We are to understand, that in the eternity hath been a nature in the eternal will, as an eternal mind, but in the will it was but a spirit. And the substance of its powerfulness (sufficiency or ability) was (N.B.) not manifest, except only in the playing of the will, which is the eternal wisdom. (N.B. 1.) That here expressly a manifestation is asserted, so well as denied: denied with respect to nature as nature generated, but asserted with respect to the eternal will; yet (N.B.) not with respect to this will, considered strictly as an abyssal will in itself, but considered as playing with itself, that is, with its byss, which byss itself is a manifestation of the first abyssal will. In this consideration then, nature was manifest in and to that will, before it is to be conceived as nature generated and manifested in and to itself.

(N.B. 2.) That in this playing of the will, the Three, or Trinity is understood, as our author expressly declareth.

For this playing is a moving even that moving life of the Deity, MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, i. 7. And this playing of the abyss in or with its own byss supposeth a generation of this byss, even this eternal generation, wherein we are to understand three things, before and without the eternal manifestation thereof in and through nature.

(N.B. 3.) That this playing is the eternal wisdom. If there is Wisdom (in what sense soever) before and without the manifestation in nature, there is also a Trinity before and without it; for that implyeth this, and this is inseparable from that. So then our author says here in the SIGNATURA RERUM, that self-same which he saith in MYSTERIUM MAGNUM.

But let us go now a little further,

In the AURORA, which was our Author's first book, written as he thought only for himself, and, according to his own words, like as by a stammering child, we shall not find so much as one word of the first world, or of the first consideration of God, as generating himself in himself in trinity, without and above all nature. Not the least mention of an eternal nothing, temperature, liberty, chaos, mysterium magnum, abyssal eye, mirror of wonders, eternal generation wherein we are to understand three things, etc. :

Note.— $\Lambda^1 \oplus^2 \oplus^3 \top^4 \ominus^5$

But his deepest consideration is only the generation of eternal nature, in its seven distinct properties ; from whence he proceeds immediately to the creation and fall of Lucifer, and further to the creation of this third principle. His account of the seven properties of eternal nature is here and there different from what he declared thereof in his following writings ; especially concerning the generation of the fire, which is not so distinctly and circumstantially declared as afterwards. But the true reason thereof, is this : The understanding of the seven-fold generation, and chiefly of the fourth property thereof, depends a great deal upon an understanding of that eternal liberty, lubet, chaos, temperature, which is before and without nature. He then, as yet having no understanding of what is without nature, could not have declared the generation of the fire from an eternal conjunction of the liberty, with the dark properties of nature ; but could and did declare it only so far as then his eye could reach. So therefore accordingly in the AURORA, he says very much of the most holy Trinity, but only as manifested in and through nature. Though he doth not yet use this word of manifestation, as distinct from his eternal generation in himself, for the reason mentioned above. All therefore that he says of the Trinity throughout the whole Aurora, is to be referred only to the second consideration of God, implying and presupposing the generation of eternal nature.

So also in the THREE PRINCIPLES, his second book, written seven years after the first, when the day-light, as he says, had overtaken the first dawning of the day, we may find indeed a clearer and more distinct explanation and continuation of what he had begun in the AURORA, concerning especially the generation of this our third principle ; but we shall not find anything of this eternal generation of God in himself, without all nature, wherein we are to understand three things.

If now that former declaration of the Trinity, which implyeth and pre-supposeth the generation of nature, is the deepest and the only declaration thereof, why hath not our author in his following writings kept unto this only ? Why hath he, or how could he have given us quite another and as he says, a deeper consideration thereof, under such an express title : so, or so far is God considered as in himself only without all nature.

May not this show us sufficiently that when he wrote these two books, he had not yet that great opening of the first abyssal world in his spirit ; but only an opening of the second world, or of the generation of eternal nature in its two principles ? And that his description of the Trinity in this beginning is good and true, and solid indeed, but not yet the deepest ; and that he hath given us a deeper one in his following books, after he had a deeper opening in his spirit. In which deeper description therefore he speaketh, like as from another world, so also of another thing, for though he speaks but of one Trinity, and not of two, yet this one may be called in a sense and manner, another thing when it is looked upon in the first world and another again when in the second. Wherefore it doth evidence itself, that we ought not to confound the one description with the other, nor to take the one only, and to reject the other, much less to fight with the one against the other, but to leave each of them in its own place : the first, which afterwards was given, above nature, is of no benefit to us who are in nature, and yet of necessity to be known, if we will understand the deepest original of all what is posterior : and the second, which was given in the beginning, in nature, as that which we are only concerned with, and which our regeneration and eternal happiness depends upon. So doing we shall lose nothing of his writings, but find all the parts thereof in union and concordance. [N.B.]

Now this latter description of the Divine Being in Trinity, before and without nature, we find also not to be so full and plain, when he began to have an opening thereof, as it was afterwards, when it came to be wider and wider, but as this opening in his spirit went on gradually, so also his understanding and description did by degrees.

For in the THREEFOLD LIFE, his third book, which might be called with respect to this particular point, his Aurora ; we cannot yet find a distinct consideration of God in Trinity, before and without nature, when yet we may find a plain disposition thereto, and as it were a mixture of these two considerations. Ch. iv. 86, 87, 88 he saith, In the number Three are three centres, which are understood in eternal nature, but (N.B.) without nature, they are not understood. For without nature (N.B.) the name of God is Majesty, but in nature he is called Father, Son, and Holy Ghost.—That which is without nature profits me nothing, I could to all eternity, neither see, nor feel, nor fathom it—but since the Majesty (N.B.) hath generated nature, and hath thus opened or manifested itself therein in three persons, I do rejoice in that opening or manifestation, as a creature living therein eternally.

Let us here observe, (1.) that in this third book of his, our author owns that, which in the first and second he was silent and doubtless quite ignorant of ; viz. that there is something without eternal nature.

(2.) That he says of a number three and of three centres, both without and in eternal nature, with this distinction, that in nature they are understood, and without nature not understood.

(3.) That he useth before and without eternal nature, that relative expression of three centres, in answerableness to the three things in the Mysterium Magnum, and in opposition to the three persons manifested in nature. Whereby he placeth expressly before nature, not only One, as generating itself in Three, but also Three, as generated out of One, in the eternal generation without nature, and manifesting themselves also to be Three in nature.

(4.) That he says positively, Without nature, the name of God is Majesty ; and giveth us this (N.B.) as a reason, why the three centres, or things without nature cannot be understood. Which must be further considered by and by.

(5.) That he placeth the three distinct names of Father, Son and Holy Ghost in nature ; and without nature, that only single name of Majesty, which yet is such a one as by no means can be attributed unto the Unity, considered as abstracted from and antecedent to that eternal generation, whereby God in himself generates himself in Trinity, but is a name common unto all three, and must needs be attributed to the Tri-unity.

Whereby therefore he combineth the Unity with the Trinity before and without nature.

(6.) The Majesty hath generated nature, therefore not the Unity, but the Tri-unity hath generated nature.

(7.) That he distinctly says, the Majesty hath opened or manifested itself in nature in Three persons. If the Majesty hath opened, or manifested itself in nature, it hath not generated through nature a Trinity, but hath only manifested that which before was generated. Or else the distinction between generation and manifestation could signify nothing.

But a question will here arise, What sense can there be in the words, without nature the name of God is Majesty? Since Behmen says, that without nature is no light, lustre, glory, etc.

I know it may be said, for to reconcile this, The first abyssal will is before and without nature, and hath if so considered, as in and to itself, no majesty. This first will generated nature, and through nature it generated the second will, which is the first will's co-eternal son, called by Behmen nature's end, because it is free from nature, it is above nature, and is not belonging to nature, as one of the properties thereof, though it is generated in and through nature. Now in this eternal only begotten Son the Father's majesty appears, for He is, according to the Scripture, the brightness of his glory. Rightly therefore upon such an account, could Behmen have said, That without nature the name of God is Majesty. For in all the four chapters of the THREEFOLD LIFE, he placeth the generation of eternal nature between the first will, which is Father, and the second, which is the Father's co-eternal Son. Setting thus the Father before, and the Son after nature, but free from nature, and above or without it, as well as the Father.

This explication now, I grant is plausible, if looked upon from without, and superficially: for Behmen's own words do plainly say all these things; and if there were but that due and true distinction observed, between the eternal generation without nature, and the eternal manifestation in nature, and through nature, nothing more could be desired. But seeing that in this representation, and the application thereof to the majesty without nature, a confusion is made between these two, a great mistake is committed.

Yet none can be blamed for this mistake, because Behmen himself, in this book of the THREEFOLD LIFE, (for reasons mentioned above) maketh as it were a mixture of the two considerations of the Divine Being, and doth use many times the word generation, when he speaks of the eternal manifestation. For which also neither can he be blamed, (1.) because not only in this beginning of the daybreak, as to this particular point he could not yet (as it is probable enough) discern sufficiently the one from the other. But also, (2.) because upon a good account, and with a particular respect, he could well have used the word generation, even in discoursing of the eternal manifestation through nature.

But yet from his following descriptions, when he was more especially upon this point, of the eternal generation in Trinity before nature, it is clear enough that such a distinction must be observed, and by them also this may be understood sufficiently, which of itself alone, would not be intelligible enough.

But the mistake in this account or explication of the word Majesty, is plain enough from hence, viz:

If Behmen by saying, without nature the name of God is Majesty, doth understand that majesty which is after nature, and is rightly called without nature, in a sense, and upon an account given thereof above; it must needs be a wrong and preposterous saying, when he adds, the Majesty hath generated nature, for this is absolutely false, and much rather must he have said, nature hath generated the Majesty, for this is true in its sense and place, but cannot be applied here. Where he, by saying the pure contrary, the Majesty hath generated nature, doth show sufficiently, that by this majesty he understands not that. Wherefore then, we must needs look out for such another sense as may be consistent with himself.

It is certain that the majesty of the Second Principle of light and glory is not here understood. And it is certain also, that we cannot compare this place with any other parallel one, in which he might have the same, or the like expression of a Majesty without nature.

Wherefore having observed, (1.) that this is the only place, in which he says, without nature the name of God is Majesty. And (2.) that this is the first place, in which he makes any mention of the Divine Being without nature, in distinction from an eternal manifestation thereof in nature, I say now upon this ground further, that here he had, the first time, upon his spirit that opening of the first abyssal world, with such an effect, as that his sight was instantly confounded and consumed, so that in a different sense, as mentioned above, he had seen and not seen.

That same now which he here in this first opening had seen or observed without nature, he calleth Majesty. Not that he had perceived or seen something distinctly, which could have given him a proper idea of what we use to call so, but because he could not find a more convenient expression than to call that Majesty, which his spirit could not bear, and was not able to look upon, and which must needs have been transcendently more terrible and awful to its eye, than the visible majesty of a great Ahasuerus was to queen Esther, etc.

And that he meant here by Majesty nothing else but this, may appear from this plain construction of his words, Without nature the three centres are not understood. For, says he, without nature the name of God is Majesty, giving us this name, as a proper reason, why the Three before nature cannot be understood. This Majesty therefore must needs denote something which is confounding man's understanding, not only by its own being so far above it that it cannot be looked upon, but also and even chiefly, by its working upon it so strongly, that all its natural powers must be overcome thereby. All which he asserts plainly of the chaos, or Eye full of wonders which is before nature.

However it be with this expression, it is undeniable, that since this majesty hath generated nature, which nature in its first appearance sheweth us the spiritual figure of a triangle, Δ, the three centres or things without nature, must needs be those three, which this triangle in nature is generated from, etc.

His fourth book of the FORTY QUESTIONS we shall pass by, though a considerable place relating to the Majesty without nature might be observed.

In the fifth book then of the INCARNATION he begins to distinguish expressly the two considerations of God in Trinity. Part II. i. 8—12, he sheweth us the eternity without nature and its eternal stillness, the Eye of eternity, and looking-glass of wonders; the first Abyssal Will with its magia, which we are not to search into, because it hath no original, but compriseth or maketh itself in itself, and is without all nature. (Ergo, there is (N.B.) a magia in the eternal generation, which is distinct and different from that magia that is in and belongs to eternal nature.) Vid. S. x POINTS i. 17.

Further he speaks of an eternal beginning, and an eternal end; of an eternal wisdom, or mirror of wonders distinct from the seeing and from the eternal Spirit; and which is of the greatest consideration, he says also of a desire of the first abyssal will, and that this desire is drawing of itself, which he explains by saying, this desire is the will's outgoing lubet, or pleasure, ergo, not that desire to nature, which is the beginning and first property thereof.

Chapter ii. he begins with the eternal byss, which the abyss, says he, maketh in itself, and maketh it by the desire, which in the chapter before was called Lubet, and here is expressly explained by imagination, and so distinguished again from the desire in nature. See of this distinction SIGNATURA RERUM, vi. 1, 2, where he plainly says, The desire is a hungry will, and is the natural spirit in his properties, but the lubet is out of the liberty, for God is desireless, as to his own being (or in himself) seeing that he wants nothing, all is his, and he himself is All. But a Lubet, he hath, and is himself that will, to manifest himself, etc.* He will manifest himself in nature, which manifestation cannot be done without the desire. But having in himself a lubet, wherein the eternal generation of the Trinity is implied, he is manifest in and to himself, before and without the manifestation in nature, and cannot but know, etc. himself. [* a lust-will, in the German.]

This eternal generation now our author further declareth, by an impregnation of the abyssal will, which makes in the abyss a byss. And by a motion, as distinct and different from that which is the second property of nature, as the lubet is distinct and different from the desire. And thus, says he, we know an eternal abyssal Divine Being, and therein Three persons, none of which is the other. viz. the eternal Will, which is the cause of all beings, is the first—In this will originateth the eternal beginning through imagination, wherein the Will impregnateth itself out of the Eye of wisdom, which is with the will in an equal eternity, without ground and beginning. This impregnation is the ground, or byss, of the will, the Son, heart, word, sound, or (N.B.) manifestation of the Abyss.—The third is the Spirit.

And that no one may fancy that eternal Nature is here implied, because there is spoken therein of a desire, moving, life, etc. he prevents that misapprehension by expressly adding, This now is a short declaration of the Deity in the Abyss, showing how God dwelleth in himself, and is himself the centre of generation. But the human mind doth not acquiesce with this, but it enquireth after Nature, viz. after that whereout this world is generated, and all things created, etc.

In his sixth book, called the SIX POINTS, i. 1—22. He first speaks of an unessential will, which is dumb, mute, and without knowledge of itself, until the fiery essences are raised therein, which cannot be raised up without desire, etc. Now this causeth the misapprehension of such an absolute necessity, as that the generation of nature, from the desire unto the production of fire, must be implied and pre-supposed in every consideration of the Trinity.

But let this here be taken notice of, that after he had spoken of such an unessential will, and applied it to the first abyssal will, he goeth on immediately to a consideration of a God in Trinity, without all nature, and sheweth us, that the first abyssal will, (which is unessential indeed, and therefore dumb and mute, if considered strictly as to itself alone) is not alone before and without nature, and therefore also not unessential, and not dumb, and mute, but becometh essential in and by its own co-eternal byss, generated by the desire, viz. by that which before he had called lubet, pleasure, imagination, etc. and not by that desire, which is the beginning and first property of nature. For this byss is the only essence or essentiality of the abyss. And so is nature with all its properties from this consideration utterly excluded, and to be conceived as posterior.

Thus he saith directly, when he had spoken of the eternal Eye, mirror, etc., Here we understand the eternal being of the Divine Trinity, together with the abyssal Wisdom. For the eternal will comprehending the eye, is the Father, That which is comprehended in the wisdom, wherein the comprehending makes a ground, byss, or centre in itself, is the Son or heart; for it is the word of Life, or (N.B.) his essence wherein the will with its glance appears.

And that we may have no apprehension of nature herein implied, he excludes it thus, Thus we understand, that the Divine Being in Trinity in the abyss, dwelleth in itself, and generateth a byss in itself.

Again, Thus we understand, what the Divine Being is in itself without a principle and what the eternal beginning is in the abyss, and the eternal end in its own byss generated in itself.

Again, In that wisdom, (wherein the eternal generation of the word, in the will was done, and is still doing from eternity to eternity) the eternal principle, as a hidden fire, was known in the figure from eternity, and is known so in that wisdom to all eternity.

Here (N.B. 1.) that there is something before and without nature, which, upon a good account, may be called an eternal end, distinct from an eternal beginning, and that this eternal end is that same, which, in the eternal manifestation thereof, made in and through nature, is called nature's end. And that nevertheless there is a distinction between them running parallel with that, which there is between generation and manifestation, lubet and desire, three things or centres and three persons, etc.

(N.B. 2.) That here expressly is asserted, the principle of fire, that is nature, not only was known, but also, is still known, in that wisdom, which in the eternal generation of God in himself, is implied, and is even known in the figure only, as a hidden fire, that is, as not yet generated or brought forth actually.

If we then are to understand a Trinity without a principle, and if in the wisdom of this Trinity, the principle is known as a thing still hid, how can we think that the manifestation of this principle, or the generation of nature, must be implied or pre-supposed in, or is required as needful to the eternal generation of this Trinity? And how can knowing, perceiving, etc. in this Trinity be denied?

It is not only said, It was known so, as if this knowing had ceased in and by the manifestation of the principle, but it is also expressly said, It is still known so. This Trinity therefore, and this wisdom must still be a Trinity and a knowing wisdom in itself, and must still be considered as before, without and above nature, notwithstanding that nature is actually generated. Quod erat demonstrandum.

The next in order is the little treatise of the EARTHLY AND HEAVENLY MYSTERY, comprehended in Nine Texts.

Thus then he begins: The abyss is an eternal nothing, but maketh an eternal beginning, as a seeking. For the nothing is a seeking after something; and yet there is nothing which could give anything; but the seeking itself is the giving of that, which itself also is nothing but a desiring seeking. If then there is thus a seeking in the nothing, this seeking maketh in itself the will to be something, and this will is a spirit, like as a thought, this goeth out from the seeking, and is the seeking's seeker, for it findeth its mother which is the seeking.—And herein we understand, that the will is a spirit, and is another thing than the desiring seeking.—For the will is an imperceptible and unknowable life; but the seeking is found by the will, and is a being in the will. Now it is understood, that the seeking is a magia, and the will a magus, and that the will is greater than his mother.—

Thus we give you in short to understand Nature and the Spirit of nature.—If then thus the eternal will is free from the seeking, but the seeking not free from the will, seeing the will ruleth over the seeking, we own therefore the will to be an eternal omnipotence, for he hath nothing equal unto itself. And the seeking is indeed a moving from the attraction or desire, but without understanding, and hath indeed a life, but without science. Now the will ruleth the life of the seeking, and doth with it what he pleaseth; and though he doth something, yet it is not known, until that being with the will doth manifest itself.—And thus we own the eternal will-spirit to be God, and the moving life of the seeking to be nature. For there is nothing sooner, both is without beginning; each is a cause of the other, and it is an eternal band.—And thus the will-spirit is an eternal knowing, or understanding of the abyss, and the life of the seeking is an eternal being of the will.

These are the words of our author, wherein he represents God and Nature. And from hence is now inferred and said, We see here, that he begins with the first abyssal will, and placeth nature in an equal eternity with the abyss; that he not only says, the abyss is an eternal nothing, but also, that the seeking (or nature) makes in itself this nothing to be something, and this even so, that he calleth this seeking the mother of the will, and the will an imperceptible, unknowable life. And again he says expressly, There is nothing sooner than these two, they are both without beginning, and each of them is a cause of the other.

Wherefore then, we cannot conceive a Trinity in any sense, nor any knowing, perceiving, or understanding, before and without nature; but we must conceive such an eternal Nothing, or such an Unity only, as afterwards is made Something, and is unfolded into Three, not only in nature, but also by the help and concurrence of nature. This is the argument drawn from this treatise against the Trinity before nature.

Trusting on the Divine help, I thus endeavour to answer it.

(1.) Then I say justly, that in this whole treatise, he hath no intent to show us directly the Trinity, neither as considered before, nor as in and after nature; but his purpose is only in general, to show the deepest and most internal original of this our third principle, and especially of things done and existent therein in contrarieties. This he deduceth rightly from the first abyssal will; and from that seeking, whereby afterwards he understandeth nature, saying, That there is nothing sooner than these two. All which is obvious and evident of itself, unto every attentive reader of this treatise, from the beginning to the end. Wherefore then

(2.) In all these words alleged concerning God, he speaks not of God considered as the whole Divine Being, and hath no occasion, much less necessity to tell us, in this place and for this purpose, what this Divine Being is in itself, or in its own eternal generation;

But he speaks of the abyss, only considered strictly by itself, and as abstracted from the byss. Which abyss, so considered, is God indeed, and may be called so; because it cannot be separated from its byss any further, than as to our separate consideration, but is not fully God, because not all what the name of God imports; and what we are to understand in God, is in this separate consideration implied. And (3.) In all these words concerning Nature, he speaks not of nature, as nature actually generating or generated, but as considered before its generation and before it can properly be called nature. This is undeniable from v. 8 in the Fourth Text, and v. 3 in the Fifth, where he calleth these two, viz. God and nature, not only two mysteries, but also two principles.

By calling them two mysteries, he gives us to understand, that neither this nor that is as yet unfolded, but that each of them is looked upon as still concentrated in itself; for this is, in his style, the signification of a mysterium.

And by calling them two principles, he sheweth us plainly enough, that here he takes not the name of principles in that sense, in which he takes it when he speaketh of the three principles throughout all his writings. For in this sense, he says himself that God is not a principle. And in this sense Nature also is not a principle in the singular number, but if considered as nature generated, is itself the two principles of fire and light, which the third is a visible outbirth of. But he calleth them two principles in that notorious common sense, in which the originals or the most radical beginnings of things, are called the principles thereof. And this latter sense is applicable both to God and nature, but not that former.

If then nature is called a principle in the singular number, and this even so, that it is joined in conjunction with God, called in the same sense a principle; nature must needs be considered as yet before the generation of fire and light, and as lying still in the first abyssal will, as a hidden fire, which burneth, and burneth not, according to his own expression above.

In which state, or rather in the consideration of which state, it must nevertheless be looked upon as distinct from the first abyssal will, without making any kind of mixture or confusion between them. And this distinction of the one principle from the other, or of nature from the first abyssal will, he sheweth here as in the deepest root, and saith nothing at all of its properties; nay he doth not call it directly nature, but a seeking, and the will a seeker, and saith afterwards only, that by this seeking (viz. in its progress and unfolding itself), nature is understood. So therefore it is plain, that here in this place he considereth nature, as not yet nature generated, but nevertheless as distinct from the first abyssal will, and (according to his own words) a mysterium in itself, distinct from that other mysterium, which is God, or that of God which Behmen calleth the abyss, and considereth as not yet unfolded in a byss. All which concerning nature, is punctually agreeing not only with this whole treatise, but with the rest of Behmen's writings. Now then

(4.) Our author not intending in this place, to declare what God is in himself, viz. what the whole Divine Being is in its own eternal generation in Three; nor also what Nature is, in its unfolding and displaying itself into seven; but only to declare what God and nature are in the deepest root with a mutual respect to each other, before they are to be considered, as three and seven, he could well have said, The Abyss is an eternal nothing, but maketh an eternal beginning, which is a seeking, etc. But if he had had an occasion and a mind in this place, as he had in others, to declare what the whole Divine Being is in itself, without nature, without a principle, in its own eternal generation only, he would have turned these words quite another way, and would have said, certainly to this effect, The Abyss is an eternal nothing, but maketh an eternal beginning, which is its co-eternal byss, heart, Son, or word, etc.: for so we find he hath said in many places, especially in the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM.

Where he not only saith of the abyss, that it is the will towards something, and the father of the beginning to the byss; but also of the byss, that this is the first will's eternal finding, and the perceptibility thereof, the ens (or something) of that abyss, which in comparison to the byss, is nothing, notwithstanding that it is also all in itself. And further calleth he that byss, the seat or habitation of the abyssal will, the eternal mind, the ground, and (N.B.) the beginning of all beings.

So then we see manifestly, that in two different considerations, in a twofold sense, and upon a twofold account, he speaketh of a twofold finding, and of a twofold beginning. Now we cannot take the one only, and reject the other, nor can we oppose the one to the other; but we must take each in its own place, and no contrariety can then appear.

The Abyss, which, if strictly and abstractedly considered as in and to itself only, is an imperceptible, unknowing, and unmoving being, or nothing, in comparison to all what is posterior, doth on the one hand find and perceive himself in himself; and this in and by his byss, which is his only begotten Son, in whom he is well pleased, and which is one with the Father. And on the other hand, the same abyss doth find and perceive himself without himself; and this in and by nature, as yet called here but a seeking: which Nature or seeking is not one with the Father, and is never called by Behmen the Son, heart, word, seat, etc. of God; though he be called the father of nature.

And so also concerning the beginning; the byss is the beginning of something in the eternal generation, when God, viz. the whole Divine Being is considered as in himself only:

And this seeking is the beginning of something in nature. The two beginnings are well consistent with each other, and none can destroy nor deny the other.

This I could demonstrate from more than twenty places, but one from this treatise will suffice. See then Text iv. 3, 4, 5, and Text v. 1. Where you shall find, that he says not only of an impregnation and generation in the spiritual life, or in God, according to what we heard thereof above, from many other places, but also (N.B.) that this generation goeth inwards (introrsum) into itself, and dwelleth in itself; when contrariwise the nature-life, or the generation of nature, from this seeking goeth outwards, (extrorsum) towards without, or straightway forward.

And though he says also, That these two are not without one another, yet he explains himself by adding immediately, So that there were a separation between them. Without one another therefore they are so far, and upon this account, that without mixture each of them is in itself that which it is, and neither of them doth or can comprehend and contain the other, in its own essentiality;

When there is nevertheless an eternal band, and union between them.

If then this be so, no argument can be brought forth from this saying, The Abyss makes an eternal beginning, which is a seeking; as if this position must needs exclude, or could overthrow all what he says, in twenty places, of an eternal generation of God in himself, and of an eternal beginning in this generation. For, if we shall conceive, according to the words of this treatise just now quoted, that in the Divine Being, from the first abyssal will one progress is made towards within, and another towards without; we must needs conceive also, that each of them must have its own beginning.

For the beginning of the one, which needs must be considered as it were an essential part thereof, cannot be a beginning and part of the other; though these two beginnings may be both together at once, and even inseparable from each other.

And if thus in this treatise is inserted an impregnation of the first abyssal will, and such a generation as tendeth towards within, and dwelleth in itself; with a notorious distinction from nature, which tendeth towards without, and dwelleth in itself also; it is plain and clear, that in this treatise is asserted, though not declared particularly, the selfsame eternal generation, before, without, and above all nature, whereof we have heard so much hitherto, and wherein we are to understand three things. But,

(5.) There will be still replied, That Behmen says expressly, that there is nothing sooner than these two, viz. the abyss, and the seeking. If then these two are the soonest, we cannot conceive three to be sooner than these two.

Answer. In this consideration of God and nature, both looked upon as tending towards without, he says rightly, there is nothing sooner than these two.

For in our inquiry, made backwards, from the most outward things, towards the most internal root thereof, where always the remoter cause is conceived as sooner, prior or deeper, than that which is nearer, we cannot proceed any further, and can therefore find nothing sooner than these two. But in that other consideration, wherein we say with Behmen, That there is an eternal generation, whereby God generates himself in himself in Trinity, and this from eternity to eternity, without a principle, and without all nature; we may freely say the same words, There is nothing sooner than these three, viz. the abyss, the byss, and the band of union between them.

For seeing that the same abyss, is the first of these three, and the first also of these two, and this even so, that neither here nor there, this abyss can be separated, from what, so well here as there, is joined with it in union;

There is an equal beginning of numeration on both sides, and nothing can here be sooner than the three, like as there also nothing can be sooner than the two; and the three must needs be so deep and so central, and radical in this latter consideration, as the two are in that former. Nay, we may say also more, upon a good account, and without contradicting Behmen, that the three are sooner than the two.

For it is plain enough, that by saying so we do not mean, that there was a time, or instant, wherein the three were and the two were not; which would be most ridiculously said, that the abyss was sooner than the abyss, because the abyss was, when the abyss was not.

But we own with Behmen that the two are co-eternal to the three, and by saying, The three were sooner, we mean only, that in our regular conception they are to be conceived as if they were sooner, and that it would be a preposterous doing to conceive them otherwise.

Because we cannot say in any sense, that the abyss is descended from nature, or from this seeking, but we must say, that nature, with all that belongs to it, is descended from the abyss. For the abyss makes the seeking, says Behmen, but not the seeking makes the abyss. Wherefore then, we conceive this abyss as the very deepest and most internal, central root, driving forth as it were, in the same instant, two collateral branches, the one towards within, and the other towards without; and so far we say, Neither this nor that is sooner, but the abyss itself is sooner than both its branches. But further, upon another and deeper account, seeing that this same abyss is incomparably nearer related, and infinitely more familiar to that branch which is driven forth within, than to that which is without. For that which is within is one with itself, and equal unto itself, generated in its own bosom, and dwelling in it for ever;

When that which is without is different from itself, inferior in dignity, and used but as an instrument in its hand, etc. we can by no means therefore think or say, That which is within, is descended caused or originated from or by that which is without. But we must say, That which is without is from that which is within; and that which is within must needs therefore be sooner than that which is without.

Now, that which is without sheweth us presently, in its first unfolding, the spiritual figure of a triangle; and that which is within, is nothing else but those three, that are to be understood in the generation of God himself in himself. If then these three within are not from the three without, but these latter from the former; the three within are rightly conceived and said to be sooner than the three without.

And to show that this is not a construction of my own, see SIX POINTS, chapter i. v. 9 where having declared what the abyss is, not as here, with respect and relation to nature, but as considered absolutely in itself; and having told us, that it is an eternal seeing Eye, wherein nature lieth hid, and is nevertheless seen and known, etc. he says expressly the same words, which he says here, There is nothing sooner than this eye, nothing is before it, which were deeper, etc.

From hence now it is evident, that if nature itself in general, and so also all what belongs unto nature in particular, was seen and known, nay, which is much more significant, is still seen and known in the figure, as a hidden fire before, or sooner than it is nature generated or unfolded: Further, if this seeing and knowing nature, doth imply (as hath been proved) the eternal generation in Trinity: and again, if there is nothing deeper or sooner than this seeing Eye; the Three in the eternal generation within, must needs be conceived as sooner or deeper than nature, with all its three and seven without.

Nay, from the plain words of this same treatise, it may be proved sufficiently. For he makes an express plain distinction, between within and without, saying not only Text v. 1, that the one of these two mysteriums tends towards within, and the other towards without; but he says also more explicitly Text iv. 4, that since the abyss is impregnated, the generation goeth towards within, and dwelleth in itself, for the essence of the other life (viz. of nature) cannot comprehend this impregnation, and cannot be a receiver, (or a receptacle) thereof. So therefore the impregnation must go into itself, and must be its own receptacle, which is a son in the eternal Spirit, etc.

Now it is evident to every one, that always that which is within must be conceived as deeper than that which is without, and seeing that always that which is within, is a source, cause, ground, original, root, etc. of that which is without; that therefore which is within must in one sense needs be conceived as sooner than that which is without, notwithstanding that in another sense, the one is so soon as the other.

If then here in this treatise, such an impregnation and generation of a Son is asserted, as tendeth towards within, with an express exclusion of nature, which is said that it goeth towards without, and that it cannot comprehend this generation, then there is in this book as well as in any other of our author, an eternal generation, without and above all nature, asserted, though not declared particularly.

But,

(6.) It is objected also, That Behmen placeth nature next or immediately to the abyss, and that therefore nature must be conceived as standing in the midst, between the abyss and byss, and consequently no Trinity at all can be imagined, before and without nature.

Answer. Rightly doth he place nature next or immediately to the abyss, as to that which is the first of all, the deepest and most central: but doth it follow from hence, that nature must be conceived as standing between abyss and byss? By no means; it would follow indeed, if there could be shown, that Behmen placeth the byss at a further distance from the abyss, behind or after nature. But no such thing may be found in any of all his writings.

He placeth the byss not only so near, but also, in a sense even nearer and more immediately to the abyss, than nature; so that abyss, nature and byss are not to be conceived as three things following the one upon the other in a direct forward line, but, the byss and nature are to be conceived as two collateral branches, the former tending from the abyss towards within, and the latter from the same abyss towards without. Of this see MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, vii. 6. The Father, says he, is the will of the abyss: he is without all nature or beginning; the will towards something: this (father) sets himself into a tubet for his own manifestation, and this tubet is the will's or Father's power comprehended; and is his son, heart, and seat; the first eternal beginning in the will, etc.

Pray what can be plainer, and more for our position? If the byss or Son is the first eternal beginning in the will, how can that beginning, which is, in a sense, without the will, and which the abyss maketh with the seeking, be before it, and stand between the abyss and the byss? And if this beginning is rightly called the first, so well as that, so that there is nothing sooner than this, and nothing also sooner than that, must not they both be conceived as two collateral branches?

And must we not say, The seeking is the first in that progress, which tendeth towards without; and the byss the first in that generation which is within? If we then will not turn out of doors, or make it an insignificant nugatory prattling, what he says of such a distinction, between within and without, we cannot but freely see and own, that from his placing nature next and immediately to the abyss, no argument can be taken against an eternal generation in Trinity without all nature.

(7.) Concerning that part of this argument, where there is said, Behmen calleth the abyss an eternal nothing, and says, the seeking, that is, nature maketh this nothing to be something in itself, which seeking therefore he calleth expressly the mother and the cause thereof; so then we are not to think of any other something, but what is made in and by nature.

Concerning this, I say, little more wants to be added, for what we declared hitherto doth answer all these things sufficiently. It is demonstrated above, that the abyss is not absolutely nothing in and to itself, though it is rightly called nothing, with respect and in comparison to nature. For the abyss in itself, is an eternal seeing Eye, which seeth and knoweth nature, in the figure, as a hidden fire, before it is nature generated. Nature therefore doth not make the abyss to be something to itself, and Behmen tells us no such thing, but the pure contrary: he tells us, viz. that nature makes this nothing (which before was nothing in and to nature) to be now something in and to itself, that is, in and to nature, not in and to the abyss. How can nature make something in the abyss, when it is not only without it, and tendeth altogether towards without, but also, when it is itself made by the abyss to be an eternal beginning, and when this abyss is in itself beginningless, nay, when it is an abyssal seeing Eye, which seeth nature before it can be called nature? Nowhere shall we find in Behmen, that nature makes the abyss to be an abyss, neither that it is called the mother and the cause of the abyss, but only (N.B.) of the will.

There will be replied, The abyss and the will are but one, if then nature is the cause of the will, it is the cause of the abyss also. Answer. It is true, they are but one; but it is true also, that in this consideration, they are nicely to be distinguished, and you may find this distinction plainly enough throughout the three or four first texts of this treatise.

The abyss is in this consideration prior to the will, and is an absolute name, bearing no relation to nature; but the will is a relative name, and implieth a notorious tending towards without. The abyss as abyss is nothing to nature, for there is not yet any concern between them; but this abyss as a will towards nature, is now concerned with nature, and is upon this account something to nature, and no more something only to itself. The abyss, considered as abyss only and strictly in itself, is not the father of nature, but an eye, seeing nature before it is nature generated; but this same abyss considered as a will towards nature, is the father of nature. Nature therefore is not the cause of the abyss's being an abyss, but may be called the cause of the abyss's having a will to nature, and further of being a father of nature; because from nature's being seen in the abyss before it was nature, this will is to be conceived, as raising itself and tending towards without, like as almost in such a manner, a son may be called a cause of his father's being a father, but not of his having been a man, fit and sufficient for his generation. So now this something, in the progress from the abyss towards without, cannot make us to fix our eyes upon itself only, and to deny that there is any other something, but what is made in and by nature. But rather it directs us to look up higher, for that something which we find in the eternal generation, which turneth as it were away from nature, and tendeth towards within.

For it is plain and obvious everywhere in all the books of Behmen, that the byss in this eternal generation is constantly called the father's or abyss's ens, essence or something, his eternal perception, his heart, word or son, wherein the father is well pleased, etc.

Having now, as I hope, sufficiently answered all the parts of this great objection, we are to proceed further—

[NOTE.—Not finished: because the objector (one Mr. Pierce) owned himself mistaken, and satisfied by thus much, as expressed in the following letter:—"Sir,—I return many thanks for the sight of these papers; before which I did not distinguish between the eternal generation and the eternal manifestation, but conceived the Threefold Spirit in the Abyss to be ungenerate and hidden; but now I understand the Triune Spirit to be, in the abyss generate and manifest to itself before nature. And that which pleaseth me much more is to see none of the former descriptions denied or laid aside, but reconciled with the latter, which I did not understand further than the eternal nature; but might well have expected more in them than in the former, had I considered that the author saith, the descriptions are one deeper than another, and that he saw more and more; but I not minding this, took the former to be complete, and thought he knew all at first though not able to set it all down: and for that reason I laid by what I could not find in them, thinking it was enough to know as far as the eternal nature; and so did not much study the latter descriptions, and some I never saw. But now I am glad to find so harmonious a concordance in all; and have no objection against anything in these papers, one of which is more than enough to satisfy me: for I am soon convinced by reasonable arguments, being but a learner, and never expect to understand all this author hath written, and am best when I think I know nothing; and ever thought that there could be no difference in the apprehensions of those that love and study this author, but what might easily be reconciled."]

The Third of the selected Extracts and abstracts from Freher is headed, "POSITIONS CONCERNING GOD in UNITY and TRINITY, considered both as BEFORE and AFTER ETERNAL NATURE, according to BEHMEN's CENTRAL THEOSOPHY," thus:—

I.—The first and deepest consideration of God in unity and trinity, is not that which JACOB BEHMEN hath delivered in his Aurora, declaring always together and intermixing with it the generation of eternal nature in its seven properties, or fountain spirits.

But that is the first and deepest, which afterwards he gave us in the most of his following books, where he calleth it an eternal generation of God in himself, in trinity, without all nature.

II.—In this first and deepest consideration, God is not to be conceived according to any such definitions, as usually do ascribe unto him all the highest and most glorious attributes, be they either such as are generally found out and owned by all created spirits, to be truly divine perfections, or also such as are expressly mentioned in the holy Scriptures.

III.—This is the ground of Behmen's saying so much of an eternal nothing, oneness, chaos, temperature, etc.; of his denying in God thoughts, deliberations, decrees, consultations, predestinations, etc. about things to be created, or governed in such or such a manner; and further of his taking wisdom in different senses, and placing it now before, and then again after the trinity.

IV.—None of the true perfections imaginable are hereby denied in God, even not in this first and deepest consideration without all nature. But the meaning is only this, that in this consideration, they cannot yet be a distinct object of our understanding. Because they are still to be looked upon, as not yet unfolded out of their root, or centre, which he calleth an universal all, no less than eternal nothing. And if we do conceive them by distinct ideas, we show but forth thereby, that our consideration doth not go beyond the generation of eternal nature.

V.—It is not hereby asserted, that such definitions of God, as may be seen in all the systems of Divines, are to be rejected as erroneous and hurtful; rather they are freely owned to be good, profitable, and sufficient to instruct men in what they are to know of God, for their eternal salvation. But it is asserted only, that they are not central, and do not declare, as Behmen doth, what God is in himself, without nature.

VI.—When God is considered by Behmen without all nature, but yet still with some relation and comparison to creatures, He is said to be an eternal nothing, an ineffable and unintelligible oneness, a most internal ground, root or source of all created beings, which by none of them can be named, found out or understood.

VII.—When God is considered without all nature, and as in himself only, without any relation or comparison to creatures, we must say, according to Behmen, that God is a beginningless and endless beginning, delighting in himself, and playing with himself, in the wonders of his eternal wisdom.

VIII.—In this definition, the trinity in unity without all nature is contained and expressed. By God delighting in himself, a single individual being, or an unity without distinction is expressed; when yet from the second consideration of God, as in and after nature, it doth appear, that here also before and without nature, in this same individual being three things are to be understood, so that we can say thereof truly, in some, but not in every sense, the first is not the second, and the second not the third.

IX.—For that which delighteth is to be conceived, as answering to that, which in and after eternal nature, is called Father. That which is delighted in, as answering to that which afterwards is Son. And this delight itself, as answering unto that, which afterwards is called Holy Spirit, but here, as before and without nature, a moving life of Father and Son.

X.—These three are not to be conceived as if they were three distinct beings, persons, or intellectual spirits, existing besides one another, each having his own understanding, will, etc. This would be making three Gods.

XI.—These three are but one intellectual being, having but one intellect, will and life. When nevertheless there is such a distinction between them, as is not imaginary, nor also arbitrary. But it is a distinction cum fundamento in re, representing rightly three and neither more nor less. Behmen distinguisheth them thus: he calleth them an eternal nothing, and an eternal ens, or something. Again, a beginningless and endless abyss; an eternal beginning and end, or a byss coeternal to the abyss; and an outgoing or proceeding from that abyss and byss, or also from that abyss through that byss. Again, he calleth them the first or abyssal will, the second will, or with the Scripture the eternal Word, and the moving life of the Deity. And sometimes Father, Son, and Holy Spirit.

XII.—The eternal nothing, answering or appropriable to that which after nature, is called Father, may be safely conceived so, but with this caution, that we do not think it so (nothing) in and to itself, but only so to all and every created understanding.

And when this nothing itself openeth upon the spirit of a soul, it instantly confoundeth and consumeth all its sight, and reduceth it in a sense and manner, into its own nothingness. The generation of the fourth property of eternal nature, wherein this nothing openeth, and which is to be met with more or less in the process of regeneration, is of all this not only an unexceptionable witness, but also an instructor, able enough to inform us, how we are to conceive of this eternal nothing.

XIII.—The eternal ens, or something, answerable or appropriable to what in and after nature is called Son, may safely be conceived so, as we can conceive an endless, substantial being, but with this caution, that we do not say or think, It is so to nature and creature, but only, in itself, and to that former nothing. For as to all created spirits, it is still but nothing, because it is still before, above, and without nature, and can by none of them be seen, found out, and entered into; notwithstanding that it is, in a sense, to be distinguished from that nothing, and that this nothing doth see, find and manifest itself therein, and delight in it as in its own expressed image.

XIV.—Behmen's frequent expressions of abyss and byss, are all equivalent in sense unto those of nothing and something. But because he speaks more distinctly and explicitly of abyss than of nothing, more is also to be said thereof.

When he speaketh of this abyss, declaring what it is in and to itself, he never says, that it is a nothing, but plainly and expressly in more than twenty-five places, that it is a beginningless endless Eye. This eye seeth all nature and creature, before either this or that can be called so. It seeth all the powers, products, numbers, etc. that ever are or can be brought forth into being. But it seeth none of these things as without, or as really distinct either from itself, or from one another; and seeth therefore itself only, that is in a word, its own central all-sufficiency for all these things.

XV.—Here now is the Divine intellect or Wisdom in its first and deepest sense, which Behmen also calleth wisdom expressly and in many places. And here therefore that objection saying, He placeth preposterously the will before wisdom, and wisdom after the will, contrary to sense and reason, is answered sufficiently, and must be looked as risen only from a misunderstanding him.

For though he placeth wisdom in another sense, and upon another account, not only after the will, but after the trinity, as he doth for instance in his Table of the Principles; yet here standeth wisdom, in this sense, before the will, and the will followeth immediately upon it. For

XVI.—Thirdly, when Behmen intends to proceed further, and to declare that eternal generation in three, which goeth, as it were, on the one side, from this abyss towards within; when that of eternal nature in seven tendeth on the other side, from the same abyss towards without,—he saith, This abyss is, or also, hath a will, which he calleth the first abyssal will, in distinction from the second will, that of the byss. This expression of a first and second will, doth not say that there are two wills in the Divine Being, they are one as the Father and Son are one.

The first will is not to be conceived as a will by itself, for it is not yet that which we use to call a will, but it is to be conceived as the first imperceptible disposition to the will. Which disposition is in the abyss, but as in the abyss cannot come to its maturity.

XVII.—The reason why Behmen calleth it the first will, when it cannot properly be called a will, is this: That which is in the abyss, is that self-same, which is in the byss; in the abyss in its deepest root, in the byss in a full-grown tree. If then that which is in the byss is a will rightly and properly so called; that same in the abyss may aptly though not so properly called a will, with this distinction of first. This second will he calleth also with Scripture the eternal Word, because this second will is not only an offspring produced out of the first, but chiefly such an offspring, as is an express image, manifestation, unfolding, outspeaking, or declaration of all (neither more nor less) what the first will was, or had in its own central depth.

XVIII.—The generation of our own word, within the particular sphere of every one's created being, can be in a manner, or in part, a fine though but shadowy representation thereof. For though we use to call only that a word, which is distinctly formed and pronounced; yet we know, that every such formed word hath a much deeper root, in the inmost recesses of our soul and spirit, even before it cometh to be perceptible in our mind.

Further, we know, that such a formed word is nothing else, but an opening, or manifestation or declaration of what our soul first had unformed in its own depth, or what our will first in itself, and first even insensibly was inclined or disposed unto. And then also we know, that this is nothing else but that; and that by the formation of an express word, the first disposition thereto in the will, doth only bring forth and exalt itself, and nothing but itself, unto such perfection, as it could not have had, as long as it was unformed in its first original depth.

If then that which is expressly formed and spoken forth is rightly called a word, that which this same word was, before it was thus formed, may well enough be called a word also.

XIX.—In one will, says Behmen, no knowledge of itself can be. And this is not to say, That for a knowledge of itself two wills in two distinct intellectual beings are required. But only, in this first abyssal will, if it were alone, without having brought forth and exalted itself into its own formed expressed image, viz. the second will, no perception nor knowledge of itself could be.

XX.—The abyss is all-power concentrated, and the byss the same all-power unfolded. Now this all and that all must needs be one, and no distinction can be found out between all and all; neither can there be two different alls.

XXI.—The communion between these two, which is a living beam, proceeding from the first into the second, and through the second, (and so from first and second into the eternal wisdom, delighting and playing in and with its wonders,) is the Spirit, called here by Behmen a moving life of the Deity. And this completes this holy most adorable number Three.

XXII.—Unto these three no fourth can be added, and by Behmen's saying never so much of an eternal Virgin Wisdom, no quaternity is made.

Immediately after these three, Behmen in his Table placeth Wisdom, distinguishing the outgoing from that which is gone out, and saying, that the out-going, or proceeding forth is the spirit, and that which is gone out is wisdom.

Wisdom stands rightly both in the beginning and end, or both before and after this Trinity, concluding as it were the circle of this eternal generation, which was also begun with wisdom.

Wisdom is compared by Behmen not only to a seeing Eye, but also to a Mirror full of wonders. And though he sets these two comparisons commonly together, yet he distinguisheth them also plainly enough here and there, so that this twofold comparison may not only show us that twofold sense in which he looks upon wisdom, but also direct us to that twofold place, wherein he placeth it, and show also why he speaketh before the will, and also again after the Trinity.

When he considereth the abyss, not yet as a father, but as abyss only, he saith affirmatively of it, that it is an eternal seeing eye. Here now in this place there is not yet any mention made of the will, which will makes the first beginning of the abyss's being called a father; and so also there is not yet a generation of the son, nor a proceeding of the spirit to be conceived: but this wisdom or seeing eye, is considered only and strictly as by itself, in its own eternal centre, wherein it seeth purely in itself, its own radical all-sufficiency for all whatever is in any sense posterior; and so not only what may concern nature and creature, but also what belongs to the next following generation itself.

In this first consideration therefore, the comparison of an eye is more fit, than that other of a looking glass, which implieth notoriously two things, a certain object, and then also something that it can be an object to.

When Behmen hath declared the eternal generation in Trinity, so that now Father, Son, and Spirit are considered in that distinction, wherein they stand so far, that we can say, The Father as father is not the Son, and the Son as son not the Spirit, though all three but one and the same intellectual being; then only, but not before, according to this distinction, a distinction also between wisdom and wisdom doth appear, and the comparison of a looking glass full of wonders is now more fit and proper than before. Notwithstanding that wisdom is both now and then the same.

For it is now no more considered by itself alone, as an abyssal eye, in its own internal centre, but as outgone and dilated in the byss, and as in conjunction with this byss; between which two, abyss and byss, there is now a mutual relation, so that it is no more the abyss's, but the Father's and the Son's wisdom. And something there is now also which the wonders of this looking-glass can be a passive subject to, viz. a moving active life of the Father and Son, which is the Spirit. For,

XXIII.—In the consideration of the eternal generation only, and not before it, the abyss is considered as outgoing or proceeding forth from itself. If then this abyss is a seeing eye in and to itself, this seeing eye goeth out, and makes itself more external than it was before; viz. in that sense strictly, and not any further, in which we can say, The Spirit gone out from the abyss, is to be considered as more external than the abyss, as in itself only. When therefore this eye considered as abyssal only, had more strictly, or as it were more narrowly for an object, its own central and radical all-sufficiency, it hath now, considered as more external, as it were in a larger dilatation, an infinite multiplicity and variety of wonders; which are to be looked upon not only as distinct from the Spirit, but also as a passive subject of this spirit, wherein he moveth, playeth, and delighteth. Which indeed is to be such an object as they could not be before, when the Spirit was not yet a moving life, outgone from the abyss.

And with relation therefore to this spirit, that same eternal wisdom, before abyssal only, but now in conjunction with the byss, is more fitly than before compared to a looking glass, standing as an object before the Spirit, and representing all its infinite variety of figures, powers, wonders, etc.

This distinction between wisdom and wisdom is so much cum fundamento in re, as that is between the first and second will, or that also between Father, Son and Spirit. And if therefore it is needful to consider the eternal unity, antecedent to the trinity, and again the eternal generation in trinity as subsequent to the unity; there is also needful such a distinct consideration of Wisdom and wisdom, and a placing wisdom in the one sense before, and in the other after the Trinity.

XXIV.—Wisdom in that first sense and place is by Behmen called Mysterium Magnum without nature, considered as in its most internal root or centre. And this second sense and place it is that same Mysterium Magnum without nature, but considered as more external, as gone out, or displayed out of that root.

Wisdom in that first sense and place can be considered neither as active nor passive, because abyssal. But in this second sense wisdom is rightly considered as passive only, and as incapable of activity; for it is in subordination to the spirit, like as a body to its life. A body may be living indeed, and full of vigour and activity, and can for all that never be that life or principle of activity itself: so also wisdom is indeed not without life and hath nevertheless no life without the spirit, which is the only life therein, and from which, wisdom in this second sense, is so inseparable, as wisdom in the first sense is from the abyss.

Wisdom in the first sense, compared to a seeing Eye, is the divine intellect, that is, God himself considered only and purely as in himself, but not yet as in Trinity. And in this second sense, compared to a Mirror full of wonders, wisdom though still divine, is not purely God himself, neither as in Unity, nor as in Trinity, but it is as it were a habitation of God, considered now in Trinity. Which habitation without all nature, answers to that in and after nature, which is called a most glorious, majestic habitation, or temperature in substantiality, which also is not God himself, but under God, as every habitation is under its inhabitant.

Yet in all these and the like distinctions, the eternal wonders of wisdom, relating principally to the second sense, are inseparable from that seeing Eye in the first. The wonders of wisdom are in the first sense thereof, tacitly implied, and in the second more explicitly represented. For the Spirit is now that which seeth them, and delighteth in them. And his seeing is no more as in himself only, but as something gone out and distinct, though not separate from himself.—The next consideration is concerning the divine Trinity, both as before* and in and after nature.

XXV.—As soon as the first Abyssal Will is conceived or named, there is also conceived on

* The following positions contain a representation of the "Eternal Liberty and Abyssal Unity, pari passu ambulans:"—

I.—The Liberty is God, and so, the Unity is God. Forasmuch as this so well as that is central and universal, is before Nature and creature, and is the original root of all posterior beings.

II.—The Liberty is not God, and so, the Unity is not God; forasmuch as this so well as that, is as yet destitute of those perfections, that from the idea of a most perfect being cannot be excluded.

III.—That sense of God I call the first, and this the second.

IV.—The Abyss is itself both the unity and the liberty, bearing the former denomination with respect to the Trinity, and the latter with respect to Nature. So,

V.—The abyss is God (in the first sense), and is not God (in the second).

VI.—In the abyss, or in God (in the first sense) is not only that which tends ad intra, and is perpetually flowing out in Three; but also that which tends ad extra, and is perpetually setting forth itself in Seven.

VII.—Out of God (in the first sense) or out of the abyss considered as a central unity, the trinity is unfolded; and yet the unity is not changed into the trinity, so as to be no more a central unity in itself. So also,

VIII.—Out of the same considered as an eternal liberty, the septenary is unfolded, or nature is brought forth in seven properties; and yet the liberty is not changed into nature, so as to be no more in itself a central root and original thereof.

IX.—This bringing forth of nature is done by the abyssal Will's moving ad extra; and this moving is understood on the one hand in a harsh desire, and on the other in a soft lubet. Which two are the root of the Two eternal Principles.

X.—The desire is coming forth out of the abyss, from which it is distinct; and with its following properties it is constituting the first restless properties of nature. But,

XI.—The liberty, which is not distinct from the abyss, is not coming forth, as constituting that restless part of nature, but only as concomitant, by a lubet, [with] the properties thereof, and so thereby exalting itself in the superior glorious part of nature: which superior part of nature, rightly so called in one respect, is therefore rightly also said in another, to be beyond nature, free from nature, and the end of nature.

XII.—The Abyssal Will, as before its going out ad extra, by a desire and lubet, is not yet neither fire nor light; but by the process of nature, the will cometh to be Fire, and the liberty Light. Nevertheless,

XIII.—The will is not changed into fire, and the liberty not into light, so as to cease, and having to be still themselves the root and ground thereof. For,

XIV.—If the will willet fire and light, and if this willing is not done in preterito, but is perpetually doing, the will must be perpetually the inmost root and ground without any change or alteration of itself. And,

XV.—If the desire, the will's instrument, and in a natural order nearer to the fire than the will, is not changed into fire, so as to lose its own peculiar desiring essentiality, and to be no more the first property of nature, but the fourth, how can the will be thought to be changed so? But,

XVI.—If the desire cannot be desire without the Will's moving and directing it, it is the will principally as the first mover, of which it is rightly said, it cometh to be Fire, notwithstanding this the one side, the Father of the Byss, and on the other the Father of Eternal Nature. Which are not two fathers, but only one, though the generation, upon several accounts, is twofold. For like as from the first abyssal will towards within, proceedeth forth, from eternity to eternity, a generation in Three; so also from the same abyssal will proceedeth forth an eternal generation into Seven, which is the generation of eternal nature. Wherein the three do manifest themselves more externally, and come thereby not only into a clearer distinction, but also into a nearer, as it were approaching towards the creation of living intellectual beings, to be made after their own tri-une image, that they might by them be known and glorified. For none of them could have been brought forth by or from the three only, without the seven, generating themselves mutually and perpetually in that constant process, called by Behmen the generation of eternal nature. Why this eternal generation is rightly called an eternal manifestation of the Divine Tri-une Being, is most worthy and needful to be examined.

The name of a manifestation implieth (1.) that there is something, which hath a being in and to itself; (2.) that this something is unmanifest, hid and covered, etc. (3.) that there is also something unto which this manifestation is to be made. Now then, that the Divine Tri-une Being without nature, is not a nothing in and to itself, and is not by nature to be brought forth from not being, into being, has been enough proved.

But since, in this Tri-une Being, the byss is a manifestation of the abyss unto itself, it may be justly asked, What is then further hid, secret, or unmanifest?

And what is that unto which a manifestation is required to be made? Answer. Notwithstanding all this manifestation of the abyss, by its byss, the whole Tri-une Being without nature is still unmanifest unto itself. And this manifestation is therefore a manifestation of this Tri-une Being made unto itself only, though it is also consequently, a manifestation, made in order to the production of intellectual creatures: none of which this Tri-une Being could have been made manifest unto; nay none of which could have been brought forth, unless this Tri-une Being had first been manifested to itself, through the generation of eternal nature.

XXVI.—The byss is a manifestation of the abyss unto itself. For the abyss's eternal finding, perceptibility, etc. is the byss. And in the mirror of wisdom, an infinite variety and multiplicity of wonders, figures, colours, virtues, etc. do appear, to that moving life of Father and Son, which is the Spirit. All this is true in its sense and degree; yet all this will not yet do. For all these things are still merely nothing in and to themselves, and have no activity in or with them, but are only as transitory or shadowy images in a looking glass, which are and can do nothing to themselves, though they are something to that Eye which looketh upon them. No properties therefore no qualifications are in motion, no sound from them is heard, no harmony ariseth, no fire burneth, no light can shine, etc. And though there is a clearness and serenity, yet there is no splendor, lustre, and glory.

And upon this account, the Spirit cannot, in a full sense, be said to perceive and know himself, or to be manifest unto himself, before he knoweth effectually what it is to have passed through all the inferior properties of nature, and to have exalted himself through the fire into the light of glory. If then this is done in and by the generation of eternal nature, and if it cannot be done any other way, this generation is rightly called a manifestation of the Spirit, and so of the whole Tri-une Being, made only to itself.

XXVII.—It is plain from hence, that this manifestation is not, as it were the removing of a veil, or the like impediment, from a thing, that is covered or concealed by it, no such thing is here to be imagined. For as it is not a manifestation, made either to, or by any other, but made only by and to that being itself: so is it also an eternal impossibility, that this Being could be manifest unto itself (in that sense which Behmen takes this word) without or before an actual performance, interposition of the desire, and its own not being changed into fire, but continuing the abyssal root of it. So then,

XVII.—The will is fire, and is not fire, as the abyss is God and is not God.

XVIII.—The abyss, God (in the first sense) or the liberty cometh also by the process of nature to be light: for he willeth both fire and light, which he is not before or without this actual willing, and effectual executing of the will. And nevertheless,

XIX.—The liberty is not changed into light, in the same sense, in which the will is not changed into fire, and the unity not into trinity. And so therefore,

XX.—The liberty also is light, and is not light, as the will is fire and not fire, and the abyss God and not God.

XXI.—This liberty, which is free from those motions of nature that are to produce the fire, and which therefore is without light, is the father of light by its lubet, as the desire is the father of fire; and the Will comprising them both, is the father of the whole nature.

XXII.—This light shineth in one sense and respect downwards, into the darkness, the inferior part of nature which comprehendeth it not; and in another upwards into the liberty, which comprehendeth it, and which now as comprehending the light, is the superior part of nature, still indeed free from the restless nature, but no more (as before) destitute of glorified natural properties. Or also,

XXIII.—This light shineth in one sense and respect, forwards into nature though with a great difference, as to its inferior and superior part; and in another backwards into its root, which is God (in the first sense, not in the second). And so,

XXIV.—God is that spiritual fire and light, which is in eternal nature; according to the Scripture calling God, fire and light. And again,

XXV.—God is not that spiritual fire and light, which is in eternal nature; according to that fundamental position, conformable to Scripture, that nothing of these things is done in preterito, or only once, but all is perpetually doing; and that therefore the abyss, abyssal will, or eternal liberty is not changed neither into fire nor into light, but is perpetually the inmost root and ground thereof.

XXVI.—St. John's expression, it was, was not, and yet was, may here also be well minded, and in a manner be applied, no less than his following words, and here is Wisdom." of all what is for this manifestation required. Which is in short a raising up the properties of nature, a passing through them, and an exalting itself thereby into glory and majesty.

To the foregoing may be appended the following Abstract of "A Conference between A. (a scho-

This cannot be done by three, and not by less than three; and though the properties of nature are in one respect but three, nay in another also but one; yet in their full dilatation, they are also seven; and by three only, this raising, passing through and exalting cannot be performed.

For that which will thus exalt and manifest itself is in a manner three already; and this manifestation is not a going backwards, or decreasing, but an increasing: and though this Tri-une Being doth not itself increase, yet its manifestation is and must be a fruitful progress, laying as it were a foundation for an infinite multiplication.

XXVIII.—As in this eternal manifestation must be more than three, so by the same necessity, there can be neither more nor less than seven.

For the three in the eternal generation may be conceived, the first as a terminus a quo, than which is nothing sooner or deeper; the second as a terminus ad quem, beyond which is no going further, and the third as a medium between them, both distinguishing and combining them. And this threefold degree of progress must in the generation of the properties of nature distinctly be expressed and represented, if the three without nature shall be manifested, and gradually exalted in and by the progress of nature; as it is accordingly expressed in the three principal regions, or parts of nature. And it is this same distinct expression, which bringeth in, or carryeth along with it of all necessity, the full and perfect number seven, without having less, or wanting more. For when in the eternal generation the terminus a quo is but one, the same cannot be one but must be three; in this eternal manifestation thereof, because there are three in the completed eternal generation, which all three together are to be manifested and exalted in this progress of nature.

All three therefore are, as in the end of this progress, so in this beginning thereof also, wherein all three do consequently leave behind them, as it were, these footsteps, which are the three first properties of eternal nature, distinctly by Behmen ascribed to Father, Son and Spirit.

Now further: as the Three in the eternal generation are not to stand still in this beginning, but must go on unto a full manifestation, and exaltation in the light of glory and majesty: so these their first footsteps in nature cannot be left in that state, wherein they are in this beginning; but must be fixed and appear in the end of nature also, which is the terminus ad quem, beyond which is no going further.

And these are the three superior properties of nature, not only answering in one sense, unto the three first, but also one with them in another. And so there are now six of them.

But now as to the medium between them, which is both to distinguish, and to unite them, this cannot be neither three nor two, but must be one. Two cannot be an exact distinguishing mark, between these three and three, for if they are two, they not only can, but also want still to be distinguished themselves by a third.

Three can also not be such a true distinction, for they are themselves distinguished already by a third standing between one and one. This third therefore would be the distinguishing, not between three and three, but between four and four. Again, neither two nor three can be duly uniting these three and three, for this uniting must be done in or by one only indivisible point: The three on the one side, stand as it were by themselves in a circle or globe, so do the three on the other also. As then two circles cannot touch one another in more than one point, so it is here to be conceived also. And this one point must be such a one, as may be able, not only to keep in itself an exact neutrality between the three and three, but to have also an equal communion with both sides, so as to keep them not only from each other in one respect, but also to bind them both together in another. All which cannot be done by two, or three, but by one only. And this is now the fourth property in the generation of eternal nature, standing in the midst between three and lastic divine), and B. (a theosophical divine):"—

"A.—The great controversy between us, is this, Whether eternal Nature is 'created' by the 'omnipotent will' of God, 'commanding it to come forth, out of nothing,' or Whether it be out of God, and yet not God, nor a part of God.

B.—I affirm according to Behmen that eternal nature is out of God, viz. the first abyssal will. And the reason why we disagree, is because we have not both the same idea of God in this dispute. Your notion of God here, is compounded of all the divine attributes, as they are delivered in Scripture, and so is a good notion in itself, but not right in this place.

A.—If my notion of God is according to the Scripture, must it not be good and true and all-sufficient?

B.—It is good and true, nay sufficient also for a true Christian, who considereth only and declareth the wonders and works of God, especially as concerning his dispensations towards creatures. But it is not so for a true christian Theosopher as Behmen was, who considereth and declareth, what the Scripture is quite silent of, viz. What eternal nature is in its seven properties, what its original and perpetual generation is, by what it is distinguished from God, and how it came to be that manifestation of God by which further in the creation of angels and men, his works and wonders, and different dispensations about his church were effected: for this consideration and declaration, I say, your notion of God is insufficient, and not fit at all; but such a one must be had, where all these Divine attributes, as they are in or after his eternal manifestation, are utterly excluded from.

A.—Is not God always the same, and what can your notion of God be, if you exclude the Divine attributes from it?

B.—The Divine attributes are all in this notion of God, only in an eternal concentration, but without distinction and manifestation. And this is what Behmen calleth, an eternal unity, abyss, the first temperature, Nothing and All.

As after the creation and fall of men and angels, things or attributes may be conceived and affirmed of God, which could not be attributed to him before, without implying any change in God, so no change in God is made, by supposing the distinction of divine attributes to arise from his manifestation in eternal nature?

A.—What is then your notion of God, when this word is used with a peculiar reference to this matter?

three and making up the full and perfect number seven; by which the whole manifestation of the three without nature is all accomplished. So as nothing can be taken from or added to it.

XXIX.—By this eternal generation in seven, the Tri-une Being without nature is manifested unto itself, and all the Divine attributes are out of their root unfolded.

For all what for this manifestation is required, is now performed by the generation of these seven. The fire burneth, the light shineth; that in strength and power, this in splendor and brightness, the air uniteth and keepeth them in union, being itself neither this nor that. And so the former stillness is turned now into a most glorious region, full of living, moving, working and all harmonized properties and qualifications; wherein God in Trinity dwelleth and perceiveth what it is, to have actually exalted himself, from an abyss into glory and majesty.

XXX.—The Divine Tri-une Being was never without this eternal generation in seven, which is therefore all inseparable therefrom, though it may be separately by itself considered, and though Behmen ascribeth an eternal beginning unto this sevenfold generation; yet this is not to say, that the Divine Being was by itself alone, before a beginning thereof was made; but only that this generation in seven is not the first, and deepest, or inmost original centre.

And this saying therefore of a beginning, is to be taken only in such a sense, as in which the Byss or Son himself, though equally co-eternal to the Father, is rightly said to have an eternal beginning in the will, which beginning he had not once in such or such an instant, but hath it still from eternity to eternity.

XXXI.—All what creatures can know, perceive, enjoy and understand of God, is only in and by this eternal generation in seven; which is therefore not to be looked upon, as if it were a thing strange unto, or separable from God, or not of so great an importance in the consideration of God. For it is the Divine nature, which all the creatures, that are made after his image, must be partakers of, if they shall be able to stand before his throne: and without which he can much less be known and understood by them, than any particular thing can be known without knowing the nature thereof. Wherefore then in a true definition of God, not only the number three ought to be expressed, but also the number seven.

Without the three the seven could not be, and without the seven, the three could not be manifest. For the seven do make in their generation those two eternal principles, which are fire and light. And these two are that same, wherein the manifestation of the Divine Tri-une Being without nature is accomplished; the Father's in the fire, the Son's in the light, generated and shining forth out of that fire, and the Spirit's in them both.

XXXII.—After the three first properties, called by Behmen the triangle in nature, and referred distinctly to Father, Son and Spirit, in the generation of the fourth, which is the fire, the first Abyssal Will is opened as an eternal nothing, consuming, melting down, turning, and transmuting, in one sense, into nothing, but in another into something better and more noble, all what by the three first properties in their fighting and whirling was made up. And this is the Father, whom the Scripture also calleth a consuming fire. If then this first abyssal will is God, viz. the Father, considered as in himself only without all nature, this same abyssal will, now opened in the generation of this fourth form, is God in nature.

From this first manifestation which is the Father's in the fire, the second, viz. the Son's in the light, is all inseparable. And so is also from these two the third, which is the Spirit's, called or compared, as in the Scripture, so by Behmen also, to a wind or air, not only proceeding forth from fire and light, but also keeping them both in union, according to that outward representation thereof in temporal nature, wherein we see, that without air proceeding from [and with] the fire, no fire can burn and consequently no light can shine.

XXXIII.—From this different consideration of the Trinity cannot be inferred, that Behmen

B.—I conceive of him, with Behmen, as of an eternal nothing. . . .

A.—But have not you yourself in many places said, That without and before eternal nature, which you call an eternal manifestation of God, there is an eternal generation in Trinity, whereof Behmen says, God generates himself in himself from eternity to eternity?

B.—When in a former discourse, I considered in general the eternal generation in Trinity, and the co-eternal manifestation, demonstrating (without considering nature's original) that this is different from that, (which was the matter then in question,) and declaring which of these two is deeper and more interior, and which therefore is to be set in the first or chiefest place, and which in the second, I said rightly that the eternal generation goeth before, and the co-eternal manifestation followeth after, because of its being lower and exterior, and not because of its having its original out of that tri-une being, which in the eternal generation is generated, which even from this expression of its being co-eternal thereunto, might be evident.

But when I now consider especially the original of eternal nature, out of what it is, (a thing quite different from that former,) I do not set the tri-une being before, or antecedent immediately to the first property of nature, as if it had such a connexion with it, as cause must have with its effect, but I set it, as it were over against the first property of nature; and the first abyssal will in the midst immediately over them, in this form,

The first abyssal Will

The Tri-une being in the eternal generation.

The first property of eternal Nature.

For out of this Will, and not out of the tri-une being, Behmen says, eternal nature is; and this will he calleth the Father, both of the eternal generation in the trinity within, and of eternal nature without.

From hence it can now be demonstrated also, (1.) that your notion of God, gathered from Scripture, though good and proper in its place and order, and sufficient also for a true Christian, is not so in this matter, for a true christian Theosopher, searching into the deep things of God, but that Behmen's is. (2.) That from your notion, the seven properties of nature, why the three first must be dark and restless; what the fire is, by what it is produced; from whence the light is, why it ariseth out of the fire, etc. cannot be declared, but that all this from Behmen's can. (3.) That his notion, when rightly understood, is free from all offensiveness, and that by his saying, eternal Nature is out of the first abyssal will, he doth really say much more, and quite another thing, than you do by saying, It is effected by the will."

makes two Trinities, the one before and the other after nature. For the first abyssal will, the eternal word, and the out-going from this and that, before and without nature, are the three self-same, that in and after nature, are called Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. And if his speaking of a first and second will, does not make two wills in the Divine Being, which was made out above, his speaking of a Trinity without, and a Trinity in nature does also not make two Trinities. For as the second will is but an opening, manifestation, and exaltation of the first, having neither more nor less in it than that first; so also the Trinity in nature is but an opening, manifestation and exaltation of the Trinity without nature, and hath in it neither more nor less.

XXXIV.—When we say with Behmen of an opening, manifestation, or exaltation in the Divine Tri-une Being, we say that same in substance, but more explicitly, which the Scripture saith more implicitly, when it calleth the Son an express image, character and brightness of the Father's glory. For if we are thus to conceive of the son, we must needs conceive also of the father, that he hath no brightness of glory without the Son. And if so, must we not conceive the Father without the Son, as a centre sealed up, not manifested unto himself, and not exalted into a brightness of glory?

The Son's generation therefore, which is from eternity to eternity, is nothing else but the Father's manifestation unto himself, made by his own opening, proceeding forth, and exalting himself from a low or deep abyss, into the highest seat of glory.

XXXV.—Though there are not two Trinities,* the one before and the other after eternal nature, yet there are several considerable differences between the Trinity considered as without and

* That there are not Two Trinities.—“Concerning a description of the properties of eternal nature, how they may be conceived in God, it is true that Behmen's description, for the most part, is taken from the process of regeneration, experienced in himself, to which process also he directs every one, for to follow it in his own person. [N.B.]

There, will he say, if he finds first perceptibly and really, what the three first properties are in their being separated from the three second, or superior, he shall further find also, what they are in their union with them. And then only, being thus made partaker again of the Divine Nature, he will be satisfied as to this matter himself, though he never shall be able to satisfy another. Though therefore Behmen hath said indeed several things here about, yet he could not have said them otherwise than so, that all his expressions are still liable more or less to exceptions and objections; for nothing can be named upon earth to declare thereby something in heaven or in God, otherwise but as in a shadow.

So all the words which he useth in his Aurora, where he saith, not only of the three first properties, but also in particular, of air, water, heat, and cold, how they are in God; and so also these three names, attraction, mobility, sensibility, which he useth, when he saith the three first properties are in God, will be still subject to be excepted against. But how can this be remedied? From whence shall earthly man living upon earth, have other words than earthly, when the Lord himself from heaven had no other words than earthly, so long as he lived upon earth in our flesh, and spoke to earthly men? This then is the only thing that can be said: Let from all the words and notions we can have of the properties of nature, all be removed and excluded, what any ways implieth an imperfection either directly or indirectly; and what we then can find remaining in our mind surpassing outward words, we may say thereof, this is (according to the different degrees of our sensibility) either a more clear, or a more obscure shadow of what the thing itself is in God.

Concerning the two last mentioned similies, relating, in a tolerable sense and manner to the Trinity considered as before, and as in or after eternal nature, the first was taken from a consideration of the soul, and the second of the human will.

The first, which is not so nigh and proper as the second, is yet fit enough to illustrate that particular point whereto it was exhibited, is to show only so much, that we bear in ourselves something, which is but one and the same, nay, as to my thinking, it may well be expressed, the selfsame; and which nevertheless may not only be considered, as in two distinct states or degrees, but shall be found also, to be in the one, very much different from what it is in the other. For the soul, considered as in a child, is the selfsame soul which is in that child when it is a man, but what great differences there are, between that former and this latter state of the selfsame soul, is known enough; and presupposed is it especially (which also could be made out), that unto the soul, considered in this latter state, nothing is added from without, but all what it hath now, and had not so before, is risen and displayed only from its own ground within.

The application can easily be made, and the conclusion is this: like as all this difference doth not make two souls, so also, our distinct considerations of the selfsame Divine Trinity, with all the differences, grounded upon that sure bottom, of this eternal generation of nature, doth not make two Trinities.

But that other simile, taken from a consideration of the human will, which is more agreeing, and in a sense and manner applicable in more particulars, can illustrate it better, as by the following positions may appear:—

I.—Our will not only may, by every one, but also must, by a philosopher, be considered distinctly, first as it is in its own central root, wherein it is imperceptible to all the posterior faculties; and secondly as in its activity, wherein it is plainly perceptible. So also may and must the Divine Being be considered distinctly, by a true theosopher, searching with the spirit into the deep things of God.

II.—In this distinct consideration, a philosopher will find several differences between will and will; and so will a theosopher find differences between the Trinity in his first consideration, and the same in his second.

III.—A philosopher in a discourse, speaking of this will and will, may well enough for brevity's sake, call the one will the first, and the other the second. And so might the theosopher, speaking to understanding, not to ignorant people (upon a foregoing explication of his sense), say of a first and second Trinity; though indeed Behmen hath never done so, but the will only he calleth a first and second.

IV.—That the first will is and must be always, both in general and in particular, the inmost root and ground of the second, which second cannot be separated from the first, and could not be as in and after nature; some of which have a relation to creatures, but the chiefest is that which concerns the Trinity as in and to itself.

The Trinity without nature cannot have any created representative, made after its own image and likeness. When the Trinity considered as in and after nature, can have, and hath such in an innumerable number; even angels and men, all having (if not by their own fault fallen away from it into disorder) in themselves, this eternal generation in seven, and so also the two eternal of fire and light, in their most harmonious union, answering unto that wherein they stand in this eternal manifestation of the most holy Trinity. The deep ground and reason, why the Trinity before nature cannot have any created representative of itself, is shown us by Behmen sufficiently.—
Again,

The Trinity without nature cannot be a proper and direct object of any created understanding, and can never be seen, felt, or enjoyed, either by angels or men: when the Trinity in nature can and is by them understood, seen in a manner, nay felt and enjoyed even so, that Father, Son and Holy Ghost, in their distinct communications, or influences, can be discerned by such souls and spirits, as stand with them in a nearer and more intimate union. [N.B. ye holy Rogers-Fletcher-Bramwell-praying souls, on earth!] The reason both of this and that can easily be given: for if the whole created being of angels and men is and must be inferior and posterior to this eternal generation of nature in its seven properties, all their understanding, feeling, enjoying, must be strictly confined thereunto, so that there is an impossibility for them to reach beyond it.

And if all their created [or regenerated] being is of the same nature, which the trinity is manifested in and by, even of this eternal nature in its seven properties, they cannot but understand, see, feel, and enjoy God in Trinity, after whose tri-une image they are made, and of whose Divine nature they do partake, even so that he is not ashamed to call them sons, children, gods, etc. [N.B. ye holy ones! ye experiential theologians! ye gospel 'enthusiasts,' so called; who have proved and 'known the truth' as it is Jesus. Herein behold the sure ground and philosophy of your spiritual discoveries, experience and joys!]

XXXV.—The chiefest difference, between the trinity considered as before, and as in and after eternal nature, is this, that in the second consideration it can properly and directly be called a trinity; because there is a plain and manifest distinction between the three, which is fitly figured out and represented, even in outward nature also, by that distinction which is therein between fire and light and air. And though we say, with Behmen, that three things are to be understood in this eternal generation without all nature, and again God generates himself in trinity. In which expressions a distinction is implied, so that we cannot understand them at all, without thinking more or less of some distinction between the three, yet we are to say also, according to his instruction, that all intelligible distinction in the trinity, depends upon a raising up of the three first properties of nature by the first abyssal will, which is Father; further upon the generating and passing through the fire; and then also upon a manifesting the brightness of the Father's glory in the light or Son. So then we are permitted indeed to conceive the three in the eternal generation, with a distinction, because we cannot do otherwise; yet we are charged also to abstract our mind again from all this concept, and to deny all our affirmative ideas, according to what he plainly says.—Mysterium Magnum, cap. vii. 11, 12.

Seeing that we are not able to understand any distinction before and without the distinct generation of eternal nature in its seven properties, etc.

XXXVII.—It is not so much our knowing, there are three without nature, but it is rather this perceptible distinction in nature, which makes us to call it a trinity. For though the three without nature are naturally prior to the trinity in nature, yet as to our knowing, we cannot but say, that the trinity in nature is prior to the three without nature, because our understanding ariseth after nature, and goeth not forward from what is unmanifest without, to its manifestation in nature, but contrariwise from this unto that, so far, that we are directed by what is manifest in nature, to know that same must have been unmanifest without nature. Because we now find in nature a plain intelligible distinction between the three, we call it rightly and properly a trinity. And because further we know from hence, that three also are and must be without nature, we take this denomination of a trinity from nature, and attribute it unto that which is without nature also. Though we cannot do it so properly, because as soon as we go beyond nature, and what is manifest in nature, all distinction is lost, and vanisheth away out of all our sight and perception.

XXXVIII.—A simple and rude similitude may perhaps declare the meaning hereof a little nearer. When we conceive a little grain, of such a quantity as is but discernible to the eye, we what it is, nor have what it hath, if the first were not. So also is it with the Tri-unity before nature, and the distinct Trinity in and after nature.

V.—The first will cannot be abolished by the second, so as that it should be no more, what it is in itself, nor can it be transmuted into the second, so as that it were no more the inmost ground thereof, but it is always found in our consideration, as remaining in its central place, without any alteration in itself. So also the Tri-unity is neither abolished nor transmuted, by the Trinity in and after nature, but remains always the inmost deepest ground thereof; and will be found so perpetually by angels and men, in their searchings into the deep things of God.

VI.—In the second will, the first hath nothing added unto itself from without, but all the difference between the first will and second, lieth therein, that in the first all is concentred, and in the second all out of that centre is displayed. So also in this Tri-unity and Trinity, if there came in anything from without, these two could not be one and the same. But all, rising out of the first all-sufficient ground, and displaying itself by its own all-sufficiency, the Trinity and Tri-unity are one and the same, though there is and must be this difference, that the former is as it were a deeper centre, having its own circumference in itself, and the latter a displaying of that centre, as in a spiritual circumference, having also its own centre in itself.

VII.—Neither our distinct considerations of the will, nor our different denominations of first and second, nor also any difference that may be found between this and that, can make two wills, so as each of them could be separable from each other, and each exist by itself only, without or besides the other. So also all what is here said concerning the Divine Being, before and after nature, cannot make Two Trinities.'

can visibly distinguish therein, a superior, an inferior, and a middle part. But when we now suppose, is lessened and reduced to the quantity of an invisible and impalpable atom, we can perceive nothing more of a distinction, when nevertheless, so long as we can conceive it to be an atom, we can conceive also that it hath still the same three parts, which before were visibly to be discerned. And this notion of its three parts is all inseparable from our idea, whereby we conceive an atom, and must needs continue so, though we should think it to be lessened, even in infinitum. But if we could suppose, this atom were at length all spiritualized, and so thereby totally taken away out of the number of all corporeal beings, which all are confined to their dimensions, though never so little; then only all the distinction in our idea would be totally lost together with the name of atom, and nevertheless there would remain in us the notion of a certain spiritual something, which we could no more conceive with any distinction.

XXXIX.—So also in a tree, when we see three branches, we see them in a plain and manifest distinction; but when we go back first to the stock, considering that they laid therein, before they came forth thereout, all the manifest distinction is disappeared, and nevertheless, from their being manifestly three, we can justly conclude, there were three also in the stock, because there must needs have been a threefold disposition thereto; which as long as it is, or can be conceived threefold, it cannot be conceived without all kind of distinction, though no distinction is or can be obvious to any of our outward senses. But when we go now deeper, to a consideration of the very seed, out of which all this tree, with all its branches came forth, we can be said in a sense and manner to go beyond the generation of nature, because in this seed, the actual strife of the first three properties of nature, must be conceived as not yet raised up, and so this seed lieth in a state of stillness, rest, and nothingness, with respect to what afterwards is brought forth thereout. There now the distinction may be said to be lost totally, for, what distinction can we possibly imagine, when we must conceive, the three first properties of nature themselves, which are by their actual strife the beginning of all growth in every tree, are not yet entered into their distinction? But nevertheless, again, from our having observed three branches, in the outward manifestation, we cannot but conclude, three also must have been in the first original centre of this manifestation, which centre we may justly think, had in its own sphere no sufficiency for more and no disposition for less than three. And thus so long as we do so think thereof, or speak of three, not all distinction in all and every sense can be excluded from our idea, notwithstanding that we are not able to find out, or to perceive a distinction in the thing itself.

This now may show us, though never so obscurely, that it is no contradiction, when we say on one side, the three in the Divine Eternal Being, without nature, are distinguished; and when we say again on the other side, they are not distinguished. For we say that former, with respect to our apprehension, wherein we cannot separate all and every distinction from an idea of three; and this latter we say with respect to such a distinction, as properly may be called so, according to our common sense and manner of expression, wherein every distinction is and must be posterior to the generation of eternal nature with its seven properties.

XL.—A hand or foot of a child in the womb, saith Behmen, groweth forwards from within, and before it hath any visible figure, it hath already its own proper form or signature in the spirit. If then this be so, as it certainly cannot be otherwise, we must of all necessity conceive, that the spiritual signature of the one cannot be that of the other, but must be, in a manner so distinct therefrom, as a full grown hand is from a foot, and this even long before it can properly be called a hand or foot, and before any distinction between them can appear. And he therefore that was able, as Behmen was, to declare this wonderful generation and formation in the womb, [N.B.] from the first beginning in the Spirit, to the manifest and visible outbirth thereof, should find himself necessitated, not only to take the names of the parts or members, for instance, those of hands and feet, from the visible outbirth, and to give them unto that, which is but an invisible disposition thereto in the spirit; but also to tell us sometimes, these members, (hands or feet) are distinguished even in this spiritual disposition, sometimes, again, they are not distinguished, before their distinct figure and formation in fingers and toes can appear.

And by so saying, such a declarer would not contradict himself at all. For they are not distinguished with respect to our sight, and yet they are distinct and must be conceived as distinct, because when they can but upon any account be called hands and feet, we are not able to conceive them without all and every distinction, especially when we know, that each of them hath already in the spirit, before it cometh to the outbirth, its own proper form or peculiar signature; for this constrains us to apprehend and own, that the signature of a hand cannot be that of a foot, though as yet neither this nor that can properly be called so.

So, therefore, we are to conceive every distinction, as it were, in different degrees of increase and decrease, for in the first stirring of the properties of nature, every distinction takes its beginning, and from thence it goeth forwards, increasing gradually, till at length in the outbirth it cometh to be manifest and plainly discernible. But in our sight and apprehension, going backwards, from the outbirth to the first root in the spirit, every distinction decreaseth more and more, till at length it is totally lost. Which is done so soon as we presume to go beyond the generation of nature, in its distinct properties.

Thus now was the case of Behmen, when he declared the Trinity, considered both as without and as in eternal Nature. And accordingly he hath not contradicted himself, when he not only gave us three distinct names of Father, Son, and Spirit in the Trinity without nature, but told us also expressly, that we are to understand three things in this eternal generation: and yet tells us again, in outward appearance, quite the contrary. As Mysterium Magnum, cap. vii. 11, 12.

XLI.—The conclusion of this matter will now be this, That we are to conceive the first disposition in the spirit, to be, as it were, a hidden, invisible, imperceptible root, of that manifest distinction, which can be perceived in an outbirth; and this manifest distinction, as it were the fruit or product of that root. And that we say, concerning this twofold consideration of the Trinity, (1.) The Trinity considered as in nature, differs chiefly from the Trinity without nature, in this, that the Trinity in this eternal manifestation is manifestly, and as to creatures intelligibly distinguished, when contrariwise all the creatures are not able to find out, or understand a distinction in the eternal generation without nature. (2.) As the first stirring in the properties of nature, which makes a distinction intelligible to creatures, is to be conceived as an invisible root, of which that visible distinction in its following outbirth, is a fruit or product; so the three in the eternal generation without nature, are to be looked upon, as an unintelligible root of that intelligible distinction, which is made in the first stirring of the said properties of nature; for without that Triune root, the distinction in the first properties of nature could not have been brought forth.

And therefore, (3.) the three in the eternal generation without nature are distinguished, by such a distinction as is perceptible and intelligible by and to themselves, but absolutely imperceptible and unintelligible unto creatures.

(4.) A distinction, or root of distinction must there be in these three in the eternal generation, because the first is not the second, the second not the third, and the third neither the first nor second. (5.) This distinction must be perceptible by themselves, because the second of these three is an eternal perceiving, finding and enjoying of the first, caused by intervention of the third, which is a moving life, both of the first and second, and because the Divine Intellect, or Wisdom, which is not the Father's only, but also the Son's, exerted and manifested in this eternal generation, by the proceeding forth of the Spirit, cannot but imply an eternal understanding of what it is to the first, to find, perceive and enjoy himself in the second, by that moving life which is the third. And if so, this can be nothing else, but an intellect touched and affected by, or an eternal understanding of this distinction. (6.) But absolutely imperceptible and unintelligible must this distinction, or rather this root of distinction be, to all created spirits; because it is before, without and above that distinct manifestation of these three, made in and by the properties of eternal nature; wherein they live and move; from which they are, and have all that they can be said to have, and be; and which, therefore, all their perception and understanding strictly must be confined to, as to a sphere of their activity. So that there cannot be conceived in them any ability, proportion, or capacity of perceiving and understanding that which is beyond this sphere; which is, and can be extended no further than to that eternal manifestation of these three, which is made, and could not be made otherwise, but by a distinct generation of nature in its seven properties, rightly called the Seven Fountain Spirits, with respect to all posterior created things, flown forth from them, descended down, or breathed out.

XLII.—Whether this eternal manifestation, in and by the seven properties of nature is to be looked upon, as purely voluntary or as absolutely necessary, cannot positively be defined from plain express words of Teutonicus. But many things may be observed from his writings, whereby it can be plain, that it is more consistent with his sense, and much more conformable to the whole construction or coherence of the eternal generation in three, with the eternal manifestation thereof, in seven, to declare for this latter, than for that former.

XLIII.—All what, for this eternal manifestation's of the three in seven being purely voluntary, can be brought forth, will, as I think, summarily be this:

That the Divine Tri-une Being, in the eternal generation without nature, stands in a full accomplished perfection, is all sufficient for, and in, and to itself, enjoyeth itself in a fullness of love and delight, rest and acquiescency with itself, and wanteth nothing to be superadded unto it which could increase its ever blessed happiness, etc.

And from hence is now inferred, that if this be so, no necessity can be thought upon, for a more exterior manifestation of the three in seven; but this manifestation must be looked upon as purely voluntary, so that it be wholly and only referred to his good will and pleasure. And if he would not have been pleased to condescend thereto, he should still have wanted nothing, like as nothing is added unto him thereby.

Answer. What is here said against a necessity of the eternal manifestation of the three in seven, that same almost could be reasoned against a necessity of the eternal generation in three itself, by saying, The Father is all, and hath all in himself, for the Son hath no more but what the Father hath. And that which is and hath all, cannot but acquiesce with its own fullness, etc. What necessity therefore of this Father's generating a Son? But as this reasoning is not good here, so not there.

XLIV.—From what was said above concerning an exaltation of the Divine Triune Being, and such a manifestation as is made only by and to itself, as also of its being still but central, not manifest unto itself, not unfolded, etc., it can be plain, that such an idea of the Divine Being without nature, as here in this objection is expressed by the words of a full and accomplished perfection, and enjoyment of love, delight, and acquiescency, etc., is all inconsistent with Behmen's ground. For though we do not deny, that all the Divine perfections are in the Triune Being without nature, yet we say, that in this first consideration of God, which is not total, but only partial, they are not yet exerted, and cannot become exerted, but by the raising up and passing through the properties of nature.

And though, therefore, we rightly say, in one sense, The Tri-une God without nature wants nothing, but hath all, and is all-sufficient in and to himself, so that nothing can be given or superadded unto him, which could make him more perfect. Yet without contradicting this, we may rightly say also, in another sense, The Tri-une God, considered as without nature, wants something, which he hath not in this first consideration, for he wants a fit and proper medium or subject, wherein his all-sufficient perfections may exert, display, and show forth themselves, that so thereby he may come to perceive himself, viz. to perceive what he is in that state, wherein they are actually exerted, which medium is the generation of the properties of nature.

And this expression, though gross and rude enough, can give offence unto any man of sense no more than this, The Father considered as Father only, though he is, and hath all in himself, stands yet for all this, not in a full accomplished perfection, for he hath no brightness of glory, and wants therefore, a son, or express image of his substance, that he may thereby come to know, and perceive himself, viz. what he is in that state, wherein the brightness of his glory is actually generated, displayed and manifested unto him. Which expression is, in itself, all innocent and true enough.

XLV.—It can be plain and evident of itself, that by necessity, we do not understand, There is this or that coming in upon the eternal will from without, and binding it down; so that this will were to be conceived first as indifferent, further as moved and drawn, and at length brought away from his former indifferency. But here is no such thing.

The eternal will, which is next to the abyssal eye, and is even that abyssal eye itself, considered as in its first disposition towards a progress or proceeding forth, cannot be considered first as standing indifferent between YEA and NO, and then as moved and drawn to the YEA, by something coming in from without, or from besides, and representing its motives to that eye, or will, causing thereby first a consideration, or deliberation, and then a consent, which the will must now condescend unto, lying as it were impotent under a necessity, and not altogether free from weakness, etc. Away with all such and the like thoughts !

In the first central Abyssal Being itself, not without it, that is, in that eternal Eye and Will itself, or in its own internal, inseparable essentiality, that thing must be implied, which we call a necessity, for want of a more convenient expression.

And if so, it is plain, that as this eye or will is most internal and essential to the Divine Being, so that also must be so, which we call a necessity. And which, therefore, cannot be conceived as a thing different from the will, or standing besides it, moving or persuading it, and in a manner overruling it. But must be conceived as in a most harmonious union and concord with the will, nay as the will itself, considered in this necessity, as in a peculiar and eminent perfection.

For as there is an absolute necessity, implying the highest perfection, that God must be a living God, knowing, feeling, and enjoying himself, so that the will stands not indifferent, and wants no foregoing consultation, whether or no he shall be a living God : so also is there such an absolute necessity, full of perfections, and necessarily implied in the Divine essentiality, that the Divine Tri-une Being must go forth to the generation of eternal Nature, whereby his omnipotent life and power may be unfolded, displayed and manifested, wherein his infinite perfections may be exerted and exalted through the fire in the light of glory.

XLVI.—If we but consider the first abyssal will, and the first stirring thereof, wherein the eternal generation and manifestation are inseparably connected, and from whence go both together the one towards within, and the other towards without : according to what Teutonicus declareth thereof in many places, and especially in the Earthly and Heavenly Mystrium, we shall find plainly enough, such an absolute necessity as mentioned, though he himself never hath expressed it so.

For the Will intends a manifestation of its own central and radical all-sufficiency, which manifestation is nothing else but an unfolding of his infinite perfections, and an exaltation thereof, from their being concentrated all as one, as it were, into a glorious circumference, wherein they may appear and work in their distinction. Now this will can do nothing to its purpose without a stirring, which is self-evident. And if then this very stirring, for as much as it is in a sense and manner, exterior than the still and resting will in itself, is nothing else but a beginning of raising up the properties of nature ; we cannot conceive it otherwise nor can we perhaps express it better, than by saying :

There is for the generation of eternal Nature such an absolute internal necessity, as cometh not upon the will from without, or from anything besides itself, but lieth in the will, and is so near and so essential to the will, so harmoniously united with the will, and therefore also so inseparable from the will, as this will is near and essential unto, united with, and inseparable from itself. Seeing that if we conceive, this will intends its manifestation, we must needs conceive also, that this will knoweth, not only that he cannot obtain it without a stirring, but also that this same stirring is the beginning of a raising up that fire, which before laid hid in the will, and was not burning, nay that this stirring is made in order thereunto. And if we must conceive it so, it must needs evidence itself, that this will, intending its manifestation, intends by that self-same intent, as by one single act both to stir, and also by this stirring to raise up that fire, for to be manifested thereby, and to be exalted through it into the light of glory. So therefore none of these three can be considered as superfluous, but all three must be owned to stand in an equal degree of necessity, if but the will is supposed to intend its own manifestation, the necessity whereof cannot be questioned.

XLVII.—Another argument for such a necessity could be brought forth, from a consideration of the Divine Goodness, and communicability thereof. For, as the eternal Will in his infinite wisdom, knoweth himself to be good, so he knoweth also, and cannot but know, this goodness to be communicable, outflowing, and giving forth itself. And as it is not indifferent to the will, whether he be good or not, but is his intrinsic essentiality, that he must be the supremest good, so it can also not be thought to be indifferent to him, whether or no his goodness shall flow out and communicate itself ; but as these two, to be good, and to be communicable, or willing to communicate himself, are inseparable from the will, and have both an equal ground in the Divine Being, so also a necessity for them must be equal in them both. When yet, like as there is nothing besides him, which might make or cause him to be good, so also is there nothing besides which might cause him to communicate his goodness, but this goodness itself upon its own account, and from its own internal nature or moving principle floweth out, and cannot but flow out, without denying, or forsaking its own nature and name. And there lieth the necessity of the generation of eternal nature. For though all this communicability is directly to be referred to creatures, created after the image of God ; yet it presupposeth necessarily the seven distinct properties of eternal nature, without which no creature could have been, and so also nothing of the divine goodness could have been communicated.

XLVIII.—Almost that same, but as to several particulars with a greater emphasis and evidence, could be said concerning the Divine Omnipotence. We cannot say properly, in the first consideration, without all nature, that God is omnipotent, for there is not only nothing wherein his omnipotence could appear unto himself ; but there is also nothing, wherein or whereby he might feel and perceive himself to be omnipotent. When yet this saying doth not bring upon him any weakness, impotence, or imperfection : for we do not say, that it is eternal nature which makes him to be omnipotent ; but that he himself raiseth up the properties of eternal nature, for to afford unto himself thereby, that necessarily requisite subject, wherein and whereby his radical omnipotence may be exerted and made perceptible unto himself. And further we say, That it is the generation of the fourth property of nature, or the enkindling the fire ; the dwelling therein in one respect, and the passing through it in another, wherein and whereby he can and doth perceive himself to be actually and effectually omnipotent, which he cannot without this generation. Wherefore then without this generation we say rightly, He hath the ground and root of omnipotence, in and purely of himself, but without a manifestation thereof, and without feeling and perceiving what this root is in its manifestation.

And so we cannot so properly say, He is omnipotent without all nature, but more properly we say, He is all-sufficient for to show forth his omnipotence in the generation of nature. Which all-sufficiency cannot raise in us any idea of defect or imperfection but rather of all and every perfection; only considered as still concentrated, and not yet out of that centre unfolded and displayed.

If we then cannot think it is indifferent to the eternal will, whether or no he be actually exerting, feeling and perceiving himself as an omnipotent God, but if we must conceive a necessity for the affirmative, we must needs say also, There is implied in the first abyssal will, such an absolute necessity, as declared, for the generation of eternal nature in its seven properties.

All the Divine attributes would likewise furnish us with further proofs of this necessity, especially those that have more or less a relation unto creatures; and that never could have been manifested or exerted, if intellectual creatures had not been created by the Father, redeemed by the Son, and fitted by the Holy Ghost for a communion with Father and Son.

Moreover also, many expressions might be found in the holy Scriptures which would afford such arguments. As for instance, a threefold, very considerable one might be formed from the words of St. John in the Revelation, concerning the seven spirits, which are, as he saith (1.) before the throne of God, from which (2.) he wisheth grace and peace unto the churches, and which (3.) he placeth in the middle between the Father and Son, wishing grace and peace, first from him which is, and was, and is to come; in the next place from the seven spirits; and then in the third from Jesus Christ.

But since, it is I think made out sufficiently enough, that such a necessity lieth in the very deepest root, even in the first Abyssal Will itself, it is needless to gather arguments from this and that, which all is but posterior to that abyssal root.

XLIX.—Like as in the first consideration of the Divine Being without nature, Wisdom was considered immediately after the Trinity, where it was represented as a looking-glass full of wonders, and in distinction from the Spirit: so it is here also in this second consideration of God, manifested in nature, to be considered after and under the Holy Trinity. Nay even much more properly here than there, because not only was it there, not yet a proper object of human understanding, but also, because all the denominations, which Behmen giveth unto wisdom in the first consideration, without nature, when he calleth her an eternal Virgin, a mirror full of wonders,—the Spirit's corporality, clothing, habitation, instrument, etc. are all taken from this second consideration, wherein they are significant and intelligible unto creatures; when, nevertheless with respect to them they are not so in that first consideration, but yet are used therein also, for want only of more convenient ones, and for to declare thereby, that wisdom in the first consideration is not another thing, but that same which it is in the second; though it stands now in another, more external and more intelligible condition, state and degree, wherein it can be a proper object of our understanding, like as the Trinity itself.

And moreover all what was said before concerning a distinction between the outgoing, and that which is gone out, or between the Spirit and wisdom, was to be understood only according to what was declared, concerning a distinction between the Three in the eternal generation without nature. But here now, in this second consideration, the distinction is plain enough, and can be understood by intellectual creatures.

For there it must needs have been unintelligible, and past all their finding out; because it was without that sphere wherein they live and move and have their being.

But here it must needs also be intelligible, obvious and familiar unto them, because it is not only within their sphere, but also so nearly related unto them, that they are endued themselves therewith, and called expressly the children of wisdom.

L.—This distinction between the Spirit and wisdom, or according to Behmen's expression, between the outgoing and that which is gone out, is the chiefest point in this consideration. And seeing that Behmen himself, in a few words, hath pointed as it were with the finger upon a certain simile, I shall lay it open into its particulars. Which will sufficiently show that Behmen is absolutely guiltless of that crime, which many charged him with, that he made a Quaternity in the Divine Being.

A wise and potent king seeth in his wisdom, considereth with himself, and without any advice from his counsellors, pondereth in his own mind such things, as he knoweth can promote his own honour and glory, and the prosperity of his kingdom. Now so long as this is only a seeing, contemplating, and pondering in his own mind, it is what it is, only in, and to himself; but it is nothing at all to his counsellors, and of no effect in his government; for it is still, in a sense and manner, separated as it were from his royal power and authority, which cannot yet exercise or show forth itself therein, nor do any good thereby to any other, etc.

And this may represent to us the Divine Wisdom, taken in its first and deepest sense, wherein it is Divine intellect compared to a seeing Eye, and not distinct from God, but God himself.

This king, having thus seen and found out in his wisdom, how to promote and exalt his glory and the good of his kingdom, settles now further himself into a will or resolution, for to put out a proclamation, and to declare thereby his will.

Now this will is indeed the first step towards the declaration of those things, that in his wisdom were seen, and found expedient and necessary. But as long as it is only a will, antecedent to a real act and deed, it is still but nothing, and of no benefit to all what is without and posterior to it, which all nevertheless doth depend upon it, as upon its original. And this will may be looked upon as a representation of the eternal Father.

When now further, this will goeth actually forth, by putting out this intended declaration of itself, we may plainly therein discern three things more, as so many distinct figures of the Son and of the Spirit, and of that which Behmen calleth wisdom in a second, inferior, and more external sense.

For,

The declaration of this royal will, considered as to the sense and substance thereof, which is not visible, but intelligible unto his subjects, and in itself nothing else but an express image and manifestation of what the will had first in itself conceived, approved of, and disposed itself unto; nay even strictly such a manifestation as hath neither more nor less in it than that very same, is a fit representation of the Eternal Son; which hath an eternal beginning in the will, as in the Father, of which he is an express image and manifestation, having all that which the Father hath, and neither more nor less.

The actual putting out of this declaration, which is an active moving, and proceeding forth of this royal will unto its manifestation, and is distinct both from the will itself, and from the declaration of the will also; and yet inseparable from the one so well as from the other, because it is participating with both, and combining them both, represents to us the Spirit, which is an active moving life of the Deity, and a band of union between the Father and the Son.

The declaration of this royal will, considered as it is visible also, and more external; or as a thing which passively can be said, that it is gone out from the royal will, and which is a writing subscribed by the king's hand, and sealed with his seal, is a representation of the eternal wisdom, taken in the second, more external sense, wherein it is compared to a looking-glass, and is not God himself, but distinct from and under him; as this writing is also distinct from, and under the king, and distinct also from his will, and from the declaration thereof, considered as to its invisible sense and substance.

Like as this writing is purely passive, having no life, motion, power, or operation, or efficacy, and doing neither good nor evil of itself, or from its own ability: So is wisdom in this latter sense also.

But like as the king's will, power, and royal authority, declared in the going out thereof, or in the putting forth this declaration, is the only life, activity and power therein, for which it is honoured, esteemed, and justly styled royal, and by which it is able and sufficient to do good unto the kingdom; seeing that the king's will and royal authority doth own it, as its own product; is joined therewith, doth operate therein, and doth in a manner quicken it, and keep it alive, by maintaining it, and executing the ordinances contained therein, etc. So also is and doth the Spirit of God in and with this wisdom, which here most properly in this distinction from the Spirit, is compared to a looking glass, full of wonders.

Besides this distinction between going out, and that which is gone out, or between the Spirit which is God, and wisdom which is under God, there is yet another distinction to be taken notice of, between this Wisdom and wisdom itself, or rather (which is more proper according to Behmen's expressions, who giveth the name of wisdom only to what is in the holy Light World) between this looking-glass, and Looking-glass.

For as the Spirit itself cometh now in a two-fold consideration, according to the Two Eternal Principles, and in answerableness to that distinction, which is now intelligible between the Father and the Son; so doth this looking-glass also. And as the Spirit is in each of these two eternal worlds, according to the property of each; so is this Looking-glass also, in each according to its condition, representing only that, which to that part of eternal nature doth belong, and having no ability to admit of anything that is of, or appertaineth to the other part. [N.B.]

For in the very nature of a Principle, if taken in Behmen's sense, this is most necessarily, and absolutely implied, That it hath its own dominion, in, and by, and for itself, according to its own natural constitution, and that it cannot be concerned with any thing that is without its own sphere.

And hereby that great objection, cast in against Teutonicus, when he had written, God knew not beforehand the fall of Lucifer, is answered sufficiently: as may be seen from his own words in the Aurora, and in his Apology against Balhasar Tilken.

The Fourth Extract, selected for insertion on the present occasion, consists of "GENERAL POSITIONS CONCERNING THE DIVINE BEING IN UNITY and TRINITY, and ESPECIALLY the GENERATION OF ETERNAL NATURE, gathered from our FORMER WRITINGS, according to the MIND OF TEUTONICUS; and all taken either IMMEDIATELY FROM his own plain UNQUESTIONABLE WORDS, or by means of an EVIDENT CONSEQUENCE flowing forth freely OUT OF THEM," thus:—

The first and deepest concept, the human mind can have of the Divine Being, according to the Scripture, is justly said to be that of Unity: because in our going back from the multiplicity of things, inquiring after their originals, we must needs stop and rest in the unity, without proceeding any further.

This concept of the unity doth not import, that, at any imaginable moment of eternity, the Unity hath been so alone by itself, without or before the Trinity; but only that our weak and finite understanding cannot but apprehend it so, and speak thereof so separately. For if the generation of the eternal Word, was and is from all eternity, without beginning (which Behmen expressly asserts with the Scripture), the unity never was without or before the trinity, yet must be conceived of as before, for natural reasons.

This Unity, belonging not unto the number and order of divided, outflown, and multiplied things, but being infinitely deeper than all things, and all our possible ideas thereof, and having as yet no manner of relation unto them, is to be conceived of, much rather so, as we conceive of that negative original, preceding all the numbers, and expressed in arithmetic by an 0, than so as we do of the first positive number 1. And therefore chiefly is it that Behmen useth to call this unity, an eternal nothing. Predestination, i. Theosoph. Quest. i.

In the concept of this unity, still considered as to itself alone, is necessarily implied, that it is without and before all manifestation, still, unmoveable, quiet, silent, hid and dwelling in itself; and therefore well enough expressed by still eternity, and by Behmen's temperature (the first), abyss, and eternal liberty; which latter expression denotes with him a freedom from, and a priority to all the properties of Nature. For all what in our concept implieth anything of moving, speaking, breathing, etc. implieth a receding from the true concept of this unity, and representeth more or less implicitly, instead thereof, a trinity.

All this again doth not import that at any imaginary moment of eternity, there hath been such a state of rest and silence, which by Behmen is expressly contradicted:

But only, that our understanding, in its gradual process backwards, and inquiry after the deepest original of things, cannot but apprehend it so. For, if by nature we understand with Behmen in general, a moving stirring life, and ask thereupon what is without or before it? we must needs answer, a rest and stillness; or else we would say, there is a moving and stirring, without and before motion or mobility.

All what was said hitherto, was in consideration of the Unity, as only and strictly in and to itself. But now of this same Unity, Abyss, Nothing, or eternal Liberty, considered as with some respect, or as in order to eternal nature, Behmen saith it hath a Will, and is a Will, both which is right, and neither this nor that is inconsistent with the other (Deus est quod habet), if we but look upon that former as more accommodate to our manner of apprehension and speech, and upon this latter, to the internal reality of the thing itself, this wherein there is no distinction.

Considering this, we may find Behmen reconciled sufficiently with himself, when he says in one place, God dwelleth in himself, and in another, he dwelleth in an abyss, and in a third, the abyssal nothing is a dwelling-place of the divine Unity, because here, before and without nature, there is no difference between the abyss and the will, or the dwelling-place and its inhabitant.

This abyssal Will is here not yet considered as in its act, or as a perceptible will, but as in its root. For else Behmen could not call it abyssal, and could not have said, That in this will, nature lieth as a hidden fire, which is and is not. Seeing that in the will, considered as in its act, nature doth no more lie as a hidden fire, but rather as a fire now manifesting out of the abyss, by the generation of gradual properties.

This abyssal Will is now further considered by Behmen as Father, both of the eternal Word, in the eternal generation within, and of eternal Nature also, in the co-eternal manifestation without.

To the question lately proposed, How can one and the same will move or go forth* at one instant both towards within and towards without? The answer is, according to Behmen's ground, plain and easy, viz. this: a will in actu cannot do so, because there is already a certain determination implied in the notion thereof, by which determination it is either to go in, and then it

* The following "Questions" with their Answers more immediately appertain to a subsequent page, but for convenience sake, we insert the Note containing them in this place:—

"Question I.—What goes out of the Abyss into the trinity, distinct from what goes out of the same into nature? Answer. An incommunicable and incomprehensible delight within himself only, is in the Trinity. But stirring communicable properties, displaying themselves, as a more exterior thing, in a perceptible variety, are in Nature. Both this and that is out of the abyss, and this is manifestly distinguished from that. He that sits upon the throne is certainly distinguished from what is before the throne, and both this and that from the throne itself, which throne (in this consideration) may be the abyss.

—II.—Do there go out into the Trinity incommunicable properties only, or communicable also? Answer. I can find indeed no other distinction, but what relates to an incommunicability in the first, and a communicability in the second, yet not so, as if there were nothing at all, in the severest strictness, communicable in the first, and nothing at all in the strictness incommunicable in the second. But only so, that all what can be conceived of, as communicable in the first, is in some sense to be conceived of, as lessened in degree, when it is communicated to the second, and still successively more, when unto other inferior things.

So that this same, which is in the first communicable in a lower sense to the second, is nevertheless incommunicable in a higher, because it cannot be communicated to the second in that fullness, extent, or totality of sense, wherein it is in the first only.

If there were in the strictest sense, all incommunicable in the first, and all communicable in the second, there would be a total separation between the first and second, and no coherence at all. But if it be so as now is said, there is connexion between them preserved, and the first retains nevertheless always its due prerogative (which is absolutely incommunicable) above the second. For instance, may be considered, in the first, that great I AM, which is communicable to the second, viz. to nature, and further also, but with a great alteration of sense and degree, to angels and to men. And in the second, which is in one sense all communicable, there is nevertheless something also still of an absolute incommunicability, viz. this, I am a total or universal basis of all created things.

This is manifestly incommunicable unto any creature, though all the properties of nature, both principal and subordinate, are communicable unto all, in a lower, and exterior sense and degree.

—III.—If a creature hath the whole natural God in it, doth not this make the creature equal unto God? Answer. No creature, from the lowest to the highest, hath the whole natural God in it. For the whole natural God, or God in Nature, is the universal basis of all the creatures. This is his unalterable prerogative, implying a manifest contradiction, if we would say, the creature hath or can have this in it.

The creature hath indeed in a sense, in it, the whole nature, that is all the properties thereof in its endless variety, but (1.) only, that not all those properties are equally manifest in it. And (2.) only so, as in a lower sphere of creatural being, and not at all in that higher, wherein the nature was a whole nature, (and is still so in itself) before any creature was.

Here therefore is no more an equality, than there can be between a greater and lesser, or higher and lower circle, so conceived of as that the lesser and lower is subordinated to and depends upon the greater and higher.

—IV.—Can any creature say that it is a part of the natural God? Answer. No: Behmen combining frequently these two expressions together, the natural and creatural God, directs us to observe that continual distinction of degrees, just now touched a little, and declared by him in several places.

The natural God, is God as manifested in and by eternal nature, which he was before any creature was. And the creatural God is indeed the same natural God, yet now no more considered in that former sense and degree, but in a lower, viz. as manifested again in a lower and exterior sphere of created beings; wherein all the creatures taken collectively together, are the whole manifestation of the natural God, or the whole creatural God, or all the invisible things of God made visible: like as the whole outward nature is a whole manifestation of eternal nature, and this of the unmanifested and unatural God. [N.B. the sense and relations of every word in this paragraph.]

Take away all creatures, there will remain God in nature, or the natural God; but take away all nature and creature, there will remain God in himself only. No creature therefore can say that it is a part of the natural God, but it may say, (in Behmen's expression) that it is a part of the creatural God, for it says thereby no more, but that it is a part of the creation, or manifestation of God through the creation; and owns also thereby, that God is always a whole, total, or universal root or basis of all the creatures. [by the Wisdom and desire of the magia-Will.]

All this I think may well be illustrated by a simile, taken from those lesser and greater circles, that are made by a stone cast into a still, standing water. Where always the outmost is most remote from the centre, and dependeth upon that which is next to it; by which also it is made, but cannot go out, etc. But this will, still here considered as abyssal, can do so, because there is not yet in the notion thereof, a distinct determination implied, neither to this side nor that. And if a root, in its gross manner and way can spread forth itself, at once, and by one motion, both to the right hand and to the left, why not much more eminently so, this most universal root of all divided things?

The so called, by Behmen, eternal generation and co-eternal manifestation, are as it were two collateral branches, out of one and the same root. Though therefore we cannot say, the same actual will that goeth out, goeth also in, which Behmen never said, yet we can say with him, the same abyssal will goeth both out and in at once, and displayeth itself in these two branches, of which it is the common root, having not yet in it any distinction, as long as abyssal; nor can we conceive in it any determination to this or that, according to Behmen's plain words, saying, It is without all properties, and hath no inclination to this or that, for it hath nothing before, behind, nor besides itself, which it could be inclined to. The two places of Behmen quoted above, will justify this answer in almost all their expressions, convincing us, that if we conceive of any inclination or determination in this abyssal will, we do no more conceive an unity, but a duplicity: no more a temperature, but a distinction and inequality; no more an unsearchable nothing, but two conceivable somethings, the one inclining and the other inclined to; no more an eternal liberty, but a being tied to this, in opposition to that; no more an abyss, where this no searching, finding, etc., but a byss, having found already something, which it tendeth to, and uniteth with in its will.

Now further: out of this abyssal Will, by its moving and flowing out, Behmen says, All cometh forth whatsoever there is, both in the internal generation in trinity, and in the co-eternal manifestation in nature.

As to that former there is no objection made, for therein is generated according to the Scripture, God out of God. But concerning this latter, there is first brought in a question, and then from this a great objection.

It is asked, Is eternal Nature out of the abyssal will, so that this abyssal will, is the (quasi) material cause thereof? Or is it only brought forth out of nothing, by an omnipotent power of this will, commanding that it should be so? [See Note, p. 291, 2.]

The answer must be, according to Behmen, affirmative for that former, and negative to this latter. Though there must needs be observed, that according to Behmen's ground, and the whole construction of his writings, that the concept of a material cause, however refined by the addition of a quasi, is here in this matter much more impertinent, than ever an ell can be to measure the height etc. of the wind.

He expressly calleth this Abyssal Will a father of nature; not a former, nor maker, nor also creator, but a father, in which name, his having generated, or brought it forth out of himself, is absolutely implied. But,

The reasons for which an out of nothing is all inconsistent with Behmen's ground, and an out of himself is expressly asserted, may be these following:

(1.) The Abyssal Will, as it is here considered in this beginning of the gradual generation of nature, hath no power, to command that anything should come forth out of nothing. And though there is all power therein concentrated, yet there is not any ability for to exert any power; but this first out-flowing into desire, and further into the other properties of nature, is made for this self-same end, that the powers might be exerted and displayed and brought forth into activity. Which is not done before the generation of the fire. And though there is in the Divine Being, neither a before, nor after, yet it might be so in our distinct apprehension. In the fire therefore, not before it, Behmen placeth properly the Divine omnipotence. If we place such an omnipotent commanding power in the first Abyssal Will, we understand him not, and run all into confusion.

(2.) The first step of the Abyssal Will, out of its abyss into nature, is a desire. Nothing can be nearer to the will, than its own raising itself, for to take in that which it willeth. And this raising, or as Behmen styles it, this sharpening itself, is, in this beginning part of nature, called by him desire. Who now can say, with any sense, that a desire is brought forth out of nothing, by the will's omnipotent command, and is thus joined to that will from without? Must we not say, That out of the still and resting will, the stirring desire floweth out? That is, a desire of that will, which intendeth to manifest itself thereby. And the will itself bringeth forth itself into desire. For truly the will conceiveth a desire in itself, in one respect, and sendeth it forth out of itself in another, as an exterior offspring.

(3.) This generation (in its full perfection) is the Divine nature, even that which we shall be made partakers of again in our regeneration, according to Scripture. It is the manifestation of God in his powers and wonders, [Ternarius Sanctus.] And what shall hinder us to say, in one particular sense, It is God himself, (though we say rightly again in another, it is not God, but his manifestation, instrument, etc., of which seeming contradiction hereafter,) seeing that the Scripture expressly saith, our God is a consuming fire.

doth not contain, nor apprehend it, and is neither that whole circle itself, nor a part thereof, but a whole for itself, though weaker and more impotent. So that none of all these circles hath the principle or power of making itself a circle, but altogether do depend only upon that central point, where the first motion was made.

— V.—May not the creature because of its having the whole nature, or natural God in it, be worshipped? Answer. No creature, as was now said, hath in it, neither the whole nature, nor the whole creatural God, but is only a part, or particular of this latter. And its having in it the whole nature in such a sense as mentioned above, makes nothing at all for a worship, but is rather directly against it.

Moreover, our worship implieth the deepest humiliation of ourselves, with an explicit acknowledgment, that that same which we worship, is that universal ground, wherein we all live and move and have our being. Which if no creature can be, none also can be worshipped. In a low and partial sense, we have our being from our parents, them therefore we are especially commanded to honour. And this honour runs parallel, in its lower sphere, with that worship in that higher, wherein therefore it can be due to none or nothing, but only that which was before the creation, and which could be what it is, though all the creatures should be taken away."

Now then the Divine nature, or that which the Scripture calleth our God, is not brought forth out of nothing, by a commanding omnipotent power of another God, that liveth before and without nature.

(4.) This generation of eternal nature is not to be conceived as arbitrary, but as necessary, therefore it cannot be out of such a nothing as is without, or different from the first Abyssal Will; but out of that Nothing, which is not only nothing in one respect, but also an universal All in another; and which will not bear that former name and being only, but must necessarily manifest and display itself in multiplicity and variety, for to shew forth its own abyssal Allness.

(5.) Of created and visible things the Scripture no where saith, that they were brought forth out of nothing, but that the invisible things of God were made visible. If we then with the Scripture, are to call them his invisible things, we are not to conceive of them as of nothing, though they were nothing to themselves before they came to be visible. And if this be right and true as to the lower things of this world; how much the more, and in what a higher degree of truth and regularity, must it be right and true also, concerning these invisible things themselves, viz. the properties of eternal nature?

Which therefore, when we conceive them with Behmen as having laid in the first Abyssal Will, like as a hidden fire, which was and was not, are not to be conceived of as nothing, nor as having laid in nothing, but must be called with him, his imperceptible things, and said to be made perceptible, in, and by this outflowing eternal generation.

(6.) Angels and men are the children and offspring of God (according to Scripture,) partakers of the Divine nature; bearing his name written upon them; having that life and light in them, which was in the eternal Word, which Word was in and with God, and was God; having a natural kind of omnipotence in them, for to faith nothing is impossible, etc.: and of man especially the Scripture saith, that he came to be a living soul, (not by God's saying, fiat, out of nothing, but) by his breathing (out of his own mouth) into him the breath of life; that we must be born again from above, and out of God; that his seed remaineth in us; that he is not only our creator, with respect to the body, but also father, with respect to soul and spirit; that Christ the only begotten Son, in whom the Father is well pleased, called us his brethren, etc:

Let now all these things and many more the like, be duly pondered, and then the conclusion must needs be this, That angels and men are generated out of God, and not brought forth out of a nothing, by God's commanding will. And if so, they must needs be so many living witnesses, that this eternal nature, with all its properties, is out of God also, considered here but as the first Abyssal Will; and this because they have in all their nothing else, but what is and was before them in eternal nature.

Hereupon two objections are now cast in; the one taken from the notion of a material cause, and the other from an apprehension of the darkness its being in God,* which is said to be directly

* Concerning darkness in God.—“Behmen speaks much of an eternal darkness in the first property of nature. This darkness, is objected, must be in God, because it is supposed to be in his desire, which is directly contrary to the Scripture, saying expressly, God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. 1 John i. 5.

To this objection I cannot but answer distinctly, with reference to the four particular words of this position, (1.) darkness (2.) is, or is not (3.) in (4.) God. For each of them will show us, that Behmen by his eternal darkness in the first property of nature, hath not contradicted neither this place of the Scripture, nor any other. I say therefore,

I.—Let the words of the apostle be read, and it will evidence itself, that he understandeth by darkness that, which now is called so, after the fall of angels and men, in a notorious opposition to the light.

Like as also St. James doth in that parallel place of his, where he says, that with the Father of light is no variableness, neither shadow of turning.

That now such a thing as they mean, is in God, or in the first property of eternal nature, Behmen never hath asserted, but rather the pure contrary. For he expressly says, in conformity with both these apostles, God is light; again, This light shone from all eternity without beginning; and again, This shining of the light was never interrupted, by any of the darkness's breaking forth and prevailing over it.

Where now light is, there is no darkness, and where the light had no beginning, there was no darkness before it; and where also the shining light was not interrupted by any darkness, there was no variableness, neither shadow of turning, and no darkness in the light at all. But with the light, there was, in a sense, (not which these two apostles call darkness, but) that which Behmen calleth so, which he had good reason to call so, and which is called so in another place, even by this same apostle St. John himself, for it was and must have been that, which the light from eternity shone into, and that which comprehended it not, according to his words in the beginning of his gospel.

If then the apostle in this place, 1 John i., understands by darkness one thing, and Behmen another, where is the contradiction? Not so much as in the letter, but only in a consequence, that has no coherence with Behmen's sense, as shall appear hereafter.

II.—By darkness in the first property of eternal nature, Behmen understands an astringency, a condensation, in a spiritual sense and manner, or a being thicker and more perceptible than the first abyssal will can be. This he declareth why it must be so, and this he calleth darkness, because (1.) according to his own account given thereof in plain words by himself, this astringency is the first and deepest ground, of what is darkness afterwards, in and to the creatures, when by departing from their life and light in God, they fall into this astringent darkness, or as he calls it, still-standing death. Which then, the Scripture calls everywhere by the same name of darkness, and everlasting chains of darkness. Which expression plainly represents a binding, astringing, and shutting up into death, in opposition to light and life, which is all free, open and liberally giving forth itself.

(2.) And he calls it darkness, and hath good reason to call it so, because in this beginning, partial, and gradual consideration, fixing upon the first property of nature only, the fire is not yet pro-contrary to the Scripture.

The first objection is this, If eternal nature is not produced out of nothing, by the abyssal Will, commanding that it should be so, but is brought forth out of that will itself, then it must be either God or a part of God: because this out of imports a (quasi) material cause, and makes God to be not only an effective, but also a constitutive principle of nature; and so God and nature are confounded, which is all intolerable.

To this first objection distinctly, it may be answered: (1.) Such an objection was not made to Behmen himself, but yet what he would have said, if occasion had been given him, may be apparent enough, even from that simile he made use of in this matter.

He bids us to consider our mind and thoughts, because we bear in us, and are ourselves the duced, and so also the light not yet risen out of the fire. If we then must needs say, Wherever is no fire and light in nature, there is darkness, we cannot but conceive of this first property, that it is dark and without light: not that ever it was so in and to God, but because it is now so, in and to us, when we lose our eternal light, and are fallen into that dark astringent death. Where now in this sense of Behmen (meaning by darkness no more but a spiritual astringency in the first form of nature), is the contradiction against the apostle's words? Truly there is none at all, but much rather can we say, that this apostle by his saying, The darkness comprehended not the light, shining into it, says in substance that very same which Behmen doth in such a manner, The astringency in the first property of eternal nature is that, which condenseth and shutteth up itself, so that the shining light can find no receiver, no admittance, or no free and open place, or rather no such condition, as that it could display itself therein.

III.—What the apostle means by God, when saying, Darkness is not in God, must be inquired into. But this he can best tell us himself, in his own twofold definition of God, saying not only, God is light, but also in the same epistle, God is love.

Now light and love are that second, or superior part of the divine manifestation in eternal nature, which this first beginning, with its harsh astringency, must be subservient unto; and which Behmen commonly calleth the Second Principle. If then it is notorious, that all his declaration of this matter runs straightways to this point only, That in the second principle, the apostle's God, in light and love, not only is not, but also cannot be any darkness at all, neither what the apostle here calleth darkness, nor what he calleth so, in his consideration of eternal nature, before the creation and fall, Where is the contradiction between these two witnesses of the same eternal truth?

Nay, which is more, if Jacob Behmen in his declaration goes still deeper, and tells us more explicitly, not only that darkness is not in God, that is, not in the Divine Triune Being generating himself in himself; but also again, darkness is not in God, that is, not in the first Abyssal Will, which is all free, clear, pure, serene, without all astringency, over-shadowing, and condensing itself, etc. it may very well be asked again, Where is the contradiction?

IV.—The apostle doth not say in an absolute sense, Darkness is not at all, as if he would thereby totally deny all its being, and make it a mere nothing. But he says in a limited sense, It is not in God at all, granting thereby, that it is without God, viz. according to his own interpretation, without his light and love. Truly he had wisdom, and knew how to reconcile what the angel told him in so notoriously contradicting words, it was, is not, and yet is.

And all this is exactly conformable to Jacob Behmen, who says, in one sense, Darkness was from eternity, and in another, It was not: so that we may easily apprehend, the one saying, it was not, relates to these words of the apostle, not in God at all; and the other, it was, to that other expression, in itself.

But now, notwithstanding all this distinction (between in God, and in itself), it is undeniable, that there is also another sense, not contradicting that former, but supported thereby, and implied therein, and confirmed by other expressions of the Scripture; in which sense we can safely and soundly say, Darkness is in God: not meaning thereby, that it is touching or infecting him, or bringing any alteration, mixture, or variability upon his being light and love, but only that it is within, (not without) the boundless sphere or globe of his universal all-filling being, (and therefore not in him in one sense,) but being comprehended by him, (and therefore not without him, in another.)

If he is in the darkness and hell, so well as in the light and heaven (Ps. cxxxix), the darkness must be within his reach so well as the light, and must have its peculiar existence so well as the light, (not without, but) within the infinite latitude (if we may so say) of his being; when nevertheless it is in him not at all, but without him, that is, without his being light and love.

This in him therefore, and this without him, are not contradicting each other at all, for the sense, wherein we take him in the one expression, different from that wherein him is taken in the other, makes a plain distinction. If we may freely say, The devil is in God, we may say the same, and in the same sense, of the darkness also, for without God is nothing.

If the devil was once in God, and is not annihilated in his fall, as to his creatureal being, he is certainly still in God, though he hath left his first habitation in the light and love. Again, if the apostle Paul could say to the dark, unbelieving, superstitious and idolatrous Athenians, That they lived moved and had their being in God, without contradicting thereby his own saying to the Ephesians, which had once been just such a sort of heathens also, That formerly, when they were in that state, they were without Christ, and without God:

And lastly, if thus, in such a sense, we can say tolerably, and without offence and without contradicting the apostles, The darkness is in God, understanding even by darkness, that same evil thing, which now is called so after the fall, and in the disordered properties of nature in man; it is plain, that Behmen much more tolerably, and with lesser offence, could have said, The darkness is in God, understanding by darkness, that good and necessary thing, which was from and is to all eternity, in the beginning of the harmonious generation of the properties of eternal nature, viz. the spiritual astringency and condensation, which always is and must be in the eternal desire. For though such an expression, The darkness is in God (considered as before the creation and fall) is not to be found in Behmen's writings, he always saying, it is not in God, not in the Will, but in the Desire; yet I may grant freely, that he could have said so, without contradicting the Scripture. For in this latter harmless sense, (according to his ground) this expression is to be understood.

nearest representation of the Divine Being, that may be had. By our mind he understandeth not a formed, determinate, or particular thing, which could be described to be so, or so; or distinguished by this or that from other things of the same kind, but an universal, unformed, still, silent, unmanifest, free and undetermined ground; or as he expresseth it sometimes, an invisible, or imperceptible well-spring, in itself neither good nor evil, neither light nor darkness, neither joy nor sorrow, but antecedent to all these distinctions, and a mere nothing with respect to all our sensations or perceptibility; until it be made sensible and perceptible in and by our thoughts and senses, which out of it arise and multiply themselves in infinitum.

The mind he compareth to the eternal nothing, the first temperature, the abyssal stillness, etc. for as this, so also that, is in itself unmoveable, imperceptible, and without properties: and the

V.—That nothing can be in the desire, but what is in the will also, is ambiguous, and in Behmen's sense (whereof he is to be the interpreter) utterly false, and the contrary is true, viz. that something is, and must be in the desire, which is not and cannot be in the will.

Consider the simile formerly used, of a moderate appetite and a violent hunger. We know that former is antecedent, and, if not satisfied in due time, always attended by this latter. Consider whether each of them must not needs have something in it peculiar to itself, and incommunicable to the other, whereby it is known and said to be this, not that.

The abyss hath, as an abyss, in itself, neither light nor darkness. The first Abyssal Will therefore hath also neither this nor that; but as a will he willeth to have light, to dwell in the light, and to shew forth therein the infinite variety of his own central powers and wonders, so as that they may be all manifested and displayed, out of his own hidden centre.

He willeth not to have darkness, or to make first a darkness in his abyss, and then to produce a light out of it, but only and directly he willeth light.

But now this will (comparable, in an earthly manner, to a moderate appetite) cannot thus be satisfied. For he cannot have light only by willing it, or as it were by his playing in himself with it, in a pleasant imagination, representing unto himself the beauty and glory of the light. What is he then to do?

Shall he give over willing the light, because he cannot have it by his having only a will to have it? No. For this would be to deny himself, or as it were to despair of his all-sufficiency, and to be no more a will, willing the light. Not being able to forsake this willing the light, he must go on therein; and what is this going on, but a raising, sharpening, and setting himself forward, first into a strong vehement desire, and so further into that whole process, which formerly was described. [N.B. the process of our regeneration so often referred to, herein.]

Now this desire which is the first property of nature, as of a strong, moving, and stirring life, is in its own essentiality, attracting, astringent, condensing; as, if it were not so, nothing could be brought forth thereby, and no progress were made from the first abyssal will towards without, or towards a production of the light; but that will would only in itself still be willing the light, without any effect of having it. [N.B.]

This harsh astringency therefore (which Behmen saith is the first and deepest ground of what we now call darkness), is the proper internal and essential character of this desire, by which it is and must be distinguished from the will; which in itself, hath nothing of such an astringent attraction and condensation. Now let any one judge, in what sense there can be said, That nothing can be in the desire, but must be in the will also. Is it not evidently plain, that something must be in the desire, which cannot be in the will? Like as in a violent hunger there must be certainly that, which in a moderate appetite cannot be.

If then this be Behmen's sense, it is manifest, that the pretence of a contradiction between St. John and Behmen is groundless, because it depends only upon such a consequence, as has no coherence with his sense or meaning, nor any ground in his doctrine.

VI.—By another expression of Scripture parallel to this of St. John, this controversy concerning darkness in God, may not only be much illustrated, but also very well decided. The Scripture says, Wrath and fury is not in God. This says Behmen also.

But may we not also say with the Scripture, God is a consuming fire, or which is the same, a fiery justice is in God? And when we say so, do we mean thereby anything else, but that in God there is something which is wrath and fury in and to the creatures, if they awaken it in themselves? Surely wrath and fury are those hands of the living God, whereof the Scripture saith, it is a dreadful thing to fall into them. And yet those hands are also nothing else in God, but his consuming fire or his fiery justice.

If therefore justice and wrath are placed besides each other, and conceived of so, as that the former declareth, what the hands of the living God are in and to himself, and the latter, what the same are in and to the creature, the Scripture shall be consistent everywhere with itself.

Just now such a parallel distinction is also here between the spiritual astringency in the first property of nature, before the creation and fall, and darkness in the dark world after the fall.

That former is the deepest ground of this latter. This latter (in a certain sense) is not in God, but in the properties of nature disordered by the fall. And that former is also not in God (in a certain sense), but in the exterior moving generation of eternal nature. And as wrath and fury was not before the fall, when there was nevertheless that consuming fire, which now is wrath and fury, in and to the disobedient creatures: so also, darkness was not before the fall, when yet there was that spiritual astringency, etc. which is and maketh darkness in and to the creatures, when divorced from the light. In the generation of nature, the astringency is good and subservient to the production both of fire and light; but in the dark world after the fall, it is the greatest evil of punishment to creatures, for it is that which bindeth and shutteth up unto death the tincture and its free mobility, and is the first link of the everlasting chain of darkness.

If then, Behmen had but not used the name of darkness, in the description of the first property of nature, no contradiction had been found betwixt St. John and him. But now he having used it, and given us not only a good reason for so doing, but also declared sufficiently what he means thereby, he hath made it an unaccountable thing for any one to lay hold on the outward word, without minding the sense thereof. Which, if understood, cannot but make this whole objection vanish out of sight, and convince us of this truth, That he hath not contradicted the Scripture."

thoughts he compareth to the perpetually generating properties of nature ; for as the former are a stirring life of the mind, so also these latter, of the abyssal still eternity.

Now if we consider how the contents of this simile do agree, or disagree, with the notion of a material cause, we shall easily find what Behmen would have said thereof.

Three only particulars can make enough for this present purpose :

(a.) Nothing can be called a material cause, nor be looked upon as running, in a higher sense, parallel therewith, but that which hath in, by, and for itself (before or considered as abstracted from its effect) its own peculiar and particular essences ; and them so really as ever afterwards, that material, or quasi material effect hath, which is made up thereby.

(b.) Those essences, at least in part, if not wholly, must be communicated, or translated from the cause to its effect.

(c.) This translation or communication doth import of all necessity, that the material, or quasi material cause must always lose, or be deprived of just so much of its matter or essences, as it hath communicated to its material or quasi material product.

Now none of these three requisites can here be applicable to this present simile, and much less to that eternal generation of nature, which is thereby as in a shadow represented. And therefore Behmen would certainly have rejected this notion of a quasi material cause as altogether impertinent, and no more fit to conceive thereby anything of this matter in reality, than an earthen vessel is, to contain such or such a quantity of human thoughts. For he expressly declareth, that like as (a.) Our mind hath not its own peculiar and particular essences, in and by itself, before or considered as abstracted from its thoughts, so also the first abyssal Will hath none, and is therefore by Behmen called an unessential will. As our thoughts themselves are the essences of the mind, which is but an universal root or ground of them, so also the properties of eternal Nature themselves are the essences of their universal root, which is the first abyssal Will.

As our mind cannot be distinguished from its essences, except only thereby, that it is in itself a whole, unchangeable and unmoveable being, prior and superior to its essences, but in itself without distinction and perceptibility ; seeing that our thoughts are but so many particulars, distinct from the mind and from themselves, because generating themselves in a perpetual motion and alteration, and making thereby the mind perceptible of itself : so also it is declared by Behmen concerning the first abyssal will, and the eternal properties of nature, perpetually generating themselves.

(b.) If then our mind, as in and to itself, without its thoughts, is un-essential, no essences thereof, neither wholly, nor in part, can be communicated from this imagined quasi material cause to its product or effect.

And as our mind is never broken to pieces, nor divided into parts, by sending forth out of itself so many thoughts : and what is more, as our mind itself, is never changed or transmuted into the thoughts, so as to cease to be what it was, and to be no more an universal fruitful root or ground thereof : so also all this is rightly applied by Behmen to the first abyssal Will ; and all this declareth again sufficiently, that as our mind, so also this abyssal un-essential will can have no manner of communion with what we call a material cause.

(c.) As our mind, communicating no essences to its thoughts, can lose nothing at all of its being, nor be deprived of anything, by their arising and coming forth out of it. But rather on the contrary, as it (in a sense and manner) winneth and getteth thereby ; seeing that it cometh thereby into manifestation and perception of itself, and that it sheweth forth thereby, for its own delight, the endless fullness of its own hidden treasury : so also this third particular is largely declared in many places, and elegantly applied by Behmen to the first abyssal will. And this then sheweth again, (first) that the notion of a material cause, though never so much refined by a quasi, and though never so useful in the lower region of natural things in this our Third Principle, is here, in this consideration of this beginning of eternal nature, altogether impertinent. And (secondly) that nevertheless as it is rightly said, Our thoughts arise, and come forth out of our mind, have no other thing for their original, and are not formed out of nothing by a commanding power of the mind : so also is it rightly said, The properties of eternal nature arise out of the abyssal will, have no other original but this will, and are not brought forth out of nothing, or barely effected by the will, commanding that it should be so.

Hereupon is now replied, If our understanding of this matter is to be thus directed by this simile, we shall at length lose all the distinction between God and nature ; for it is generally agreed upon, that our thoughts are nothing else, but the mind itself, variously modified.

If we then shall say accordingly, That eternal nature is in like manner God himself, will not this be to take away all distinction ?

Answer. This exception against Behmen's simile is of no consideration ; because the contents thereof make in reality very much for his sense, but nothing at all against it. But this will evidence itself, by what now further is to be answered to that former great objection. viz.,

(2.) There was said above, What shall hinder us to say in one respect and sense, eternal nature is God himself, seeing that this saying is supported by these plain expressions of the Scripture, our God is a consuming fire ; and again, God is light ? Though we may say rightly also in another sense, Eternal nature is not God himself, but only his manifestation, or his instrument.

Both this and that is said by Behmen in plain words. Affirmatively he saith, Aurora, Chapter xi, This light is the true Son of God, whom we Christians honour and adore, as the second person in the holy Trinity, etc. And negatively he says again, in plain words, of the three first properties of eternal nature, That they have their ground in the Trinity, but are not to be understood, as that they are God, but only his manifestation. And so of eternal Nature in general, That it is to be distinguished from God, and is his instrument, or an instrument of the still eternity.

Now from the whole system of all his writings about this matter, it appears sufficiently, that he hath not thereby contradicted himself in sense, though the words run directly contrary to each other. For like as we can rightly say, in one respect of his usual simile, Our thoughts are the mind itself, because without our thoughts, we cannot be sensible of the mind ; all our sensation is confined, and all our perception of the mind restrained to our thoughts ; and without or abstracted from our thoughts, the mind is as it were quite nothing, etc. And as we can nevertheless rightly say also, according to Behmen's declaration, Our thoughts are not the mind itself, because the mind is their ground and root, which if it were not, the thoughts could not arise, nor change, nor multiply; the thoughts are particular things, posterior and inferior to the mind; and the mind is a whole universe, prior, and superior to the thoughts.

The thoughts are a moving stirring life, when the mind, abstracted from the thoughts, is a still unmovable rest: in the spirit of our mind (not our thoughts) the Scripture saith, we shall be renewed; and though even as to the thoughts also, we shall certainly be renewed, yet the Scripture, speaking in this place of the mind, and requiring in other parallel places, the very bottom, or the inmost ground of the heart, sheweth sufficiently that the thoughts are not the deepest ground in the sight of God, and therefore (in so good a sense as ever that other can be,) not the mind itself.

Though the thoughts are the deepest in our sight, or perceptibility, and make us therefore to say tolerably, they are the mind itself, because we can have no apprehension, nor sensation of what the mind is without our thoughts.

So also now all this is rightly applied by Behmen to God and nature; and this simile can safely direct our understanding of this matter, so that nothing of a due distinction between God and nature is lost thereby, and no contradiction in sense is found. For we can rightly say with Behmen in one sense and respect, Eternal nature is God himself, because it is that which of the Divine Being is communicable to the creature, (according to Scripture,) both with respect to our understanding, and to all our constituent essences. It is that deepest, inmost ground (expressly called God in the Scripture) wherein we live and have our being; which ground we are confined to, and deeper than which we cannot reach, but must needs say in Behmen's sense, that which is beyond it, is an eternal Nothing. It is that which we are commanded to worship, as our only God in Trinity; seeing that the Scripture tells us of no other Father, but him that calls himself a consuming fire; of no other Son, but him, that is this Father's light and brightness; and of no other Holy Spirit, but him that proceedeth from this fire and light. And lastly, it is that, wherein our highest good, eternal happiness and glory, and our ultimate end consists, or that wherein we are to rest and acquiesce for ever. Rightly therefore it is called and owned to be God, our God. But all this notwithstanding, we can rightly say also with Behmen, in another sense and respect, Eternal nature is not God himself, because it is not that most supreme, all-abyssal, all-unsearchable, and altogether incommunicable being, which generates himself in himself in Trinity. It is not that (in every imaginable sense) beginningless, and endless Unity, which, before and without its outflowing can be conceived of, if not properly as a centre, yet as an indivisible point; but it is rather to be likened to a circumference, which in some sense hath a beginning and an end:

It is not altogether that groundless ground, which hath nothing before it, out of which it could come forth, which it could depend or rest upon, and which is itself the ground of all what is posterior; but it dependeth upon this ground, is out of this ground what it is, and if this groundless ground were not, this eternal nature also could not be. What distinction now between God and Nature can we desire more; and where is the confusion, pretended to be brought in by Behmen's simile? But with him, and according to Behmen's sense, we say now further:

Of that first, all-abyssal, all-incommunicable, beginningless, endless, groundless, Triune Being (which because it is in itself only what it is, must needs be hid and unmanifest), this eternal Nature, in the perpetual generation of its seven chief properties, all intelligible and communicable more or less, is a perpetual manifestation. And this is called also by Behmen significantly, with another peculiar respect, A sounding harmonious instrument, which the Spirit of eternity playeth upon; and with another again, A tool wherewith he worketh, etc.

But here is now replied again, Generation and manifestation are two expressions, not well consistent with each other, in one and the same thing. If eternal nature is a generation, how can it be a manifestation? And if it be a manifestation, what sense can there be in calling it a generation?

Answer. Eternal nature is a manifestation with respect to what is before and without it, for this is made manifest thereby; and a generation it is chiefly with respect to itself, for it is not only generated once, as we might conceive of it, but is also generating perpetually, that is, standing perpetually in the same incessant, unalterable generation of its properties. When it is considered as in the first abyssal Will, wherein Behmen says, It laid as a hidden fire, which is and is not; it is unmanifest; but when it is considered as coming forth, in the three first properties, out of that hidden ground, this same coming forth is its generation, significantly called so, because it cometh not forth from besides that will, but out of it, which in common speech cannot be otherwise expressed, but by saying, that it is generated, or born out of that womb, wherein it laid. And this same generation is a manifestation also, no less significantly called so, (1.) with respect to itself, because that which was a hidden fire, which was and was not, is now a manifest and freely-burning fire, of which it cannot be said, It is, and is not, but only, It is. And (2.) with respect also to the first abyssal Will, which was not manifest, but also could not be manifest without this generation, but is now manifested by the same, because it hath not only showed forth thereby its own hidden central all-sufficiency for such a generation; but is also now itself this manifested free-burning fire, which it was not, and could not have been, without this generation of the three first properties of nature. But this I have reason to hope will be more cleared by what I have still further to answer to that former great objection. For

[Here the matter was interrupted, nay broken off with violence.]

The Fifth of these progressive Extracts, consists of the following LETTER to a Clergyman, in which are "TWO QUESTIONS ANSWERED:"—

Revd. Sir,—Your first Question is, Whether Jacob Behmen asserts, that there was a motion of the central fire with its own self desire, whereby the will of God was stirred in both fires, and the anger-fire broke forth, before the fall of angels?—This now I cannot but answer unto directly, saying, God forbid! No such thing may be found, neither said, nor implied in any place of his writings. But the contrary may be demonstratively shown not only from a great many of his plain expressions, free from all ambiguity, but also from the whole order and connexion of God's eternal manifestation, made first as to himself through eternal nature, and further as to creatures through their creation. And especially in his fourth theosophical question, wherein you say, that he seems to assert it so, he saith no such thing at all. How it may be translated into English, I know not, but if your expressions are taken from that translation, it is directly contrary to the high Dutch original. For,

(1.) The author saith not, that the central fire moved with its own self desire. But so he saith, When the central fire of the own will (that fire which is, if divorced from the light, the matrix or mother of own will) moved, and when it introduced itself into a greater desire, for its contemplation and formation, then the creation was done. Which greater desire is so plain as the day at noon, that it was not that evil, accursed, own self-desire, or selfishness, which he saith, v. 4, was cast out from the working of God, and was shut up into darkness; but it was a good, needful, regulated, and blessed desire, not cast out from the working of God, but made use of in his work; and not shut up in darkness, but brought forth to the light. For when the central fire moved, and introduced itself into this greater desire, the eternal ideas came to be figured or formed creatures, to the praise of the wonders of God.

(2.) He saith not, that by this motion of the central fire, the eternal will of God was stirred (passive) in both fires. But he saith the pure contrary, viz. that the eternal will of God stirred (active) the central fire, (that one only substance or being, v. 2.) and that he stirred it in or as to both fires: into which this One Being is distinguished in the Two eternal Principles.

If he had said that former, he would on one side have dethronized the eternal will of God, raising up above him, a motion of eternal nature; and especially of the inferior fiery part thereof. And on the other, he would have showed himself a kind advocate to the apostatized angels, instructing them how to plead their cause against the Creator. But since he saith the latter, he is clear and free both from this and that.

(3.) He speaketh distinctly of two, nay I may say, (knowing what and how, though I cannot presume to make it intelligible enough) of three much different things, which you seem, Sir, to take but for one and the same, or at least to make but a little distinction between them; mentioning indeed both the central and anger-fire, but considering not how they are two, notwithstanding that they are also but one, and thinking, that in this single expression of anger-fire you have the whole matter perfectly implied. Whereas our author hath not such a single and general expression in this place, but speaketh very circumspectly and circumstantially, saying v. 4, In this motion (of the central fire) the hellish foundation of God's anger broke forth also along with it.

Whether it be so distinctly expressed in the English translation I cannot tell; but this I can, that none of these circumstances is to be neglected, if his sense shall not be wronged; for none is superfluous, they are altogether significant, and sufficient to demonstrate that he asserted no such thing, as in your question is expressed.

Of this two or threefold distinction then, we must have got an idea in our mind, if not from a deep internal ground, yet at least from having much conversed with his style, or manner of expression. If we have got that former, he cannot at all, and if this latter, not easily, be misapprehended. The central-fire and anger-fire are in one remoter sense, but one indeed; but in another nearer, they are also really two.

Like as on one side the central-fire is but one substance with the light-fire, v. 2, when there is yet also a great distinction between these two: so on the other, the central-fire is also one with the anger fire, and yet there is a far greater distance between these latter, than between the former two. For the former two can and do actually consist together, both in God and in creatures, but the latter two can by no means consist together, neither in God, nor in creatures.

In God there is a central-fire, but not an anger-fire, neither before nor after the fall of angels; and in creatures if there be an anger-fire, there is no central-fire, for by falling into that, they are immediately banished out of this; and that which before was a central-fire in them, is now become an anger-fire, not in God, but in themselves.

The central-fire is properly the First Principle, the great strong city of God the Father, the residence of his living power and almighty power. And this was never and can never be an anger-fire, if we will not think, that the eternal Father is angry with his only begotten Son.

Nay we cannot say, that it is an anger-fire in him, even now, after the fall of angels and men. For God is not angry with the devil, he is still the same from eternity to eternity, and changeth not; but the devil is angry with God, and so the anger-fire is only the devil's residence, for he hath changed the central fire into an anger fire, not in God, but in himself.

If they both were angry with each other, they lived both within the same residence, which without blasphemy cannot be asserted.

And so far I think it is intelligible enough, but there is still yet another and more subtle distinction to be made, reaching much deeper, and not easily without experience to be really apprehended.

And this lieth therein, that our author saith not in your single expression, The anger fire broke forth, but the hellish foundation of God's anger, which he calleth also especially Satan, or the dragon, whereof there may be seen what he saith, Question xlii. 10, 11, compared to xi. 3—6. For if this be understood, it will show forth itself in the clearest evidence, that he doth not assert what your question, Sir, expresseth. But fearing justly that I might not be able to explain myself intelligibly enough, as to this particular, and seeing that it can by other means be evidenced sufficiently, I shall lay this aside; being moreover well enough sensible thereof, that nothing can suffice you for evidence, except this particular expression, of breaking forth be cleared up, so that you may acquiesce with what he understandeth, by saying, The hellish foundation of God's anger broke also forth along with the motion of the central fire, and this in the creation of angels, certainly before their fall.

For here, I think, lieth the only knot, which gave occasion to this Question, and which the English translation of this third and fourth verse (which I have now seen) gave you just occasion for, seeing that it is very wrong, and must mislead the reader.

Wherefore I am the more concerned in my mind, how to lay open most plainly our author's sense in this serious matter, which is truly of great importance, and of many considerable consequences.

And I think I cannot do it better, than by considering first the whole order and connection of all what here is said in this fourth Theosophical Question. For so there will appear manifestly not only that his sense is good, conformable to all his writings, simple and child-like; but also, that it is well and significantly expressed, and even so, that it doth not justify nor excuse the fallen angels, but only exalt the glory of their Creator.

The whole order and connexion is this: before the creation of angels, there was only God, with the two central fires, an eternal generation of wonders, etc. as he declareth v. 1. Now it is asked,

Which was the first original or principal cause of the creation of angels, or that which made the first beginning in order thereunto? To say it was a motion of eternal Nature, or of one part thereof, as the fire is, and this with its own self-desire too, by which motion the will of God was stirred, caused, or perhaps necessitated to the creation, would be the greatest nonsense of the world.

But it was the eternal Will himself, desiring those eternal ideas should be substantial living creatures, formed for his praise and glory. And this, but not that former can be shown conformable to all our author's writings. But further,

Could the eternal ideas come to be substantial created beings, without an actual moving of that whereout they were to consist, or which there was to make up their being? To say they could, would be a great nonsense again. Truly that whereout they should come forth, which was eternal Nature, must both have been moved, and must have moved itself also, in a different respect. But that being moved must have been prior; and this moving itself posterior, as an effect of that former. For we know that eternal nature was itself, in its own essentiality, a perpetual moving without rest, or an eternal never-ceasing generation. But if this eternal moving (without being moved particularly by the only supremest power) could have been sufficient to bring forth the creation of angels, the angels altogether must have equally co-eternal with eternal nature, and could not own any other superior creator. It was then the eternal Will of God himself, who first moved and stirred this eternal nature, which there was to make up their created being; and then only, not before, but after it was thus moved and stirred, it was able to move itself, also further effectually to the creation.

No creation then was, nor could have been, until first the eternal will had actually stirred eternal nature.

In eternal Nature now, there were before the creation of angels, the two central fires, the anger fire and love fire; now so called (N.B.) a posteriori, after they both are manifested by the fall in a divorce from each other; but as then they could not have been called so, but their only name was, Fire and light in a most harmonious union, one only substance, v. 2. If then eternal nature was that which must have been moved or stirred by the eternal will, it must have been moved in, or as to both fires; not as to an anger and love fire (because not so before the fall), but as to fire and light.

For these two, and not only this or that thereof alone, but both together jointly and in union with each other, were to break forth. Which is properly and emphatically expressed so, for it was most really a breaking forth, out of, or through their own sphere, wherein they were before without living substantial creatures, into an exterior manifestation, or into innumerable self-subsisting beings, all bearing that one eternal fire and light within themselves, and all being nothing else but glorious fire-flames illuminated by the light, as so many little particular representatives of their Father and Creator, that great universal All in All, both in fire and light.

No living creature can there be generated in this Third Principle, except it have the fire of temporal nature, united to the light thereof in the generation of its life; and these two cannot be separated from each other, except this creature die.

So also out of eternal nature no living creature could have been brought forth, except it had its eternal fire and light, united to each other in its generation or creation; which it also must keep in that union, if it will live, and fall not into eternal death. And as these two, after they are broken forth in union into the creature, cannot be separated from each other, without its destruction: so they could also not have been separated from each other, before or in their breaking forth; for the life is in the fire, and without the fire the light is dead. And again, out of the fire only without the light, no glorious holy angels could have been brought forth, (we might say, devils could, if there had been such a creator, as could have delighted to create devils, which God forbid we should so much as think;) for holiness and glory is in the light, and without the light, the fire is but dark, obscure, and unholy, profane and strange to the most Holy and Almighty, whose dwelling-place is fire and light in union, but neither this nor that alone. But further,

When now thus eternal nature was moved and stirred as to both fires by the eternal will, what was the consequence or effect thereof? We see there were several and different effects, all linked together, and so succeeding each other (at least as to our manner of apprehension) that always the following depended upon its next preceding.

The first was, That eternal Nature moved itself also, and why should it not move to the creation, when it was moved thereto by the only superior eternal Will?

It is certainly nothing else but an instrument in his hand, and must nevertheless not be conceived as a dead, senseless, unmoveable instrument, like as an axe or hammer is in the hand of a carpenter, for it was itself in its own essentiality an eternal moving generation: wherefore it must be conceived as a living, faithful and obedient servant, who hath the principle of life and motion in his own members indeed, but is nevertheless only an instrument of his master, moving not to this or that design, except he be first moved and stirred himself thereto, by his command, as having also not ability enough to perform it, without being commissioned and empowered thereto by his authority.

This moving now in eternal nature was in, or as to both fires, for as to both it was also moved, for both were in union and both were one, like as Father and Son are one.

But as the fire is naturally prior, because of its being the root of the light, and the light posterior, because of its coming from the fire; so the first or chiefest, or beginning-motion is also ascribed to the fire, and not to the light. Before, the author had spoken of two central fires, and had said they were but one, but now he must also speak distinctly, of that central fire in particular, wherein there lieth the principal efficacy, or the foundation power of formation or generation. And this being in the fire, and not in the light, he saith justly, that the central fire of the own will moved, Showing thereby, that the beginning of moving to the creation in eternal nature, was and must have been made in the fire and not in the light.

And this fire, he saith not, moved with its own self desire, nor saith he that it moved in its own will, for it was declared sufficiently that it moved not, until it was moved and so commanded to move by the eternal Will; but he saith plainly, that it moved and introduced itself into a greater desire, which sheweth quite another sense than the English translation expreseth. But why he calleth it the central fire of the own will, several good reasons might be given, but this is the chiefest, viz. that he now must have distinguished the two central fires, if he should have declared distinctly what he intended. If he then must have distinguished the first central fire from the second, he could not have done it better than by a denomination taken from its own proper, essential, and inseparable character, not common to both fires, but proper in particular to that first alone.

But seeing that there was not yet such a character manifested, neither before nor in the creation, both fires standing then as one only Being, in the most harmonious union, he must have taken a convenient distinguishing denomination a posteriori, from after the fall of angels. And there he found the proper character of this first central fire was own will, immediately after or in the fall of angels. Which character is absolutely proper to the fire, but incommunicable to the light.

For in the fire, and not in the light, the own will ariseth, and liveth, whenever and as soon as a divorce is made between them. In the fire, and not in the light, is that eternal substantial life, which cannot die nor cease, being an indissoluble circling band of the four first properties of nature, generating themselves always mutually, and therefore also perpetually, if but once knit together by the kindling of the fire. When contrariwise, that life which is in the light can die, or cease and pass away, as it died also actually in the fall of angels, when own will arose in the fire, wherein it liveth also still as in its proper residence. And so that first central fire is justly called the fire of own will; though I grant freely that all is not yet said hereby, but it is called so, with another and deeper respect also. Which if I should bring forth, I could neither do it in few words, nor perhaps so as to be enough understood. Seeing then (1.) that this which is now said is not contrary unto that, (2.) that it is a great deal plainer, and (3.) exactly conformable to all our author's writings, I shall pass it by, and proceed.

The next consequence depending upon the first, and almost coincident therewith, is this, That when the central fire moved, it introduced itself into a greater desire. As the moving before was ascribed peculiarly to the fire, and not to the light, because of its priority, and of its having the principal power of formation or generation in itself above the light; so this greater desire is ascribed also peculiarly to the fire, and not to the light, though neither here nor there the light may be excluded. As eternal Nature in its own intrinsic essentiality, from eternity was a moving generation as to both fires, so it was a desire also from eternity as to both fires.

How will and desire in a true and real sense, may and must be attributed to all its seven fountain properties, nay, to all its lesser subordinated innumerable powers also, shall be said in the consideration of the second question. Here we are only to say, That eternal nature in general was and had (for being and having cannot here be distinguished) a desire from eternity; and that this desire is not that, which is ascribed peculiarly to the first attracting form thereof, whose proper sphere of activity was only the perpetual generation and multiplication in infinite, of the forms and powers of eternal nature, within its own circumference.

But this desire here now spoken of, which became a greater desire, by its being stirred by the eternal will, was stretching forth as it were beyond that sphere, for its object was to break forth into an exterior manifestation, and to bring forth living, intellectual, substantial, and self-subsisting creatures, wherein it might display and show forth, the infinite variety of its powers and wonders. And though this desire was kept under both on the side of the eternal will, by his absolute sovereignty, until he was pleased to move; and on the side of eternal nature also, by its submission and faithful obedience to its Lord and Master; yet nevertheless there was in its own internal ground a desire, and continued such a desire, till it became a greater, more living and vigorous, nay, a more exerted and efficacious desire, by its being moved and stirred in both fires. For thereby it was now raised up as a spark of fire that before was covered with ashes; it was commissioned thereby, and mightily empowered to break forth as to both fires, according to its desire, into an exterior, substantial manifestation.

Wherefore then it cannot but be manifest, that this greater desire is not that own self-desire, which beareth the number and mark of selfishness, but so distant therefrom as the south is from the north, or the day from the night. For when that is an untimely, monstrous birth, and even from the womb a professed enemy to the eternal will of God, this is surrounded for its defence, both from before and after, by the eternal will itself. Seeing that, from before it hath the foregoing moving of the eternal will, of which moving it is the proper intended effect and offspring; and after it, it hath its own immediately following effect and offspring also, which tended again to the praise and honour of the eternal will. For,

The third consequence, depending upon the former two, and especially upon the second, is now this, That the eternal ideas became substantial creatures, to the glory of their Creator. Here then is now the actual breaking forth of the two central fires, out of eternal nature into an exterior manifestation, to be considered; and that which is further said, v. 4. to have also broken forth along with them, viz. the hellish foundation of God's anger, is here as to its breaking forth, to be considered also.

For they are inseparably joined together, as in reality itself, (when the great wheel of eternal nature in its whole universality is considered, comprising all whatever laid therein and came forth thereout,) so also in these expressions of our author, wherefore then they must be joined also in our consideration.

Before, there was spoken only of two things, which were called two central fires, but now there cometh also forth a third, which laid indeed always implicitly under the former two, as their root and ground, but came not then explicitly into consideration.

For it is one and the same thing, whether there be named two central fires, or darkness, fire, and light. Only this is the difference, that now that former double, and then this latter threefold expression is more accommodate to such or such a state of things, that may be differently considered. As now these three make up the whole eternal nature, and are three such essential parts thereof, as body, soul, and spirit are of man; so they must also all three have broken forth into the creation of angels, if they should have been really children of the Living God, generated out of eternal nature, after the likeness of their Father. But not all three in the same sense, degree, and manner, but each in such a sense as it is able to bear, and each according to its own order and degree, wherein it stood from eternity, with respect to the other two; either deeper into the bottomless centre, or higher exalted in the conspicuous superficies.

As to the two central fires, it can now be plain enough, from what there was said thereof before, That their breaking forth was a most glorious, real and visible manifestation of fire and light, in a most intimate union, displayed in a numberless variety and multiplicity of illustrious shining fire-flames, which were so many living, intellectual, blessed, and holy-substantial creatures, all bearing the holy name of trinity and unity, both in and upon themselves, and all being the natural children of God, generated in eternal nature, after his own image and likeness, which is (in eternal nature) nothing else but fire and light.

But what shall we further say, as to the breaking forth of darkness, represented in such dreadful expressions, as the hellish foundation of God's anger? In what sense can this have broken forth also, and even along with fire and light? What communion between them can be so much as dreamed of?

Answer. Let there first be well taken notice of, and attentively remembered, that and how, darkness was from eternity, that it was not, and yet was; in what place or station it was, with respect to fire and light; in what condition it was, considered as in and to itself, and chiefly that it was good, no less than fire and light in its own kind, and rank, and order. Let but all this be well considered and understood, it must of itself appear, what this breaking forth of the darkness was, and that there must indeed be given another definition thereof, than that of the former breaking forth, but that nevertheless, all what our author saith thereof, is properly, well, and significantly expressed; and especially that this expression of breaking forth is justly used as well with respect to darkness, as with respect to fire and light.

If we should see a ladder of three steps, and consider it as a semi-diameter of a circle, and as breaking forth into a circular motion, we could not but say, that this same and single breaking forth is common unto all the three steps, and so properly applicable unto the lowest as unto the highest, but not unto every one promiscuously in the same wise, seeing that each of them must keep to its own place and order. The highest toucheth the outmost circumference, and there it breaketh forth into motion, making the greatest and most considerable circle of all. The middle is lower, and lesser, its breaking forth into motion is in its own inferior degree, and its circle cannot be of the same extent. But the lowest must still keep the centre, and can make no perceptible circle at all, when it doth nevertheless in that centre break forth at the same instant, into motion also, no less than the superior two, none of which can break forth alone; as also the two superior cannot by themselves alone, without assistance and concurrence of this third and lowest, if the whole ladder shall not be spoiled and broken into pieces.

Let now these three ladder steps be darkness, fire, and light, and let this circle be that universal wheel of eternity, so considered as it ought to be, viz. that only circumference thereof, and that which reacheth the circumference, to be visible and manifest, but its centre, and that which lieth therein, or is annexed thereunto, to be altogether invisible, secret, and unknown. And then this rude simile may easily show forth of itself its true application, so far as it hath in it any shadow of resemblance, for much more is not to be expected. For it is not an improper resemblance, and may at least declare us so much, that as really as there were brought forth many legions of living, substantial creatures in eternal nature, by its breaking forth into an exterior manifestation; so really also, and in the same degree of reality, all these holy angels must have had in themselves all the three essential parts of eternal nature, standing in every particular microcosm of eternity in the selfsame order, in which they stood in the macrocosm thereof, and in which order they were also all three harmoniously broken forth into motion, for to make up so many representatives of that greatest universal All in All.

And so therefore from this united and harmonized breaking forth, they must have had an eternal light, in the supremest, excellentest, most manifested circumferential place of their created being; where they had it also, and have it still (as many of them as there kept their habitation in the light), giving and being unto them, all their glory, beauty, delight, and happiness.

Further, they must have had also, an eternal fire in the middle place of their being, united to the light, and generating it, but standing lower and in an inferior degree of dignity; as they had and have it also, giving and being unto them, all their life, strength, power, and activity. Thirdly, they must have had also an eternal darkness in the lowest, most hidden, and central place of their being, united to the fire, and affording unto it its essences, but standing not with it in the same degree of nobility. And so they have it also, giving and being unto them the central foundation, and root of their fire and light, keeping these two in their order, and preserving them in their union and glory, as long as it is itself kept by them under, and affixed to the centre. [N.B.]

Like as the lowest ladder-step only by means of its being fixed to the centre, is the only cause of a regulated circular motion, which must become irregular and all disordered, as soon as this is turned aside from the centre, and will break forth to move in, or nearer to the superficies.

If then they had these three things in such an order, they had the darkness under their feet, according to what is said of their eternal Father himself, whose children they are, and whose likeness therefore they must bear, if they shall be his representatives. And if so, this darkness was not evil, not hell, and not anger or anger-fire, as long as under their feet; and nothing to this sense or purpose was ever said by Behmen.

He saith indeed here, The hellish foundation of God's anger broke forth, but how can there be spoken of these three things distinctly, in an earthly language, now after the fall, and by such creatures as do partake themselves of that lamentable fall, but by such distinct denominations as of necessity must be taken from what these things are now, unto creatures, in their disorder and divorce? He saith not, The hell broke forth, nor the anger-fire broke forth, for that would be saying, God was angry with his creatures, prepared hell for them, before he created them, and cast them thereinto in their creation. And from whence could hell and anger have broken forth into the creation, when there was neither this nor that in all the vast extent of eternity? If we believe there was nothing else before the creation, but God in fire and light, how or where, from whence or to what end could there have been hell and anger? Could that central fire of God the Almighty have been hell? And what could there have been angry with each other, seeing there was nothing else but himself alone in fire and light?

But this is the thing: there was in eternal Nature that, which after the fall, could have been nothing else but hell and anger-fire unto rebellious creatures. Not that it had been changed in itself; but because they manifested it in themselves in disorder.

And this broke forth in the creation; but in this breaking forth, it was but fire and light, or life and glory: and not hell and anger, no more than it is now unto those holy angels that kept their habitation in the light. And though it was darkness in and to itself, as to its own particular essentiality, yet it was not, and could also not have been manifested as darkness, seeing that it was kept under by fire and light, so that there could not appear what it was, and needs must be, when separated from fire and light. And therefore Behmen calleth it not positively hell, nor anger-fire itself, but only the hellish foundation of God's anger, or that which must of necessity have been hell itself, superstruced as it were, upon this dark foundation, as soon as it was raised up out of its bottomless pit.

And this, he saith, broke also forth along with fire and light: intimating significantly, that it broke not forth alone in its own strength and power, and so not in its own dark shape; that it broke not forth in disunion from fire and light, and so not with its own self-desire, which it was not permitted, as now shall follow. And that it broke not forth in the first place, but in its lowest order and degree, or as it were after them as an appendix.

And this hellish foundation, he saith further, God hath cast out from his working, and hath shut it up into darkness. How could he have plainer expressed, that this hellish foundation broke not forth into such a manifestation as fire and light?

Truly, if God hath cast it out, it could not have crept or broken in, and if God hath shut it up into darkness, then certainly it came not to be manifested in the light. And so this breaking forth as to the darkness, must have quite another sense, which we shall find out by and by.

But it will be asked and said, What is here meant by this casting out and shutting up in darkness? If there was not an evil thing in eternal Nature, intending to break forth unto destruction, why must it have been thus resisted by God, and cast forth from his working? If it was good and useful, why was it not permitted to stand in its lot? And if evil and hurtful, from whence had it its original? Or how could it have been said, that all was good in eternal nature before the fall?

Answer. There was said before, that eternal Nature had and was a desire, to bring forth its wonders in a more exterior manifestation. If now this was so, it was not so in this or that particular part thereof, but in the whole in general, and in each part thereof in particular. So that it must have been in the fire as well as in the light, and in the darkness as well as in them both. And if so, even reason itself may tell us, that if each of these three desired to be made manifest, none of them could desire to be made so, according to the nature and condition of the other, but each only according to that which was its own. Each could but desire to bring forth its own wonders. As the light could not desire to be darkness, so could it also not, to bring forth the wonders of darkness, and so vice versa.

But as each is confined to its own particular essentiality, whereby it must be what is, so this desire of each must also be naturally confined to its own proper essentiality, as being a proper consequence thereof, annexed thereunto inseparably, and wholly depending thereupon. So that it be inclined only to bring forth that which it hath in itself, as sufficient only for that, and further for nothing more.

As also each of these three desireth still, and is not only naturally inclined, willing, and ready to manifest its own secret wonders, but doth it also effectually, each in its own region, being now enabled to do so, by the fall of angels and men: and this both in the Two Principles of eternal nature, and in this Third also, as in their bipartite temporal outbirth.

All this desiring now, (considered as in eternal nature before the fall and creation, and as purely abstracted from all relation and reference unto creatures,) is good, and must be so, if eternal nature shall be what it is to be.

No own will, no self-desire may be found therein; which only then might be said, when we could imagine that the light desired to be fire, and the darkness to be light, or the fire either this or that. Nothing is here inordinate, and so nothing also hurtful, or noxious, but all is profitable and useful, because all in its order, and so also serviceable to the whole manifestation of the eternal Will. Nothing is here to be restrained, cast out, shut up, or pressed down, but each must stand in its lot, and each must have its share in that eternal first seven-fold and further infinite generation, which there was before the creation of angels. And as each must be what it is, so each must also be for that which it hath, in its own peculiar ground and bottom.

But now, as soon as there is spoken of this desiring with any respect to creatures, or to their creation, there is immediately made a digression from that pure, abstracted sense; and this goodness faileth more or less, growing weaker and weaker, and declining always gradually so much from its primeval purity, as much as the creature is considered in conjunction therewith.

If all these things that are in eternal nature, always and in every respect good, both unto God, and unto each other, and unto themselves, could be good in and unto creatures also, always and in every respect, wherein were the creature lesser or inferior than God? what prerogative could the Creator have above the creature? what distinction could there be between order and disorder? and what could it signify, that God is called a God of order? To say, This God of order could according to his omnipotence, have manifested all these three things, according to their threefold desire, in that order wherein they stood from eternity, and so this goodness must have continued, is true indeed, in that sense which before was spoken of, and as I think sufficiently declared, but it is false in this, which we now are speaking of. For even therein consisted their eternal order, that the light only was manifested, shining into the darkness, and that the darkness was unmanifest, comprehending not the light, and being nevertheless subservient to the generation of fire, out of which the light could shine and could manifest, in its own manifestation, all the powers both of darkness and fire, but not in their own dark fiery qualifications, but transmuted, according to its own soft, meek, and tender essentiality.

It is the first fundamental truth, That there was nothing evil in eternal nature. Like as also nothing (properly) good, because of this same reason, That it had not any evil in opposition against it, from which it could be distinguished by such a denomination of good. But since this opposition is made effectually in the fall, we have no expression nearer unto the truth than this, that we say, All that there was in eternal nature was good, not with opposition to any evil that then was, but to that which afterwards was manifested in the fall.

But nevertheless, there is also further a second fundamental truth, well consistent with, and immediately annexed thereunto, viz. There was that in eternal nature which must have been evil in and unto creatures, as soon as they manifested it in themselves; when it was good and profitable be- fore, in and to itself, and to them also, so long as it was unmanifest in them. And here we shall find that which must have been restrained, cast out from the working of God, and shut up in darkness. For therein laid all the danger, and the root of declining from good into evil, when it cannot nevertheless be attributed to the thing itself, considered as in that former abstracted sense, but only to this conjunction with the creature, in this latter relative sense.

But how, and what was this? It was that natural desire, inclination, and readiness to bring forth its own dark powers. And how could this have been evil and dangerous in the very creation, and yet have been good in eternity abstracted from the creation? If this be not apprehended, all the rest will for the greatest deal remain obscure, and therefore, being certainly much concerned therewith, I must make it as plain as I can.

(1.) In that pure abstracted sense from all creatures and creation, these three things in eternal nature were all three manifest and all three hid, in a different respect. All three were manifest, but each only in and to itself, and therefore all three must also have been hid, each with respect to the other two. When we then find this expression in Teutonicus, which he hath frequently, The darkness was manifested in itself from eternity, it is not inconsiderately to be passed by, for it hath its deep, true, significant and wide reaching sense, which I know not how to express nearer by other words, than by saying, As the darkness was in and to itself, when it was not, or nothing to the light, so it was also, and must have been manifest in and to itself, when it was not manifest in and to the light. For it was, and if it was, it was but that same which it was, and nothing else. And this being what it was, cannot but imply a manifestation of what it was, answerable to that sense wherein it was, and relating only to itself.

In that sense then wherein it was, and wherein it was manifest, it had also an inseparable desire of being manifest, or of continuing to be what it was. And this desire now was therein good, needful and profitable, not bringing in any evil or disorder. For it was not a desire reaching beyond its own sphere, or intending to destroy the light, by breaking forth out of its own limits into the light's region, but only to generate and bring forth its own dark powers, and so to preserve its own being in its own region. Which all must have been so, and continued so without alteration, for it was subservient to the light. If it had not been so, no fire could have been generated, having no essences but from its root, and so the light could not have shined out of the fire, and could have had nothing to shine into. For its essentiality is to shine into the darkness, and that of the darkness to comprehend not the light. But,

(2.) As soon as there is spoken of creatures and their creation, there is a digression made from this pure abstracted sense, and this desire can no more be so considered in a singleness, or by itself alone, but all three must now be considered as in conjunction, breaking forth and entering each from its own deeper particular sphere into one only compounded, lesser, lower, and weaker, for to make up all three together every particular angelical being. Wherein, or with respect to which, this desire of darkness cannot further be considered so single, pure, and close to itself, for it hath now an external object, which it can lay hold on, and make a pretension to, no less than fire and light, seeing it is no less than they a third essential part thereof.

And as by the moving of the eternal Will in both fires, the central fire especially introduced itself into a greater desire, so did also the light, and so no less the darkness, each in its order and place, and according to its condition. When, nevertheless, even in this greater desire also, there was no evil, nor any danger, as far as it can be conceived by itself alone, abstracted from the creature, for it had not, nay, could also not have changed itself, and no alteration was brought upon it from without: but only in its conjunction with this external object, there was an evil danger of disorder and confusion conceived as it were in the womb, not as an absolute necessity, but as a possibility of being brought forth into real existency. And so the former goodness, consistent with that pure abstracted sense, is now inconsistent, at least as to the same degree thereof, with this latter relative; not because of its being changed, but because of its now having ability and possibility, in this external object to be changed, by this dark desire's being stirred, raised up, and manifested beyond that sense wherein it was manifest before: which before could not have been done by itself without the creature, but could now by the creature, as it was also done soon thereafter, by some of them in their fall.

But could not this dark desire have been kept under or in order, in and by the creature, that so its goodness and profitableness had been continued without alteration? Certainly it could, for so it was also, and is yet still, with all those holy angels that kept their habitation in the light. For it could not have broken forth into manifestation of itself, neither could it have necessitated any creature to raise it up. Certainly no more than fire lying hid in a flint stone can break forth to consume houses if not brought forth by a living agent, and no more than it can necessitate or constrain any living to strike it out of steel and flint. But if now this is done by a living creature, and evil consequences come forth from this doing, who can be blamed as an author of evil?

So therefore, all and every evil hath its only original in the creature, and not in this dark desire, considered in itself without the creature; for in its conjunction with the creature the danger was conceived, and by the creature's own activity, the evil was effectually born. This desire of darkness implyeth as in and to itself nothing else but a bringing forth of its own powers, that is a preservation of its own being; and this is good, for it is consistent with order, and is according to its own natural and eternal right. But this same desire of darkness, as in conjunction with the creature, implyeth also further disorder, and destruction, rebellion and insurrection, against the light, and this is evil. If then that former can be separated from this latter, as it really can and did before there was any creature, there can be no evil, and none could have been in eternity, before the creation. But if this latter cannot be separated in the creature from that former, as it certainly cannot by any means, that former goodness faileth, when this desire is considered in conjunction with the creature, and faileth so, that the fault is on the side of the creature, and not on the side of this desire. [Let God be glorified, by demonstration and publication of the Truth.]

Which even in the creature itself, intendeth not properly and directly the destruction of the creature, but only its own manifestation and increase.

Nay what is much more, even now after the disordered manifestation of this dark desire, when it is really hell, darkness, torment, anguish, and anger-fire, we may still find some evident and most considerable footsteps of this distinction, declaring plainly, that all what there is or can be conceived of evil, lieth only on the side of the creature, and not on the side of that which came out of eternal nature to be manifested by the creature. For hell-darkness and anger-fire would immediately be good and only good, without any mixture of evil, and could bear no more such dreadful names, if but the own will of creatures, with respect to which they are and must be evil, could be taken away, abolished and annihilated. Which certainly as it is a sure and solid truth, so it is most worthy to be taken into deep consideration.

But I think it can now from hence be plain enough, what is here meant in our author, by the breaking forth of the hellish foundation of God's anger. And that there must be spoken thereof in different senses, which I see not how to represent better in their difference, but by saying, It broke forth, and broke not forth, and yet broke forth. For we may find in this fourth theosophical question, compared with the fourteenth question, such a threefold sense, as is according to this threefold expression, though we find not such a construction of words.

(1.) It broke forth, seeing that all the holy angels must have been made up, in their creation, by darkness, fire and light; according to the likeness of their Father in eternal nature. But it broke forth in its due order, for it was not made manifest, entering not into the supericies, or supremest visible circumference of the angelical beings, but kept below to the centre, as the lowest step of this eternal ladder.

And entered nevertheless into them, and into every one of them, to be the root and ground of their fire and light.

Which entering into them, was its breaking forth, from its own uncreated eternity, into a lower and exterior degree of many particular created beings.

(2.) It broke not forth, in that sense which implieth hell, or anger-fire, properly so called now after the manifestation thereof. For here it was cast out and shut up: which is not so grossly to be conceived, as if the darkness had had a rebellious will or desire, to be hell, and to break forth in flames of anger-fire, to destroy the light, and to disturb the whole creation of God; which rebellious will, as a raging, furious devil must have been resisted by force and violence, and bound with eternal chains of darkness.

For what a ridiculous nonsense would this be, and what strange monsters would not be generated therefrom?

Certainly not so much as the least shadow thereof may be found in all the writings of Teutonicus, if not ignorantly, or maliciously perverted.

The darkness had a will or desire indeed, or a natural internal propensity and inclination to enter into manifestation, and to bring forth in and by the creature its own powers and wonders; which was so natural unto it, as it is unto fire and light. And this was good and not evil, as far as it can be considered without conjunction with the creature; for it implieth no rebellion against the light, no disorder, or destruction of anything in eternal nature, but only its own generation, manifestation, and preservation of its own being. Which must be preserved in its own state and condition, and is, by the concurrence of fire and light themselves, preserved in eternal nature.

But it was not good in this conjunction with the creature, for there it implieth, and carryeth along with it, of all necessity, an undoing of the light in the creature, and so the creature's destruction, and insurrection against the eternal will of their Creator, who would not have had them creatures of darkness, but of light.

Here then in the creation of these creatures, this will and desire of darkness, was not made use of by the Creator, in such a sense as he made use of that desire of light, but he cast it out. From whence? From his working saith our author, not absolutely from the creature, for darkness must have been the third essential part thereof, hid in its inmost deepest centre, but from his working he cast it out. What is this else, but to say, He opened not the dark bottomless pit, but shut it up in its own abyssal centre, he brought forth no hellish wonders, and created no devils, but all holy angels of light, being all bright and glorious shining flames of fire, and having the darkness, together with all its dark will, desire and inclination under their feet.

So therefore this hellish foundation of God's anger broke not forth, and could also not have broke forth in the creation of angels; but afterwards it did in their fall, when this desire of darkness was stirred, raised up, assisted mightily, and brought forth effectually by their own activity, working in the dark and false magia of their own will. But nevertheless again,

And what is now this breaking forth else or more, but a nearer advancing, not from not being unto being, but from a state of pure absolute impossibility of coming ever into being, to a state of possibility, or if it might be said so, to a good hope for being. For before the creation, there was an eternal impossibility that darkness ever should have been manifested, beyond that sense and degree wherein it was and must have been manifested in and to itself;

Seeing that not only, it could not have manifested itself any further, but also, that it could not have desired, or not have been inclined to do so, because there was nothing which it could have been manifested in or unto. But now there were so many millions of exterior living objects, all capable of receiving its manifestation into their own ground, wherein it laid unmanifest, and all also able themselves to bring it forth into manifestation, both within and without themselves.

There was then now a possibility, and a door as it were was opened in the creation, through which it could creep in, and come into manifestation; not indeed by its own sufficiency, but by the creature's assistance, and concurrence, if these might be so curious and desirous as to unlock its secret pit, and so to enter into a manifest conjunction with it. Which that they could by their own will and desire, experience hath shown us in the fall of angels, and can still daily show in our own actual transgressions, that these two desires, of darkness and of living creatures, can enter into, unite and mingle with each other, more easily than black can unite and mingle with black.

And here that greater desire, whereinto eternal nature, after its being stirred up in both fires, introduced itself, may be found with respect to darkness. For when this had before, according to its eternal right, a desire to be manifest, and to continue so, in that sense wherein it was so in and to itself; it got now a greater desire, to be manifest in the creation also. Which greater desire was cast out by the Creator; not because of its having been evil in itself abstracted from the creature, but because of its being inconsistent in the creatures with that state, wherein he would have had for his own praise and glory, and their own happiness.

And this, saith Teutonicus now further, v. 5, was the ground and cause of Lucifer's fall.

But if we would imagine such a cause as whereby he were made excusable in the least, we should be quite out of the way. It drew and tempted him indeed, but in him only, and not without him. So that it was but his own lust that tempted him; and tempted he must have been as well as Adam, and as all the rest of holy angels. It drew and tempted them all, but it necessitated none, and could also not, or else they must all have fallen, no less than Lucifer with his legions. But as the greater part stood unmoveable in the truth and light, so could he also have stood and kept his own lust under foot.

And then this darkness would with all its drawings so little have darkened him, as his fire could have burned him, or could have consumed his shining light.

Of man saith the scripture, Thy perdition is from thyself; notwithstanding that man had in his temptation this same, living, strong and mighty prince of darkness against him. For it was but his own lust which he could have been sensible of, and this therefore was properly that which tempted him; had he prevailed against this, all what there was without him, should not have hurt him.

And if it was so with man, how much the more is Lucifer's perdition from himself, who had not such a living, strong, and cunning adversary against him from without, as he was afterwards himself unto man. He abode not in the truth, and he kept not his habitation in the light, saith the Scripture, and maketh so himself only, and nothing without him the cause or causer of his destruction.

I shall now but try, whether I could illustrate a little more all this matter, as to its chiefest particulars, by a convenient similitude, obvious unto reason and senses.

From the creation of this world all that there ever since was manifested therein, both good and evil, laid hid and secret in the manifold powers and energies of temporal nature. And so, that all things successively and gradually, each in its appointed time, should be brought forth into manifestation. Of so many others let us consider only that evil, noxious and destroying invention of gunpowder, certainly not flown forth from the properties of light and love, but out of darkness, from this hellish foundation of God's anger; seeing it is notoriously made up of the three first properties of darkness, and only by the concurrence of the fourth it is enabled to show forth its stupendous effects.

As really now as this laid in the powers of temporal nature from its very beginning, so really also this nature had a desire to bring it forth into manifestation. As it hath still such a desire for all what may yet be behind, and shall have it unto the end of time. All the powers, properties, and energies of stars and elements, and all what there is set at work, or hath a share in the government of this principle, from the supremest officer down to the lowest, is capable of this desire, each in its order, and degree, and according to its ability. But especially the spirit of this world (according to the plain expressions of Jacob Behmen) is created with a natural inclination, to bring forth into manifestation, all what there lieth hid in the secret recesses of his kingdom. For therein his government and the execution of his office consisteth; he being ordained to manifest both good and evil in this his mixed third principle, wherein yet all is good, if considered as in and to itself.

This desire then in the spirit of this world, with reference especially to the manifestation of gunpowder, was absolutely good in him, (in such a goodness as this principle can be capable of) as far as it can be considered only in itself, and purely abstracted from men. For though we may say of the devil, yet we cannot of the spirit of this world, that he desired or intended so many thousands of living men and beasts should be killed and destroyed thereby; but his desire implieth nothing else, but that a faithful execution of his office might be made by manifestation of those powers and wonders, which he was ordained to manifest. But as soon as it is considered in conjunction with man, this goodness faileth immediately, not that it had been changed in itself, but because it is inconsistent in its manifestation with the condition of sinful man.

This manifestation with its effects could not have broken forth of itself, or by own sufficiency of this desire, though it had been never so strong, and notwithstanding that all the materials requisite thereto, were in their being; but it wanted a living agent, or such an intellectual instrument as could be able and fit to make a proportionable mixture and composition thereof, and to prepare what there was more required for its pernicious use. And this could have been no other but man. Beasts were not able, and the devils also not, because of there being cast out from this principle, so as to have no power therein at all.

It could therefore not have broken forth before the creation of man; there it was in a state of absolute impossibility. But in his creation we may say, it advanced nearer, or made as it were the first step of advancing from a state of impossibility to possibility, for that external living agent, whom this desire could come into conjunction with, was now in being. But in his fall the conjunction between them was actually made; and in this conjunction all evil that ever arose therefrom, was actually conceived in the womb.

What here might be objected, That thus it seems a necessity is laid upon man, by which he was constrained to fall; for that else the spirit of this world could not have manifested its wonders and secret powers, and that so his being created with a natural inclination thereto, must have been in vain, is of no consideration at all. Man was free, and not necessitated to join in his imagination with the spirit of this world, and if he had kept him under, he should himself nevertheless have manifested his wonders, quite in another and much more glorious way; not as a foolish captive and servant, but as a wise ruler and master thereof. But now in his fall, or joining with him, a wide gate was opened, through which this hellish invention could get a ready entrance into this world, after such a pernicious way as it is still therein unto this day.

But nevertheless it was still unknown to mankind for several thousand years, during all which time it could not have been called evil, if purely considered in and to itself, as it is a wonder of the powers of nature. And, which is the chiefest thing, and the conclusion of all, when it broke forth at length, after such a long period of ages into an actual manifestation, it carried no killing and destroying evil along with itself, of an absolute constraining necessity, but all that evil laid there already before in man himself. For it could not have forced any body to kill his fellow-creature thereby, though it may have occasioned and tempted many, who yet all were free, so that they could have left it alone: and if they all had kept under foot their own evil lusts of hatred, envy, anger, pride, and covetousness (which properly was that which tempted them), it would have done no more hurt in the world, than it did before it was in being.

But this is enough. What further might be said and applied conveniently to our purpose, can easily represent itself, if duly considered and compared.

I shall now say something in short, concerning, Sir, your second Question, which was this,

What is the true notion of own self-desire as it relates to fire and forms, and such like things of themselves inanimate; will and desire, in propriety of speech belonging only to intellectual and rational beings?

Answer. Several things are here expressed, which first a little distinctly must be taken notice of, before a direct answer can be given to this question. But, though there many things properly belonging and subservient thereunto, come into my mind, yet I shall for brevity's sake set down only some of them in the following positions:

I.—It is not the right way for truth and wisdom to make or settle outward notions, and to fix our mind upon spoken or written words; but the only way is, according to the direction of the Scripture (repeated and insisted upon most earnestly by Teutonicus), to ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not.

II.—If this is given by God, and is obtained in the soul internally, it is authorized by its giver to regulate the propriety of outward speech, by which itself cannot be regulated reciprocally. For,

III.—It is unquestionably true, that our propriety of outward speech must be subject to a propriety of inward sense; seeing that upon this only, it must depend, and that it ought not to aspire to any higher dignity, but to be a faithful interpreter thereof.

IV.—It is no less true, that all what we can call a good, nay the very best propriety of speech, is but earthly, imperfect, impotent, shadowy (in comparison to inward light and substance), full of confusion (because our Jerusalem speech is lost, and this but born in Babel), and always subject to be taken differently, according to the different constitutions of hearers or readers, none of whom can take any outward expression nearer unto truth, than himself standeth therein.

V.—Many things are said in a good propriety of speech (according to our sense and apprehension), even in the Scripture itself, condescending to our capacity, which yet are all improper, and if regulated by that outward propriety of speech, utterly false; when they are really true in their own internal propriety, which if it should or could be exactly represented, should be all inconsistent with the propriety of earthly speeches. Instances would make a prolixity. This only, concerning the deliberation or consultation of God, and his decrees, following thereupon, could evidence it sufficiently.

VI.—It must justly be asked, By what ground, or in what sense, the Seven spirits of God before his throne, can be placed in the number of things inanimate? or what the true notion is of being inanimate? Seeing that the prophet Ezekiel testifieth of these four which he saw as a four-fold wheel full of eyes, they had a living Spirit within them; and seeing further that they are the original of so many thousand animate beings. For that they are called seven wheels, and seven burning lamps, and that neither wheel nor lamp upon earth is animate, can signify nothing at all.

Truly our author had found a true propriety of internal real sense, which cannot be outdone by any propriety of earthly speech.

VII.—He that made the eye, should he not see? and should he not hear that prepared the ear? saith the Scripture of God, who nevertheless hath neither eyes nor ears; when yet he hath them both far above all propriety of earthly speech, in such a true propriety of inward sense as is consistent with eternity, and with his transcendent being.

And as this is said of God, so it may be said also in its lower, subordinate sense of eternal Nature.

VIII.—All the forms thereof see, hear, feel, smell, and taste each other, truly, really, and properly, in such a truth, reality, and propriety as is consistent with their eternity, though not with the capacity of sinful man; who lost his intellectual eye, and all internal senses, and is but able to look into time, and this moreover but so, that there justly might be doubted, whether he more properly should be called blind or seeing.

IX.—How these five senses are appropriable to the forms of eternal nature? or how they see and feel each other, is asked in vain, and should be declared in vain, though it were by an angel from heaven, if we are not ourselves acquainted inwardly with the movings and operations of eternal nature, in its restored harmonious union. All what our author saith thereof, [N.B.] is not to declare it to any other so as that it should be understood from his outward words, by bringing them into regular notions, but only to stir up every one that complaineth of unintelligibility, to seek and ask the understanding of God, where he may certainly find it, according to his appointed measure, like as he found it, who before was so ignorant thereof as any other can be upon all the earth. For,

X.—So impossible as it is to be understood, if we are not acquainted with the operations of eternal nature within ourselves, so possible and easy is it, if we are; for then it declareth itself most sensibly, and wanteth no declaration from without. It is seen and felt in the mind of man, as a living word of God is spoken, heard, and understood without any outward sound, and without means of any language.

XI.—If then these things be so, will and desire cannot be so strange to the seven forms of eternal Nature as they might seem, if we would think, that the propriety of earthly speech, which we are used to, is a good and proper norma for these eternal, immeasurable things to be regulated by.

XII.—A little new-born child, Whether it hath will and desire, and especially own will, and self-desire? might here justly be asked. I am sure enough, directly and positively it can neither be affirmed nor denied, but a harmonious mixture and union must be made of Yea and No. If we should consider this a little deeper, much would be found therein, convenient to this present matter, concerning the Seven forms of eternal nature.

XIII.—Each of them, considered as by itself alone (though none can be alone), hath its own will and desire.

And this (1.) is its own immutable essentiality. (2.) It lieth in its own immutable essentiality. These two cannot in eternal nature be distinguished from each other, they are one and the same thing, but from the effects and consequences we find the distinction after the fall in creatures. It is rightly said (1.) that it is its own immutable essentiality; for it is that, whereby it is, and continueth to be what it is, and cannot be any other thing or property; and can also have no inclination, no possibility, nor any kind of ability, to be, or to become any other thing, but what it is. And so it is not an acting, stirring, or working activity, as we conceive in the notions of will and desire, for there is no occasion for it. It is quietly what it is, and need not be busied with a moving will, or desire to be, or to maintain its being; for there is no opposition, which it could or must resist by exerting any act of will or desire.

It standeth (notwithstanding that it hath really its own particular essentiality for itself) in the nearest union with all the others, making up with them, one only harmonized substance. But seeing further, that this same afterwards in fallen creatures, is own will and self desire, with respect to these seven dis-harmonized properties, when scattered and brought in opposition against each other in creatures; it is also rightly said (2.) that will and desire laid in the immutable essentiality of each of these seven forms: for it ariseth only from thence, and sheweth forth itself immediately. Each is departing from union, and withdrawing into that which is its own; each is contrary to all the other, and hath now a natural strong desire, (inclination or propensity is not here enough,) or a fixed, obstinate will, to stand by itself, upon its own bottom; to exclude all the other, to prevail against all and every one; and only to preserve and maintain its own particular being. Which could not be so, if in the first harmonized original (when they all seven were united into one only substance, and ruled by one only will, of light and love), each of them had not its own particular, immutable essentiality.

So then there was no own will, nor any own self-desire in eternity, before the fall of angels; nothing the like was ever said by Teutonicus, who declareth expressly, in more than fifty places, not only that it had its original in the fall, but also, that it could not have been in eternity before the fall. But that must have been therein, which, when introduced into an exterior manifestation, and so communicated unto creatures, could, in and by them have been stirred and raised up in discord and opposition. And this was that seven-fold, particular, immutable essentiality of the Seven eternal Properties, whereby each of them, must have been only that which it was. For the one could not have been the sixth, nor the second the fifth, etc. But they altogether could have given up their will and total being into the whole; all loving, desiring and embracing each other, in union and harmony, and so making up one only will and substance.

But when they were now stirred up in the deepest central root by Lucifer and his angels, this union and submission to the will of light and love, was broken and disturbed; each recalled as it were that which was its own unto itself, acted according to what it was able in its own essentiality, and showed forth what it was, when departed from union.

And so there must arise seven particular, not only different, but also contrary wills and desires, which the Revelation of St. John representeth by the emblem of seven heads of the dragon, by seven mountains, and seven heads of the scarlet-coloured beast, whereupon the whore sitteth, etc.

The following paper contains a representation of "The GROWING of VEGETABLES, with RESPECT to their YEARLY RENEWING in the Spring-time, as described by BEHMEN:"—

I.—Heaven and earth make up but one principle and are the two chief constituent parts thereof, to be compared in a sense unto male and female: so that the concurrence of them both is necessarily required, for the generation of all sorts and kinds of earthly things.

II.—The properties of Nature therefore in the earth, which on the third day of the creation, when they were in conjunction with the eternal Word moving them especially, could produce, with out concurrence of the sun, all sorts and kinds of vegetables, can now do the same no more. But, because of their being after the fall and curse, half dead and impotent, they want now the sun's heat and light, for to be thereby raised up, stirred and enlivened.

III.—All the Seven chief Properties of nature, together with their lesser subordinate qualities, are in every seed, but in various degrees and orders; so that some of them lay more or less deeply hidden therein, and others are more or less outward and nearer to activity, according to the different kinds thereof.

But all are without a manifest distinction, as if they were all but one and the same thing: wherefore then they must also be without qualifying or exerting their several distinct faculties, till the seed be thrown into the ground.

IV.—All the same properties are in the earth also, but in several degrees and orders, variously different, according to the different constitutions of places; and in the earth no less than in the seed, they are impotent, shut up into death, and overpowered by its cold astringency. Because then the earth hath its own centre precipitated down from the sun, nay set as it were in opposition over against it, so that it must be more passive than active, its properties could never be able to raise up any qualification in the seed, unless they were first raised up themselves, by the influence of heat and light from the sun.

V.—When this begins to be done, and goes then further on gradually, the Properties begin to be stirred, and are enabled gradually to operate, each of them according to its own nature; for the heat, which is the next degree to the light, is unfolded and raised successively more and more out of the cold astringency.

And so therefore an agreeable conjunction or union is made between the properties of the earth and those of the seed, which latter are taken in, and supported and strengthened by the former. Provided,

VI.—That the properties of that peculiar ground or place wherein the seed is sown, be not in their constitution too much contrary, but agreeing more or less with the properties of the seed in their condition and order, or kind. For else the grain or seed is taken in indeed by the earth, but not so the properties of that seed by the properties of the earth. Seeing that there can be no conjunction, or at least no agreeable living union between them. And from hence therefore ariseth a slow and weak vegetation, or also sterility, and a total corruption of the seed. This Behmen illustrates by a similitude taken from a mother's entire kindness and affection to her own natural son, and the same mother's lesser tenderness, or total carelessness towards a step-son.

VII.—These two then in conjunction, viz. the natural contrariety and strife of the three first properties, in the earth and seed; and (2.) the sun's influencing power, not only raising up that strife by its heat, but also gradually reconciling it in its light, are the cause of all and every vegetation.

And this in an harmonious answerableness to the two eternal principles. For like as Eternal Nature tendeth always forwards in and by the war and strife of the three first dark properties, to their transmutation into peace and light and glory, which it obtaineth in the second principle of light and love; so doth also Temporal Nature tend or press always forward, to its perfection in its kind, or to a transmutation of its inferior striving properties, to be made in and by the light or tincture of outward nature, which is hid in everything, and is fully obtained in the full maturity of every fruit.

VIII.—This conjunction between these two is always broken in the winter, by the then predominant astringent cold. But as soon as the properties of the earth can have the heat stirred and raised in them again, this conjunction is renewed, and their strife begins afresh. And so from hence it is, that in every tree yearly new twigs and branches are produced; and from every root or seed, a new vegetation springeth up, which is thus more particularly described by Behmen.

IX.—The sun's heat warmeth and stirreth the quality of water, or the water spirit, and so also the material water or sap, both in the earth and in the seed. And then the light of nature, in and with that sweet water spirit springeth up; which maketh all the other properties moving and stirring also. For there is now a mutual affecting, touching, penetrating, and working of the properties in one another, when nevertheless each of them keeps constantly to its own natural inclination, and cannot therefore but act accordingly.

X.—All the other qualities, besides the sweet water and light being in themselves but dark, harsh, cold, rough, astringent bitter, dry, etc. are thereby naturally made sensible of this light and water's being their end and aim, or their only desirable treasure, refreshing, softening, tincturing, and reconciling them. Wherefore then in this their sensibility or natural tendency, pressing towards perfection, the vegetation is now carried on by their own natural strife and contrariety. For the seed is now impregnated with a new life according to its kind.—[NOTE.—By sensibility here is meant a natural tendency or propensity towards that which is, and brings them to their perfection, and may rationally be conceived to stand in such proportion or analogy with respect to sensibility, as the proportion is between the knowledge and reason of man, and that which more or less is answering thereunto in beasts.]

XI.—This new life, being still surrounded with death, and encompassed with a gross, hard, unprofitable husk, shell, etc. cannot spring up beyond it, and so not manifest or exert itself, but by breaking through that dead inclosure, putting off the same, and leaving it behind in and to the earth. And here that death lieth, so much spoken of by Behmen, and applied to the regeneration, according to the words of Christ, The grain of wheat cannot bring forth fruit, except it fall into the ground and die.

XII.—In this mutual affecting and touching of all the qualities, the sweet water-spirit tasting, as it were, the bitter and harsh qualities, it naturally stretcheth forth itself, flying or retiring from them as much as it can, which Behmen illustrates by a similitude of a man tasting an astringent bitter gall, who naturally caggs at it, and wideneth his palate, showing thereby a natural antipathy against astringency and bitterness.—[NOTE.—This word tasting is such an expression as that former of sensibility; and may, together with what now followeth, be illustrated, by what we see several such liquors as are of contrary or disagreeing qualities do, when mixed together.]

XIII.—But this sweet quality with its water and sap, thus flying and retiring in its antipathy, from the bitter and astringent, makes them but more eager to follow after it, and causeth the astringent spirit especially, to press more earnestly upon it: which causing is nothing else, but a more lively stirring and raising up its internal property, desiring to be by that sweet water refreshed, to satisfy its own natural dryness, and to have also such fit subject before it, as may be capable of its operation.

XIV.—This operation is, according to the natural inseparable constitution of this astringent quality, a continual attracting, coagulating and (in conjunction with the heat) a drying and thickening the water or sap. Whereby this cometh to have such or such a visible colour, and palpable figured body according to the kind of the first seed.

XV.—This flying and pursuing after going on thus continually, until the water is all consumed, and the sweet quality is made all impotent, so that it can at length retire no further, is the true growing or vegetation in this four elementary world; wherein it cannot be done but so successively, gradually, and by little and little. For.

XVI.—This sweet quality with its water kindled more and more from above by the sun's heat, and pressed upon from beneath by the bitter and harsh qualities, cannot but fly and retire in its natural antipathy more and more, not only first springing up above the ground, and not only stretching forth itself on every side as in a circumference, but also pressing directly forwards, or rather upwards to the sun, for to escape as it were, their violence. But being always further and further pursued by the other contrary, and especially by the astringent quality, it cannot but be successively more and more coagulated and compacted: and so therefore successively a long and round stock or stalk growth up.

XVII.—The stalk is always thicker below on the bottom, and thinner or smaller above in the height, decreasing in its quantity by little and little. And this is from the sweet water-spirit's having first its full strength, but losing it successively more and more; till at length it grows so weak and impotent, that it cannot retire any higher, but must submit, and be as it were captivated by the other properties.

XVIII.—The different colours and the alterations of them, made severally in one and the same vegetation, wherein we may see that first below the herb or plant appears whitish, and is then changed into green, brown, yellowish, etc. are from the various predominancies of the different qualities, in the outmost surface of the stalk, affected by the sun's heat and light.

XIX.—The branches, leaves, knots, etc. have all their original from that continual strife between the contrary qualities, which is sometimes carried on more regularly and gently, and sometimes as in a storm or violence: which latter especially is a cause of the knots, and must be supposed wherever we see a knot, that there hath been such a vehement assault made upon the sweet water, that it was like as if at its period, but that it had strength to escape and get through again. [In the Signatura Rerum, Behmen declareth this figuration of the knots, etc. much deeper, and more reflecting upon the generation of eternal nature, saying for instance, Each of the properties pursue the sweet water : Mars raveth and rageth, Mercury is terrified at it ; and Saturn, by his strong impression, maketh this terror or crack (which is salnitral, according to the third property of nature,) corporeal ; and thus the knots come to be. In this terror, Mercury goeth on a side, and taketh Venus along with him ; which causeth a spreading forth of twigs and branches, etc.]

XX.—When the water is so far spent and dried up, or coagulated and compacted by the sun's heat from without, and the first astringent property within, and consequently the sweet quality hath so much lost its strength as that it can no more press forward to preserve itself, it is necessitated to yield to the contrary qualities. Which it doth by spreading out the little residue of its sweet watery essence, as in a round court or ball, and admitting all the other qualities therein. And this now is the generation of a round bud or head, which the astringent spirit compacteth, and wherein all the rest do further act their parts, each of them according to its own natural drift, until another grain or seed be therein produced in a perfect answerableness to that first, out of which this growth came forth.

XXI.—In this bud, the sweet quality with its water may now be compared in a sense to a pregnant woman, which having conceived a seed (the other crude qualities) into her womb, must now further herself bring it to maturity, and labour for an opening and bringing forth thereof, for this sweet water must bring forth from hence the proper natural children of all the other properties.

XXII.—These children are the various leaves of the flowers and blossoms, of so various, and sometimes also mixed colours. All which are no more (like as the green leaves were on the stock below) of the water quality's nature and condition, but according to that of all the other qualities, and their manifold combinations, etc.

For the sweet water now impregnated with all these qualities, cannot bring forth children according to its own, but needs bring them forth according to the constitution of that seed, which it is impregnated with.

XXIII.—When these red, white, yellow, blue, etc. children are brought forth, the sweet mother thereof groweth all faint and weary, and is not able to nourish them very long. For they are not only very tender as to themselves, but also, with respect to this mother, are upon a certain good account, only as it were her step-children. Because not generated freely, nor from, nor according to her own natural quality, but according to the others, and as by constraint, when the sweet quality was decayed, and all the others had overpowered and captivated her.

XXIV.—When therefore the sun's heat from without presseth upon these tender flowers and blossoms, all the qualities in them are stirred up and enlivened. For the spirit of life, even that true vegetable life, which is in every vegetation, according to its kind, is now exalted in them to the highest degree. Seeing then that these tender flowers are for this strong spirit, too weak and cannot bear it, they must surrender their various noble virtues, which they send forth from them, in a lively pleasant smell or perfume ; but they themselves must soon after fall away and wither. And so now from hence the vegetation decreaseth, and turneth back or downwards, in a good and true sense and respect, though in another it goeth still forwards, to the maturity of the seed or fruit.

XXV.—For in this flourishing and blossoming of the vegetables, (even of thorns and thistles also,) a conjunction is made manifest more or less between time and eternity, or earth and paradise. And eternity as it were beholds, or represents itself in time, by a visible image, partaking more or less both of the one and other. For in this smell especially, something of a paradisaical property is opened : the meaning of which is not this, that the smell itself, forasmuch as it can be perceived by the earthly sense, or nose, were purely paradisaical, for it is according to the condition of this third principle, but only that something of a paradisaical property doth lie and open itself therein more or less, according to the different kinds of vegetables.

XXVI.—This paradisaical property sheweth forth also its own signature, by the manifold beautiful colours ; when the temporal earthly property expresseth its character, by the subtle green leaves, surrounding the blossoms and flowers.

For the various colours are according to the various dispositions of all the other qualities, besides that of the sweet water, and are rightly also called their colours ; yet they are not absolutely their own, so that they could produce them without a concurrence of the hidden inward world. But there is in this blossoming a transmutation (of the sulphur and its sal, says Behmen, wherein all the qualities are understood) into paradise, or into a paradisaical property and joy.—[NOTE.—This is such an expression again, as we had several the like above, and it is used by Behmen frequently, upon various occasions and different matters. In that sense, wherein the harsh, dark and bitter qualities can be conceived to be naturally desirous after their perfection, reconciliation, rest and satisfaction, they may be said also to be rejoiced, that is content, satisfied and acquiescing, when they have obtained it. Moreover, a real and proper joy, delight and pleasure is caused and raised in man, when he beholds the wonderful workmanship of God in Nature, more especially when he understands how a paradisaical property is manifest therein.]

XXVII.—In this conjunction now between time and eternity, or earth and paradise, that highest degree consisteth, which the spirit of life in all the vegetables, but in each according to its kind and capacity, is or can be exalted into ; and which degree can now further not rise any higher. For though even afterwards also, in the full maturity of the fruits, something the like is opened again, and manifested after such a manner, in the pleasant smell and taste of the fruits ; yet this which is here done in the blossoming, is the principal thing, with respect to the inward hidden world ; though that other may be called the principal thing also, but only with respect to this outward four elementary world, and the chief benefit, which is brought forth thereby, unto creatures. From hence therefore the vegetation turns, as it were back or downwards, unto earthliness. For,

XXVIII.—Seeing that the kingdom of this outward world is but temporal, having its own dominion, or government, as a principle by itself, and lying moreover under the curse and vanity, this paradisaical property with its image, character, and signature, cannot make a very long stay therein, but withdraws soon into its own centre. And this third principle according to its own natural right or privilege given unto it on the third day of the creation, and confirmed immediately after the deluge, is only for such a grain or seed to be brought forth from the blossom, as may be perfectly according to the sort and kind of the first, and may have in it the same quality and capacity of bringing forth and multiplying again after the same manner.

And thus the Circle of Vegetation is ended or concluded, by the end's returning into its own beginning. [As Time or Temporal Nature herself shall terminate, p. 5, 6.]

[If space would allow, we might now go on to present further illustrations of the workings of the seven properties of nature in this temporal outbirth, but the present may suffice for our purpose, of displaying the divine science of Behmen, and Freher, and its substantial concentration in Law.]

The following curious and interesting Paper, as consonant with the tenor and spirit of this whole Treatise, has been likewise selected for insertion with the preceding extracts. It is entitled "The PROCESS in the PHILOSOPHICAL WORK, considered as thoroughly ANALOGICAL with that in MAN'S REDEMPTION through JESUS CHRIST; and REPRESENTED by POSITIONS given thereof, as to its PRINCIPAL POINTS in BEHMEN'S SIGNATURA RERUM, chapters vii, x, xi, xii:"—

I.—Adam's primeval state in paradise, and the manner of his spoiling himself, his whole created being, by his lustful imagination after the knowledge of good and evil, is rightly by this author, not only spoken of in the first beginning of his description, but also frequently repeated and variously expressed throughout his whole discourse. For if man understandeth not his own corrupted nature, and that curse which he himself lieth under, how can he be imagined to be able for an understanding of the nature and curse of the earth? Or upon what ground can he presume to deliver such a particular thing from that curse; or to be instrumental in this deliverance? which is the true artist's only business.

II.—As long as Adam stood in a pure paradisaical innocency, the eternal Word and power of life, (called by Behmen the heavenly mercury,) was his leader, and had predominance in him. His life, which was a clear flaming fire, burned in and was nourished by that pure spiritual oil of the Divine substantiality; which, together with the holy water of eternal life, is generated in the angelical world; and this, therefore, could not but give forth a glorious bright shining light.

III.—Through the power of his imagination, or lust after the knowledge of good and evil, that which then was still kept under in him, and so was hidden from him, viz. the outward watery property, came to be manifest in his holy oil, and got predominance therein. This oil therefore, now overpowered thereby, could no more be such an agreeable food, and well-doing to his fire, as it could and did before. And so his fire not only lost its shining light, but came also to be spoiled itself, for it was obscured, and made all impotent. And his mercury, which before in his holy oil, had caused and raised up paradisaical joy and triumph, according to his moving and stirring property, was now made a stinging anguishing poison, according to his own natural constitution, which he doth and must stand in, when before or without the light.

IV.—Nothing of the Divine substantiality was hereby spoiled, poisoned, or turned into evil: though sometimes this or that expression, which must be made use of with respect to man, may seem in outward appearance, to say something the like. For that which was in man of the Divine substantiality, faded, disappeared, or died indeed, but only with respect to man; seeing that this disappearing, was but an entering again into its own secret original, and so but a returning unto God the giver thereof.

When contrariwise the creatural mercury, that is, man's own life, went forth with its will, desire and lust, out of eternity into time; so that the former union was broken, and upon this breach, its own natural property and propriety could not but be made manifest immediately: and because of this manifestation, which never should have been made, according to the will of God, it is now rightly called, spoiled, poisoned, and turned into evil; when yet all this doth not reach the Divine substantiality, nor the holy life of God, but only that of man.

V.—This is the substance of what Behmen largely declareth concerning man's paradisaical state, and falling away from it under the curse. Where he brings in also for a clearer illustration hereof, not only the fall of Lucifer, saying of him, that his desire was to try the fiery mercury, like as man desired to try the watery; but also the serpent with its poison, saying, that in the strongest and most poisonous mercury, the highest tincture lieth, yet not in its own natural property, etc.: all which he represents as a most proper, and pertinent introduction to this discourse of the philosophical work.

VI.—Immediately after the fall of man, God said unto the serpent, I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: her seed shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel. And herein the philosopher's stone or tincture lieth implicitly. For though this primarily concerneth man, yet secondarily it concerneth the whole creation also; and this bruising of the serpent's head is done both spiritually and corporeally, and both in time and in eternity, and though in different degrees, yet in a parallel process or method, both here and there.

VII.—The serpent's sting points at the wrath-fire, and the woman's seed at the light and love-fire. These two are in every thing; and in the curse that former came to be predominant in outward nature. This latter now must be raised up again, and, by its shining through the wrath, it must subdue and keep it under, and take away from it its predominant power, so that it may keep and exercise only its true natural office, as a servant in and to the light. And that these two may no more stand in contrariety and opposition to each other, but be one only thing, reharmonized by light and love, and re-introduced into paradise. And when now thus the dark poisoned mercury is tinctured, his anguishing death is turned into triumphing life and joy, and his former dark desire into a new light and love desire; which of itself is now able to make in itself a pure love and light substantiality, viz. a heavenly body out of an earthly.

VIII.—The whole work consists summarily therein, that two things must be reduced back into one, even into such a one as they were from the beginning before they came to be two; a heavenly thing and an earthly one are to be joined. That former must be admitted or received into itself by this latter, and must change it into its own heavenly quality. Earth must be turned in, and heaven out, etc. Which the mercury, that is therein, doth all himself; the artist is not to do it, neither can he do it: he is only to join together those ingredients that are requisite, and to leave the work to be done by that workman which is therein already.

Yet nevertheless Understanding and Faith is in him required; and by this latter especially he is to co-operate, if his design shall take effect. For his design is nothing less than to fetch out a body from the curse, and to raise it up from the dead; which never can be done by him, that is still dead himself,* both in his understanding, and as to his internal life.

* The following letter from the chief subject of the present treatise, and of the proposed biography,

IX.—With all this, the process in the regeneration of man runs parallel exactly. Consider only with thyself the heavenly humanity of the regenerator, and the earthly of poor fallen man, that is to be regenerated: consider, that the former must be received or taken in by the latter, and that this must suffer itself to be subdued, changed, kept under, and turned in by that. Consider that faith in man is absolutely required, by which he must in a sense co-operate indeed, but that for all this, he cannot make himself a child of God; but must suffer himself to be made so by the eternal speaking Word, which in the philosophical process is called by Behmen, the heavenly mercury. Which also at the end of time, as in the completest period of the regeneration, will raise up his body again, which then shall no more be earthly, but heavenly, and conformable to his own glorified body.

Consider all this in its true coherence, and dependence upon the only love and free grace of God: and you will certainly find, that all the description of this process, is nothing else but a sound true, solid, explanation of these words of St. John, As many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe in his name.

X.—In these words also lieth plainly, the possibility for obtaining the perfection in the philosophical work; which is rightly and firmly grounded here-upon by Behmen.

For if God gave us, out of his infinite love, that which is the greatest and highest, how could he have withheld from us, that which is much lesser and lower? If man, in this divine power, —who is, indeed, only so presented to the contemplation of the world, as a personification and standard model of the most perfect natural development of a sound understanding, through all solid human knowledge and accomplishments, and all the experimental states of christianity, even up to the highest intellectual science, embraced in the grand mystery of all things revealed by God in Behmen, —the following letter, we say, may be not unsuitably appended to the present extract. From which the candidate will further perceive, the perfect, unidocratic understanding faculty of this great genius, and the practical gospel character of all his profound science; which like that of the Saviour himself, of Paul, of Behmen, and of all rightly illuminated prophets of all ages, could only tend to the furtherance of the one Gospel design, the conversion of sinners and unbelievers, of all nations and people and tongues.

And here we take a fresh occasion to observe, for the consideration of the candidate, that all that evangelical applicability which the personal ministry and writings of the inspired Paul possessed, in reference to the generation of his day, and to the church at large since, that same suitability and adaptation to the present state of the unconverted intellectual world is contained in the writings of Behmen, Freher, and Law. Nay the chief of these latter, or rather the whole jointly are but a further birth of that self-same Spirit which brought forth the former; proceeding as immediately from the same will and wisdom, and God and Father of all. These are strong statements, but they are the results of a clear apprehension of such a truth. And we doubt not, that a similar conviction will be forced upon others who are familiar with the works in question, after a perusal of the several sections of this treatise.

The letter in question was written by Law to an intimate friend, who possibly, like many mystical and natural philosophers of the last century (even Newton himself, as referred to in the note of p. 46), and as a few even in our day, might have been dabbling in alchemical studies and experiments in search of the philosopher's stone; but who were not sufficiently versed in the mystery of truth, as to perceive the futility of all such attempts, without not only an apprehension of the union and mutual co-operation of the powers of eternal and temporal nature, which can only be the result of a high degree of sanctity, devotion and purity, such as might be expected in a Theosophic College, but also of an especial appointment of God to that end, for the same purposes indeed, as St. Paul was endowed with his divine wisdom and miraculous virtue.

But how few even of our modern rational christians, with all their learning and ingenuousness, have sagacity or a will to perceive this essential truth, that the attainment and manipulative exercise of high illumination, must be founded in the simple experimental religion of the Gospel, in death to the old man, and the real resurrection of the new life of Christ, the light of eternity, in the soul; in a word, by the actual passing through all the mystical deaths and births in the soul, which stand between human corruption and the light of God. The letter is as follows:—

“My dear L——, I cannot tell you how much I love you. But that which of all things I have most at heart with regard to you, is the real progress of your soul in the divine life. Heaven seems to be awakened in you. It is a tender plant, it requires stillness, meekness, and the unity of the heart, totally given up to the unknown workings of the Spirit of God, which will do all its work in the calm soul, that has no hunger or desire but to escape out of the mire of its earthly life into its lost union and life in God.

I mention this out of a fear of your giving into an eagerness into many things, which though seemingly innocent, yet divide and weaken the workings of the divine life within you. For a multiplicity of wills is the one only evil, disease and misery, both of our souls and bodies. That which can make the soul to have only one will, and one love, is the universal tincture both for soul and body: and nothing else is it. That alone can take the fall or curse out of the body which can take it out of the soul. For the curse through all nature and creature is but one and the same thing, viz., the absence of the heavenly power. Heaven is dead in gold, just as it is dead in man; and its heavenly tincture can only be made alive in the same manner, and from the same power, as the inward man is born again of the water and spirit from above.

Our outward man must be tormented, crucified, mortified in the fire of our own flesh and blood: and then it is as the gross gold in the crucible heated by earthly fire. But as no fiery torments of our own flesh and blood can glorify our inward man, and set him in his first angelic state, so no outward fire can torment gold into its first heavenly state. Our Lord said to the crucified thief, To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.

Now no one is a divine Magus, till he is thus qualified to say to his subject, To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise. If he himself is not in paradise, he can do no paradisaical work.—But, my friend, let not what I here say, put you upon disputing this point with any one, for I say it for a quite contrary end, to shew you the vanity of all such discourse. My dear soul, adieu. Oct. 16th, 1752.”

bestowed upon him by free grace, can verily rule and triumph again over sin, death, devil, and hell, whom he made himself subject unto by his lust. Why should he not also be enabled thereby, to rule and triumph again over the curse in the earth, he brought into it by the same lust? When this latter is but a natural consequence of that former; nay an inconsiderable one in comparison to that. Truly it is inseparable therefrom, if that former be really attained unto, and provided that all the qualities that are requisite thereto, be verily found in the artist or Philosopher.

XI.—All these qualities are, as in their principal sum and substance, concentrated in this, that the artist first must have the curse transmuted in himself into the heavenly blessing, through the holy tincturing blood of Jesus Christ. Which Behmen thus sometimes expresses, He must first be, and have really that same in himself, which he will make or introduce into metals without himself. And this he frequently presseth home unto every one, warning earnestly and calling heaven and earth to be witnesses, that none shall presume to meddle with the curse in the earth, before he be really delivered, as to his inward man, from that curse in himself; or else he may expect to earn nothing else but curse instead of blessing. Before this, his own internal deliverance, he may have indeed many fine notions of this work in his brain; but the real process cannot be manifest in him, and so not understood by him, in that experimental fullness and exactness which is required.

XII.—This same he also offers to the serious consideration of such a one, under these and the like philosophical terms. He is to know that his Mercury is kindled in the fiery Mars, and burns in the eternal Saturn, in the terrible impression of darkness; his Venus is captivated, his water dried up, his Jupiter is become a fool, his Sun is darkened, and his Moon turned into a black night. And now there is no other remedy but to take Venus, (the eternal love of God) and to introduce that into his poisoned Mercury and Mars, that they may be tinctured thereby, and then his sun will shine again and Jupiter rejoice, etc. Which he represents afterwards in plain words from his own way, practice and experience.

XIII.—Yet all this, though really attained unto, will not be yet fully sufficient. For there is not only such a sufficient ability for this work, and a sufficient understanding of its process required, which I doubt not but Behmen had: but there is also required an especial calling thereunto, which he had not. Without this calling the artist goes but in his own will; though his meaning and intent, as to his thinking were never so good and pure. And this call he must be able to discern, by its own internal character, which it carrieth along with and in itself, from his own natural impulse. Which easily may delude him, under the specious appearance of a divine call; and whereby the spirit of this world, which from its own internal constitution, is mightily for such an undertaking, will certainly mislead him into various dangers.

XIV.—When now these two more general requisites, viz.,

(1.) An experimental understanding, from the artist's process in his own regeneration, and (2.) a Divine call for this undertaking, are truly found in him, two other more particular qualities will still be required in him, when he now is to make a beginning of his work.

And these are represented by Behmen from that parable of our Lord, concerning a man that went down from Jerusalem to Jericho, and was robbed and wounded by highwaymen;

Saying, That the artist must truly and wholly stand in the figure of the merciful Samaritan and must have both his will and eyes. His will, that he may desire nothing else, but to heal and restore that which is wounded and broken: his eyes, that he may be able to discern that wounded body which he is to heal, and which is not easily to be discerned, and not by every one, because of its great corruption.

XV.—These eyes he shall have the greatest need of in his very first beginning, to choose the proper matter for this work. This is called by Behmen and described parabolically, That evil child, which is run from its mother's house, (from Jerusalem to Jericho) and desired to be in self, or to stand by itself upon its own bottom. And this must be sought for in Saturn; which Saturn therefore, the artist must have sharp and piercing eyes to look into, both as to eternal and temporal nature. For the wrath of God, by its strong astrigent impression, (says he) hath shut it up into the chamber of death. Not that it hath turned the same into Saturn. [Which I think is to say so much, as that it is not turned into lead:]

But it keeps it imprisoned in the Saturninish death, in the first cold, hard, dark, astrigent property; which is called the great still standing death, because as yet there is no mobility of life therein.

XVI.—When this proper matter is found in Saturn, the artist may go to work, but so, that he do consider and follow that same PROCESS, which God observed in the redemption of mankind through Jesus Christ, (in which twofold holy Name, the general process was clearly understood by Behmen from the language of Nature,) even from his conception and nativity, unto his resurrection and ascension. So doing, he may come to find the joyful feast of Pentecost, viz. that desirable tincture in outward nature, which is answering unto that holy spiritual tincture, whereby St. Peter, in his first public sermon, on the day of Pentecost, tinctured three thousand souls at once. Now observe,

XVII.—When the human mercury, the outspoken word of the human life, was infected and poisoned by the serpent, or made manifest in its own natural quality, which it hath in itself, before and without the light, God did not reject the humanity, so as to annihilate it wholly, and to make another new, and strange Adam, but he regenerated that which was spoiled. And this he effected not by any such new or strange thing, as which the humanity had not had in it before; but by that self-same holy divine mercury, which at first was breathed into Adam, for to make him an image and likeness of God.

This he re-introduced again into the poisoned humanity, and made thereby a good, sure and solid disposition to the new regeneration thereof. And this was done in the immaculate conception of Jesus Christ. For therein a conjunction was made, between the eternal speaking, and the human outspoken word, mercury, or human life, now poisoned in man, and full of self, or own will.

XVIII.—This must be the first consideration of the artist, well to be observed, that so he may be sure to act accordingly, and to bring not his subject matter to the fire, without such a previous conjunction; if he will not work in vain, and make himself ridiculous. And for an illustration hereof this may serve: in the Second Principle, of light, the love-desire, that is, the first property of eternal nature, but considered as in the fifth, makes a pure crystalline substantiality. And therein the divine mercury is the eternal holy Word and understanding: but in the first principle, wherein the harsh astringent desire makes a dark obscure substantiality, the same mercury is a principal part, or chief property of the wrath of God, and an original of all mobility, and moving power. This mercury therefore (considered as in the outspoken Word, or life of man,) after it was turned away from the second principle, of light and love, and was made manifest according to its own wrathful property in the first; could not have been restored or brought back again, but by that very same mercury, which was first breathed into man, and was not altered in the light and love of God, though it was altered in man, in whom it disappeared and lost its former pre-dominion. Now the getting this lost pre-dominion again, either in man, or in any other creature, according to its own kind, is nothing else, but that same tincturing and transmuting, which in all this discourse is spoken of; and which pre-dominion therefore of that heavenly mercury must needs reproduce again such a pure light's substantiality, as that which disappeared in man, by his fall, and in the earth by the curse. [Let him that readeth, understand.]

XIX.—In the relation of St. Luke, concerning what the child Jesus did with his parents, in the twelfth year of his age, a representation is seen of the inward and outward world, and of their different wills. For the inward will in Jesus broke first the natural will of his parents, when he remained in the temple, without their knowing and consent, nay, said also like as rebuking them, How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?

And then again, the will of this outward world in his parents, broke the inward will in Jesus, for he went down with them to Nazareth, and was subject unto them. This sheweth to the artist, that in his work he shall soon find such a two-fold will also. The will of the inward world, will not in the beginning presently condescend and be subject to his will.

But if he ceaseth not to seek after it, as Mary did, and wrestleth with it all the night like Jacob, with a full resignation of his own will, which is the will of this outward world, this Divine will, will at length condescend to him, and go down with him; for it is as it were broken or conquered by his will.

XX.—Here the artist, or magus is to know, that he is not to bring that will or tendency to the perfection, into this matter from without, but that it lieth therein already before.

He must only first in himself be capable of the Divine will, and then with his own renewed, or tinctured will, which here is his magical faith, he must handle his subject matter; that so thereby the will towards perfection, which lieth in the matter indeed, but still and unmoveable, may be stirred up and brought into conjunction with his human tinctured will, and so also with the Divine will. And that further this Divine will may press forward or outwards, meet with and bless that outward will, which presseth backwards or inwards from the corruption into God's love and mercy.

XXI.—Highly is this point recommended unto the artist, not only for to consider and understand, but also to make it his continual practice. Because herein the Philosophical baptism, as to the greatest part consisteth, and this practice is the very first beginning thereof. This only can make him able to baptize truly and rightly, for he is to baptize his matter, not only with the water of the outward, but also with that of the inward world. Of which more hereafter.

XXII.—The poor fallen humanity considered so barely as it was in, and to itself, viz. as broken, spoiled, poisoned, was not cast immediately into the fiery furnace, and melted down by the wrath of God; but, as said before, a conjunction was first made between the earthly and heavenly humanity.

Neither came the great fiery trial upon it, immediately after this conjunction; but a long and wonderful process was held, before it came to that great earnest. First, the humanity was to be baptized with water in the Jordan, and with water from above the firmament. Further, it was led into the wilderness, for to be tempted by the devil, which devil (N.B.) was not put into the humanity, but permitted to stand over against it, and to offer unto it all that the first Adam was tempted with. And all this time of forty days, no outward food was given to this new baptized humanity, but it was to live upon its own life's mercurius, viz. the eternal Word proceeding from the mouth of God, according to the answer the Lord Jesus gave unto the devil. After this he came forth in public, preached, and did great wonders in all the seven properties of nature. And though at length even his human body was really glorified upon the holy mount, and seen so by three of his disciples, yet by all this, the full perfection was not yet wrought out, but the very greatest, sharpest trial was still behind. Answerably to all this process, the Philosophical work also must be carried on, and the artist will see a continual parallelism; but at length he will find also, that all this, though it was shown him in never so glorious an appearance, is still short of perfection, and all but as it were preliminary.

XXIII.—By the Philosophical baptism, if it be truly performed, in the dead mercury, which lieth in impotence, and hungers only after its own property, being of itself not capable, either of desiring after, or of admitting into it any other, [N.B.] the hunger after the heavenly substantiality is stirred and raised up again.

And by this hunger, that heavenly substantiality is drawn in, with its own peculiar will, desire, or inclination, which is nothing else but a readiness, or tendency to become manifest with its life in the death. And herein is the first beginning of a new body, or rather of a seed, from which a new body is to come forth in its due time.

XXIV.—What this Philosophical Baptism is, and the absolute necessity thereof, may be thus represented. Every hunger is a desire after such a thing as is conformable to that hunger: for after that which is disagreeing and contrary to it, no hunger in anything can be. The dead corrupted mercury then hath a hunger indeed, but only (according to its own condition in the curse), after death, wrath and poison, etc. If now to this hunger such a dead and wrathful thing is given, as it hungers after, the death therein must needs increase, and its wrathfulness must be strengthened thereby. But if to this hunger the life is presented, or a living, heavenly property is offered, the death is not at all able to receive it. Unto this death therefore, the death and wrath of God must be given, but in this death and wrath the heavenly substantiality. And this is the Philosophical baptism, for this is that earthly and heavenly water, in the first of which is death, and in the second life: both which must be together; for the reason is now plain, why neither by this nor by that alone, this baptism can be performed. But when it is thus rightly done, this baptism, viz., that which is heavenly swalloweth up into death, that which is earthly and wrathful, and exalts its own new life therein; though not immediately, like as it also was not done in Christ immediately after his baptism. [Along herewith, consider portions of the Note of p. 3: for every disease is a hunger. The sympathy and antipathy indeed, do all.]

XXV.—This Philosophical baptism is nothing else but a conjunction, to be made between the fiery and watery mercury. The fiery must be baptised with the watery. And this is what Behmen means by saying obscurely: have a care only for this, that thou baptisest the mercury with his own baptism. For this watery mercury is his own, viz. it is that, which the fall and curse he enjoyed and rejoiced in, as his most precious treasure; whereby his fiery poisonous wrath, was kept under, and prevented from being manifest. But when these two were separated from each other, a breach was made, which cannot be healed again, but by a renewed conjunction between them. Like as it is in animals and in fallen man also the same thing, only different in degrees.

The conjunction of male and female, which is absolutely required, to the multiplication of every kind of living creatures (which hath in vegetables also something answering thereunto), may be a good illustration thereof. And therefore it is

XXVI.—That by Behmen this very same, which here now is called also the philosophical baptism, is called also a matrimony or espousal, when he plainly says, not only that to the earthly wrathful mercury, a fair loving virgin of his own kind must be given in marriage, but also that this same giving is the philosophical baptism.

And again says he, The woman's (not the man's) seed shall bruise the serpent's head. The man hath in his tincture the fire-spirit, and the woman in her's the water-spirit.

This latter must baptise, soften, and overcome that former, and so transmute its strong fiery hunger after wrath, into a tender love-desire; and herein lieth the baptism of nature. In this stedfast love-desire, these two are at last turned into one, so that they are no more male and female, fire and water in contrariety, but a masculine virgin with both tinctures in union. But before this be wholly effected, and as long as they are in the way and process thereunto, Behmen calleth them in all this discourse, the young man and the virgin, or also the bride and the bridegroom.

XXVII.—Immediately after the baptism of Christ, he was led by the Spirit into the wilderness, to be tempted by the devil. And a serious consideration of the whole process in this, three-fold temptation, is highly recommended to the artist. For in this philosophical work the same must be done also, in a total answerableness to the three particulars therein, relating to the three first properties. All which is largely declared by Behmen, the sum and substance whereof, is this:

XXVIII.—The human soul, or the whole humanity as an image of the eternal speaking Word, was now tried, after God had re-introduced into it a spark of his eternal love, whether it would enter again into its primeval state and place and be an instrument of God, to be played upon by his holy Spirit, in his love; or whether it would rather continue in its own will, and suffer the devil to play upon its instrument in the wrath and anger of God. And so in the philosophical work also, the earthly poisonous mercury, after he is now joined again to the heavenly, is tried, whether he will go out from his own natural wrathful property, and suffer himself to be turned into his first, pure and crystalline condition, wherein he stood before the curse: or whether he will rather continue in his own awakened and now predominant quality.

XXIX.—In our Lord Jesus Christ, the human will rejected all the devil's presentations and offerings, resigned itself, and entered wholly into the first mother's womb, according to his words to Nicodemus, etc. And so in the philosophical work, if it goes well and right the artist will see, that when the tempter comes on, the young man, or mercury gives himself up wholly into the first mother, and that this will swallow him up as into nothing. At which the artist will be amazed and terrified, thinking that all is lost and undone, for he sees nothing, and has lost all appearance of heaven. But he must have patience, that which is impossible in his sight, is not so in the powers of nature.

XXX.—The wilderness wherein this temptation is done, is, in this philosophical work, the outward, earthly, dry, desolate and barren body.

Wherein the young man, or the mercury is not able to stand against the devil, unless he lay hold on his virgin, and be by her supported. He is, therefore, to unite with her, to cast his will and desire into her love, and to eat of her bread, not of his own natural quality, like as Christ our Lord, all the forty days of his temptation, did eat only of the eternal speaking Word, and would not eat of that bread, which he could have made out of the stones. All which is nothing else but that mercury must admit and receive into its own poisonous quality, the heavenly tincture, and suffer the serpent's head, the fiery, wrathful property, to be bruised thereby in himself. Which if he doth not, the devil will prevail, and detain him captive in that state, wherein he is, when separated from his virgin. But if he doth the devil must withdraw, and the virgin takes his seed from him into her womb. [As Note of p. 71.]

XXXI.—What the devil is in this work, the artist (says Behmen) will easily know, but he calls him not by any plain or distinct name: doubtless it is such another wrathful dark and poisonous matter, as may be fitly compared to the devil, and may be able to do in this process, the devil's office, because of the qualities alike in both. Thus says he, he shall have a care, to suffer not, that this tempting devil be too furious, or too wrathful, but proportionable, etc.

And again, on the other hand, that he be not too weak, for else the mercury should not be assaulted by him sufficiently, and might as a hungry wolf, swallow up his baptism, return to his own wrathful property, and continue still that same poisonous thing, which he was before.

XXXII.—At the end of forty days, when the devil had ended all the temptation, he must depart from the Lord Christ, and the angels came and ministered unto him. This also the artist is especially well to observe, for he himself stood here in the fiery trial also, and may now perceive infallibly, whether or no, he be fit for, and accounted worthy of his work. If at the end of forty days, in answerableness to the process of Christ, the angels do not appear, he may surely think of himself, that he is not yet fit and worthy; and of his fiery masculine mercury, that this doth not yet stand in a due internal union with the watery feminine, but that it is still that same, in its own wrathful property, which it was before, and that the devil hath prevailed. But if he seeth the sign of the angels, he may rejoice and be sure, that the bridegroom is in his bride, and she in him, and that his work can prosper. What this sign of the angels is, the author saith not expressly; it must be some new delightful appearance, by its own character so intelligible to the artist, as that was intelligible unto him, when before he saw nothing, and had lost the appearance of heaven.

XXXIII.—Immediately after this temptation, and overcoming of the devil, the Lord Christ began his public office, not only by preaching, reproof and instructing the people, but also, by working many great miracles, through all the properties of nature. For instance: in Saturn, he raised up the dead; in Luna, he transmuted water into wine, and fed with five loaves of bread five thousand men; in Jupiter, he made out of the ignorant and simple fishermen, the most wise and understanding apostles; in Mercury, he made the deaf hearing, the dumb speaking, and healed the lepers; in Mars he expelled devils from the possessed: in Venus, he loved his brethren and sisters, as to the humanity, and gave freely his life for into death. Only six of the properties are here enumerated, and the seventh which is Sol, standing in the midst and uniting three and three, is here not mentioned, because this belongeth to the full perfection, which then only was attained unto, when he was risen from the dead, ascended up to heaven, and had poured out the holy tincturing spirit, on the day of Pentecost. But that Behmen hath a good ground for referring distinctly to all the seven properties of nature, all the miraculous deeds, could be made out sufficiently from him, were it needful.

XXXIV.—All this now the artist shall distinctly see, that it hath an exact answerableness in the Philosophical work, when the forty days temptation with good success is ended. In Saturn, he shall see, that now the mercury raiseth up from death, that same substance, wherein he was shut up before. In Luna, that he feedeth and nourisheth that substance, when there is nothing outwardly wrought, which it could be fed and nourished with: and again, that the deadly water is exalted and turned into wine, by having now got (like as wine hath) an union of a fiery and watery virtue. In Jupiter, he shall see the four elements each by itself, and their colours, and the rainbow upon which Christ sitteth for judgment, in the outspoken mercury; so that he highly shall be amazed at it, and perceive that the wisdom of God playeth and delighteth therein. For the friendly Jupiter sheweth forth his properties herein, after such a manner as that is, in which God will, in its time change this world, and transmute it into paradise.

In Mercury, he shall see that heaven separates itself from the earth, and that it sinks down again into the earth, and changeth the same into its own colour, and that mercury purifieth the matter, etc. In Mars, he shall see, that Jupiter in the Mercury, casts out from the matter upwards a black fire smoke, which will be coagulated like as soot in the chimney. And this is the poisonous hunger in the mercury, rightly to be compared to the devil, because it hath, according to its own kind, the devil's qualities. What Christ did in Venus, the artist shall see most gloriously in the Philosophical work. For as soon as this black devil is expelled from the matter, Venus in her virginity appears, in great beauty and glory, which is a fine type or emblem of the great love of Christ.

XXXV.—Now here, when this appears, the artist is rejoiced, and thinks reasonably his work is finished, and he hath got the treasure of the world; but soon shall he find himself extremely disappointed. For when he trieth it, he shall find, it is but Venus, still a female, and not yet a pure and perfect virgin, with both tinctures united into one. Like as in Christ, the eternal speaking Word had indeed wrought out through his humanity, all these wondrous deeds; and yet the full perfection could not be made manifest therein, his human body could not be glorified, and much less could he have poured out the Holy Ghost, before he was passed through the great anger of God or death and hell. So also in this philosophical work, though all these glorious things have appeared in the properties of nature, yet the universal tincture is not yet fixed and manifest, but all what was seen hitherto, was only transient, and the greatest work to be done, for this fixation and manifestation, is still behind. For all the seven properties must be made totally pure and crystalline, before they can be paradisaical, and each of them hath its own peculiar process, when it is to go out from the wrathful into the paradisaical life; wherein they must all seven have but one will, viz. that of love, and all their former own will, wherein each was for itself, in opposition to the others, must be utterly swallowed up. And then only they are fixed, and able to abide the fire, for then no Turba can be more therein.

Which is now further effected by a process answering to that which was observed in the suffering and death of Christ.

XXXVI.—As soon as the regenerator of mankind came into this world, from above, and had the name of a king given him, the civil government thereof could not endure him; but presently he was by Herod persecuted, and at length by Pilate crucified, though he had plainly declared that his kingdom was not of this world. And because this newborn king came not with a royal state and splendour, nor in such an outward power, as the Jews expected and hoped for, at the coming of their Messiah, the ecclesiastical government in the high priest and Pharisees, would not receive him.

And since he owned himself to be the Son of God, and a king of truth, and said he was come to save his people from their sins and darkness, and from the wrath to come, the devil also could not endure him. But he was immediately a strong opposition against all these three together in conjunction. So also in this philosophical work, as soon as Venus thus appears in her beauty, with her own natural character, and in order to perfection, there is a great alarm, opposition and insurrection against her, manifest in Saturn, Mercury, and Mars, the first of which is a true figure of the civil government, the second of the ecclesiastical state, and the third of the devil. And as these three jointly were the same chief agents, that brought the Lord of Life and Glory unto death; so in this philosophical work, the three inferior wrathful properties, Saturn, Mercury, and Mars, are rightly called by Behmen the murderers of Venus.

XXXVII.—This great opposition and uproar against the Lord Christ, had, in the internal truth and reality no other ground but this, that he was from above, when all these three were from beneath.

Deep, great, and many things are in these few words comprised, and the essential nature of a Principle (taken in Behmen's sense) is understood therein. If the Lord had been out of their own dark, harsh, bitter and wrathful root, and if he had appeared, for to preserve and establish the same, in its own selfish and wilful qualities, they would have received him very kindly, and no opposition could have been made.

But he was from another principle, and came only for to destroy the works of the devil in this world, and to recall its inhabitants unto light, love and truth. Now all this was bad news in the ears of all these three parties, for none of them was willing to be stript of its selfish greatness, dignity, strength and power, and therefore they all three at length agreed for his crucifixion. So also in this philosophical work, there is no other ground for this great opposition, but this very same, that Venus is from above, when these three are from beneath; united in one wrathful sphere, and unwilling to be deprived of their natural power and pre-dominion.

Heaven stands now in hell, upon earth, and will transmute them both into paradise; and hell perceiveth its ruin is inevitable, if it receives into it this child from heaven, and therefore it swell-eth up against it, and opposeth all what it can. But by this same opposition, it must and doth but promote its own destruction; as it was done also in the process of Christ.

XXXVIII.—Here might be objected, How can all this be consistent with what was done and declared above, viz. that the matter was purified, the devil expelled, and the sign of the angels appeared, etc.?

For if so, whence can now such a wrathful, hellish opposition arise. The answer given to this by Behmen himself, (though but implicitly, and not so directly) is of the greatest importance not only in this philosophical process, but also especially in that of man's regeneration. When Mercury, says he, is awakened from the death of Saturn's strong impression, and receiveth manna (heavenly food, light's and love's substantiality, his own true virgin, the water of life, the philosophical baptism) into the mouth of his poisonous property, a joyful crack [shriek] ariseth indeed; for it is like as if a light were kindled in the darkness, and a paradisaical joy and triumph ariseth in the midst of the wrath. When now this mercury thus gets a twinkling glimpse thereof in Mars, the wrathfulness is terrified at the love, and sinketh back, like as in the generation of the second principle out of the first; and the angelical properties appear as in a glimpse.

And so this is (N.B. not yet a transmutation but) like as a transmutation, but only transient but not yet fixed.

If therefore a fixed and radical transmutation shall be done, the same process, that was in this like a transmutation, must be repeated again; but in a far higher or rather deeper degree. And the same can also be repeated, because the harsh, bitter, wrathful hellish properties were hitherto suppressed only in part, but not fully rooted out, and radically turned into one only will. And they therefore are now raised afresh by this appearance of Venus, nay even much more than they were before, they stand up in opposition against her, for to maintain their own natural right. So that here also, in a sense, the words of Christ are true, I am come to kindle a fire, and to bring upon earth a sword, enmity, etc.

XXXIX.—This opposition is, in this Philosophical work, between three and three; like as it is also in the generation of eternal nature.

Yet this is to be understood in such a sense, as the foregoing position can bear, wherein there was asserted, That here nothing as yet is permanent and fixed. So it was also in the process with the Lord Christ: when he was a going into the strong severity of the wrath and anger of God, in order to the full consummation of his great work, he said expressly of himself, I am not alone, but the Father is with me. He had then with him on the one side, or from above, the Father, and him unalterably, in one sense, though changeably in another, relating to the sensibility of his outward human person. Which may appear, by his woeful crying out on the cross, My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me! For that which here by some now is objected, concerning a wrong translation of these words, is not to be regarded, because the sense of them is not as they imagine. And on the other side, or as from beneath, he had with him, though in a very low degree, and in considerable sense, the common ignorant people, which received and accompanied him with great joy and acclamations, when he came riding upon an ass into Jerusalem. So also in this philosophical work, Venus is not alone, but, as it were, from above, Jupiter is with her, and from beneath Luna, which is a true figure of that vulgar, simple, ignorant crew. This Luna holds with Venus, so long as it goes well with her, that is so long as Saturn, Mercury, and Mars do not actually exert their malice against her, but when these three murderers arise, and will forcibly put her to death, or swallow her up into their wrathful pit, then Luna also changeth her colour and inclination; like as the vulgar people changed their will, and instead of their former hosanna, cried now out, Crucify, crucify him.

XL.—In the process of Christ, when it cometh to the great earnest, not only that which was done with him outwardly, by the Pharisees, High Priests, etc., but also that which was done within his own person, in body, soul, and spirit must be considered.

The Two eternal Principles, viz. the fire world with its properties of wrath and anger, and the holy light world, with the pure love and light's substantiality, or heavenly flesh and blood, were both manifest in him, and stood open the one against the other; and the great work of redemption could not have been performed, except they entered into one another essentially; for else no solid, fixed, permanent transmutation of the first into the second, could have been effected.

This now made an inexpressible terror in the humanity of Christ, viz. in his whole person, considered in all the Three worlds or Principles. For the love was struck with terror, and trembled at the rough, harsh, bitter death, which it was to give up itself into; so as to be swallowed up by the wrathful properties of anger, all now distinctly raised up and qualifying according to their own nature. And the anger also was struck with terror, and trembled at the appearance of love, wherein it was to lose its own wrathful and now predominant life. And so from hence the outward human body also, in this third principle, was so violently struck with terror and trembling, that the sweat thereof was, as it were great drops of blood, falling down to the ground. Yet he said then, Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me, yet not my will, but thine be done: which words are to be understood, as spoken by the whole person of Christ, viz. in each world and property, according to the different condition of each.

For the first principle, or anger said, Let this cup of love be removed from me, that I may keep my dominion in men, because of their transgression; like as we may see an excellent type thereof in Moses, when the wrath of God said unto him, Let me alone, that I may devour this disobedient people; but Moses in the figure of Christ, and Christ in the highest operation of love, would not let him, but replied, first indeed as it were to the same purpose, If it be possible let this cup pass from me, but added also immediately, Yet not my will, but thine be done. Whereby the human will of Christ as to this Third Principle resigned wholly and submitted itself to the will of the angry father, and was obedient unto him, even unto the death on the cross.

So also in this philosophical work, when it cometh to this great earnest, the artist shall plainly perceive a great terror and trembling therein; he shall see, that Mercury especially, which is the principal agent against Venus, trembleth at the appearance of Venus, and that Venus also not only trembleth at this opposition of the three wrathful murdering properties, but also that it is with her like as if a sweat did break out from her body; and that nevertheless she is not stirring, but quiet and resigned to suffer all that they can inflict upon her, and to be wholly swallowed up by them into their wrathfulness.

XLII.—In the process of Christ, the devil said, or thought within himself, I am alone the great monarch in the fire, Saturn is my might, and Mercury is my life, and I am in, and through them, a god and prince of this world, and will therefore not suffer such a one as calls himself a Prince of Love, to rule therein, but I will devour him in my wrath, together with his love. This he intended indeed, with concurrence of the two principal properties of this outward world, Saturn and Mercury, the civil and ecclesiastical government. Thus also in the Philosophical work the artist shall plainly see, that Venus, which is all passive and wholly resigned to enter into the dragon's jaws, is surrounded on every side by Saturn, Mercury, and Mars, nay, also that they lay hold on her, and bind her, by injecting their poisonous rays upon her, etc.

XLII.—In the first place, Mars bringeth Venus to Mercury, like as the devil's agents in the anger of God, brought the Lord first to the high priest. But as this was already beforehand prepossessed with hatred against him, and did not duly or truly try him, nor could look into his internal will and work of love, but looked upon him only from without, examined him superficially, and concluded, that since he stood not with them, in the same will, way, and form, he was not to be tolerated among the living. But seeing that he could not execute his design, to kill him, he sent him to Pilate, with the character of an evil doer, that had deserved death. So also in this philosophical work, this very same is the true internal signature of Mercury, against Venus,

He was already before possessed with his own hateful quality, and stood in opposition against her, and is therefore not able to try, much less to approve of the loving property of Venus, but hath only a will and ability to murder her. But seeing that there is in Venus another living Mercury, from above, he cannot destroy her by his own power, but must confederate himself with Saturn; and unto him he delivereth this Venus, for to be killed, like as Christ was delivered to Pontius Pilate to be crucified.

XLIII.—Pilate, a governor or lord in the dark Saturnish impression, did little inquire after, or concern himself about the spiritual doctrine, light, love, and truth of Christ, but only about the government; and upon this only account of Christ's being against Cæsar, and his own coveting to be accounted Cæsar's friend, he sentenced him unto death. So here also in the philosophical work, Saturn, the dark astringent property, does not at all concern itself, with this or that internal loving quality of Venus, being not able to receive anything thereof into its own essence; but only for the pre-dominion in this great contest. Saturn will not lose the friendship of Mars and Mercury, which both are with him in the same sphere, and jointly make up therein their own government, which needs must be overthrown, if Venus should be permitted to arise, and shine therein, with her light and love. And therefore he puts in execution that which is well pleasing unto them, and which they think may make for their wrathful government.

XLIV.—Pilate sent the Lord Christ unto Herod, and this mocked him, and put on him a long white garment. In this philosophical work, Herod the king answereth unto Sol, who is a king also in his own principal. And this Sol puts upon Venus a simple, lunarish white colour; for it perceiveth that there lieth in Venus a solarish kingly power, and therefore it giveth unto her the white colour, from the eternal liberty's property, and would fain see, that she might open therein her powers from the fire's centre, and show forth herself in a golden lustre, which, if Venus did, she would be indeed a master over Mars and Mercury, but only in this outward world, a ruler in the wrath, like as this Sol is. But as the Lord said unto Pilate, My kingdom is not of this world, and would answer nothing unto Herod, nor his expectation by working a miracle before him, because in this white garment he stood only before the justice of God, and represented the poor, fallen Adam, in his false love of himself, whereof this white robe was a very significant figure, deeply declared by Behmen. So also in the philosophical work a breaking forth of the solarish power, in a golden lustre from the fire's centre, and tincturing this white lunarish appearance of Venus, is all in vain expected; because the pure union, and universal tincture cannot be made manifest, except first all the dark wrath and poison of Saturn, Mercury, and Mars, be wholly drowned and swallowed up in blood and death.

XLV.—Herod sent the Lord Christ back again to Pilate, and this, by his soldiers, stript him, put him on a scarlet robe, scourged him, put on his head a crown of thorns, and showed him to the multitude, who cried out, Crucify him, etc. So also in the philosophical work, Venus is delivered again unto Saturn, and he, with his strong, dark impression, lays hold of her, strips her of her fair robe, and puts on her a scarlet colour, wherein the wrath of Mars is lodged. This colour is from Saturn's and Mercury's property, mixed with the fiery Mars, as the artist shall distinctly see. When, now, the Lord Christ, in this royal robe, which was put upon him but in scorn, was presented to the pharisees, priests, and people, they all cried out, Away with him, we own no other king but Cæsar. So also, when Venus, in this royal colour, appears unto Mercury, Saturn, and Mars, and Luna also, they all together, with one consent reject, that is, they dart forth their malignant, poisonous, fiery rays upon, and imprint the same in her, by the sharp impression of Saturn, so that the artist shall see distinctly, that Venus is like as scourged and full of spots. And moreover, which is indeed the greatest wonder, he shall exactly see the crown of thorns, with its sharp, stinging prickles, is put upon her.

For as the whole process in the suffering and death of Christ, is a circumstantial representation of all what the first Adam had acted in his transgression, in a quite contrary way, which is distinctly shown and declared by Behmen. And as the condition of man in the fall, is the same with the earth's condition in the curse, only different from it in degree, which he demonstrateth sufficiently. So also the manner and process of their restoration, cannot but be alike in both.

And as the Lord Christ in all his sufferings was most profoundly humble, and only passive, in a full submission to his Father's pleasure, so also, in this philosophical work, Venus is wholly quiet and passive, etc.

(a.) Many particulars more are by Behmen observed, but they shall be but mentioned in short. The three nails wherewith Christ was nailed to the cross, are referred to the three first sharp, piercing properties. (b.) The two figures of the Virgin Mary and St. John, standing under the cross, are referred to the young man's and the virgin's life, now appearing distinctly. (c.) The words of Christ, Father, forgive them, they know not what they do, are deeply and excellently declared by Behmen, (1.) as to the redemption of mankind, by showing, when Jesus destroyed death and selfhood in the humanity, he did not throw away that human property, wherein the anger of God was kindled before, but even then he took it truly unto himself, i.e. he took even then rightly the outward, out-spoken kingdom of wonders into the inward. (2.) As to the philosophical work, in showing that the three murderers when drowned in the lion's blood, do not pass away, but are forgiven, i.e. their former wrathfulness, as to its natural quality, is not annihilated, but turned in the highest love-desire. (d.) The two thieves are referred to the kingdom of the devil in the wrath, and to the kingdom of love in the light, which two kingdoms are now separated the one from the other. (e.) The words of Christ, saying to his mother, Woman, behold thy son, and to St. John, Behold thy mother, are excellently discoursed of by Behmen, not only with reference to the redemption of mankind, and to the universal church, but also to the philosophical work; wherein the artist is to know, that he must imitate St. John, that all his work is done only in or about the mother, that is, the kingdom of outward nature, from which Christ here departeth; that his work in this world never will become wholly celestial, that he cannot manifest therein the paradise, so as that God should appear therein face to face. But that he must abide all the time of this, in the mother only, though he verily obtaineth the universal tincture in this mother. Like as the mother of Christ also obtained it, in her being called by the angel, the Blessed among the women; notwithstanding which, she was afterwards to pass through temporal death, etc.

So also the artist obtaineth the blessing in this miserable world, so that he may tincture his corrupted earthly body, and preserve it in health, unto the termination or end of his highest constellation, which is [N.B.] after or under Saturn.

[When Saturn therefore is at his end and limit, and leaveth that life, which he hath been a leader of, no universal tincture can prolong that life any longer.]

(f.) Concerning the words of Christ, I thirst, and the vinegar mingled with gall, which when he had tasted, he would not drink, are profoundly declared (1.) as an outward, most significant figure of what was transacted inwardly between the holy name Jesus, and the anger of God awakened in the human soul. The name Jesus thirsted after the salvation of men, and would fain have tasted the pure living water in the human property; but the anger of God in the soul, gave itself into this thirsting love desire, which the love would not drink, but yielded up itself, in a full resignation and obedience thereto. Vinegar and gall are the proper figure of the human soul, viz. of these properties wherein the human soul essentially standeth, when without the light. The soul now here given again into the holy light's substantiality, which was in Adam, disappeared, etc. This caused such a two-fold crack, or shriek, as in the generation of eternal nature was explained.

The first terrible crack made the earth to quake, and rent the rocks asunder, etc. The second joyful crack raised the dead bodies of them that had hoped and waited for the coming of the Messias, and rent also the veil in the temple, from the top to beneath, uniting now the human time with eternity, etc. And (2.) as to the philosophical work, wherein Venus also thirsteth after the manifestation and pre-dominion of the fire of love; but Mercury, in the sulphur of Mars and Saturn, presseth itself into her, with his killing menstruum, which is the greatest poison, of the dark, wrathful source. But Venus, instead of drinking the same down, yieldeth up herself wholly thereto, as if she did actually die. And from hence the great darkness in the philosophical work ariseth, so that the whole matter cometh to be as black as a raven.

(g.) When the inward sun of the eternal light's principle, in the humanity, had given up itself into the dark wrath and anger of God, the outward sun in this third principle, which taketh all its glance and lustre from that inward, as a representation, or mirror thereof, could not shine. For if its root or deepest ground (considered as in the region of this world) was gone down into darkness, for to renew this principle into the light, the outbirth of this root, the outward sun, must needs have been darkened, contrary to the common course of nature, and this even from the sixth hour of the day unto the ninth, which was the time of the first Adam's sleep, etc. In the philosophical work, as the artist shall see, all what God hath done, in and with the humanity, when he was to redeem and bring it again into paradise; so he shall see also in answerableness to this great supernatural darkness, that when Venus thus yieldeth up her life, which all her glance and lustre dependeth upon, all her beauty must disappear, and darkness cometh up instead thereof. He shall see also, that not only Venus, in the three wrathful properties, but also that these three themselves, in Venus, do lose their life all together, and that all is now so black and dark as a coal. For here now life and death lie together still and quiet in the will of God, and to his only disposition. The whole is now reduced to the beginning, and standeth in that order, wherein it stood before the creation. Nature's end is now attained unto, and all is fallen home unto, or into, the power of the first Fiat.

(h.) After this, the Lord cried out, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? The eternal, speaking Word stood now still, in the humanity, i.e. it did not operate therein, so as to be sensibly felt thereby. For the heavenly humanity, which in Adam was disappeared, and in Christ quickened again, was to bruise the head of the wrath, in the fiery soul, and to change the soul's fire into a clear, shining sun. That now this might be done, the humanity must be introduced into this wrath, by the eternal, speaking Word, and by the same also, through this wrath and death, into the solarish or paradisaical life. When now this was done, the humanity could not but feel that wrath in the soul, and in the same instant of this feeling, it could not feel the presence and power of the eternal speaking Word, so as it could and did before, etc. And this was the forsaking.

So also in the philosophical work, when the wrathful properties swallow up the life of Venus, which is to change them into Sol, and to make that all seven may be but one, Venus is forsaken.

And this makes her to lose her colour, and become dark. (i.) As the Lord Christ, after all his powerful works, overcoming of the devil in the temptation, and transfiguration of his human body, was to go through all these sufferings, and at length wholly to die on the cross, whereby he frustrated in a sense and manner, the expectation of all his disciples. And as he had no other gate or way, than death, through which he could have entered into his glory, and drawn after him his members: So also in this philosophical work, the artist hath hitherto seen indeed many wonderful things, and very glorious appearances, which made him to have a very great hope and expectation; yet for all this, now his expectation is in a sense quite overthrown. For now the whole nature dieth in his work, and he must see that all is changed into a dark night. All the properties, powers, and virtues, must now cease to be and do, what they were and did before, and must fall into the end of nature.

All yieldeth up its former life and activity, there is no more any stirring, moving, or operating. All the properties are in the crown-number, scattered in thousand, and so entered into the first mysterium, in that state wherein they were before the creation. The meaning is not, that the outward materiality is made invisible, or quite annihilated, but only, that all the powers therein which the outflow properties had from the eternal speaking Word, and which were raised up against each other, in contrariety, each of them according to its own nature, are now at the end of their activity in self-will, and earthly inclination, and are fallen home again into the power of the eternal speaking Word, having no other way, nor gate, but this death, through which they could enter from the curse into their primitive blessing. But when thus they are in death to themselves, and in the hand of the eternal Word, this cannot but raise them up again unto glory, as by a new creation, answering to the resurrection of Christ.

(k.) The Lord Christ died indeed, as to the humanity from this world, but he took the same human body again in his resurrection, and left nothing thereof behind, but only the government of the four elements, wherein the wrath, curse, and mortality lieth, etc. So in this philosophical work also, the first matter is not abolished, but only the curse therein is destroyed, in the four elements, and the first life in the one eternal element is raised up again; and therefore it is now six, and can abide the fire. A glorious new body is now raised up out of the black darkness, in a fair white colour, but such a one as hath a hidden glance in it, so that the colour cannot be exactly discerned, until it resolveth itself, and the new love-desire cometh up. And then in Saturn's centre, but in Jupiter's and Venus's property, the sun ariseth. This is in the Fiat, like as a new creation, and when this is done, all the properties cast forth unanimously their desire into Sol. And then the colour is turned into a mixture of white and red, from fire and light in union, i.e. into yellow, which is the colour of majesty.

(l.) The appearance of love, to the wrathful properties of darkness, causeth, as mentioned above, a great crack, shriek, or terror. The wrathfulness is mightily exasperated by this appearance of love, and presseth vehemently into her, for to swallow her up into death, which it doth also actually. But seeing that no death can be therein, the love sinketh only down, yieldeth up herself into these murdering properties, and displayeth among them her own loving essentiality, which they must keep in them, and cannot get rid of. But even this is a poison unto death, and a pestilence unto hell. For the wrathful properties are also mightily terrified at this entering of love into them, which is so strange and contrary to their own qualities, and which makes them all weak and impotent, so that they must lose their own will, strength, and pre-dominion, etc.

So was it done in the death of Christ, and after such a manner, (largely and excellently declared by Behmen.) Death and curse in the humanity, was killed and destroyed, in and by the death of Christ, who, after his resurrection, had no more the form of a male in his human body, but that of a paradisaical virgin, as Adam had before his fall. And so also is it, in this philosophical work. In this terror, crack, and mutual killing (though there is properly no death, but only a transmutation, or union of two into one), when Venus yieldeth up her life to the wrathful properties, and when these, having lost their pre-dominion, are raised up again to a new life, the virgin giveth her pearl to the young man, for a propriety. And so the life of the anger, and the life of the love, are no more two, but only one; no more a male and female property, but a whole virgin, with both tinctures united into one. When then the artist seeth the red blood of the young man rise from death, and come forth out of the black darkness, together in union with the white colour of the virgin, he may then know that he hath the great arcanum of the world, and such a treasure as is inestimable.

Several more things might be added from Behmen, which would afford many excellent considerations. But these may be sufficient to show that harmonious analogy which is between the restoration of fallen man, through Jesus Christ, and the restoration of cursed nature, in the Philosophical Work.

☞ The candidate will of course understand that the above extracts from Freher, are presented chiefly with regard to Law, the great practical subject of the proposed biography, as illustrative of the theosophic or highest development of his perfectly square, masculine understanding; for they are all printed off from the MS. copies made by him for future reference, and the benefit of his friends. We use the term practical in connection with the biography, as the subject of it will necessarily be therein presented to the world, as an example of the right proportions of an universal intellectual cultivation, and as a kind of standard model (with reference to education,) of a learned and accomplished sober English gentleman, philosopher and christian.

What is then so offered, may suffice for the candidate, and also serve to afford to the religious world a glimpse, if not a perfect conviction, of the eternal foundation and truth of Behmen's writings, as a revelation from God, however they may have been scoffed at by popular, unphilosophic religionists, practical infidels, and incipient idiots, as the reveries of an enthusiast or madman.

For Behmen, as observed in the note of p. 320, and as, we trust, will be fully manifest through the instrumentality of the present treatise and the proposed biography, stands before the world in the character of the last great prophet of the gospel dispensation, commending himself, in such light, to all intelligent right-minded men, as supplying that desideratum of divine revelation, which has long been the demand of all nations, no less than of the christian world, in the full open exhibition of truth from its deepest ground, and by consequence a strict and perfect demonstration of all the orthodox doctrines of the gospel.

To afford however the completest gratification that can be desired by the reader, we will present four or five sheets more of these writings, containing a kind of popular summary and specification of the leading contents and sense of Behmen's works, which will also form a fitting conclusion to the present POSTSCRIPT.

And we super-add this unpremeditated appendix the more cheerfully, as by it many worthy living students of Behmen, will obtain a fresh insight into numerous very generally unapprehended points of his writings, and so will be effected a still further reconciliation of his declarations with the received and progressing discoveries of practical science, or of these with the former.

These further extracts then, consist of "MISCELLANEOUS OBSERVATIONS occasioned by the REVD. EDWD. WAPLE'S own WRITINGS about JACOB BEHMEN, which he desired ME to CORRECT." How these critical remarks display the universal and exact knowledge of Behmen's mind and writings, possessed by Freher, and justify Lee's poetic apostrophe, In sum, second to thee p. 253, will be for the reader to consider. They proceed thus:—

Page 33. Question. Do they mean that the Father and Son, etc? Answer. They take the words of the Scripture, calling God, fire and light not metaphorically but in their plain natural sense; and mean that the Father and Son (as in nature) are formally that spiritual fire and light, but as without nature they are in fire and light, as in somewhat distinct from themselves. For the Will as abyssal or without nature, is not yet fire, and the eternal liberty or that state of tranquillity, which is before or deeper and without nature, is not yet light; but in the process of nature, the will or rather the desire, or the will in and by its desire, cometh to be fire, and the liberty light, according to the large declaration of the seven properties of eternal nature.

Page 44. Q. ult. What reason do they give for their translation of John i. 1, further than the order of the words?

A. They say that a translation of the apostle's words, as is done in the English version, by saying the Word was God instead of God was the Word, is inconsistent with the deep mysterious description of the Godhead, and with the sense intended therein, and inconsistent also (in this place) with the order of the eternal generation; and that it takes away the greatest emphasis and force of an argument that can be had from hence, and which lyeth in his own construction of these words. For, the apostle's intent is to shew by these words, both union and distinction in the Godhead, and even to shew it by going directly as it were forward, from the centre, God, or first abyssal will, to the circumference, Word, or express character of his substance; which order is perverted by transposing the words, and the weight thereof is lost. For the apostle's words in their order, import so much, as that the only true eternal God, considered as the Father, or first abyssal will, not indeed as being an abyssal will, but as having set forth himself in an express image of his substance, was himself that Word, which was with him in the beginning, he being himself both the first and the last, the beginning and the end: and this is not so imported, when these words are trajected. And so, the apostle, having said immediately before, the Word was with God, and having declared thereby a distinction between God, or the first abyssal will, and the Word or the byss; and saying now further, and God was that Word, declareth again the highest union between them, and this from the centre or abyssal will forwards, in the natural order of generation, towards that which is that centre's, as it were, circumference, and not backwards from the circumference to the centre: for this centre is that circumference eminently, as containing it, and being able to bring it forth; but this circumference is not that centre reciprocally, in the same sense, emphasis and consequence. And in short, Behmen's explication of this Scripture-place cannot have half so much of life and deep weighty sense, as it hath when these words are transposed, which in the German Bible are rightly rendered, according to the Greek original.

Page 45. Q. But do they mean, that they have one and the self-same numerical or individual essence or substance—three essentialities are but one essence?

A. The two last similes mentioned in this question, are without doubt the best and fittest, because the first, of heat, light, and air, is that which Behmen useth frequently; and the second, of the three faculties of the soul (though I would rather say, fire, light, and tincture), is taken from the image of God, to the consideration of which Behmen useth to direct his reader. But whether now, or how these latter three, or those former three shall be called (in school expressions) numerically, individually, identically, specifically etc. the same, I am not able to say, being not acquainted sufficiently with the emphasis and importance of these words.

Page 48. Q. 1. The eternal glorious Light do they take it to be God or a creature?

A. The asker of this question, before he can be answered, must needs be asked again, What he understands by God? or in which of the two senses (the very last time represented, and owned to be pretty plain,) he takes God in this question. For the answer to it must be accordingly. I cannot answer so simply and generally, it is an eternal emanation from God. For this answer is not distinct, but lies in confusion, breeds a world of other confusions, and leaves all together in the dark. In the question, God is taken in the second sense, which from all the following discourse, till page 62, and further, appears sufficiently: when, in the answer, I cannot but take it in the first sense. If I say, an eternal emanation from God, I must understand God as an abyss, as not yet light, as not yet a most perfect being, but still as a central incomprehensible unity, which is not God in the second sense. All therefore what in the next following Question is discoursed of, makes nothing to the purpose, seeing that it opposeth something, which in the foregoing answer (according to Behmen's ground), is not asserted, and all but upon this mistake, that there is not minded what Behmen understands here by God.

Page 50. Q. and A. 1. This very same which now was said, evidenceth itself still more in the discourse, concerning a necessary emanation, which is generally affirmed to be an undoubted error. For, a necessary emanation from God, if God be taken in the second sense, as by them that oppose and contradict such a necessity, may indeed be granted to be an error; but if Behmen takes God here in the first sense, and they cannot or will not mind what he means by God, viz. only and solely the abyss, and how he declareth (N.B.) what this abyss is, and will nevertheless charge him with an undoubted error, they show themselves to be full of nonsense and unreasonableness. For, I suppose they will not deny, but that it is necessary, (not arbitrary nor contingent), that God is light, in one sense, and that he dwells in the light, in another. And if so, it is necessary that the abyss should not continue in an abyssal state, but be unfolded, and bring forth such emanations as it doth. Objection. This unfolding is done in the eternal generation in Three, which we can grant to be necessary, but what necessity is there for an unfolding in Seven also? Answer. (1.) This unfolding is not done in the eternal generation in three, for if there is a Tri-unity rather than a Trinity, it is (I don't know how to call it) a . . . rather than an unfolding. This unfolding therefore must needs be done in seven, by which the three are made known distinctly. (2.) If the central life and light is rather a rest and clarity (see page 62 at the end and page 64 at the beginning) without exulting joy, and a bright diffused glory; there is a palpable necessity for such an unfolding in seven, if we will not think it indifferent whether the Divine Being be in an exulting joy and glory, or whether it be not. (3.) If the abyss is not a most perfect being in that sense in which generally and rightly God is called so; what error is it then to say, Out of the abyss the divine perfections must be unfolded? It is rather an undoubted error to leave it indifferent whether God be a most perfect being or not. To conceive therefore, in the first place, of this most perfect being, and then to speak in the second place, of necessary emanations from it, is directly contrary to Behmen, and is the true ground of all this confusion, and endless as well as needless controversy.

Page 54. It is commonly asserted that nothing can emanate from God, except by which is not God in the highest sense of that word. Here again all this now spoken of sheweth forth itself as clear as the day. For they commonly take God in the highest or completest sense of that word, viz. in that which I called the second: if then Behmen takes it not so in this matter, but in the first and deepest, do they not fight against a shadow of their own making; and how can they pretend to an understanding of what he saith? Let it be as true as it can be agreed upon among themselves, that nothing can emanate from God, which is not God in the highest sense, (viz. when they take God, as they do, in the highest, fullest or second sense,) when Behmen takes it in the first or deepest, as he doth in this matter; such a position accommodated to that first sense is utterly false, and the direct contrary is true. Consider only what he saith of the abyss, and you may find, that something emanates from it (not by way of creating efficiency out of nothing) which is not abyss, nor can be abyss for this same reason, because it is emanated or unfolded out of the abyss, and which therefore is not God, and cannot be God in that sense in which the abyss is God, but on the one side in a higher, and on the other in a lower. Summa summarum: this unhappy dispute ariseth only from not minding what Behmen in this matter means by God, and yet presuming to try and judge him by what others have said from another principle; which indeed is not fair, but such a dealing with him as we would not be dealt with ourselves.

Page 66, et seq. Concerning what here is discoursed of two Trinities, I see, and say only so much, that even this controversy also ariseth, at least for a great deal, from the same ground of confounding the one sense of God with the other: and that after such a manner of arguing, it might as well be pretended, that Behmen makes two Gods, the one imperfect, and the other perfect, and the one within the other. In the order of our conceptions (yet cum fundamento in re), going from the creatures backward, or into the deep, there is a Tri-unity beyond or deeper than the Trinity; and further an abyssal Unity beyond or deeper than the Tri-unity. But as the Unity and Trinity makes neither two Gods, nor two unities, nor two tri-unities the one within the other, notwithstanding that the unity is verily in the tri-unity, and that both this and that is-God: so the tri-unity and trinity makes neither two tri-unities nor two trinities, the one within the other, notwithstanding that this latter is represented as actually fire, light, and air, and that former not actually so, but only potentially; and notwithstanding also, that the unity and the tri-unity is in the trinity. Like as the Son is in the Father as in his original, and the Father in the Son as in his express image, which nevertheless makes not two Gods.

As to the Priscillians and Gnostics, and what they held hereof, I can say nothing. It may be they had a deeper understanding than the relation we have thereof imports; and their being condemned in a synod* signifieth nothing at all to me, who am fully persuaded that at first the Lord of Life and Glory himself was condemned by the generality of the whole Jewish church, with as much,

* Note, and in continuation of the note of p. 200, so far as relates to Lee; as also concerning the 'Treatise' referred to, p. 252, 3.

But first we take occasion to observe, (though such an announcement belongs more appropriately to a Preface, if one shall be found needful,) that this treatise, to be duly apprehended, should be perused regularly from the commencement, it having been drawn up in the intervals of daily commercial avocations, from only a general scheme or conception of its form and contents, just as the sheets were demanded by the printer; the editor, moreover, not being possessed of literary talent, and having no other preparation for the work, than the singularly providential possession of the MSS., treatises, and almost all the books of reference necessary for the compilation of a biography, such as is thereby sought to be obtained. Wherefore as in such cases, there will not be found a logical uniformity in the arrangement and composition of the work. On account then of these circumstances, of the editor's not being a practical master of logical composition, (clearness of conception, and perspicuity of expression, having been his sole aim,) and his having to get together and decisively arrange the matter as it has been required by the printer, it is recommended to the reader, not to satisfy himself with dipping here and there into the work, but to give it a regular perusal from the commencement. The printing of it began in the month of November of the last year, and has continued up to the present time, the month of September, 1848, and is intended to be proceeded with, until the circle line of the scheme be drawn round all the points needful to be embraced in a treatise of such a character; which is designed as an index to the quintessence of all orthodox metaphysical, spiritual or mystical science, (the science of the saints, enlarged to its true philosophical extent,) and to the direct attainment of all that is experimental therein, from the lowest to the highest supersensual degree, according to the personification of such human and divine wisdom in the ~~scholastic~~ accomplished, naturally developed, ~~quintessence of the Christian~~ ~~Christian~~ mind of WILLIAM LAW. Which general directions or rude outlines can be hereafter filled up to their full proportions for universal benefit, and practically applied, by such as shall be qualified and called to the work.

With respect to the reference of p. 252, 3, the writer, a few days ago, met with a work which, on examining more closely its matter and style, he has no doubt of being the 'Treatise' there in question, and written by Lee. The title-page runs thus, 'The General Delusion of Christians, touching the ways of God's revealing himself, to, and by the Prophets, evinced from Scripture and Primitive Antiquity. And many principles of Scoffers, Atheists, Sadducees, and wild Euthusiasts, refuted. The whole adapted, as much as possible, to the meanest capacity. In four parts. 'Prophecy came not [ὁὐνέχην, was not, or is brought] at any time, by the will of man; but holy men of God spake [ῥεπομένοι,] being violently moved by [πνο, under] the Holy Spirit.' 8vo. London, 1713."

To come now to the chief purport of the present note, or continuation of the note of p. 200, if not more outward appearance of right in the eyes of the high priests and pharisees; so also afterwards many of his members were so condemned by the christian synods, in the time of which the church had lost already her true simplicity and virgin-purity, and was setting up more and more an outward form of words, instead of the inward teaching of the Holy Spirit of God.

Page 76, is to me very obscure, so that I can make nothing thereof. It is plain that the scripture saith, In God we live and move and have our being; and that here is meant God as in nature, seems to be determined by the words more immediately, for in God as in nature we live and move more immediately, and are not capable of being raised up beyond nature. Why then is it replied, The scriptures attribute this to God the infinite spirit, from whom all things continue to have their being, or their TO:ESSE immediately, as if either God in the sense here taken by Behmen, viz. God in nature, were not an infinite spirit, or as if the creatures had their being immediately from God without nature, which cannot be and is nowhere said in the Scriptures.

Page 98. A. 1. They may be said to be partakers—not necessarily. It may be granted the creation of angels and men was done by God freely and contingently, not necessarily, but this participation upon a presupposition that God would have such creatures after his own image and likeness is not free nor contingent, but necessary. For he could not have created them after his image and likeness without making them partakers of his Divine nature, though it is true that this participation is only after a creaturely manner, derivatively.

Page 100. A. 1.—They assert the fire of this emanation to be immortal as well as the light. This is true absolutely in eternal nature, but not so in the creature. And therefore I cannot say what further follows, and consequently the soul as well as the Spirit. For though the light and spirit dies not in or to God, yet it died in and to the creature, that is the creature lost it and was separated from it, and retained only its own natural principle of immortality, or continued only to be a living soul in its own fiery nature, but not a blessed image of God in the light.

Page 102. A. 1. Because here is asked, What they deliver concerning the manner of this emanation's coming out of God? I think it might be more distinct if it were answered thus: They say, that upon the desire's actual moving and attracting, divers such other properties or spiritual motions arise, as are necessary for the production of a spiritual fire, and further of the light, and that so this emanation is eternally produced or brought out of the unproduced, unmade, or self-existent abyss of all things, in which, considered as an abyssal will and Father of nature, it is to be conceived of as a hidden fire and light, not meaning that it was actually fire and light, and hid as it were behind a veil, but that it still was lying potentially in those not yet moving spiritual properties or motions, by the united concurrence of which it must have been manifested or brought into act.

Page 116. To the particulars of this answer could be added I think, in the first or second place (for it will be directly relating to the question, and is plainly Behmen's ground), That the desire is not in God, that is not in the abyss, nor in the Abyssal Will, and much less therefore in the Tri-unity or Trinity. For though we may say the fire is in the abyss, as a hidden and not yet burning fire; and so also the desire is therein, as a hidden and not yet desiring or actual desire; yet we must say also from the plain and contrary nature of abyss and desire, that the desire, as soon as it is conceived to be actual desire, and actually attracting is no more in the abyss, but is gone forth the first step out of it. And if then the desire, as hidden in the abyss, is not yet attracting, filling and darkening, this filling and darkening which is in the desire, as gone out already and attracting actually, can also not be in the abyss, but only in the first step from the abyss, which first step having never been without or separated from the fifth, sixth, and seventh, it never was also in that first step otherwise than as to our necessary conception.

Page 126. A. 2. Out of their possible, uncreated, ideal state. Seeing that in the next following answer, a reason is given why they cannot properly be called creatures, I think they should also, there not be said to having been in an uncreated state,—abyssal state, would be my expression.

where is observed concerning Lee, that notwithstanding what he had there above written to Dodwell, in defence of the Philadelphians, their principles and proceedings, he became afterwards, in the year 1709, the author of "Hickes's" History of Montanism. Upon which, the editor of this treatise, as incumbent upon him, would additionally remark, That it appears to him quite paradoxical, how Lee, so eminently devoted and spiritual an individual, so experienced in deep communion with God, and so cognizant of the super-rational operations of the Spirit, could have written (even anonymously) the history of the Montanists as he has done in the above work; after what is contained in the above-mentioned letter to Dodwell, in his prefaces to Lead, and in his other writings in connection with the Philadelphians. Contrasting the spirit of these latter, with the cool, semblant-impartial, yet, in effect, condemnatory tone of the same writer, in the above-mentioned work, an ordinary reader would suppose the author to have been a menial crafty advocate, acquainted, as a backslider, or growing lukewarm professor, with the spiritualities of high Christian experience, and, at the same time, with what may be plausibly urged against them by sober orthodoxy and rationalists, and yet ready to write on either side, as hired. It is strange, we say, that the pious and devout Lee, could be induced to write at all in judgment upon so super-rational and delicate a subject as is implied in the history of the Montanists, or indeed upon any devoted individuals, whose lives were characterized by a strict practice of gospel piety outwardly, and by great self-denial, total separation from the spirit of the world, and earnest continual prayer, in their private walk and conversation.

How differently does the divinely wise and apostolic Freher speak and write, in the passages to which these remarks are a note, as on every other occasion. And who that knows anything of experimental religion, is not aware, that a man must become a fool to the world, to be truly wise, in the sight of Christ and God? And though human prudence, (under the character of sober orthodoxy) may talk mightily wisely about the necessity of avoiding particularity, (and, whether in synod or individuals, will judge and condemn accordingly); yet he that dares not be so weak as to be particular in his religious course, will not only fail of the attainments of evangelical perfection, but be often obliged to avoid the most substantial duties of Christian piety.'

tion? In the answer no ground for it is shewn, but only is said, they think it may be illustrated from what occurs in this world, etc. Whereas Behmen had certainly a deep and solid ground for it, and had not taken it up by reasoning from what is in this world; which ground in short was his breaking in the Spirit through the gates of hell into the light-world, and having therefore this generation, as to both the principles, opened in his own soul. A ground certainly not to be shaken by devils, and much less by men, of which all his writings testify sufficiently.

Page 138. Q. 1. What ground is there for their asserting that these seven Spirits are the instruments under God of the Divine nature in man? This seems to me very obscure and ambiguous, for these seven spirits (as also is said in the next following answer) are God's eternal nature, and this nature, or these seven Spirits are by Behmen called God's instruments whereby he worketh, which is plain. But to call the seven Spirits, instruments under God of the Divine nature in man, seems to be so much as to say they are instruments of themselves, or nature is its own agent and its own instrument, or these seven spirits are so distinct from nature, that nature can be an agent, and these seven Spirits the instruments of this agent; which by Behmen is not asserted, nor could any ground be had for such assertion.

[Vol. II.] Page 1. Q. 1. Considering that knowledge is not the manifestation itself, but rather an effect and consequence thereof, I should be apt to think that either this first question might be formed otherwise, or if it should stand so, that something more might be expressed in the answer, viz. this, or something the like,—it is such an efficacious and solid understanding (chiefly and summarily) of God and man, as cannot be had but by a manifestation of the Spirit from Christ, in whom are hid etc.

Q. 2. For considerable reasons, I would for my part change the order of these two particulars, saying, 1st, in the renewed spirit of the mind, from the Word and light of God as in its only true place; and 2ndly, in the Scriptures as in a direction thereto, and a testimony thereof. Joh. v. 39, 40.

Q. 3. The words not in the same measure, I would either leave out wholly, or turn them into these—not in the same manner. Because the Word and light of God considered in the humanity and with respect to the several ages of the church, was from the beginning and will be unto the end of time increasing, unfolding and displaying itself more and more, like a tree in its boughs, greater and lesser branches, blossoms and fruits. This simile is frequently used, and excellently declared by Behmen; so that it doth not derogate from the honour and due unquestionable prerogative of the Apostles to say, that after their time such and such a one had the Word and light of God, in the same, or even in a greater measure; but their prerogative is asserted sufficiently by owning, that none had it to the same end. Like as it doth not derogate from the honour of great considerable boughs to say that they are not so adorned with variety of buds and blossoms, nor so richly laden with fruits as the lesser branches are which yet come forth out of them, are supported by them, and stand upon them as upon their foundation.

Q. 4. Great and sundry are the ends to which the Word and light of God was given, especially unto Behmen; and he certainly received it not for his own only, but also for a general benefit which is yet to be expected. Wherefore then I think that at least something thereof in the answer to this question might be mentioned. As for instance—It was given him, as he saith in the AURORA, for to declare to the world the morning redness of the instant day, and unto Babel its downfall, and to warn the children of God that are dispersed in all the streets thereof. Again, for an unfolding and explaining of those many deep mysteries that laid couched in the letter of the Scriptures, and were not understood, but must now in this latter age of the world be brought to light, according to the prophecy of Zech. xiv. 7.—In the evening it shall be light; and this (N.B.) in order to a preparation for the coming in of the Jews, Turks, and Heathens, etc.

Page 3. Q. 1. Between these two marks here expressed, I think this third could fitly be inserted,—by inquiring into their life and conversation, and especially their end or departing from this world.

Q. 2. This expression, they may have erred in what they have delivered, I think might be a little restrained or limited, by adding,—they may have erred as to this or that particular circumstance of what they have delivered.

Page 5. Q. ult. When here is declared, in or to whom the Word and light of God can become a shining lamp and a living oracle, all the qualifications, excellently here expressed, are indeed sufficient unto every one for to attain thereby unto that former, but as to this latter, something methinks is wanting: for such children of God, as, in whom his Word shall become a living oracle, are not only to have all those qualifications on their side, but something also from the side of God is further required thereto, viz. they must be expressly chosen or preordained thereto by God, intending to make use of them as of his extraordinary messengers. [The Lord will ever choose his own prophets. No man or woman, however devout, must take that office to himself or herself.]

Page 7. Q. ult. That the answer to this question might more directly satisfy the question, I would add to the words to a more perfect regeneration, these or the like—which (regeneration) itself carrieth along with it such a measure of knowledge of the deep things of God, as is proportionable to that degree thereof.

Page 19. Q. ult. Knowing and loving are here in the question, and in the answer knowing and delighting are combined, and both ascribed to the unity before the act of willing, which I think cannot stand so, because it giveth occasion to a confused apprehension and raiseth a great objection; for, if we consider in God a loving himself, we must needs imply (1.) a lover, (2.) a beloved, and (3.) a ray of love; and so our consideration represents to us a Trinity before the act of willing, which is inconsistent with the Unity. But a knowing himself may be owned before this act of willing in the Unity; for therein is the Divine intellect, called by Behmen an abyssal Eye. This cannot but know himself as one, and is therefore consistent with the Unity, and doth not at all import a Trinity, because it is not considered any further than as to a knowing only his central all-sufficiency for all what is in any sense posterior, or as it here in the answer expressed sufficiently, as a knowing himself as one, which is the same as all in one. It is true indeed that knowing and loving himself are inseparable from each other in God, but they cannot be so in our separate, gradual, imperfect consideration, wherein we cannot but look upon each in its own prior or posterior place. As then knowing precedeth loving in our reasonable conception, so our consideration placeth justly such a knowing in the eternal Unity; and as next to the Unity the Trinity cometh into consideration, so also next to this knowing, yet not as in the Unity, but in the Trinity, the loving himself can be considered.

Page 25. A. 2. When there is said of spiritual fire and light, and that our first parents were created in this image of God, I think it might be limited by adding—as to the invisible, spiritual man, or, as to soul and spirit. Not that it was not true and plainly enough expressed to him that hath understanding; but only that it may not be a stumbling-block to him that hath it not, who might presently cry out, It is contrary to Scripture, etc.

Page 37. What here is discoursed of the will, wants, to my thinking, more to be cleared up, for I see that there is spoken of another will, distinct from the will of the Unity, and subordinate to it. Whereas the generation of eternal nature begins with the desire, and presupposeth no other will but that self-same first Abyssal Will which is the will of the Unity, and cannot be distinct from itself, though it wiltheth two such things as are exceedingly distinct from one another. In the eternal generation in three, the first will is Father, and the second will is Son. Now this second will (in the first consideration of God as in himself, rightly considered as before nature, or as if nature were not yet generated,) is here in the second consideration of God as manifest in nature, rightly also laid aside, as if it were not yet generated, and there must be in our consideration as it were, a going back unto the first abyssal will, which is the only generator both of the second will, by its introducing itself into an eternal lubet, and of eternal nature also, by its introducing itself into an attracting desire. The first and second will therefore are distinct so as Father and Son. But this first will is no where represented by Behmen as generating another will distinct from itself, and antecedent to the desire, but only as introducing itself immediately into desire, like as on the other side immediately into a lubet.

Page 41. Q. 1. Darkness becometh an evil of punishment, as it exists separately from the light, not universally in every creature, but in such only as were created to the light, and left their habitation. For there are creatures in the darkness, unto which the darkness is good, and the light would be evil, pain, torment, and destruction.

Page 43. Q. 1. This description of the seven spirits is to my thinking not yet sufficient, nor distinct enough. For they are not all equally pure, simple, living, and active. The second, for instance, is in a spiritual sense and manner thicker and grosser than the first; the third is a composition or mixture of the first and second. The six only are living and active, when deadness, impotence, and passiveness belongeth unto the seventh. Wherefore then, this question might be answered in this or the like manner,—they conceive of the six first spirits as of living and acting beings, and of the seventh as of their passive, spiritual body; whereof the six are the life, and wherein they do, in a different respect, both work and rest.

And here after this first question, would be the proper place to add several things more, some of which are very necessary to the understanding Behmen's mind, viz.—that each of them is distinct from all the rest by its own peculiar essential character, which makes it to be precisely such a property, and not another. That notwithstanding this, they are not seven distinct things, but seven properties of one thing, wherefore also they are commonly called the seven properties of eternal nature. That they are not to be conceived as standing without or besides each other, according to the representation of seven distinct lamps in the vision of St. John, but as within each other, according to the fourfold wheel in that of Ezekiel. That they are in one respect but one, in another seven, and in another again but three, according to the Holy Trinity; the first and seventh, second and sixth, third and fifth being to be looked upon as one and the same, with only this distinction, that when they are called the first, second, and third, they are before the fire, and when the fifth, sixth, and seventh, they are after it, which fire maketh the most considerable distinction between the three and three. That none of them is properly the first or second etc., but that they are only called so according to our conception. That there is a reciprocal and perpetual generation between them, each of them requiring all the other six for its own generation, and being required again for the generation of each of them. That each of them receiveth the impression of all the other six, so that here also, in a sense it is true, quidlibet est in quolibet; from whence an infinite variety and multiplicity of wonders in the kingdom of glory ariseth etc.

Q. 2. The three last words, light or glory, and joy, I would place thus—light, joy, and glory, because of that correspondence which they have to the three last properties, joy being to be referred to the sixth, and glory to the seventh, as it is commonly so done by Behmen.

Q. 4. There must be a seventh, not only to unite the six, but also to make the distinction between the three distinct opposites manifest, which is done by the fire. And this distinguishing office is as much (if not more) needful to be observed and understood as that uniting one. For we should not be able to perceive darkness and light in their distinction, or rather opposition, if there were not fire, having the darkness before and the light after it.

Q. ult. In the answer is said, the joy arising from it a sixth, and the kingdom of joy a seventh. Here I would rather say,—the kingdom of glory, not as if the former expression were false, but only for a clearer relation's sake to the properties, and because it is not plainly expressed how the joy and the kingdom of joy do differ.

Page 45. Q. 1. Seeing that Behmen did not argue that four spirits are requisite to spiritual fire, from the like necessity to the production of material fire; but had the eternal nature sooner opened unto him than the temporal, and concluded rather from that unto this, nay knew also nothing of these new philosophical experiments, as afterwards is said, I am apt to think it would be better if this question were formed after such a manner—Have you anything for confirmation or illustration that four spirits are requisite? For otherwise the question seems to import, with respect to Behmen, a previous understanding of the generation of fire in outward nature, and a ratiocination from this to the eternal. What is said in the answer, being all most proper, true, plain, and sufficient, might nevertheless be retained, mutatis tantum mutandis, grammaticæ constructionis gratia.

Page 47. Q. 1. Here I cannot see why it is said the fifth spirit, from which the light ariseth, this light being itself the fifth spirit, or fifth spiritual property, arising not from the fifth but from the fourth, viz. from the fire, which is the fourth, as the answer also declareth.

Page 49. Q. 1. Instead of these words, and no more intimate union of the Triune equally manifest in everything, I would rather insert these or the like,—by an opening and essential union of the still eternity with it, which is to be conceived as all free, pure and clear, but without glance and lustre, before the first desire. This is more according to Behmen's sense than that, and I think it is no less intelligible than that; and what in the answer is further added, for an illustration from outward nature, may illustrate this so well as that, if not better, as to my thinking.

Page 53. Q. 1. Grace and peace from the one divine essence, or threefold Spirit only, considered as in himself alone without the creature, cannot be profitable unto man. Man hath broken or disharmonised in himself the seven properties of the divine nature, is fallen thereby into misery, strife and restlessness, and wants now grace and peace. All the grace without him, cannot profit him, if there be not peace made within him; this peace therefore dependeth upon that grace, and from that grace this peace must be brought into man. But it cannot be brought into him except by an actual reconciling and reharmonising of the disordered properties of his human nature. And seeing this human nature is an offspring of the Divine nature, or of God as manifested in his eternal nature, unto this disharmonised nature therefore is rightly wished, not only grace, but also peace, and not only (1.) from God, as the only original of all grace and peace, but also (2.) from the seven Spirits before his throne, as the seven Divine open Fountains, out of which the human nature was flown forth, and unto which it must be brought back again, if man shall be partaker again of the Divine nature, as he was in the beginning. And (3.) also from Jesus Christ as the King and Head of men, in whom all this reconciliation was first effected, and by whom it is to be effected further in all his members. And in this consideration (as might be made out sufficiently), lyeth certainly the true ground of this Apostolical wish. But that it is not used so by any of the other Apostles, may even not by St. John himself, except only in this mystical and prophetic book of his, doth shew us sufficiently, that it was not then the time for the opening and understanding this mystery, but that this book was written only for the future ages and generations then to come.

Page 53. Q. ult. Instead of the words flowing out from them, I would rather say—flowing out through them, or being unfolded, displayed, or manifested by them. For that former, as to my thinking, seems to make the seven properties an original of the Divine attributes, when their original (if we may so speak, for properly they have none) is in the abyssal Unity or central Allsufficiency before and without the properties of nature, and by them they are only unfolded out of their centre.

Page 55. Q. 1. Here I think it would be needful to say something, though never so little, concerning this expression, before. Not that an understanding reader should have need thereof, but only for to remove a stumbling-block from the sight of the ignorant.

Q. 2. A little more relation between this Q. and A. would there be, if in the answer to the words to know and perceive, were added, distinctly. And here might be considered also, what Behmen frequently objects himself, and answers also sufficiently, viz., Whether all the foregoing consideration of God in general, and this question of his distinct knowledge in particular, doth not import a beginning of the Divine Triune Being, or at least of the manifestation thereof. And whether Behmen's expression of an eternal beginning might not be so represented, that no man of sense could find a contradiction therein.

 As a relief to the uniformity and matter of these pages, we present currently therewith, the following Notes and Memoranda, relating to the personal history, birth-place, family and friends of the subject of the proposed biography; which, though belonging more appropriately to that work, may not be unacceptable to the readers of this preliminary treatise.

And here we take occasion to say, in reference to the compilation and authorship of the Biography, that what is WANTED in short, as the sum and the object of the present treatise, and as necessary in the nature of the thing, is AN EDITOR, who, whilst proving himself an exact historian, a solid universal scholar, a just thinker, a profound philosopher, and a deeply-experienced, enlightened christian, shall produce a masterly picture, or biography of the individual, in all the features and developments of his mind and character;—interweaving the scanty incidents of his life that have been preserved, with such tender and manly reflections, and filling up the vacancies in his history with such elevated and charming natural conceptions and observations, and interspersing the whole with such dashes and reliefs of sublime instruction, though popularly expressed, as shall irresistibly inspire the reader with a fervent admiration of true wisdom and piety, and also fire him with an ardent and indomitable resolution, to immediately commence the pursuit of evangelic perfection, and the imitation of so perfect a model of a learned and accomplished English gentleman, philosopher and christian. The whole to be rendered as captivating, by the dignity and importance of the diversified subjects upon which it treats, in so uniformly felicitous and masterly a manner, as, by the condescending tenderness, nobility and wisdom of its sentiments, and the classic purity, elegance and sweeping rhetorical ~~and masterly~~ power of its composition:—all which qualifications, a solid duly-constituted ordinary genius may engraft upon itself, by diligence and a close study of the models referred to, and through the directions and specifications interspersed throughout the present treatise. In a word, as none but a Law could design and execute a perfect biography of a man, a scholar, a philosopher, and a Christian; so this treatise aims solely at creating another Law, possessed of all the talents of the former, with all the highest practical experiences, discoveries, and divine manifestations in the human nature, that have distinguished these last ages, superinduced thereupon: for without a beau-ideal or model of a perfect man in all his characteristic features and particulars, how shall mankind be elevated to their proper redeemed perfection, how shall the Gospel produce its full results. To proceed.

The town of King's Cliffe is situate in the northern part of the county of Northampton, at about equal distances from the counties of Huntingdon, Lincoln, and Rutland, and is a place of great antiquity. Though now of small extent, and secluded from the great highways intersecting the country north and south, it has anciently been famous as a royal residence of the monarchs of England; but in later ages, it has obtained a much greater honour and celebrity, by being the birth-place of the individual who is to form the chief subject of the proposed biography, the justly celebrated, oracle of wisdom, truth, and goodness, WILLIAM LAW.

The proper name of this place is Clive, meaning a town on a slope. Indeed, the word cliff is

Page 57. Q. 3. This description cannot be said to be complete, for the light is not fed by the water directly or immediately, but the water and oil (of which this latter is more spiritual, and that former more material, though they both are the light's materiality,) do feed rather the fire eternally, whereby as by its most noble food, it is enabled perpetually to give forth out of itself the most noble light. Like as we see in outward nature also, that the more pure, clear, and noble the fire's food is, the more clear, bright, and noble is also its light. And by this union of fire and light, water and oil is generated in the light; so that there is between These three, an eternal circling band without beginning and end.

And here after this question, I think it would be proper to ask also further, What is this water of eternal light, and how is it generated? which is indeed excellently and sufficiently declared by Behmen, and illustrated also from the generation of material water in outward nature. But I see not how it could be made intelligible, without declaring also many other things belonging thereto, and not easily to be represented to the understanding.

Page 59. Q. 1. For a more natural order's sake in our conceptions, the two last members in this answer, and in both of them several particular expressions, as to my thinking might be transposed and a little altered, that it might stand thus,—seeing in them, as in a twofold mirror, all the creatures which he would create out of the fire and light, as in ideas reflected from them; but in the latter especially, all the evils of sin and of punishment, which the creature was capable of, upon its dividing it from the light.

Q. ult. The words remain in the fire are right and true enough, if rightly understood, viz., of such a kind of fire as is vastly generated from that which Behmen calleth the First Principle; yet because this is not by every one distinctly enough apprehended, I would rather say—fall through the fire into darkness, or only, remain in the darkness, which is more according to the Scripture's expression.

Page 61. Q. 1. When there is said, powers and perfections of God, which are to be conceived to arise in his nature, I think for a reason given above, it ought to be limited, by adding this or something the like,—to arise as to their distinction, or distinct activity in his nature.

Q. 4. Instead of the last words in this answer, by the spirits of men, I would say rather—by angels and men, because by mentioning the spirits only it seems as if the soul were to be more or less excluded, whereas this seeing and feeling is more directly and properly to be attributed to the soul than to the spirit, though the spirit is more immediately touched by this glance and power, and the soul not at all capable of this seeing and feeling, but by the spirit's being drawn up into that glance and power so essentially, as the soul, considered in its own soulish being, cannot be.

Q. 5. The answer to this question must needs be altered, for though it is good enough and true in its expressions, yet the construction thereof cannot be left so, because it cannot but cause a confused idea in the reader. It hath two parts: the first affirmeth the question as to God the triune being in himself, and the second as to his nature; and these two parts ought to be more distinctly represented. Concerning the first part, it is indeed rightly said, God is in all things; but unto this rather than unto the second, is to be referred that which is added, page 62, of his connot confined to abrupt precipices, but is used also to designate the side of a hill. [See Dugdales' Warwickshire, word Cliffe.—Cliffe is the chief town of the East Bailiwick of the Forest of Rockingham. It is called the Bailiwick of Cliffe. This forest division contains three walks, Morehay, containing; Sulchay, containing 1028a. 2r. 33p.; and Westhay, 1147a. 3r. 16p.]

It is seated on the northern acclivity of a valley in that district of the county of Northampton, which was formerly the Forest of Rockingham, through which a brook runs, that rises near Corby, in the western part of the forest, and joins its waters to the Nene, in the Lordship of Fotheringhay.

The lands, not only in this valley, but in smaller ramifications of it, bear testimony to the use which the inhabitants in the time of the Romans, made of the iron ore, with which the stone in many parts is united. Indeed the church, which probably occupies the place of one much older (for there was a church here in the time of the Saxons), is on the site of a smelting-house, as the numerous pieces of slag mixed with the earth, in the northside of the churchyard, and in other parts of it, testifies. In digging a grave in the north-western part of the church-yard, in 1829, the bottom of a furnace was discovered. From coins found in other lordships, viz. Laxton and Bulvick, near spots where the smelting of iron was used, it appears that the Romans were the workers of it. There were extensive quarries of freestone in this lordship, which supplied materials for building many of the ecclesiastical and domestic structures in this part of England. The lordship also abounds in mineral springs, one of which issues from a stone basin in a wood, called Spa Sale, on the south-west of the parish. The spot on which it rises was paved and surrounded by stone benches, about a century ago, and contained a bath for the limbs of cripples. Of the quality of the water the following account has been given: "It both smells and tastes of iron. It will deposit a white sediment, with oil of tartar; and with galls it precipitates a purple sediment; but turns of an opaque red with logwood, and of a deep green with syrup of violets. A gallon yields one hundred and forty grains of sediment, seventy-five of which are lime-stone and ochre, and sixty-five a calcareous nitre. From various experiments, it appears that this water is of a chalybeate laxative nature, impregnated with iron and calcareous nitre, with a small quantity of sea salt, and an earthy substance. It has been used with great success in disorders from obstructions, and in eruptions of the skin; it has also cured several lame persons." [The Rev. John Boughton, formerly Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, was the first person who observed this spring to be a mineral water. In 1670, or about that time, it was approved of, and publicly recommended by the learned Dr. Thomas Browne, a physician, then residing at Cliffe. Morton, from whom this information is obtained, proceeds to state that ever since it has been much applied to, and deservedly celebrated, for the real services it has done to the drinkers of it in divers distempers, and especially those arising from obstructions. It has likewise been successfully used externally, in the way of bathing or lotion. And there is a fit cistern of stone at a convenient distance from the spring, to take in water for the use of those who have cutaneous diseases or ulcers.—Morton's Natural History of Northamptonshire, pp. 274, published in 1712.]

Dr. Thomas Browne was buried December 23rd, 1682, Par. Regr.; and his wife died September 23rd, 1681. Mr. John Boughton took his degree of B.D. in 1666, and as he was a Fellow of St.

taining all things, and being contained by none, and containing them even so as their infinite foundation or centre, from which they proceed, and in which they rest. In which description, these two particular words, centre and rest, do require an addition, by which the former may be distinctly determined, and the latter more explained, so as to be made applicable unto all things. For seeing that eternal nature is also rightly to be called the centre of all things, from which they proceed, this centre must needs be distinguished from that. And though we cannot conceive in one circumference two centres, the one besides the other, yet we can conceive the one deeper than the other, so that from this deeper the whole circumference, together with its exterior centre, can proceed. Wherefore then, this deeper centre (God in himself) must needs be distinguished from that centre which is nature, by calling it the first, or the deepest and inmost. And further, seeing that in the denomination of all things the devil also is comprehended, this expression—in which they rest, (if understood in a sense relating to the Sabbath) belongs only to nature, and is not applicable to the devil. Wherefore then it must be so explained that nothing more than this may be understood thereby,—God is the first foundation-being, whereupon all things do stand and rest, so as that there is beyond it no further progress to any deeper cause from which they could have proceeded. For so far is it true that God is in the devil also, as the deepest centre of that whole circumference, in which he also is one of its innumerable particular things. Concerning the second part, it is indeed rightly said, his nature is in all things; but the following description, as the hidden inward ray, glance, or light, life, power, and virtue of them, imprinting etc., is (1.) not opposite to that general expression, his nature, because by his nature we cannot understand his light only, but must understand his whole manifestation, and even in that opposition wherein it now is manifest, viz., light and darkness, love and anger. Nor (2.) is it applicable unto all things in general, but only unto all things in this outward Third Principle, where, in all things is good and evil; for it is not applicable to the devil, who is contained again in this general expression of all things, though he cannot be considered as a creature belonging to, or created in this outward third principle. Wherefore then instead of his nature, might be said his light, or with the Scripture, his unperishable spirit, which is the superior part of nature; and the expression of all things must be restrained to this outward third principle. Which if done, another question will naturally flow forth, viz., Is then God essentially in the devil also? Which is distinctly to be affirmed again, (1.) as to his own eternal triune being in a sense mentioned before; and (2.) as to his eternal nature, one part which is manifest, and the other hid in him etc.

Page 65. In the definition of God it is said, manifesting himself in a sevenfold spirit, in a kingdom of light etc. And here I observe (1.) that by mentioning first a sevenfold spirit, and then a kingdom of light, occasion is given to apprehend this kingdom of light not to be included in this sevenfold spirit, but to be posterior to it; and might be supposed to be as it were an eighth number, when it is even the seventh spirit itself. And (2.) that the first in is more relating to the way or manner of this manifestation, and the second in more as it were to the place wherein he manifests himself. Wherefore then, that both the one and the other might be more distinctly expressed, I think it might be said—manifesting himself by six living and acting spirits, in a kingdom

John's College, Cambridge, he would take his degree regularly, according to the statute, which would make him about thirty-one years of age at that time. We are told that it was he who discovered this spring to be a mineral water; hence we may conclude that it was soon after 1660 that attention was paid to it, when it was secured by stone-work, as it still appears.]

Our early historians mention a battle fought here in 778, between Aldulf, son of Bosa, general of the army of Ethelred, king of the Northumbrians; and Adelbald and Heardbert, who were in rebellion against that monarch. Without pretending to claim absolute credit for this report, it may not be unapt to mention, that there was a part of the brook, in the meadow eastward of the town, which, till the time of the inclosure in 1809, retained the name of the Battle Green Pit.

The last Saxon possessor of this lordship, was Earl Algar, whose brother had a seat at Chesterton, in Huntingdonshire, and whose family, it is supposed, continues to the present day, and is seated at Chell House, near Newcastle, in Staffordshire.

The first of the family who was characterised by a surname, was Goisfred (or Geoffroy) de Clive, chaplain to Henry the First, who, in consequence of his marriage with a princess of the Saxon race, was more lenient to the former inhabitants than his predecessors, and raised his chaplain to the see of Hereford, December 26th, 1115. Goisfred is represented by Godwin as a man of great temperance and frugality. He died February 3rd, 1119, and was buried in the north wall of the cathedral of Hereford.

At Aston Hall, in Warwickshire, on glass, were paintings of the Saxon owners of Clive, supposed to have been copied from monkish illuminations of great antiquity; they were represented in their coat armour, on which some bore the eagle displayed with one, and others with two heads.

In the time of Edward the Confessor, when Earl Algar possessed it, the manor of Clive was his freehold, and valued at £7. per annum. At the general survey after the Conquest, it was in the hands of the crown, and rated at £10. per annum. It then contained the following quantity of land: one hide and two virgates. Two carucates, with one servant, were in demesne; and seven villanes, with a priest, and six cottagers, had five carucates. There was a mill, of twelve pence yearly rent; four acres of meadow, with a wood a mile long, and half a mile broad. Writers differ materially as to the quantity of land contained in a hide; and without attempting to dive into the meaning of the term as here used, but taking a carucate to comprehend one hundred acres, and a virgate twenty-four acres, the contents of the lordship at the time of the Conquest, were two thousand one hundred and four acres, beside a wood a mile long, and half a mile broad, exclusive of those parts of the parish which were within the forest boundary, and not appendant to the lordship.

In the reign of Henry the Second, it was estimated to contain one hide and a half, and half a virgate.

The Manor House, or King's Palace, is reported to have stood on the south side of the churchyard, and extended to an open space towards the east, still called the HALL YARD (hereafter noticed as the residence of the Rev. W. Law, Mrs. Hutcheson, and Miss Gibbon). Of this there have been some tokens seen by persons living in the eighteenth century, in the number of pieces of carved stone-work thrown up in trenching that part of the ground for an orchard; which were deposited in of light, exulting joy and glory, which is the seventh.

Page 67. Q. 1. This very same cometh again, for there is said, such a kingdom is eternally generated by the seven spirits of God's eternal nature, when it is generated only by the six, and is itself the seventh.

Page 68. Q. ult. The answer to this question combineth two considerations, vastly different from each other, which makes the sense obscure, and must needs therefore be altered. Fire and light are indeed always and every where to be conceived as distinct, for the one can never be, nor become the other, each must keep eternally to its own peculiar essentiality; but in this kingdom, the distinction between their properties is not perceivable, for the fire is meekened and softened by water and light, and is not known in its own natural fiery properties, but is overpowered by the light, which ruleth in this kingdom, using indeed the fire's powers as its instrument, but qualifying every thing according to its own tender and well-doing qualities. And this is that, which makes fire and light to be unsevered in this kingdom, though they are separable in and by the creature. But what more is said in this answer, viz., that they are to be conceived as two distinct, self-subsistent, and self-sufficient lives or spheres of activity, which they call principles, can here have no place at all, for this is quite another consideration. And though the two principles may be conceived so (with a good explanation both as to their being self-subsistent and self-sufficient) now, after the fall and separation, yet they cannot be conceived so, as before his fall. And further, that they cannot be conceived so in this substance is evident of itself, because this substance, or this kingdom of light and glory, is itself the one of these two eternal principles, the other of which should never have been known or perceived, if Lucifer had not manifested it.

Page 69. Between Q. 1 and 2, could fitly be inserted, though it be not absolutely necessary, this Q.—Is there anything in temporal nature by which this might be illustrated? A. Yes; the night's darkness, hidden in the light of a shining candle and manifested immediately upon its being extinguished, is a proper representation thereof.

Page 69. Q. 3. Ideas are those transitory or changeable figures, images, or representations that are formed in the seventh, by a perpetual play or love-wrestling of the six active spirits. Transitory they are, because each of the six spirits hath a hand in their formation; and as therefore now one and then another gets the upper hand, so each of them figureth or changeth them more or less, according to its own more or less then predominant qualification. And this perpetual play is that which Behmen calleth the formed Wisdom, and compareth to a looking-glass, wherein the Spirit of God seeth the powers and wonders of its central All-sufficiency, now displayed indeed and unfolded in a sense and manner, but not yet breathed out into created beings, and so therefore only for his own holy pleasure and delight. Hereof the Scripture hath an excellent place, Prov. viii. 22—31. Where, besides many other most considerable expressions, it is directly said (according to the German translation) that Wisdom was God's oblectamentum or delicia, and that she played delightfully before his throne; that last words are the same which St. John hath of the seven spirits.

Page 69. Q. 4. Essences are the subordinate particulars, or lesser inferior properties of, or also necessary emanations from that generation or generated thing, which they are said to be es-the lower land of the same close, to raise it above the sock of the mill-dam. In 1836 the occupier of this spot dug up the capital of a small pier, evidently early English, and probably part of a window or entrance of the palace. It is some guide to give a notion of its original style of architecture. This house was sufficiently capacious to receive the kings of England in their progresses through the country; several of whom were here on those occasions. [Galfred Fitz-Piers, one of the king's justices, resided at Cliffe, in 1189; to whom the Abbot of Croyland appealed in a dispute with the Prior of Spalding.—See Allen's History of the County of Lincoln, p. 280.]

Charters still exist, and particularly the Haarleian Manuscripts (No. 5511) give some insight into these proceedings. From them it appears, that King John was at Cliffe on the twenty-fifth of July, 1208; in 1216, he was at Bedford, on the fifteenth of September of that year; at Cambridge on the sixteenth, and at Clyve on the twentieth of September. At all of these places he signed mandates, which are dated there. Hence, on the twenty-first day of September he proceeded to Rockingham, and was at Lincoln on the twenty-second of the same month.

[At the sale of Mr. George Baker, the historian of Northamptonshire, was a confirmation charter to Robert de Braybroc, of all his possessions, extending into the counties of Northampton, Bedford, Buckingham, Leicester, etc. dated at Cliffe, the twenty-fifth of July, 10th. John, 1208.]

In the year 1229, December the ninth, Henry the Third occupied his house at Clyve, as appears by a brief, pro feo do Comitibus Flandria, signed there on that day. In the year 1230, the inhabitants accounted to the Exchequer in £30, for the farm of their township. The same year, Stephen de Segrave, sheriff of the county, in the articles of his accounts, charged for the carriage of four hogsheads of wine, from Baston to Clyve: a proof that the palace was in use. In 1236, Henry the Third settled the manor upon his queen, Eleanor, second daughter of Raymond Brenger, Count of Provence, as part of her dowry. In 1247, 30th. Henry the Third, four pounds, six shillings, and four pence, were expended in repairing the buildings belonging to the Crown; and in 1249, he (Henry the Third), granted the inhabitants a fair, for three days, beginning on St. Luke's Eve. This he renewed in 1258, on consideration of their paying to the crown fifty shillings per annum, in advance, for the farm of their township. The grant of a market seems to have been at an earlier date. And the grant for the fair was again renewed in the 1st. of James the First, 1604, in consideration of the great suffering of the inhabitants, by fire, and the discontinuance of the fair and market on that account. By the Rolls for the year 1274, it appears that King Edward the First visited his house at this place, in that year; being at Westminster on the twenty-first of October, at Northampton from the third to the eleventh of November, and at Clyve on the twenty-second, when he signed the patent, De homagio Lewellini Principis Wallie. A.D. 1274.—Pat. 3 ed. 1. m. 36. in Turr. Lond.

In 1293, upon the decease of Eleanor, the queen dowager, who died a nun, in the nunnery of Ambresbury, in Wiltshire, the manor was given, during the king's pleasure, to Elias de Hanvill. During the time it was possessed by the queen, there was a priest officiating in the royal free chapel of the palace of Clyve; as appears from the accounts of the year 1247, when the sheriff charged to the exchequer one shilling, paid to the chaplain celebrating divine service in the chapel at Clyve.

sences of. So that this denomination cannot be determined or tied up to a fixed constant sense, which were applicable every where universally, but must be taken variously, according to the subject matter. Yet so much may be said in general, that it imports always a particularity of things stirring and moving, descended down from this or that, which considered as before this particularity, is to be looked upon not only as an universal, but also more or less as hidden and unknown, and manifested in distinction in and by its essences. Powers and virtues are in one respect one and the same thing, but in another distinct, by such a distinction as is answerable to that which there is between fire and light; so that powers have a nearer relation to the strong and mighty, lively, energetical, penetrating fire-source, and virtues to the soft, mild, lovely, refreshing, amiable tincturing light. Colours are not different from what we call so in this external world, except only by their being that heavenly, and as to our eyes, invisible original, which our colours are but an obscure, transitory, and shadowy resemblance of, viz., such a one as is suitable to the condition of this four-elementary world; when the colours in the holy light-world must needs be so much more noble than ours, as that eternal light is more noble than our perishable light of the sun. From hence now the difference betwixt ideas, essences, powers, virtues, and colours may appear sufficiently; and moreover can it be plain also, that one and the same particular thing can be capable of three or four, if not of all these denominations, if it be but considered in different respects.

Page 69. Q. ult. When there is said, The ideas, together with the fire-light substance, and all its powers, was breathed out: I observe, that this is true indeed, yet so, that in each particular angel one power is predominant, or chiefly manifest, and all the others hid. Or else, if all were manifest in every one, there could be no variety, no distinct offices, no different abilities, nor degrees of dignity, as it is unquestionable in the heavenly hosts such distinctions and differences are.

Page 71, line 7. by the attracting desire in them. Here will be objected, This being compacted is their being created, and then if the attracting desire in them hath compacted them, they must be conceived as to have created themselves. Now I know this manner of expression is good and right to such as have understanding, but it will be hard to satisfy them that are in want of it. Wherefore then, to prevent this objection, I think it might be thus expressed—by the first compacting property of eternal nature, which in conjunction with the eternal speaking Word, they call the Verbum Fiat, or the creating power.

Page 71. Q. 2. In the answer to this question, after the words, to be a similitude of the eternal Word of God, I think must needs be added this, or something the like—enabled to form and speak out again his powers and wonders, in a subordinate or secondary way, according to their several properties predominant in them. For even herein, their being a similitude of the eternal Word consists, and without this they cannot be conceived so.

Page 73. Q. 1. To these several ends of their creation belongeth also this—that they should form, or concur to the formation and multiplication of God's wonders in his formed Wisdom, viz. each of them in his station, and according to the different names and powers which they represented.

Q. 3. The intellectuality of angels ariseth in and from the sixth spirit, or from that mutual per-

In the year 1315, it was in the hands of Margaret, Queen of England, second wife of Edward the First, and eldest daughter of Philip the Third, King of France, then a widow. She died in 1317.

In 1330, August the eighth. Edward the Third was at his manor house of Clive, where he signed a document, De Rege ap Griffyn et Wallensibus de adhesionem Edmundi de Wadestok, nuper Comitis Kantia arestandis. Teste Rege apud Clyve VIII. die Augusti Pei ipsum Regem Clans. 4th. Edward the Third. M. 25. in Turr. Lond. His progress was from Woodstock, where he was on the twenty-fifth of July, at Northampton the second and third of August, at Clyve August the eighth, at Stamford August the tenth, at Lincoln the twenty-sixth day of August, and at Nottingham the ninth of September.

From this time to 1440, there does not appear to be any document relating to this place. It probably continued during that period in the crown. At that time, it appears that the tenants of the manor were much impoverished, and that the manor itself (by which may be meant the mansion-house, as well as other things belonging to the manor,) was gone to decay; which induced the crown to make an abatement of their fee farm-rents for forty years.

A remission of their rents was also made in the second year of Edward the Fourth, 1462, on account of a fire, which burnt down a great part of the town. The tradition of this fire was continued to the time of Bridges, the historian of Northamptonshire; and upwards of one hundred houses, which were not rebuilt, are said to have been destroyed by it.

From the reign of Edward the Fourth to that of George the Third, the manor* was in the crown, and leased to different persons. At the time of the inclosure of the parish, which took place in 1809, under the sanction of an Act of Parliament, the Marquis of Exeter was the lessee, who collected the fee farm-rents, amounting to £40, and paid annually £22 out of the desmesnes. Since that time, the Marquis of Exeter has been possessed of the fee-simple of the manor, by purchase from the Commissioners for the Management of the Crown Lands. [* Valued, by order of the Commonwealth (1650), at £22 13s. 4d.; 10th. James the First, demised it to Sir Thomas Howard for sixty years; twenty-second of April, 1698, to Richard Marriot, Gent.; to the Earl of Exeter, 1715, for thirty-one years; having been previously (twenty-third of September, 1706) assigned by Marriot to that earl.—Reports of Surveyor-General of Crown Lands, Office of Woods and Forests.]

The inhabitants being tenants in ancient demesne, are exempted from the payment of tolls throughout England. By which is meant, all tolls except those taken on turnpike roads; which, being regulated by the statute, are laid indiscriminately on all who use them.

About a quarter of a mile west of the church, an embankment crosses the valley; through the north end of which an opening has been made, as a passage for the waters of the stream. This embankment, or bay, corruptly called the Bees, was the head of a piece of water belonging to the Crown, which occupied a large portion of the meadows, now called the fish pools. The sluices were standing not many years before Bridges wrote his history. These fish-pools were for the king's use, and in the seventeenth year of King John, 1216, the constable of the castles at Rockingham was ordered to distrain upon the tenants of Clyve view, (or Forest Balliwick) for their part towards as-meation of all the seven, whereby their distinct properties are represented and communicated to each other; yet this sixth spirit is not to be considered as by itself alone, but as in conjunction with the eternal speaking Word, willing them to be living and understanding creatures, able to dispose of the powers and ideas in his formed wisdom. For as the first compacting spirit, not by itself alone, but in conjunction with the eternal Word, was the Verbum Fiat; so now the sixth, not as alone, but as in the same conjunction, is that which giveth intellect to what by the first was compacted. And as the life and light of man, according to St. John, was in the Word (not in the seven spirits), so was the life and light or intellect of angels also. For by the seven spirits, before the creation of angels, only ideas were formed, which had no life and light in them, and the Word was that which spoke them forth with life and light. But as this Word could not bring forth this life and light, except by an instrumental concurrence of the seven spirits; so in the answer to this question not only the Word, but also the seven spirits, and the sixth especially, must be expressed. Nay, the sixth may be mentioned even before the Word, because of its being nearer to the creature, and as it were in the middle between the creature and the Word. And not only in, but also from this sixth spirit, the intellect is rightly said to arise, because of its being the proper seat of intellect in nature, wherein especially Wisdom's looking-glass is manifest; and further, because of its peculiar character, fitness for the raising up, and intimate correspondence with the created intellect. Like as if it were asked, From whence cometh the image, name, and arms of the king upon a golden piece of money? It might be rightly answered, From the stamp, but in conjunction with the coining master, who can stamp it with this instrument, but cannot do it without it. For as there is a likeness between the stamp and that image which is expressed thereby, so is there also such a congruity between the angelical intellect and the sixth spirit of eternal nature, which yet cannot imprint its character without the Eternal Word, whose instrument it is. The expression, the eternal Word could not, etc., cannot give offence, seeing that God himself said unto Lot, I can do nothing till, etc. And if this instrument is considered as it is of his own making, and made even in order to perform thereby all the purpose of his will, this expression is not derogating in the least from a full idea of omnipotence.

Page 73. Q. 4. As to the manner of their knowledge, I cannot find that it is or can be different from that of man, except by such a difference as is necessarily caused by the condition of their holy uniform world, without mixture of good and evil, their nobler objects without them, and their own greater purity in themselves, or in all their faculties. For as to that lower sort of knowledge, which more or less dependeth upon or is combined with the use of senses, they see, hear, speak, feel, taste, and smell, no less than men. And as to that which is more or most sublime, touching the Divine, Infinite Being, they are all clear, pure, and passive mirrors, wherein the Supreme Good may freely, and without hindrance, represent his infinite perfections, according to their several capacities; and may thus in what is formed in and reflected from them, contemplate his own powers and distinction, which is the same manner as the Mystics declare from their experience. Wherein this will be the chief difference, that man, because of his mysterious redemption from a lamentable fall, is such a subject of the Divine manifestation, as angels cannot be, and sisting the tenants of the manor in the repairs of them. In the first year of Edward the First, 1272, the pools were reported to be well stocked with fish, but the bay would require £20 to put it in proper order; and the king was to supply materials for that purpose from his own wood. For this, Roger de Clifford, justice of the forests on this side Trent, was directed, by the king's writ, to deliver ten oaks.

To the royal mansion belonged also an extensive park lying on the eastern side of the lordship, containing eleven hundred and thirty-six acres, forest measure; that is, eighteen hundred and fifty-four acres, statute measure; two acres of forest measure being equal to three statute acres. It was enclosed with a fence, partly of stone and partly of wood, by the tenants of Apethorpe and Wood-Newton Manors, in the twenty-second of Edward the Third, 1349; the crown finding the materials, and care being taken that this service of theirs should not be drawn into a precedent. The park continued in the crown, till the eighth of Henry the Eighth, 1517, when the keepership of it was granted to David Cecil, and to his son Richard Cecil. William, Lord Burghley, in the reign of Elizabeth, disparked it, and settled on his hospital, at Stamford Baron, £100 per annum, to be paid out of the rents of it, and thirteen loads of fine wood from the wood growing in the park. Thomas, Earl of Exeter, settled also on the hospital at Liddington, county of Rutland, a rent charge on the park. His descendant is still in possession of it.

Within the bounds of the Bailiwick are the whole walk of Westhay, and a large portion of the walk of Morehay, anciently part of the forest of Clyve; as the East Bailiwick of the forest of Rockingham was called in several ancient documents, as in thirty-eighth of Henry the Third, 1253. [Containing one thousand one hundred and forty-seven acres, three roods, and sixteen poles.—MS. Apethorpe Library.]

The forest or bailiwick of Clyve, originally comprehended the following parishes: Fotheringhay, Nassington, Yarwell, Woodnewton, Apethorpe, Southwick, Blatherwick, Bulwinkle, Fineshade, Duddington, Collyweston, Easton, Benefield, Deenethorpe, and Cliffe. It may be observed, that the forest lands, comprehended with certain bounds, included in the ancient perambulations, were not parochial.

We find that in the seventeenth of Edward the Third, Cotterstock Chantry obtained the tithes of certain assarts, particularly in Horshaw and Calvay, in Cliffe Forest, which the parson of Clive had been unjustly accustomed to receive. These tithes were also confirmed to them by the Bishop of Lincoln, Clare, anno seventeen Edward the Third, m. 5, and Reg. Thomas Beke, Bishop of Lincoln.

The walk of Westhay, the coppices, with the privilege of cutting down all the woods, underwoods, and trees, growing on the premises, for ledgebote, palebote, gatebote, and railbote, with all the tops, lops, and branches, were sold, at the end of the seventeenth century, to the ancestor of the Marquis of Exeter. Previous to that time they were possessed by the Earl of Westmoreland, who possesses the walk of Morehay in fee.

The lordship was inclosed, under the sanction of an Act of Parliament, passed in the year 1809, when several allotments of land were conveyed to the rector, in lieu of all tithes.

that he therefore finds also in God such other attributes and glorious perfections, for his peculiar objects, as angels cannot find in him, viz., so, as if they were or could be themselves concerned therewith, so much, or so deeply and directly as man.

Page 73. Q. ult. Their souls consist of fire and light. Here I must needs observe, that when Behmen considereth soul and spirit, each in its distinction from the other, and as to its own peculiar being, he attributes fire unto the soul, and light unto the spirit, and says expressly, that the soul considered strictly as to itself only, hath in its being nothing else but fire with its dark root, that is the four first properties before the light, which is the fifth. And if we say the soul of angels consists of fire and light, we must needs own, that Lucifer, by losing his light, lost something of his soul, which cannot be made out.

Page 75, line 1. Their spirits of a heavenly power, etc. This may stand, and is not contrary to what now was said of the soul, but may well be reconciled with Behmen, as it could be shewn sufficiently if there were a necessity for it. But concerning what now further is said of their bodies, this must be observed, that Adam before his fall had indeed a body, wherein he was equal unto the angels, but that besides this angelical body, he had also an exterior one, which was from this third principle, and which the angels have not. And therefore, in our full restoration we shall be equal indeed unto the angels; but we shall have also something more than they, in the consideration of which they shall not be equal unto us. For we shall keep eternally that body also from this third principle, and this is that unto which resurrection belongeth, not that angelical one; seeing that this, if once born again in the regeneration, dieth not in the dissolution of the four-elementary body, but passeth through death into life, or rather is passed already in Jesus Christ. If we say therefore only—their bodies are like that which Adam had; without any further addition, limitation, or explanation, especially now in this beginning, when nothing has yet been said of Adam's body, we shall make way for a great objection to be raised from the Scripture saying, that Adam's body was taken from the earth. Which I think ought to be prevented, as it can be done easily, by giving but a hint at that distinction between body and body, which doubtless will be discoursed of hereafter.

Page 75. Q. ult. Concerning their food, Behmen saith it is all manner of true, real, substantial fruit, answering unto that variety which we have in our world, and that they take it with their hands like us, etc. Besides the testimonies of them that have seen it, this depends rationally hereupon, that this world was one of the three angelical kingdoms, as it shall be again after the end of time. Wherefore, then, by the creation, no new thing that had not been before was brought into it, but only that which was before was altered and brought into such a grosser materiality, as that its former prince may no more make any use thereof. And this, Behmen saith is intimated by the words of Moses, saying—that every thing came forth after its kind. That which is further said, page 77, of the fire-light and watery part of that fruit, and of their twofold effects, I do not remember indeed that I have found it so declared by Behmen, but for all that it may be consistent with him well enough, if there were only some few words added, which might declare—that this is not the only, nor the principal thing which softeneth their central fire, and causeth their humility.

The rectory is of a date prior to the Conquest. The naming of a priest, in the general survey, always denotes as much; and we find it so stated in that record, with regard to Clive. Before the Reformation, the patronage of the rectory was in the Prior of Merton, in Surrey; and was probably given to that house by Henry the First, its founder. The profits of the rectory, in 1254, thirty-eighth Henry the Third, deducting twenty shillings in a pension to the prior of Merton, were rated at thirty marks. In 1558, twenty-fifth Henry the Eighth, they are stated at £15 6s. 8d.; out of which were deducted the twenty shillings above mentioned, and ten shillings and seven-pence for procurations and synodals. But I find in the Valor Ecclicie de Clive, £20, Pens. Prioris de Merton £1.

In 1552, fifth Edward the Sixth, the advowson was granted to Edward, Lord Clynton.

In 1589, thirty-first Elizabeth, it was in the hands of Sir Walter Mildmay, who at that time passed it by will to his son, Sir Anthony Mildmay. Sir Anthony's only daughter and heiress married Sir Francis Fane, Knight, created Earl of Westmoreland; who, on the death of Sir Anthony, in 1617, became possessed of the patronage of this benefice, and it continues with his descendant, John Earl of Westmoreland.

The quantity of glebe, as settled by the award of the commissioners under the inclosure, is four hundred and seventy seven acres, one rood, and a sale.

The eastern part of the rectorial premises, occupied by a large building, containing an upper and lower chamber, barn, and poultry yard, and by part of the garden, is copyhold of the manor, at the rent of two shillings per annum; and the rector is admitted to it, at the earliest court baron after his induction, upon the fine of one shilling. These were formerly the inheritance of Nicholas Woodcock, and were purchased by Thomas South, rector of this parish, who, on the ninth of October, 1688, surrendered them to the rectory for ever. He is supposed to be the builder of the rectorial house, between the years 1641 and 1689, during which he was the incumbent. The list of incumbents may be seen in Bridge's History, but must be corrected by other documents. Prior to the Reformation, this church was in the diocese of Lincoln, and subsequently in that of Peterborough.

The last incumbent was Henry Kaye Bonney, A.M. 1791; died the twentieth of March, 1810, formerly Fellow of Worcester College, Oxford, also vicar of Nassington and Yarwell, and prebendary of Carlton-cum-Thurby, in the church of Lincoln. He was vicar of Warrington, which he resigned for the rectory of Gretford, in Lincolnshire, which he held till his death. Patron, John, tenth Earl of Westmoreland.—[The two previous incumbents were Wilfred Pyemont, Cl. fifth of October, 1726, died twentieth of June, 1759, Peterborough Register; and Thomas Howard, Cl. 1759, died sixteenth of November, 1790; as also stated in the inscriptions on their grave stones.]

The present incumbent is Henry Kaye Bonney, D.D., son of the above, instituted twenty-sixth of April, 1810, at that time prebendary of Nassington, in the church of Lincoln. On the death of his father, he became vicar of Nassington with Yarwell, on his own petition. In 1820, he was appointed chaplain to the Bishop of Lincoln, who promoted him to the archdeaconry of Bedford, in December, 1821. In May, 1829, he resigned the vicarage of Nassington. In June, 1837, he was made rural dean of Stamford; and in 1845, he resigned the archdeaconry of Bedford, and prebend

And then it might further be added—that our sound in prayers, praises, and thanksgivings, doth also something the like, because of its relation to the sixth property of eternal nature, which is one of the forming spirits.

Page 79. Q. ult. This expression, ignorant of the time, might give occasion to think, that they profess the angels were created in or after the days of the creation, seeing that the beginning of the first day is the beginning of time, and that before this there was no time. That therefore this might be prevented, I think this question, When were the angels created? might be thus answered.—They hold them to be created before the six days of the creation, but do not tell us how long before, rather professing themselves to be ignorant thereof.

Further, in this answer it would be most proper to declare a little plainer, and more significantly, the difference between their fire and light, for to lay thereby a foundation for what is to follow after, seeing that very much dependeth hereupon, viz.—fire was absolutely their propriety, which they could not lose, it was their own nature, which could not be taken from them without their ceasing to be creatures; but creatures they could not cease to be after they once were created. But light was not so their own propriety, it was but their inheritance, given them for a portion by their Father, who would have them to be creatures after his own image, and who would not have taken it from them if they had continued obedient sons. Which inheritance therefore, they could lose, without losing their created nature.

Page 81. Q. 1. I think this question ought to be formed a little otherwise. For (1.) they had not a law which could properly be said to be given them; seeing that this implieth their having been creatures before this law was given, when this law was rather natural unto them, inseparable from their being creatures, innate in them, or born with them in their becoming creatures. As soon as they can be conceived as intellectual creatures, their intellect must be conceived also as sufficient to tell them, that since they had not made themselves, they were not to alter their Maker's making. And this was all their law, and their whole duty was therein comprised.

(2.) This was not a peculiar or particular law, commanding them this or that particular thing, but it was that universal law, which may rightly be called so, because, (1.) it is extended to all and every kind of understanding creatures, none of which can be created without having this law imprinted, from its very first beginning, into its intellect. And, (2.) because it is the true, eternal root and ground of all the particular laws whatsoever in this inferior world.

Page 82. It is said, God would not withstand them by anything, but by his wrath, which would have enkindled the fire in them, and then they would have fallen before they had sinned. This seems to be somewhat obscure, and to my thinking could be plainer, if it were after this or the like manner expressed,—but by his wrath, which (if thereby he would have prevented their fall) would have enkindled the fire in them; and then they had been turned out of the light before their sin was consummated. Or thus,—and then they had fallen into darkness before they had themselves extinguished their light.

Page 83. Q. 2. This question and answer (in the sense which I can find therein) goeth too far; for I understand the meaning to be, that God offered his grace after their full consummated of Nassington, for that of Lincoln, with a canonry annexed. Patron, John, tenth Earl of Westmoreland.

The church is dedicated to All Saints, and consists of a nave, aisles, transepts, and chancel, at the junction of which rises a plain pyramidal steeple, of about ninety feet in height. The length of the fabric from east to west, is one hundred and five feet, ten inches; the transepts, from north to south, fifty-eight feet, six inches; and the width of the nave and aisles is forty-four feet, seven inches. At the north-east angle of the steeple, is a pier of three semi-shafts and capitals, with several mouldings, evidently designed to support an arch; and we may reasonably believe that formerly there was a chapel on the north side of the chancel, opening into it, through the arch of which this pier was a support.

The present structure is composed of various styles of architecture, and has evidently undergone considerable change since its first erection. At the west end, may easily be traced the point of the old roof. This, with the steeple, appears to be of the twelfth century, and probably as far back as 1150. A clere story was added, apparently about the middle of the fourteenth century, (1350). To this date the west window of the nave may also be referred. The chancel seems to be of the fifteenth century, and the east window of the north transept, somewhat later. It was inserted, probably, when the chapel alluded to was demolished. The steeple exhibits four semi-circular headed windows, seen from within; each divided by a rude shaft, a capital supporting the ends of two smaller arches of similar curvature. One of these is open, the others are partially walled up. It is remarkable that the arches in the basement of the steeple, are of the pointed style, which is not easily accountable, unless we may suppose that, when the character of the architecture was changed, in the fourteenth century, the workman was bold enough to insert them, in the place of others of the Norman style. The windows in the bell chamber are pointed, with nailhead and billet mouldings, divided by a slender shaft. The aisles are separated from the nave by four drop arches, of bold and well-executed mouldings, supported by octagonal piers, with ogee mouldings, and embattled capitals.

The font is circular, ornamented by quatre-feuilles enclosed in a plain circular border. This, in 1818, was surmounted by a rich cover of dark oak, in the form of an octagonal spire, crocheted, having each of its sides carved, and pierced with quatre-feuilles. On four of these are the angel, the lion, the bull, and the eagle, being emblems of the four evangelists. On the intermediate sides are a rose tree, with the legend, Sum Rosa Sharonis; a lily, with et Lilium Convallium; a vine, with Sum Vitis et vos Palmetes; and a rock, with water springing from it, having the sun rising over it, and Venite ad istas aquas.

The open or free seats are terminated by panels, with good tracery of oak, brought from the church at Fotheringhay, in 1818. The materials of which the desk and pulpit are composed, are similar, and were brought also from the church of Fotheringhay, at the same time. On the seventeenth of May, 1841, Lord Exeter conveyed a piece of land, for the enlargement of the churchyard.

In the year 1668, John Thorpe, Esquire, of this place, at his own expense, erected three hou-fall, and (according to the foregoing question) after they were actually turned out, which cannot be so conceived. For they had then already hardened and shut up themselves fully, so that they were no more capable of hearing the gracious voice of God. Though this cannot be denied, that the love and grace stood then as it stands to this day, over against them in its own principle, and would be ready to take them in, if they were to accept of it, by dying to their own fire-will, and turning into meekness and humility.

Q. 3. In the words, over God's meek love and light, which they despised, the words and light must needs be left out. For though it is rightly said they would rule over love and light, yet light cannot be connected with the following words, which they despised, seeing that they intended not to go out from the light, but rather to continue therein, and to make it greater, brighter, and more glorious than it was, that so their dominion might be the more exalted, and the majesty of their prince made more adorable, and so they did not (directly) despise it. But the love, meekness, humility, obedience, conformity with their brethren, and all that was not agreeing or conformable to the strength and might of fire in own will, they despised, thinking all this too low and contemptible for such mighty lords.

Page 85. Q. 2. § 1. Three things I may here observe, though but of small importance. (1.) The prince of it is now, since his fall called Lucifer, but before it he had another name, which is not known. (2.) He was absolutely the most glorious angel, because of his representing the Son, who is the brightness of the Father's glory. (3.) If by the fall is understood his being cast out from the light, we cannot well say, he fell first, for they were turned out altogether; but if the meaning be, that he began first to turn away from the meekness and obedience, it is true that he fell first away from it, for he was the centre and principle of this motion or insurrection in all his subjects, and none of them could have made such a beginning of apostasy.

Ibid. § 3. Their fight consisted in their opposing each other. This I think might be nearer and more significantly declared by saying—that it consisted in a magical operation, wherein they raised up the powers of eternal nature against each other. For the holy angels made use of the holy light-powers in a divine magia, and the devils contrariwise. This fight, saith Behmen, cannot be understood, but by the spirit (of a believer) in his own experience.

Page 87. Q. ult. A. Yes: they suppose according to Scripture, 1st, That God is love and light. 2ndly, That God's is also fire and might, together with its hidden root of darkness. And 3rdly, That darkness, fire, and light are all three requisite to make up a creature after the image and likeness of God. And now upon these premises they say—that which came out of God, viz., out of love and light, cannot be capable of such a state of damnation; but as it is his free gift, so it returneth unto the giver, when the creature severeth itself from it by turning its will and obedience away therefrom. But that which came out of God's fire and might remaineth in such a case alone, and cannot be lost, because it is the creature's natural propriety, or that which makes it to be a creature. And this now, seeing it consists all of moving, stirring and active properties, cannot but work according to its own internal nature and essences. Which working is nothing else but a sensible manifestation of its own natural propriety, made in, and to, and by the creature itself.

ses in Park-street, for the habitations of three poor persons, who have been, time out of mind, placed therein by the rector; the churchwardens keeping the houses in repair, at the expense of the parish. On the side towards the street, upon a tablet, is the following inscription, coeval with the building: (in separate lines) ÆDIFICAVIT CHARITAS. INHABITABIT PAUPERAS. ORNABIT HONESTAS. DURABIT OMNIS ÆTAS. EX DONO JOHANNIS THORPE ARM: ANNO 1668.

To the inhabitants of these houses, Mrs. Hestor Gibbon, (aunt to the historian) who died in June, 1790, left by will three hundred pounds. It was bequeathed to a Mr. William Law, senior, of King's Cliffe, and his son, Mr. William Law, junior, then of Stamford, (afterwards of King's Cliffe), attorney-at-law, in trust, to place out the same at interest, or in government security, and to pay the said interest weekly, to the poor women in Thorpe's almshouses. And she directed that when either of the trustees should die, the other should choose one in his place. It does not appear that the money was so vested; and both trustees died without filling up the trust. But the successors of Mr. William Law, junior, in Mrs. Gibbon's property at King's Cliffe, regularly pay the interest weekly.

To this bequest must be added the interest of one hundred pounds stock, 3 per cent. consolidated annuities, left to these almswomen, by will, dated 1804, by Mrs. Ann de Rippe, of London; which is regularly paid by her executor, Mr. Lawrence Redhead.

In the year 1688, Mr. Richard Wildbore gave five pounds per annum, for the teaching of eight of the poorest boys, born and resident in this parish, to read and write; and charged a tenement in Park-street, and a close, called "Willowbed," for the payment of it for ever.

In the year 1727, the Rev. WILLIAM LAW, formerly Fellow of Emanuel College, Cambridge, a native of this town, (the subject of our especial notice,) founded a school for the education and full clothing of fourteen poor girls of King's Cliffe, with a salary for the mistress to instruct them in reading, knitting, and useful kinds of needlework. He afterwards built a school-house and school, and two tenements for two poor old unmarried women or widows of King's Cliffe, with a weekly allowance. He appointed the same trustees, as will be mentioned hereafter in the account of Mrs. Hutcheson's charity, and vested in them the school-house, almshouses and premises, and a freehold estate at Northorpe, in Lincolnshire. He gave also to the trustees a small collection of books, part of which is for the use of the inhabitants of King's Cliffe, and its neighbourhood, and the other part for the clergy; the audit room in the house of the master of Mrs. Hutchinson's school, being fitted up for the books.

In 1745, Mrs. Elizabeth Hutcheson, widow of Archibald Hutcheson, of London, esquire, founded a school in this town, for the education and full clothing of eighteen poor boys of the town of King's Cliffe, (since increased to twenty), with a salary for a master to teach them reading, writing, and the useful parts of arithmetic.

Mrs. Hutcheson afterwards bought a house for the master, built a school-room, and four tenements adjoining it, for four old and poor widows of the town of King's Cliffe; each of whom have also a weekly allowance of money. For the maintenance of these charities, she appointed seven

And this manifestation now, is that which we call such a state of damnation, and which this creature must naturally and of all necessity be capable of, because it cometh not upon it from without, but is raised by itself out of its own ground, and is only a discovery of itself, as of that which the Creator would have hidden from the creature, by his free gift of light, and would have glorified it in his love, as it is so in himself, or in his own eternal nature. To say therefore, that a substance which came out of God's fire and might, can be capable of such a state of damnation, is to say nothing more than this, that a rebellious creature is capable of losing the free gift of love and light, and of feeling what its own essential nature is, if separated therefrom, and living in and to itself. Which self-living and self-working is for all that, good in its kind and order, forasmuch as it must serve for the manifestation of God's honour, glory, truth, and justice, though it is the greatest evil, viz., of punishment, to the creature.

Page 89. Q. 3. Here, either in or after § 3, could most properly be added, according to Behmen—that the dark own-will of the devils, being entirely united to, co-essenced and con-substantiated with, and captivated by the dark world, cannot turn into God's light and the meekness of his love; because the dark world hath got such a mighty life, will and government, and no life can be for its own death, neither can any government desire or promote its own destruction.

And if then further another question should be formed, as an objection taken from man, who, notwithstanding his fall, can turn, and can ardently desire and pray that his own dark will in him may be slain and subdued, and utterly extirpated by the light and love of God; this could be answered sufficiently by shewing the differences between man's and the devil's fall, as also chiefly between this outward world's, and the dark world's condition, state, and properties.

Page 91. Line 3. This expression, passing away of the new heavens and the new earth, after the end of this world, depends, I suppose, upon a peculiar apprehension not understood by me. Wherefore then, I can indeed say nothing against it; but I can also not approve of it, finding it (as to that sense I can now see therein) inconsistent with Behmen's ground.

Page 91. Line 8. If these words, actually force their wills, were set in an answer, so that I could apprehend them to be your own words, I would humbly beg of you, Sir, to change them into these or the like,—Whether God will ever, in any space of eternity, find out, in his infinite wisdom, an expedient for their restoration into the light? Which expression would answer the purpose as much as that other can. But seeing those words stand in a question, and are, as I suppose, the proper expression of that person who said lately, He may do so if he pleases, etc., they can perhaps not well be altered. Yet in the following answer, something might be said for a correction. For this is certain, that he who useth this expression of forcing their wills, whosoever he be, is altogether unacquainted with Behmen's ground, and cannot pretend to understand what a Will is, and especially what this will is, which here is spoken of.

Q. ult. This question and answer might give occasion to object, That if their office is to be images of the eternal fire, there seems to be a predestinating will supposed, which would have had such officers and images. This now might be prevented, if in the answer were mentioned—That they must be images and officers by the same necessity by which they must be creatures, and as trustees, chosen out of the gentry and clergy of the neighbourhood, and vested in them a freehold estate at Northorpe, in Lincolnshire; a freehold estate at Aslackton, in Nottinghamshire; and several parcels of land at King's Cliffe, including the site of the charities. These charities combined, are entitled LAW'S AND HUTCHESON'S CHARITIES, and are kept up with regularity by the trustees, of whom the rector of King's Cliffe is entitled to be one, ex officio.

Mrs. Hutcheson was Elizabeth, daughter of John Lawrence, Esquire, of Lawles, in the county of Dorset. She married, in October, 1710, Col. Robert Stewart, of the island of Barbadoes, who died June, 1714. Her second husband was Archibald Hutcheson, Esq. of the Middle Temple, London, to whom she was married October 30th. 1727: he died August 15th. 1740. Mrs. Hutcheson was born March 28th. 1689, and died at King's Cliffe, January 31st. 1781; and her remains were interred at the right foot of Mr. Law's tomb, on the north side of the church-yard of this place.

The schools and almshouses are situated at the east end of the town, and consist of a house for the master, to which is attached a school room. In the parlour of the house the trustees of these charities hold their meetings, and in it also are three bookcases, containing a portion of the library of the Rev. William Law, placed there by his own desire, besides what he provided during his life time. Over the entrance into the house is this inscription: BOOKS OF PIETY ARE LENT HERE, TO THIS AND THE NEIGHBOURING TOWNS. Over the school-room door is engraven: DEO ADJUVANTE. 1749.

On the same premises are four of the almshouses, and on a tablet in the centre of the front of them, these words: VIDUARUM HOSPITIUM. 1749.

These were all founded by Mrs. Hutcheson; and on the opposite side of the street is that part of the charity which was founded by Mr. Law, having a schoolmistress's house, in which is the school room. Over the entrance is this inscription: CHARITATE SACRUM. 1752. On the same premises are two almshouses, with these words on a tablet, AD USUM INUPITARUM VEL VIDUARUM. 1754.

Among the inhabitants of this place, as already observed, the most memorable was the Rev. WILLIAM LAW, the founder of the school and almshouses already mentioned. The name of Law occurs in the early registers of the parish, and it is probable that the family resided here some time prior to 1590, the date at which the register of the parish commences. At that time, it appears there were four families of the same name, inhabitants of King's Cliffe; William, Thomas, Robert, and Giles. It cannot be stated precisely from which of these he was descended, but most probably from Thomas, the son of George Law, who is styled, "gentleman," baptized 30th. May, 1626, as it appears, that his grandfather, as well as his father, bore that christian name. Their arms, on a token, dated 1659, are, field ermine, charged with a chevron.

His father, who was baptized 25th. Sept. 1657, was a grocer and chandler, and carried on an extensive business in a house which he himself had built, on the north side of the principal street, in the centre of the town. His mother was Margaret, the daughter of a Mr. Farnery, of Lincolnshire. [It is not beyond probability, that he intended to raise a monument of honor and affection to his worthy father, in drawing the character of Paternus in the Serious Call, as also to his widowed they could not lose in their fall their being creatures, so neither could they their being images and having offices; but since they would not bear that holy image and office in God's love and light, they must now bear that in his wrath. And then I would not absolutely say, an image of the eternal fire, but rather of the dark eternal fire; that so it might not be understood of the first principle, from which they are cast out, though it is so also well enough expressed, for any one that hath understanding, and is acquainted with Behmen's style.

Page 93. Q. 1. To the words, it is their work to transform themselves, could be added, according to Behmen, into manifold terrible shapes, and the more monstrous they can make themselves, to ridicule thereby the holy, simple, angelical image, the more they take delight therein; as players, and indeed all kinds of mountebanks, in this third principle.

Q. 2. Seeing that only the two first lines of this answer, do relate to the question, and all the rest is a digression from it, and seeing also that this is a question of importance, I think there might be made some mention of—their considering the different properties and inclinations predominant in men, and then assailing them accordingly, by raising up with their pernicious magical imaginations, such powers and properties of darkness as they find most fit, for to dart by them into their dark and astral minds, such thoughts, lusts and desires, as they know are most agreeable to their several natural constitutions.

Page 95. A. 1. Here it will be objected that the description of Moses, and the tradition of all nations, say something indeed of a dark, confused chaos, but do not tell us that the same came to be so by the fall of Lucifer, for Moses beginneth only with a work of God, saying expressly, In the beginning God created, etc. Wherefore then, that this might be prevented, and also that a more exact order might be observed, I think something could be inserted, and the construction a little altered, that it might be thus,—all the order, beauty, light, and glory of the seventh passive form in their kingdom, which all depended upon a harmonious love-wrestling of the six active spirits, must needs have been spoiled, wasted, extinguished, made desolate, and all turned into a dark, confused chaos, by their great disorder, strife, and opposition. Every war between two mighty potentates in this world, as it hath taken its original from hence, so it can be more or less a plain representation hereof. And that there was such a desolate state in the beginning of time, we see from the description of Moses, and the unanimous tradition of all nations, etc.

Page 97. A. 1. This description saith indeed something of the chaotic state, as to the invisible things of the angelical kingdom; but it saith nothing thereof as to the visible things, which yet are to come into the chiefest consideration. For therein were the sad effects of Lucifer's revolting (See AURORA, Chapt. xvi. and xvii.), and the disorder and strife of the invisible properties was but the cause thereof. The six active forms are the invisibles of this kingdom, which are perpetually generating; but that which properly by Behmen is called the kingdom itself, or the seventh passive form, and the innumerable multiplicity and variety of things generated therein by the six, are the visible things (viz., to the angelical eyes). And therein chiefly the chaotic state cometh into consideration, as in Moses's description also may be seen, who speaketh only of the mother, in that of Eusebia in the same work, keeping also De Chantal, and other saints in his eye.]

He had three brothers older than himself, George, baptized Feb. 22nd. 1681, who succeeded to his father's business; Thomas, baptized Jan. 7th. 1683; and Giles, baptized Oct. 16th. 1685. WILLIAM was the fourth son, and was baptized Feb. 3rd. 1687. He had other brothers younger than himself, Nathaniel, Benjamin, Farmery, and Christopher. The names of his sisters were Isabel, Margaret, and Ann, the first of whom was the eldest of the family, and died soon after her birth, in 1679, and Ann died 1696, according to the dates in the parish register of King's Cliffe.

Having acquired a competent knowledge of the learned languages, LAW was admitted into Emanuel College, Cambridge, June 7th. 1705, where he took the degrees of Bachelor, and Master of Arts, and was elected into a Fellowship in 1711, in consequence of which he entered into Holy Orders. He retained his Fellowship until 1716, when, by refusing to take the oath of allegiance to King George the First, he forfeited his Fellowship, and all prospect of advancement in the church.

On that occasion he addressed the following letter, which is now in existence, to his eldest brother, George:—"Dear Brother,—If your affairs will permit you to peruse the intent of this letter, you will oblige the affectionate writer.

I have sent my mother such news, as I am afraid she will be too much concerned at, which is the only trouble for what I have done. I beg of you therefore, to relieve her from such thoughts, and contribute what you can to satisfy her about my affairs. It is a business that I know you love, and therefore don't doubt but you will engage in it.

My prospect indeed is melancholy enough, but had I done what was required of me to avoid it, I should have thought my condition much worse. The benefits of my education seem partly at an end, but that same education had been more miserably lost, if I had not learnt to fear something more than misfortunes.

As to the multitude of swearers, [those who took the oath of allegiance to George I.] that has no influence upon me; their reasons are only to be considered, and every one knows no good ones can be given, for people swearing the direct contrary to what they believe.

Would my conscience have permitted me to have done this, I should stick at nothing, where my interest was concerned; for what can be more heinously wicked, than heartily to wish the success of a person upon the account of his right, and at the same time in the most solemn manner, in the presence of God, and as you hope for mercy, swear that he has no right at all. If any hardships of our own, or the example of almost all people can persuade us to such practice, we have only the happiness to be in the broad way.

I expected to have had a greater share of worldly advantages than what I am now likely to enjoy; but am fully persuaded, that if I am not happier for this trial it will be my own fault. Had I brought myself into troubles by my own folly, they would have been very trying, but I thank God can think of these without dejection.

Your kindness for me, may perhaps incline you to wish I had done otherwise; but as I think I have consulted my best interest by what I have done, I hope, upon second thoughts, you will visible material things; whereby yet the invisibles are not excluded, for their disorder and strife raised by Lucifer, was the only true cause thereof, which Moses mentioneth not.

And further, there are also in this description, several such expressions as cannot be maintained, for instance, may be this one only, Darkness hath overspread the whole face of that dark or abyssal region. When it should rather have been said—the whole face of the outmost generation, or of the holy, pure, and crystalline materiality. Wherefore then, I should think this description might be shorter as to the invisible things, and as to the visible something should be added, that it might stand in such or the like form :

A. They mean, that the invisible things of that kingdom were in a divided and confused state, nay, even quite turned upside down ; the darkness being now predominant, manifest, and outermost, the fire more, and the light more deeply hidden in their several centres, so that none of these three could do its proper office ; which was now directly contrary to that state wherein they stood before. And consequently also, that all the visible things, generated in this kingdom by the six invisible properties, were thereby utterly spoiled, ruined, wasted, deprived of all the former order, harmony, proportion, beauty, purity, and transparency, and were violently condensed, and made all gross, hard, and rough, by the sharp, harsh, astringent properties of nature, now prevalent and qualifying them, according to their own nature.

Page 97. A. 2. Instead of the last words, This whole kingdom would have been soon so condensed, etc. I think the two reasons which Behmen giveth, could properly be added, viz. (1.) This kingdom was not Lucifer's propriety, but only his inheritance, which he had under condition of obedience. Why then should it not have been taken away from him, by God, the only true proprietor ? (2.) This kingdom, viz. the seventh form, had not committed any fault, but was only passive, according to its nature, and must have suffered all those violent acts of its robbers and murderers. Why then should it have been forsaken by God, so as not to be restored into its former state ?

Page 99. A. 1. Seeing that this expression, into a new order, is ambiguous, and can be understood of another order different from the former, when it is rather the former order itself, only renewed, or restored at least in part : seeing further, that this renewing is so coherent with the breathing forth, that it cannot be conceived (at least, not wholly) as a peculiar act, done by itself, before this breathing forth ; but as a thing done gradually and successively, during the days of the creation, though the first beginning thereof or disposition thereto, may be conceived as before it. And seeing, thirdly, that two or three things more in the following words might give rise to scruples, I think this answer would be less exposed to objections, if it were formed in this or in the like manner :

A. They say that God, restoring the invisibles of this kingdom into their order and union, (yet so that darkness and fire kept each of them its own awakened life and power, though under some restraint,) spoke or breathed forth out of them gradually, by his eternal Word and Spirit, in conjunction with them, an exterior and inferior degree of government ; answering indeed, unto that former, but having now a twofold source, and being settled only for a certain time, which when fulfilled, this kingdom shall be fully delivered and restored into its former state. And that further, think so too.

I have hitherto enjoyed a large share of happiness ; and if the time to come be not so pleasant, the memory of what is past shall make me thankful.

Our lot is fallen in an age that will not be without more trials than this. God's judgments seem now to be upon us, and I pray God they may have their proper effect.

I am heartily glad your education does not expose you to the same hardships that mine does, that you may provide for your family without the expence of conscience, or at least what you think so ; for whether you are of the same opinions with me or not, I know not.

I shall conclude as I began, with desiring you to say as many comfortable things as you can to my mother ; and persuade her to think with satisfaction upon that condition, which upon my account, gives me no uneasiness, which will much oblige your affectionate brother,—W. Law.¹⁷

The sober and devout character of his parental training, and the serious turn of his mind in early years, may be gathered from the following documents found amongst his papers, in his own hand-writing. The first of which, headed RULES FOR MY FUTURE CONDUCT, was probably, drawn up by him, on entering the University ; and the latter during his residence there, and on his taking holy Orders. The former document thus proceeds :—

I.—To fix it deep in my mind, that I have but one business upon my hands, to seek for eternal happiness, by doing the will of God.

II.—To examine everything that relates to me in this view, as it serves or obstructs this only end of life.

III.—To think nothing great or desirable, because the world thinks it so ; but to form all my judgments of things from the infallible Word of God, and direct my life according to it.

IV.—To avoid all concerns with the world, or the ways of it, but where religion and charity oblige me to act.

V.—To remember frequently, and impress it upon my mind deeply, that no condition of this life is for enjoyment, but for trial ; and that every power, ability, or advantage we have, are all so many talents to be accounted for, to the Judge of all the world.

VI.—That the greatness of human nature consists in nothing else but in imitating the Divine nature. That therefore all the greatness of this world, which is not in good actions, is perfectly beside the point.

VII.—To remember, often and seriously, how much of time is inevitably thrown away, from which I can expect nothing but the charge of guilt ; and how little there may be to come, on which an eternity depends.

VIII.—To avoid all excess in eating and drinking.

IX.—To spend as little time as I possibly can, among such persons as can receive no benefit from me, nor I from them.

X.—To be always fearful of letting my time slip away without some fruit.

XI.—To avoid all idleness.

XII.—To call to mind the presence of God, whenever I find myself under any temptation to accordingly from hence all the visible things of it were generated, and fashioned indeed after their former kind, but in that mixture wherein we see them to this day. Which whole exterior, temporal government, they call therefore an outbirth, a mixed third principle, and, with a peculiar respect to the visibles, a coagulated breath or smoke from the eternal darkness, fire, and light. So that this whole macrocosm may be conceived as a kind of appurtenance or accident of the whole eternal nature, considered as in its manifested division into three.

Page 101. Q. 1. How many mixtures, etc. Seeing that every mixture implieth, or requireth at least two things, and that the four after-mentioned parts cannot be said to make four mixtures, but only one mixture made up of four things, I think it would be more proper if this question were formed thus—How many things, do they suppose, this mixture in the things of this world, consisteth of? Or also thus—How many different things, do they suppose, may be found in this mixture, by chemical operation separating, or, as it were, anatomising the things of this world?

§ 20. by the devil and man's sin. Here it is to be observed, that man's sin did not introduce the wrath or root of evil into the things of this world, but only the curse: which is to say only, that he caused the blessing, viz. paradise's penetrating and greening forth through the earth, to cease and to withdraw; whereby then, that wrath and root of evil, which laid therein before, and was introduced thereto by the devil only, but was hitherto kept under by the paradise, must needs have been enabled, or empowered to spring up and manifest itself again, etc. Wherefore then, the words, and man's sin, must either be left out wholly, or the whole sense must be thus expressed—introduced into them by the devil, and awakened again by the sin of man.

Page 101. Q. ult. Seeing that this question expressly asketh, From whence all the mixed things arise, and adds further—as from their first root, I cannot see that a sufficient answer can be taken from the seven properties of temporal nature only. For the seven spirits of eternal nature are rather the first, or at least a deeper, though not yet the deepest root. And as to their being mixed, I think that this expression, also, might be more or less regarded in the answer. And further, when there is said, page 103, line 2, Which are supposed, etc., it seems a little ambiguous what this which is to be referred unto, whether to the seven spirits of eternal, or to the seven of temporal nature. To the former it is indeed rightly to be referred, yet so, that the latter may not be thereby excluded; for, during all the time of this world, they are inseparable from each other. And then also the last words, according to the several kinds of things, bring an obscurity along with them, and do not very well agree with what in the following question is declared, though I confess they might be reconciled therewith. For we cannot so properly say—the diverse predominancy is according to the several kinds of things; but rather to the contrary—the several kinds of things are according to the diverse predominancy, which is also in the following question plainly asserted. Wherefore then, these last mentioned words could be left out, without any hurt. Now, after this, I think it would be proper to insert this following:

Q. How do the seven properties of temporal nature differ from the seven spirits of eternal nature?
A. They differ upon one particular account, as an accident differs from its substance, or as a shadow from its body; upon another, as an offspring of lesser dignity, from its nobler original; and upon a third one, as the darker, more impotent, and unactive productions, at the extremes of the fire's spherical activity, from the most luminous and active effects, at the nearest distance of a radiant flame. Which simile was mentioned above.

Page 102. Q. 1. In the answer to this question, I would say rather thus, and think it might be more distinct and plainer:

A. From the various combinations, and greater or lesser predominancy of some of these spirits, with their inferior subordinate properties, which did form ideas from eternity, in several kinds and species. And seeing they are now all in conjunction with the eternal Word and Spirit, they must needs bring forth those ideas, according to their in part restored and re-unioned state, which they were brought into by God in the creation. In which state, they are not only themselves still breathed forth, by the eternal Word, but are also enabled thereby to breathe forth again, to form and to compact. And this their secondary, or subordinate breathing forth, considered chiefly with respect to the first compacting property, is a temporal Fiat, still remaining in all things.

Page 102. Q. 2. From what now was declared in this foregoing answer, it appears, that this question will be plainer, if thus proposed, What is that Word, which still breathes forth the diverse kinds and species of things? For if there is said only—breathes them forth, it will be dubious whesin, and to have immediate recourse to prayer.

XIII.—To think humbly of myself, and with great charity of all others.

XIV.—To forbear from all evil speaking.

XV.—To think often of the life of Christ, and propose it as a pattern to myself.

XVI.—To pray, privately, thrice a day, besides my morning and evening prayers.

XVII.—To keep from _____ as much as I can, without offence.

XVIII.—To spend some time in giving an account of the day, previous to evening prayer: how have I spent this day? what sin have I committed? what temptations have I withstood? have I performed all my duty?" The remaining documents are as follows:—

I.—A PRAYER of deep humiliation.—“I will arise and go to my Father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven and against thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. Behold me here, Lord, a poor miserable sinner, weary of myself, and afraid to look up to thee; humbly begging to be fed with the crumbs that fall from thy table.”

Whilst all thy faithful servants are on this day, offering to thee the comfortable sacrifice of the body and blood of Christ, and feasting at that holy table, which thou hast ordained for the refreshment, joy, and comfort of their souls; I, unhappy wretch, full of guilt, am justly denied any share of these comforts that are common to the christian world.

O God, I thus judge myself, that I may not be judged; I thus condemn myself, that I may not be condemned.

Sanctify, O Lord, I beseech thee, this punishment to the benefit of my soul; that by thy blessing, it may take away my guilt, heal my sores, take out the stains, deliver me from the shame, and rescue me from the tyranny of sin.

Oh, Lord of mercy, how miserable, how fallen, that I dare not approach that altar, where is the ther these things, or whether the properties themselves of temporal nature are meant. And to this question now I would answer thus :

A. It is that same eternal Word which breathed them forth in the beginning, yet not considered as in that manifest and perceptible act, which was done in the days of the creation, and entered into rest at the end thereof; but as in its secret continuing in and with all things, upholding, and still enabling them (by the powers, either of eternal or temporal nature, or by both of them together,) to increase and multiply, according to their kind.

[That word, Be fruitful and multiply, was not an outward sounding speech, but an internal living power, going forth and communicating something like unto itself, though but as in a shadowy resemblance, and according to the creature's capacity. Which communicated power is but transient and perishable, like as the creature is itself: when that which hath communicated it, is constant, fixed, and permanent, and is even that, without the continuing of which in and with all things, nothing could subsist. Whereof the Scripture says, He upholdeth all things by the Word of his power; and again, Thy (according to the German translation) untransitory Spirit is in all things.]

Page 103. A. 1. I think it might be here very proper, if not necessary, to say—that as the seven planets and fixed stars are such representations above, so the seven metals and minerals are also the same below. For our earth, being made up of the grossest excrements, or most corrupted matter gathered from all the corners of this wasted kingdom, and compacted into one globe, must needs have in it something, answering to what is, besides it, finer, and more subtle or ethereal, in the whole region. And this is certainly the ground (though some other reasons, no less considerable, might be given of that saying of Hermes, Id quod est inferius est sicut id quod est superius.

Concerning now, the following description of the three first properties, I have nothing to say of importance; but shall only gather from Behmen, what I may find here or there is attributed unto each of them. If it might serve, for to insert this or that particular thing, significant expression or circumstance, it would be well and profitable; and if not, no hurt can be done thereby. As to the first, then, (Page 103. A. ult.) Behmen useth the words, of a spiritual sharpness, harshness, grossness, darkness, etc. and sayeth that of these three, (sal, sulphur, and mercury, commonly, by natural philosophers, called the three principles of things,) the first, viz. sal, is this same first property. Whereof he sayeth also, that it is the greatest and most potent, the beginning of strength and might, the Fiat (though never as by itself alone), and the keeper of all things; a drying and shutting up into death; a taking in unto self, and a true mother of selfishness; a cause of sound, noise, etc.; the beginning of every formation; a magnetism, or magnetical impression and coagulation of itself, filling and darkening itself, etc.

(Page 105. Q. 1.) This second quality is the motion of the magnetical drawing in; a cause of all creatural life, a trembling, stinging bitterness, or a stinger, stirrer, rager, and breaker; the cause of the essences; the beginning of enmity, and of all contrariety, and also of all qualification; the cause of distinction, speech, intellect, five senses, etc. This spirit (N.B.) is restless (or rather the restlessness itself), and is yet the seeker after rest, making its own unquietness by its very seeking. It is a ground of bitter woe, and yet the true root of life; and the vulcanus, striking the fire (viz. of or to the life). It is a cause of all sensibility and feeling; a ground of the air, in the outward world: it is the outflow moveable word; and in the creation this was the separator or divider in the powers.

(Page 105. Q. 2.) This third quality makes the triangle in nature, and is a whirling wheel, taken in, and as it were swallowing up into death the bitter essences, but giving forth out of it another life. A cause of death and life, and of the twofold fire, viz. of the first and second principle. Its proper name is anguish; its qualification, wrath and anger; and its materiality, sulphur. It hath a twofold fire in it, viz. a cold and a hot one, and is the devil's chiefest seat. Without the light it is the true foundation of hell; and in the light the cause of eternal joy, etc.

Considering, Sir, that this matter, concerning the three first properties, is of so great importance, so fundamental, and hath so much depending upon it, I cannot but recommend to your consideration, whether it would not be necessary, that several things thereof more distinctly and circumstantially, and even so might be declared, that always the things, belonging more properly and immediately to eternal nature, were placed first, and that then a descent were made to temporal only atonement of sin! God be merciful to me, who am such a sinner that I dare not to plead the only atonement for sin!

O God, spare me, according to thy mercy. Oh, spare me, and let me live to enjoy thy future mercy. Cut me not off in the midst of my sins, but let me live to seek and enjoy again the light of thy countenance. Let me be again amongst thy redeemed ones, eating and drinking at thy table, and partaking of my full share of that atonement for the sins of the whole world.

Oh that I were but a doorkeeper in the house of my God, that I might sit but amongst the lowest of thy servants, that I might but eat the crumbs which fall from thy table!

But, O my God, I am an unclean worm, a dead dog, a stinking carcase, justly removed from that society of saints who this day kneel about thine altar. But, oh, suffer me to look toward thy holy sanctuary; suffer my afflicted soul to long to be in the place where thine honour dwelleth.

Let me be blessed and sanctified, as thou blessedst those that lament in sackcloth and ashes. Reject not the sacrifice of a broken and contrite heart, and do thou be with me in secret, though I am not fit to appear in thy public worship.

Extend the atonement of thy Son's blood to me, a forlorn creature; and let not my sins utterly separate me from thy mercy in Christ Jesus.

O God, preserve me for times of peace and pardon, and let me live to be again alive in Christ. Raise me up, I beseech thee, from this state of misery and penance, that I may be a child of the light and the day.

O God, let me never see such another day as this. Let me never again be so oppressed with guilt, as to run away from thy presence, and be forced to abstain from the society of thy children.

Let the dreadful punishment of this day never be out of my mind, that I may henceforth live in a state of repentance and godly fear; so as never again to fall from any comfort in Christ Jesus, nature, and further to the grossest outbirth thereof; that so confusion might be the more avoided, and the connexion plainer might appear. I mean, that there might be declared—how strictly and inseparably these three are united, and make an indissoluble band, notwithstanding all their great contrarieties. That the second must necessarily be always and everywhere with the first; and that the first cannot be conceived without the second; as no attraction can be, nor be conceived, without conceiving a motion, etc. How the third ariseth from the first and second, and is a mixture of them both; and why it must necessarily whirl about, etc. That these three are always to be combined with the other three, if those particular effects or products, that are attributed by Behmen either unto the first, or second, or third, or also sometimes unto two, if not unto all three of them shall be understood. And that so therefore, the first belongeth to, and is accomplished in the seventh; the second in the sixth, and the third in the fifth, etc. Such, and the like particulars, I am sure, are absolutely necessary for an understanding of the Seven properties, according to Behmen's mind.

Page 107. Q. ult. Where and how doth this water spirit arise? A. It ariseth in the light, and is that same, which before the light was called harshness. The manner of its arising is this—when the fire in the three first dark properties is enkindled, it makes in them a (twofold) great crack, or terror, called so with respect to sensible creatures, which, if it were done so in them, could not but feel the greatest terror. This harshness then, being thus terrified, (in the second crack) loseth immediately, or, as it were, dieth to its former nature, and is made soft and thin, and qualified according to the meek and tender properties of the light; wherein it is now the water spirit, or that whose immediate production in the spiritual materiality is water.

Page 108. Q. What do they mean by the sweetness of the water? A. They mean, that tinctured and transmuted quality, with relation especially to the spiritual taste, which now the water hath in the light, in opposition to that, which it had before in the first harshness: and they distinguish thereby the water of light and life, from that of death and darkness.

Page 111. A. 1. The words, arising from these seven spirits, might be looked upon as inconsistent with what was declared above; and though it could indeed be reconciled, yet this would only make way for several other questions, and cause a digression. Wherefore, I think they might be left out, the more, because they are not absolutely necessary, and the sense is full enough without them.

A. 2. It is indeed rightly said, this mercurial spirit. But seeing that this denomination of this sixth spirit, depends chiefly upon an union with the second, before the light, which commonly by Behmen is called Mercury, when this sixth is Jupiter, unto some this expression will be obscure, and others might say that a mistake is committed. Wherefore, I am of opinion, that either this word mercurial might be left out, or something might be added, whereby this obscurity could be taken away, and needless objections prevented. And then, it will not be well enough to say only—those things sound most which have this spirit in them, seeing that it was owned just before, that all things have it in them. Wherefore, it must needs be more proper to say—most in them, or— which have it sufficiently stirring in them, etc.

Page 111. A. 3. In which they work the work of God. Nothing indeed can be said against this manner of expression; yet I am apt to think, it would be more expressive in this place, if there were said—in which they do, by their working, unfold and manifest in forms and figures, the hidden powers of God's central all-sufficiency, Page 115. A. in conjunction with his will (which they call the fiat). This, I think, is not plainly enough expressed; for it might be apprehended so, as if the will (alone) were called by them the fiat, which it is not, as it was observed before. And then, instead of will, I would rather say, eternal Word. Because here is not spoken of a purpose, but of the execution thereof, or of a present act and deed, which the will may be conceived indeed as antecedent unto; but the Word is rightly conceived as nearer, and as actually engaged therein. And therefore the Word (in that conjunction) more properly than the will, was the fiat in actu; whereby yet the will is not excluded, but manifestly presupposed.

Ibid. (which they take to be the meaning of the word created.) This might justly be put in after the words, compacting its earth, for as it stands before them, it doth but misrepresent their meaning. Seeing that by the word created, they do not understand—he prepared the chaotic angelical world, which is a more general expression, but they understand precisely this compacting.

but may be ready, amongst thy faithful people, to offer the glad sacrifice of joy and thanksgiving, and to plead the great atonement for the sins of the whole world.

Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. Lord, speak but the word, and thy servant shall be cleansed.

O Lord, I am destitute, afflicted, bound in sins, and banished from thy presence. I approach thee with fear and trembling. I may not come to thy table, but suffer me, I beseech thee, to touch the hem of thy Son's garment.

O God, let this punishment fill my soul with deep humility, that, seeing myself thus separated from thy faithful servants, and denied a share in that bread of life, which is common to all christians, I may look upon myself as the least and unworthiest of all thy servants! That I may never dare to prefer myself to any one, or censure or despise any of my brethren; but may always humble myself with this reflection, that I have lately been forbid to shelter myself under the altar, and not suffered to hide myself amongst those holy crowds which offer to thee the sacrifice of thy dear Son.

Oh, let no vain thoughts, no proud imagination of my own worth, ever enter again into my soul; but let me consider all orders of christians who are now pleading the merits of the body and blood of Christ, as much my superiors, being admitted to the most glorious part of thy worship; whilst I poor sinner, am calling for thy mercy by myself.

But oh, my God, thou that art the God of all thy creatures, accept of a broken and contrite heart, and be not angry with me for ever."

II.—A PRAYER, for the destruction of the evil, bestial and serpentine properties of the old Adam, and the quickening of the divine Spirit of the Second Adam, in the soul.—"O most Holy and adorable God, be merciful unto me, I humbly beseech thee, a poor miserable, helpless creature; tied Ibid. And its heaven—into a state of purity. I cannot see that it is fit or proper to say—heaven was compacted into a state of purity.

For (1.) the word compacted is more fit for the earth, than for heaven, which might rather be said to have been condensed, (or if there is any such other more pertinent expression) for to show the difference between heaven and earth. Which two could not have been equally capable of the same degree of condensation or compaction. And (2.) heaven cannot be said to be—condensed into a state of purity. Because this purity doth not depend directly upon its creation or condensation (which selfsame word impleth already something of impurity, forasmuch as it is a changing from its former state into another, made upon such a sad account), but only upon its being, as it were, swept and cleansed from those gross impurities that were scattered up and down everywhere. Which when gathered and compacted in one place, the rest of this region was free from them, and became more fit for to receive another shape and condition, much inferior to its former. And this only is meant by Behmen, when he speaketh of that state, which the English interpreter hath expressed by purity.

Page 116. A. 1. To the last words, which there was not before, I think most pertinently could be added something of what over against p. 117, is blotted out, viz.—and that they might be a habitation, fitted and prepared for those innumerable kinds of creatures, that were to be in them.

Page 117. A. 2. All this is right and true, what herein is declared: only this may be observed, That not only the compaction into palpable materiality in particular, but also more generally, the whole condensation or outbreathing, coagulated into another inferior kind of grosser substance though never so fine in comparison to the earth, was that proper means, by which the devil's power was broken, his kingdom taken from him, and he disabled to exercise his wickedness any further therein, by his dark and false magia.

Page 118. That it might be a principle, existing in itself. Seeing that this denomination of a principle, in its full sense, wherein Behmen usually takes it, is not applicable to the earthly globe, but to the whole macrocosm, I think it would be more tolerable, if it were a little limited, by saying—that it might be as a principle in some sense existing in itself; for in every sense it cannot be said that it exists in itself.

Page 119. Q. 1. This answer also is right and true enough, but only the two last lines thereof may be called obscure, and might easily be made plainer, and more freed from objections. For they do not say nor mean, that the earth was restored into a tolerable state, directly, or only by its revolutions; but by the different works, effects, and products of the six active spirits, which performed in and to the earth their several operations, and concurred successively to this restoration, during the time of these revolutions.

Q. 2. Why the earth's revolution is made in a natural day, cannot well be asked nor answered. Because, if we think to ask so, we must needs presuppose an idea of the length of a natural day, before the idea of the earth's revolution, which we cannot rationally do, seeing that the earth's revolution is only that, which made from the beginning, and still makes all the natural days, determining their constant length, and that without or before it no natural day can be conceived, nor any measure of its length can be imagined. And so, this question cannot be answered any more than this, Why hath a natural day precisely such a length as it hath? Which would be the same as if we did ask, Why doth not the earth move either more swiftly or more slowly than it doth? Which nobody will presume to answer sufficiently from natural reasons. And yet even so must this question be formed, with respect to the three first revolutions, which did not yet make a natural day; and were nevertheless performed in the same space of time, which is now the proper constant length thereof.

Page 123. A. 1. If to the last words, by the motion of his Spirit, were added, upon the waters, it would be more evident that this relates to the description of Moses.

A. 2. line 1. They say, it is diffused: here I would, for my part, rather say—it was diffused, for several reasons. And after the words, became not bright and resplendent, I would add, from Behmen, but was of a blueish colour, like that of the clear firmament.

Page 127. A. 1. A dark part, which is as a firmament. Though this can stand so well enough, and could be maintained sufficiently; nay, though it may have been expressed so, by Behmen himself, which I do not exactly remember, yet I may justly observe, that it doth not represent sufficiently Behmen's sense. For, it is not properly and strictly that dark part itself, which is this and bound in chains and fetters of my own sinful tempers and passions; imprisoned in my own darkness, selfishness, earthliness, wrath, death, and hell.

Leave me not, O my God, to myself, to the disordered workings of my own corrupt nature, but look upon me according to thy love and mercy in Christ Jesus; that mine eyes may see, my heart and spirit feel and find thy salvation.

Oh, my God, break down, I beseech thee, all the works of the devil in my soul; break down all that pride, hypocrisy, and impurity have built up in me. Strip me of all false coverings, take from me all deceitful props; pluck up, as thou pleasest, only pluck up, all the depths, and roots, and branches of selfishness, self-will, self-love, self-esteem, and self-seeking: and plant in the depths and bottom of my soul a most true, and real, and essential humility, a most pure and perfect love of thee; that love and humility may be united in all my thoughts, and words, and actions, that I may be all love of thee, all humility before thee.

O Heavenly Father, touch, and penetrate, and shake, and awaken the inmost depth and centre of my soul; that all that is within me, may cry and call unto thee. Strike the flinty rock of my heart, that the water of eternal life may spring up in it. Oh, break open the gates of the great deep in my soul, that thy light may shine in upon me, that I may enter into thy kingdom of light and love, and in thy light see light.

Oh, awaken in me all that is capable of knowing thee, loving thee, and adoring thee; that I may love thee on earth as thou art loved in heaven; as saints and angels love thee, for thine own sake, because thou art that which thou art, because all is to be referred unto thee.

O Holy God of Love, help me to die to everything, both within me and without me, that hinders my living unto thee; to die all kinds of deaths, that may fit and prepare me for the life of thy Holy Spirit in me. [Behmen's Repentance tract should be rendered according to this phraseology.]

firmament; but it is rather that, whereby this dark part, with all what belongeth thereto, and dependeth thereupon, is divided and excluded from the light. It is that which chiefly makes a principle, to be called so in Behmen's sense. In some places, I think the German word is translated,—a gulf, but not significantly enough. In a rude similitude it might be represented by that point, which is in the middle of these two semicircles, (two semicircles placed back to back, and joined, through the centre of which is a cross.) But seeing that this is not fit for every one, I say again, that this expression, of a dark part, may stand so well enough.

Page 129. § 2. ideas or essences. Here I think it might be better to say, ideas and essences; that so these two might be left in a distinction, and not taken only for one and the same thing; though in a peculiar respect they may be so.

Pages 129 and 131. § 5. Concerning the description of the growing of vegetables; seeing that it is almost impossible to give in so few lines, a circumstantial and sufficient account thereof, according to Behmen's sense, I should be apt to think it better, if there were said only in general—that all the growth of vegetables cometh from the strife of the qualities of nature, raised up from without by the sun's heat, and carried on within by their own natural contrariety. And that therefore, no growth can be in the winter, when the sun is impotent, etc.

Pages 133 and 135. They say therefore in short, etc. In this description, I meet with several things which could be excepted against, and which, if they should be particularized, would but cause a prolixity, without any considerable benefit. I shall therefore, leave this alone, and set only down the order and chief circumstances of this generation; so as I think it might be best, but not pretending to give that full satisfaction which might be expected:

They say, therefore, in short: (1.) That on this fourth day, the production of the planetic orb, with all the fixed stars, being a visible outbirth and representation of the seven chief spirits, both of eternal and temporal nature, with all their inferior or subordinate qualities, was made in a manner, answering unto that which they were themselves from eternity, and still are generated in.

(2.) That the fourth spirit of eternal nature, the magic fire broke forth, and fixed its representative in the centre of our vortex, which is the sun.

(3.) That several particular circumstances, relating to the first astrigent property, and this considered both as before, and as after that saying, Let there be light, (all which they are not wanting to declare sufficiently,) are most necessary to be well understood, and considered jointly; for to be informed and convinced thereby, that this first spirit of nature, the cause of cold, produced its representative (at this enkindling of the fire) in the remotest orbit from the centre, called Saturn, which is, according to their doctrine (agreeing with that of the ancients), a cold planet.

(4.) That at the same enkindling of the fire in the sun, the fierce terrible crack, (always naturally preceding the fire's clear flame and light) was projected, or rather fled up itself from the centre, with a dreadful force, according to its own natural birth-right; and took along with it, for its substantial being, the fire's wrathfulness. And that so this ascended, until the sun's light, now rising and displaying itself, overpowered it, and stopped its raging fury. This [sphere] now they say is Mars, the third anguishing and whirling spirit's representative, whose office is to stir and move all what is moveable in this whole macrocosm, and the planetic wheel especially. [That illustration, concerning the projection of stars in fire-works, is here considerably left out, not that it were altogether unfit, but only not to give occasion for such a concept, as if a visible fiery globe were ejaculated from the sun, whereas Behmen says no such thing. It was an invisible spiritual property, whose bodily being became visible, when the light had conquered and stopped its course, and then appeared in that planet visibly, whereupon the planet's motion commenced. It would appear that Newton did not clearly apprehend the exact sense of Behmen in this point.]

(5.) That this light (considered not as to the shine or glance, but as to the power and virtue thereof) having thus stopped the course of Mars, left behind it its fierce wrathfulness, and ascended up still higher, as a soft rising life, according to its own natural right, until it came to Saturn's harsh, astrigent sphere of activity, by whose compressive power it was resisted, and made impotent of rising higher. Where it therefore remained, and made, by taking possession of that place, the fifth spirit's representative, which is Jupiter, the meekness in outward nature, and rightly therefore situated between the astrigent cold of Saturn, and the fierce fire of Mars, as a temperament betwixt them.

(6.) That when the light arose from this enkindled fire in the centre, and by this light the Drive, I beseech thee, the serpent and the beast out of me, and do thou take possession of my whole heart, soul, spirit, and body: that I may be all thine, the stringed instrument, sound, and harmony of thy Holy Spirit; united to all thy harmony in heaven and earth; willing nothing but in thy will, loving nothing but in thy love, speaking nothing, doing nothing, but what thy Holy Spirit speaketh and doeth in me.

O my God and my All, draw me unto thee, I humbly beseech thee. Oh let me hear thy Divine call always sounding in the depth of my soul. Fill me with such hunger, and thirst, and longing desire of thee; strong and lively faith in thee; pure and perfect love of thee; full and absolute resignation unto thee, as may make me capable of thy divine nature; that I may eat the heavenly flesh, and drink the heavenly blood of the blessed Saviour, and dwell in him, and he in me.

O Holy Jesus, joyful name of Love, eternal Word, and Son, and Heart, and Light, and Life, and holy Power of God! be thou incarnate in me; do thou open thyself in me, that the spirit of my soul may reach thee, and receive thee into it. I seek wholly unto thee. I desire to renounce all for thee, to live wholly unto thee, to be nothing but in thee, by thee, and through thee.

Oh, do thou inwardly call me, as thou calledst those who left all and followed thee. Touch me as thou didst those whose distempers thou healedst; awaken me as thou didst those whom thou raisedst from death. O Holy Son of God, be thou my inward atonement, my saviour, and deliverer. Without thee I am only wrath, and fire, and darkness. Oh, let thy divine birth arise in my soul, that I may be in thee a new creature, quickened and revived, led and governed, by thy Holy Spirit.

O Eternal Father of all Spirits, take the veil from off my heart; remove all that is between thee and me, all that hinders my knowledge and love of thee, the manifestation of thy Divine life, light, love, spirit, power, and holy presence in me.

first harshness was broken, the same, but transmuted, and being now the mild water spirit, sunk humbly and softly down, and made a visible representative of the fifth spirit in Venus, which they say hath an inherent light of its own* (which is asserted by some late astronomers), and tempereth the fierceness of the heat of Mars. [* as well as a borrowed one from the sun, I do not remember that Behmen saith, nor can I find it by all my enquiring.]

(7.) That this sinking went on from the property of Venus, so that the power of the first harshness, now softened in and by the light, sunk deeper down, and became a visible representative of the sixth spirit, which is Mercury.

(8.) That this sinking continued further from Mercury also, and attained its period in the Moon, which they say doth represent the seventh spirit of eternal nature, partaking of the qualities of all the others, and therefore the fitter to receive them, and transmit them to our sublunary world.

(9.) That the seven planets have a wonderful efficacy upon——, etc. Page 135.—§ 8.

Concerning the difficulty, that the planets have so gross and obscure bodies, as cannot be imagined to have been projected from the sun, it can be plain enough from this short description, that Behmen saith nothing at all of such a gross material projection, but that he describeth a spiritual generation, or displaying of the spiritual properties, which needs must have been done in this macrocosm, at the enkindling of the fire in its centre, according to the manner of their eternal generation, wherein the fire's nature and office is to display all the properties, and to make them manifest in their distinction. Seeing then, that this was now done in a manner and degree inferior to that eternal generation, viz. in a temporal principle, in circumscriptive localities and measurable distances, etc., these planets, as to their several chief qualities predominant in them, and giving them their distinct names, may well enough be said to have been projected from the sun, for as much as the enkindling of the sun was their original, or the cause of their being thus made visible in this temporal world. It is not said that the sun hath generated them, this Behmen expressly denieth. And much less is it said, that so many vast, gross, and obscure bodies, were ejaculated from the sun. But only, that at this enkindling of the fire in the sun, such and such spiritual properties were raised and stirred up, so that they moved each of them according to its own nature, some mounting up from the centre on high, and others in opposition thereto sinking down: and this as to their predominant powers and virtues. But concerning now their corporeal being, it must be supposed, that each of them got it in its own place or sphere, wherein it standeth still at such or such a proportionable distance from the centre, according to Behmen's plain words, saying, sometimes of the one or other (which cannot but be applied unto all)—they were created in that place. For if we consider what he means by created, which was declared above, it will be self-evident that this saying cannot be reconciled with that other—they were projected, if we do not understand by this latter, a descent of their spiritual properties from the centre, and by that former a compaction of their vast material bodies. If there should be objected, that there was said above, (§ 4.) Mars took along with it from the centre, the wrathfulness, as its body, etc., it is easily and solidly answered, That in such a sense it may be said even of all of them, that they took along with them this or that from the centre, for a body. But that this was only such a body, as our thoughts are bodies of the spirit in them, mentioned above, p. 113. Which kind of body each of them must have had indeed, even in the first beginning of their departing from the centre. But that this body was as then, not yet that vast, gross, obscure globe, wherein they appear to this day, is evident enough. This spiritual body therefore, was afterwards immediately created or compacted, in their several places, and according to the difference of their spirituality. So that none of them can be reasonably imagined, to be altogether alike unto our earth. Nay also, none of them can be such a one as the moon's is, which is the nearest unto earthliness, and hath a mixture of them all, notwithstanding that they all may be equally obscure in themselves, etc.

And thus, I think, the chief difficulty is sufficiently removed, so that it can be tolerable to say, in such a sense as mentioned—the planets were projected from the sun, at the enkindling of the fire in the centre, though Behmen doth never use the word projection or ejaculation, but says rather of—their own free displaying and departing from the centre (though this was caused by the fire), either by flying up or sinking down, according to the manner of their generation in eternal nature.

Page 139. § 1. manifested out of the fire of nature, etc. This manner of expression, as to my

Take from me everything that takes me away from thee, lead me into and through everything inwardly and outwardly, that may cleanse and purify me from my sins, that may fit and prepare me to be the temple and habitation of thy Holy Spirit.

Keep me, I humbly beseech thee, always before thee, in a state of inward, deep, continual prayer, and love, and adoration of thee; looking up unto thee in all things, looking at all things only as they are in thee, receiving all things as from thee, doing all things in thee and for thee, from a principle of pure and perfect love of thee, in all things absolutely resigned unto thee, every where and at all times worshipping and adoring thee in spirit, and in truth." [A model of a prayer!]

III.—A PRAYER, on entering into holy Orders.—"O Great and Holy Lord God, I am ashamed to lift up my face to thee. For mine iniquities have increased over my head, and my trespasses are waxed great unto the heavens. Since the days of my youth I am in a great trespass, even unto this day: and I cannot stand before thee for this.

O God, be merciful to me, the greatest of all sinners, who have sinned against the greatest advantages of education; against the greatest blessings of thy providence, against frequent inspirations of thy Holy Spirit, and in despite of repeated vows and promises of amendment.

I have not only the sins of common christians to lament, I have not only the guilt of breaking my baptismal covenant to deplore, but the grievous, dreadful sin of abusing, defiling and neglecting the duties of that great calling to which thy providence hath suffered me to enter.

O God, be not angry with me, for turning my eyes towards heaven.

An unclean worm, a dead dog, a stinking carcass, yet presuming to minister in holy things! Lord, how oft has thy goodness spared me! entering the holy place with impurity of heart, with vain affections, with pride and vanity; and touching the holy things with polluted hands!

O Lord, I detest and abhor myself for all these my sins; for my abuse of thy infinite mercy.

thinking, is a little ambiguous, and though it can bear a good and true sense, yet it could easily also be taken in a wrong one. Wherefore, for my part, I would say rather thus—breathed forth out of the dark and light world, and manifested by the enkindling of the fire, in the sun, as in the centre of this our vortex, etc.

§ 2. Seeing that the fixed stars are not only a representation of energies, but also energies themselves, though in an inferior degree and order than those which they are a representation of, I am apt to think it would be fit and requisite, alter the words, energies of eternal nature, to add this, or something the like—exercising in temporal nature, and after a temporal manner, the same powers and energies that are originally in eternal nature, out of which they were breathed, etc.

For though there followeth afterwards, (§ 3,) expressly enough, that they are of wonderful efficacy, yet there is not expressed—that this efficacy depends only upon this, their being representatives, of so many energies of eternal nature.

Page 139. § 3. on all things here below. Seeing that this efficacy cannot absolutely be restrained to things here below, though this may make the chiefest part thereof, with respect especially to man, I think it would be most proper to say—of wonderful efficacy in the whole extent of this temporal universe, and especially on all things here below.

To all the rest of the expressions of this paragraph, I must say, it is so obscure, that I cannot apprehend the proper meaning. The distinct particular expressions, looked upon each by itself, are indeed plain and true enough, but the connexion of them makes a great obscurity, which yet may be so only to my sight, for want of a sufficient understanding of a good English style.

Betwixt § 3 and § 4, I think something could be most properly inserted, which might make plainer that which is said, § 4, and might also shew, at least impliedly, a ground and reason for it, viz. That good and evil, wrath, anger, and love, are manifest in the stars, and this because of their threefold original, which is the dark, fire, and light world, of whose powers and energies, brought by Lucifer into contrariety, they are efficacious representatives.

And then, in any other convenient place, several things more could be added, according to Behmen, though they are but arbitrary, and may be left out also, as for instance,—That they have among them their orders and degrees, as of bigness or visible magnitude, so also of different, superior and inferior dignities and offices, in analogy to the angelical kingdoms, and also to the governments upon earth. That, in one sense and respect, they stand all in discord, disharmony, contrariety, and opposition, and yet in another, make up altogether but one great harmonious instrument: like as the many greater and lesser, thicker and thinner strings, of one or more musical instruments, can make a melodious concordant tune, as well as a dissonant, ungrateful noise, according to the skill or intent of that hand that moves them. That the whole nature, with all its powers and energies, is totally in every one of them, but one only power is principally predominant or manifest in each of them: wherefore then, there are not so many natures as stars, but all the stars together, are the whole nature, or the manifestation of all the powers of nature. That they are in a continual anxious turning, or rolling from the wrath-fire, kindled by Lucifer and his legions. That they are fixed, each in its own place, because this third principle is to stand in a constant abiding generation, unto the end of time; and all manner of life in the earth, shall be generated always by one and the same operation, and after the same manner. That they may draw, incline, or dispose man to good and evil, and many times to great wickednesses, but cannot constrain nor lay a necessity upon him, etc.

Between pages 140 and 141. Q. 1. What do they say concerning the influences—with respect to the nativity? Here I can produce nothing from Behmen, in particular. Behmen says only in general, that the hour of nativity can bring a great alteration upon that power which the constellation that was in the time of the conception, would have in man. Or that the constellation, in the hour of man's nativity, doth alter very much of that natural temper and inclination; doubtless also, very much of those accidents or chances, concerning temporal prosperity and misfortunes, which he would have, or which would befall him from the power of that constellation, which was in the time of his conception. As to the places alleged, viz. MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, Chs. lxvii and lxviii, where, in the English translation, a scheme or figure of the twelve houses is added, the same is not only in the High Dutch original not to be found, but nothing also can be taken from the author's words, which did in particular refer to this influence, with respect to man's nativity. For in the first place, Chap. lxvii, he declareth only, that every man beareth in him an image of his own con-

Oh, do thou increase this abhorrence, and fill my soul with a true penitential sorrow, such sorrow as may make me capable of thy mercy.

Deliver me, O Father of mercy, from all bloodguiltiness; and lay not to my charge the iniquities of those whom I have injured, either by my negligence or ill example.

O Gracious Father, suffer me not to sink under this weight of sin; reach out thy mercy to me, and through the merits and death of thy Son Jesus Christ, receive me to pardon, to grace, and favour.

I repent with all the powers of my soul, I return with all my heart; but, O Lord, grant me a better heart, a more pious soul, to offer unto thee.

O God, surely it is not in anger that thou permittest and inclinest my mind to offer myself to a further office at thy holy altar? Be not angry with me, O God, for presuming upon thy Holy Spirit, for hoping that I am called by thee to this holy office.

O God, fit and prepare my heart, I beseech thee, for this holy and divine employment. Cleanse and purify me from all filthiness of flesh and spirit.

Grant me strength and power to renounce and forsake all appearances of sin, to study and practice all instances of holiness and virtue.

O Heavenly Father, let not this heavenly office be to my condemnation. But do thou make it a means of atoning for the guilt of former life. Make it such a state of penitence and piety, as to prepare me for thy mercy, that my dreadful sins may be blotted out before I appear at the last tribunal.

Receive me, I beseech thee, O Father of mercy. Do thou sanctify and change my heart, that I may feel and know that thou callest me to this holy function.

For Christ's sake blot out all my sins, deliver me from guilt, heal my sores, take out my stains, stellation, called by him a magic astrum, which must indeed needs be conformable to the figure of that firmamental constellation, that was both in his conception, and in his nativity, but cannot be restrained, or confinedly referred, either unto that former, or unto this latter only. Wherefore it must be referred to both of them in union together, viz. to the latter, as grounded upon the former, and to the former, as partly altered, and partly confirmed by the latter. And in the second place, ch. lviii. where nothing at all is said, neither as to man's conception, nor nativity, and even the word constellation is not so much as mentioned, Behmen declareth only, what a great difference there is between natural and supernatural figures, dreams, and visions; and sayeth that the dreams of Pharaoh were out of eternal nature, above the operation and figure of the stars and elements, and that even this was the true reason, why the Egyptian magi, which were but naturalists, could not give him an interpretation thereof. Now this indeed cannot be denied, that here also Pharaoh must have had, in his outward natural constellation of the stars, such a figure as stood in answerableness to that which came out of eternal nature, and whereby he was to be that person, under whose reign such a great and notable alteration of the Egyptian kingdom should come to pass. But whether this natural constellation was more to be referred to the hour of his conception, or to that of his nativity, or also to both of them together, nobody I think can presume to determine.

Ibid. Q. 2. As to the influences of the planets and stars upon civil governments, Behmen says also nothing in particular, and nothing directly, but in general only and in many places he owneth, that civil governments, and the various chances, revolutions and alterations thereof do depend upon their influences, for as much as they are (in such a form and manner) but a natural order and constitution of the spirit of this world, though indeed, as to the substance thereof he granteth also freely, that they have a ground in eternal nature. And, moreover, all this dependance upon the starry influences, standeth but under the inspection and direction of the Most High, whose operating instrument all this temporal nature with all its influences is; which justly and significantly may be called an operating instrument, in a similitude taken from a watch, and frequently used by Behmen. For a watch, with all its parts and wheels, is but a dead, impotent, and unmoveable instrument of itself, and is nevertheless also operating by its own communicated sufficiency, if but once drawn up and directed by its master.

Concerning their influences upon the weather, Behmen says indeed expressly and distinctly, that the stars and planets cause fair weather, rain, hail, snow, excessive heat, frost, etc. [as indeed is undoubted, as with nativities, &c. but who can calculate them all in a given point?] But he goeth not further to any particular account, declaring which of the stars especially, or what manner of the planetary aspects do cause such or such a kind of weather, but he refers us to the skilful astrologers, saying that they found it out, at least for a great deal, by long and sedulous observations, etc.

Ibid. Q. 3. The meaning of the planetic wheel, in Behmen's threefold life, as to its turning, winding, or bending more and more towards within, is not to be understood with relation to the outward appearance of the planetic bodies; for it is notorious, that they stand all seven in an equal degree of outwardness, in one and the same outward or third principle, and have all seven an equal share in being visible objects of one and the same firmamental eye. But it is to be understood with relation to that which is in the planets invisible, but not incomprehensible, and which belongeth inseparably to the whole geniture of this third principle, considered in its union with, and dependence upon, the twofold inward world. For this, and thus considered, doth not stand with its seven different parts in the same degree of outwardness, and is not intelligible at once, or to an intellect that stands unmovable in one and the same station. For these seven different parts have not, nay, cannot have, an equal share in being intelligible objects of one and the same human intellect, if this be not as it were translocated seven times: seeing that they turn in deeper and deeper, according to Behmen's figure, as it were into a deep pit, wherein the centre must be conceived as at the bottom, and the windings all more and more upwards, until the outmost, which only may be visible to that eye that standeth at the mouth of that pit. [Not as a circular line winding inwards by seven turns, to a point, but to a central ground, for all the windings and the ground are of equal magnitude or circumference, though represented on a plain surface as ending in a point.] Which eye therefore must be conceived as that it is itself to go down deeper and deeper, if it shall behold the one of these windings after the other. One and the same eye without being translocated from that place of the earth where it standeth, would be able indeed to see at once all the make me not an example of thy wrath. Be not angry with me for ever, by reserving evil for me.

Neither condemn me into the lower parts of the earth, for thou art the God of them that repent: thy mercy triumpheth in the salvation of sinners.

Speak the word, therefore, Gracious God, that thy servant may be healed; look upon me through the merits of Christ, that I may rise from this death of sin and misery.

O, my God, I humbly, in thy presence, renounce all my former sins: oh, help this resolution. I here offer and devote myself, and all that I have, to thy service; desiring, hoping, and resolving to live the remainder of my days in penitence and piety; watching, praying, and labouring to save my own soul, and do all the good that I can to the souls and bodies of all my fellow-creatures.

Thus, O Lord, repenting and renouncing my sins, I trust in thy great mercy in Christ Jesus; I presume to offer myself to wait at thy altar: thus repenting, I hope I shall not provoke thy displeasure, by presuming upon thy Holy Spirit, by looking upon myself as thereby called to this sacred employment.

Receive me, therefore, O Lord, I beseech thee, to this sacred office. Do unto me, as thou dost unto all those whom thy providence chooseth for this great employment.

Send down, O Lord, thy Holy Spirit upon me; endure me with light and wisdom from above, that my heart may be filled and strengthened with all those graces which thou knowest to be needful for me.

Lord, grant me a burning zeal for the salvation of souls. If it be thy gracious will, make me instrumental in the salvation of my fellow-Christians; by my advice, labour, and example, may I correct and improve their lives. And grant, Gracious God, that whilst I preach unto others, I may not be a cast-away myself." [NOTE.—On a further examination of the MS. of the No. II. Prayer of pp. 348—51, it is judged to be of a much later date than at first supposed, and so ought not to planets together, if they were but all elevated above its horizon. But one and the same human intellect cannot see all the windings of this planetic wheel, without its own being really translocated, that is, without its own being really deeper and deeper generated, or introduced into the one winding after the other. For that which is seen or understood is always a veiling or covering of that which followeth next. Which covering (N.B.) is not only in that planetic wheel, considered as without man in the macrocosm; but is after the same manner in man himself also, who else could not be called a microcosm. In man himself therefore (N.B.) all these coverings must be removed, and so his intellect will be thereby as it were transplaced, and enabled to see what otherwise is but in vain for him to undertake. Plainer I cannot represent the meaning of this planetic wheel. Behmen saith expressly and intelligibly, not only that it cannot be delineated by figures, and not expressed by words, but also that it cannot be understood, except by the spirit, who may understand it in himself, viz. if he be made able to see and behold himself, what and how he is, for as this planetic wheel is, so is the Spirit also. And then also, he directs us to consider for an illustration hereof, the three different principles wherein we may find the same, or at least something very like. For all the three principles are in every man (like as all the seven windings of this planetic wheel are in every man also), and yet only that is seen and felt by him in which he standeth, or which is manifest in him, and by the same manifestation of itself it excludeth, covereth, or hideth always the other two. Which, if they shall be manifested or opened in his sensibility, he must be brought away from his former station, which is as it were a translocation, or a real transport from the one into another. A human soul, if in this natural earthly body only, can be sensible only of this third principle, and of things belonging thereto, and cannot all this while see or feel the first and second. If it be departed from the body, and entered into the dark world, it can no more be sensible of the third, and can have no perception of the second. But if it be in the second, the first is shut up from it, and of the third it can have no sensation. And though in this outward world one and the same soul may have, at different times, more or less a real sensibility of all three, yet there will always be required and presupposed something of a real translocation, in a spiritual sense. For no principle can be seen or felt, but by those creatures that are therein actually.

Page 141. No. 6. In this description concerning the spirit of this world, I meet with several things which I think do want some observation. When there is said, that the spirit of this world is also called the archeus and separator, etc. I observe justly, that the archeus or separator is expressly called by Behmen, the outflow word of God, an efflux out of the invisible world, the fiery mercury, that Creator which still createth, etc. CLAVIS, v. 96. Germ. Wherefore then, (though perhaps upon this or that particular account, the spirit of this world may be called also the archeus or separator, which yet for my part I would not call so, when I intend to speak thereof distinctly,) I would here make no mention of an archeus, that I might not make the reader think these two expressions do always strictly denote with Behmen, one and the same thing. Considering especially that his fiery mercury is but a part of that spiritual habitation, wherein the spirit of this world work-

Such then, were some of the early manifestations of that earnest and devout spirit which so eminently characterised Mr. Law's subsequent life and writings.

In the year 1714 his father died, whose epitaph, inscribed on a monument in the chancel at King's Cliffe, is in the following terms: HERE LYE THE DEAR REMAINS OF THOMAS LAW, LATELY GROCER IN THIS PARISH: A KIND, CAREFUL AND INDUSTRIOUS FATHER OF A LARGE FAMILY; A TENDER AND AFFECTIONATE HUSBAND; A TRUE AND FAITHFUL FRIEND; AND A PEACEABLE, HONEST NEIGHBOUR; WHO DECEASED ON THE TENTH DAY OF OCTOBER, ANNO DEI, 1714. —AND NOW, LORD, WHAT IS MY HOPE? TRULY, MY HOPE IS EVEN IN THEE.

In August 1718, his mother died, and by her will left his brother George and him in trust, to dispose of her real and personal estate at King's Cliffe, and to divide it equally amongst her children, then consisting of George, Thomas, WILLIAM, Benjamin, Farmery, and Margaret. The deed of release, which bears date 1726, states that the amount paid to each of the then survivors, was one hundred and fifteen pounds, only. To Margaret, who was now married to Edward Hayne, of Ashbourne, in Derbyshire, had also been devised the household goods, linen, and plate. Farmery was baptised September 29th. 1699; went to Cambridge, took orders, and resided at Sibson, in Leicestershire, married, but left no issue. Benjamin was baptised April 23rd. 1691, and died shortly after his mother. Giles, the third brother, is said to have had issue, though no memorial is preserved thereof; nor likewise of Christopher, who probably died in infancy.

Thomas, the second brother, married, and settled at Warmington, and afterwards at King's Cliffe. He is described as yeoman, and had two sons and five daughters, viz. William, a linen-draper, in Sun-court, Cornhill, London, born in 1713, died unmarried in 1790; Sarah, born in 1709, died 1784; Margaret, born in 1716; Ellen, born in 1718; Mary, who, 'for sixteen years of the best part of her life,' attended on Mrs. Hutcheson, was born in 1724, and died in 1803; Elizabeth, born 1727; and Nathaniel, who left one son and two daughters, viz. Henry, who succeeded to his uncle's business in London, and had issue, by his second wife, a Miss Rogers, three children, all sons, John, in holy Orders, rector of —, in Hants; William, in a mercantile warehouse, who married, and had two sons; and Thomas, with an insurance broker. Susanna, the elder daughter of Nathaniel, was married to a Mr. Skey; and Sarah, the younger, unmarried.

The eldest brother, George, who, in a document dated 1714, designates himself 'chandler, of King's Cliffe,' married Margaret, daughter of Mr. John Arney, of King's Cliffe; by whom he had a numerous family, viz. John, born in 1710, settled at Spalding, in Lincolnshire, and left issue; George, (residing at Apethorpe in 1761, afterwards at Morehay, and buried at Yarwell,) was born in 1712, married Ann Anthony, and left several sons, (one of whom is supposed to be George, who was at London, in the year 1761, when his 'relative' and 'benefactor,' the Rev. W. Law, deceased,) and one daughter, married to the Rev. Mr. Twells, of Norfolk, who had issue three daughters, two of whom married; Thomas, born in 1713, married, 1749, Camilla Twells, and left no child; William, born in 1715, and died the year following; Henry, born in 1716, died in 1754; William, born and died in 1717; Benjamin, born in 1718; and two daughters, Margaret and Elizabeth, both unmarried, eth, as shall be said now by and by.

What further here is added of—an outward quintessence of things, in which the spirit of this world opens itself and resides, out of which he hath power of effluxing, and which is his inward and more immediate body, etc.—cannot, to my thinking, in all particulars be reconciled to what Behmen says in that place, which the last lines direct me to, viz. CLAVIS, v. 96—105. Germ. Which only place can be sufficient to declare what he means by the spirit of this world, which, saith Behmen, is hidden in the four elements, like as the soul is in the body, and is nothing else but an efflux and actual power from the sun and stars. Its habitation, wherein it worketh, is spiritual, encompassed with the four elements. This spiritual habitation is (1.) A sharp magnetical power, from the first property of eternal nature. (2.) An efflux from the inward motion, or second property—this I call the fiery mercury, in the spirit of this world, for this is the mobility of all things, a separator of the powers, and a former of shapes or figures. (3.) A sensibility in this motion and sharpness, etc. from the third property of eternal nature. These three properties the ancient philosophers called sulphur, mercury, and sal, according to their matters which out of them are generated in the four elements, when this (threefold) spirit coagulates or makes itself substantial. In this ground the four elements also lie, and are not separated therefrom, nor something peculiar, but only they are the manifestation of this spiritual ground, like as a house or habitation of the spirit, wherein it worketh, etc.

The words, which outward quint-essence, the inward and more immediate body of this spirit (for the four elements are its outward body), they call salniter, etc. are, as to my sight, all obscure, and I do not think they can give to any a clear and distinct apprehension of the thing. For (1.) I cannot find that Behmen calleth the salniter a body of the spirit of this world. (2.) I cannot see what here is meant by salniter. That visible materiality, which is an ingredient of gunpowder, cannot be meant, seeing that this salniter is called an inward and more immediate body; when that is equally outward or distant, in the same degree from the spirit, as the outward salt, brimstone, and quicksilver. And that which is more inward in this outward salniter, is its being (in answerableness to eternal nature) that crack wherein all the properties are separated and displayed. But this also can here not be meant, because the crack, as a separator and displayer of all the properties, cannot be conceived as a body of the spirit of this world. (3.) This body or salniter is called a quint-essence of everything, which cannot be applicable any more to this salnital crack, than to the palpable salnital substance. (4.) It is called an outward quint-essence, and this makes all still more obscure. For every quint-essence is the most inward of that thing whose quint-essence it is said to be. And though it might be understood as with respect to this outward world, and so thereby distinguished from a heavenly quint-essence of paradisaical things, yet this will not be sufficient to make it out, as long as it is not declared, both as to this outward and to that inward world, that the salnital crack can be called the quint-essence of all things, which I see no possibility to do.

the former of whom, if not the latter, resided with Miss Gibbon, as attendant. Benjamin married, and had issue, William, a solicitor, born 1748, who, as before-mentioned, by the will of Mrs. Hester Gibbon (the inheretrix and trustee of her dear deceased friend, the late Rev. W. LAW), was possessed of estates in King's Cliffe, and died in 1805, without issue; Thomas, who was living at Stamford in 1778, married Jane Lowe, by whom he had an only son, Farmery, born 1785, and now (October 1848) residing at King's Cliffe, and in possession of the aforesaid property; who, in 1803, married Eleanor Carrington, and has issue surviving, William, a solicitor, at Stamford; Thomas, a farmer, near King's Cliffe; Farmery, manager of the London and County Bank at Chelmsford; Eleanor, and Sarah. Besides these children, Mr. Benjamin Law had John, born in 1752, a surgeon in the Royal Navy (on the Latona, at Portsmouth, in 1783), who went round the world with Captain Cook, and died in 1786; Farmery, who, in 1767, was placed with Mr. William Law, at Sun-court, Cornhill, and died in 1780; Henry, who died in 1761; Elizabeth, married to a Mr. Charles Lowe; and Benjamin, a draper, at Stamford, who married a Miss Reeve, by whom he had one daughter, and died in 1802, and his widow in 1822. Such are the particulars which have been collected together, concerning the birth-place, family, and relations of the Rev. WILLIAM LAW.

Having quitted Cambridge upon his resolution not to take the oath of allegiance to King George the First, his next appearance in public was in London, in the year 1717, engaged in the Bangorian controversy; but whether at that time, or from the period of his relinquishing his Fellowship, up to the year 1726, in any pecuniary appointment, does not now appear. Report states him to have officiated as a curate in London, and to have had very considerable livings tendered him by or through his friend, Dr. Sherlock, afterwards Bishop of London; but, as he ever remained true to his non-juring principles, it is all but certain that he did not again officiate in the church. In the above memorabilia, and most important controversy, however, he laid the foundation of his future fame; the ability he therein displayed having gained him the notice and respect of many who were opposed to the high church principles, which he had imbibed at the university, and at that early period of his life so strenuously and plausibly advocated. [According to the 'Preacher's Assistant,' vol. II. 1737, he published a Single Sermon, in 1718, on 1 Cor. xii. 3; but after making researches in the chief libraries throughout the country, and in private collections of tracts, the writer has not been able to find or hear of such a discourse. His Thanksgiving Sermon of 1713, may be seen in Queen's College Library, Cambridge.]

The 'Answer to the Fable of the Bees,' published in 1721, was the next issue of his pen, and may be considered as a good specimen of the gentlemanly tone of ironical banter, in which patrons of vice and infidelity, men of education, ought to be met and dealt with, by the public guardian of religion and moral virtue.

Some few years afterwards, in the year 1726, he published a tract against the Stage entertainment, then characterised by the most open obscenity of sentiment and language. In this tract, entitled 'The absolute Unlawfulness of the Stage Entertainment, fully Demonstrated,' he exhibits that power of close yet agreeable argumentation, for which his writings have been so highly commended. And notwithstanding the ridicule which Gibbon, Dennis, and others have attempted to cast upon this performance, it is to the honour of Mr. Law, that no admirer of sound reasoning, who was a christian, ever found fault with it, nor is it possible indeed for such an one to do so, without doing violence to his

His spirit shown (as in the above Sermon) by a public spirit (quite the whole notice of the affair pp. 20 & 21, in two places of above it appeared he changed to deep seriousness in 1720 (see note here of p. 506) but what was the special occasion of this at this time.

In the last lines, where there is said of three salnitrous substances, (1.) of a visible, (2.) of a heavenly, and (3.) of a divine one, a notorious mistake is committed. For the heavenly and the divine, if both called and conceived as substances, cannot be distinguished, but by referring the former unto God, considered as in, and the latter unto God as without nature. But now, in the Divine being without nature, is no such thing, but all must be referred only to the generation of nature. The salnitrous crack, in, or at the entrance of the fourth form, is that which may be called divine, but not yet divine substance. But in heaven, viz. in the seventh form, no doubt but there is such a substance, as the salnitral substance upon earth is a visible image of. Yet this heavenly substance is not a shadowy image of another divine salnitrous substance, but it is a body or chrysalline material being, expressed and made substantial by that salnitrous (not substance, but) crack, which is in the generation of eternal nature, caused by that conjunction between eternal liberty and the dark forms of nature, of both which, even our visible salniter in this world proves to partake, according to its low manner and degree.

Page 142. No. 7. Here I have to observe only this, that instead of these words, this outflown word is not the pure Deity, but his outflown word, by which, etc. the sense could be expressed with more grace, and with greater significance, thus—this outflown word is not the pure Deity, but such an outflown power, as by which, etc.

Page 142. No. 8. Here, concerning common salniter and its preparation, the philosophical mercury, oil of sulphur, oil of vitriol, spirit of nitre, the character \perp signifying gold, etc., I have nothing to say, neither pro nor con; the author may perhaps be able to make it out, but experience must confirm it. Only at the first expression I am a little stumbled, when there is said, the matter of the philosophical work are the five vowels, which signify common salniter. For I cannot see what relation these two can bear to one another. In all the description of this work (in SIGNATURUM REUM) Behmen never useth the expression of five vowels. And though that very same which he doth understand thereby, viz. the divine life, power, virtue, the Spirit of God, the true spirit of understanding from the second principle of light, etc. is absolutely required to this work, yet upon what account the five vowels can be called the matter, I am not able to apprehend. But for all that there may be something therein above the reach of my capacity.

Page 143. No. 9. The signal star, mentioned not only in the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM but also in several other books and places, hath a twofold signification, relating most evidently to the discovery both of the inward eternal, and of the outward temporal nature, according to his own words, saying, Two suns are risen and shine unto us. And again, the signal star is so great as the whole world, etc. With respect to the first, he understands chiefly this great manifestation, concerning the generation of eternal nature in its seven-fold wheel, with respect to which he called his first book AURORA, Day-break, Morning redness, etc. And so this signal star, in this first sense, is nothing else but that same, which, by some others now is called the morning star of Wisdom, relating especially to the mysteries of the kingdom of Christ, which cannot be fundamentally understood understanding, and renouncing his religious profession.

The 'Christian Perfection' was published in the year 1726, (where composed it does not now appear,) and the 'Serious Call' in the year but ~~one~~ following. And now we come to one of the eventful periods of his life, in a philosophical point of view; for to these two books may be said to be owing under God, the present religious, moral, social, commercial, and political glory of this highly favoured country—the grand providential instrument for the evangelization and moral affranchisement of all nations. But this subject must be left to be fully considered in its proper place, in the proposed larger memorial of Mr. Law.

The following is the impartial opinion of the great and good Bishop Wilson, concerning the 'Christian Perfection,' contained in a letter, addressed by him to the Lady Elizabeth Hastings, of blessed memory; dated Warrington, September 13th, 1729:—

"—His Christian Perfection (he writes.) fell into my hands by a like providence: and after reading it over and over, I recommended it so heartily to a friend of mine near London, that he procured eighteen copies for each of our parochial libraries; which I have recommended to my clergy after the most affecting manner, as the likeliest way to bring them to a most serious temper. I have considered the most exceptionable passages in that book. I dare not say he is altogether in the wrong. That of—selling all, and giving to the poor, he truly explains to be the disposing, in our sincere intention, of whatever we enjoy, above what is necessary for our own and the honest support of our families, to pious and charitable uses, and to the relief of our necessitous fellow members; so as to part with our superfluities with the same cheerfulness and ease of mind, as if we had sold our estates, and were only disposing of another body's income. I need not tell you, Madam, the happiness of such a disposition, and how acceptable it must needs be to God; and that our blessed Saviour laid that injunction upon his followers, not to torment them, but to set them above the world, to make them truly easy in it. As to the passage of—not going to law upon any occasion whatever, with relation to private injuries, I dare not condemn, until I see much worse effects follow from practising accordingly, to those who have made the experiment; as you know, Madam, some sects of people have done, without any great visible inconvenience. And whether one who resolves to do so, might not expect a peculiar providence to watch over him for good, or a more extraordinary reward of his faith and sufferings, in obedience to the commands of his Saviour, is what ought to be well considered, before we peremptorily condemn such a doctrine.

"I will, God willing, for now I have not time to say more, give your ladyship the sum of the whole book in a few words, as I have, some time ago, met with them in a book of Erasmus, a person whom God raised up just at the time of the Reformation, to set people in the right way, after the christian world had been led into error and superstition for some ages:

"A Sketch of Christianity, from Erasmus, agreeable to what is contained in this book. [A more complete one will be found in Dr. Horneck's Letter, on the Lives and Spirit of the Primitive Christians, at the end of his Happy Ascetic.]

'Jesus Christ came into the world to form to himself a people, who should wholly depend upon God, and, placing no confidence in any earthly support and comfort, should be after another manner rich, after another manner noble, after another manner powerful, after another manner happy; intending that they should attain felicity by the contempt of the things that are most admired by without an understanding of the generation of eternal nature in its seven properties, as from the Revelation of St. John is evident enough. And then with respect to the second signification, which is inferior unto that first, but necessarily depending upon and following after it, he reflects not only upon an understanding of temporal nature in general, but also in particular upon an understanding of this philosophical work, wherein the cursed nature is restored, from the strife of its seven disharmonised properties, into their paradisaical union. For even herein lieth that provision laid up for the children of God, whereof he speaks in the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM. And even this is that, by which according to his prophecy,—silver and gold shall be made as common as it was in the days of Solomon. And this is that same whereof he saith also, that—to the kingdom (of Christ) which is, and is not, and yet is, the ornament of gold and silver shall be added; for the Prince of the powers of the earth hath given it thereunto. And so now the signal star, in this second sense, is nothing else but this same manifestation, as it concerns the restoration of outward cursed nature. All this is fully agreeing with the construction of his writings, and could be made out sufficiently from a hundred places. But that he, by the signal star, should have directed us in particular to antimony, I cannot tell.

Page 143. Nos. 10 and 11. All what herein is declared, belongs to an outward chemical operation, which I know nothing of, and can be neither for nor against it. Thus much I observe only, that I could not say, they say, because it is not apparent to me, that Behmen says all these things, who in his writings hath quite another end, and so frequently and earnestly protesteth, that his intent was not to teach any man this art, etc.

Pages 143 and 145. No. 12. Several things are here expressed concerning salniter, which I can make nothing of at all; if they are of Mr. Pierce, he will doubtless be able to declare his sense more intelligibly. That salniter was not created, but only made substantial at the creation, is very strange in my apprehension; but seeing that I do not know what peculiar notion he may have of the word created, and what distinction he may make between created and made substantial, I can say nothing more against it. That salniter brings the fire of God to man, is no less strange than that former, though indeed I see obscurely, and as it were at a distance, something therein, if it be not understood of the outbirth, viz. of salniter, as created, or as made substantial at the creation, but of that which Behmen calleth the salnitrous shrack, wherein the two eternal kingdoms are severed, and in this world the four elements are displayed, etc. But if Mr. Pierce reflects, as I suppose by this expression, upon the philosophical work especially; meaning that salniter, even common salniter as before, is that matter which bringeth the philosophical fire into the artist's work, there may be something more in it, which I shall not presume to judge nor censure. That salniter is the instrument of God by which he worketh, is true indeed, if it be referred again to the salnitrous shrack, not to the dead outbirth; for as the whole nature, in all its properties, is God's instrument, so is that also especially, wherein all the properties of nature are brought into distinction and operation. That the separator is in this substantial word, and that it is the spirit of this the world; as people that should be strangers to the lusts of the flesh, by studying in the body the life of angels; that should have no need of divorce, as being able to mend or to bear with patience all the evils of the married state; that should be strangers to oaths, as those who will neither distrust nor deceive anybody; that set not their hearts upon increasing their substance, as having laid up their treasure in heaven; that should not be transported with vain glory, because they refer all the glory to Christ alone; who should be void of all ambition, as disposed the greater they are, so much the more to submit to all men for Christ's sake; who should avoid wrath, much more revenge, as studying to deserve well of those who deserve ill of them; whose lives should be so without blame, as to force even infidels to speak well of them; that should be born again to the purity, simplicity, and teachable temper of infants; that should live like the fowls of the air, without solicitude; among whom should be the same concern and good understanding, as among members of the same body; where the abundance of some should supply the wants of others, and the evils of one member be mitigated by the good offices and compassions of others; who should be conspicuous as a city on a hill, that all about them might be instructed by their example, and as salt to secure the rest from corruption; to whom this life should seem vile, and only to be borne with, in submission to the will of God; and who, relying upon the invisible power of Christ, are always diligently preparing for that day, when they shall enter upon a lasting happiness.—I am, Madam, &c. &c. Thomas, Sodor and Man."

In the year 1727, as related, Mr. Law founded a school in his native town, for the instruction and clothing of fourteen girls (now increased to twenty), to which, sometime afterwards, were added almshouses, for two poor old women, inhabitants of King's Cliffe.

With what resources he accomplished this, is not now known; but report states, that, shortly after the publication of the 'Christian Perfection,' whilst one day standing in the shop of his publisher, in London, a person, habited as a gentleman's servant, accosted him, enquiring if he was the Rev. Mr. Law; and being answered in the affirmative, placed a letter in his hands, and departed. Upon opening the letter, it was found to contain a bank note for one thousand pounds, from some anonymous individual. If this anecdote be true, the money so presented, with what he possessed from the division of his mother's property at this time, and other resources, might have contributed to the foundation of this charity.—But such was not the only gift of money Mr. Law received in his life-time, from admirers of his writings, and strangers also to his person.

With regard to his works, his arrangement with his publishers (according to documents in the possession of the writer) was, that the latter should have the entire profit of the first editions of each. As therefore the principal of them ran through six or eight editions, it is very possible that he derived some pecuniary benefit from that source.

The 'Serious Call' was the next production of his pen; but it is a work so well known by devout and well-informed persons, that little need be said respecting it in this place; especially, as its theological character has been so repeatedly explained in the present treatise, as containing a demonstration, in logical order, free from all sectarian idiosyncrasy, of the pure spirit and practice of the gospel, according to the personal teachings of Christ, and the ground of the apostolic writings,—in brief, a systematic method of pure and perfect devotion to God, and of evangelical aggressiveness towards our unconverted neighbour.

See Byrom's Remains Part ii p. 387 shows Law's metaphysical views previously to 1729 and to 1731 when he wrote his 'Case of Reason' and approves of Bishop P. Brown's philosophical treatises. Law had then marked out the special writers as referred to p. 616—same work, and in 1733 or 34 (before the Three Letters to a Lady) was published for Behmen's writings, with world, etc., something herein also is true, but indeed it is not pertinently expressed. For by saying, in this substantial word, the reader is caused to understand (in connexion with what went before) common salniter, created or made substantial at the creation; and though he may apprehend well enough that the separator is therein, yet that this substantial word is the spirit of this world, none I think can apprehend to satisfaction. What Behmen says concerning the spirit of this world, we had already above.—All the places quoted p. 145, I looked over, but cannot find that Behmen saith therein anything of salniter. Nay, in many other places also, which I consulted, I find very little of the outbirth or common salniter, but of the salnitrous crack, made in the kindling of the fire he speaketh very much.

In the SIGNATURA RERUM, xiv. 69, etc. Germ. (as in some other places) I cannot find that he treats concerning an universal medicine, that is a medicine resisting universally all manners and kinds of diseases, like as the universal tincture doth: but only concerning a medicine reaching deeper than the four elements, and resisting the evil of the astrum. Which every medicine should and would do, if rightly prepared, that is, if itself were first delivered from the four-elementary strife, and exalted according to his description; when yet for all that, it would not resist all sorts of evils from the astrum, but only such of them as it is in particular prepared for. For it would not yet be the blessed universal tincture.

Page 145. Q. 1. What do they say, concerning the oil of life? A. In order to understand what they say concerning the oil of life, it is absolutely required to understand also first, what they deliver, concerning in general the generation of eternal nature, and in particular, the generation of the water of life, in the second principle of light; from which water this oil is all inseparable, and of which it is the more spiritual part, fatness as it were, or unctuousity. The conjunction between the soft eternal liberty, and the harsh, strong desire, causeth in eternal nature the generation or kindling of the fire. From the latter of these two cometh a life to be, which standeth in, and is itself a fire; and from the former a water and oil, which is a pabulum of that fire and life. By the water it is refreshed and preserved; in the oil it burneth and flameth, and from this oil especially it getteth a shine or glance. If now this be transferred to the life of man, it may easily be understood what Behmen says, that—every sickness is more or less a spoiling, poisoning, or darting impurity or contrary properties into the oil of life, etc.

Q. 2. What do they teach concerning the philosophical work? A. They teach in substance that the process of the universal tincture, for transmutting metals, and healing the body (attainable, if all the requisites are truly in the artist found), is the very same, with the process of the holy spiritual tincture for the soul of man, attainable in the regeneration. That both in the one and in the other, this process in itself is very short. That the life of man, and so of metals, as also of the whole nature, and all the things therein, standeth in seven properties. That these seven properties are now under the curse, and stand in mere strife and contrariety, each of them being in its own natural quality manifest, in opposition to all the rest; that is, each of them, according to Beh-

It is however, deserving of record, as an interesting circumstance, that almost all the individuals who have been subjects of great piety, and eminently instrumental in the moral regeneration of this country during the last hundred years, have been mainly indebted for their spirit and principles to this and the last-mentioned treatise. In which consideration will also be taken into account the thousands of other individuals who have mediately or immediately, derived their piety and usefulness from such a source. And this not only in our own country, but on the great continent of America, where, it has been related to the writer, that, at the present day, there is scarcely a devout family in any of the numerous towns of the United States, in which the 'Serious Call' is not amongst the number of its standard books of piety.

It was about this time that Mr. Law entered into the family of Ed. Gibbon, Esq. of Putney, as tutor to his only son, Edward, afterwards father of the historian; with whom, at the commencement of the year 1727, he proceeded to Emanuel College, Cambridge, and remained during his stay at that university. As the 'Serious Call' was published in 1728, it was probably written by Mr. Law during the intervals of his tuitional engagements, and possibly for the immediate benefit of his pupil, as Fenelon wrote his Telemachus for the Duke of Burgundy: though, the idea of such a work had doubtless suggested itself to him, as he proceeded with the 'Christian Perfection,' particularly in writing the ninth, tenth, and twelfth chapters of that treatise. It is reported, that he also gave occasional instructions to the two daughters of Mr. Gibbon, whilst residing with the family at Putney; where he remained as a friend, some eight or nine years after his pupil had finished his education, much respected, and esteemed by all who enjoyed the pleasure of his acquaintance.

During this period, he pursued with avidity his theological studies, whilst his writings had rendered him so celebrated, that he became consulted by serious persons, personally and by letter, as a kind of oracle, or spiritual director: to whom he failed not to afford every needful instruction for their several cases to remove their doubts and scruples, and satisfy their minds. Among the more memorable of his spiritual children and patients, were the celebrated brothers, John and Charles Wesley, the former of whom, in the mature part of his life, resumed all that veneration and respect for his exalted piety and wisdom, with which he had been so irresistibly impressed in his earlier years, but which he had suddenly cast away, on embracing some peculiar views and opinions upon certain points of religious doctrine; to which circumstance, however, reference has been made in a preceding note, and therein to the periodical of 1797 for a further and full understanding of the subject in question.

Another of Mr. Law's correspondents was a Miss Dodwell, daughter of the learned Mr. Henry Dodwell, who, overlooking the simple guidance of the Word of God, and the all-sufficiency of the Holy Spirit to sincere seekers of truth, had so bewildered herself in the labyrinth of polemical controversy, concerning schism and other ecclesiastical questions, that her mind became filled with doubts of the sufficiency of God's grace in the ordinances of the established church of this country, of which she was a member; and perplexed about absolute decrees, the dispensations of providence, and other mysterious subjects. In this state of mind she forwarded some papers to Mr. Law, wherein, among other details of her case, she expressed a desire to be of the church of Rome, that she might be delivered from the anxiety of thinking for herself in matters of religion, and might have a sufficient authority to which she could resign herself absolutely. This gave occasion to him to men's usual expression, nath its own selfish will. That this strife cannot be reconciled, except there come such a death into these seven properties, as may break and destroy their own will, viz. such a life as by its own essentiality may be first a death unto them, and then also able to raise them up again, into one harmonious life and will. That all this is done according to the constant unalterable generation of eternal nature, wherein there are the same seven properties indeed, but not seven contrary wills, all being harmonised and overpowered in, and by the fifth of love and light. That when this re-harmonising of the properties in the philosophical work is done, the universal tincture is prepared, the curse is removed, earth is turned in, and heaven out. And this, therefore, is able also to reharmonise all the seven disordered properties, both in the metals of the earth, and in the distempered bodies of men.

Q. ult. Why must gold be purified seven times? A. Because it must be brought through all the seven properties of nature, and in each of them a peculiar work must be done. For as they are all seven under the curse, so they are all seven impure, and want to pass the purifying fire seven times, if that gold or silver shall come to its perfection. In the first melting, the harsh quality, the gross, hard, stony dross is melted away. In the second, the harsh death in the water is separated; for in this second property the sweet water was killed or spoiled, and turned into the quality of a poisonous aqua fortis, which is the worst of all, and must now, in this second melting, be cast out. In the third, the bitter death must be melted down, viz. the stirring, raging, and breaking, stinging property, which makes the gold and silver brittle; so that it is not malleable before this be conquered also. In the fourth the fire-spirit must be destroyed; and then the matter begins to be like unto gold or silver, according to that property which is predominant therein; but it is not yet tough and pure enough. In the fifth melting the life, in the light and love's property, ariseth; and according to this, the matter which is left in the foregoing trials, gets again that virtue which from the first original hath been the propriety of that fountain-spirit, which is predominant therein. In the sixth, this life, risen in the fifth, stirreth, and from this stirring the metal gets its clear, tinkling sound, according to its kind. Here, says Behmen, the greatest care is to be taken, that the fire may not be too strong, or else this new life is easily kindled again, in the properties of wrath, and the whole matter burned to a hard, unprofitable dross. In the seventh melting it cometh (provided that the same care be taken about the fire, which must be more subtle or temperate, than in the sixth,) to that perfection which it is capable of in this third principle; and hath only this defect, that the spirit therein must leave its metallic body in a hard palpability, and cannot exalt it, so as he did, before the wrath-fire was kindled in the fall of Lucifer.

Page 147. No. 1. To prevent a certain needless objection, I think, when here is said, The third principle being perfected on the fourth day, there might be added this, or any other the like limitation—as to its own harmonious structure, essential constituent parts, order, government, or governing faculties, etc.

Nos. 2 and 3. souls or spirits. Here I observe, that in sensitive creatures, a difference between address to her three letters, wherein he meets all her objections in his usual felicitous manner, demonstrating throughout, whatever be the point he examines, that the sovereign remedy for all the evils of this life, consists solely in an implicit faith, and total resignation to the adorable providence of God. These letters were written in the year 1731—2, and intended as private communications, but through the instrumentality of Mr. Payne, the editor of Kempis, Mr. Langeake, or some other admirers of Mr. Law, were searched up in the year 1779, and then for the first time published, under the title of 'Three Letters to a Lady inclined to enter into the Communion of the Church of Rome.' [Note, p. 189.] They will be found replete with edification, to such as love the strong meat of impartial truth, and elevated christian wisdom.

[Afterwards noted down by a daughter of the Baptistess, during a visit to her mother, who has good reason to suppose that the letters were composed for the purpose, but it is too long and trivial to transcribe here. The original was destroyed by fire in 1829.]

The next public exigency which elicited the services of his powerful and undaunted pen, was the refutation of Deism or infidelity, another rampant vice of that age, among men of education. The occasion thereof was the appearance of Tindal's book of 'Christianity as old as the Creation,' to which he wrote an answer, entitled the 'Case of Reason or Natural Religion, fairly and fully stated.' Concerning this work, which is a perfect model of classical argumentation, written in the most easy, natural manner,—and as such, ought to form a regular class book in schools, it being revised and corrected by the author in a second edition, in the year 1752,—a correspondent of the 'Gentleman's Magazine' gives a very judicious opinion, in a letter to that periodical in the month of October, 1800, which, notwithstanding the irrelevancy of certain portions of it, for its general interest we insert at length.—It may just be remarked, that although Gibbon professes to give a slight critical review of Law's early writings, he entirely omits any notice of this absolute refutation and ironical exposure of infidelity. The letter thus proceeds:—

“Sir,—In addition to what your ingenious correspondent has related, concerning that good and truly great man, the Rev. W. Law, commonly called the mystic divine, give me leave to observe, that many years since I was acquainted with some of his admirers, from whom I understood that Mr. Law was a bachelor all his lifetime; that in person he was a well-set man, and rather of a dark complexion, though remarkably cheerful in his temper; that such was his love of privacy and a state of recollection, that it was very seldom indeed, that he passed away more than two hours in the company of any person. With a very small patrimony, also, Mr. Law was remarkably charitable; but it was principally confined to his poor neighbours, and the manufacturers of wooden ware, in and about King's Cliffe; in which view, it is related, that he would only eat off a wooden platter. In these exercises of christian charity he also engaged the two ladies with whom he resided. Their object was not to encourage the idle and dissolute, but to promote and facilitate the good intentions and endeavours of the industrious.

"Whether the 'Serious Call' be Mr. Law's masterpiece, I have some doubt. I should give the palm to his 'Case of Reason,' stated in answer to 'Christianity as old as the Creation.' The style and conclusions are almost as plain and convincing as any of the deductions in common arithmetic: and at this present time, as the public is not quite cured of the predilection it has lately entertained for the French goddess of reason, I presume a cheap edition of that work by Mr. Law.

souls and spirits is not indeed by Behmen much regarded or insisted upon. But that, nevertheless, it is apparent enough, from his declaration, that in them also are both souls and spirits, or something answering, in its lower temporal kind and degree, unto that great considerable difference in man. Wherefore then, if a nice and curious distinction be not intended, there may be said well enough, souls or spirits. But if a more distinct enumeration shall be made, there might much rather be said, souls and spirits; with a short addition, declaring that the former is more particularly to be referred to the stars, and the latter to the sun. Whereof much could be said from Behmen's ground.

Page 147. No. 3. Their bodies were made, etc. Here I would, for my part, rather say, brought forth; not that the former were altogether unfit or impertinent, but only because it seems (at least to me) to represent the thing too grossly, as if there had been a certain maker from without, using his hands or instruments. Whereas, they came forth all freely out of the elements, when the eternal Word moved, and thereby enabled them to bring forth, in distinction and variety, those visible images or outbirths of their invisible powers.

No. 4. from which the visible, etc. Seeing that the elements and compounded bodies differ in degrees, and that from the former to the latter a descent is made, so that the elements are to be considered as joined to the invisible principles; when there is said, from what compounded bodies do arise, I think it would be proper to make the construction thus, or the like—from which (invisible principles) the visible elements, and further (or lower) also, in conjunction with them, the compounded bodies arise.

No. 5. those are unclean, etc. Seeing that this uncleanness cannot be restrained to terrestrial animals, because in the water also some are declared by Moses to be unclean, it would be better to say more generally—those are unclean, that had in their original a property of the dark world more or less predominant in their particular kind.

Between Nos. 5 and 6, these following particulars could be inserted; yet there is no necessity for it:

That living creatures are in all the four elements, and in each according to its constitution: and this, because of that indissoluble concatenation of all the elements, in one universal ground, by reason of which none of them is excluded from those powers and abilities, that were required for their bringing forth their own peculiar offspring. That from the food and habitation of every animal, its original may be more or less discerned. That the tame and friendly beasts, are, with respect to their original, nearer related to the one element; when the wild and not so tractable ones are nearer to the four elements. That the state and condition of the living creatures, before the fall of man, was much different from what it is now, after the fall and curse. That in all the living creatures, a character of the Holy Trinity may be found, though in none of them so plain and em-might effectually remove their propensity, as it exhibits reason not the empress (as the French and English freethinkers have displayed her), but too often 'the blind tool and most abject drudge of the passions.'

"I might here mention the opinion of Mr. John Wesley, respecting Mr. Law's literary abilities, viz. that 'his writings would remain an everlasting testimony of the strength and purity of the English language.' As also the testimony of that erudite critic, Dr. Johnson, inserted in Boswell's Life of him, third edition, vol. i. p. 43, and vol. ii. page 110, (which may be known to most of your readers):—"When at Oxford," said he, "I took up 'Law's Serious Call to a Holy Life,' expecting to find it a dull book (as such books generally are), and perhaps to laugh at it; but I found Law quite an overmatch for me, and this was the first occasion of my thinking in earnest of religion, after I became capable of rational inquiry."—"He much commended Law's Serious Call, which he said was the finest piece of hortatory theology in any language."

The following interesting letter from a clergyman, may also be worthy of insertion in this place; it was originally addressed to the editor of Lloyd's Evening Post:—

"—Sunt certa piacula, quæ le

Ter pure lecto poterant recreare libello."—Hor.

"Scarborough, Dec. 21st. 1771.—Sir,—As I have an universal love and esteem for all mankind, so particularly for my brethren of the established church; of which I should think myself an unworthy member, did I not take all opportunities of doing good, according to the abilities with which God has enabled me. But as I have ever thought a concern for men's souls to be preferable to that of their bodies; so, I have, in a more especial manner, extended my charity to that better part.—We live in an age wherein numerous objects present themselves to our view, that are destitute of every virtue that can make them worthy of the divine favour; and, consequently, there never will be wanting occasions for exercising ourselves in a laudable endeavour for their amendment. I, for my own part, though I live (when at home) in a small country village, have had sufficient work upon my hands to bring my parishioners to any tolerable degree of piety and goodness: I preached and laboured amongst them incessantly, and yet, after all, was convinced my work had been as fruitless as casting pearls before swine; the drunkard continued his nocturnal practices, and the voice of the swearer was still heard in our streets. However, I was determined to leave no means untried for bringing this profane and obdurate people to a sense of their duty: accordingly, I purchased many religious books, and distributed them amongst them; but, alas! I could perceive no visible effects. In short, I had the grief to find that all my labour had proved in vain, and was ready to cry out with St. Paul, Who is sufficient for these things?—About this time, I happened to peruse a treatise of Mr. Law's, entitled, A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life, with which (if I may be allowed the expression) I was so charmed and greatly edified, that I resolved my flock should partake of the same spiritual food. I, therefore, gave to each person in my parish one of those useful books, and charged them upon my blessing (for I consider them as my children) to carefully peruse the same. My perseverance was now rewarded with success; and I had the satisfaction of beholding my people reclaimed, from a life of folly and impiety, to a life of holiness and devotion.

Before I conclude, I must beg leave to recommend the afore-mentioned book to the perusal of all your readers; and I heartily wish they may receive as much benefit therefrom, as those have who are committed to my charge.

inent, nor so glorious and efficacious as it is in man.

Page 149. ad finem. Two different things are here desired in one question, which yet must needs be parted in two. The first is concerning the two tinctures and their division, and the second concerning the magia, and the appearing of animals in it. (1.) As to the first, this I think may be a sufficient declaration thereof, and as short as I can make it. Fire and water are and must be in the generation of eternal nature, and so of temporal nature also. When and wheresoever eternal nature is in its right harmonious order, then and there these two cannot but be united, or stand in a most internal union. This union is consequently holy, pure, and heavenly, and so must also those creatures be wherein this union is. Now then, seeing that this third principle was spoiled, and all its properties disharmonised by the fall of Lucifer; seeing further, that it was not to be restored immediately unto its primeval glory and dignity, but that it should be settled for an appointed time in a lower and exterior condition, wherein it cannot be called holy, pure, and heavenly, but mixed, transitory, and elementary: and again, seeing that nevertheless in this mixed state it should have the whole nature, or all the properties of nature, working and generating therein; these two therefore which cannot be separated from nature, must needs in this third principle have been divided. Yet so (because of its being but one world) that a communion or mutual communication between them might be left both in the whole government, or whole generation of this temporal nature, and in the particular creatures also belonging thereunto, and governed thereby. Now this division was made accordingly on the second day of the creation, not in any particular place or thing, but generally throughout the whole extent of this region, that so a perpetual communication might be between that which is superior and that which is inferior. When therefore the living creatures now were produced, to be temporal, mixed, four-elementary, not eternal, holy, one-elementary creatures, they must needs have been formed in and according to this division also. For seeing that their original was only in, and their end only to this mixed world, they could not have been gifted with that holy union, which heavenly creatures only can be capable of. But man, having a higher original, came not out of this divided twofold source, but according to that end he was designed for, he had the whole eternal nature in its due harmonious order and union within his own single person. So therefore, as it was impossible that he should be a twofold male and female image in his first creation, so was it impossible also that animals should not be males and females, or should not have (which is the same thing) the two tinctures in their division. For the tincture here with respect to the living creatures, may be sufficiently described by saying that—it is that tender, loving inclination towards that which from the first original in eternal nature is its nearest and most internal part. Though I do freely grant that a deeper description thereof might be given by saying—that it is rather that ground which in animals is the root of that inclination, that which stirreth up the same, that which floweth out therein, and which

This excellent treatise is wrote in a strong and nervous style, and abounds with many new and sublime thoughts: in a word, one may say of this book as Sir Richard Steele did of a discourse of Dr. South's, that it has in it whatever wit and wisdom can put together; and I will venture to add, that whoever sits down without prejudice, and attentively reads it through, will rise up the wiser man and better christian.²⁹ [Errat. The 'Serious Call' was first published in 1729, not 1728.]

It would, perhaps, be difficult to conceive a finer illustration of Mr. Law's solid and universal theological knowledge, than this circumstance, namely, that individuals, who had begun their religious course under the discipline and guidance of his practical books and conversation, but who afterwards were induced to abandon his rule, on the plausible representation of a shorter 'way to Christ' and salvation, than the Old Testament experimental path in which they were traveling,—that they, on again glancing over the elementary treatises of their early studies, some twenty or thirty years afterwards, expecting to meet therein with low and superficial knowledge, should find, to their great surprise, the author's ground of understanding to be manifestly, as much superior to their own, with all their supposed evangelical light, as when they first put themselves under his direction. Like the continental tourist, who, having set out to make the ascent of a neighbouring mountain, after proceeding some twenty or thirty hours on his journey, looks up, and to his astonishment, finds it towering above him at almost the same distance, though in more imposing majesty, as on commencing his excursion.

But the full merits of his genius as an evangelical divine, cannot be duly appreciated, until the spirit of his mind, as portrayed in his writings, have been traced through all the degrees of the christian life, up to the last or highest point thereof; to which, as an able minister of the Spirit and not of the letter, he conducts his faithful follower and disciple, introducing him apprehensively, into immediate communion with the triune Deity of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, thus rendering him a worshipper of God, 'in spirit and in truth.' For as such is the sole end of all divine dispensations and institutes, so it is the design and consummation of all his teachings as an illuminated interpreter of religious truth.

These latter ministrations are contained in that series of his works, beginning with the 'Spirit of Prayer,' and terminating with the 'Address to the Clergy,' the last words of which, wrote only a few days before his decease were, by a singular coincidence, those of his master, the 'Great Teacher' himself, on closing his earthly ministry, thus:—"All that Christ was, did, suffered, dying in the flesh, and ascending into heaven, was for this sole end: to purchase for all his followers a new birth, new life, and new light, in and by the Spirit of God restored to them, and living in them, as the support, comforter, and guide into the truth. And this was his, Lo I am with you always unto the end of the world."—The first series of his theological works may be considered to close with the 'Three Letters to a Lady inclined to the Church of Rome;' the second series to commence with his discourse 'on the Sacrament;' and the last, as just stated, with the 'Spirit of Prayer.'

It is, however, to be well observed, that the true apprehension and profit of his writings, can only be obtained, by passing through them experimentally, in regular order, from the commencement. Indeed, the reason why complaints have been made against his later works may be said to be solely owing to this, that half-instructed christians, or totally unqualified readers, instead of so entering upon and pursuing the study of them, (which had been according to the order of spiritual nature, and the process of the Holy Scriptures,) they have, as it were, jumped into the midst of his last dissertations, and thereupon found themselves out of their depth, having nothing to cling is conveyed thereby from the one into the other. Yet seeing that this latter, abstracted from that former, is all imperceptible in man as well as in beasts, and that it is made perceptible only in and by that former, by a joint consideration of these two, the tincture may be sufficiently described, viz. in this peculiar place, and with reference to the living creatures. If then this be, as to the fiery part in males, and as to the watery in females, their longing desire from both sides after a conjunction, and in the conjunction, the impregnation, and propagation may be easily understood. (2.) As to the second; the magia, wherein all the living creatures shall appear eternally, is in short, that incessant operation of the six working properties of eternal nature in the seventh, whereby an infinite variety and multiplicity of figures, forms, and images, was produced, changed and altered from eternity. If there now had been intellectual creatures before the creation of angels, all these wonders of this eternal magia would certainly have appeared unto them; but since there were none, they could not be known except only to the Spirit of eternity. Considering then (1.) That after the time of this world there shall be innumerable hosts of intellectual creatures, men especially, that are more concerned with the wonders of this third principle than angels. (2.) That this principle with its wonders is not to be annihilated, but shall be exalted again into its primeval glory and dignity. (3.) That all these temporal creatures are but figures, representatives, and outbirths, of those eternal magical powers. And (4.) That it shall be kept eternally in man's remembrance, what God hath done with him in time; what wonders he hath brought forth by his eternal wisdom, and that nothing, neither great nor little, was done or made in vain, etc. Considering, I say, all these and the like things together, we may easily come to understand what Behmen meaneth when he saith that all the creatures of this world, and so the living creatures also, shall appear in the eternal magia to the praise and honour of the Creator, and rejoicing or delight of men and angels. Which yet is to be understood in a different way, according to the difference of the two eternal worlds. For the last day of judgment, and purification by fire, is a day of separation, dividing the good from

to, or depend upon, but God alone, a character of divinity they were unacquainted with. On emerging from which, and again feeling their wonted creatural or doctrinal supports, they have 'blessed their stars' for the 'way of simple faith,' and resolved for the future to keep clear of the infatuating quagmire of mysticism.

'Speak thou with us, and we will hear,' said the Israelites to Moses, 'but let not God speak unto us, lest we die.' It was not, it has been observed, through irreligion they escaped from God, but it was through a religion, and a divinely appointed religion. Though they had no direct intercourse with God, they had to do with ordinances of his own appointment, and by these they pacified their consciences. Here was their great delusion: for they came to have a religion for their God, instead of God for their religion. And is it not so, even in our own day, under the full light of the Gospel? Are not 'evangelical doctrines' treated in the same way, as 'blessed' and 'soul saving' and 'comforting'? Is not the 'atonement' and 'death of Christ,' the 'finished work of Christ,' as it is termed, hugged in the conscience as a rest and a confidence, whilst the religious professor is neither living crucified to the world, with its goods and its ills under his feet, nor worshipping God spiritually, nor trusting in him immediately and altogether? Thus what was done by the ancient children of God, with their ordinances, is it not acted over and over again in all ages? at one period by the serpent of brass, at another by rosaries and crucifixes, and intercession of saints, at another by the church and apostolic successions, and at another by evangelical doctrines—whilst but a mystical 'seven thousand' are ever found who worship God 'in spirit and in truth.'

An equally rational and substantial answer, might likewise be given to the objections, which have been made by the same description of persons, at another time, against his early publications of the 'Christian Perfection' and the 'Serious Call,' as not sufficiently dwelling (they say) upon 'faith in the atonement,' in connection with that prayer, self-denial, humility, universal love, resignation, and other constant exercises of devotion to God, which are so fundamentally inculcated in those works; whereby the devout soul might (in their phraseology) 'at once obtain pardon,' and rise out of self-abasement, penitence, and humble confidence in the mercy of God, into 'joy,' 'peace,' and 'salvation.'

But, such complaints may be made against the Old Testament dispensation itself, in regard to its practical character, as the mystical childhood of man's spiritual renewal, the whole Bible itself being the entire symbol—as only a preparatory school unto Christ, a ritual of carnal ordinances, washings and purifications, as confessions and memorials of an inward spiritual pollution, and as sure types and figures of a cleansing and deliverance from it; thereby inducing its subjects, in the full assurance of faith and hope, to call upon God for deliverance, without understanding how or when that should be effected—Why, it may be asked, why were not these devout worshippers led to Christ at once: i. e. and suddenly from children, turned into men? "Why put a foundation below the foundation?" As justly, might the mosaical and prophetic dispensation be objected to, as these two fundamental treatises of Mr. Law; for they are both of the same mystical character, in respect to the soul that is to be restored to perfection.

As, however, the coming of Christ, both in the flesh and in the spirit, was suitably timed to the preceding dispensations, and his whole process figurative of that of our renewal, so did the analogy truly hold in Mr. Law's experience and writings. Wherefore, in his succeeding works of the 'Sacrament Book,' the 'Tract on Regeneration,' and the 'Serious Answer to Trap,' there will be found every thing stated, to not only strengthen the hope and assure the faith of a devout, penitential soul, but they, as it were, lift him up into the heavenly sanctuary itself, where is the true high priest, with the blood of the sacrifice, ever making the full, the perfect, the effectual atonement and intercession; where, moreover, he sees as it were, the title-deeds to every degree of salvation, purity, holiness, and wisdom he may desire to be possessed of—yea, constituting him the 'heir of God, and joint-heir with Christ,' and (1 Cor. iii. 20—22,) of 'all things.' Thus, indeed, defying him not to 'believe.'

But it may be worth the enquiry, on the present occasion, What does all this, in effect, amount to? Is the subject of divine drawings to consider the lively representation to him of such verities, and his apprehension thereof, pardon, justification, divine peace and salvation; and the temporary composing effects upon the mind flowing therefrom, that love, joy, peace, etc. which are 'the fruits' or direct communications of the Spirit of God in his truly regenerate children? as is too commonly taught. Truths these are, precious and glorious truths indeed, as they are the ground of all divine rethe evil, and giving unto each its own proper place. So, therefore, of all the creatures of this mixed world, only the good part separated from the evil, belongeth and shall be gathered into the light; when contrariwise, the evil part, separated from the good, shall appear in the dark world, out of which it had its first original.

Page 151. Q. 1. Seeing that the greatest emphasis in this question lieth in the word finishing all his works; I think a little more might be reflected thereupon in the answer, by representing more distinctly, that the whole generation of nature, as to its working part, is finished in the six first properties; and that therefore, when these six had done what God would have them do, the creation-work could not have gone further, but must needs have been finished also.

Q. 2. Six days were employed in the work of creation, not only to represent (as here is said) which is as it were only a posteriori, but also and even chiefly to employ and set to work all the six operating spirits of eternal nature; which being just six, neither more days nor fewer, could have been employed.

Page 153. Line ult. More explicitly, I think, might here be declared, that man should have been translated into eternity, when the appointed time of this third principle had been expired, viz. if he had continued in rest from his own work.

Page 155. Line ult. I find something, which, if it shall represent the sense of Behmen, must needs be otherwise expressed; but if no regard is had to Behmen's ground, doctrine, and declaration, it may be left as it is. For it concerns but an opinion, and such a one as he could not indeed himself approve of, but left it, nevertheless, to every one's own liberty to hold thereof what he thinks himself able to understand, viz. of the seventh blessed time or age (which, I suppose, is taken to be during this four-elementary world, before the period thereof is quite expired; that is, before the coming of Christ as judge of the dead and living,) two things are said here, which in such absolute terms Behmen would not have owned. (1.) The creation shall be delivered from the bon- velation and intercourse with fallen man. But what is the end of such truth, and of the knowledge of it? Not to induce those who for the first time apprehend it, to believe themselves 'justified,' 'pardoned,' 'saved,' and so to settle down and rejoice, as having made a grand advance in religion, as having received some extraordinary manifestations of the divine favour (which is too commonly done): but, to set them upon 'working out their salvation' with 'fear and trembling,' yet with all the courage, cheerfulness, and gratitude, which the conviction of the love and gracious assistance of God, and the certainty of final triumph and endless glorification with Christ, are calculated to inspire. To nerve their souls with holy resolutions, to magnanimously 'fight the good fight of faith, and lay hold of eternal life.' Thus leading them necessarily into the true order of spiritual advancement; namely, to feel their own nothingness, and the absolute necessity of the new birth, and a total momentary dependence upon God alone, in every step of their progress; which only deserves the name of 'conversion,' or 'salvation.' Such, then, being the ground of understanding of Mr. Law's practical treatises, where stand the objections against them? and who can henceforth utter them, but such as are imperfectly acquainted with the theory of true Christian theology?

The sum of the matter (with respect to Mr. Law's evangelical knowledge and systematic exhibition of practical Christian truth) is this, or may be thus represented. He, as a wise master-builder, profoundly versed in the ancient science of spiritual architecture, which, by the way, seems now to be almost lost, not only designs a noble edifice, complete in all its parts and perfect, but lays the basis broad and solid, upon the eternal 'foundation that is laid,' the rock Christ Jesus, and thence proceeds to raise the superstructure in due order and degree, according to the principles of the science and his own practical experience. Such being the case, he has no occasion during the construction, to be perpetually reminding himself that he must 'believe' in the rock, upon which he is building, (for he knows it to be firm and steadfast, and laid by God purposely for him to build upon,) neither to regard the diversified opinions of professors of imaginary evangelical architecture, one party of whom, on examining the ground floor of the edifice, laments his want of 'comforting views of the principles of building,' for that he keeps the rock or 'foundation in the back ground,' or at all events is not always talking about it at every step of his progress; another avers that he ought to rest his whole hope on the 'finished work' of the foundation, for that is the true evangelical way of building, while a third pities him as a most 'unscriptural' workman, that he is seeking to raise his edifice by his 'own works,' and so detracting from the merits of the foundation; whereas he ought to do nothing more than 'merely believe' in the rock, and then the superstructure would rise of itself, for that St. Paul teaches 'justification,' as well as 'sanctification,' to be 'by faith alone.' But disregarding all this babylonish confusion of scripture science, he soberly proceeds with his labours, until the top stone be put on, when, the whole being completed according to the Gospel model, he gives glory to God for his free grace in providing a ground or rock, so sure and steadfast, whereon to erect his edifice, with all the materials for its construction, and for enduing him with wisdom and strength, and perseverance to complete it, though at the cost of all worldly satisfactions. Such is a figurative representation of the ground of Mr. Law's understanding in his devotional writings; and such the character of the critical observations which have been made upon them, by some modern professors of divinity.

To proceed with the narrative. Another of Mr. Law's correspondents was the celebrated Dr. Byrom, of Manchester, sometime Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, a poet of renown in his day, and an inventor of stenography: who was a great admirer of his genius, so much so, indeed, as in after years, to render into verse copious selections from his writings, and to voluntarily carry on a controversy in his defence, with the celebrated Dr. Warburton, against the perverse attacks of that indiscreet writer. To which Mr. Law himself paid no attention, until the appearance of the 'Divine Legation,' when he took up his pen, and wrote his famous 'Letter' to Bishop Sherlock on that work, and thereby so effectually silenced his antagonist, that the latter did not venture either to reply to that letter, or to mention his name again in public, until after his decease, which was some years afterwards. (See Payne's Letter to the Bishop of Gloucester, 1761.—Dr. B.'s Poems.)

A large accession of fortune rendering Dr. Byrom independent of his profession as a physician, he became a great reader and collector of the books and writings recommended or approved of by Mr. Law, and also published a new edition of Behmen's 'Way to Christ,' 1752. His estate and library have descended into the inheritance of a lady of the name of Atherton, residing in the age of corruption under which it groaneth. For though, indeed, he owneth a seventh blessed age, which he calleth the manifestation of Zion, the time of lilies and roses, the Enochian life, etc., and whereof he foretells many great, wonderful and excellent things that shall be done therein to the church of God; yet he hath declared also himself, and shown his ground sufficiently, that the creation, during this time of the four elements and the starry heaven, cannot be fully, totally, and universally delivered from the bondage of corruption and vanity, though, it may, indeed, partake something of the immunities and advantages of this blessed time of refreshment: which expression of the scripture itself, denotes but such an imperfect state as cannot yet be applied to a total or universal deliverance.

(2.) Of this blessed seventh age is said also, that therein the paradisaical, inward, invisible things, hid under the thick veil of this gross, earthly world, shall be manifested. If this were so expressed that it could be understood of the mysteries of the kingdom of Christ, hid under the veil of Moses, and with a particular relation to the inward, regenerated part of man; or also, so that it might be understood of a nearer communication than what is now, between paradise and this corrupt four-elementary world, nothing could be objected. But if the meaning shall be this—that paradise shall be re-opened in this world, and shall penetrate the earth and the four elements, as it did before the fall and curse; and that so, not only as to man and his regenerated part, but also as to all the creatures, the same state shall be again, which then was in this principle when man stood yet in his entire perfection, without any apparent mixture of good and evil, very much could be said against it. But because it is not my intent to overthrow any man's harmless opinion, which Behmen himself hath left free unto every one, and hath only declared his ground and reasons why he could not embrace it; this only may suffice, viz. to recommend to a serious consideration, that a manifestation of the one pure eternal element, and a manifestation of the four temporal elements, cannot consist together in one time and place. For, when and where the four are manifest, then and there the one must needs neighbourhood of Manchester, who is as distinguished for her high christian principles, and princely liberality in the cause of religion and charity, as was her worthy predecessor for his estimable old English character, and benevolent attempts to diffuse the love and practise of religion and virtue, among all mankind. In the year 1736, he wrote to Mr. Law, stating that one of his relations, a devout woman, was on the point of separating from the Church of England, to join the Quakers, which he was anxious to prevent, and therefore requested Mr. Law, as a writer, in whose piety and judgment the party in question had expressed great confidence, to address her, in dissuasion from her purpose, giving him the grounds of her secession. He accordingly wrote five letters, (dated November and December, 1736,) wherein he considers the several points of her case, and forwarded them to Dr. Byrom, with a request that they might be returned to him again; possibly with a view to revision and publication, but which did not take place, and they are now in the possession of the writer of these lines.

At the close of this same year, his ancient friend, Mr. Gibbon, died. This necessarily led to a change in his domestic circumstances, though he did not finally retire from the town until about four years after that event. Whether any pecuniary mark of respect were bequeathed to him in the will of the deceased, does not appear, though an allusion in the letter of one of his correspondents might induce a conjecture to that effect.

As already stated, it was between the years 1733 and 1736, he first became acquainted with those writings with which his name has become so identified, that he is now scarcely known by any other distinction. That may be considered another important epoch, and eventful circumstance in his life; not so much on account of what has ensued therefrom hitherto, as what may justly be expected, but as yet lying in the inscrutable womb of Providence: though the nature of those writings, the intrinsic necessities of mankind, the prophecies of revelation, the progressing developments of the great spirit of nature, and the relative state of the world, may enable an enlightened mind to form some general surmises what those events shall be, and when they shall be brought to the birth. In a letter to a friend, (November, 1754,) Mr. Law thus expresses himself, 'But all pretences and endeavours to hinder the opening of the mystery, revealed by God in Jacob Behmen, and its bearing down all before it, will be as vain, as so many attempts to prevent or retard the coming of the last day.' In order to understand the exact sense of this wonderful author, he took the extraordinary pains and trouble to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the German language, in which the writings in question were originally indited and published.

Here, indeed, there would be room for enlargement, if place and circumstances would allow. The effect upon him, on first accidentally alighting upon the treatises of Behmen, has formerly been alluded to. To understand the sentiments of his mind on that occasion, it will be needful to consider the character of his education and studies up to that period; which may be inferred from the treatises he had already published, and from the fact of his having been solidly versed in all the regular university learning, science, and philosophy of his day. Then, is to be taken into account, his strong distaste for anything visionary or novel in religion, which would only be a natural consequence of his sober, orthodox views, and pure christian principles; as, singular enough, but recently exhibited in his correspondence already mentioned with Miss 'Dodwell,' for instance, in the following extract therefrom (which may also, serve as a specimen of his high qualifications, and great powers as a casuist):—

"The short of the matter is this: man fallen from innocence and perfection, can only turn to God as a penitent; he is, therefore, as such, turned out of Paradise, a place of heavenly enjoyment, into a world cursed for his sake, full of cross, and trouble, and burthen, and vanity, that he may there have continual occasion to exercise all the humble tempers of a pious penitence, and meet with every trial that may best purify and prepare his soul for its return to God.

And when one considers how poorly and vainly human philosophy has, in all ages, talked about God, and religion; and, on the other hand, what a depth of wisdom and treasure of knowledge is discovered to us in the Scriptures, without any help from human parts, or human learning; it is easy to see from whence our light and knowledge in religion is to be expected, and who are the best qualified to partake of it.

If we look into history, we can hardly find any churchman remarkable for an uncommon extent of human learning, without having troubled the world with some inventions of his own, some fan-be hid under and by this manifestation of the four. And so contrariwise,—when the one is manifest, the four are swallowed up in this one, and by this same manifestation thereof. Now, in the one is only good; and, in the four, is good and evil, mixed. Good and evil, therefore, cannot be separated (though this latter, in a great degree, may be suppressed and kept under by that former,) before the day of Christ's appearing unto judgment, who shall then find all still in a mixed state, which is apparent enough from that description he gave himself, concerning the day of his appearance. From hence, it is now plain that the following words, which they think to be the opening of the seventh seal in the revelation, cannot be understood with reference to Behmen; for he truly did not think that this which was so expressed, is the opening of the seventh seal, but only that which he did own thereof, and found a ground for it in his communicated gift, and which in part is here by me declared, and is answering also to his own declaration of the seventh seal's opening in the philosophical work; which doth not bring in an absolute paradisaical or heavenly perfection, but only such a perfection as the creature can be capable of, during the time of this four-elementary world. [N.B.]

Page 157. Line penult. This matter would, I think, be plainer, and more significantly expressed, if it were shortly thus represented,—that Christ, as the eternal Word, belongeth not to the number of the seven, being beyond and above them; but that he came down into them, by taking upon him human nature: wherefore, then, he was truly and properly as an eighth unto them; and must have been so, because neither all the seven together in general, nor any of them in particular, was able to reharmonise the disordered state in human nature.

Page 161. A. 1. In this answer, nothing is said of that great, mysterious, principal point which Behmen delivered, by saying—man is created upon the cross: his body hath the figure of a cross, and because of that first creation, Christ must have redeemed him on the cross, etc., without which the creation of man cannot be fundamentally understood. But seeing that this is left out, because cied improvements upon the common christianity. The great Origen was one of the first instances of this kind; he was celebrated as the oracle of learning, as a possessor of all the sciences; along with this, he was of a very pious and mortified life, and full of contempt of the world: but, for my own part, I should have left his conversation, his deep discoveries, and allegorical explanations of Scripture, to have spent my time and learned religion with a poor mechanic that I have somewhere read of, whose heart and life was governed by this spirit: 'I am nothing, I have nothing, I am worth nothing: I desire nothing, but to love, adore, praise and obey God, in every thing, and for every thing.'

Was the world to see this remark upon learning, they would in all probability impute it to my want of learning; and though they would be very right in judging my pretensions to learning not to be great, yet it would be unjust to think me an entire stranger to the nature of it.

But I profess to you, that whatever parts or learning I am possessed of, I think it as necessary to live under a continual apprehension of their being a snare and temptation to me, as of any worldly distinctions, whether of riches or dignity, that I should be possessed of: and I desire no other improvement of science or knowledge, nor to see into any depths, but such as penitence, humility, faith, hope, charity, the pure love of God, and an absolute resignation to his providence, shall discover to me. These virtues fill the mind with more light and knowledge of God, than all the libraries of human learning in the world; and are a much shorter and surer way to the possession and enjoyment of Divine Truth, than that of turning over the endless volumes of the learned. They are the keys of divine knowledge, and afford an easy entrance to those that keep them: they make us 'friends of God;' and, as such, always in a state of finding his certain care and guidance of us: they are, as it were, so many inward eyes of the soul, always receiving a sufficiency of light from God: and we never are at loss or perplexity, but when some of these divine virtues are either too imperfectly practised, or wholly neglected by us.

I take the matter to be just thus with relation to the discourses about the restoration of all things, etc., they are about something that we have not the least knowledge of, nor any faculties or foundation for such knowledge: we have nothing certain or plain within ourselves about it, and so have nothing to oppose to anything that is told us; we are, therefore, easily taken by every writer, that has parts and abilities to form an agreeable scheme of it.

Again, there is another thing which prepares our minds for a reception of such discourses. The irrecoverable state of men, or angels, is a dreadful thought to us; our sense of misery, tenderness, and compassion for our fellow-creatures, makes us wish that no creatures might fall into it; and we are unable to shew how such a state should result from the infinite wisdom, goodness, and perfection of God; and so we are mightily prepared to think every scheme to be rational and well-grounded, that puts an end to such a state.

But then we must consider, that we are here governed by our passions and weakness, and only form a God according to our own conceptions: we must consider, that the infinite wisdom, goodness, and perfection of God, is the fathomless object of our faith and adoration, and not of our comprehension; and to pretend to know what God must do, by virtue of such attributes, in the vast compass of futurity, with regard to his fallen creatures, is as absurd, as to pretend to be infinitely wise ourselves. For as God is so, for this only reason, because he knows what infinite wisdom, goodness, and perfection, require of him; so if we knew that, we should be in the same state of perfection.

The inability to account for the present disordered state of the creation, has made many philosophers turn atheists, and deny an all-wise and good providence; but these poor men are self-condemned, and fall into the greatest of all absurdities, only to avoid a difficulty that has no absurdity in it. They deny a providence of an infinitely perfect being, because they cannot account for such a providence in the present state of things: and yet, if there was such a providence, it could not be what it is supposed to be, unless it was infinitely above their comprehension: this is their great self-condemnation and absurdity.

Again, they reject a first and governing cause of infinite wisdom, and goodness, because they see so much evil and disorder in the world.

But why do they conclude thus? It is from their own sense of wisdom and goodness; they feel such a goodness and benevolence in themselves, that they would not permit what they see per-

(as I suppose) of its being uncommon, and requiring a deep understanding of the generation of eternal nature and its cross, I shall say nothing more of it.

Page 161. No. 3 Here I meet with some obscurity. These two, man's fallen estate, and the earthly property of his body, seem to be set together as one only thing, without any distinction; when they must needs be distinguished. For the earthly property (according to what is said No. 4, and again Page 165, A. 1) was that which was in man of the earth before his fallen estate; when it was not manifest, but covered by paradise predominant in him. But his fallen estate is now the manifestation of that earthly property, made afterwards, when paradise was covered and veiled by his now predominant earthliness.

Page 162. Lines 4 and 5. with a power of manifesting themselves. Seeing that these words are indifferently applied to two different bodies, when only the one of them, viz. that which was interior and superior, can be said to have had such a power; I think the sense of these words might be rather thus expressed, or after any other the like manner—the one with a power of manifesting itself in its due time, and the other with an ability of being manifested by man's own wavering imagination. Or this latter part thus—and the other with a power of appearing and exerting itself immediately after a disappearing of that which then was still predominant, and kept it under. For that inferior, four-elementary body, while it was a body only potentially, had no power in it for to manifest itself, nor should ever have been able to do it, if man's own imagination had not empowered it, by turning itself away from its internal, pure and holy object.

Page 163. A. 2. The latter part of this answer I would alter a little, for several reasons, and to prevent a two-fold objection, saying thus, or something the like—but not so highly dignified, glorious, and heavenly, as it would have been at the changing of this third principle, if he had not fallen.

Q. ult. Seeing that the paradisaical property was the middlemost, as having above it the heamitted in the present state of things; and, therefore, they conclude, that such a state cannot come from, or be under the direction of a cause of infinite wisdom and goodness.

But here they are again in a state of self-condemnation, and taken in the greatest of absurdities: for if they feel wisdom and goodness in themselves, whence have they them? As their existence is an infallible proof, that something did always exist; as everything finite is a proof of something infinite in the same kind; so their own wisdom and goodness is as plain and infallible a proof that the cause from whence they proceed, and under which they subsist, is infinitely wise and good.

So that for a being to argue from his own wisdom and goodness, that the first cause is destitute of both, has all the absurdity in it, as if he should conclude from his own power and life, that the first cause from which he proceeds, and under which he subsists, is destitute of power and life.

These absurdities must be embraced by those, who are too reasonable to adore an infinitely wise and incomprehensible providence.

Deep and long thinking upon the providence of God has an appearance of a very pious exercise; and a zeal to set it in some new light, or confute adversaries in some better way than common texts of Scripture, has often betrayed well-meaning men into measures prejudicial to religion; and that which they intended as a support to religion, has helped the adversary to oppose it with a greater shew of argument.

I am not against our using all the arguments that reason and learning can furnish us with, in defence of religion; but I think we are much mistaken, when we place our chief strength there, and conclude that Christianity must prosper, or infidelity decline, accordingly as all objections and difficulties are more or less cleared up and solved.

For as religion never entered into the fallen world that way, by condescending to explain all the difficulties, or answer the objections that ignorance, malice, self-love, pride, curiosity, wit, or worldly learning, could bring against it; as no revelation from God ever dealt in this manner, with this kind of adversaries; so it is against reason to think, that it must now, or at any other time, be supported in that manner.

For these tempers have no right or claim to be answered or satisfied in their own way; as they are only so many disorders or corruptions of the soul, so they are to have no relief from religion, but that of dying before it. To give pride, self-love, or curiosity, the resolutions they require, would be keeping up the disorder of fallen spirits, which, as such, can only be saved by a religion that calls them to self-renunciation, to penitence, humility, faith, and absolute resignation to God.

If speculative instructions, and resolutions of doubts, had been the right way of delivering man from the corruption and disorders of his nature; if nice and determinate decisions of the difficulties and depths of providence, had been a proper requisite for entering into the spirit of christianity; can it be thought that our blessed Lord would have said, 'Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye cannot enter into the kingdom of God?'

But if an infant simplicity, if self-renunciation, if humility of heart, and a total resignation of ourselves to the wisdom and goodness of God, be proper and necessary dispositions of the soul that is to be saved through Christ; it cannot well be thought that Christianity is then best defended, or the hearts of people best assisted for the reception of it, or adherence to it, when speculative decisions of its matters of faith are most studied and appealed to.

If all who wish well to Christianity, and are desirous to stop the growth of infidelity, would oppose it with their lives, and produce the practice of true Christian virtues in defence of religion; infidelity would sink into the utmost shame and confusion, and Christianity would be more than mathematically demonstrated to common sense. But the misfortune is, that, in every attack, we think there is something wanted in point of argument, and so are racking our thoughts for something new in the way of reasoning; whereas the enemy is in his state of strength, and we in our state of weakness, because we are doing nothing but argue, and are contending for a dead christianity: did we but begin its defence, by entering upon new lives, the old arguments would be sufficient.

You ask, 'When discoveries of this kind are thrown into our way, is it matter of strict duty to reject, instead of giving them entertainment, and not rather be grateful for them? And if we may venly, and under it the earthly, it is not very proper to ask (as here is done) which was the next to it? for though, in one particular respect, the earthly might be conceived as the next; yet in another, the heavenly may also be conceived so; and in a third, the one of them was as near as the other. Wherefore then, the question might be formed thus—which was the second property? or thus—which property may be supposed to be next, with respect to this exterior third principle?

Page 165. A. 1. the corrupt property of the earth, which it had from the fall of Lucifer. An understanding reader may find, indeed, in these words the intended, right, and true sense; yet to him that is not yet so well acquainted with these uncommon things, they may seem to be hard, and liable to several objections. To prevent which, I would express it thus, or after any other manner like unto this—the earthly property, which though pure in man, (as a quintessence is pure, in comparison to that grosser mass out of which it is extracted) was yet nearly related to the earth without him, which was infected from the fall of Lucifer. For though the whole third principle may well be said to have been corrupted by Lucifer, viz. when it is considered as his region or kingdom, and with respect to what he hath done and acted therein; yet, when it is considered as taken from him, and brought into another state in the creation by God, whose works are altogether good, we cannot well call it corrupt, without giving offence, more or less. But this we may say, that it had, as it were at the bottom, an infection from Lucifer, whose dwelling place in some sense it is; who still pretendeth to be the prince thereof, and who hath an access into the dark infected bottom thereof. For this is plain and demonstrable enough, from its having a certain period of time, appointed in the very creation, and a day of separation, in which it shall be entirely purified by fire, and delivered from that infection.

And so also the words, with the corrupt property in it, I would alter a little accordingly, that they might not be understood so as if the corrupt property, as corrupt, had also been formed into Adam's body. For this was extracted out of that, and by this same extraction made pure; but that not give them the credit of Divine revelation, yet may we not entertain such things as probabilities, as a harmless entertainment of one's busy thoughts, as things that may innocently be believed or rejected? I do not deny that there are such things.

But if I knew of any body that wanted them, or sought for relief in them, I should caution him against them; for such entertainment of our busy thoughts, is often as dangerous as the entertainment of our restless passions; because the activity and curiosity of our minds is not a little prejudicial to true devotion and piety of heart.

If it could be supposed, that these probabilities would always be considered as we at first received them, there would be very little to be said for them; for why should our mind, which should be always in a state of reverence and adoration of divine truths, and feeding itself with solid enjoyment and satisfaction in them, seek for religious amusement in groundless imaginations? for, supposing (what is here supposed) that they may be as innocently denied as believed, they can only be groundless imaginations. But when we consider the weakness of our minds, how easily they are affected with what they admit, and how soon that which was thought of only as an amusement or bare probability is changed into a solid truth or fundamental point, we shall find that such entertainment is a dangerous indulgence of our thoughts.

The matter you here propose, seems to be taking this very turn upon your own mind: you propose it as an innocent probability, or speculative amusement of one's busy thoughts; yet, a few lines after, you say, 'This does not, therefore, seem to be a matter of mere speculation, but of great use and benefit.' And perhaps a little longer dwelling upon it, would make you take it for a fundamental point, and that christianity could not be received without it: and so the entertainment of busy thoughts would drive you upon a rock. Humility, faith, and a total resignation of ourselves to the fathomless depths of the divine providence, are our only guard against this danger.

As the fall of our first parents, though in innocence, seems to be owing to the desire of a knowledge not suitable to their state; so we sin in the same temper, when our curiosity searches for a higher knowledge than that which is revealed to us. It is an excellent saying of the son of Sirach, 'Seek not out the things that are too hard for thee; neither search the things that are above thy strength; but what is commanded thee think thereupon with reverence. For it is not needful for thee to see with thine eyes the things that are in secret. Many are deceived by their own vain opinion, and an evil suspicion hath overthrown their judgment.' Chap. iii.

I hope I shall not offend you by observing of your great and good father, whose memory I esteem and reverence, that his chief foible seems to have lain in a temper too speculative; and, perhaps, you may have some reason to resist and guard against it, as a temper to which you have a natural inclination. [Surely he is here referred to, not Dodwell.]

But be that as it will, thus much I think I may assure you of, that however such curiosity might be innocently indulged, yet, if upon a principle of humility, faith, and resignation to God, you deny it, you will be a much greater gainer by the exercise of these virtues in such an instance of self-denial, than you could possibly be, by any knowledge such curiosity would lead you into.

You may perhaps think, that I have too often recourse to these virtues, and seek for too much support from them; but, Madam, they are the highest virtues of the most enlightened souls, and as they lead the mind farthest into the truest, deepest knowledge of the mysteries of God, so the best knowledge of the mysteries of God, gives the greatest height and strength to these virtues. And when a Christian is at the height of all the perfection which the spirit and grace of the Gospel leads to, though he has been with St. Paul in the third heavens, he will then be, more than ever, all humility, all faith, and all resignation to God; and will find all language too weak to express that fulness and extent in which he desires to practice these virtues.

As to the matter proposed, it cannot well be looked upon as an harmless probability, because the tenour of Scripture, both as obvious to common sense, and as interpreted by the constant general belief of the church, is contrary to it; and therefore, till it shall please God to give some new revelation of this matter, and show its consistency with the divine revelation already made, there seems to be no room for an innocent reception of it.

As to the relief which is sought for in such discoveries, humility, faith, and resignation, make it needless, and give the mind a comfort and rest in God, which cannot be equalled by any such which it was extracted from was infected: and this, therefore, by reason both of this extraction and of this infection, was able to bring the corruption into man's body, when he descended into this lower infetted property, and stirred it up by his lustful imagination.

Page 165. A. ult. This answer cannot stand in these expressions, for the reasons following—
 (1.) The description here given of the heavenly property, is applicable unto the paradisaical also. (2.) Between the paradisaical and heavenly property, and so also body, I cannot find that Behmen makes any other considerable difference, but that of a higher and lower degree or dignity, relating to the two different stations of the first Adam. For the paradisaical, as the lower, was manifest when he was in paradise upon earth, and should have continued so until this third principle had been recalled into eternity; and the heavenly, as the higher, should then have been manifested when he was to be translated and exalted from this paradise into heaven. Since, now, this first order is broken by his fall, and his blessed eternal station must now be re-obtained quite another way, viz. by a regeneration out of water and Spirit; Behmen, when declaring this way, and speaking of that body which he is to put on in the regeneration, takes no more great notice of a distinction between a heavenly and paradisaical body, but useth these two denominations promiscuously, and calleth man's new-born body sometimes, indeed, paradisaical, but frequently also heavenly; notwithstanding that we still do rightly own, with him, a difference of degree between paradise and heaven. All which could be further illustrated and confirmed from the forty days of Christ, between his resurrection and ascension; wherein he was but in a paradisaical, not yet in a heavenly state, notwithstanding that he was always the Lord from heaven. And further also, from a consideration of the speculative light. For my own part, this one saying, 'Shall not the Judge of all the world do right?' is more to me, is a stronger support to my mind, and a better guard against all anxiety, than the deepest discoveries that the most speculative, inquisitive minds could help me to. With this one assurance of the infinitely infinite goodness of God, I resign up myself, my friends, relations, men, and angels, to the adorable and yet incomprehensible disposal of his wisdom; content and happy with this thought, that myself and all creatures will not only be treated with a goodness and benevolence like mine, but with a goodness so exceedingly superior to it, as no thought can comprehend, or language describe.

This, Madam, is the spirit and temper you are to have recourse to; and I make no doubt, but the piety of your heart, and those degrees of holiness to which you have already attained, will by the grace of God, enable you to find your peace and rest in it.

When, therefore, difficult questions or objections about the providence of God, are either suggested to you by the activity of your own mind, or from other people; you must look upon it to be as right and just to silence and confute such suggestions by humility, faith, and resignation to God, as it is right to throw water upon a fire that ought to be quenched, or to use any medicine proper to any distemper.

And as this is our strength, so it is always at hand, and nothing can take it from us. Every disorder, calamity, or temptation of life, whether within or without us, only helps us to so many more occasions of being more eminent in these virtues, and of finding our relief and strength in them. It is always in your power, to express to God your want of these virtues, and your earnest desire to practice them in the most perfect manner, and to find your strength and protection in them; and so long as you do so, you will put yourself into a condition to say, with the apostle, When I am weak, then am I strong.

Such were his principles, and such his counsels, [doubtless, in the above extract delicately referring to Jane Lead's professed 'Revelations'] at this time, which was about two years previous to meeting with the writings in question, of Behmen.

Now when all these circumstances are taken into consideration, his education, his judgment, his principles in favour of pure theology, and his prejudices against any improvement or enlargement upon the common christianity, and then—his taking up a book at an old book stall, and reading the title-page, thus, 'Concerning the Three Principles of the Divine Essence, of the eternal dark, light, and the temporary world: showing what the soul, the image and the spirit of the soul are; as also what angels, heaven, and paradise are: how Adam was before the fall, in the fall, and after the fall: and what the wrath of God, sin, death, the devils, and hell are: how all things have been, now are, and how they shall be at the last.' Then, his turning over to the contents, perusing a page or two, and finding, though the language strange, a deep and solid sense couched therein, every sentence, indeed, seeming to awaken a secret, and heretofore, unfelt knowledge in the depth of his mind, the author being, moreover, manifestly, a man of the purest, truest, liveliest evangelical experience—

When all these things are considered—what, it is remarked, must have been the power of truth, to produce such effects as did ensue thereupon, in a mind so constituted as his was! so furnished with defences against the insidious entrance of every species of error, and, as just shown, so averse to the reception of any the most seemingly innocent knowledge, beyond what was openly contained in the sacred scriptures. Nor can it be any wonder that the first insight into those writings, as he stated to a friend, put him into a perfect sweat.

Here, the secret mystery of all things, of all time, of all eternity, appeared to be fundamentally opened. Here, all that lay in religion and nature as a mystery unsearchable, and which had so often been the subject of his reverend thoughts and contemplations, was in its deepest ground revealed. Here in short, was presented the key to the universe of intellectual and physical nature, to all its laws, powers, and operations, every where, and in every individual thing. Here, in an instant, was unveiled the true ground and source of the Newtonian philosophy, and here the head-spring of all future solid progress, in all the branches of divine and natural, metaphysical and experimental philosophy. And finally, here was the natural means whereby to bring all nations, and people, and tongues, into the understanding, belief, and acknowledgement of the one only true faith, of the christian revelation. And the instrument—through which this incontestibly all-but-a-miracle was accomplished—a poor, illiterate man, whose only qualifications for the free divine action upon him therein seemed to have been his earnest devotion to God, his christian simplicity, and perfect abandonment of self-will! Thus much with respect to his first acquaintance with Behmen's writings.

It may also be added, that what Newton was with regard to natural philosophy, Law after-mechanical

new Jerusalem, which, forasmuch as coming down is certainly paradisaical, and is yet not said to come down out of paradise, but from God out of heaven. (3.) The simile of the gold in the ore, or the tincture in metals, is not applicable to the heavenly body in the paradisaical: nor is it ever so used by Behmen; because there is no such difference between these two pure internal things, as there is between the other two external things; the one of them only being pure, and the other all impure. But with respect to man's fallen state and new regeneration, he useth this simile frequently, comparing the ore (or, as he commonly expresseth it, the hard, gross, rude stone) to man's corrupt four-elementary body, or flesh and blood, which cannot inherit the kingdom of God; and the gold or tincture to the regenerated body, born from above, of water and spirit; which he calleth sometimes heavenly, because it is from heaven; and sometimes also paradisaical, because it cannot be had in man as heavenly, except it be first had as paradisaical. Wherefore then this question, What do they mean by this heavenly property? I would answer after such a manner,—They mean the same paradisaical property as to substance, they both being of the water and spirit of eternal life; but they consider it as higher and more inward, and with a particular relation to that exalted state which Adam, if he had not transgressed, was to have been taken up into, after the consummation of time, in the perfect restoration of this third principle. And then, for more distinction's sake, I would add further this following question and answer:

Q. Is this paradisaical and heavenly property still in all men? A. The paradisaical and heavenly property lieth still in all, though in different degrees, as a possibility to their regeneration and wards came to be with respect to metaphysical science. And what Boyle said in his 'Usefulness of Natural Philosophy,' that 'man is born the interpreter and priest of nature, ordained to celebrate divine service, not only in it, but for it,' is applicable to him in the highest sense. And further, what Kepler was to Newton, that Freher may be considered to have been to Law. Indeed, the analogy that runs between the development of the two branches of science, physics and metaphysics, since both had been placed upon a correct basis, through Behmen, (to be contemplated in the third chapter, from § 4, of 'Maclaurin's Account of Newton's Discoveries') is most remarkable. Unhappily, however, the pursuit of the latter branch, since Law's day, on the only sound basis, has been as much disregarded, as the former has been cultivated; which, if the reason of things were duly considered, must needs appear a strange circumstance, for there is the same positive truth in one as in the other, inasmuch as they relate to nothing more or less than the inside and outside of the same thing. As the powers and instinct of nature have in them a governing power and wisdom, so it cannot but be highly profitable to know the philosophy of the superior principles, their union and co-operation with the inferior natural powers, but above all, their relation to the supreme unity of all powers, with all the relative philosophy thereof, both of grace and nature: which is the science in question, based upon the soundest principles, and capable of endless research and experiment.

The appearance, in 1737, of a book, entitled, 'A Plain Account of the Nature and End of the Sacrament,' afforded him an opportunity of appearing again before the public, equipped, indeed, with fresh powers, as the champion and interpreter of revealed truth, which he had derived from his newly-discovered original source in the writings of Behmen, though as yet he ventured to use them but sparingly and inoffensively. His answer to the work in question, is entitled, 'A Demonstration of the Gross and Fundamental Errors, in A Plain Account, etc.,' and to such as desire to see through the imperfect common notions of that divine institution, and to obtain a clear understanding of its real nature and character, it may be heartily recommended for perusal, as well on the ground of edification as of instruction. The latter portion of it 'explaining the nature and extent of the redemption of all mankind by Jesus Christ' may, as already intimated, be considered an introduction to that grand system of fundamental and practical truth, or of true philosophical divinity, which is opened to the world, in so noble and captivating a manner, in all his subsequent writings.

His works, from this period, have been descriptively divided into two series, the first embracing the active and contemplative divinity of all ages, and sections of devoted christians, purified and raised to its highest perfection. And the second, consisting of an ascent from thence, into that cloudless atmosphere, whence St. John wrote his epistles, and where he also, pierced through and through with the divine light, was constrained to break forth in the same strain, proclaiming, with all the powers of his ravished soul, that God is love, mere love, the spirit of love, and love only; and to endeavour henceforth, by all the ingenuity of divine and human wisdom, to draw all the world to the full belief of that truth. His experience in such respect, answering to that of the four-and-twenty elders round about the throne, whose highest adoration of the divine glory, is the expression of the simplest truth, viz. 'thou art worthy to receive honour and glory, for thou hast created all things, and for thy glory they are and were created'—an unvarying devotion of all those whose inward state is a sense of the nothingness of creature and the all of God.

His chief study and employment, about this particular period, would appear to have been the making himself master of the substance of Freher's writings, and copying out those portions of them which he deemed desirable to possess. Part of the extracts thus made, though somewhat altered as to their form of paragraphs, and occasional retrenchments, have been inserted in the preceding pages of this treatise. Nor was he remiss in making researches after other enlightened writers upon theosophical science, as also upon spiritual quickening truth. For the time was at hand, when his high evangelical knowledge was to be called into service, as he himself afterwards, in the midst of its exercise, thus writes to a lady of quality, who was much mixed up with the great movements therein referred to: 'As to myself (he observes), I seem to myself to have no other part to act, nor any call to anything else, in this hurry, and struggle of zeal against zeal, in such a variety of forms; but only and fully to assert the true ground, and largely open all the reasons of that one inward regeneration, which is equally the one thing needful to every sect, and the one thing alone, that can make every sect, or method, or outward form, not hurtful to those that adhere to it.'

With respect to his opinions concerning the merits of the peculiar and extraordinary religious professors and writers, foreign and domestic, of the previous and then present generation, whose works were much read by certain descriptions of so-considered spiritual individuals, about this time, the statement thereof must be left to another occasion, as his recorded observations upon them varied according to his experience at the time of writing, and the supposed requirements in regard to edification, of his correspondents who had solicited them. In after life, towards the conclusion of his exaltation. But the paradisaical body lieth in them only that are actually born from above of water and spirit; and in them it lieth hid under their gross four-elementary flesh and blood, increasing more and more, as gold in the ore. And the heavenly body, or the paradisaical considered as heavenly, cannot be said to be manifest in any, before the passing away of time.

Page 167. Q. & A. 1. From what was animadverted above, concerning the corruption and infection of this principle, it is here plain, that either this question cannot be so formed, if the asker thereof be supposed to have taken any notice of what was then given him in answer; or if, notwithstanding this, it shall be formed so that this answer must be altered. For (1.) barely as the words lie, and as they may be understood with a prejudice to the honour, goodness, and purity of the Creator (especially if the reader be apt to carp and dispute), no corrupt property was in man; but only it could be raised up in him by his lust, going forth without him into that which was by Lucifer infected. (2.) These words in the answer, God permitted it to be so, cannot well stand, because they are too popular, and in this place too insignificant. And though Behmen himself, in a popular sense and manner, may have used this expression, when he declareth this same reason which here is given of God's foreseeing the fall; yet seeing that still a deeper ground is to be shown from Behmen, which this expression is not well consistent with, it will be needful to alter it. For (3.) It was not so much, or not so properly a permission of God, because of his foreseeing the fall; but it was rather an absolute necessity in the nature and in all the circumstances of the thing. Man was to be a prince and ruler of this third principle, instead of fallen Lucifer; out of the es-course, he remarked in conversation of Marsay, a sort of French-German mystic writer of his day, that 'the best of what he had written was translated in the Scotch volume; that his sending souls to the moon and stars for purification was a mere fiction,' (which particular, however, though modified, the celebrated Swedish mystic, Swedenborg, after him appears to have adopted;) 'and though he says that he writes entirely from a revelation from God, yet it may be proved that he has borrowed largely from Madame Guion;' that 'Marsay, Madame Bourignon, [Jane Lead,] and other mystics who were continually pretending to revelations, and deep openings in the divine life, should show their ground,' and then he (Mr. Law) added, that 'the ground of all things was never opened in any man but Behmen, and perhaps never would be opened in any other man.' In reply to a letter from Dr. Cheyne, concerning Marsay and the above mentioned spiritual writers among the protestants, he said, 'it would have been as well if there had been none in the mystic way among them;' but his opinions on this point have been already expressed in the note of page 157. In reference to certain descriptions of professed converts to religion, he wrote in another letter to a friend,—"Such persons when they become religious, will talk of religion just as they used before to talk and determine about everything. I have met with very few people, who are free from the foible of turning all their awakened zeal into curiosity." And in the course of a conversation, he observed, that 'a man's taking up merely a new opinion in religious matters, was of no more use or consequence to him (while it remained only an opinion) than helping himself to a new hat.' Also, that 'every Christian had four states to pass through, in the process of his return to God, namely, the state of nature—the state under the law—the state under Christ come in the flesh—and the state under Christ come in the spirit;' but that the experience of each state necessarily varied according to the complexion and character of the individual subject thereof. Speaking of Gregory Lopez, the Spanish hermit in Peru, [with whom might be classed Brother Nicolaus, the Swiss hermit,] Mr. Law said, that 'he was the man that his writings require, not barely a good man, but a highly divine soul; but that he had nothing to say about the peculiarity of his outward life.' [If Mr. Law had lived to the present day, he would have pointed to Bramwell as of the same first class divine character, if not—as an apostolic evangelist, treading like his master, the common paths of life, and shewing how, according to the scriptural rule and standard the populace may live—even more to his mind than any preceding one whatever.] And, alluding to Frère Laurence of the Resurrection described in 'La Théologie de la Presence de Dieu, Cologne, 1710,' and which was translated by Dr. Heylin, in a book entitled 'Devotional Tracts, 1720,' Mr. Law observed, that 'he was a living example of the divine life, and did not, like most of the rudimental, formalist divines, and scholastic mystics, divide and subdivide it into various invented rules and gradations; which he condemned.' As he also expressed himself in a letter to one of his correspondents thus, "Again, (through the same talkative spirit) you tell me, it is objected by some, that I never make any distinction between repentance, justification, and sanctification: and you have more than once called upon me to speak to this matter. You add 'Here' (that is, in this distinction of these three words, thus understood) 'is the beginning, the middle, and the end of the work of the triune God upon the soul. Happy are they who experience these great and important things.'—Now, Sir, if you and the objectors are in possession of this happiness, feeling the benefit of these three words, thus distinguished, I have said nothing to rob you of that happiness. And you might call to mind, that a much greater teacher than I am, who justly calls himself the light of the world, the way, the truth and the life, never makes any more mention of this distinction, than is to be found in my books. If, therefore, they are defective, or blameable for want of this distinction, how will you excuse the four Gospels?" The above series of observations, it will be borne in mind, were expressed towards the close of Mr. Law's ministry: his opinions from time to time to his various correspondents will, as above intimated, belong to a more complete history of his life.

Marsay was the strange and fanciful writer he was looking into, when accosted by P. Böhler, the newly arrived Moravian, in Somerset Gardens, in 1738, who, it would appear had some personal knowledge of that writer, which Law being then informed of, was induced to make a few inquiries concerning him. Whereupon, Böhler whose knowledge and experience of Christian truth had doubtless impressed him with a just opinion of the unprofitable, ungospel character of Marsay's views and writings, might have hastily concluded that Law, who had been previously represented to him as attached to the mystics, was of a similar turn of mind; and so, as common with zealous sticklers for exciting interpretations of gospel doctrines, he would peremptorily judge him accordingly, and not hesitate to express his opinion to such of his friends as desired it. Whence may be accounted for, those groundless and injudicious letters that, shortly after this interview, were addressed to Law by his quondam pupil, as already referred to, and which, however sincere and right meaning, betray the uncertainty and imperfection of the writer's theological science at ences, therefore, of this principle he must have been made, and his own personal essences must have had some sort of communion and communication with the essences and things of this principle. And though he was not made out of the corrupted essences, as corrupted (which would have caused himself to have been corrupted also from his first creation), yet he was extracted out of those essences that were without him infected by Lucifer's corruption. And if so, these infected essences without him must needs have been in such a state and capacity as that they could have been stirred and awakened by their Lord and Ruler, and so have brought their infection and corruption into his own personal essences also. And (4.) This was the true deepest reason why man of all necessity must have been created in and out of this principle, which before was spoiled and corrupted by Lucifer; and that other, viz., that he might not fall immediately into the dark world, though also good and true, is yet as it were but posterior, and to be superadded or super-structed unto this. Wherefore, then, I think this question and answer could be fitly thus proposed:—

Q. Why was that earthly property which was infected from the fall of Lucifer permitted to be so in man as you mentioned above? A. We cannot properly speak of a permission, but may well of a necessity. For man was to be a prince and ruler of this principle instead of Lucifer; and therefore his essences must have been taken out of the essences and things thereof, and must have had a communion therewith, which he could have had without corrupting or infecting himself thereby. And then also God foresaw his fall, chose him in Christ Jesus from before the foundathe time when he wrote them.

It might have rendered this outline of Mr. Law's history more interesting, to have inserted therein specimens of his talent, selected from his several treatises, as they have successively come under review; as also to have introduced some of his letters, written during the periods of his life already considered, in illustration of his style and progress of thought. But as the present notices are rather of the nature of a general sketch of his life, with the lights and shades broadly but correctly thrown over the chief points of the landscape, as a guide to a minute and perfect delineation of the whole, in a finished drawing, by a master artist; and as such an attempt would have extended this outline beyond the limits which its present position would afford, it has been deemed proper, as a general rule, to defer such insertions, either to the proposed larger biography, or to a second and more correct, and polished edition of the present work, if called for. In which case, the whole would be revised and corrected by competent parties, so as to render it a standard reference book, or directory of pure evangelical and metaphysical science, according to the latest experimental discoveries and developments. It would, also, be printed in larger type, being then adapted for popular reading; whereas, now it is in the character of a pioneer, to prepare the way for a new era in science, embracing the unity, connection, and dependance of supersensuals and physics.

There have been few, if any, writers, who have made, or been qualified to make, Law's character and talents their special study, and approached to anything like an apprehension of his ground of understanding. Mr. Richard Tighe, in 1813, published a brief, but inexact memorial of Law, from some slight information which he had collected on a visit to King's Cliffe, and from a perusal of his works. But he had, manifestly, no philosophic perception of the constitution of his mind, as appears by his book; in which, also, his religious idiosyncrasy is but too evident. And though reference has sometimes been made to Coleridge in such respect, yet he must be considered to have been as far removed from Law's sphere of mind as the former individual, and equally as incapable of offering a just representation of him. For his piety, according to report, and appearances, was like his genius, mere ideality, not issuing in exalted, practical virtue. It was not of the genuine gospel stamp, beginning in a broken and contrite heart, and proceeding by the degrees of faith, of earnest prayer, self-denial, watching, fasting, and such like exercises, and cultivation of the divine life, to perfection; and therefore, whatever might have been his philosophic imaginativeness, through the reading of the higher departments of Law, Behmen, and others, he was incapacitated for such a task.

To describe the character of Law, who, as before observed, is considered by the writer, after looking over eminent individuals of antiquity, and later times, to be the finest classic specimen of a perfect common-sense mind, uniformly developed through all the solid attainments and accomplishments of human erudition, sterling wisdom, and enlightened, impartial piety, that has ever appeared; as much beyond Socrates or Epictetus, as full christianity is an improvement upon the most perfect light that preceded it—to describe his character justly and universally, the author must be radically of a similar mental organisation and complexion; and have been subjected to a similar course of universal Spartan mental training and studies; (he would have to carry himself back, to view the state of learning, religion, and leading circumstances of Law's epoch, accompanying him Mentor-like in his understanding, and thence to proceed up to the present time; and he must, especially, have passed through a similar course of evangelical ascetic piety and religious experience.—Secondly, he must be devoid of all idiosyncrasy, having been led through all the partialities and imperfections of the several sections of christianity, so as to have reached the centre of truth; and further, be able to express and demonstrate the justness of his perceptions, so that all his readers, who are capable of sound reasoning, shall be irresistibly convinced thereof, though, when they recede back to their own several positions in the circumference of truth, and measure his declarations by the standard of their own oblique light and imaginary conceptions, or personal interest, they shall agree in rejecting them as 'mystical' and 'erroneous.'—Thirdly, he ought to be an individual of a searching, exact, and philosophic turn, of at least forty years of age, and to have been brought up, as to religious communion, amongst the Methodists. Such should be some of the chief characteristics, or qualifications, of the individual who is to do justice to the portraiture of Law.

Those who are familiar with Gibbon's auto-biographical memoirs will have noticed his remarks and critical observations on Mr. Law and his writings. Upon a close scrutiny thereof, from a right point of vision, it may afford matter for speculation, whether Gibbon's perusal of those writings (whatever had been the results of his researches into history, devoid of the light of faith), did not, in reality, remove from under him the entire ground of his scepticism. Hence, may be accounted for the peculiar modest tone of those observations, considering their author. Though for him to have turned confessor, and thereby invalidated his pretensions to the character of a philotion of the world, and consequently showed even herein that he created him so, his endless wisdom, goodness, and mercy. For man being so created could not fall immediately into the dark, hellish principle, as the devils did, but into one which was capable of being changed and exalted again, together with its fallen prince, into its primeval station of purity and glory.

Page 167 to 169. Here are six different questions, all relating to soul and spirit; upon each of which several things, and some of great importance, were to be animadverted. And in some of the answers, also, this or that could be excepted against; but to particularize all this, I think, would be of greater prolixity than benefit. Wherefore, it may be the best and nearest way to set them only down so as they may be answered from Behmen's ground, with some alteration of their order, and augmentation of their number; when, nevertheless, you may, Sir, freely alter again what you please, and where you may find any more convenient expression. I represent, then, the sense as followeth:—

Q. What was breathed into this threefold body? A. A threefold breath of life, in relation to the threefold manifestation of God, made in the two eternal and in this third temporal principle which all three must have concurred and contributed to the creation and perfection of man, the true image and likeness of God.

Q. Which of them was breathed first? A. None was breathed first, and none last, but all three together in one single act: for they were all in a strict union; neither of them was without the other two, and all three made up but one life in one body, though both this and that is rightly also sopher—to expect him thus to have died to self, and pride, and honour, and interest, in the incipency of his religious convictions, is not warranted by the observations of experience. The power of faith must be increased in the believer to such a degree, as to force nature into subserviency, ere she will consent to the performance of pure and magnanimous virtue.

Amongst the observations in question, on the present occasion, the following remarkable sentence:—“His theological writings (he states) which our domestic concerns induced me to read, preserve an amiable, though imperfect, sort of life, in my opinion; but here, perhaps, I pronounce with more confidence than knowledge, on the merits of the man no pen can justify.” What, is there no pen that can do justice to the merits of Mr. Law? Remarkable words, indeed and the more remarkable, coming from so thoughtful, and, in some instances, judicious a writer, so penetrating and critical a judge of mental ability, as the historian Gibbon. But they were the words of soberness, carefully considered, and uttered by one, who, whatever he may affect by “perhaps,” was, doubtless, as intimately conversant with the character of Law's private life, through the conversations of his own father upon the subject, as with the nature of his sublime genius from his writings. Whence it was, he could place upon record, that immortal panegyrick upon the author of the ‘Christian Perfection,’ and ‘Serious Call,’ and ‘Answer to Trap,’ that he lived all he taught, and practised all he enjoined.

And, had Gibbon been able to enter into further particulars, without seemingly compromising himself in the way above-mentioned, or giving ground of suspicion of his real sentiments, he might, possibly, have added (from the same source) that—his life, from his youth to seventy-five years of age, was one continual growth in knowledge, piety, wisdom, and truth. That he did not, like the rest of men of learning and genius, after their quittance of the university, and on the completion of an enlarged course of theological studies (such as set forth in Dupin's translated work), settle down to the ease and quietness of domestic life, but with his wonted academic severity, and according to his unvaried principle of living by strict rule, he proceeded onward to fresh attainments—now fathoming the recorded spiritual or mystical science of all ages, making all that was evangelical, just and solid in it, his own. And further, that he did not stop there, but, moved by an insatiable desire and impulse after wisdom and perfection, he was finally led into the highest sphere of science, namely, into the contemplation of the supra-sensual ground of the divine wisdom, and its relation to all after being, of nature and creature; the philosophy of which, he discovered had been revealed by God through Behmen, though the popular class of mankind (as indeed, unavoidable) considered the contents of that author's works to be ‘stupendous reveries.’ And further still, he might have stated (from the same source of information, for letters are still in being referring to the fact,) concerning the ‘regular and good life’ at King's Cliffe his father had been witness to, when on a visit there, and to the ‘discipline’ of which, even during so short a period, he had attributed an improvement in his bodily health; and how that, according to his (the historian's) aunt Hester's own manuscripts still in existence, Mr. Law died as he lived, ‘in the perfect vigour of his faculties, as if he had not attained to half the age of man,’ his whole conversation, in the intervals of the agonies of his nephritic and mortal affliction, consisting either of apostrophies of adoration to the triune Deity of love, or declarations concerning the new birth and full ‘opening of the divine life in the soul, to be all;’ and that ‘after taking leave of every body in the most affecting manner, he expired in divine raptures.’ Such might have been the character of some further particulars respecting Mr. Law, had Gibbon permitted himself to have inserted them.

The following quotation from a friendly letter of Law to the Dr. Byrom before mentioned, who had turned into poetry part of his writings, and was then further engaged in the same occupation, is here inserted to show the effects of Law's writings on some of the learned deistical writers of his day, from whence to infer the effect that could not fail to be derived from a solid and continuous perusal of them, by so clear-headed a man as Gibbon:—“I have (he writes) lately received two or three sheets of paper, the remarks of a very learned and ingenious deist, upon the ‘Appeal,’ written to a gentleman in London, who sent them to me. They are written with great spirit and vivacity, but leave the ‘Appeal’ as unhurt, as the northern archdeacon did. He promises to give it a reconsideration, and says thus of it:—I sincerely admit the preference of Mr. Law's system, to any I ever met with; and since some religion is necessary for the mass of mankind, I could wish to see his system established—a spiritual elizium. He ends his strictures with saying of the author of the ‘Appeal,’ whom I look upon as one of the greatest and best divines that ever did honour to mankind.—He has this postscript, viz., I have read Dr. Byrom's poem. I think it an admirable one; and was I to believe the Fall at all, it certainly should be his [Law's] system of it, far preferably to that of the bishops. [1751.]”

With respect to the averment, that no pen can do justice to him, (which is to be considered to considered as threefold.

Q. But seeing that we cannot consider them, nor speak of them all three at once, is there not a certain reason to be had, by which they may be considered in order and distinction, as a first, second, and third?

A. Yes, there is a good reason why the fiery breath may be considered as the first, the light as the second, and the airy as the third. And this reason hath its ground, not only in the order of eternal and temporal nature, but also in that order wherein man's life was to continue in conformity to the eternal being and will of his Creator, who ordered his light to stand as in the midst, and to rule both on the right hand and on the left; as it is so with himself in his threefold manifestation through eternal and temporal nature.

Q. What was then that first breath? A. A spiritual fire out of the first principle of eternal nature; which had, therefore, the four first properties thereof in their own reciprocal generation, so knit together that they nevermore can be dissolved.

Q. How is this properly called in man? A. When so considered as separately and to itself alone, it is peculiarly and eminently called the soul, and described as a dry, hungry, anxious fire, or fire-eye, having the centre of its birth in itself, and being the proper root and only original of life, though also life itself.

Q. What is the meaning of its having the centre of its life, or birth in itself? A. This is so much as to say, that its life, or whole living being is perpetually generated in and by itself, with-imply, that a man must have the same capacity of mind, and have studied as universally and successively for more than half a century,) it is hoped that such a difficulty will, by the instrumentality of the present treatise, be, in a sufficient degree, done away. And that, whether by one or more enlightened men of God, full of the purest human and divine erudition, justice shall be done, not only to Law, but to truth itself, manifesting her undivided unity and multiplicity and yet harmony in nature and grace. For let her but be exhibited in the rise and termination of all her tissues and elaborations, from the centre to the remotest extent of natural being (symbolized in the concatenation of the parts of every living natural form), and then shall 'all nations' and people proclaim respecting the author of christianity, as did the unbelievers of old, when they cried out,—“the Lord he is God; the Lord he is God.”

As to this point, some further remarks which the specific character of this brief memorial will require to be inserted hereafter in the order of the subject, in exposition of the fundamental relation of Law to the elaborated physical science of the present day, may afford a presumption that the time is nearer at hand than is ordinarily supposed. For, indeed, the science of the present time has seemed to the writer to stand in a somewhat analogous position to that of astronomical or cosmic science at the close of Kepler's life, when he declared that—it belonged to the next generation to discover the true system of the material universe, and that God would not fail to reveal it—thus justly may an observant, penetrating, and enlightened understanding judge of the approach of great natural events. For all the needful practical discoveries and experiments to that end were then supplied, and nothing was wanting but the metaphysical key to the matter, whereby the latter and the former could be made to correspond; which accordingly had been prepared by the divine wisdom, and revealed in Behmen. Whose demonstrations of the ground and constituent qualifications of Nature, of the Three Principles of the eternal dark light and temporal universe, and of the magnetical tendencies and instincts of all things therein to their respective centres and to one another, with the other corresponding laws and relations thereof, all being in number, weight and measure—so far as related to this temporal or material principle, Newton translated into the mathematical and philosophical conceptions of earthly reason, and so produced his system. As then such was the state of science which gave birth to the Newtonian system, so it has occurred to the writer, the present state of physical science seems to stand in a somewhat analogous relation—nothing being wanted but a true theosopher, acquainted also with all the advancements and theories of experimental philosophy, to manifest openly to the world the whole clockwork of nature from the centre to the outermost circumference of dead and gross matter—in a word, her science, and working powers, properties and effects in everything; such an one as is implied in the following allusion of Mr. Law:—

“But would you divinely know the mysteries of nature, the ground and reason of good and evil in this world, the relation and connection between the visible and the invisible world, how the things of time proceed from, are influenced by, and depend upon the things and powers of eternity, there is but one only key of entrance; nothing can open the vision but seeing with the eyes of that same love, which began and carries on all that is, and works in visible and invisible nature.” As he likewise describes the qualifications of a true scientific divine:—“Would you divinely know (he proceeds) the mysteries of grace and salvation, would you go forth as a faithful witness of gospel truths, stay till this fire of divine love has had its perfect work within you. For till your heart is an altar, on which this heavenly fire never goes out, you are dead in yourself, and can only be a speaker of dead words about things that never had any life within you. For without a real birth of this divine love in the essence of your soul, be as learned and polite as you will, your heart is but the dark heart of fallen Adam, and your knowledge of the kingdom of God will be only like that which Cain had.”—Let but such a philosopher arise (a master of the science of Behmen, Freher, and Law), having his inward eye opened, as implied in the above quotation, and at the same time conversant with the whole sphere of physical science, and then truth or in other words wisdom shall be justified of her children, then shall it be understood, how Law may be termed the Newton of metaphysics. But, as observed, the primary tracing of this fact belongs to a subsequent place in this memorial.

And without such a two-fold light and qualification, the disjointed theories and experiments of modern philosophy (the former in many cases, being pure imagination), will unavoidably continue to be but a kind of school-boy, scientific recreation and theorising, instead of the clear apprehension of divine philosophers, who, spiritually dwelling in him that sits upon the threefold rainbow throne in the centre of nature, as the true life and light of angels and men, see all things in his light: who is Christ and God.

The writer has been further led into these considerations by a perusal of the ‘Poetry of Sci-out concurrence of anything without itself; the four essential properties thereof being all of that active nature that each of them is generated by the other three, and must concur again with all the rest, to the generation of each of them: which is also the nearest and most internal essential reason of its being an immortal life.

Q. If it be thus an immortal life itself, why then is it said also to be the proper root and only original of life? A. When life is taken for that eternal glorious and blessed life, man was created and is redeemed unto, this soulish being is nothing else but the root and original thereof; having, as in itself alone, no glory nor blessedness, but only restlessness and mere anxiety. But when by life is understood a never-ceasing continuance in its will, desire and sensibility; it is for itself also an immortal living being, which never can desist from being what it is, and doing what it doth, according to its own peculiar fiery nature.

Q. What was the second breath? A. A spiritual light out of the second principle of eternal nature, called strictly and peculiarly the spirit, or the spirit of the soul; and described as a glorious flaming breath of light and love, illuminating, tincturing and harmonising all the fiery properties of the soul, and making it to be an holy angel of God, endued with Divine wisdom, and fit to stand and worship before his throne.

Q. Is not the soul then perfect without the spirit? A. No; for though it is perfect as to its own peculiar nature, requiring nothing else but its own four eternal properties, for to make it a living soul: yet it is not perfect as to that life which God had introduced it into; for it is not that ence,' which he procured, to obtain thereby a general insight into the present state of physical science, he not being versed therein, and to form a conception how far it had approximated to a discovery of the ground and constitution of nature. And though but a mere tyro in the elements of theosophy, he found himself, in the perusal of that treatise in a somewhat familiar country, being able to translate the technical phraseology thereof into its true mother language, and to refer back the phenomena therein described of powers, motions, primary forms, etc., to their essential ground and relations, as set forth in Behmen. But to return to the narrative.

In the year 1739, Mr. Law published his 'Grounds and Reasons of Christian Regeneration, offered to the consideration of Christians and Deists.' In this work, he writes as a philosopher to philosophers, desiring nothing to be granted, but what will be easily conceded by honest and rational minds. He introduces the discourse thus: "Though (says he) the subject is particular, and seems only to relate to one point, yet the things which come under consideration, extend to matters of the most general moment, and contain the most affecting reasons to awaken and convert the heart, both of the Deist and of the Christian.—For (he continues) it is my intent to search and lay open the true grounds and reasons of the christian new birth, that the things said, may equally reach both these sorts of readers.—For the Deists and unbelievers, have a great share of my compassionate affections, and I never can think, or write of the infinite blessings of the christian redemption without feeling in my heart an impatient longing to see them the happy partakers of them.—And as one naturally believes, what one strongly wishes; so I cannot help hoping, that both Christians and Deists will here find truths of such a nature, as must, in some degree, touch their hearts, if not read with prejudice and aversion."

One of the ends in view by this treatise, was, undoubtedly, to counteract the evil effects of the wild and extravagant representations of the gospel doctrine of the 'new birth,' which were so common at the general promulgation of it, throughout this country, about the time he wrote this work. Which could only be accomplished by a fundamental and philosophic handling of the subject; showing, by a chain of strict deduction, the nature and necessity of regeneration, with the means and attendant circumstances of it, according to the sense of scripture, and the testimony of enlightened children of God, who had been the subjects of it.

It has been considered out of place, in the present general narrative, to accompany the notices of Mr. Law's works by selections from each, in illustration of his genius and views at the respective periods when he wrote them: but having made some observations in a former paragraph, with reference to a prevailing fallacy, that the sentiment of surprise and joy, which the mind experiences on a first apprehension of the truth of the ever-perpetuated 'atonement' and 'intercession' of Christ, is not regeneration itself, as is too commonly taught, (even by such as have been the subjects of regeneration, for want of a clear understanding of the doctrine thereof,) it may be advisable, in this instance, to depart from the original rule, and give an extract from the work under notice, wherein is described what that faith is, which saves the soul. And shewing that the blessing of the new birth is not any mere intellectual perception, but only and solely the opening or germination of the holy Spirit of God in the soul of man, or of the soul in God. And that its nature and effects are or may be as decided and sensible as those of a birth into this world, or of a man who had been imprisoned in astringent cold and darkness, suddenly emerging into all the delightful sensibilities of light and earthly comforts. And that the only way to such a birth, is the ancient Jacob-way of wrestling prayer.

For as nature, whether spiritual or temporal, always proceeds in one uniform way, so the causes and effects of the new birth are the same in all ages. And that persevering, faithful prayer, and wrestling with God, which made Jacob a prince in Israel, Behmen a pure original fountain of divine wisdom, and Hester Ann Rogers a conscious subject of the distinct operations of the triune Spirit of love, and model of practical gospel holiness, diffusing the savour of the vital knowledge of Christ, and winning souls for heaven wherever she appeared, that same must be the process of every soul that will realise equal results, according to its signature. There is nothing artificial or to be obtained by trick, or the knowledge of an easier or 'shorter way' in this matter; but all who will reap the full blessings of the gospel dispensation, can only do so in the standard gospel-way, by absolutely breaking with earthly reason, and dying to all that the world, the flesh, and the devil, have in them, and put upon them; and then, summoning all the powers of an omnipotent faith, breaking through the barriers of death and hell which environ the soul, into the light of God.

Further, from the confusion of ideas upon this particular point, have arisen the crude conceptions and misrepresentations of the doctrine of the 'witness of the spirit:' which would declare itself at once, did we but consider what the new birth really is. The 'witness of the Spirit' is not a kind of arbitrary attestation of God, that he has accepted the new-born champion soul, because of entire image of God which he created.

Q. How doth the spirit chiefly differ from the soul? A. So as the second principle in eternal nature differs from the first; and as in temporal nature the light doth from the fire. For as the light is a product of the fire, upon which notwithstanding its own quite contrary constitution, it so dependeth as to have no being of itself without it, so also is and doth the spirit in relation to the soul.

Page 169. This question concerning the pre-existence of souls, I think would be answered sufficiently by the four first lines, if they were put in such a construction, viz.—that they did not pre-exist as creaturely formed beings, but only as to their ideas in the divine intellect, and as to their unformed essences which were from eternity in eternal nature. Souls may be conceived to have pre-existed from eternity, in such or the like sense as in which our souls that live to this day in the temporal world, may be said to have pre-existed from the creation of the first Adam's soul; when we all were in his loins. Concerning which some considerable places might be produced from Behmen; with the whole analogy of whose writings this sense is moreover all consistent, and firmly supported by the generation of eternal and temporal nature, considered as both concurring in the creation of man.

Page 169. Q. 2. What was the third life breathed into Adam? This question belonging still to the former, and requiring, as I think, several things more to be added, might be answered thus with the following additions.

his 'believing;' but it is the natural effect or sensibility of the soul, on entering into, or abiding in the element of Christ, of which the Holy Spirit is the moving life, and therefore witnesses to such as are in the truth, that they are 'in him that is true, even in his son Jesus Christ.' As the powers, and properties, and elements of this world, witness to us our existence in it; so the powers of the holy, divine, intellectual world, witness to those who are inhabitants and children thereof, that they are the children of the triune God.

The consideration of which and other theological points, that have been, or may be hereafter entered upon, will, on reflection, be found to be in strict accordance with the character of the present memorial, as a general yet specific index to Mr. Law's life, principles, and writings. Though the spirit and scope of the practical remarks will not be fully apprehended by a mere abstract perusal thereof, but rather require a duly prepared reader, who is in communion with some zealous and spiritual outward church, and such a season, as, for instance, on returning from some of its solemn devotional services, when the mind is deeply impressed with the stupendous and affecting concerns of eternity, and the soul's everlasting state. The extract, then, proposed for insertion on the present occasion, is as follows:—

'The reason why we know so little of Jesus Christ, as our Saviour, atonement, and justification, why we are so destitute of that faith in him, which alone can change, rectify, and redeem our souls, why we live starving in the coldness and deadness of an historical, hearsay-religion is this; we are strangers to our own inward misery and wants, we know not that we live in the jaws of death and hell; we keep all things quiet within us, partly by outward forms and modes of religion and morality, and partly by the comforts, cares, and delights of this world. Hence it is that we consent to receive a Saviour, as we consent to admit of the four gospels, because only four are received by the church. We believe in a Saviour, not because we feel an absolute want of one, but because we have been told there is one, and that it would be a rebellion against God to reject him. We believe in Christ as our atonement, just as we believe that he cast seven devils out of Mary Magdalene, and so are no more helped, delivered, and justified by believing that he is our atonement, than by believing that he cured Mary Magdalene.

True faith is a coming to Jesus Christ to be saved and delivered from a sinful nature, as the Canaanitish woman came to him, and would not be denied. It is a faith of love, a faith of hunger, a faith of thirst, a faith of certainly, and firm assurance, that in love and longing, and hunger, and thirst, and full assurance, will lay hold on Christ, as its loving, assured, certain, and infallible Saviour and atonement.

It is this faith that breaks off all the bars and chains of death and hell in the soul, it is to this faith that he always says what he said in the gospel, Thy faith hath saved thee, thy sins are forgiven thee; go in peace. Nothing can be denied to this faith, all things are possible to it; and he that thus seeks Christ, must find him to be his salvation.

On the other hand, all things will be dull and heavy, difficult and impossible to us, we shall toil all the night and take nothing, we shall be tired with resisting temptations, grow old and stiff in our sins and infirmities, if we do not with a strong, full, loving, and joyful assurance, seek and come to Christ for every kind and degree of strength, salvation, and redemption. We must come unto Christ as the blind, the sick, and the leprous came to him, expecting all from him, and nothing from themselves. When we have this faith, then it is that Christ can do all his mighty work in us.

Temper and inclinations are the fruits of the new-born nature, and not the nature itself; and as fruits and flowers are entirely distinct and different from the root and the tree, and necessarily suppose the root and the tree, before they can be brought forth, so holy tempers and inclinations are distinct from, and posterior to that nature which is to produce them as its fruits.

And if holy tempers, rightly purified, could really arise, or be brought forth in us, without a change first made in the root, or nature that is to bring them forth, it would be no absurdity to say that men may gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles.

But if our blessed Lord has declared this to be contrary to the nature of things, and has further said, that the tree must first be made good, before it can bring forth good fruit, then we can, with sufficient ground of assurance, say, that our nature must first be made good, its root and stock must be new made, or regenerated again, before it can bring forth the fruits of a holy, Christ-like walk and conversation.

The whole nature of the christian religion stands upon these two great pillars, namely, the greatness of our fall, and the greatness of our redemption. In the full and true knowledge of these truths, lie all the reasons of deep humility, penitence, and self-denial, and also all the motives and incitements to a most hearty, sincere, and total concession to God. And every one is necessarily more or less truly converted to God, according as he is more or less deeply and inwardly sensible of

A. An astral and elemental life out of this outward world; which life especially made him to be a living creature in this created temporal principle, and to have communion in his essences with all the things therein. Like as the former two, and especially the second made him to rule over them, as a mighty, glorious prince; and not to have their own twofold qualities manifest and qualifying in his pure paradisaical life and body.

Q. Which of these three was that breath of life which Moses saith was breathed into man's nostrils? A. Seeing that all three were but one life, and were all three breathed together by one only act, standing in such a connexion as the three principles are connected in one only, though a gradual manifestation of God; they were all three that breath of life (or according to the Hebrew text of lives) which made man to be a living soul. Notwithstanding that this particular expression of breathing into his nostrils, is properly applicable unto this third only. For the former two being much deeper and interior, could not have been breathed from without into his nostrils, but were rather raised and breathed from within, each out of its own internal world.

Q. Can there any ground be shewn for a confirmation hereof? A. Yes, several ways could it be confirmed, but this only can do it sufficiently; in the dying of man this third astral and elemental breath is only that mortal life which goeth out of his nostrils again, into that same outward receptacle, wherout it had its original; and therein it can be perceptible, like as a smoke arising from a candle as soon as extinguished. When the soul and spirit are much deeper and interior, and do not go through his nostrils from within into this outward world; but go rather out of this these truths.

And till these two great truths have both awakened and enlightened our minds, all reformation and pretence to amendment, is but a dead and superficial thing, a mere garment of deceit, to hide us from ourselves and others.

Nothing can truly awaken a sinner, but a true sense of the deep, inward possession and power that sin has in him. When he sees that sin begins with his being, that it rises up in the essences of his nature, and lives in the first forms of his life, and that he lies thus chained and barred up in the very jaws of death and hell, as unable to alter his own state, as to create another creature; when along with this knowledge, he sees the free grace of God has provided him a remedy equal to his distress, that he has given him the holy blood and life of Jesus Christ, the true son of God [by the 'incorruptible seed' of the 'engrafted word' of promise], entering as deep into his soul as sin has entered, to change the first forms and essences of his life, and bring forth in them a new birth of a Divine nature, that is, to be an immortal image of the holy Trinity, everlastingly safe, blessed and enriched in the bosom of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; when a man once truly knows and feels these two truths, there seems to be no more that you need do for him. You can tell him of no humility, and penitence, or self-abasement, but what is less than his own heart suggests to him. Humility can only be feigned or false before this conviction. He can now no more take any degree of good to himself, than assume any share in the conviction of angels; and all pride or self-esteem of any kind, seems to him to contain as great a lie in it, as if he was to say, that he helped to create himself.

You need not tell him that he must turn unto God with all his strength, with all his heart, all his soul, and all his spirit; for all that he can offer unto God, seems to him already less than the least of his mercies towards him. He has so seen the exceeding love of God in the manner and degree of his redemption, that it would be the greatest of pain to him to do anything but upon a motive of divine love. As his soul has found God to be all love, so it has but one desire, and that is, to be itself all love of God. This is the conviction and conversion that necessarily arises from a right understanding of these truths; the soul is thereby wholly consecrated to God, and can like, or love, or do nothing, but what it can in some way or other turn into a service of love towards him. But where these truths are not understood, or not acknowledged, there it is not to be wondered at, if religion has no root, that is able to bring forth its proper fruits.

And if the generality of Christians are a number of dead, superficial believers in christian doctrines, as unwilling to have the spirit, as to part with the form of their religion, loth to hear of any kind of self-denial, fond of worldly ease, indulgence, and riches, unwilling to be called to the perfection of the gospel; professing, preaching, and practising religion, merely as the custom of the sect or church they belong to requires—these are delusions that must happen to those who, however they may talk about the 'corruption of human nature,' and the 'way of simple faith,' do not yet know the true nature of their own fallen soul, and what a kind of regeneration can alone save them."

Thus may be seen the difference between true regeneration and a lively apprehension of the certainty and efficiency of the 'atonement' and mediation of Christ, as the ground of human salvation. But for a full unequivocal elucidation of the subject, the reader is referred to Behmen's Tract of 'True Repentance,' by the practical study of the directions of which, it will be found that regeneration is the actual enkindling of the life and light of God in the soul, which is more or less powerful and sensible as the soul is more or less qualified for it, and which therefore nothing can effect but the immediate action of God himself, nor by any other than the natural means there exemplified, viz. of continuous ardency or vehemency of desire on the part of the soul, directed towards God, and yet not then until its resignation, self-abandonment, humility, and faith be complete, and so capable of it: "all things are possible [to be done] to him that hath faith." Which process in its essential character and beginning, it may be well to remark, will be also found to be as diametrically opposed to the insidious, self-delusive, 'quiet-turning of the spirit inwards' with its consequent unproductiveness of that burning and shining devotion and holiness, and outflowing practical godliness, which are represented in scripture as the inseparable fruits of true healthy regeneration, as it is to the boisterous outward action of the self-willed, uninformed young professor, or the ignorant enthusiast.

For a close to these observations, the following extract of a letter from Mr. Law, to one of his correspondents, (dated Oct. 12th, 1757,) may be here appropriately inserted:—"My unknown friend in Christ Jesus,—I am glad that you are so heartily affected, and so deeply instructed in the things of God. It is a happiness that no one knows, or can know, but he that is possessed of it.

world into their own spiritual eternal ground.

Q. How doth this third life differ from the other two? A. So as time differs from eternity, out of which it is, and into which it is to be reduced again. Or so as this third mixed world differs from the two eternal principles. Or so as air differs from fire and light: which all three are notoriously different enough, and yet also all three so firmly combined that none of them can be without the other two.

Q. How do your authors call this third life in man? A. They call it the astral spirit, the exterior spirit, the outward part of the soul, the transitory, mortal soul, etc. Not that it was mortal from its beginning; but because it is now mortal since man's transgression, and cannot but be mortal, because of the earthliness manifested in his body.

Page 171. In what do they place the image of God, after which Adam was created? God created man after his image, not as he is in himself unmanifest, but as manifest, not only in eternal, but also now in temporal nature; after (and not before) the creation of which man was created. If then this manifestation of God was now threefold; viz. according to the two inward, and to this third outward world; man also, who was to be an entire image of God manifested, and a prince of this outward world, must have had all these three as so many essential parts of his created human being. Not therefore only in the soul's fire illustrated with its light, the entire image of God consisted, (which might be said indeed of the holy angels, created before the creation of this world,) but in all these three considered in their due order and relation to each other, wherein they stand

One of the surest signs of divine light and true regeneration, is an inexpressible tenderness an unfeigned love, an unchangeable compassion towards all that are under any hardness of heart, blindness or delusion of our fallen nature.—This is the necessary effect of regeneration; it brings forth nothing but the nature of Christ in the soul. All that Christ was towards sinners, is in its degree found in the truly regenerate man. [N.B.]

He cannot murmur or complain, though he sees foxes have their holes, birds their nests, but he hath not where to lay his head. He must turn the other cheek to the smiter; he cannot revile the reviler; is as free from censure and judging his brother, as a new-born infant. As all that he has to rejoice in, is the unmerited, free love and compassion of God towards his own once wretched state; so he has no eyes but those of love and compassion towards those, who are only as blind and dead as he was, till the Giver of life and light did that for him, which he did for Lazarus, lying in the grave.

All the concern that he has for the outward state of things, whether in church or state, is discharged in these words, Hallowed be thy name; thy kingdom come; thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven; and as for those who oppose this kingdom, he only thinks and speaks of them in the spirit of its king, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.—Wishing you all increase of light and life in Christ Jesus, is the best proof I can give you of my being your hearty friend, Wm. Law." To proceed.

In the early part of the year 1740, Mr. Law appeared again in print. The occasion thereof was the publication of a sermon by one Dr. Trap, a high church zealot, wherein after picking to pieces isolated portions of the 'Christian Perfection,' and 'Serious Call,' he attributed the great religious movements then commencing throughout this country to those two practical treatises, saying that 'on their appearance he had prophesied they would do harm, and so it had happened (he added), for shortly afterwards up sprung the Methodists:—a conjecture, by the way, as to their results, true enough, if with them had been associated Jeremy Taylor's 'Holy Living and Dying.' Which was also reaffirmed some dozen years afterwards, though mistakenly as a reproach, by the before-mentioned Doctor Warburton, who, upon reading the journals and other publications of the chief leader of that body of people, remarked in his usual coarseness of expression, that 'Mr. Law begot Methodism, and Count Zinzendorf was its wet-nurse,' or words of a similar import. However, Dr. Trap in his sermon had shewn no measures to the subject of his criticism and remarks, asserting that those treatises 'contained false and scandalous doctrine, reproachful to the Christian religion, and deserving of public censure.'

To this discourse, Mr. Law then published a reply, entitled an 'Earnest and Serious Answer to Dr. Trap's Di-course of the Sin, Folly, and Danger of being righteous overmuch,' wherein he sufficiently justifies his own writings, whilst he probes to the quick the principles and sentiments of the doctor's sermon, testing them not by the conventionalities and customs of a church by law established, but by the perfect standard of the spirit and counsels of Christ, and his apostles, and the practice of the church in its first and purest state. He therein also complains of a serious defect in the doctor's discourse, who, though deprecating throughout it the evils of being 'righteous overmuch,' and what he terms the 'baneful plague of enthusiasm,' fails to lay down for the information of his hearers, the right and proper measure of sober gospel piety, showing how far it ought to regulate a man's spirit and conduct in the world: by which omission the doctor had laid himself open to the charge of that 'half-thinkingness' which he had so heartily attributed to 'enthusiastic pretenders to a more than ordinary degree of sanctity.' This essential deficiency however, Mr. Law, not taking for granted like the doctor, that his readers were sufficiently versed in the holy requirements of evangelical Christianity, takes upon him in his 'Answer' to supply; which he does with a master hand, shewing himself thereby to be a learned scribe in the kingdom of God, bringing forth out of his treasury of theoretical and experimental science, things new and old.

In the life of the Redeemer, who declared that he 'came to do not his own will, but the will of him that sent him,' it will doubtless have been the subject of the reader's reflections, that he did not wait for extraordinary or singular occasions whereon to do his mighty works; but that he timed his actions and discourses to the common events and circumstances which each day brought forth, turning them into a means of shewing forth the glory of God: which is undoubtedly the true order of co-operating with the Divine wisdom and providence. And further, that although such occasions seem to have arisen entirely by what is termed 'chance,' sometimes as the product of natural causes, and at others as the result of malice or ignorance, on the part of men, whether of the reigning orthodoxy of the time or the common people, yet that they seem to have been the very circumstances that were needful for his personal ministry, whereby to convey his divine instructions down to all future ages of mankind.

also in God, manifested in eternal and temporal nature. Wherefore, then, this question might be thus answered.——A. They place it in his having all the three principles in his created being which God hath likewise himself, as manifested in eternal and temporal nature; but especially do they place it in that due order according to which the first and third were to be subject and ministering unto the second, which only was to be predominant. And unto this I think could well and properly be added that which here followeth:

Q. Do not they exclude hereby all those perfections of holiness, wisdom, dominion, etc., wherein the image of God in man is commonly said to have consisted? A. No; but they consider all such glorious attributes as posterior consequential things, which of necessity must have resulted from the union of these three, and none of which could have failed or been prevented from proceeding forth thereout freely, so long as he stood without alteration in the order of this threefold life: which therefore, they look upon as the very basis of all his perfections, and think, therefore, they have sufficient reason to say, that in this order, chiefly and fundamentally, the image of God is to be placed.

Page 171. Q. 1, and 2. Concerning paradise, and the paradisaical state. In the first question no mention is made of that notable distinction, between paradise and the garden Eden. And in the second, nothing is said but what is common and general, when Behmen hath declared thereof so many particular and most considerable things. Wherefore then, if his sense as to these two questions should be represented, it might be done in the following manner:

Now as it pleased the wisdom of God thus to act in the life of our blessed Saviour, so does it please him to act in a similar manner in those in whom the same Spirit rules and governs, who are called out of the common path of life, to be as extraordinary guides to the rest of the world; they being constituted for such office by their great devotion and experience in the spiritual life of Christ, their clear, uniform perception and impartial love of religious truth, and the possession of sound learning: qualifications which may naturally be conceived to be indispensable in those to whom the 'word of wisdom' is especially given, in these last, and more accomplished ages of christianity. Accordingly, these features will be found to signally mark the whole of Mr. Law's career, as a moral and religious instructor. All his works bear this peculiar stamp, of being well timed, both as to occasion and matter, and full of the most natural, profound, and lasting instruction. And as he combined within him the quintessence or substantiality of all solid human erudition, as of theological science, which he brought to bear in due proportion, in whatever subject engaged his pen, so his writings must remain standards, in regard to the subjects upon which they severally treat, to all posterity.

But, if one more than another of his works illustrate the principle that has just been enunciated, (though, where all are of equal cast of judgment, it were, perhaps, improper to make any distinction,) of turning every day events in an elevated spirit of wisdom, to their right ends, the glory of God and the edification of men, it may be said to be the treatise under consideration, namely, the 'Earnest and Serious Answer to Dr. Trap's Sermon;' to which may be appropriately added, the 'Animadversions upon Dr. Trap's Reply,' hereafter mentioned, as forming together, a lively epitome or mirror of evangelical christianity. And the reader of those treatises will have only to refer to the biographies of some acknowledged exemplars of holiness and perfection, whose lives were, according to their particular form and complexion, a natural exhibition of the regenerated and highly developed spirit of Christ in the human nature, after the gospel model and idiosyncrasy,—take, for instance, as a modern life, 'Sigston's Memoir of Bramwell,' or, amongst those of past times, numbers which are but just sketched off in 'Butler's Lives of the Saints,'—to be convinced of the justness of such an observation. Indeed, it is far from speaking too highly of this brief discourse, to say, that it is not unworthy of the most devout and judicious bishop that ever addressed an assemblage of clergy; being just what might be expected from the Spirit of Christ, speaking through an erudite apostle to these last times, (as he spoke by his forerunner to the characters of his own day): which, however, is but a common characteristic of all Mr. Law's ministrations, as the reader, who is acquainted with his works, is doubtless prepared to affirm. Happy would it be for this nation, if those portions of the treatises in question, relating to the nature and design of the christian religion, the duties and obligations of the pastoral office, and the true character and requirements of divine love, were, in conjunction with the author's practical treatises, 'Jeremy Taylor's Holy Living and Dying,' and other works that will be mentioned in the following section, made a regular study in every theological institution, and the daily meditation of every administrator of apostolic functions throughout these kingdoms.

Further, with this treatise may be deemed to be completed the series of elementary instructions and directions for the full development and sober guidance of the new evangelical spirit, which arose into fresh manifestation at this period,—as the result of his own instrumentality, and, as to its peculiarity of experimental character and missionary zeal, (through the Moravians,) of that of Behmen. Whose little book of the 'Way to Christ,' even in his own day, according to the account of his life, had begun its operation; and which, especially the tract 'of Repentance,' and 'of the Four Complexions' therein, will be found, on examination, to be both original, and containing the rudiments of all that was solid, practical, and evangelically operative, in the principles and economy of the 'Church of the United Brethren,' which, derived therefrom, was superinduced upon the ground structure of 'Methodism.' The term 'Methodists,' as already stated, devoid of all mystification concerning its origin, was given, and that very naturally and appropriately, to the individuals who associated themselves together to practice the methodical devotion to God of the 'Serious Call' and 'Christian Perfection.'

All which interesting facts, taken from authentic sources, with the chain of connection between them, and the manifest instrumentality of the whole in the advancing regeneration of the world, in an evangelical sense; as also concerning the germ and growth of the present and progressing universal amelioration and aggrandisement of this country, (as of its ancient dependencies,) where the principles of civil and religious liberty have had a free course of operation, will require to be set forth in the proposed larger biography. For it is owing to the action and reaction of the religious spirit which was revived at this period, first planting a new shoot of the tree of gospel christianity in every corner of the land, full of its original vigour and purity, and then raising a society around it, and these answers, extracted and given in the "Introduction to Theology" (p. 676)

Q. What was the paradise, or garden Eden, in which this glorious person was placed? A. The garden Eden is not to be confounded with paradise; seeing that into paradise no beast can enter, when into the garden Eden all the beasts were brought before Adam; though these two are also not to be divorced, but owned in their union: nay, if but a due distinction between them is understood, the garden Eden may well enough be called paradise in some sense and respect.

Q. What distinctions do your authors make between these two, which are commonly understood to be but one and the same? A. They say, with a good ground, that paradise was a holy spiritual qualification in Adam's mind, or in all the essences of his spirit, soul and body. But the garden Eden was a certain circumscriptive place upon earth, or a part of the earthly globe, which remained still a part thereof, though paradise was lost and gone in Adam's fall.

Q. In what respect and sense can then this garden be called paradise? A. It can be called so (and for distinction's sake it may be called the local paradise), because it had a paradisaical property manifest and predominant in it, which was not so in any other place of the earth.

Q. What was this paradisaical property, and what were the effects thereof in this garden?

A. It was a quint-essential or one-elementary principle of vegetation, producing the most excellent, incorruptible vegetables of all sorts, wherein the four elements were not manifest in their contrariety; which fruits, therefore, were fit for man, when no beast was capable of eating thereof.

Q. This principle our philosophers assert to be a nitrous salt, which giveth fecundity to all things: to which not only vegetables, but minerals owe their original, and which is the spirit of life for its special cultivation, in the nature of things chiefly composed of the poor and ignorant, (and therefore subject to many absurdities of doctrine and practice,) just as the parent stock itself in the first churches where it was planted,—it is to the religious and moral regeneration of the ~~world~~ we do ~~and~~ operative classes, which constitute the base of the social structure, that this country is indebted, in connection with its rich endowment by providence of great natural resources, for its present solid towering greatness, wealth, power, and aggrandisement. Unstable and unhappy must be all nations, in proportion as religion is disesteemed by the masses of the people, as the christian sabbath is not strictly venerated, at least in outward appearance, and as the word of God is not an inmate of every house, and cherished member of every family: their prosperity can only be that of blind nature in her annual process, a constant building up and pulling down: as recent continental occurrences have but too fatally demonstrated. It is the Bible which is the key to England's solid greatness. May the contents of that precious volume be more than ever the daily study and practice of all her children, from the least unto the greatest: so shall she continue to be the favoured instrument of God to bless the world.—[Mr. Law's ministration for the renovation of the Gospel spirit closing, then, with these discourses, it will remain to show, from his succeeding writings, the second part of his office, in regard to Jews, Turks, and Heathens; as also to Natural Philosophy.]

The 'Appeal to all that Doubt or disbelieve the truths of the Gospel, whether they be Deists, Arians, Socinians, or nominal Christians, wherein the true grounds and reasons of the whole christian faith and life are plainly and fully demonstrated,' was the next independent treatise that issued from his pen. This appeared in the same year as the preceding tract, and was accompanied by an 'Appendix,' being the before-mentioned 'Animadversions upon Dr. Trap's reply.' It would seem that this individual had not the discretion to keep silence under the rebuke he had received in the 'Earnest and Serious Answer;' but, (not considering the puny ability and vulnerability of a mere scholastic theologian and state church-man, in comparison of the giant-like qualifications of a true mystical divine, who, besides being equipped with all the regular acquisitions of learning, has 'the world, the flesh, and the devil' under his feet,) he must again venture to take up the cudgels, and try his hand with so perfect a master of the science of evangelical theology in its two branches of theory and practise, and so accomplished a controversialist as was his antagonist.

Which reply accordingly drew forth a rejoinder from the latter, being the 'Animadversions' in question; wherein, as may be surmised, the doctor's professional reputation was entirely laid prostrate, though it had already become the subject of popular discussion and ridicule, one of the publications that appeared on the occasion, being ironically entitled, 'Dr. Trap vindicated from the imputation of being a Christian.' This latter discourse, then, as observed, is a most felicitous conclusion to its predecessor, and of equally a providential character, as affording to its Elias-spirited author, the opportunity of completing what he might have before left unsaid, for the purification and good of the church. The following extract, taken from the former treatise, as exhibiting his heavenly enkindled spirit in both these discourses, and serving also to justify what has just been stated concerning his mystic vocation, and, moreover, on account of its great practical importance, as involving the best interests of christianity, may not be deemed unsuitable for insertion on the present occasion:—

"The whole Christian world, from the time of our Saviour to this day, has been praying, Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Sacraments, divine worship, and the order of the clergy, are appointed as ministerial helps for this end, to raise, set up, and establish this kingdom of God on earth.—The fall of man brought forth the kingdom of this world; sin, in all shapes, is nothing else but the will of man driving on in a state of self-motion and self-government, following the workings of a nature broken off from its dependency upon, and union with the divine will. All the evil and misery in the creation arises only and solely from this one cause. There is not the smallest degree of distraction, pain, or punishment, either within us, or without us, but what is owing to this, viz. that man stands out of his place, is not in, and under, and united to God as he should be, as the nature of things requires.—God created every thing to partake of his own nature, to have some degree and share of his own life and happiness. Nothing can be good or evil, happy or unhappy, but as it does or does not stand in the same degree of divine life in which it was created, receiving in God, and from God, all that good that it is capable of, and co-operating with, and under him, according to the nature of its powers and perfections. As soon as it turns to itself, and would, as it were, have a sound of its own, it breaks off from the Divine harmony, and falls into the misery of its own discord; and all its workings then are only so many sorts of torment, or ways of feeling its own poverty.—The redemption of mankind can then only be effected, the harmony of the creation can only then be restored, when the will of God is the will of every creature. For this reason our blessed Lord having taken upon him a created nature, so continually declares against the doing any thing of himself, and always appeals to the will of God, as the only motive in all animals; and is not this that very same? A. A paradisaical property lieth still, indeed, in all things, yet no more manifest and predominant therein, but all surrounded and infected with a four-elementary corruption: and upon his account, therefore, it cannot be said absolutely to be the very same. For if it were, all things would still be paradisaical and incorruptible, as they were then. Man, also, would still be in paradise, and enjoy a paradisaical state, both within and without, as he did then, when he was in this garden in paradise.

Q. What do your authors say of this paradisaical state? A. Many great, glorious, and most considerable things. For instance, concerning this paradisaical state within, they say that it consisted in an entire subjection of all his exterior faculties to his immortal fire-light-soul, and of both to the holy Will, Word, and Spirit of God; in a child-like, innocent mind; in a continual holy communion with God and Angels; in his being filled with angelical joys, delights, and praises; in being endued with divine wisdom, and understanding all the creatures of this world: in an ability to look into all their essences, and to have dominion over all, etc. And as to his paradisaical state without, they describe, particularly, (1.) the glorious condition of his body, which could freely pass through earth and stones, without being withheld, resisted, or hurt by anything. (2.) His living indeed in a temporal principle, but standing not so much in time as in eternity; having no night, no weariness, nor sleep in him, and not wanting to take in his breath from the outward air, so as he must do now. (3.) The manner of his eating and drinking, which was done in his mouth only, without filling a belly and emptying it again; but almost like as the sun swalloweth up water, and and end of everything he did, saying, that it was his meat and drink to do the will of him that sent him.

What, now, can be so desirable to a sober, sensible man, as to have the vain, disorderly passions of his own corrupted heart removed from him, to be filled with such unity, love, and concord, as flows from God, to stand united to, and co-operating with the divine goodness, willing nothing, but what God wills; loving nothing, but what God loves; and doing all the good that he can to every creature, from a principle of love and conformity to God. Then the kingdom of God is come, and his will is done in that soul, as it is done in heaven. Then heaven itself is in the soul, and the life and conversation of the soul is in heaven. From such a man the curse of this world is removed, he walks upon consecrated ground, and everything he meets, everything that happens to him, helps forward his union and communion with God.—For it is the state of our will, that makes the state of our life; when we receive everything from God, and do everything for God, everything does us the same good, and helps us to the same degree of happiness. Sickness and health, prosperity and adversity, bless and purify such a soul in the same degree; as it turns everything towards God, so everything becomes divine to it. For he that seeks God in everything, is sure to find God in everything. When we thus live wholly unto God, God is wholly ours, and we are then happy in all the happiness of God; for by uniting with him in heart, and will, and spirit, we are united to all that he is, and has in himself. This is the purity and perfection of life, that we pray for in the Lord's Prayer, that God's kingdom may come, and his will be done in us, as it is in heaven. And this we may be sure is not only necessary, but attainable by us, or our Saviour would not have made it a part of our daily prayer.—It may now, then, justly be asked, have we yet obtained that which we have been so long, and so universally praying for? Can we look upon the church of this nation, as drawing near, or even tending to this state of perfection? Can we be carried to any one parish, either in town or country, where it can with truth be said of any one pastor and his flock, that there the kingdom of God is coming, and his will begins to be done on earth, as it is done in heaven? Can we, therefore, find any one parish, where the pastor has not great reason to reject the doctor's discourse, and to pray both for himself and his flock, that they may enter much farther into the spirit and practice of christianity, than they have yet entered, that the gospel may have much greater power over them, than it hath yet had, and that they all may, with a most awakening conviction, see and understand what it is, that has made so divine and powerful a religion, so without its proper effect upon them?—For if the case be thus, if we stand at this amazing distance from that state of perfection to which Christ has called us, though we have his infallible promise to be with us to the end of the world, to assist us with such power and strength from above, as to obtain, and do everything that we pray for, through a right faith in him, and conformity to his laws and example; if the case be thus, does not heaven and earth seem to call upon every minister of the gospel, to take some share to himself of this miserable state of things, and to endeavour to convince both himself and his flock, that they have not yet been christians in true earnest, that they have professed Christ with the tempers of Jews and Heathens, that they have not yet entered into the narrow way that leads to life, that they have not yet enough renounced the world, not enough denied themselves, not enough emptied their hearts of passions hurtful to piety, not enough offered and devoted themselves to God, not enough made the spirit of religion the spirit of their lives, not enough sought for strength and deliverance from sin, by a firm and living faith in Jesus Christ, who is made righteousness and sanctification to every sinner who turns to God through faith in him; not enough prayed and desired that they might be born again of God by the awakening and quickening the incorruptible seed of divine life in their souls, so that Christ may be truly said to be formed in them; not enough prayed and desired to be everywhere and on all occasions under the perpetual influence and guidance of the Holy Spirit, that they may think, and say, and do everything by his holy inspiration; not enough looked to that first and great commandment, of loving God with our whole heart and whole strength; not enough endeavoured to keep the next, which is like unto it, that of loving our neighbour, as we love ourselves; not enough renounced such fashions, customs, and conformities to the world, as greatly corrupt the heart, and grieve and separate the Holy Spirit from it.—Now, which way soever we consider the lamentable state of religion amongst us, whether they be evils within or without the church, no evil can be removed, nor any remedy be procured by us of the clergy, but in this one way, that every individual of the order, from the highest to the lowest, begin in right earnest with himself, open the book of his own heart and life, and consider seriously in the presence of God, whether, according to his degree in the ecclesiastical function, the world has had its due share of salt and light from him; whether all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, have been so openly, so constantly discouraged and renounced by him, that the whole form of his life has been one loud is yet never filled, nor made gross and thick thereby. (4.) The manner of his generation, or multiplication, which should have been pure and undefiled, without concurrence of a woman, and answering, in a sense, unto that in which he was himself brought forth by the Creator—from not being, into being. (5.) His clothing, which was no other but his own interior brightness and lustre, breaking forth, penetrating, and covering his outward body, so that its nakedness could not appear. Like as the obscurity of an iron may be entirely covered by the brightness of that fire by which it is possessed and penetrated through and through. (6.) His work or business, which was a childlike play, but full of wisdom, and freely left unto his own pleasure; all was pure unto him, for he was pure himself. He might have planted trees and flowers, and searched out all the wonders of this third principle, especially in the noble metallic tincture, etc.

Q. But what evidence can be given for the belief of all these things, which seem to be impossible for man to know? A. Paradise is not annihilated nor destroyed, but is still that same now in itself which it was then, though it be veiled by the curse, and fallen man be not therein. If, then, there is a possibility that man can be raised up from the fall and curse, and as to his renewed, inward part can be admitted again into paradise, and this even still during his outward life, there must needs be also a possibility for such a one to know what paradise is; what the first Adam, and what his paradisaical state was. And as that former cannot be doubted of, so this latter, also, cannot be questioned.

Page 173. Q. 1. What command was given to Adam in paradise? According to Behmen's continual call to all orders of christians, to set their affections on things above, to mind only the one thing needful; to have nothing at heart, but to be in Christ new creatures, seeking, intending, desiring nothing through the pilgrimage of this life, but to live unspotted from the world, and to obtain every height of holiness, and heavenly affection, which becomes those who are to be called sons and heirs of God with Christ Jesus. If religion was at this time in a most flourishing state amongst us, abounding with such congregations as made up the primitive church, it would be great injustice to suppose that the clergy had not, under God, been the chief instruments of building it up to such a state of perfection, since they are considered by our Saviour himself, as the salt and light of the world, which are to preserve it both from darkness and corruption.——Seeing, then, that an universal corruption of manners is on all hands confessed to have overspread this christian nation, and the true spirit of religion hardly anywhere to be seen, nothing can be more reasonable in itself, more suitable to the present state of things, than for every clergyman, wherever his lot is fallen, to suspect himself to have, in some degree or other, contributed to this common calamity, and to be more or less chargeable with the guilt of it, and to try to discover his own state by such like questions as these, laid home to his conscience: If christianity has not done that to my flock which is the only end and intent of it, is there nothing of this failure chargeable upon my conduct over it? Can my righteous Judge lay nothing grievous to my charge on that account? Can my own heart bear me witness that I did not run in my own will, was not driven by human passions, but stayed, and waited till the Holy Spirit called me to this office? Have I not undertaken the care of others souls, before I had ever any true and real care of my own? Have I not presumed to convert and strengthen others, before I was converted myself? To preach by hearsay of the grace, and mercy, and salvation of the gospel, whilst I myself was an obedient slave to sin? Have I not taken upon me to explain and lay open the mysteries of God's love in Christ Jesus, before they had had their proper entrance into my own soul? Has my own repentance, compunction, deep sensibility of the burden of sin, and want of a Saviour, taught me how to make the terrors of the Lord known in the deep of every man's heart, and to awaken and pierce the consciences of sinners? Has my own true and living faith in Christ my Saviour, my own experience of the atoning, cleansing, sanctifying power of his precious blood, enabled me with great boldness to tell all sinners, that to the faith which worketh by love, Christ always and infallibly saith, what he said in the gospel, thy sins are forgiven; thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace.

Can my own heart, and God, who is greater than our hearts, bear me witness that in my sacred office I have not sought myself, or my own things, but the things of Jesus Christ? If I have changed one flock or station for another, or added one cure to another, have I done it in singleness of heart, as unto the Lord, and not for myself? Has all that I have sought or done of this kind, been only from this motive, and in this view, that I might be more truly faithful to him that hath called me, and be more and more spent and sacrificed for the salvation of souls? Have I neglected no means of fitting and preparing myself for the illumination of God's Holy Spirit, which alone can enable me in any measure to speak to, and work upon the hearts and consciences of men? Have I earnestly longed, and laboured after every kind and degree of inward and outward holiness, and purity of body, soul, and spirit, that my standing at the altar may be acceptable to God, and my prayers and intercessions for my flock avail much before him? Has my own self-denial, renunciation of the world, and love of the cross of Christ, enabled me to preach up those duties in their full extent? Has my own strictly pious use of the things of this world, my own readiness to relieve and assist every creature to the utmost extent of my ability, fitted me to call others to these things with power and authority? Have all ages and conditions of people under my care had their proper instruction and warning from me, so that I have spared no folly, vanity, indulgence, or conformity to the world, that hurts men's souls, and hinders their progress in piety? Have I done all that by my prayers and preaching, life and example, which Christ expects from those whom he has enjoined to feed his sheep? Can my flock, by looking at me, see what virtues they want? Can they, by following me, be led to every kind and degree of christian perfection? Lastly, has the will of God and the spirit of the gospel been the beginning and end, the reason and motive, the rule and measure, of my liking or disliking, doing or not doing, everything among those people with whom I have lived as their minister? These are a few of such questions as the present state of religion in this island calls upon every minister of the gospel to sift and try himself by.——For as the order of the clergy is instituted for no other end, but for the preserving of religion and true piety in the world; so when any age is more than ordinarily sunk in vice and impiety, the whole order of the clergy, and every member of it, have great reason not only to be deeply afflicted, but greatly affrighted at it, and to suspect and fear their own conduct, since that which is their particular work, has had so little success. They have great reason to apprehend, that it is some degenerate ground, this question is more deeply and distinctly to be answered. Adam, in paradise, must be considered as in a twofold different state. (1.) As he was, before the first beginning of his wandering imagination, only and purely a workmanship of God, having his threefold life out of the mouth of his Creator, and being an entire image of him, made in purity, without any defilement, or disposition thereto. In which state he had in him all the characters expressed of the perfections of him whose image he was; viz. so far as they could have been expressed in, or be communicable to the creature. And (2.) as he was in the first beginning, and further carrying on more and more his own work of a lustful imagination, taking delight gradually more and more in things inferior unto himself. In which state that holy image of God was not yet indeed wholly destroyed, but, nevertheless, already more or less polluted; and began with the beginning of his own work to decrease, decreasing still further always as much as that did increase. Now, in this latter state, viz., in the first beginning thereof, not in that former, the command was given him. The command is to be considered as posterior, and presupposing a previous beginning, or a ready disposition to the transgression: when the transgression is to be looked upon as prior, and as that which had given occasion to the command. For the command, Thou shalt not eat, presupposeth the tree of knowledge. Now, this tree was not before, but was brought forth by the concurrence of Adam's lusting imagination, and presupposeth therefore a beginning of the transgression, or a moving, active disposition thereto; and so the command is posterior both unto this and that. All this is conformable to that order which the apostle observed, saying, Because of the transgression the law came in; but racy of spirit, some common misbehaviour, some general negligence, some want of example, some failure in doctrine, some defect in zeal and care of their particular flocks, that too much contributes to so general a corruption of manners. This does not suppose, that it is in the power of our order to regulate the manners of people as we please; it only supposes, that of all human means it has the greatest effect; and that when any nation or people are either very good or very bad, the behaviour of the clergy may reasonably be reckoned to have greatly contributed to it.—Let us all, therefore, of the clergy, who have any right sense of the nature of our order, any true love for our brethren of it, awaken and stir up one another to a faithful diligence in our callings, not such as may secure us from public scandal and the laws of the land, but such a faithful diligence as the nature of our office, the spirit of the gospel, and the present decay of religion calls for. Let us beseech and intreat one another deeply, to consider the great need that this poor nation hath of a zealous, pious, exemplary, disinterested, and laborious clergy; to consider the dreadful judgments of God, that may justly be expected to fall first upon our own heads, if this true, only relief and remedy is not procured by all of us, according to the utmost of our ability.—It is now no time for ease, indulgence, or worldly repose; all is to be renounced, all is to be sacrificed; and we must, in the spirit of martyrdom, awaken the world into a faith and love of the gospel. Now is the time that we must give up all our worldly regards, forsake all that we have, that we must hate father and mother, wife and children, and brothers and sisters, yea, and our own lives also, or we cannot be faithful ministers of Jesus Christ. The same spirit which first planted the gospel, is now required to recover and restore it amongst us. We must break off our chains of worldly prudence, and come forth in the spirit and power of the gospel; so live, and speak, and act, whether in the pulpit or out of it, that all who see and hear us may be forced to confess that God is in us of a truth, and that his Holy Spirit hath sent us. A ministry that hath not this power, that have not full proof, both to themselves and others, that the Holy Spirit is thus with them, opening the kingdom of God in their own souls, and enabling them to preach it to others with spirit and power, are to answer to God for their want of it. [Here and throughout, consider the remarks of p. 378: "Further, &c."] To ask whether the assistance of the Holy Spirit is to be ordinary or extraordinary, is as needless and groundless a distinction, as to ask whether a minister of the gospel ought to be an ordinary or extraordinary good man. The operation of the Holy Spirit in us since the fall, is a supernatural power, and therefore, in a just sense, always extraordinary, because enabling us to be and do that, which the ordinary power of fallen nature is insufficient for; but it is more or less restored to us, as we are more or less fitted to receive it. And all that assistance or renovation of the Holy Spirit which an apostle might expect, for the raising his own personal holiness to its greatest height, or for enabling him with spirit and power to move, affect, and convert the hearts of men to the faith of the gospel, may be justly expected now by such ministers of the gospel, as do all that which an apostle did to obtain and receive it. Our religion is founded on this doctrine, that we are to be born again of the Holy Spirit,—that it is to be the breath and life of our new-born inward man,—that there is no sanctification of the heart, no illumination of the mind, no knowledge of divine mysteries, no love of holy things, possible to be had, but in and by the motion and life of this Holy Spirit renewed or born again in us;—that its life, motion and power in us, increaseth according to our faith, prayers, and desires of it.

Is it not now a flat denial of all this to say, as is said by some, that the establishment of the gospel in the world, together with the assistances of human learning and languages, has been the occasion why the assistance of the Holy Ghost is abated, and become only such as may be called ordinary? For if we consult either scripture or experience, must it not be said, that worldly peace and prosperity want as much to be sanctified by the Holy Spirit, as persecution and distress? That human learning and knowledge need as high degrees of divine grace and help, as human ignorance? Is not the blindness, the infatuation and corruption of men of letters, as notorious as that of unlearned men? Does an editor of Terence, Horace, or Virgil, receive such illumination from man establishments, as to need less to be led and governed by the Holy Spirit of God? Or will we say, that a critical study of divided languages, and a religion established in worldly ease and peace, are not only in themselves free from danger and corruption, but have so much of the nature of the Holy Spirit of God in them, that they can be to us in his stead, and make his sanctifying operations upon us needed in a less degree?

On the part of God, our redemption in Jesus Christ, and our sanctification by the Holy Ghost, stand always in the same degree of nearness and fulness to all of us; there is hardly a chapter in the New Testament that can be understood, or its doctrines observed, but upon the supposition of this great truth. If Christ is less formed in us than he was in the first saints of the church, if not the transgression came in because of a foregoing command, or law. Nay, with that first state of man in paradise, before the beginning of his transgression, it is all inconsistent to speak or think of a command or law. This was formerly represented more particularly, and, as I think, sufficiently. But seeing that in this answer no notice is taken thereof, because, as I suppose, it is thought to be of little or no importance, I say here nothing more thereof but this,—that as to me, it is of great consideration, and hath very much in it, and depending upon it, in this present matter of man's perfection, temptation, and fall.

Page 173. Q. 2. How long was Adam in Paradise? This question, according to Behmen's declaration, is to be answered thus: A. They say, that Adam alone, before his Eve, was in paradise forty days, until his sleep; and then with his Eve forty days again (?) until they both saw that they were naked. And that (besides many other types or figures of the Scripture) first our Saviour's resisting the temptation in the wilderness for that space of time; and, secondly, his forty days between his resurrection and ascension, are a sufficient proof of it: the second Adam being to continue under the temptation so long as the first had done.

Page 173. Q. 3. How and by whom was Adam tempted? A. By his sensitive soul, etc. Here the question is twofold: How and by whom, but the answer only single; for to that former nothing at all is replied, though the manner of the temptation, as to my thinking, is well worth to be declared. And then, further, there is nothing at all said of a necessity, viz. that he needs must have been tempted. Which, if something shall be said thereof, as I think it needful, would have we come not to the perfect man, to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, it is not because Christ is now become only our Redeemer in an ordinary way or degree, but it is because we have not so turned to him, not so turned from ourselves, not so counted all things but dung, that we might win Christ, and be found in him, as the first saints did. If the Holy Spirit does not now in such a degree renew, quicken, move, and sanctify our hearts, and fill us with such degrees of divine light and love, as was done in the first age of the church, it is not because this sanctifying Spirit has committed some part of his work to human learning, and so is become only our sanctifier in a lesser and ordinary degree, but it is because we ourselves have forsaken this fountain of living waters, and hewed out broken cisterns for ourselves; it is because we have grieved this Holy Spirit, resisted his motions, quenched his holy fire, and under an outward profession of Christ, have kept up that old man, with his deeds, which cannot be the temple and habitation of the Holy Spirit.

If, therefore, we have any true sense of the nature and weight of our ecclesiastical calling, any desire to do the full work of the ministry, to satisfy the wants and necessities of our flocks; if we have any fear of being condemned as useless, insignificant labourers in Christ's vineyard, it is high time to awake from this dream of an ordinary and extraordinary sanctification of the Holy Spirit; it serves only to keep us unsanctified, shut up in death, in the dead workings of our own corrupted nature, to keep us learnedly content with our state, as if we were rich, and increased in goods, and had need of nothing, and hinders us from knowing that we are wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked.

Several of the clergy, whose lot is fallen in this corrupt age, may be supposed to have taken upon them the sacred office, and to have lived in it, not enough according to the nature and spirit of it, merely through the degeneracy of the times, and from a consideration that they are well enough, according to the measure of religion that now passes in the world. And perhaps there are few, if any, of the order, however eminent for good works, whose virtues have not received some abatement from the same cause. This, therefore, may be added as another reason why all the clergy of this land should search into their lives and conduct with the utmost severity, and bring everything to the test of the letter and spirit of the gospel.

The christian religion has not had its proper effect, nor obtained its intended end, till it has so set up the kingdom of God amongst us, that his will is done on earth, as it is done in heaven. This is the perfection that every christian, when advancing forward in the several degrees of holiness and purification, is to tend to, and aspire after. And if they who are to be taught, are to be thus separated from an earthly nature, thus emptied of all worldly passions, thus dead to the workings of self-will, and self-love, that the Spirit of God may be all in all in them, what manner of men ought they to be, who are to teach, promote, advance, and lead the way to this purity and perfection? What a distance ought he to be from every appearance of pride, that is to draw others to love and practise the profound humility of the blessed Jesus? How ought he to deny his appetites, to humble his body, and be steady in all kinds of self-denial, who would convince his flock that they who sow to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap destruction? How heavenly-minded, how devoted to God, how attentive to the one thing needful, how unspotted from the world ought he to be, who is to persuade others that they cannot possibly serve God and mammon? How empty ought he to be of all selfish cunning, all worldly policy, all arts and methods of ambition, who is to fix it deep in the hearts of his hearers, that unless they become as little children, they cannot see, nor enter into the kingdom of God? What open hands, and open heart ought he to have, what an extent of charity ought to be visible in him, who is to bring his flock to this faith, that it is more blessed to give than to receive? How remarkably plain, open, sincere, undesigning, and faithful, should he be, who is to recommend, plant, and establish sincerity, plainness, simplicity, truth, and innocence amongst his flock? There is such a necessary fitness in these things, that the force and power of religion must be much prevented, when its precepts are recommended to the world by such as excuse themselves from the plain and open practice of them? [Consider Bramwell!]

The office of the ministry is of the highest nature, it is a trust which no language can sufficiently express; and the unfaithful discharge of it is, of all conditions in life, the most dreadful. To be charged with the death and blood of souls, by that God who laid down his life to redeem them, is a condemnation that will carry more of guilt and punishment in it, than any other. Would you know the office of a christian pastor, you must look at the office of Christ; would you know what manner of spirit he ought to be of, you must look at the spirit of Christ. For the work of the ministry is only the work of Christ committed to other hands, who are to supply his absence, to be here in his stead, to be doing the same things, and with the same spirit that he did, till the end of the world.

Nothing is so highly honourable as to bear a part in the priesthood of Christ, and be employed here its proper place. Wherefore, then, for my part, I would represent this matter by several distinct questions and answers, after this or the like manner:—

Q. Do they give any reason why the first Adam was tempted? A. Yes, they give several reasons, all concentrated in this point,—that there was an absolute necessity for it. For they say, that as there was a necessity, by which Adam must needs have had a threefold life in him, if he should have been an entire image and likeness of God, and a prince in this created world; so there was the same necessity, also, that he must needs have been tempted, if he should have possessed the throne of fallen Lucifer. And this necessity they demonstrate chiefly from the very nature, combination, and internal constitution of that threefold life.

Q. But his threefold life stood, as you said before, in a good and excellent combination, order, agreement, and harmony, as only one, because only one was manifest and predominant in him, which was the paradisaical; how then could this have caused or necessitated a temptation? A. His threefold life stood so, indeed, in him; and even this made him to be an entire image of God. But it stood not so without him in the three great worlds which he was an epitome of, and each of which had a natural communion, answerableness, or sympathy with that part in man which was extracted out of it: for in them it was disordered and disharmonised by the false magia of Lucifer. And from hence the cause of the temptation can be seen sufficiently.

Q. How, then, or in what manner was this temptation done? A. The third life without him, viz., the spirit of this world, represented unto him its manifold powers and wonders, which he in the work of the ministry; but then it should be well considered, that it is only honourable in the same sense as it may be said that nothing is more honourable than to suffer as a martyr. It is an honour that is as different from all worldly figure and distinction, as the glory of Christ upon the cross is different from the triumph of an earthly prince. When, therefore, we think of the honour and dignity of the pastoral function, we should be careful to remember, that it is only the honour of dying a martyr, an honour of humbling, abasing, and sacrificing ourselves with Christ, and continuing the exercise of his suffering priesthood for the salvation of the world. The holy function is often considered only as an authoritative commission to minister in holy things; but it is much more than this; it is a call and command to act with the spirit of Christ, to represent his purity, to continue his holiness, to bear a part of his sacrifice, and devote themselves for the good of others as he did. A priest that has only his ordination to distinguish him, wants as much to make him a true priest, as Judas wanted to make him a true apostle. For though holiness gives no man a commission to exercise the pastoral office, yet all who are called to it, are as much ordained and appointed to a peculiar holiness of life, as to the administration of the sacraments; and when they cease to be as tight and salt to the rest of the world, they sin against the pastoral office in as high a degree as they that enter upon it without any authority.

For the sacred office is God's appointment, to continue through all ages of the world, the spirit and power of Christ, for reconciling men to God in the same manner and by the same means of holiness, sacrifice, and devotion, which Christ exercised when he was upon earth. We need no other proof of this, than this one saying of our blessed Lord: As my Father hath sent me, so send I you. That is, for all the ends for which I am come into the world, for all the same ends I send you into it, to be there in my stead, to supply my absence, to carry on the work that I have begun, to exercise my power, to act with my spirit, to continue the exercise of my love, and labour, and suffering for the salvation of mankind. To be sent by our blessed Lord for the same ends as he was sent into the world, is such an appointment of us to all kinds and degrees of holiness, as can never be rightly discharged, but by our giving and devoting ourselves wholly and absolutely unto God.

Imagine that you had lived with our blessed Lord when he was upon earth, that you had learned the dignity and divinity of his person, that you had seen the love which he bore to mankind, that you had entered into the glorious designs of his kingdom; which was, to convert the inhabitants of the earth, poor creatures of flesh and blood, into sons of God, and heirs of eternal glory.

Imagine that you had seen him after his resurrection, when he had redeemed the world, conquered sin, death, and hell, and was about to take possession of his throne; imagine that then, in that state, you had seen him commission some of his followers to be priests and intercessors with God on earth, as he had been, to feed, and nourish, and watch over his flock, as he had done, to go before them in such exemplary holiness, such love of God, such compassion for sinners, such contempt of the world, such poverty of spirit, such obedience and resignation, as they had him for an ensample; had you been present at all this, how would you then have heard and felt these words, As my Father hath sent me, so send I you?

What sentiments of piety, what magnificence of spirit, what exalted holiness, would you have expected of those, who were called to succeed so great a master in so great a work? Could you think they could be fit for this office, or were enough like him that had called them to it, unless they had renounced and sacrificed everything for the sake of it? Could you think that any care but that of the church of God was proper for them? Would you not own that the conversion of sinners to God, ought to have been their one only labour and pains? That they were to seek for no other happiness in this world, than such as their Lord and Master had done, but consider themselves as called from the common affairs, ease and pleasures of life, to be in Christ's stead towards the rest of mankind, to conduct them safely to eternal happiness?—Now, when we consider the apostles in this light, as being the first who were entrusted with the care of souls, and from Christ himself, we can see no degree of zeal, no height of piety, no compassion for sinners, no concern for the honour of God, no contempt of sufferings, no disregard of worldly interest, no watchings or mortifications, no fervours of devotion, to which we of the clergy are not equally obliged. For the salvation of mankind is still the same glorious, great and necessary work that it was in their days, is still to be carried on by the same means, and is now in the hands of the clergy as it was then in theirs. If it was their happiness and glory to be faithful to him that called them, to forget the little interests of flesh and blood, and have nothing at heart but the advancement of God's kingdom, we shall fail both of happiness and glory, if we seek it any other way. If an apostle, considering the weight of reconciling souls unto God, is forced to cry out, Who is sufficient for these things? shall we think any care but that which is the greatest, sufficient to make us stand uncondemned before God? It is a fatal deception to imagine, that the life of a minister of God is ever to be a must needs have been affected or touched with, so as to be made sensible thereof; because the third part (if I may so say) of his life was extracted out of it, and he was a lord and ruler thereof. And the devil, being full of malice and envy against him, pretending still to be the prince of this world, and having also an entrance into the dark root thereof, stirred by his false magia that which he had infected before, and darted so by this means his malicious imagination into that third life of man, in whom he raised up and increased thereby successively and gradually, first an attention, then a delight, further a lust, and, at length, a consent and desire.

Q. Here you set chiefly the spirit of this world and the devil together; but which of them was properly that by which Adam was tempted? A. Whether you say he was tempted by the devil, or by the spirit of this world, or by his own lust, or by his sensitive soul, all will be right and true, each in its sense and order. For the devil was, indeed, the chief agent, and more secret; but the spirit of this world was his active instrument, and more appearing. And as they both were without man, so there was also within him his own lust and his sensitive soul, answering unto, and concurring with the two without him.

Page 173. Q. Why did the sensitive soul, etc. From what was said in several places above, it is apparent that this question might now be reasonably looked upon as superfluous, because it is answered, as to substance, several times. But, notwithstanding this, if it shall stand so, and be answered again more explicitly, it is well to be observed, that the words, The knowledge of the wonders of this world depends upon the knowledge of the forms of things, etc., cannot so be brought in as life of ease or worldly repose. For though the temporal sword be not always drawn against them, nor they forced to flee from one city to another, yet the world, the flesh, and the devil have, perhaps, never so much difficulty to be resisted, as in temporal prosperity; nor have the ministers of Christ ever more occasion to put on all their armour, than when the world is given up to ease, and peace, and plenty. Swarms of vice steal upon us in these seasons, the spirit and life of religion is in danger of being lost, and the salvation of souls is made more difficult, than in the most perilous times. And how is such a state of temptation to be resisted, such a torrent of vice to be opposed, but by the clergy's showing themselves visible and notorious examples of all the contrary virtues. When mankind are wallowing in debauchery, wantoning in pleasures, and given up to vanity and luxury in all shapes, it is then the duty of the faithful minister, by his being crucified to the world, to proclaim himself the messenger of a crucified Saviour, and to make his own self-denying, mortified, and heavenly life, a plain, open, and constant reproof of all vain indulgences. For to yield to, or fall in with the softness, vanity, indulgence, or avarice of the world, is the same infidelity, and breach of trust in the sacred office, as to depart from the true faith, and fall in with some abominable heresy.

And here I cannot help addressing myself with great affection to all my younger brethren of the clergy. According to the course of nature, you are likely to have the care of the church wholly upon your hands in a short time; and therefore, it is chiefly from you that the restoration of true piety is to be expected in this nation. I beseech you, therefore, for your own sakes, for the gospel's sake, for the sake of mankind, to devote yourselves wholly to the love and service of God. As you are yet but beginners at this great office, you have it in your power to make your lives the greatest happiness, both to yourselves and the whole nation. You are entered into holy orders in degenerate times, where trade and traffic have seized upon all holy things; and it will be easy for you without fear to swim along with the corrupt stream, and to look upon him as an enemy, or enthusiast, that would save you from being lost in it. But think, my dear brethren, think in time, what remorse you are treasuring up for yourselves, if you live to look back upon a loose, negligent, corrupt, disorderly, worldly, unedifying life, spent amongst those whose blood will be required at your hands. Think, on the other hand, how blessedly your employment will end, if, by your voices, your lives, and labours, you put a stop to the overflows of iniquity, restore the spirit of the primitive clergy, and make all your flock bless and praise God, for having sent you amongst them. — Lay this down as an infallible principle, that an entire, absolute renunciation of all worldly interest, is the only possible foundation of that exalted virtue which your station requires. Without this, all attempts after an exemplary piety are in vain. If you want anything from the world by way of figure and exaltation, you shut the power of your Redeemer out of your own souls; and, instead of converting, you corrupt the hearts of those that are about you. Detest, therefore, with the utmost abhorrence, all desires of making your fortunes, either by preferments or rich marriages, and let it be your only ambition to stand at the top of every virtue, as visible guides and patterns to all that aspire after the perfection of holiness. Consider yourselves merely as the messengers of God that are solely sent into the world on his errand, and think it happiness enough, that you are called to the same business, for which the Son of God was born into the world. — I do not call you from a sober use of human learning, but I would fain persuade you to think nothing worthy of your notice in books and study, but that which directly applies to the amendment of the heart, which makes you more holy, more divine, more heavenly, than you would be without it. You want nothing, but to have the corruption of your natural birth removed, to have the nature, life, and spirit of Jesus Christ derived into you; as this is all that you want, so let this be all that you seek from books, study, or men. This is the only certain way to become eminent divines, instructed to the kingdom of heaven. — And above all, let me tell you, that the book of all books is your own heart, in which are written and engraven the deepest lessons of divine instruction; learn, therefore, to be deeply attentive to the presence of God in your hearts, who is always speaking, always instructing, always illuminating that heart that is attentive to him. Here you will meet the divine light in its proper place, in that depth of your souls, where the birth of the Son of God, and the proceeding of the Holy Ghost, are always ready to spring up in you. And be assured of this, that so much as you have of inward attention to God in your hearts, of inward love and adherence to his holy light and spirit within you, so much as you have of real, unaffected humility and meekness, so much as you are dead to your own will and self-love, so much as you have of purity of heart, so much, and no more, nor any further, do you see and know the truths of God. These virtues are the only eyes, and ears, and senses, and heart, by which you will know and understand everything in Scripture, in that manner, and in that degree, in which God would have it understood, both for your own good, and the good of other people. — It was owing to this purity of heart, and attendance upon God, that an ana cause why the sensitive soul tempted Adam. For although they are now all true, in a sense, yet they were not so in the same sense before the fall; or, at least, the full sense as it is applicable unto Adam in paradise, is not thereby expressed. For Adam, giving names unto all the beasts, and being able to look deeply into all their essences, originals, constitutions, properties, etc., knew certainly the internal forms of all things. In a word, the whole nature, with all its powers and wonders, stood open before him, and he had knowledge thereof. Which, if it had not been so, he could not have been so tempted as he was: but then he could also not have been a prince and ruler of this principle. His temptation and fall, therefore, was not because he desired a knowledge of the wonders and forms of things, but because he had such a knowledge of all the wonders and powers without him, he desired to know them within himself also, in a sensible manifestation of their contrarieties. And this was the knowledge of good and evil, which, as then, he had not yet, and could not have had it, without falling down himself from his eminent station in and under the same twofold government of good and evil. That former knowledge was well consistent with his paradisaical state, nay, it was a precious jewel of his crown, when this latter was his utter destruction. Not knowing whether I have expressed my sense and intent intelligibly enough, I cannot but declare it again, by saying, that Adam knew, well enough, there were contrary qualities and qualifications without him, in all the things of outward nature; and this knowledge was an eminent perfection of his, without which he could not have been what he was ordained to be in this world: and this, therefore, was not that which he lusted after. But because of this he came to lust after an experimental knowledge, or own sensation of these contrary qualities within himself. His sensitive soul would prove actually by feeling and tasting how it would be with itself, when these contrary qualities were manifest, each in its own operation. And this was the thing which was agreeable to the nature of the sensitive soul.

In the next following Q. (Page 175,) something the like is said, indeed, as to the words, but not as to this sense, viz., which experimental practical knowledge, I suppose, was the thing chiefly desired by the sensitive soul. This, I say, hath almost indeed the same expressions; but is, for all that, greatly different in sense. For I cannot understand it otherwise but that there is meant thereby only a setting of forms on work in things without him; because I see it is said afterwards to be now so useful and praiseworthy. And this is so indeed now, and was also so before; for it was an eminent piece of Adam's dominion over all things; but for this same reason it was not that which the sensitive soul so blindly desired. For it was never useful nor praiseworthy, but always hurtful and accursed, that Adam set on work the forms of nature within himself; because of which he must now bear in soul and body all the disharmonised properties in their contrary operations, and is fallen into sin, anxiety, vexation of spirit, trouble, misery, all manner of sickness, and death.

Page 175. Q. ult. In the first part of the answer to this question, if I should form it, I would leave out those things that are brought in only as probable, and would rather put this No. 1 into such a construction:

Q. Did not Adam resist the temptation? A. Not faithfully, and therefore also not successfully, for he was wearied and overcome by it. As appears,

1. By his desiring a help-meet, or a female associate, as he saw all the rest of the living creatures to have. When God said, It is not good that the man should be alone, it doth declare sufficiently, that an alteration or change, more or less, from good into not good, was made already in man; and by man himself, because not by God. If, then, by man, it must needs have been from his not resisting faithfully the appetite of his sensitive soul. And that this appetite was not only in general after a sensual knowledge of good and evil, but also in particular after such a help-meet, can be manifest from the event, wherein that same was given him which he desired.

2. His falling asleep argues, etc.

3. The division, etc. Here, instead of saying, as in uncertainty he seems to have been overcome, I, for my part, would rather say positively, —he was overcome; or, at least, as hitherto frequently, —they say he was overcome by the temptation.

Page 177. Q. ult. and 178. What is here objected concerning the honourableness of the matrimonial state, could have been objected also (mutatis tantum circumstantialibus) against the doctrine of our Saviour, concerning polygamy. Which doctrine seemed to the Jews no less offensive, and reflecting upon Moses and the law, than this may seem to reflect upon the words of the apostle. If I were asked, Was there somewhat not good in Adam, and what was it when he desired a female help meet? I would answer, it was that same which the Lord called the hardness of the heart, because of which Moses had permitted polygamy. Not that it was so gross in Adam . . . and in such an outbirth as it was in the Jews; but yet it was the same internal root out of which this hardness came forth afterwards. If, then, this hardness was not good in the Jews, when out-born in this world, its root also could not have been good in Adam, when first conceived by his sensitive part in the paradisaical state. From the beginning it was not so, saith the Lord, that man should be married unto more than one wife; and yet he would not say absolutely the law and Moses's permission was not good. So also we may say justly, From that first beginning which is to answer unto that ultimate end, wherein, according to the Lord's own words, there shall be neither marrying nor being given in marriage, it was not so. And yet we do not say thereby that the permission and institution of God was not good; but we say only that it was made by God, because man was departed already, in his imagination and desire, from the first, most pure, and best paradisaical state; which departing of man was certainly not good. In the creation of this world, God saw all his works, that they were all good; and yet all this goodness is hardly comparable to that goodness which Lucifer had destroyed, and unto which this world shall be brought back again. So then there is goodness and goodness, not indeed fighting against each other, as good and evil, but nevertheless distinct and different in degree and order; so that when both compared, the one is better, but when considered separately, each is good by itself. What then can this objection signify against the apostle's word? He says, indeed, the matrimonial state is honourable, and shall cient widow, named Anna, knew him to be the true Messiah, whom the rulers, chief priests, and doctors of the law, condemned as an impostor. Had they, instead of their adherence to critical knowledge, and rabbinical learning, been devoted to God in such purity of heart as she was, they had known as much of the kingdom of God as she did. Place, therefore, all your hope and con-be accounted and kept so; but truly, honourableness in a state of this world is not an absolute holiness and purity in the paradisaical world. Marriage, therefore, as it is an association from without of male and female, is justly to be accounted honourable here in this world, [but will not be honourable in that which is to come, where the Lord said himself it shall not be at all, and where, nevertheless, nothing that is pure and holy shall be wanting.

Page 183. A. 1. By the rib they mean somewhat taken out of all the essences, etc. Though it is true, that they say somewhat was taken out of all the essences, yet it cannot be said that they mean or understand this by the rib, as if this rib did signify all that which was taken. More members besides the rib were not taken out of Adam, saith Behmen, expressly. And by this rib, which as then was not yet so hard and gross, he understands nothing else but that which then, in Adam's body, answered unto what we now call rib, and which also came to be the rib as a particular member, when the body came to have such gross earthly flesh and bones as it hath now.

Page 185. Line 3. Here I think it is not well said, that text seems to say, etc., as if there were only a probability of this text's saying so, when it is clear and plain unto every one, that this excellent text saith positively, and by so many express words, that God created but one, because he sought a godly seed.

Page 185. A. 2. Here, the description of Adam is well and right enough; but that of Eve, calling her a gross elementary creature, is not applicable to that state wherein she stood before her eating of the tree. For she was indeed flesh of Adam's flesh, and bone of his bone, but not yet grosser nor more elementary than Adam was. She was indeed made for to be his wife afterwards, in the elementary state of this world; but as then the elements were not yet manifest nor predominant, neither in her nor in him. But they were both alike in glory, happiness, holiness, and purity, and were both in paradise, though they had none of these things in that eminent degree in which Adam had them all, when he was a single person.

Page 187. Line 1. A perfect virgin, with fire and light in union. This must here needs be expressed with an addition of these or the like words—with fire and light, and with the two tinctures thereof in union: or shorter, thus—with the two tinctures of fire and light in union. For the union of the tinctures in one person presupposeth and implieth also an union of fire and light, and is therefore enough to describe Adam as a perfect paradisaical virgin; but the union of fire and light only, without an union of the two tinctures, is here, in this place, not enough, where Adam is considered not only as a single person, but also immediately as divided into two: so that an account is to be given of what was divided, and what was given unto each divided part. Not fire and light, but only the two tinctures thereof were divided. For Eve had a fiery soul, or soulish fire, as well as Adam, and had also a shining light, as well as he; and had therefore fire and light in union, neither more nor less than he. But for all that neither he nor she was any more such a perfect paradisaical virgin as Adam had been before his sleep.

Page 187. Q. What do they mean by the two tinctures? A. I know not how to express it better than by what I have expressed it already, saying that they mean the two generating powers in man, out of the two eternal principles; neither of which can be complete by itself, nor acquiesce with itself alone; but each must embrace the other, find its accomplishment therein, and be enabled thereby to produce a living image after its likeness.

Q. Which of these two was left to Adam? and is there a reason to be had, why that which was given to Eve could not as well have been reserved to him, so that Eve might have had that which now Adam hath? A. The temptation before Adam's sleep was chiefly about propagation, and even especially was it in his fiery soul; for therein the lust was conceived, and the desire arose after a female associate. That part, therefore, of the propagating power which was inseparable from his soulish fire, must needs have been reserved to him; and that was the strong, fiery, masculine tincture. And so then that other part which he was not willing to have had further within himself in a paradisaical integrity, but without or besides himself, after the manner of all the beasts, must needs have been taken out of him and given unto Eve. And this was the weaker watery female tincture, not able (for want of fire) to raise up a life by itself.

Page 187. Q. 4. Could not a paradisaical birth or godly seed, etc. Here are two reasons given for a negative answer, which are both indeed right and true; but that which might be the most considerable, at least upon some certain particular account is not mentioned, which I think should be set in the first place, and thus expressed:

A. No; because (1.) in the womb of Eve no union of the two tinctures, according to the right of eternal nature, was, nor could have been made; but only an outward familiar conjunction, which soon after must have been turned into disagreement and strife. And moreover (2.) both tinctures were defiled, etc. Concerning the next following words, I observe this, that Eve did not expect such a birth, or such a paradisaical virgin; because after her being turned out of paradise, she knew paradise no more, and much less what a paradisaical virgin was. But she expected (according to her understanding the promise of the serpent treader) a valiant champion against the devil, who should conquer him after an outward earthly manner, etc. And this she called a man from the Lord. But as she was disappointed in this her blind opinion, so she must have been disappointed much more, if she had or could have expected a paradisaical virgin.

Page 189. Q. 2 and 3. These two questions belong together; and seeing that several things could be expressed and represented plainer and more distinctly; and also, that this and that expression could be excepted against, I think therefore that this matter might be declared in such a manner:

Q. What do they say concerning the formation of Eve's body? A. They say, with the scripture, that the Lord God made of the rib a woman. And more particularly do they declare their sense by saying:

(1.) That the chief work-master was the eternal speaking Word, in conjunction with the first attracting, binding, or compacting spirit; not only of eternal, but also now especially of temporal confidence, all your learned help and skill, in the ardent love and practice of these virtues, and then, and then only, you will be able ministers, holy priests, and messengers of God; your cleansed hearts, like so many purified mirrors, will be always penetrated, always illuminated, by the rays of divine light, and you will no more need the critics, to tell you what God speaks to you in your own nature, which latter they call the exterior fiat, under whose power man was fallen in his sleep.

(2.) That this exterior fiat gave in this act unto Adam, as well as Eve, those distinct marks of male and female, now required for their propagation; and those other parts and members, also, that are now necessary for their living an earthly life; though nothing thereof was as yet manifest unto them, until their eyes were opened, when they had actually eaten of the earthly fruit, and seen that they were naked.

(3.) That therefore Eve was made to be a woman of this world only, and for the use of this transitory life; and not to continue a woman for ever, but to be restored into a perfect virgin-image in the world to come, such as the first Adam was before she was taken out of him.

(4.) That all this was done with Eve from the sixth hour to the ninth; whereunto, they say, do answer the three hours of our Lord's being nailed to the cross, until his dying to the male and female of this world.

(5.) That in this space of time her body, as then yet not so gross and earthly as it is now, arose into a full stature; and this by the power of the tincture (the principle of growth and increase), which then was still very lively, though not so powerful as it had been before the heavenly virgin was withdrawn from Adam.

Q. What do they say concerning her soul and spirit? A. They say, (1.) That her soul was not created anew, or infused into her body by a repeated act of creation, but generated out of Adam's soulish essences, as all souls now still are, viz. according to the process of the generation of eternal nature, in its four first properties.

(2.) That her soul was neither higher nor lower graduated than Adam's soul was in that state, which having been defiled already with his lust, could not but have infected with the same lust the soul of Eve also, as it showed forth itself soon after.

(3.) That her spirit arose out of her soul, as the light out of the fire, and as all the soulish spirits do to this day; which will be made more clear hereafter.

Q. But was not something of the substance of Adam's soul taken from him, and given unto Eve? A. No; only the watery tincture, as the one-half part of the propagating power, was taken from him, and given unto Eve; but this doth not belong to the substance of the soul, of which he lost, and could have lost nothing; like as the flame of a candle may communicate its fiery essences to another candle, and can for all that lose nothing of its substance.

Page 191. Q. 1. What do they [here] mean by the eternal Virgin Wisdom? A. They mean that breath and mirror of the power of God, that image of his goodness, that ray of the Almighty, and that treasure of man, which is called so by the author of the book of Wisdom; and which, in the Proverbs of Solomon, viii. 30, 31, saith of herself,—I was set up from everlasting: I was by him as one brought up with him: I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him: my delight was with the children of man, etc. And this, they say, is that same which the prophet Malachi, ii. 14, 15, calleth the wife of thy youth, thy companion, and the wife of thy covenant, against whom thou hast dealt treacherously. This Adam should have cleaved unto faithfully, but dealing treacherously against her, he got, instead of her, the woman of this world, called a strange woman, and described emphatically, Prov. v. 3, etc.

Page 193. In this matter, concerning the temptation of Eve by the serpent, I see it would cause too great a prolixity, if all the observations that might be made should be particularised. I will, therefore, only set down the sense of Behmen, so and in such an order as I am apt to think it might best be represented.

(1.) They say, that Eve was tempted by the devil, who envied man, because he was to have possessed that third angelical throne from which he fell.

(2.) That the devil did not tempt Adam directly, but Eve; because he had tried it already with Adam before, and could not prevail against him, so far as for him to condescend to this degree of transgression, though he was prevented chiefly by an intervention of the great mercy of God, who caused a deep sleep to fall upon him, and divided him. But after this division, he saw his own evil seed, which he had sown into Adam, spring up in Eve, whom he knew to be made for a woman of this world; and whose watery tincture, as the weaker, he might well suppose, would not prove so strong as to resist effectually the poisonous darts of his dark magic fire.

(3.) That he did not tempt her immediately by himself, because, having nothing of this third outward principle in him, he could not have wrought so effectually upon her sensitive part; and wanted, therefore, a medium, fit to procure a familiar communication, and then an union of will between himself and her.

(4.) That this medium was the serpent, which in its own living substance was of the same qualities as the tree of knowledge was of in a lifeless figure. And that, therefore, unto this tree, as its own most agreeable likeness, not only the serpent could and did apply itself, but also through the serpent the devil could and did act his parts most properly, to persuade Eve that she might freely eat of the fruits thereof.

(5.) That he therefore entered into the serpent's properties and tincture, and especially into the subtlety in this tincture; for this was the most suitable for his end, viz. to insinuate himself after the most advantageous manner into the tinctures and properties of Eve.

(6.) That the deepest ground why he made use of the serpent, rather than of any other living creature, is to be found in the serpent's originality. Concerning which they say,—That ens which in the creation became the serpent, was nearly related unto Lucifer before his fall. For as he was a most eminent prince, both as to fire and light, so that also was a fire-light image of great powers and virtues. No wonder, then, that in and after his fall, also, it was nearly related unto him, when, by his false magia, he had infected and impregnated it more than anything else with the properties of the dark world. These properties, say they further, not being able to exalt that kind of intellect which is therein to a degree of holy wisdom, and true understanding of truth, do sharpen it only in subtlety, guile, deceit and lies, fairly coloured with the glistering astral light of hearts.—There are indeed in the scriptures secrets and mysteries, only fully to be known in God's own time, and not a minute sooner; but of all men in the world, the critical dealers in words and particles, know the least of them, and make the vainest attempts to understand them. But scripture, considered as a doctrine of life, faith, and salvation in Jesus Christ, is a sealed or unsealed, an outward nature. Now all this being so in the serpent, he was for this reason more fit than any beast of the field to be made use of by the devil in his present purpose of transforming himself into a creature of light. [See Behmen as to its figure and appearance.]

(7.) That he spoke through the serpent, and by that speech transfused his infecting subtle tincture into her, which eclipsed her light and weakened her will more and more, till at length her former secret lust came to be an open resolution to try whether she might find out that hidden treasure which the serpent told her God had kept back from her; and laid it up within the good and pleasant fruit of this desirable tree. [Animal magnetism comes in to illustrate deep man's truth]

(8.) That this the devil's transfusing his poisoning tincture into Eve, was done after such a manner as still to this day his wicked instruments are able by incantation to convey poison, pain, sickness and all manner of evil into another's mind and body, if he be capable thereof, by not being armed or provided against it.

Q. I do not well know what you mean by the tincture of the serpent, nor what the subtlety in this tincture is: pray, Sir, therefore satisfy me in these doubts? (Here I am to show the reason for which I left out the word twofold, together with this whole question, Why do you assert this creature alone to have this tincture? And then also why I say the subtlety in the tincture, instead of the property of subtlety.)

(1.) It is plain enough that one and the same thing, and under the same name, may be considered and spoken of differently with respect to different qualities, powers, operations and effects. Now then the tincture is here not considered any more as that propagating power which upon its division came to be twofold, as it was so spoken of above; but as a power operating upon another thing without it, influencing it, and communicating or conveying unto it this or that. The tincture is a powerful thing, whose true name, says Behmen, is wonderful, and none can name it but he to whom it is given; and he can name it only in himself, but not without him to another. It is not the spirit itself, but the spirit's and soul's habitation and instrument. Through the tincture the soul can overthrow mountains, and do all those wonderful things that the Lord and his apostles did. It is indeed in all things whatsoever, yet not in one as in another, but in every thing according to its nature and condition. All the communication between intellectual creatures is done by the tincture; all the thoughts and senses arise in it, and without it there could be no seeing, hearing, feeling, etc. This therefore in the serpent the devil made use of to transfuse his poison into Eve, which he could not have done so by his own tincture only. Now then it is apparent that it is one thing when Behmen speaketh of two tinctures, and another when of a twofold tincture. For that former hath a particular relation to the two divided propagating powers in male and female; but this latter to the twofold means of communication between intellectual creatures: which here in this case of the serpent was the outward and inward tincture. The outward from the astral light of this outward principle was that which Eve could immediately be sensible and capable of, and which the devil could not have entered into immediately. But the inward from the inward dark world's properties, was that which the devil had a free entrance into, and by which he could direct that outward also; and so through this outward, convey and transfuse his hidden poison into Eve's tincture, if she would hearken to the serpent's speech. So then, it is evident, that this question, why the serpent alone had this twofold tincture, if the twofold tincture be understood as now declared, hath no sense in it: for it is nowhere said, that the serpent had it alone, but only that the serpent had it in a manner and degree more fit for the devil's use than any other beast of the field. But if it be understood of the two divided tinctures in male and female, it doth not belong to this place at all, and is therefore justly left out. And though I might well have said twofold tincture in a sense as mentioned, instead of tincture only, yet I left out the word twofold, also, to give no occasion for this prolixity, and because the matter can be, and is, as I think, represented intelligibly enough, though this word is not made use of.

(2.) Instead of the property of subtlety, I say only the subtlety in the tincture; because that former expression is a pure Germanism, and the translator might rather have said, the subtle property in the tincture: for, as to my thinking, that former represents, as it were, three different things, viz. (1.) a tincture, (2.) a subtlety in this tincture, and (3.) a property causing this subtlety; when there are but two. What subtlety is, I think, is seen and known in this world sufficiently, wherein yet it is but an outbirth from the dark-world, and must be described from the properties of them both together in conjunction. That which is in the holy light-world wisdom, is in this astral light-world subtlety; and in the dark we have no proper peculiar name for it, but call it subtlety also, though certainly a distinction ought always to be observed. When, therefore, Moses saith that the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field, he says in the ground and substance nothing else but that the serpent (1.) with respect to the dark-world, was more than any other beast, infected possessed, and filled with its properties; and (2.) that it was with respect to the outward light-world, more than any other, of a friendly, fallacious, false-loving, penetrating, and insinuating temper; those inward dark and wrathful properties being thus, in a sense, corrected and tinctured, or exalted to a specious appearance. And so in these two together in conjunction, this subtlety consisted; wherefore, then, the serpent was the fittest for the devil's use, who wanted such an instrument. Now, this subtlety is not the tincture itself, but in the tincture; and by the tincture, as by a proper vehicle, it was conveyed to, and transfused into the tincture of Eve. For it is not essential to, nor inseparable from, the tincture, but shall be separated from it again, and came to be therein only by the devil's false magia. Wherefore then, the sense is rightly expressed by saying, the subtlety in the tincture.

Q. What is now further their doctrine concerning the tree of knowledge of good and evil? A. They say.

(1.) That like as the serpent was a fit medium to convey the devil's poison from the dark-world chiefly into the mind of Eve, so this tree was such a medium also to convey the same, by her eating thereof, especially into her body, for to make it beast-like and mortal.

open or shut up book to every heart, in the same proportion as it stands turned to the world, or turned to God. Nothing understands God, but the Spirit of God; nothing brings the Spirit of God into any mind, but the renouncing all for it, the turning wholly to it, and the depending wholly upon it. Human learning is by no means to be rejected from religion, for it is of the same good use

(2) That this tree was such a one, and neither better nor worse, than our fruit trees are, which we now eat of, after the curse.

(3.) That the difference between this forbidden tree and all the other trees in the garden Eden, was just such a one as there is between the now earthly body, and that paradisaical body which man had then; the quintessential property being then in all the other trees predominant, when in this only the four elements in their strife and contrariety were manifest.

(4.) That it was called the tree of knowledge of good and evil, because man, not having had before an experimental knowledge of these two in their contrarieties, could only, by eating of this tree, come to have a knowledge and feeling thereof in his soul and body.

(5.) That no creature can live without food, but every creature, according to its kind, must eat of the fruits of that world wherein it is to live. And that, therefore, in this tree an infinite mercy of God appears, who, foreseeing the fall of man, and not willing him to fall into the dark-world, ordered all things so, that, by eating of a four-elementary fruit, he might fall into this outward mixed world; whose four elements being but so many issues of the pure quint-essential element, may be brought back again into their root, and so therefore man also to his primeval state.

(6) That this tree came not forth with the rest of vegetables, on the third day of the creation, but that it was afterwards brought forth out of the earth by the strong magical imagination and desire of Adam, when he was already deviated from the first paradisaical perfection.

Page 199. A. 1. Seeing that this objection hath a fine outward appearance, I think it would be needful to answer it more particularly; and for this reason there might be added to the last words of the question. What reason can they give for this assertion?

A. They think they have a solid ground firmly to believe that they do not contradict Moses, any more than he seems to contradict himself, when he saith, Gen. i. Male and female created He them [supposing this expression not to be antithetical, relating to the beasts' creation in contradistinction to man's]; and in the second chapter, He took a rib and made a woman. But some of their plainest and most obvious reasons for this assertion, may be these:

(1.) This tree was not altogether good, much less very good, and therefore we cannot say that it was made by God on the third day, with all the rest of vegetables. For on the fifth day God saw everything which he had made, and behold it was very good.

(2.) It brings with it great prejudice to the honour of God, to say that he made such a tree to grow out of the ground, when man stood yet in his entire integrity; for this would be as much as to say directly, God himself gave the first occasion to the fall, or God tempted him, and laid a snare at his feet, by setting desirable fruit before him, and yet commanding him not to desire nor touch it. When God is not a tempter to the evil, and when we can show the right and true ground of this temptation.

(3.) This assertion is all consistent with Adam's princely state and mighty power; and if this be joined to a consideration of his threefold life, it is to them that can understand the constitution thereof, a strong, convincing proof, that this tree came not forth before, but after the beginning of his deviation; and that he brought it forth himself, though God is not absolutely in all and every sense excluded. And though Moses makes mention of this tree before he says that God brought man into the garden, seeing that it is evident enough that Moses, in all this relation, is not so nice and accurate as to put everything in an exact order.

(4.) As it is greatly prejudicial to the honour of God to put any appearance of evil upon him, which cannot but be done by saying, He, without any concurrence of man, and before he could concur to it, made this tree to grow; so it is, contrariwise, highly exalting his honour, goodness, and tenderness to man, to ascribe all evil, in the greatest latitude, unto the devil and man; which is done by saying, when man, through the instigation of the devil, lusted and longed after such a food, then only, but not before, God gave it him, or let him have it so; and yet declared withal his displeasure sufficiently, by commanding him, Thou shalt not eat thereof; and telling him of his eminent danger.

(5.) Like as he that says, God gave, or raised up a king to the house of Israel, is not contradicted by him that declareth orderly the manner of this raising up, and says, The tribes of Israel first departed with their hearts from the Lord their God, and rejected him, that he should not be their king; and then they desired importunately, not of God, but of the prophet, that he should set a king over them, after the manner of all the nations; and so by this desire they were themselves the immediate cause of this kingdom, and of all their following calamities: so also Moses, in what he says of God's doing about this tree, is not contradicted by him that makes the strong desire of Adam, after his imagination was departed from the Lord, his Father and Tutor, to be the proper immediate cause of this tree's coming forth out of the ground.

Q. How could such an evil, infecting tree grow in paradise? A. Thinking still, Sir, on your last question, I might well ask reciprocally.—How could such a tree as you describe have been brought forth by God, the only good, without an immediate operation of man himself, and even before he was infected by the devil? But to resolve this new scruple, also, I must needs say, there is no difficulty in the matter at all. For this tree grew not in paradise, but in the garden Eden, and even in the midst thereof where Adam and Eve were tempted. We discoursed before, concerning the difference between paradise and the garden Eden; and from thence you may easily apprehend, that this tree was as little in paradise as the devil or the serpent was: but in the garden, in which all the other trees were paradisaical, it could be; for only the pre-dominion, either of the quint-essential or four-elementary property does make the difference.

Q. Why is this tree of knowledge said to have stood in the midst of the garden? A. As all outward things are figures or signatures of the inward, so was this also. Adam and Eve were tried as in the midst, between the three principles, having them, indeed, all three in them, but being not yet fixed in any of them: and in answerableness to this, the tempting tree stood also outwardly in the midst of the garden. But another and deeper reason can be given, which is this: This standand service, and affords the same assistance to religion, that the alphabet, writing, and printing does. But if it is raised from this kind and degree of assistance, if it is considered as a key, or the key, to the mysteries of our redemption in Jesus Christ, instead of opening to us the kingdom of God, it locks us up in our own darkness.—It is a truth confessed on all hands, that the kingdom ing in the midst is chiefly and in the first place attributed to the tree of life, representing the second principle of pure eternal life, which standeth in the midst, between the first and third; but to the tree of knowledge it is attributed but secondarily and consequentially. For it was not two trees in number, standing the one besides the other, but only one manifest in two principles, which as to its outward figure in this world, could not but stand in the midst of the garden, because it stood, as to its inward representation, in that midst; and this in conformity to the second principle's standing in the midst, between the first eternal and the third temporal world.

Q. How can this assertion, of one tree, be consistent with the description of Moses, who tells us expressly of two? A. The tree of knowledge, forasmuch as it had corruptibility and death in it, was not indeed the tree of life; like as also this four-elementary world is not paradise. But like as paradise is only without the qualification of this world, but not without the place of it, so also was this tree of life with relation to the tree of knowledge. As then, upon that former account, Moses rightly speaks of two trees, so upon this latter, there is also rightly spoken but of one, yet such a one as is twofold, or manifest in two different principles; and Moses is not contradicted at all.

Q. This distinction and difference between these two trees, which you say were but one, wants yet better to be illustrated. A. There was such a distinction and difference between them, as there was between man's outward astral and inward soulish spirit. When his imagination wandered out, he found in the midst of the garden an object was represented to his astral spirit by the spirit of this world, which invited him to eat, that he might get an experimental knowledge of good and evil. And when he withdrew his imagination from this, and turned in, he found in the midst of the garden (though it might now more properly be said, in the midst of paradise) an object was represented to his superior soulish spirit by the spirit of God, which invited him to eat, that he might be strengthened, and enabled to go forward unto his being confirmed to that higher eternal life, which he was to have been translated into at the end of this temporal world. And so there was the greatest difference, even to a contrariety, between these two objects. And yet they were not two such trees as stood besides or without one another, each upon a peculiar spot of ground, so as that they could have been seen at once in one station of man, and by the self same seeing faculty. And though they both were always before him, yet each of them affected only that part of him which it was conformable to, and he was sensible of that only which his imagination applied itself unto. And as he was but one man, or one soul with an interior and exterior spirit, so was this but one tree, with an interior and exterior appearance, answering unto his twofold spirit.

Q. How did this tree of life differ from the other paradisaical trees? and to what end was it set before him, in the midst, as you say, of paradise? A. The very name thereof sheweth us that it was more dignified, or higher graduated than the rest of the paradisaical trees. For though they also had nothing of death in them, yet they brought only fruits for man's then present paradisaical life, when this offered him fruits from that higher heavenly life, which upon his having held out his trial faithfully, he was to have been confirmed unto eternally. Wherefore, also, it was set before him in the midst of paradise, for to show him that this paradise, then upon earth, was still but, as it were, a circumferential state, from which he was to enter into a higher or deeper central rest. But especially was it set before him because of this temptation, that he might have the highest antidote against the devil's poison, hid under the veil of the spirit of this world; that he might be altogether inexcusable, and find afterwards no fault with his loving Father and Creator; but that God, as he is just, might be justified also in all his works by man, who must needs own that he would not have had him fall, but that he did for him all that he could do, consistently with that free will which he had given him. When, therefore, Eve neglected this, and applied herself to the tree of knowledge, and gave Adam also of the fruit thereof, they both could not but fall, by their own fault, into death, and lose not only the tree of life, but all the rest of the paradisaical fruits also.

Page 205. No. 4. For the sake of a clearer distinction, and better agreement with what was declared above, might here be said,—They had lost paradise, and were driven out of the garden also. For paradise, as to their own persons and paradisaical state, they had lost before, and saw that they had lost it when their eyes were opened; but in the garden they were still, till they were driven out of it afterwards.

Ibid. Q. 1. Concerning the cherubim and flaming sword, might thus be answered:

(1.) That the words of Moses are indeed to be understood, according to the letter, of a dreadful appearance, to Adam and Eve, of a mighty angel, having a flaming two-edged sword, and driving them away from that place. But that, nevertheless, this was but an outward figure or representation of an inward reality, which is of a very large signification, and full of mysteries. Whereof they say further:

(2.) That but an obscure external notion can be had thereof, without a self-experience in the process of regeneration; seeing that it is not only without, but much rather within man.

(3.) That this sword is the spiritual fire of eternal nature, considered as divorced from the light in man; and so that it is that only passage which he must go through, if to be restored to his entire primeval perfection.

(4.) That the whole dispensation under the law, with all its types and figures, is to be referred hereunto: this fire being all that time advancing forward to a re-union with its light in the humanity, until in the fulness thereof this re-union was accomplished in the human person of Jesus Christ.

(5.) That from this Adam and Eve's being driven out of paradise, no soul of their posterity was able to pass through this fiery sword into paradise again, because no male nor female can be admitted into it, but only that perfect virgin-image which was therein created in the beginning; and such a virgin-image was not among all living, until the Lord from heaven came down and took upon him human nature.

of grace is the beginning of the kingdom of glory, and that they differ only in degree. Is not this plainly confessing, that the light of the kingdom of grace must be one and the same with that of the kingdom of glory? How else can one be the beginning of the other? And must not that, which is to be our one only light in heaven in a full degree, be now our one only light of all heavenly

(6.) That He, though outwardly a male, being internally a perfect virgin, broke this fiery sword in his death, by passing through it into paradise, and carrying along with him the holy patriarchs, prophets, etc., and that in this entering into, and passing through this sword, that article of our christian religion, concerning his descending into hell, is understood.

(7.) That this breaking the fiery sword doth not yet import a total abolishing or removing of the same, but only a having weakened and made it impotent; so that though every one is to follow that same way after him, yet this angel is no more able to keep out any soul that is endued with his Spirit, and much less any that has put on his new humanity.

(8.) That the office of this angel is to cut off from the soul (N.B.) all what it is infected and polluted with from the devil, the serpent, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

Page 207. No. 4. that he implanted in their souls. For certain considerable reasons I would here much rather say,—in them, or in their mind, or, in their ground. Because it was not implanted in their souls, if the soul is taken strictly for that fiery being which in itself is distinct, and was moreover now separated from the spirit: but it was inspoken into them, or in their ground, without their having any power to do or act with it according to their pleasure. Nay, it is even more properly to be attributed to Eve than to Adam, seeing that Eve, not Adam, was to bring forth that holy seed which was to bruise the serpent's head. When the fiery soul in Adam, chiefly (for Eve's soul is not thereby excluded) was that same serpent in man, whose head, or fiery predominant power was to be bruised by that seed of the woman, not of the man. In Adam the soulish fire began to be raised up, and in Eve the light thereof was first extinguished. Into this, therefore, not into that immediately, this seed was implanted, for to stand in opposition against that first beginning made in Adam.

Ibid. Q. 1. The same in substance with what divines commonly call universal grace, etc.

Though I do not exactly know what they understand by universal grace, yet I think this supposition, which here in the answer is passed by in silence, and as if it were all granted, should be answered in a sense inclining more or less to the negative, by showing a difference between them, consisting herein,—that the universal grace is that ability in all men, which is freely given them after the fall, to turn their will, desire, and imagination unto God again, who offers them a gift, and to receive the same from him; when this ingrafted word is that divine gift itself, though still but considered as a little seed. For though even this also may verily be called an universal grace, yet there is also something lower than this, and in a sense prior, and more as on the side of man, by which he is to procure the manifestation and increase of this gift in him, which else will never be manifest in him, nor do him any good. In a word, that first, all men have absolutely; and this second, all men can have, by means of a right use of that first.

Ibid. A. 1. propagated, but in a hidden manner. Here, I think, might well be added,—in its own inward principle, and not as by the soul's own propagating power. For the soul was not sufficient for it; and therein also chiefly, according to Behmen's plain declaration, that hidden manner did consist. And, that the last words, viz., the first-born, commonly the figure or type of the sinful image, might not seem so dry and useless, I think these words could conveniently be added,—which they say is very mysterious. For Behmen's declaration testifieth sufficiently, the great mysteries contained therein, and sheweth also plainly the deep mysterious cause thereof; even from the generation of eternal nature, wherein the fiery, wrathful properties are, and must be, prior to the light, as the soul also in man is and must be prior to the spirit.

Pages 211—218. Here is a compendious description of the beginning of the natural generation, represented first, as to the sense of Behmen, and then also as to that of several other philosophers and physicians, which are apprehended to be not only different from, but also contrary to him. I cannot but say hereupon in general (1.) That same which I find is said afterwards (page 229. A. ult.) is absolutely true; viz. that internal eyes, looking into the inward ground, are more to be valued than external ones, beholding only the superficies of things, though never so well instructed with microscopes. (2.) That these latter are to be censured, judged, and rectified by those former, but not the former by the latter; according to the apostle's word, which herein also is true in a sense and manner, the spiritual man judgeth all things, and is judged by none. (3.) That notwithstanding this, if, by the outward eye something is plainly discovered contrary to, and inconsistent with what internal eyes have delivered; in such a case it may be granted, that in this or that particular thing a mistake is committed, either by the author himself in his delivery, or by the reader in the apprehension thereof. For this could have been done upon several accounts, both on the reader's side and on the author's, who not only never pretended to an infallibility in all and every punctilio, but also owned plainly himself, that he had not declared all particular things; whereto, he saith, in this matter only, concerning the natural propagation of man, many great volumes would be required. And (4.) That in all what here in these seven pages is related from the physicians, I cannot yet meet with anything which I could say is plainly and directly contrary to what Behmen hath delivered. Nay, as to those particulars wherein they differ among themselves, and are contrary to one another, I dare say it is apparent, from Behmen, that in both their contrary opinions some glimmerings appear of a deeper truth, which in its brightness was not risen unto any of them, and could not therefore by them have been discerned. So that they are not only not so contrary to Behmen as they may seem to be from without, but also not so contrary to one another as they think themselves to be. This, I shall, in the first place, endeavour to show by going through all their eight positions (from page 213 to 218,) and then I shall also say what I think is needful to be observed upon the six positions (page 211), declaring the same thing according to the sense of Behmen:

(1.) The physicians say, the semen of the male consists, etc. In this whole first position, I am not able to discover any the least contrariety between Behmen and them; nay, as to some particulars, not so much as a difference, but what may be in the construction of words. Behmen speaks of a blood of the heart, and they of an arterial blood conveyed from the heart: and is not things in a lower degree? Therefore all that we see and know of the kingdom of God now, must be by that same light by which we shall see and know the kingdom of God hereafter.—God is an all-speaking, all-working, all-illuminating essence, possessing the depth, and bringing forth the life of every creature according to its nature. Our life is out of this divine essence, and is itself a both this and that one and the same thing? Behmen considers chiefly the first, the principal and the more insensible original of the seed, in that place whereout, as the Scripture witnesseth, are the issues of life; not minding so directly that which is secondary, which yet in several other places, he also plainly expresses and asserts. And the physicians consider chiefly that which is nearer to apprehension and sensibility; not minding so directly that which is first and principal, which yet they also do not deny, but assert and express it plainly, by their saying it is conveyed from the heart. Behmen doth not say, that the semen is elaborated in the heart; but that in the heart the beginning is made of its generation, not in the spermatic arteries. For to the brain, which is the astral spirit's residence, the heart, as the chief residence of life, is nearer and more immediately related than those arteries. Upon the heart, therefore, the first operation is done, from the agent in the brain, and then from the heart it is conveyed down: which I am sure the physicians will not deny nor contradict. Further: I see they disagree here, more or less among themselves; for some add to the animal spirits, the nervous juice, the succus nutritius, or succus genitilis. But Behmen will disagree with none, having asserted, that in the greatest latitude all the powers and virtues of the whole body are comprised in the seed. And to their last particular in this position, viz., that the gross parts of the semen are as a vehicle to the spirituous parts, etc., he will be found not only to stand in an entire conformity, but also to be able more than any or all of them to declare, from his internal sight, what and from whence those grosser and these more spirituous parts are, what it was that made such a difference between them, and how the former came to be so gross and beastlike as they are.

(2.) Physicians say, the females have no semen: their testiculi are ovaria; and from hence it is concluded that Behmen, saying much of the female semen, cannot but contradict their ocular experiences. But I think this contradiction will be but seeming, and lying in different apprehension of the word semen. The females, they grant, have something in them requisite to the generation: even such a thing as hath the lineaments of the foetus in it, before the knowledge of man, and which is to drop into the fundus uteri, as a seed into the ground. Now why this may not pertinently be called a seed or semen, I cannot see, when the Scripture itself speaks of the woman's seed. When, therefore, the physicians say the females have no semen, I cannot think that they intend to set up their ocular experience as a witness against the Scripture, but only that their meaning is this: that which the woman hath is not like to the semen of the man, and hath not those requisites which they conceive to be needful in the man's semen. And if this or the like be their sense, it is not contrary to Behmen. For he nowhere saith that the female semen is thoroughly such a one, or that it is generated entirely in the same form as the males; though he doth also say nothing of that form of an ovum, which whether he knew or not I cannot determine. It is at least apparent, from his saying—that hands and feet have their signatures in the centre, before they come to an outward appearance, that he knew more than he delivered. But let this also be taken notice of: Seeing that the physicians say little of that which needs must precede every generation, viz., will, imagination, lust, and desire, which yet is not of little moment; and seeing that these things are and operate in the females as well as in the males; why should they be in them quite without effect, when they are so efficacious in men? May we not reasonably think, that their astral spirit in the brain, acting upon the same object as in males, must also have the same effect in them, according to their peculiar kind or female constitution? And could not therefore a massa (or however else it might be called), chiefly of more spirituous parts, be raised up thereby from the blood of the heart, and then conveyed into their ova, for to stir and influence the same with a concupiscence after the male semen? Truly, if they have, as the physicians own, their spermatick arteries and vessels, as well as men, they must have them in vain and to no purpose, or at least the physicians must give them this name in vain, if they do not at all minister to the generation of the seed. But I will herein not be positive, not pretending to be a natural philosopher. I say only, that what I have now offered to consideration is not inconsistent with Behmen, and that I can as yet, in all what the physicians say in this second position, see nothing directly contrary to him.

(3.) The things said in this third position are partly belonging to the foregoing second, and are considered already. Partly they will be repeated in the following positions, and shall be then considered; and partly also they are depending only upon the females having ovaria. Wherefore it is plain, that if this can be consistent with Behmen, that also which depends thereupon can have nothing in it directly contrary to him.

(4.) Here is also, at least on one side, a harmony to be perceived; and though on the other something of discord may be observed, yet seeing that this discord is only about a thing delivered by the physicians from their ratiocination, and not from an ocular experience, nothing thereof can be set in opposition to Behmen, as able in any wise to detract from his authority. The seed of the male, they say, is no part of the conception, but only the active principle or efficient cause of the foetus. Above (position 1st), they have owned the masculine seed hath both gross and spirituous parts. Now then, let them make these spirituous parts the active principle of the foetus, Behmen shall well enough agree with them. But as to the gross parts, which they themselves call but a vehicle of the spirituous, none I think will deny but that they are in the coition mixed with the limpid liquor in the female ovum, or else how could this be impregnated thereby? And if so, it might well be asked by what sort of microscopes they could have discovered that this limpid liquor only, and not also that which is so mixed with it, is the matter or the passive principle of the foetus? Male and female are one flesh, saith the Scripture; now this one flesh in two persons jointly generates a third flesh. What ground then can be shown why the female only should generate the flesh, and the male should contribute nothing to the substance of the flesh, but only be an active principle thereof, when it is so plain that the masculine seed is more fleshly, or nearer unto flesh, than that limpid water of the female.

(5.) That all what here is said in this fifth position, if it be really so in the outward appearance, creaturely similitude of it; and when we turn from all impediments, this divine essence becomes as certainly the true light of our mind here, as it will be hereafter. This is not enthusiasm, but the words of truth and soberness; and it is the running away from this enthusiasm, that has made so many great scholars as useless to the church as tinkling cymbals, and all christendom a mere ba-as some of the physicians declare, can be consistent with Behmen, appears sufficiently from the foregoing observations. I shall add only this, as to the two different words, fecundated and impregnated, that they seem thereby themselves tacitly or implicitly to grant, that the male semen is not only an active principle, viz., as to its spirituous parts, but also as to the gross, a part of the matter or passive principle of the fœtus; for unto this the impregnation, and unto that the fecundation, is proper, which two cannot be attributed unto both promiscuously. If the masculine seed doth fecundate the female ovum, it works thereupon and enables its faculties to bring forth that which they cannot bring forth as of themselves alone; but if it doth impregnate the same, it makes it only thick and swelling, not by working thereupon, but by adding or infusing something into it which is agreeable thereunto. The gross parts as to themselves cannot fecundate it, or else they would be the active principle themselves, and not a gross vehicle thereof. And so the spirituous parts cannot impregnate it, viz., directly and immediately by themselves, or else they would be but a gross vehicle without activity. And if these two should be attributed to each of them promiscuously, the distinction (which yet is real enough) between grossness and spirituousity in one and the same seed, would signify nothing at all.

(6.) In this sixth position is nothing that wants any reconciliation with Behmen. Those that profess they do not know, etc., might learn something thereof from him; and others, who think their opinion to be very probable, might be more by him confirmed, and get a clearer sight, seeing it is undeniable that he hath declared this matter deeper than they were able to do.

(7.) This position of some, though it be exploded by others, hath certainly something in it which is not absolutely to be rejected. Of the animalcula in the male semen I will say nothing, though I think something might be said for it, though not perhaps in their sense. I will say only, that it is most agreeable with Behmen that the lineaments of the fœtus are therein, no less than in the female ovum; though, I am sure, so deeply hid and secretly, that they shall not be discerned by any microscope, but found only by such an eye as Behmen had, whose words we heard above. And though perhaps these lineaments may be nearer to appearance in the female ovum, yet this cannot be a sufficient ground to assert that they are not at all in the male seed. The second part of this position, saying that the conception is in that animated male semen, and not in the ova of the females, which they take to be only the receptacles of the semen virile, though it is likewise exploded by others, hath nevertheless some part of truth in it, and is so far consistent also with Behmen, which hereafter more and more will evidence itself. So, therefore, this exploding one another among the learned physicians themselves, cannot be derogating from Behmen's authority, but from their own; and must rather exalt him the more, because by his principles many assertions of theirs can be reconciled, and their sparkles of truth, scattered among them here and there, can be discerned from what is false.

(8.) The heart is not the seat of our affections, etc. What is here asserted is so exceeding well consistent with Behmen, that this whole position (if but one small and inconsiderable particular be excepted) is more than any of the former to be excluded from the sentence in the first words of this question, saying, our philosophers and physicians teach us otherwise. If by the seat of our affections is understood that particular place wherein they reside, act, and play their parts, it is true that it is not the heart, but the phantastic or astral mind. But if there be understood the ground from which they came first into the astral mind, and out of which they may still by the fancy be raised up, some more and others less, it is true again that it is the heart. For our Lord says himself, Out of the heart come evil thoughts; and Solomon warneth, Watch over thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life. Both this and that did Behmen well understand, and hath asserted distinctly. He hath not asserted that this love, which indeed is one of our affections, ariseth, resideth, and playeth in the heart; but rather that by this love's playing in the phantastic mind, the first conceptions (as it is in this position well expressed) or rude draughts of the sperm are begun. But as this is in the brain but an active spiritual play, so it must have a certain passive and material object or instrument, which is the blood of the heart, from which it is further conveyed to the testicles. Brain and heart must both concur; for that which is active in the brain raiseth up that which else would be quiet in the heart. What the author of this position adds further of something particular, that seems to him very probable, needs not to be examined, because his probability can be no argument against Behmen. But what he says at last, of the fancy's assisting in the business of generation, always in order to coition, etc.; and of its stigmatising the fœtus, etc.; is as well and true as anything could be from him expected. Wherefore, then, I cannot see how this position can be brought in as an instruction of the physicians contrary to Behmen.

This now being so far made out, that the pretended differences and contrarieties are not so many and great, nor so considerable and deep, as first they were believed to be; and that nothing hitherto was shown from the ocular experiences of the physicians, which could give a demonstration of Behmen's being in the wrong, it can now from hence appear sufficiently what is to be replied to those two questions that are proposed in the conclusion, page 217, section ult., viz. :—

(1.) That the conception is in both male and female. For as every child is generated from the sinful will and lust both of father and mother, so every one bears also both his father's and mother's flesh and blood. If the masculine semen is not a part in the conception, as to its fleshly grossness, as well as it is an active principle of the fœtus as to its spirituousity, what can the words of the scripture signify, when it saith, Adam begat a son after his own likeness? A chief part of his own likeness was certainly his gross, earthly, mortal body, out of which his fleshly seed proceeded forth. And again, what can it signify, when the Scripture says, that the children of this world are born of the flesh, and of the will of man? If the whole being of man and woman did consist only in soul and body, a greater outward appearance of probability for that other opinion might be found. But since there are in the whole human being not these two only, but three distinct things, body, soul, and spirit, and all three both in the man and woman; yet so that the soul, as to bel of learned confusion. I shall now only add one word more: A composed gravity of life, a suitable decency of outward behaviour, is not the thing that is demanded of you; your piety must be solid, your lives exemplary, the perfection of your virtues must shine before men; or you will all of you, in your several degrees, stand charged with the ill state of religion that is about you."

the stronger, fiery, active power, is more in the man ; and the spirit, as to the weaker, passive, watery part, more in the woman ; but both, and both in the man and woman, equally clothed with the flesh, or body ; which flesh, in the man especially and chiefly, is to do the outward work in the generation ; it is apparent, from a due consideration of all these things, that all these three parts do and must concur in this business, each in its kind and order, and according to its ability. And that the male semen is not only an active principle of the foetus in its spirituousity, but also a passive part in the conception, as to its grosser and exterior being of fleshliness.

(2.) That the spirituous part of the semen of the male, or that semen considered κατὰ δύναμιν, and the limpid, prolific liquor in the ova of the female, are not to be accounted the two tinctures themselves ; but only two things coming very near thereunto. The tinctures themselves are prior and higher, more spiritual and of far larger extent than to be concerned only about this particular generating business ; when these two things are notoriously posterior and lower, more material, and appointed only for this peculiar work, in the consideration of which they may be accounted the two chief and most immediate instruments of the tinctures. As to the males, indeed, much of this account will depend upon the different considerations of their semen : for this κατὰ δύναμιν, might be so far extended, that but little of a discernable difference between the spirituousity thereof and the tincture, would be left ; though it can never be so far extended that the tincture in itself should not always have a pre-eminence of priority and universality. But as to the females and their ovum, wherein the limpid liquor cannot be considered in such a great, active spirituousity, the distinction or difference between this and the tincture, is much plainer. For the limpid liquor, with the lineaments of the foetus, is in them, not only before the knowledge of man, but also before the maturity of their tincture ; during all which time this ovum is not fit for generation, nor can by the male semen be fecundated, though it might, perhaps (for I am not positive in it), be impregnated thereby. But the female's own tincture, after it is come to its maturity, must first fit, and prepare, and make it capable of being by the male seed impregnated and fecundated, which none, of any reasonable sense, can deny. And so now is it in the males also, mutatis tantum mutandis. For the tinctures in them both, playing first in their astral minds, stir up the seed, and raise the lust and desire after the carnal conjunction ; which is the consequence and effect thereof, like as that is the first active principle.

And now I am to go back to the six first positions, page 211, which are to represent this same matter, according to the sense of Behmen ; for in them also, I meet with several things, which I think must needs be altered. Yet I shall not enlarge, by making particular observations upon them, but think it may be enough to set down only the positions so as the sense of Behmen, according to my best apprehension, might be expressed ; which accordingly will be in the following manner :—

(1.) That the only true ground of this natural generation or propagation, is to be found in the two divided tinctures, which, when come to their maturity in male and female, cannot but press forward naturally for their re-union.

(2.) That this their pressing forward is first done in the astral spirit, whose residence is the brain, and whose open gates are the eyes, wherein the tinctures of male and female mutually do meet, lay hold on, and unite with one another.

(3.) That this their kind of union in the astral spirit is that natural love, which is one of the chief agents in this business.

(4.) That this love-union, as long as in the spirit only, is indeed much purer than afterwards, when the flesh comes to concur with it ; but that it cannot fully satisfy that natural inclination of the tinctures, nor stop their further pressing forwards, because they are generating powers, which cannot generate, because of their being divided, without concurrence of that flesh or body wherein they live and act.

(5.) That because of this still pressing forward, which is turned into a fervent desire after a fleshly copulation, this flesh is mightily stirred, and according to the different conditions of the several instruments and vessels thereof, proper and requisite for that business, severally affected and acted upon.

(6.) That this affecting and acting toucheth in the first place, and as to our chiefest, consideration, the heart.

(7.) That from the sweet water or oil which is in the blood of the heart, a mass is drawn together or coagulated, and that this is filled, not only with the animal spirits, but also with all the powers and virtues of the whole human body.

(8.) That this coagulation is the generation of that semen which is now fit for propagation, when it was not so before. And that this hath a fiery tincture in the man, but a watery in the woman.

(9.) That these two masses and tinctures, or generating powers, united in the womb, are the causes of the conception and foetus ; the male semen being both a part in the conception, and an active principle of the foetus.

(10.) That each of these two masses is a one-threelfold substance, being not only fleshly and producing the mortal body, but having also in it, though in different degrees, the two eternal principles. And that none of these three is manifest or comprehensible to the other, but each in its own sphere only ; and yet all three in such a combination, as the two inward worlds are with this outward third.

This, now, as to my best apprehension, is Behmen's sense, and from hence it may appear that several of the other positions of the physicians, and also that sentiment which is given thereof in general, cannot be left so as it is expressed in this conference, because the contrariety is not so great as at first imagined. But one thing more I must here mention, which I did not so exactly observe before : The physicians, if I do not misapprehend their meaning, declare from ocular experience, that the conception is done in the female ovarium, above what they call tubæ fallopi-

Such then is the extract from the former of the discourses in question, and such may be considered some of the finishing touches given by this divine artist, Mr. Law, to the portraiture of standard gospel christianity, personal and ministerial, after the model of its author, contained in the series of his earlier writings ; which by their just and powerful conceptions, logical clearness, ana, and before the vesicula, impregnated with the masculine seed, drops through them into the fundus uteri. Now Behmen, saying nothing of this, but only and simply of an union in the womb, cannot but be looked upon as contrary to them, and as one that is quite out. But I must answer hereupon, not questioning, but supposing their relation, as here represented, to be true, the following things may well be considered:—

(1.) A sufficient assurance must be had, not only that their ocular experience is taken from the inspection of a woman, not of a beast; but also, chiefly that the dropping of the vesicula into the fundus uteri is done after its being impregnated by the masculine seed; and not after its being impregnated or influenced only with its own female tincture, or propagating power, after this is come in her to its maturity. For that the ovary with its vesiculæ, was in being before the female tincture was ripe and fit for propagation, is granted; and that the vesicula, during all the time of infancy, was not so qualified as it cometh to be in the time of the tincture's maturity, by the astral spirit's playing in the brain, and stirring the blood and water of the heart, cannot be denied. But let all this be supposed to be true, viz., that the dropping of the vesicula into the fundus uteri, is done in a woman, after its being impregnated with the masculine seed; it may be considered, (2.) That all the words, ovarium, vesicula, tubæ fallopianæ, uterus, fundus uteri, and if there be any more belonging hereunto, are denominations but of so many particular places, parts, vessels, instruments, etc., all comprised sufficiently in that general expression of matrrix, which Behmen useth, who had no intention, as he pretended not to have ability, to instruct us in anatomy. (3.) That the Spirit of God, which also hath not such an intention, though he wants no ability, useth the like general expression in the Scripture, saying the conception is done in the womb, and calling children the fruit or blessing of the womb: Thou shalt conceive in thy womb, said the angel unto Mary, etc. (4.) That the whole work of propagation from the conjunction of male and female, is done in the lower region, under the heart; and that he who calls this region so generally either by the name of womb, or belly (which is not unusual nor improper in the German language), or matrrix, doth not fight thereby against another that gives a distinct enumeration of more particular places or things contained therein. Like as this latter also doth not, by his enumeration, contradict that former, who may have left such a particularity, either by reason that he had not a sufficient understanding thereof, or also, that he could declare without it all that he intended. From all which, now, (5.) This conclusion, doing justice unto each party, may be drawn: First, in general physicians and anatomists are more able to show the superficial appearance of these lower visible things, that are of their profession, and which only they bestow their time and labour upon, to little further purpose than to satisfy their natural curiosity, which yet remaineth always in the dark, as they must own themselves; and Behmen is more able to show the spiritual inward ground from the two internal worlds, which no microscope can reach into; and this is to a far greater use and benefit, tending to man's regeneration, which is always attended, more or less, with light. And then, in particular, as the physicians in this present matter may be in the right, so Behmen is not in the wrong, any more than the Scripture is. And so therefore, between these two parties there is no more contrariety than between A and B, when A says the meeting was in such a house, and B the congregation was in such a particular chamber of that house.

Page 219.—221. Here the further process in the natural generation is represented in five positions, according to the sense of Behmen. And here I must observe—as to the first. That when it is said, the two tinctures in union are much delighted with each other, and there is somewhat paradisaical in that delight; this is expressed too generally, and not so as to represent the sense of Behmen faithfully. For that which is called by him paradisaical is not in the mutual delight of the tinctures, so long as they are, or can be said in a sense to be in union, nor also so long as they are delighted with each other, but only in their very first meeting and receiving one another, when the seed is sown by the male into the female; where it is, he saith, but for a moment, and vanisheth away immediately, being but a small obscure glimpse, and not to be referred at all to what the beast-like flesh is sensible of.

At No. 3. That when there is mentioned a following strife to produce the paradisaical image which Adam lost, this strife is not sufficiently represented by referring it to the two tinctures only, but it must be referred and declared also (though not so properly here, where this strife is as yet all but in love and friendliness, yet soon after, when there is spoken, No. 5, of their being oppressed and polluted) as to the spirit of this world, and the four elements, and that which Behmen calleth the fiat; all which distinct things are mightily (each in its order and degree) for the bringing forth a paradisaical image. And if it were not so with them, nothing else but a beast (though in an outward human form of body) and beast-like senses could be produced. So also

No. 4. This incapableness to produce that paradisaical image belongeth not only to the two divided tinctures, but also to all these things now mentioned, that all have the same natural inclination.

At No. 5. Concerning the blood's being taken into the matrrix, I am apt to think that this also might be more circumstantially expressed. Chiefly when it is said the tinctures retire, it will be needful to be more distinct, and to say in what sense this is a retiring. For it is not an absolute and total departure, but only as to that clearness and purity, which in that state they are capable of. Whereby it would shew forth itself, that it might better and more properly be said (in singulari)—the tincture retireth. Again, here is nothing said of that great alteration, which is made in the blood, which yet is the chiefest thing in this consideration, that makes, nay constrains the tincture to withdraw, as to its former clearness and purity. And from this defect, it is now further, that a stranger to Behmen's writings about this matter, will hardly be satisfied by that short and imperfect account, that here is given from whence the longings and pains of women arise; telling indeed something of what he asserts, but not declaring his true ground or reason for which he doth assert it.

Now all these things might be represented indeed more fully, and without any great difficulty: yet seeing that in what now followeth from the modern physicians and philosophers, nothing is mentioned in particular, but only in general, that they give quite another account; I am doubtful simplicity of expression, and admirable applicability to all orders and conditions of christians, were calculated to enkindle and direct that new evangelical spirit, which was to arise at this epoch, to go forth and leaven all nations, inductively to the coming of the great day of the Lord. In which emanations of his genius, the erudite divine will at once discover under what great masters of spiritual

(1) what to do, and think it enough to have now observed only these things, and that it may be best to let them rest at present, until a revision can be made, because in the meantime, this or that might be more cleared up in the following discourse, so that unnecessary repetitions may be avoided. I have only to say a little more about what is replied upon these five positions.

(2) The physicians, it is said, deny that anything of the mother's blood is taken in the matrix. But the ground they think they have for it not being expressed, I cannot say more to it, but that their denying this seems to come forth from not knowing, What the blood and tincture are, not having found that anything is mentioned by them concerning the tincture, which yet is in this matter of the greatest importance. And if it were so with them, their denying would signify nothing at all.

(3) But concerning especially the menstrua's being poisonous, which they also deny, at least in part, if I do not misunderstand what here is said thereof; it is to be observed, that Behmen, asserting them to be poisonous, doth not take so much the word poison, as they seem to do, with relation to this outward world, wherein adders and toads, arsenicum, mercury, aqua-fortis, etc., are called poison and poisonous; but in a more mysterious sense, relating to the lost paradisaical world, which he explains by adding, that in the menstruum lieth the greatest antipathy and contrariety to holiness and purity. [Consider here what the Scripture saith, when it compareth all our righteousness to a pannus menstruatus.] In which sense, if the physicians did deny the menstrua to be poisonous, I could not but have a very low opinion of them, and little value for their understanding the fall of man from the one paradisaical into the other four elementary world. And, moreover, it is remarkable that Behmen had a familiar conversation with many physicians and graduated doctors; nay that he had written the same thing of the menstruum to an eminent one among them, and that yet it was never heard that he was by any of them contradicted, or less valued afterwards than he was before.

Page 223. Q. What do they mean by the essences death to paradise? This question not being answered, and I not being able to answer it in two or three lines, I shall declare the meaning, and leave, Sir, to you the finding out of better expressions, and of a shorter construction thereof. It is easily intelligible, that this death in every individual generation is not such a one as that was, which all the first Adam's essences died in his transgression, but only an effect, and an indispensable consequence thereof. For he having lived before to paradise, could have died to it, or could have lost this life. But here in this natural propagation, the essences had no foregoing life to paradise, and cannot therefore properly and directly be said to die to it, or to lose that which they have not. But this is the meaning thereof: In every generation of man's life is a process tending to the production of the paradisaical life and image. The two tinctures in their meeting and receiving each other, are in that way and process, in a sense conformable to their now divided state; and, therefore, as declared above, they are in an endeavour to produce it, and in an expectation thereof. This process would always have been effectual, if Adam had not fallen; so that in all and every one of his offspring that life and image would have been generated. But now in this natural propagation after the fall, a stop is put to that process, making it always ineffectual. And this even in that same point in which the paradisaical life and image is to arise. This stop is partly that which is done in the blood, and partly also that which the spirit of this world doth in the essences, who insinuates himself into them, captivates them, exalts himself in them, obstructs the rising of a paradisaical life, and forces them to bring forth in his service instead thereof an astral life and light, and a beast-like image. And this is their death to paradise, different from the first Adam's death herein, that as his death was an extinguishing of his paradisaical life and light, so this is a violent hindering, because of which the same cannot be kindled again.

Page 223. Q. 1 & 2., together with their answers. The things following (immediately and primarily) from or upon the former disorder and death, are here not mentioned at all. For here is nothing said of the crack (or schrack) terror and trembling, great alteration in the tincture, and consternation in the fiat, spirit of this world, and all the essences. All which are spiritual things, and even such as upon which all that is done in the seminal mass dependeth, and from which it is by Behmen deduced and declared, according to the generation, constantly the same both in eternal and temporal nature. By answering therefore, A motion of the whole coagulated seminal mass, etc., the question is answered but half, and only as to the lower and posterior part, which without the higher and prior, cannot be understood according to Behmen's mind, much less can it represent his sense to another that is unacquainted with him. And when thereupon is asked again, What followeth from this motion, and answered, A distinction of the mass, it cannot but cause a misapprehension several ways. For the single word motion, will not declare that which is to be said. A motion, in what sense and respect soever, was before also, even from the beginning of the conception; how therefore, this is different from that should be declared. And which is more, I cannot see how this motion, and the distinction of the mass could be represented as two so evidently different things, the one following upon the other. Seeing that there is not first a motion made in the mass, and then as a thing following thereupon, as it were at a perceptible distance, a distinction of the parts. But in this motion is the distinction made, and this very motion is different from that which was before herein, that it is the distinction of the parts itself. And though there might still be imagined something of difference between them, yet it will never be such a one, as that they should be so distinctly represented as two things following the one upon the other; and this so much the less, because the chiefest thing, which is a great tumultuous motion in the spiritual properties, is not mentioned at all. And from this a transition should immediately be made to the distinction and formation of the parts; which so then would evidently imply already a motion in the seminal mass, seeing that without a motion therein, it cannot be distinguished and formed into parts. But when a motion of the mass is placed so distinctly by itself alone, before the distinction and formation of the parts, (and that is said to be preceding, and this following thereupon), the formation of the parts is ascribed only to a thing done in the seminal mass, when it should be ascribed primarily to a thing done in the spiritual properties. Wherefore, then, I think the shortest way would be to contract these two questions and answers into one.

science he had finished his theological studies, as partially adverted to in the quotations presented on pages 185—187 of the present treatise; though it may not be out of place on the present occasion, (for the gratification and benefit of the general reader,) to especially mention the names of Thaulerus, Arndt, Bernières, Rodriguez, De Rancé, with some others of the ancient and reformed

Page 223. Q. ult. No. 1. Here I cannot but observe as by the way, that by these, here styled the most experienced philosophers and physicians, all that is utterly overthrown which before by others so positively, and from ocular experience, was asserted, concerning the lineaments in the ovum. Which contrariety I know not what to make of; for I thought they had found it so by the help of microscopes, and had reason to believe that every one making use of the same means could not but see the same thing, so that none could further contradict. But when they now assure us that the lineaments are in the ovum after an insensible manner, and that nothing appears but a limpid crystalline liquor, they are directly contrary to each other; but none of them can be so to Behmen, because the one assertion of—an insensible manner, is plainly his own, and the other he hath not meddled with at all, and so not contradicted it. But it could be consistent with him, if it were really true, so as it was expressed and represented above.

Page 225. No. 5. This confession of much obscurity is not only for exalting Behmen the more, but also for confirming what he hath said; viz., that without an understanding of the generation of eternal nature, and of the spiritual properties and essences (which the physicians commonly know little of), these things cannot be understood; and that no anatomist can be able to find out, and to show the true ground, though he should dissect many thousands of men and beasts.

Page 227. A. 1. They do not, I think, pretend to this, or at least not to any great exactness in it. Though Behmen hath not made an exact description of the order of the formation of the parts, yet that he was not able to do it cannot be asserted, seeing that he says plainly,——to describe especially the order would require many great volumes. And it is easily to be apprehended, that he who had such a deep understanding of eternal and temporal nature, as to the manner of the generation thereof, and could show, so far as permitted, the internal ground of every external thing in this natural propagation of man, could not have been ignorant of the order wherein every thing is done; because this order depends upon an order in eternal nature chiefly, and then also upon an order in those spiritual properties and essences that are posterior to eternal nature, but prior to this formation of the parts and members.

Page 231. Line 4. the tough property of the first astringent spirit, etc. This tough property is not indeed by Behmen referred directly to the first astringent spirit, but to the first schrack or terror, [N.B.] because 'tis this which makes it moveable. Yet, seeing that of this terror nothing was said before, and that this first astringent spirit cannot be separated therefrom, having certainly this property also in it as a lesser branch; I think, in such a short and imperfect description, it may stand well enough so as it is expressed, though I could not but mention this for some peculiar reason.

Ibid. A. 1. Line 3. formeth the brain. Here, I think, instead of brain should be said head; for Behmen declareth, that by this flying up of the tincture, with all its essences, and also with the spirit of this world, here especially insinuating himself, the head is formed, which he describeth as the superior part of the body, distinct from it, and yet communicating therewith, like as heaven in relation to the earth. All which would not be appropriate to the brain in particular, but to the head in general, though he had not named the head expressly.

Ibid. in the same A. 1. the hard property puts a stop to its ascent, and forms the skull. This is not so expressed as to represent the sense of Behmen faithfully. For to the hard property only and directly, that is ascribed which it never would be able to do, of or by itself, if there were not something superior to it, by which it is directed and forced to do what it doth; viz., the flat, by gripping and binding down the hard property (which itself also is flying up with all the rest), puts a stop to its ascent; and so the flat, by this hard property (which now being gripped and bound cannot rise any further), forms the skull.

So also accordingly, ibid., by the same compacting astringent spirit. If to these words were added, which in conjunction with the eternal Word, is the fiat, the sense of Behmen would be completely expressed; when it is not so, if this be left out.

Ibid., again. The nerves only are called the conduit-pipes of the tincture, and of the powers of the stars; but the veins seem to be excluded therefrom, because they are set afterwards apace, without this title; when this description belongeth no less to the veins than to the nerves, nay, as to my apprehension, to the veins more especially.

Page 235. A. 2. Concerning this water of the heart, Behmen says—that it is answering to the water of the soul, like as this is to the water in the generation of eternal nature: that the soul also hath its own water and blood, which are not indeed a perceptible substance in this world, but are nevertheless in this perceptible water and blood of the heart: that this blood and water are answering to the water above and the water under the firmament; the water above the firmament (viz., in the creature, and in a sense relating to the creature) is blood, and the water under it is this water of the heart: that in these two, two kingdoms are understood, and that in the blood the soul resideth, and in this water the outward spirit.

Page 235. Q. 2. What they say concerning blood, appears from the next preceding answer, where the reason also is manifest, why the creatures having blood are more noble than such as have it not. And concerning its colour, they say that it cometh from the tincture, and is the tincture's proper compounded or mixed colour, which tincture itself also is a compounded or mixed virtue of fire and light.

Page 239. Q. 1. It is altogether unaccountable why the lungs should be the seat of the earth, and the bladder of air, etc. Here I cannot but answer in short: Balthazar Tilken made four principles, and it was altogether unaccountable in his sight that Behmen made but three. But Behmen replied, Let him freely make ten; the wisdom of God hath no bounds; but let him declare what he understands by a principle, and show that he has a true sense therein. In my understanding, which I have declared, and according to that sense wherein I take a principle. I cannot own more than three, etc. Now to the same purpose, I am sure, if Behmen were living, and should hear how unaccountable his doing is in the eyes of the physicians, he would reply, Let every one free-branches of the church, whose writings are all but unknown to the present generation, but which, (like the existing ancient ecclesiastical edifices of Europe in respect to the architectural genius of their cotemporaries,) remain to us precious monuments of their surpassing science, and experience in the things of God. [Flechére's 'Portrait of St. Paul,' an admirable modern treatise.]

ly place the four elements in never so different parts of the body; none can do altogether amiss, for the whole body is four-elementary; but let every one declare his reason, according to his peculiar understanding and degree thereof. Let the one say, The air's residence is the nostrils, because the Scripture says that in the nostrils is the breath of man; another, It is the lungs, because they draw in the air, and breathe it out again; a third, It is the whole concavity of the body, because no vacuum can be granted to be therein: they all do say something, each according to his measure of understanding, and all three may well enough agree, if they do but compare their different reasons, and take each of them in its proper sense and place. And I also do disagree with none of them, though according to my gift of understanding, and to that sense and respect wherein I look upon the four elements, I cannot say otherwise but that the air's residence is the bladder, and the spirit of the earth's, the lungs. Many things could be said for Behmen, to show, not only that his saying is not unaccountable, but also that he himself hath given a good account thereof, though not directly, because such a thing was not objected to him. But to make no prolixity, without which it could not be done, I pass it by, saying that if desired it can be done at another time.

Page 239. A. ult. The essences stretched forth for nourishment are compacted and formed into hands. This is expressed indeed intelligibly enough to such as truly do understand anything of Behmen in this matter; but seeing that it is much subject to a rude and gross apprehension, because of its too great shortness, it must needs be more fully represented. For I see it is understood and gathered from hence, as if the hands were gripping after such or such a nourishment, to be taken by the foetus, and put into its mouth, when there is no such thing. That such a gross apprehension thereof is easily made, appears from what is hereunto replied (page 241.), where it is said that it cannot be accounted for, because the foetus lieth with its hands lifted up to the head, etc., and seeks nourishment with its mouth, etc.; all which cannot so much as shake, much less overthrow, what Behmen says, who hath a deeper ground for his words than what can be reached from without. He doth not say, the hands are stretched forth for any nourishment; but as he declareth all this matter from an invisible spiritual root, so it is here also to be understood accordingly. Let the hands of the foetus lie which way they will, their chief office, after they are hands in this world, is to stretch out and gripe earthly food for nourishment. And before they were formed and visible hands, such a disposition thereto was in the spirit of the soul, because of its being infected and possessed by the four-elementary qualities. And let the foetus in the womb be nourished which way it will, Behmen doth not say that it is nourished by taking this or that food with its hands, but that the four-elementary spirit, according to its own internal essentiality, is even then already, as it is always, for elementary fruit or food, even such as Adam had eaten in the garden Eden; and that this spirit, having got predomion over the spirit of the soul, sheweth now in this natural generation his power over him, so that this latter must, in obedience to him, stretch forth his essences towards that which he as ruler, lusted after; and that from this stretching forth, which as then is still but a thing done in the spirit, such fleshly hands come to be as are no more able to stretch forth after the fruits of the tree of life. etc.

Page 241. A. 2. What they mean by the spirit of the soul's fetching the essences of the earth to feed upon, can be understood, I think, sufficiently from what was just now declared. viz., That it is not an outward actual work or doing, but a mere prelude in the spirit of the soul, who is captivated, ruled, and drawn away by the spirit of this world. The essences of the earth, considered in their outbirth, are indeed all that the natural body feeds upon, or is nourished by, as well while it is still in the mother's womb, as afterwards, when in this outward world; for even in the womb also, all the nourishment of the foetus, whatsoever it be, is earthly, not paradisaical, but of the essences of the earth, making such an earthly flesh as must needs return into earth. But Behmen doth not go down so low, nor make it his business to tell us, after the physicians' manner, what, in particular, the foetus in the womb is nourished by; but hath enough to declare this prelude in the spirit, and to show the ground of man's earthliness as to his body, and earthmindedness as to his spirit. And so his whole most excellent dialogue between the four elements and the spirit of the soul, in the THREE PRINCIPLES, is to be understood accordingly.

Page 241. A. 3. Concerning the stomach and the guts they say (all in a sense relating to and depending upon the former), that the stomach hath its original from the same ground of the four-elementary food desired, and of necessity required, by the spirit of this world in the foetus, according to his own nature, which the spirit of the soul must submit unto; though as yet it is still, as said above, but a prelude in the spirit of things that unavoidably must come so to pass. For if there be in the spirit such a previous disposition and natural tendency to earthly food, a receptacle fit for the same must be prepared in this natural generation, which receptacle is the stomach. And because the grossness of the earth is not fit for nourishment, is also not desired, but seriously excepted against in the spiritual dialogue of the four elements, and resolved that it shall be cast out; like as it was also cast out, or in a sense precipitated down, in the creation of the macrocosm; an opening of the body, therefore, must be made, and a passage must be provided for from the stomach downwards, through which this grossness may be carried out, and this is the guts.

Page 241. A. 4. No. 1. And 243. No. 2. What here is said concerning the tongue and eyes, cannot stand so as here expressed; but I see not what I could do more, beyond what I did formerly. To declare this matter but so much as tolerably, without a great prolixity, is impossible; and to make here a large digression to a thing which is to be supposed long before, would not be proper. Wherefore, I should think it best if this question were answered in this or the like manner:—

A. They say that the formation of the tongue and eyes belong together, as done by one and the same process, but in two distinct parts thereof. Which process they deeply declare from what they suppose is done in the generation of eternal nature, and in man's regeneration also.

In the latter of these tracts upon Trap, from which the extract just alluded to was taken, it will be perceived, the author felicitously availed himself of an opportunity, not afforded by the nature of his former discourse, of giving utterance to some enlightened instructions, (which the church was then, and would probably at a future period again be, especially in need of,) concerning

Page 247. A. uli. No. 1. The language of nature in general, must here more generally be described. For it is not only (as here is said) each thing's manifesting its inward predominant power and property; but also, its whole inward constitution, showing the whole mixture and combination of all its powers and properties, whether more or less predominant, or more or less subject and subservient. So that, indeed, the predominant power and property is the chief that can be discerned from the outward signature, but is not all; seeing that all the properties, and their different degrees (which is the chiefest thing), may be discerned. And this is done, not by some outward sign (in singulari), but by the whole outward form, figure, shape, colour, smell, taste, etc., and all what is therein or can be an object of our outward senses; though the name signature hath more especially a relation to the visible appearance of things.

No. 2. the one language, etc. This one language, before the division of tongues, as to the outward formation and sound of words (for something beyond this is implied in that name), was not different from any of the now divided languages or dialects thereof, except only by having been the mother or root of them, which in the division was lost or swallowed up. It was not therefore any of those languages that were used afterwards, though a great affinity therewith may have remained in the Hebrew, Chaldee, or any other such as was afterwards spoken in the oriental countries. And Behmen doth not tell us what language it was, and how this or that thing was called therein, but only that the nearest to it is the Hebrew.

No. 3. The division was, not chiefly and primarily in the language, as to the outward sound and formation of words, but in the mind and understanding, (wherein what Behmen calls the sensual tongue and the mental tongue is to be placed); and this now being in different families divided and confounded, their outward language consequently must needs have been confounded also. So that, as they were barbarians to each other in their intellect, they must needs also become such as to their words, each of them calling one and the same thing by different names, not proper to the true internal signature of that thing, and this was the division.

Page 249. Line 3. a whole treatise. By this I suppose Behmen's SIGNATURA RERUM is meant; but if this be the meaning, I cannot see how it could be said, they have written a whole treatise concerning the signatures of men; seeing that this book is but in general concerning the signatures of all things; and that which is mentioned therein concerning men especially is very little, and all but in general also; so that hardly anything particular of the different signatures of men can be learned thereout.

As to all the following ten positions, I must observe in general, that whereas both the inward and outward signatures are therein mentioned, and yet no distinction between them went before, nor any declaration what by each of them is meant; this cannot but bring in an obscurity upon all the matter, and a disorder also in placing before or behind the particulars thereof; which obscurity could for a great deal be done away, by altering something in the order of these positions; but chiefly by declaring, in the first place, not only that there is a distinction between the inward and outward signature to be observed, but also what so well by the one as by the other is to be understood: viz., That the outward signatures are but the visible, or by other senses also perceptible signs, marks, and express characters of the inward invisible, and (by themselves without the outward,) all imperceptible signatures. And that these latter are not the spirits of men themselves, but as it were, their vessels or receptacles, by which the spirits of men are set in innumerable distinctions and differences, which differences further are manifested unto others by the outward signatures, derived down from the inward, and representing them exactly; so that the imperceptible form and figure of the outward must be the very same which the imperceptible of the inward is, which inward imperceptible signature Behmen compares to a lute standing still, that is, not played upon. For as a lute, furnished with strings, must have a certain signature, form, or something either of harmony or discordance in its strings, by which it is distinguished from all other lutes; further, as this signature cannot be by any means perceived, except the strings be touched and moved; again, as the perceptible sound of these strings, caused by this touching and moving them, is but a discovery and outward manifestation of that interior signature, from which, as to the form, it cannot differ at all; and lastly, as this inward signature would not be the spirit of the lute itself, but only its instrument, if the lute were, like man, an understanding creature; so also is it, in a sense and manner, as to all these four particulars with man: which I think is intelligibly enough declared by Behmen, in the first chapter of his SIGNATURA RERUM.

Page 249. No. 1. and have divers beastial properties. Here I must needs observe: (1.) That these words, joined with them that go immediately before, may seem to pervert the natural order the true doctrine of evangelical union, or the nature and requirements of impartial universal love, which is the perfect spirit of Christianity, and whereby alone those selfish spiritual boundaries and tempers, in which the several sections of Christians had enclosed themselves, (in proportion as they were fallen away from the power of faith, under the dominion of earthly reason,) could be broken down, and the church become again, like the ancient mother church at Jerusalem, the true temple of the Holy Ghost, or body of Christ, and all its members of one heart and of one soul. Of which evangelical union, it is manifest none can be true members, however outwardly associated, but such as, in certain modern phraseology, 'enjoy entire sanctification.'

But we proceed to observe further, concerning the providential character of the writings in question, that, as it was with the injustice and falsehood that attacked the person of the Redeemer upon earth, which by his divine wisdom and love he turned into so many occasions of blessing and instruction to mankind through all future ages, so had not Trap's publications been permitted to appear, the world, it may be reasonably conjectured, had at this day been ignorant almost of the name of Behmen, at all events, of the peculiarity of his character as an inspired messenger of God:—to say nothing of the present advancements in practical science, and the universal benefits to mankind flowing therefrom, being indebted originally to his instrumentality; in order not to anticipate the observations upon that subject which will be required to be subsequently made, in their proper place. For it was in this tract, that Mr. Law first openly declared, (despite the obloquy which he would thereby necessarily entail upon himself,) the true nature of Behmen's writings; which description, in all his subsequent treatises, he took occasion to further and of these things; seeing that we can rightly and properly say,—the beastial properties have their signatures, being themselves prior, deeper or more inward, and therefore naturally showing forth more outwardly their characters. But the signatures, and even the outward signatures (for that these especially are here meant, appears by No. 2, where it is said, they arise—from the internal forms) cannot be said, vice-versa, to have beastial properties, but only to be the perceptible signs of the invisible beastial properties, and these even tame, friendly, and good or harmless, as well as wild, cruel, venomous and evil ones. And (2.) That it is not applicable (as it here in this position is applied) to the signatures in general, nay, not to all the outward signatures, to have or to be the characters of beastial properties; seeing that besides them, not only those properties that are in man divine or heavenly, but also those that are devilish or hellish, have their divers signatures.

Ibid. No. 4. Here I cannot see why these words, under the Spirit of God, should be inserted; seeing that by this freedom is not to be understood a free liberty, indifferent to good and evil, so as if man were not to give an account, and to be punished with justice, if he moveth from the former to the latter; but only an ability to take in, or to raise up, or to move towards the one, as well as the other. And if now here is said, he hath such an ability under the Spirit of God, it would almost be as much as to say, or at least it might easily be so understood, as if the Spirit of God assisted him in moving to the evil as well as to the good, which would be quite intolerable. This same is clearly and rightly expressed thus,—under the Spirit of God, or the spirit of Satan and of this world.

Page 259. Q. 2. is asked especially, What do they mean by the sowing and seed of the soul? But in the following positions, though I find something is said hereunto, yet I find not an answer directly given, concerning these two expressions. Wherefore I shall but observe in short, that by the sowing Behmen means the natural work of begetting, and calls it a sowing (like as in another respect the apostle, speaking of our natural body's being buried after death, saith it is sown), because it is a putting only, as it were, the first rudiments of the soul into that natural place where they are to be orderly disposed, and then to be brought forth again no more as rudiments, but as a perfect living soul. And concerning the seed of the soul, it is plain, that if there is a reason why this work may be compared to a sowing, there will be a reason also why there may be spoken of a seed. And this reason can be the more plain, if we do but consider that the soul, viz. that which truly and really is and may be called a living soul, is not sown, but only those spiritual properties that by their own due process come to be the soul, lie in the seed of the man; and these are sown in and with this seed. If, then, they are that of which afterwards the soul is made up and doth consist, they may significantly be called the seed of the soul, while they are not yet so far advanced in their process, as actually to be made a living and immortal soul.

Page 261. No. 6. These propagated essences were not actually living (but only in potentia), until the conception of the foetus. And again, No. 7. At the conception, an actual life, or living soul, was generated out of them. These assertions are not at all consistent with Behmen; nay, I do not see how they can be conceived as consistent with themselves. (1.) Not with Behmen, for he expressly says, that the soul is not generated at the conception of the foetus, but at the formation of the parts and members thereof, or after the formation of some of them; and that before this time there is no immortal life in the foetus. All life in general before this time is not denied: the propagating essences could not but be living actually, each in and for itself; but they could not be an actually living soul until their process was absolved: the end of which is their being in this foetus indissolubly knit together, and then only they are and can be called an immortal soul. (2.) With themselves also these two assertions are not well consistent: for the conception of the foetus is in and with the propagation of the essences; or if there be any distinction between them, it must be very small and nice, seeing that the conception implieth propagated essences, and essences cannot be called propagated before the conception be done. If, then, the living soul is generated at the conception, according to No. 7, what time could there have been before this generation and conception, in which (time) the essences might be called propagated, and asserted, according to No. 6, not to have been actually living until the conception of the foetus? seeing that this conception cannot be separated from the propagation of the essences.

Page 265. No. 17. Instead of saying only, the stars, it will be needful to say, the stars and planets have the dominion. And the rest of this position will require also a considerable alteration; for it is not yet enough to say, that the life breaketh off when the stars and planets come to their limit; nor also that this breaking off is inevitable when Saturn cometh to his limit: but something more besides this limit is required for the life's breaking off, which will appear from what further elucidate, opening out to the astonished eyes of the sceptic, (no less than of the learned divine,) the truth of the great mysteries of Christianity, accompanied by such noble and elevating views and justifications of the divine wisdom and goodness, as are to be met with, in the same classic purity of diction and fulness of light and conviction, in no other author in existence. Indeed it may be questioned, whether any but an individual of similar peculiarity of genius and training to his own, enlarged capacity and scholarship, divine sublimity and greatness of soul, 'well purged mystic eagle eye,' and favoured with the advantages of the light and experiences of Freher's MSS, could have penetrated into the profundities of Behmen, and with a comprehensive and steady gaze, contemplating the wonders of the world of pure original truth and nature, into which they afford so direct an entrance, have conveyed his impressions in so lucid, original, and impressive a manner.

[As to the particular evangelical results which have ensued, and are to be expected from this unfolding of the great mystery of nature and grace, they have been heretofore so often referred to, that it were needless to introduce the subject again on the present occasion; any further than to express a hope that, as to England belongs the honour of being the chief instrument under God of the latter days' revival and dissemination of Gospel truth among the unsophisticated portion of mankind, so she may have the crowning glory in the work of redemption. (by the means indicated on pages 82—87 of this treatise) of levelling those impassable barriers by which the intellectual heathen nations are at present shut out of the fold of Christianity. With respect to the bearings it has had upon science and the political and social state of this and other rising states, and reflectively upon all nations, such considerations being involved in those of the more recognised agencies in now followeth:

Page 264. Q. What is the limit of a star? To this question Behmen hath plainly and directly answered, that the same place or point wherein a planet stood in the creation, is his limit and his seculum; and whenever he cometh to that place again, all that is broken which he hath been a sovereign master of. But, says he further, this must be rightly understood—this limit of the planet must agree with the crown of the stars—and here it lieth why we cannot find out the time of our death, because we do not exactly know the limit of our leader: for we must not only know the number of that, but also the number of the sign, if we will know the limit of our life. THREE-FOLD LIFE, XVIII. 11, 12, 13. What now this agreeing with the crown of the stars, and what this number is, I cannot give a sufficient account of; but this I can observe, as every one can easily, that the thing which inevitably breaketh off our life, is not only Saturn's coming to the place or point wherein he was created, but that something more is required thereto. If that only were the thing, we might reasonably conclude, that nobody could live above so many years as Saturn requireth for absolving his whole circuit, and coming to the place of his creation again; which yet is utterly false. Witness our own experience.

Page 266. Q. 1. How could the outward kingdom be taken from Enoch and Elijah without dying, and this painful death? This question hath two parts or members, distinctly to be answered. Viz. 1. How could it be without dying? and 2. How without this painful death? As to the first, it may be answered: (1.) Behmen says it is not yet absolutely or totally taken from them; they have still the body of the turba, the outward kingdom, and Adam's flesh; but having also the inward, they are in the inward and outward mysterium, with a twofold body; and this outward mysterium must give forth again that outward body, which is to appear before the great tribunal of Christ, no less than that of all other men. (2.) The apostle says, We shall not all die, but be transmuted. If, then, in this transmutation, the outward kingdom can be taken from many thousands without dying, and without prejudice to the first universal sentence of death, it could also have been taken from these two persons, in whom it was done for such peculiar and eminent ends: whereof see the 35th. of the Forty Questions of the Soul. But (3.) How it was or could have been done, Behmen says, the inward kingdom swallowed up in them (in Enoch especially) the outward, and kept it under, or excluded it from its own manifestation.

As to the second, it may be said, (1.) Behmen says, The spirit of the soul feelth no pain, but only the soulish fire-life, from which its matter is broken off. Now, whether or no these two persons felt any pain in their soulish fire-life, and how much or how little thereof, we cannot tell. Truly, the feeling of pain must be greater or less according as there is either more or less of such matter surrounding the soul, and as the same is either more or less held fast, beloved, and cleaved unto by the fire-life. That now this matter, in Enoch especially, was very little, and at length minded no more at all, his foregoing walk with God for the space of three hundred years may witness. (2.) Painfulness, in every sense, is not always, nor in every person, nor in every kind of death, an inseparable companion thereof. Several sorts of death may be found, both natural and violent, which do not deserve to be called, with any considerable significance, a painful death.

those ameliorations, may be left to be inferred from what has been and shall hereafter be stated thereupon, in the course of the present memorial.]

But once more it may be remarked that, without the publication in question there had probably been no disclosure of the real source of the Newtonian philosophy, undoubtedly the greatest intellectual wonder of these latter ages; so marvellous indeed, when duly considered, as to have elicited a serious surmise that its fundamental principles must have been a direct revelation from God, either to Newton himself, or to some other person, from whom he had obtained the knowledge thereof.

Nor will it lastly escape observation, how suitably the Tract in question is constituted an appendix, or in effect a kind of introductory discourse to the great original work of the author accompanying it, entitled, "The Appeal." In short, concerning this second or Animadversion Tract it may be said, without it there had been an essential link wanting in the chain of Mr. Law's Elias-ministration, as the classic regenerator of the doctrines of religion and metaphysics, setting them forth in their original purity and simplicity, and displaying their true ground and mutual relations. Whereby, it may be incidentally remarked, was afforded to the learned and ingenious, a key to the few isolated wonder-exciting phenomena in which the knowledge of electricity, chemistry, etc. consisted at that day, and to the systematic cultivation of those sciences which afterwards took place. It is, however, as heretofore observed, much to be lamented, that so little advance has been made hitherto, in right philosophical knowledge. Philosophers of this day ought to have been able to demonstrate with intellectual clearness and experimentally, every grade or birth from the spiritual ground or centre to the circumference of nature, and vice-versa; instead of experimenting in darkness and blindness, without a knowledge of the principles, and so unable to reach beyond a certain degree backwards, the sum of all their discoveries (as appears from the lectures delivered in November of last year, 1848,) being merely a particular elucidation of what was largely and definitely stated two hundred years ago. All which must be attributed to a too confined regard to the dicta of what may be termed the subordinate agencies in the erection of the present edifice of practical science, and a want of apprehension, if not knowledge of those writings upon which it was originally founded. Though it must be admitted that, for the attainment of such apprehension a different course of study would be requisite, to what is generally conceived to be needful or desirable to pursue by the mere outward artist. But not to anticipate the subject further.

The "Appeal to all that Doubt or disbelieve the truths of the Gospel, whether they be Deists, Arians, Socinians, or Nominal Christians: in which the true grounds and reasons of the whole christian faith and life are plainly and fully demonstrated," is then the next work of Mr. Law's, which presents itself to notice. The design of it, in conjunction with that of his other treatises, to which it served as a pioneer, as indeed of the whole of the pure transcendental philosophy advocated in this treatise, may be summed up in the following recently proposed subject of a Prize Essay, viz., to "evidence that there is a Being, all powerful, wise, and good, by whom everything exists; and particularly, to obviate difficulties regarding the wisdom and goodness of the (3.) If we can believe and conceive that, and how, many holy martyrs, even in the greatest outward torments, could go from this outward principle into paradise without feeling any pain, nay, with exulting joy, singing, and praising God, we can here also be satisfied easily. But (4.) As to the manner how it was or could have been so, nothing but self-experience can teach us fully; though a true understanding may tell us so much, that the inward kingdom of peace, joy, love, light and glory, fulfilling all the sensible faculties, could have left no place at all for feeling any pain.

Page 266. Q. 2. How is the soul united to the body, and kept in its due union? A. The soul, if regenerated, is united to the inward paradisaical body, and they both together to the outward Adamical flesh; so as the first principle is united to the second, and both of them to this outward third, which without this union could not consist, and hath nevertheless no union with them as to their true internal essentiality. If, then, thus the soul between these two standeth, as it were in the midst, it can be kept in union with both, if it but always minds its own station and duty therein; for during this time they must all three, in their order, be subservient to the manifestation of the wonders of God. In which respect to the now fallen and restoring state only, this may be called a due union, when it may not be called so with respect to that which the first Adam was departed from.

Ibid. Q. 3. How was it breathed into man? This has been declared already several times, and nothing more could I say now than what was said formerly. The breathing into man is not properly applicable to that soul whereof here is discoursed, but to the third life, which was breathed from without into his nostrils; when the true immortal soul was raised from the deep within, brought forth, and introduced into his heart.

Page 266. Q. 4. What is the food of the soul? A. If the soul is considered only as in a natural unregenerate state, the outward complexion, viz., that same which she hath predominant in her, the astral spirit, the carnal pleasures and sensual delights, the works of her own hands, the manifold objects of this third principle, etc., are her food, which she draws in by her lust, longing, and desire, and feeds upon by her imagination. But as to regenerated souls, what answer could here be expected, but that same which the Lord from heaven gave himself, when saying, My flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed?

Ibid. Q. 5. What do they mean by the fire-spirit of understanding, and the council-house of the seven spirits? A. To say, the fire-spirit of understanding, is nothing else but to say simply, the spirit of understanding; and the word fire is added to the spirit, only to give to the reader of Behmen a deeper sense, and to this denomination a greater weight of emphasis; viz., to show and to recall into his mind what he so many times insisted upon; which is, that the true spirit must have passed through the fire, and that before the fire there is no true understanding. As to that other expression, the council house of the seven spirits, I see not what difficulty can be therein. The seven spirits are in man, and in him they may be variously considered. If they are considered with a peculiar respect to man's contriving or designing this or that, wherein they all must be employed, they may be compared to so many counsellors; and if so, that place, sphere, or region, wherewith Deity: and this, in the first place, from considerations independent of written revelation; and, in the second place, from the revelation of the Lord Jesus; and, from the whole to point out the inferences most necessary for, and useful to mankind." And indeed, without such a philosophy, it were impossible to adequately execute the design of the noble minded testator of the prize, in its institution. For whatever talent and genius the competitors may be possessed of, the treatment of the subject demands a scope of contemplation much more central and universal than can possibly be afforded by the ordinary conventional theology, however evangelical in its theories, or sublimated in its views. The resolution of the question, to be complete, must proceed from the very ground of truth itself.

The following are the chief topics touched upon in the 'Appeal.' CHAPTER I.—"Of creation in general. Of the origin of the soul. Whence will and thought are in the creature. Why the will is free. The origin of evil solely from the creature. This world not a first immediate creation of God. How the world comes to be in its present state. The first perfection of man. All things prove a trinity in God. Man hath the triune nature of God in him. Arianism and deism confuted by nature. That life is uniform through all creatures. That there is but one kind of death to be found in all nature. The fallen soul hath the nature of hell in it. Regeneration is a real birth of a divine life in the soul. That there is but one salvation possible in nature. This salvation only to be had from Jesus Christ. All the deists' faith and hope proved to be false." CHAPTER II.—"Of eternal and temporal nature. How nature is from God, and the scene of his action. How the creatures are out of it. Temporal nature created out of that which is eternal. The fallen angels brought the first disorders into nature. This world created to repair those disorders. Whence good and evil are in every thing of this world. How heaven and hell make up the whole of this world. How the fire of this world differs from eternal fire; and the matter of this world from the materiality of heaven. Eternal nature is the kingdom of heaven, the beatific manifestation of the triune God. God is mere love and goodness. How wrath and anger came to be ascribed to him. Of fire in general. Of the unbeginning fire. Of the spirituality of fire. How fire comes to be in material things. Whence the possibility of kindling fire in the things of this world. Every man is and must be the kindler of his own eternal fire." CHAPTER III.—"The true ground of all the doctrines of the gospel discovered. Why Adam could make no atonement for his sins. Why and how Jesus Christ alone can make this atonement. Whence the shedding of blood for the remission of sins. What wrath or anger it is, that is quenched and atoned by the blood of Christ. Of the last sufferings of Christ. Why and how we must eat the flesh and drink the blood of Jesus Christ."

Such is a summary of the contents of this treatise, which for its natural and edifying philosophy, the clear, forcible and original manner in which the author handles his profound subjects, and the classic simplicity of its diction, may not inaptly be termed the principia of true metaphysics; as may be somewhat inferred from a perusal of the contents of pages 52—63 of the present work, which constitute the second chapter of the 'Appeal,' as above recited. Which appellation, it may be further suggested, will lose none of its propriety from a consideration of the numerous fresh directions and impulses to philosophical thought the treatise has originated, and is ever calculated to ori-they are so considered, be it in the outward principle, either the head or heart, may be fitly called their council-house. Like as the very same again may be called their work-house, if they are therein considered with a peculiar respect to their mutual and never-ceasing activity.

Page 267. No. 2. The soul taken generally, or for the whole inward man. Seeing that by the whole inward man, always the new-born body, also and sometimes the same even chiefly is understood; which yet in the denomination of the soul is not contained, nor implied, in this present consideration; I think it would be more proper to say—the soul taken generally, or for the whole spiritual being, as far as the same is distinct from what is bodily.

Ibid. Q. 1. What are ideas and images of things in the mind? A. Such like representations of intelligible objects as the images in a mirror are of visible ones; arising also in the mind by the same necessity by which these do in a mirror, if an object is set before it. Because the mind of man, being in itself most quiet, empty, and undetermined to any sort of act or motion, stands in the same relation, and bears the same indifferent disposition, to things conceivable in all the worlds out of which it is brought forth, which a mirror bears to things visible in this particular world, wherein and whereout it is made. Yet with this difference, that whereas a material mirror is capable only to receive passively, and to keep unmoveably an image in it, as long as the object standeth so before it; this spiritual mirror is capable also to admit from its own side something of activity, whereby its images and ideas may be altered, compounded, divided, displaced, and transfigured into innumerable shapes: though, indeed, as then, it is no more strictly called the mind, but cometh as under another consideration, so under another denomination also.

Ibid. Q. 2. Do we see all things in God? A. In some sense, generally answering unto that wherein we are said in the Scripture to live, and move, and have our being in God, we may be said also to see all things in God. But as true as this is in one sense, so true is this also in another,—that the greatest part of mankind do not live in God, but in themselves, or in their selfishness; and that their very light, the only proper means of seeing, is darkness. How, then, can such a one be said to see all things or anything in God? To answer, therefore, this general question by a simple and general yea or no, is absolutely impossible. But let the eyes, the things, the worlds, and above all, those senses also wherein the name God may be differently taken, be duly distinguished, and then of some it may be affirmed more or less, and of others it must be either totally or more or less denied.

Page 269. No. 6. All what is here said concerning subtlety is true indeed, but might be plainer, if it were thus, or in a manner like to this, expressed:

Subtlety is considered (1.) as it is in the first principle only, wherein it ariseth chiefly from the tincture of the same, and is devilish, or if it might be so expressed, the devil's intellect, having in its generation the three first forms of nature only. And (2.) as in this our third principle, wherein it is indeed tinctured, softened, made glistening, and in some measure transmuted by the outward astral light; but nevertheless, still earthly, sensual, devilish, and always evil, from its own proper root, which is so in the dark world, and which all the tincturing with astral light is not able to turn truly into good.

ginate in the minds of its readers, according to their peculiar genius or idiosyncrasy. In some awakening a train of reflections that, owing to their sober practical turn, has terminated in the exposition of the general features of a new system of physical science, affording also a clue to its regular pursuit and development; and in others of a more sublimated or abstract cast, either opening a new sphere of intellectual research, or furnishing them with a clearer and more steady light in the prosecution of their favourite studies: not severing (as is the custom of the modern blind philosophy,) in either case, what are inseparably joined together, namely, God and nature, but considering them in their respective mutual relations; either according to the present material system, and thence ascending to the spiritual ground of things, or a priori from the understood birth and constitution of original nature, the great and only working life and power, through its elaborations and phenomena in degraded matter. Or it may be in some few cases of regenerated and divinely harmonized understandings, conversant also with the facts and theories of experimental science, (not ingenious visionaries but true alchemical artists,) tracing by an unbroken chain the manifestation of the powers and wisdom of the supernatural unity, in and through visible and invisible nature.

With this work, (taking the book on 'the Sacrament' as its introduction and the "Way to Divine Knowledge," and "Spirit of Love," and 'Tract on Warburton,' as its sequents,) may, as previously observed, be said to have commenced the latter series of Mr. Law's ministerial writings; which, in contradistinction to all others that had preceded them, in support of the truths of Christianity, were immediately addressed to men of intellect and education universally, whose strong logically-constituted well-disposed minds were unable to receive the leading partial irrational theories, dogmas and doctrines of popular christianity.

But, to return to the subject of the preceding observations, without enumerating the many instances wherein the work in question is stated to have inspired the genius of individuals whose contributions to mental or physical science have been received with admiration and gratitude by the world, (which would be out of place in a memorial like the present, that is merely indicative of the general characteristics of Mr. Law's life and ministry, presenting them in that true aspect in which they will require to be viewed by an able and compendious biographer,) it may be proper here to specify one of the most notable of those results, the origin of which has been so little suspected hitherto. One reason for the latter may have been the want of a suitable mental constitution on the part of inquirers, and their not having the proper means and books for the pursuit of such an investigation. For the tracing of the authorship of a science cannot be done a posteriori, but to it must be brought a familiar knowledge of the antecedent or concurrent relative circumstances of the time and of the private life and favourite studies of the individual to whom is appropriated the chief merit of the discovery; advantages and qualifications which are seldom found united in experimental historians.

Now it is the settled conviction of the writer, that the modern science of electricity, galvanism, chemistry, etc., is primarily indebted, for its origin and purification, to the work under review, and therein essentially to Behmen, who was the first to declare the true principles of all things in a philosophical manner. What the state of electrical and chemical knowledge was, when the 'Appeal' was

Page 269. No. 7. Reason hath for its object only, etc. Here it may be objected, that reason is able, in a sense and manner, to make all things, without exception, the objects of her speculation, be they either transitory or eternal, and in what principle soever. And this objection would be prevented, if some words were inserted, e. gr. : reason hath for its proper and adequate object only the transitory things of this world, and even them also, since the fall, but in part, and great obscurity.

Page 271. Line 6. but not the primitive faculty. Here I see not how this particular assertion could be saved. As the spirit of this world, the elements, and all the things of this principle, are now still the same which they were before the curse was pronounced upon them, though they are not altogether in the same condition; so reason, also, which came not by the fall into man from without, but was in him before the fall, must needs be the same faculty, though it hath no more now, in its usurped dominion, the same qualities which it had then, in its ministry and subordination to the superior faculties.

Ibid. Line 6, 7. nor doth it distinguish men from brutes. Though this is certainly true, yet I think it might be expressed with a little more moderation, that it might not be so offensive as justly may be feared it will. For, that eminent degree which reason hath in man, and which no brutes can reach unto, brings in at least so much in favour of him, that it makes him more noble than any of them, nay, than all of them taken jointly together. Though, indeed, that which doth wholly exempt him from their order is not to be found in reason, but in understanding.

Page 273. No. 22. The soul, by its will, turns itself from darkness into light. This is true, indeed, if rightly understood; but it might be more circumspciously expressed, that nobody might take occasion to say, that Behmen makes the will the saviour of its soul; which, under a specious appearance, might be drawn from hence. True it is, that Behmen speaketh so sometimes in short, presupposing his reader has read and understood his plain and sufficient exposition thereof, and is able to take these, his compendious words, in a sense conformable thereunto. The soul, says he expressly, cannot enter or turn itself into the light, which is extinguished in the fall; but it can turn into that deep or ground wherein it is extinguished; and therein is he also who is the light of the world, able and ready to kindle the light in that soul again. This turning now of the soul is done by the will, and cannot be done without it; the soul, therefore, (which thus can never meet with disappointment,) turning into that ground, and being taken into the light by him who hath surely promised he will in no wise cast out such a one, may well enough be said, in a compendious way of speaking, to turn by its will from darkness into light; so to be understood, that there is only named that lesser medium, sine quo non, which is on the soul's side; and yet that greater one, which is only effectual on the side of the light's principle, be not thereby excluded.

Page 273. No. 23. The will may be broken, but it is better, etc. This is a little obscure, for it may be taken in two different senses, and which of them is here intended I cannot enough discern. For (1.) the will, as to itself, before an evil act is performed, is said to be made substantial, if it is but come forth into a perceptible determination, design, or purpose. And (2.) the will is also said to be made substantial in and by its act and deed, really performed and executed. This published (as also of the theory of magnetism, etc.), may be easily found out by a reference to the works that had then appeared thereupon. It may be said to have consisted in the practice of a few isolated trifling experiments, or juggling tricks, with such simple instruments as the infancy of the science had invented, whereby to congregate electricity and exhibit its phenomena; for not even the Leyden phial was then in being. This treatise, however, and more immediately that portion of it relating to fire (see pages 61—64, before mentioned, as also 74—75), founded upon what Behmen and Freher have so fully declared, was destined to recal the minds of the ingenious and learned from the mere practice of experiment to the considerations of the philosophy of the great power which was thereby presented to their notice. Indeed, Sir Isaac Newton, with that penetration so peculiar to himself, had, from his intimate acquaintance with Behmen, mentioned throughout his writings the existence of a pure elastic medium of ethereal fire, which was the root or ground of the four elements, and doubtless had earnestly longed for the means of demonstrating it to sense; but the instruments wherewith to exhibit its nature and powers had not yet been invented, so that Sir Isaac died without seeing his conjectures, or rather knowledge, verified. But he died in assured faith and hope, that it was reserved to a later period to open the science in a systematic manner; until in short after the appearance of Mr. Law's treatise, the work under notice, in the year 1740. Accordingly, in observing the progress of its development, we find in 1744, Berkeley's "Siris" was published, which contained a further outward practical elucidation of the science opened in the "Appeal," confirmed by what the ancient sages had written thereupon. Then in the year 1746, Freke published his treatise upon electricity, which may be said to be the first direct approximation toward a systematic consideration of the subject. He thus introduced that work to the public:—

"When I first entered on this subject of electricity (he writes), I intended only to put some thoughts in writing concerning it, that I might the more easily convey them to the understandings of such as I hoped would be more likely than I should be, to go further with it. And as nobody, either here or abroad, had published anything touching the cause from which it was produced, I chose to show the beginning I had made to some friends, whose opinion concerning natural knowledge I had a great reliance on. I told them I thought my difficulty would be to convey what I had to propound on this new subject to them with the necessary clearness, as my intention was to observe the utmost brevity in it.

After I had read it to them, they assured me that what I had written was perfectly intelligible, and that it gave them many new ideas respecting this phenomenon, and were very earnest with me to print it, for the sake of the public.

I was not, however, inclined to comply with their requests, till I had shown it to a person who is most justly distinguished for his great candour, and superlative understanding in all natural knowledge; and he likewise having expressed his wishes to see it in print, I could not but look on his desire as a command. * * *

Who this very distinguished person was that is here referred to, may be gathered from a perusal of the subsequent tract itself, wherein is a further special reference to a very "learned and emilatter, not that former sense, seems here to be intended; and therefore it might be more clearly thus expressed—The will may be broken, and even much more easily when it is only a will, than when this will, by the fiat which is in it, hath wrought out itself into such or such a substance; for in the former case, the will only, and in this latter, both will and substance, must be broken (in which the desire of the will is very powerful, and its effect very great) if the soul shall be made free.

Page 274. Q. What do they say of dreams? A. They say that natural dreams are magic images, represented by the firmamental constellation, and seen by man's astral spirit in his own peculiar magic astrum; which astrum, they say, is nothing else but an epitomised figure, expressing, as it were, in a little compass, the vast extent of his great firmamental constellation. That is, the whole scheme of the astral heaven in the macrocosm, with all its energies and possible contingencies, lieth in every man, according to that peculiar form or posture, wherein it stood at the time of his conception and birth. And this in the superior astral heavens, being like a watch, and unfolding itself successively, represents also successively its operations, by such like images in those inferior heavens, which in man are answering unto them. And so of supernatural dreams, also, they speak almost after the same manner, mentioning only, instead of an exterior firmamental constellation, an interior eternal one, which all men have in the greatest variety in their deeper ground of soul and spirit, out of eternal nature.

Page 275. No. 25. the astral and sensitive soul. Here I would say rather, astral or sensitive, because they are not two, but one; though these two expressions are both fit, and may represent to us something of a distinction, consisting herein, that the former sheweth more its original, and the latter more its quality. But this being of no great importance, I would not have mentioned it, if occasion had not been given by what is said, page eadem,—

No. 3. the sensitive soul is a glass of the third principle. For here it would be much more proper to say, instead of sensitive, the astral soul, or astral spirit; seeing that the third life, soul, or spirit in man, not as it is a sensitive light, but as it is an astral spirit, is a glass of this third principle. The reason whereof is by Behmen, in the fifth of the FOURTY QUESTIONS, so plainly laid down, that I cannot see what difficulty can be found therein. All what is in the whole third principle, and all the properties thereof, lie herein, and represent themselves as in a glass; and this is even that same, for the sake of which, man is rightly called a microcosm. It was that same glass wherein the powers and wonders of this principle were represented unto Adam; wherein he delighted to see them, and which he turned his imagination and will into, till it was fixed and captivated therein.

Page 275. Line ult. that it cannot be regenerated. This is too absolute and general. Behmen says only that it is not regenerated during the time of this outward third principle, like as also the earthly mortal body, during all this time, is not regenerated. And the reasons, whereof many and great may be given, are sufficient for the astral spirit, as well as for the earthly body; because they both are equally under the spirit of this third principle.

nent author now living," coupling therewith a quotation from his work, the 'Appeal,' in question. This tract now forms the second part of his (Freke's) "Treatise on the Nature and Property of Fire," published 1752, and consisting of three essays on the following subjects:—(1.) Showing the cause of vitality and muscular motion, with many other phenomena: (2.) On electricity: (3.) Showing the mechanical cause of magnetism, and why the compass varies in the manner it does." How this work is deducible from the 'Appeal,' is left to those who are conversant with the latter to consider of; as also of its natural tendency to awaken the attention of the ingenious to the subject upon which it treats, inciting them to pursue an inquiry, which, however faintly traced out in these its first beginnings, promised to lead to the most important scientific results. And what did ensue thereupon, will be manifest on a perusal of Lovett's publications and philosophical essays, and others of the same epoch.

Upon the issuing from the press of this treatise, Freke forwarded one of the publications to Mr. Law, who acknowledged the same in a letter to the author; a copy of which, (taken from the one in the possession of the writer of these lines,) is here inserted, in corroboration of what has been above surmised, and as exhibiting the friendly relations then and previously subsisting between them. It thus proceeds:—

"Worthy Sir, and my much honoured friend,—That I am thus late in the acknowledgment of the favour of your most valuable book proceeds, not from any insensibility of the worth of it, or any want of regard for the author, but from reasons not material to mention. In all your three essays I think you sufficiently carry your point, and have opened such light in these matters, which were before all obscurity, as can only be opposed by that futility of reason which opposes everything that is just and solid. I agree with your ingenious correspondent, that the world is much obliged to you for that serious and good use which you alone have made of the phenomena of electricity, which the wanton philosophy of unblessed erudition was only disposed to turn into show and juggling wonders. Reason and superficial art know no other use of divine discoveries. It is an honour to you that you displease these pigmy philosophers.

The regimen you were so kind as to prescribe to my niece has succeeded beyond expectation. She has been for some months quite easy, and in much better health. For this and all other instances of your goodness to me, I subscribe myself, Your most faithful and obliged servant, W. Law.—November 11, 1752."

The letter of the 'correspondent' herein referred to by Mr. Law, which was inserted in the preface to Freke's treatise, deserves a notice on the present occasion, as appropriate to the point here in question, and is as follows:—

"July 1, 1751. Sir,—* * * Whilst the experimentalists were amusing themselves and the world with the marvellous feats, tricks and jugglership of the electrical machines in the infancy of the discovery, you alone transferred your attention from the effects to the cause, and gave the clue of that most important discovery, only imagined by the ancients, but now sufficiently proved, That this fire is a fluid universally dispersed in salutary proportion, which is not inherent to the electrical apparatus, but collected by the enchiretis of it out of that ambient element, so as to exin Christ, I observe (1.) that because they are not the formal words of the Scripture (which never and nowhere says so), instead of from all eternity, might be said, from before the foundation of the world. Not as if there were indeed a great important weight in this alteration; but only because several reflections could be made upon it from Behmen's ground; and then, also, because there is no reason why the proper words of the Apostle should be thus altered.

(2.) The interpretation of these words is so represented, that occasion is given thereby to call it uncommon; and to think that it delivers more, if not quite another and different thing from what divines generally take these words to mean; nay, also to suspect it of having some conformity with what the Gnosticks and Valentinians asserted. But seeing it can be made out sufficiently, that Behmen's interpretation of that Scripture expression contains nothing else nor more than what divines generally will be ready to grant, and what of their plain sense is expressed in Q. 3; I justly conceive that it would be much better, nay, even necessary, to represent this answer in some other terms; and then to make no mention of those early heretics and their eternal Aëons. For certainly, nodus est hic in scirpo quæsitus; and without any necessity, Behmen is aspersed, at least, with a suspicion of having communion with those ancient fables. The plain words both of the Scripture and of divines in general, fallen man was chosen, etc., must needs presuppose, that the fall of man was seen by God before man was a creature; and this must needs import, that it was not seen as a thing done actually without God, but as an image or idea in God's eternal wisdom, which expression, I think, none can be offended at. If this be so, the restorer also of this fallen image must have been seen, and must have been appointed in that wisdom; for all this the word chosen doth import. If, then, thus they both were seen, they were not seen as at a distance, the one from the other, but as in conjunction and union with one another. The second Adam must have been seen as entering into the first Adam's nature, and restoring the same; and the first as restored in the second. But now, all this having had no being without God, before the foundation of the world, but having been only in the wisdom of God, a foresight of what was to have a future being in time, hath and can have no other sense but that selfsame which our divines generally express, by saying—man was chosen in Christ, considered as to be incarnate, or as already incarnate in the divine decrees. And that this is Behmen's sense, containing neither more nor less, could be shown from twenty places of his writings. But now, contrary to this sense, or at least very much different from it, these words in this A. 2, the second person entered into the image or idea of man, represented, etc., seem to be so understood, as if there was made, before the foundation of the world, a strange kind of incarnation and conjunction; or as if the eternal Word had taken upon him then already the nature of that fallen image or idea: when Behmen plainly declareth, that by entering into that image, he meaneth nothing else, but that there was seen in the eternal wisdom not only the fall of man, but also the fallen man restored in and by the eternal Word; or that foresight of the eternal Word's future entering into the fallen human nature. If, therefore, only these words were expressed otherwise, or at least a little explained, it could not be replied, This interpretation is uncommon, and the Gnosticks and Valentinians have asserted some such thing, etc.

hibit those various operations of it which amazed so much at first, especially in the property of its velocity, which is strictly that of our ideas, congenial with and perhaps generated by the same element. But, my God! what an opening has this discovery given, if duly improved, if once regularly pursued from its first principles, and reduced into a regular system. Probably in such case, experimentalists would have no longer reason to complain of the bizarrerie or caprices of electricity.

The staties of the elementary fire might doubtless, by a progression of deductions from certain axioms, be ascertained, so as to account for all its seeming irregularities, as well as produce far nobler and more essential discoveries than have hitherto employed those gentlemen, who are scanning the effects before having sufficiently deepened into and simplified that cause which, without a compliment, you appear to me to have first pointed out. They must go back to the element of this fire, before they must hope to go usefully forwards with their discoveries in it. This I can safely aver, that neither Boerhaave nor Stahl nor indeed any author I ever read, could afford me the least satisfaction, especially about the principles of vitality (a point I mention only as the most interesting example of the necessity of fire to all nature), before your notion of it let in at once upon my understanding a flood of light.—I never was indeed the dupe of that philosophical gibberish of nervous fluid, æther, etc., which proving nothing to the senses, established nothing; whereas, the existence of this elementary fire realized to our senses, accounts almost palpably to me, for almost all the operations of nature. This appears probable from a research into its properties; as, for example, its extreme subtilty, velocity, and expansiveness, all which may be experimentally ascertained, and subordinated by certain laws. So that, should this system not be a dream, the component parts of the world will be simplified and reduced into two primary elements of matter, the body, and fire, the soul of the world, or that vivifying spirit, the necessity of which to nature was perceived only in glimpses by the great Sir Isaac Newton, who sought for it in a nitrous salt; surely with less probability than in fire, the nature of which he appears grievously to have mistaken. * * *

Such is our notice of Freke's publication, as one of the results of the 'Appeal.' And what further ensued thereupon, and from the former work, is left to be traced out by the reader who is interested in the subject. He will doubtless find, by a little research, how in England and throughout the polished states of Europe, as also in America (by Franklin, who imported and republished some of Law's writings, with other esteemed English works), the attention of philosophers was now becoming turned to electricity, with the view of establishing a regular science thereupon.

Passing over, for the present, any notice of Lovett's publications in 1756, 1766, and 1774, of Hoadly's, and Wilson's in 1756, and of Jones's in 1762, being the chief with which we shall have to do, and upon which a few reconciliatory observations may be needful, the next period to which attention will be called (in order to present the point in question in a lucid light), is the year 1762, when in the month of April a Letter appeared in the "Gentleman's Magazine," openly referring to Mr. Law and Behmen, as the first philosophical demonstrators of the ground of nature, or of those powers which were now classed under the name of electricity.

Page 280. A. 2. No. 2. Here to the last words most properly might be added something declaring that all, and even the meanest, of those circumstances, as well as the greatest, had their significant relation to him. For this hath Behmen not only asserted, but hath also explained many of those (from without inconsiderable) circumstances, rites, and ceremonies, so that they all and each of them do most significantly represent, as it were, a shadow of that substance, which is to be found in the only real and expiatory sacrifice of Christ. So that this also is conformable to his own words, saying, There is not one $\omega\tau\alpha$ in the law which shall not be fulfilled. Wherefore, then, such an addition would still more emphatically represent Behmen's doctrine as agreeable to Scripture.

Page 280. A. ult. Jesus — did in time take unto himself the Christ. Against these words I have nothing to say; they are Behmen's, and have their true significant sense in their place, viz., when he was about to rectify Stiefel's confusion, made by him concerning the names of Jesus and Christ. But whether they can be in this place (where, in answer to the question is to be said what Behmen means, not by names, but by the work of incarnation,) so fit and proper; or whether they have so much substance in them as to declare sufficiently Behmen's meaning, I think, could much be doubted of. Chiefly, because Behmen's sense is thus, in the very beginning of this matter, represented as containing strange and questionable things, and making, as it were, two distinct persons; whereby, it seems, occasion is given to slight it, and to think strangely thereof. Which occasion (given at least to such as love and like to take it) might well be avoided by giving another short declaration of what he means by the incarnation of the eternal Word. And then these two names, and their different signification, could nevertheless be mentioned also. But I tell only here my simple thoughts, and leave it, Sir, to your good pleasure.

Page 282. A. 1. They say that it (the name Jesus) belongs to intimate his person only with respect to his divinity, etc. In the next following question, I see it is said of this assertion, I do fear it is not true; and I think it may well be said so, with this addition — that there is nothing to support it. But Behmen's assertion it is not, for he saith quite another thing; and the words following immediately in this same A. 1. do themselves also manifestly overthrow this assertion, by saying that which cannot be consistent with it. For if (as here is said) they say further, the name Jesus signifieth the Son of God's humiliation of himself, and his exaltation of the human nature, they cannot say, that it intimates his person only with respect to his divinity; seeing that here a respect to the humanity is manifestly implied in the signification of this name. Now, it is certain that they say this latter, so therefore they do not, nor can they say that former. Behmen expressly declareth that in the first syllable, JE —, he understandeth his humiliation, and taking upon him

In the year 1771, the Rev. Richard Symes, Rector of St. Werburgh, Bristol, published a short treatise under the title of "Fire Analysed; or the several parts of which it is composed demonstrated by Experiments." This gentleman was the author of the anonymous letter just referred to, which he re-inserted in the latter publication, of which, indeed, it may be said to form the basis. As this treatise is very rare to be met with, and the contents of it are extremely pertinent to the subject under discussion, we propose here to present a long extract therefrom, as follows: —

"CHAPTER I. INTRODUCTION. — Treating of the Contrary Powers that are in Nature, both within and without man; and of the rich treasures to be found in the writings of Jacob Behmen and Mr. Law.

The generality of mankind pass through life without reflection. No one, comparatively speaking, seeks to know himself, or inquires how he stands related to nature, or nature to him. Having seen how others come into the world, this satisfies him as to his own existence; and as most are only sollicitous how to preserve and indulge themselves, his concern carries him no further than to tread in their steps. But now and then one arises, who ventures out of this general path, not satisfied with the mere acts of eating, drinking, and sleeping; he begins to consider the end of existence, and this leads him to inquire into nature, the qualities of it, and of what it consists. Such an one, reader, suffer me to say it, (it is spoken without vanity,) is the author of this treatise. — Perceiving throughout nature qualities diametrically contrary, this awakened his attention to consider why and for what reason there was nothing either within or without him but what had its opposite. Without, his eye clearly saw it. Within, his own feeling was his evidence. Within, he felt the contrary qualities of anger and love, rage and meekness, joy and sorrow, etc. Without, he perceived fire and water, light and darkness, heat and cold, calms and tempests, etc. Now in himself he observed these contrary qualities often stirred up and exerting an uncontrollable power. If anger arose, it hurried him to acts, that reason condemned, but could not prevent. If sorrow was stirred up, joy disappeared, the remembrance was gone, and it was as though it had never existed. — Now these two contrary qualities, he felt, had a power to suppress and overcome each other; and also at the same time that they were acted upon and called forth independent of his will. Good news called forth joy. Bad news stirred up sorrow. Now this shows that man has powers within him that sounds and objects can do more with, than has ever yet been effected by the boasted ability of reason. — And as it is thus with the powers of joy and sorrow, so is it with rage and meekness. They are equally and independent of reason stirred up in us, but with this difference, the former seems more prevalent in mankind than the latter; the latter has its stirrings, and often meets with incidents that call it into action, even in the most choleric; but the former prevails for the most part in man. The two first children that were born of Eve, are striking instances of the power of these two contrary qualities ruling and governing in the heart of man. In Cain rage ruled and governed, in Abel meekness; but Cain's rage got the mastery over Abel's meekness.

But now as to outward nature, where the will of man cannot reach, there the contrary qualities are regulated by an all-wise, but invisible agent. The heat and cold are wisely tempered, neither are suffered to destroy the other. The earth annually brings forth numberless productions for the service of man; but yet were these contrary qualities suffered to work blindly by themselves, vegetation would cease and every earthly life would end. For if the heat prevailed, all would be burnt up. If the cold, all would be one congealed and fixed body. And yet I think it cannot but be visible to every one how necessary heat and cold are in the creation, and that they are always at work, but at the same time governed and directed by an all-wise, and all-powerful agent; because if they were left to themselves, the one would soon be the death of the other.

Whilst my inquisitive mind was searching into these things, and yet unable to find out the a human soul and body; and in the second, — SUS, his exaltation of the human soul, etc. And moreover he owneth that the name JESUS signifieth a Saviour, according to the words of the angel to Mary; and that she was commanded to call him so, because he was to save his people from their sins. And though it was the name of the eternal Word before the foundation of the world, yet even then also was it not without a respect to the fallen humanity; for even then already was he appointed to be that Saviour in the fulness of time. And how can we conceive of this name otherwise, but by conceiving also and presupposing something that wants to be saved? This name therefore signifieth indeed his person, yet not with respect to the divinity only, but rather chiefly, as to which it chiefly belongs to be the Saviour; seeing that without Jesus, Christ (or the humanity only) could not have been a Saviour of mankind. And so there will be no need of any fear that this assertion is not true; for by many places of the Scripture, and of Behmen, also, can it be supported.

Page 282. A. 2. The great emphasis in the signification of the name Christ, or Christus, is in this answer not expressed. For Behmen understandeth in the first syllable—his entering into death, and in the second—his almighty power, breaking forth through death and hell into paradise.

Page 286. A. 2. No. 1. To the words, she became a perfect virgin as Adam was, I think might well be added—as to her inward man; for that the outward was never perfect as Adam was, her death to the outward female image declareth sufficiently.

Page 286. Q. 1. What is the meaning of his heavenly humanity's coming down from heaven; is it not everywhere altogether and undivided? A. Yes, it is so, everywhere, but in its own inward heaven of the second principle, unmanifest unto this third. The coming down therefore from heaven doth not mean a local transportation, or descending from above the firmamental heaven unto this earth; but an opening or manifestation upon earth, in a personal union with an elementary mortal body, which truly is a coming down; because the second principle cannot but be conceived as higher, and this third as lower. That God is everywhere altogether and undivided, no man can question; and yet he says himself unto Abraham, The cry of Sodom is come up unto me, and I came down to see, etc.

Page 285. Q. 2. Why and how would sin have been propagated, if he had been begotten by such a concurrence? A. For the same reason and in the same manner, for which and in which it is propagated in the begetting of every child that is generated by the concurrence of a male and female. For if the male's seed is an active principle in the generation, and is sinful in itself, what else can be propagated by its concurrence but sin and guilt? And if the soul of a male cannot propagate why and wherefore such opposite qualities should be in nature, providentially I met with two authors, in whose writings these mysteries are explained, and nature as it were dissected. These authors are Jacob Behmen and Mr. Law; whose works may be justly compared to a mine full of the richest ores. The searcher and inquirer after truth will find in them that of so precious and sublime a nature, as must satisfy the most enlarged capacity. Some indeed, who have casually stumbled on them, either prejudiced in favour of their own supposed knowledge, or having no relish for the truths contained in them, have despised and treated them with contempt; but so it has been and ever will be with men of eminence. They will have their despisers as well as admirers; but scorn and contempt can never invalidate truth. Truth will ever and invariably remain truth, let its opposers be ever so numerous: but that these men have opened the deepest truths in their writings, if experiments are any criterion to judge from, I will, by those that are incontrovertible, make it clear and evident. But how I became able to prove by experiments the arcana of nature, as laid open by Jacob Behmen and Mr. Law in their writings, shall be the subject of the next chapter.

CHAPTER II.—Explaining by Experiments the arcana and wonders of Nature, as opened in the works of Jacob Behmen and Mr. Law.

My attention was stirred up by a book, published by Mr. Lovett, of Worcester, setting forth a variety of cures performed by electricity. I had seen many years before this an electrical machine, and had tried all the common experiments that were then known; for very little had been written on the subject, and that by no means satisfactory, no one being able to trace out the cause of the striking appearances raised by an electrical apparatus. Like other strange sights therefore, which the oftener they are seen, the less they effect us, so it happened with electrical experiments. They tired and then naturally sunk into neglect; for having lost their power to keep up the attention, and despairing of ever reaching the cause, I left it, where I then thought it, impenetrably hidden, amongst the occult qualities. But reading in Mr. Lovett of its medical virtue, this roused my attention to a more accurate disquisition, and to search more minutely after what I had before given up as not to be found. I tried every experiment my imagination suggested, and at last discovered the secret I sought for.—But here I own that I owe my success to a letter of the Abbé Nollet, published in the 'Gentleman's Magazine,' of August 1759. The Abbé was then trying experiments, and maintained in his letter that there were two currents in the electrical fire diametrically opposite. This hint was enough for me, who was before sufficiently convinced that there were in nature qualities directly contrary and opposite to each other, both from my own experience and Jacob Behmen's and Mr. Law's writings. But now I was able to demonstrate this truth by experiment, and to bring forth to open view these hidden secret working powers, known only to us by their effects. But what was more, I found now I could prove by experiments to the senses, that there were in nature seven properties, as set forth and maintained in the books of the above two eminent writers; the ground of which are the two opposite qualities before-mentioned. Such a discovery, as may naturally be imagined, made me desirous of publishing it to the world, in hopes that some abler hand might throw more light upon the subject; accordingly I sent to the 'Gentleman's Magazine' the following letter, which was published in the month of April 1762:—

A Letter to the editor of the 'Gentleman's Magazine' wherein the principles of electricity are proved by experiments to be the same with those of Jacob Behmen's, and Mr. Law's philosophy.

Sir,—Without making any apology I send you this letter, which I think is on an interesting subject. My design is not to make myself known, I only write for information, and to stir up some abler hand to finish what I think only the outlines of a most important discovery. For if Jacob Behmen's and Mr. Law's philosophy can be proved by electricity, and, vice versa, electricity can be ex-another soul higher graduated than itself is since the fall, but only such a one as hath a natural disposition to sin, like as itself hath; how could this sinful disposition have been avoided in Mary's son, if he had been begotten in a natural way, by the concurrence of a male?

Page 288. A. 1. Instead of saying, from the essences of his mother, I think it will be needful to say—of his mother's soul: for it is not the essences in general, but in particular the soulish essences which generate the soul.

Page 293. A. 3. All the reasons here mentioned, why he had an inward heavenly body, are good and true indeed; but nevertheless something, which is even the chief and most convincing, might well be added, viz.—because he was to be the second Adam, whose office was to reintroduce the children of the first into paradise, and to be for ever their head and king in that paradisaical body which the first Adam had lost. This therefore he must have had himself, that by him it might be communicated to his members, like as the first Adam should have propagated it unto all his offspring. [Here and hereafter refer to pages 113—17, and to Law's other writings, from 1738.]

Page 295. A. 1. All what is here said is indeed right and true, but methinks it is not a direct answer to the question, which was this, If Christ had a spirit—what need was there then of his going through the process of regeneration in his life, and at his death? p. 294. Which question I think would be answered more directly, if there were made three parts in this answer, by saying, (1.) That there was no need of his going through all this process for his own sake: for although he had need in-plained by their writings, there is scarce any phenomena in nature, but what may be made intelligible.

‘But not to detain you longer from what I intend to lie in as little compass as possible, the following are my experiments to prove, that Mr. Law's philosophy is the same that the electrical machine discovers to our senses.

‘Mr. Law says, There are seven properties in Nature. Indeed he does not say this as the first discoverer of this great mystery, for he is candid enough to tell us from whom he had it; but as he was a perfect master of it, and has given it to us in a style more easy at first to be comprehended, than that of Jacob Behmen, from whom he had it, I scruple not to call it, Mr. Law's philosophy.

‘In proving these seven properties, Mr. Law says, Nature takes its rise from the will of the Deity, [willing to be manifest in an out-spoken life of nature and creature; for the Deity being light and love, must as such communicate.] This he explains after the following manner:

‘Will [in action] is desire; now desire [as such] has these properties essentially belonging to it, compressing, inclosing, or shutting up; and reaching out, drawing or attracting. Now the first of these, compressing, inclosing, or shutting up, is contrary to the last, drawing, or attracting, for the first has no motion in it, but only wills to compress, hold together, or endeavours to abide in stillness; but the last has motion in it, and therefore is contrary to, and never continues in a quiet state.

‘Now these two properties brought forth by the same will, have equal strength and equal power, and always act in opposition to each other, which opposition unavoidably produces a third property [in the same act], viz., a whirling, for as the holding fast and going out are equal in strength and power to each other, and neither for the other's opposition, can go backward or forward, up or down, each acting equally against the other, a whirling round must be caused.

‘Now these three, the holding fast, the going out, and whirling round, all necessarily arising from the will of the Deity, or constituting a discovery of such, Mr. Law calls the three first properties of nature. The fourth property, he says, is fire, produced from the [intense] violent agitation, motion and anguish of the three first. The fifth property, he says, is light. The sixth, life; and by the seventh, as Jacob Behmen also does, he means, spirit, [spiritual manifestation or body, pure nature, the fulfilment of desire. [As the Deity no sooner wills than effects, so this generation of nature is an instantaneous unbeginning act, though thus conceivably divided as to its order.]

‘Now I prove by the help of the electrical machine, these seven properties to be in [this temporal outbirth of] nature, exactly as Mr. Law has described them, after the following manner:

‘On the conductor I tie several threads of about four inches long; I then take a hoop, the diameter of which does not exceed the atmosphere I am able to raise by the friction of the globe, and tie some threads upon it of equal length with those I tie on the conductor. This done, I place the conductor exactly in the centre of the hoop, and on setting the machine in motion, all the threads are immediately extended, those on the conductor with their points towards those on the hoop, and those on the hoop towards those on the conductor.

‘This phenomenon, so contrary to everything I ever yet saw, greatly astonished me. For if we blow with our lips, everything within the reach of the blast, flies from but not to us; but here, though there is a manifest blast issuing from the conductor, (for it may be felt against the hand) yet the threads on the hoop instead of flying from, in the same direction with those on the conductor, act directly opposite and point to them; which is an evident proof that there are two streams or currents, one issuing to, the other from the conductor; or, in other words, that, there are two properties in nature always acting contrary to each other, the one attracting, the other repelling.

‘(Note.—The Abbé Nollet, by a variety of experiments, hath now put this beyond all doubt. These experiments Dr. Watson tells us are sixty in number, and exceedingly well chosen to prove the simultaneous affluence and effluence of the electrical matter.

‘I will only add one more experiment, which I am not certain is included in the Abbé Nollet's. viz., Suspend a bottle on the end of a conductor supported either on glass or silk; let there be nothing near the bottle and it will be found impossible to charge it, but apply a finger to the side and it will be filled and give a shock. To the finger it appears as if the matter that ran in at the top discharged itself at the side; but the charging of the bottle shows this to be a deception, and proves at the same time that for every spark that came out of the bottle, a spark went into it likewise from the finger; for these two opposite powers can only be divided by words; where one acts, there the other always is. But to put this beyond dispute, remove the finger and hold the point of a pin at the distance of four or five inches, and a flame will be seen rushing from it, and the bottle will fill and be charged as well, as if the finger had been kept close to it.—N.B. This flame discovers to us another secret, viz., that it is not air but real fire that issues towards the bottle. I make this remark, because some have concluded that, as culinary fires rarefy the air around them, into which deed of putting off again that which was mortal and earthly, after he had voluntarily taken it upon him, yet he could have done it without such a severe suffering of pain and death. (2.) That there was the greatest need of his going as a public person, as the second Adam, and head of the whole human race, through all this process for our sake; not only for to do for us what we were not able to do, but also to show us, and chiefly to make us a way, in which he might draw us, and we might be enabled by him to follow after him. (3.) That he was not therefore regenerated in his life, and at his death, as we are, by putting on, etc.

Page 294. As to these general ends of Christ's coming into the world, and suffering for us, I observe these several things following: (1.) That it would be proper to place in the beginning that which he himself declared, saying, therefore the Son of God came into the world that he might destroy the works of the devil. (2.) No. 3. as it is here expressed, cannot be called an end, because it was but a medium. If, therefore, it were expressed thus, or in another manner like to this—to become the regenerator of nature by going through the process of regeneration, both end and middle would be expressed. (3.) I cannot see how that which is said No. 4. can be called a general end of Christ's coming and suffering for us; for he came not to put off, (which seemingly doth presuppose a having it already upon him before he came,) but rather he came to put on our imperfect corrupt image, that so by putting it off afterwards again, he might deliver us from it. (4.) No. 5. to manifest the primitive glorious image in himself, can also not well be called a general the denser air presses, it is only air that rushes into the electric fire, and therefore that there is no such thing as attraction. The misfortune is, what we divide by words, we suppose may be divided in fact. But where fire is, there is air, and where air is, there is fire; for fire always brings forth air with it. To return.)

But here, perhaps, it may be objected that I carry matters too far, in thinking I have discovered two contrary properties in nature, when it is evidently no more than a strange appearance produced by an electrical machine, just as the vibration of a pendulum is produced by the weight and wheels of a clock. This objection, as it is natural to make it, I thought proper to mention, and then remove, that we may have the way clear before us.

The vibration of the pendulum is nothing more than an effect, of which the structure of the clock is the cause. But the electrical machine is not the cause of these strange appearances; it is only the means of making visible to us what is hidden in nature, just as the striking together a flint and a steel is the means of bringing forth to our sight the fire that lay hidden within them. The collision of the flint and steel is not the cause or maker of fire, but only a means of making visible what before was shut up and concealed from our sight.

After the same manner acts the friction of the globe against the cushion; the friction does not create these strange appearances, but is only a means of making them visible. Therefore I conclude, that what we see does not then begin to be, when the machine is put in motion; but that the machine is a wonderful discoverer of the hidden properties of nature, which are always acting in the same manner, though so secretly that our bare sight cannot discover them.

Now that these two properties acting thus contrary to each other are the cause of a continual whirling, wheel or circle, I prove from the Leyden experiment.

It is well known to all electricians, that unless a circle be made between the bottom and top of a charged bottle, no shock can possibly be given, but let a bottle be charged and then a communication made between the bottom and top, and something of unparalleled force will be found to act within it; but without making a circle, we cannot come at any knowledge of its power. But its strength is now so far ascertained, that nothing is found able to stand against it, and by the help of large jars its power may be increased to a most astonishing degree.

Now these three properties made visible by the help of the electrical machine, are manifestly Jacob Behmen's and Mr. Law's three first properties of nature.

The fourth property, fire, will not require me to say much upon it, for it is well known that it is real fire that bursts forth from the charged jar or bottle in the explosion; and that it will set fire to spirits, and properly prepared combustibles.

The fifth property, light, follows from the fire. This also requires no more to be said than that whoever has seen the fire burst from the bottle, must have seen light, but indeed so much light may be raised by the machine with the help of an air-pump as even to read large print by it.

The sixth property is [sound, understanding,] life. Now that fire is the radix of life evidently appears from the following experiment: let a cat and a candle be put together into an oven; let the door have a pane of glass fixed in the middle, so as no air can penetrate it, and then let the door be closely luted to the mouth of the oven, and you will perceive that the same fire that is needful to keep up the flame of the candle is needful also for the life of the cat; for the instant the candle goes out, that instant the cat dies. See Freke on Fire, p. 33.

The seventh property is spirit [developed]. This the machine makes as evident as all the rest, for when it is put in motion, there issues from the end of the conductor a spirit, or air (for they are both the same) that may be felt; and, in sensation is not unlike what we make when we softly blow upon our hand with the lips contracted: now here the machine ceases, here its discoveries end, it has no more properties to display, unless we call its lately discovered medical virtue another property; but this must not be looked upon as another property, as all the rest manifestly and distinctly are, but rather a blessed effect of the whole.

Now is it not astonishing that these two men, Jacob Behmen and Mr. Law, should write so clearly and so justly of nature, without the help of any instrument to assist them? Jacob Behmen expressly, writes in the style in which an electrician would express himself; for he speaks of the fire bursting forth with a violent crack, and so exactly describes the noise and flash, that one would think, at first sight, he had seen the fire collected in a bottle and discharged. [See Behmen's 'Threefold Life,' small 4to. pages 16, 17, 18.]

And now, Sir, though I make no doubt many will be carping at what has here been said, as has been the common practice with respect to those eminent writers above mentioned, whose philosophy now stands established on experiments, yet so long as this maxim of the schools, sensus non possunt falli, remains good, what is founded on experiment cannot be shaken. However this one thing I require of every opposer, that he produce his experiments to support his opposition, in end; but much more general would it be, if it were said—to restore the primitive lost image, and to manifest himself in his glory as the head, and all his members with him, as partaking of his glory. For the manifestation of the glorious image in himself only, was not the ultimate end which was intended, but the manifestation thereof in the whole disharmonised human nature. (5.) It would not be impertinent to mention out of the Scripture something of those excellent expressions which speak of an universal reconciliation, ἀνακεφαλαιώσεις, etc. Ephes. i.; because it is plain that the Apostle gives us this as a general and ultimate end of Christ's coming and suffering for us. Though it is not of an exigent necessity; seeing that all what is said above is in this ἀνακεφαλαιώσεις summarily contained, and this is displayed in all the mentioned particulars, like as a tree is in so many branches.

Page 295. Q. 1. Do they describe this process, and show the particular reasons and ends of Christ's actions and sufferings for us? If they do, pray give us them in short. A. Yes, they do; and even so that but a short running through all the particulars would easily fill several sheets: wherefore I shall give you but some of them. They say then—

1. That his circumcision on the eighth day was to heal or purify our impure natural generation and birth, effected by that member on which the circumcision was to be performed, according to the law.

as clear and candid a manner as I have, to elucidate this philosophy. There can be no deception in experiments; I shall therefore take no notice of any answerer, unless he contradicts by experiment, what by experiment I think I have clearly demonstrated. I am, Sir, &c., &c.

No one, that I have heard of, ever made the least objection to the above Letter, but my hope was, that some one or other would have thrown greater light on the subject; for many persons were at that time trying experiments; and several since have wrote on the subject, who have inconceivably proved that what used to be called electric matter, is real fire, and that it exists and is to be found in every place; but no one has yet attempted to show what this fire is, from whence it proceeds, or whether it be an unit or composed of parts. This I shall endeavour to elucidate in the following chapters.

[ANNOTATION.—For a further and complete philosophical elucidation of the subject of this chapter, in addition to what is contained in pages 61—64 and 71—75, and throughout Freher's papers, supra, the reader is referred to the quotation from the 'Way to Divine Knowledge,' with which it is proposed to conclude the above 'PREFACE' and SECOND SECTION of this work, commencing at page Meanwhile, however, the following 'Fragment' may not be unacceptable:—

"God is a pure spirit, who from eternity to eternity ever was, and ever must be blessed, by his will or propensity to an ever blessed goodness. This strong desire of blessing, is, in order (though not antecedent), the first fervent principle, and what is called in God, the Father, or eternal fire. And this fiery desire of blessing generates eternally the Son, or second principle, of divine light and love towards every possible subject or capacity for blessedness; and from the fire and light proceedeth the third principle, or active Spirit, wise and powerful to accomplish every intention of happiness. And these three are one GOD, and have but one will. Yet in nature and the creature they have three distinct operations, and by such distinction produce all the infinite variety of sensibilities, powers, virtues, forms, colours, flavours, sounds, etc. that from eternity to eternity ever did or can arise throughout capacity, or the universe of nature and creature.

This triune Deity of LOVE eternally perceived and found himself in the efflux or body of his own kindling spirit, even in the substantiality of internal ineffable and inapproachable light: and this substantiality of light is the heaven of God himself, and by its influence, makes the heaven of nature and creature. It is universal, but incomprehensible; communicable, but not divisible in the creator, though divisible in the fallen creature, and thereout no creature ever was or can be made, because it is everywhere; and wherever it is, there is the inseparable Unity of the trinity of God. [N.B. To be understood throughout according to the distinctions of the Note, p. 292, etc., and other passages of Freher's papers, to the like purport.]

This eternal Spirit of desire, love, and operation toward all goodness, dwelling in his own body or external substantiality of internal light, through his desire of manifestation in the blessedness of creatures, produced an internal capacity or ground of creation: and this capacity was not God, though it was in God, yet it was as it were out of or external to God: it was a want, not a filling; ■ capacity, not an inhabitant; the craver, not the gratifier; the workhouse, not the operator; the dark subject of the illuminator; nature, but not God. (Note.—Nature is as the body and mirror to God, wherein he perceiveth himself, and worketh all his wonders. In like manner, darkness is a body and mirror to light, whereby all its glories become reflected and apparent. And thus evil is as a body and mirror of goodness, wherein the goodness is seen in all its beauty and delighfulness.)

And into this dark capacity, or infinite want, called nature, the fervent desire of the Father eternally entered, and brought itself into partibility, and thereby produced an infinite, though unintelligent desire throughout nature, analogous to the intellectual desire of the Deity. It was a desire from God, but not the desire that is in God; it was nature's desire, but not God's desire, though imparted to nature by the desire of God. And this desire in nature produceth attraction, or a three-fold working of properties, throughout the infinitude of nature; and the first property of this attraction is called astringency, or a strong pulling in or shutting up; and the second property of this attraction, is ■ strong expansion or going out in order to pull in; (for the desire of compression or holding must move out to get something to compress or hold, and so produces a resistance equal to itself; and the moving out of the desire, merely in order to pull in, produces an act of compression that equally resists the act of expansion;) and forasmuch as these two properties eternally begot each other, and are equally strong, though contrary to each other, they produce a third property, called anguish or the whirling motion of the two first properties, that can never rest from an equal compression and expansion, a pulling in and a rushing out in order to attract, till desire, which is the ground of their operation, shall fail.

Thus nature became, eternally, the ground or quality of the power of God, wherein to exercise

2. That his baptism was to make our soul capable of having the holy fire, light and love kindled in her again. That this was to be done by an outward elementary medium, because man was fallen into the four elements: and that this medium must have been water, because the water of life above the firmament is that without which the fire in eternal nature cannot burn, nor the light shine.

3. That being circumcised as a Jew, and also baptised as a Christian, he united these two churches or dispensations of the law and gospel in and to himself, into one body, under him, the head.

4. That his forty days' temptation in the wilderness, was to answer and to rectify the forty days of Adam and Eve at the tempting tree: and that he must needs have gone through this temptation after he was baptized, that he might overcome all which the first Adam was then conquered by.

5. That all his miraculous deeds were the true effects and consequences of his overcoming in this temptation: like as all those calamities, sickness, death, etc. which he delivered so many distressed souls from, restoring them to life and health, were the proper effects and consequences of the first Adam's being overcome in the temptation.

6. That all his miracles are distinctly to be referred to the seven properties of nature; so that for instance, his raising up of the dead belongeth to the first; his making the dumb to speak, the and execute the infinity of his operations, and wherein to pour his blessedness by the manifestation of himself, so far as the Deity may be manifested to nature and creature; so far as the work may receive the excellence and virtue of the operator.

From the contention and anguish of the said contrary properties, grounded and founded in that desire which God had imparted to the infinite want or capacity of nature, (or rather which is nature itself;) arise all the possibilities of subsequent creation, of creaturely substance, form, motion, perception, sensibility, with every mode and power of creaturely life. And the said eternal desire so to speak imparted by God the Father, through the dark immensity of nature, is not God, nor God's desire, but yet is called the wrath or dark fire of God the Father, eternally fermenting and kindling the contention of the properties of the dark world into a capacity of union with the world of light; and into the third property, or height of the kindling of the said two contending properties, God the Father gave the fire of his own intellectual desire, and the same was as a flash through the dark immensity of nature, and became a new property, introducing or exalting nature into the kingdom of heaven, or the world of light. And through the said new property, or flash of his desire to blessedness, the Father brought the third property of attraction, the dark anguish of nature, into a fifth property, being the substantiality of the light of the Son of his love, in whom with his holy Spirit he is eternally well pleased; and through the said fourth property, he brought the second property of the expansion of the desire of nature into a sixth property, being the holy spirit or operation of understanding, in a triumph of joy. And through the said fourth property, God brought the first property, or the astringency of the desire of nature, into a seventh property, or the compression and substantiality of the six preceding properties; and this became the consummation of the union of all things, or manifestation of the heaven of God through the infinity of nature.—Now though these three properties of nature were received into the heaven of God, and were illuminated and blessed thereby, they neither changed their nature nor manner of working: for the first property of astringency became the compression or realizing of all kind of happiness; the second property of expansion, went out with the Holy Spirit into the light and the love, in order to realize and bring the same into itself; and the third property of the whirling anguish became a rapture, and restless enjoyment of the blessedness into which the two first properties were assumed.

Thus God became at once the fulness and beatitude of the immensity of the want and desire of nature, and eternally prepared to himself the capacity, ground and materials of creation, in order to satisfy his eternal and infinite desire of blessing.

True it is that as nature was hitherto unintelligent, it had no consciousness or perception of its own darkness, want, and anguish, exclusive of God, neither delightful sensibility of its infinity being filled and illuminated by him. It remained in its externity as a dark mirror or glass, whereon God beheld the beauty of his own light and ideas, which from eternity he contemplated in the mirror of nature, and in time produced into perceptibility, or a feeling of their own existence in him.

He contemplated therein the whole infinity of possibilities; all causes, with their consequences, in the remotest relation; all events that should or could come to pass through eternity.

He saw that without an intelligent desire, no creature could be excellent, or formed in his likeness; but he saw also, that unless such intelligence should be ruled by his wisdom, and its desire wholly conformable to his will, the creature could not be wise, could not be happy.

In the possibility of the creature's desire of independence, he saw the possibility of moral and natural evil; but he saw that such partial and temporary evil might be the occasion of an infinity of good and more abundant blessedness to his creatures, and without the event of such evil, the good which must counteract it, could not be manifest. That till the lapse of some creature, the whole creation must be unconscious of the distinction between God and nature, neither could they be duly sensible of their own fallibility, and that sufficiency and perfection are solely in God, all things depending on him for every quality of happy existence." . . . v. No. XII. Note, p. 49.]

CHAPTER III.—Proving that there is only One Fire in all nature, and demonstrating by experiments that fire is the Life of All Things.

Custom, which too often tyrannizes over our understanding, has hitherto arbitrarily fixed the epithet electric to a machine, which bids the fairest to be the most wonderful instrument ever yet discovered, either for its usefulness, already found out, in the medical way, or for experiments in natural philosophy. But I will not here contend with custom, it is of too stubborn a nature to yield to reason or argument. Only I would endeavour to free the reader's ideas from confusion, lest when I speak of electric fire, he should imagine it is something dependent on, or produced by the apparatus. I would therefore here remark, that there are not in nature two fires, or fires of a different quality from each other, but that the fire, by which we warm ourselves, is the very same as that made visible by an electrical apparatus. But with this difference, the first forbids us to approach deaf to hear, and the cleansing of lepers, to the second; his casting out devils, to the third; his turning water into wine, and feeding thousands of people with a few loaves, to the seventh, etc.

7. That his doctrine was delivered to the people most in parables, to fulfil the Scripture: but that it was so prophesied of him in the Scripture, because the Spirit, teaching then before his death and resurrection, was not yet that which the people should be instructed by. That it was indeed a spirit of love, but of love not yet having conquered fully, but still being much in the Father's property, which only the apostles, that were to work miracles in the Father's power, should be capable of; unto whom therefore he expounded privately his parables.

8. That all the particular circumstances of his sufferings have a relation and answerableness unto something which happened in the first Adam's fall; for that this second Adam, if the first should be restored, must have entered wholly into the state and woful condition of the first, not only to suffer for him, but also to call it all back, and to rectify what he had misdone.

9. That the punishment of our sins came to be substantial in his sufferings, for to set before us a dreadful example, to show us that all that our own will takes in and burthens our soul withal, cometh to be a substance, and must appear before the judgment of God.

10. That he was taken and bound in a dark night, and even in a garden, because the first Adam, by his transgression in a garden, was fallen out of the paradisaical day into eternal darkness.

11. That he was mocked, derided, spit upon, etc., because the first Adam was also deservedly too near it, that raised by a machine may be as safely felt as cold water; and yet this may be excited to as high and inflammable a state, as the flame of a candle with which our fires are lighted.

Fire is the most wonderful of anything we have to do with: and yet scarce is any one's curiosity or astonishment raised by it. The reason is, continual use gets the better of our attention. Knowing how to procure fire whenever we want it, we are under no more concern than to get those materials, that can furnish us with a sufficiency of it for all our purposes; thus day after day we let pass unnoticed the most astonishing of all the elements; even chemists, who make so much use of fire, have never yet, as I have read, entered further into it than to try its effects, and how far it would operate. But now it is found to be compounded of several parts; by the help of an electrical machine we can analyse it, and show all its properties distinctly to the senses.

But as I have here spoken of the chemists, I will mention an incident that happened when I was once trying experiments. A very ingenious chemist being present I asked him if he would taste the fire, the question startled him, but seeing me do it, he was encouraged to try, but rose from the chair with astonishment. 'I taste, (said he,) an acid, and now I know, what I never could account for before, that it is the acid in fire that gives the spicula to precipitate.' This observation I thought too curious to omit. But as well as being tasted, the fire may be also smelt, for after a machine has been worked some time in a close room, a strong smell of sulphur may be perceived. But no more of this now. I would speak here expressly of fire, and not of its properties.

It was the opinion of the ancients that fire was in everything; nay that everything living, whether animal or vegetable, owed its life to it; for this reason they called it the anima mundi. From whence they got this truth, or from what experiments they drew their conclusions, it is not material to inquire; an electrical machine will verify it to our senses.

Jacob Behmen tells us, his knowledge of nature was opened in him by God. This is an assertion that many may call his ipse dixit; be that as it may, it reduces us to this dilemma, either to allow or deny what he says. If we deny, to what or whom shall we attribute those deep and wonderful discoveries that are to be found in his writings, and which experiment proves to be true? Many have been the abuses poured upon him from every quarter; but which should be most regarded, the ravings of folly, or the evidence of the senses?

Mr. Boyle in his book on the 'Usefulness of Experimental Natural Philosophy, says, like a man of candour (p. 283.), 'Perhaps neither nature nor mankind is much beholden to those, that too rigidly or narrowly circumscribe or confine the operations of nature, and not so much as allow themselves or others to try whether it be possible for nature, excited and managed by art, to perform diverse things, which they never yet saw done, or work by diverse ways, differing from any, which by the common principles, that are taught in the schools, they are able to give a satisfactory account of.'

Jacob Behmen and Mr. Law have written, I own, of nature quite different from all other writers. But is this a reason for rejecting what they have said? Galileo, the famous inventor of the telescope, for maintaining the Copernican system, a system now generally received, was twice thrown into the prison of the Inquisition as an heretic. But because his persecutors, the Jesuits, did not then believe that the sun was a fixed body and that the earth moved round it, were his assertions less true? Time and experience have removed this prejudice, and fixed the error on the right persons. "One shall rarely meet," says the author of Galileo's Life, "with a more glaring instance of blindness and bigotry." To condemn an author because he has written contrary to our preconceived opinion is as good an argument of sound sense and understanding, as to pronounce that fruit bad and good for nothing, which we have never tasted.

When Jacob Behmen was strictly examined at the Saxon court by men of the greatest learning, professors in every science, brought together for this purpose by the Elector, they discovered so much honesty, candour, and good sense; that not one of them condemned him, even though he said many things to them far beyond their comprehension. What he declared was from an insight given by God into nature. [His mind stood in the centre, and God's eye opened itself in him; so that he saw with the divine eye.] Now that there is a power in nature always at work, is evident from the effects. But what is this power? It is fire. The tenderest leaf on the highest tree shows at the extremest part of it that there is life, but what causes this life? It is fire.

But that no one may say this is my ipse dixit, the two following experiments are here introduced that the senses may have full proof of the assertion:—

(1.) Pluck a branch from any plant, the leaves of which would not be too ponderous for the power you are able to raise with your machine, and observe when its leaves begin to droop, at this crisis place it on your glasses and electrify it, and you will see that the fire will have the same effect upon it, as when it was growing upon the plant; the fire will pervade and circulate through every part of it, and make it appear as if it was living.

so treated by the devils, when they had persuaded him to put on the serpent's image: and that all his posterity with him must have continued subject to all their insults, if the second Adam had not taken all this upon himself, as it was inflicted on him by the devil's ministers and officers.

12. That he was crowned with a crown of thorns, because the first Adam suffered himself to be persuaded by the tempter, to take upon him, as a king of his own making, and in his own will and pleasure, the crown of this world, which yet proved to be unto him, not a crown of honour, but of contempt and pricking thorns.

13. That he was sentenced and delivered up to death by his own people, but that this sentence was executed by a heathen magistrate, because by man's doing, contrary to the will of God, sin was brought into the world; and by man's doing also, but without his knowing and contrary to his expectation, sin was to be cast out again, and the sinner reconciled. And therefore the two chief branches of the human tree, Jews and heathen, must both have a hand in this doing; that the blessing which was to be brought forth thereout might be extended over all, and both might be forgiven, because they both knew not what they did.

14. That in the properties of eternal nature, there is the generation of a cross, immediately before the coming forth of the light; that this cross, by the light, is illuminated and glorified; that man's eternal soul had here its original; and that his fall was in effect nothing else but a departing from this glorification of his cross within, and a turning his paradisaical body without, into hard,

(2.) Take two plants of equal size and similar appearance in pots; electrify one of them for a quarter of an hour or ten minutes every morning. In a few days you will see a manifest difference. The electrified plant will outstrip and look much more flourishing than the other. Now what stronger proof than this can we have that fire, as Jacob Behmen and Mr. Law assert, is the radix of life. In the plant growing in the garden, we can only see the effect of the vivifying power swiftly pervading and rapidly circulating through every part. In the electrified plant we see the cause as well as perceive the effect of the subtil fluid.

I shall conclude this chapter with a passage out of Mr. Law's 'Appeal' apposite to my present subject:—

"The reader, (says he,) ought not to wonder or be offended at the frequent mention of the word fire, which is used to denote the true nature and state of the soul. For both Nature and scripture speak continually the same language. For wherever here is mention of life, light, or love in the Scripture, there fire is necessarily supposed, as being that in which all life and light and love must necessarily arise, and therefore the Scriptures speak as often of fire, as they do of life and light and love, because the one necessarily includes the other. For all life, whether it be vegetable, sensitive, animal, or intellectual, is only a kindled fire of life in such a variety of states, and every dead insensible thing is only so, because its fire is quenched, or shut up in a hard compaction. If therefore we will speak of the true ground of the fallen state of men and angels, we are not at liberty, to think of it under any other idea, or speak of it in any other manner than as the darkened fire of their life unable to kindle itself into light and love. Do not the Scriptures strictly confine us to this idea of hell? So that it is not any particular philosophy or affected singularity of expression, that makes me speak in this manner of the soul, but because all nature and Scripture forces us to confess, that the root of all and every life stands and must necessarily stand in the properties of fire.

"The holy Scriptures also speak much of fire in the ideas which they give us both of the divine nature and of created spirits, whether they be saved or lost. The former, as becoming flames of heavenly light and love; the latter, as dark firebrands of hell.

"It ought to be no reason, why we should think grossly of fire, because it is seen in so many gross things of this world. For how is it seen in them? Why only as a destroyer, a consumer, and refiner of all grossness, as a kindler of life and light out of death and darkness. So that in all the appearances of fire, even in earthly things, we have reason to look upon it as something of an heavenly, exalting and glorious nature, as that which disperses death, darkness, and grossness, and raises up the power and glory of every life.

"There is but one fire throughout all nature and creature, standing only in different states and conditions. The fire that is in the light of the sun, is the same fire that is in the darkness of the flint. That fire which is in the life of our bodies, is the life of our souls; that which tears wood in pieces is the same which upholds the beauteous forms of angels. It is the same fire that burns straw, that will at last melt the sun; the same fire that brightens a diamond is darkened in a flint. It is the same fire that kindles life in an animal, that kindled it in angels. In an angel it is an eternal fire of an eternal life; in an animal it is the same fire brought into a temporary condition, and therefore can only kindle a life that is temporary; the same fire that is mere wrath in a devil, is the sweetness of flaming love in an angel; and the same fire, which is the majestic glory of heaven, makes the horror of hell."

CHAPTER IV.—Showing that the systole and diastole of the heart is caused by Fire, and that fire is the cause of the redness of the blood.

In the last chapter I gave a quotation from Mr. Law; in this I shall give several, but short, from Jacob Behmen, as a prelude to what I have further to advance. In his 'Clavis' at the end of the 'Forty Questions concerning the Soul,' [N.B. the reader is especially referred to this treatise, and to the 'Three Tables of Divine Revelation,' in connection with the data here given, for the examination of the question now under notice,] at verse 98, he writes, In fire and light consisteth the life of all things, let them be insensible, vegetable, or rational things. In the 'Threefold Life,' Chap. viii. verse 31, Every living life is a fire: and yet the proper source of the fire is not the right life, but the tincture which proceedeth from the fire is a pleasant joy, and it is the liberty of nature, which is the right life. But to make this plainer by another quotation, lest the word tincture should not be easily apprehended; in the tenth verse in the Seventeenth Question 'concerning the Soul,' he saith, The fire is wrathful, the light is mild and lovely: in the light is the life, and in the fire the cause of the life. But this life (speaking of the natural life, 'Threefold Life,' Chap. viii. verse 34,) is fragile and consisteth only in four forms, viz. in fire, air, water, and earth, which is its body. In the Seventh Question 'concerning the Soul,' verse 16, As to the soul only, beside the spirit, it is a globe of fire. And in the Ninth Question, verse 2, The soul standeth in the blood of the heart, here it hath its seat and original. In the First Question 'concerning the Soul,' verse 134, Understand the great mys-

rough, and gross flesh and bones, retaining still the figure of a cross, which now his soul must bear as a heavy burden. And that this is the true reason why the Lord must bear himself his cross, and must be nailed to it, and die on it, and why no other kind of death could have done that which by his death was to be effected.

15. That he was hanged on the cross between two murderers, because the first Adam, by manifesting in himself this cross, fell into two such different regions or kingdoms, as proved both to be murderers of his paradisaical life; and if he be upon the way returning home, he liveth verily as in the middle between them. And that the one of them, viz., this outward world, hath a promise of being delivered from the curse and vanity, like as also the one of the two murderers received a gracious promise, that he should be with Christ in paradise.

16. That all his words spoken on the cross, Father, forgive them—I thirst—Into thy hands I commend my spirit, etc., and all the other circumstances also; the title written above the cross, the casting lots for his vesture, the giving him vinegar mixed with gall, the præternatural darkness, the earth's quaking, and the rending of the rocks, and of the veil in the temple, etc., are all full of deep mysterious wonders, and all relating or answering to the first Adam's fall and restoration.

17. That his side was opened, and gave forth blood and water, after he was departed the life of this world; and that this was done to heal, or to make up that breach which then was made when the first Adam's side was opened, after he was departed his primitive paradisaical life, and fallen in-tery further. You see that every fire giveth light, and you see also that air goeth forth from the source of the fire, and you know very well that if the fire had no air to blow it up, it would be smothered, as all fires are smothered when they have no air. Verse 136, You see that all fire must have matter or else it will not burn; understand it thus, the fire produceth air and in the air, water, and it mightily attracteth the air with the water into itself again, whereby the source of the fire is so allayed that it shineth, for without water no fire shineth; if no water can be produced in a thing, in that thing the fire will not shine. In the 'Book of Regeneration,' verse 19, Who would believe that fire generateth water and that the original of fire could be in water, if we did not see it with our eyes in tempests of thundering, lightning and rain; and did not find also that in living creatures the fire in the body dwelleth in the blood, and that the blood is the mother of the fire, and the fire the father of the blood.

But Behmen hath gone much deeper than this, even to the properties antecedent to fire, which is before shown in Chap. II., and proved by experiment the first. But I would here ask, What is that heat and from whence does it proceed, that warms the body, and by which so long, but no longer than it warms, the limbs are enabled to perform their offices? Shall I be answered, It is the blood that causes this internal warmth by its velocity, friction, and attrition through the veins and arteries. But then what causes this rapid circulation? There must be some power to put the blood in motion. Experiments now have fixed it beyond all doubt that it is fire, the fire of which every rational, animal and vegetable life consists. But look back to Chap. II., experiments the first and second, and there you will see how the three first properties of nature work, which are antecedent to fire. The electrical machine exhibits to our senses, that there is a continual influx and efflux, and that these two opposites always acting contrary to each other cause a whirling or circulation, and that this violent motion produceth fire. So that wherever there is fire, there is always a going in and going out and a whirling round or circulation.

Now what difficulty after seeing these experiments, by which is shown the manner of nature's working, to account for the systole and diastole of the heart; for if the soul is a fire, and from whence can heat come, but from fire? and if its seat is in the blood of the heart, as Behmen declares, then so long as the soul [or life] continues therein, there must be an attraction, repulsion and circulation.

Many had imagined that fire was the cause, because they could not tell how to account for motion without it; but then not knowing the nature of fire, or that there were any properties in nature antecedent to it, the more they attempted an explanation, the more they found themselves embarrassed, till at length others resumed the subject and attempted to explain the systole and diastole of the heart from the pressure of the atmosphere, but with as little success, for all proceeded on doubtful hypotheses. But what need of supposition now? An electrical machine shows us the manner of nature's working. It manifests the hidden and invisible fire to our senses. And by trying experiments either on the vegetable or human system, we shall find the fire, of which the life of each consists, to be the same; for if it was a strange and heterogeneous fire, it would exceedingly injure the human frame and not assist it; it would not mix so kindly as it does with the blood, but would rather cause an ebullition in it, and do the greatest harm to the constitution, whereas nothing of this is seen. The only alteration that can be perceived, is, that it acts as a stimulus and quickens the motion of the blood. The pulse beats a few times oftener in a minute. But the variety of cures that electricity has performed, speaks more strongly and loudly for this assertion, than all that I can possibly say in support of it. I wish I could as easily prove, to prevent the critic's cavil, what I am going further to advance on the subject, viz. that the redness of the blood, which has puzzled so many, is caused by fire. But what so probable? If all colours are found by experiments to be contained in light, and if we know of no light without fire, to what else can we with so much reason attribute the redness of the blood? A better cause I have never yet met with, but if any one can show a better, I will readily and cheerfully give up my conjecture. But alas! how little do we know! What reason have the wisest men to deplore their ignorance! What a mystery is fire! Who thinks that his life consists in fire! How unknown is man to himself! But such we see is the force of some men's fire, that it drives them into depths deeper than they can fathom. How many hundred books have been written that now no one thinks worth the perusal? How many volumes hath a plausible hypothesis produced, all which the next age hath seen converted to waste paper? An hypothesis, however pleasing, cannot stand long. Busy imagination is always at work to pull it down, and build something of its own, but not more durable, on its ruins. But I here put an end to this digression, if it be a digression, and proceed to the next chapter to show the usefulness of experiments.

CHAPTER V.—Showing the sentiments of Mr. Boyle, and Dr. Boerhaave, respecting men's ignorance of nature; also proving that Sir Isaac Newton was a reader of Behmen, and borrowed from him his two powers of attraction and repulsion; and concluding with the remarks of the ingenious Dr. Watson on electricity.

to sleep, the true forerunner of his following death; where his Eve was taken out of him, and the two tinctures in his holy blood and water were divorced.

18. That his body lay forty hours in the grave, because, not only this was a space of time sufficient, on the one side, to convince all men that he was really dead, and, on the other, to fulfil on him the promise that his flesh should not see corruption, but also, and even chiefly, because this was the time which the first Adam lay in his sleep.

19. That an angel rolled away the stone from his sepulchre, not that this stone otherwise could have hindered his arising out of the grave (for he came out with a paradisaical body, to which no wall nor stone could be in the way), but only in condescension to the infirmity of his disciples; for so they could go and look themselves into the sepulchre, and see with their own eyes what they had laid therein was no more there.

20. That Mary in the garden (though she saw him) knew him not before he spoke to her; and the two disciples in the way to Emmaus (though he spoke to them, and opened to them the Scriptures) knew him not until he had broken bread with them: which is to show us not only in general, that he cannot be known without his own manifesting himself by his living word; but also more particularly, that all what he speaks to us outwardly, in and from the Scripture, as he did in the days of his flesh, or through his servants, as he doth still, cannot make us to know him internally and sufficiently unto salvation, if his own internal manifesting himself in and to the hearer

Mr. Boyle in his tenth essay 'Of men's great ignorance of the uses of natural things,' begins his first section with these words: "I consider in the first place, that there are very few of the works of nature that have been sufficiently considered and are thoroughly known, even as to those qualities, and other attributes of this and that body (or other physical thing) which belong properly to it, and are not thought to be so relative to other bodies. It is not only in the terrestrial globe, but in almost every body to be met with in it, that there may be a kind of terra incognita, or undetected part, whose discovery is reserved for our future industry."

Now this terra incognita, this undetected part, no man more industriously strove to find out, than Mr. Boyle; he spent his life in trying experiments, fully convinced that they were of the last importance to investigate nature. Of this same way of thinking was the great Boerhaave. In an oration, 1725, 'On the method of obtaining certainty in physics,' he asserts that "we are entirely ignorant of the first principles of things, and that all our knowledge of their qualities is derived either from such experiments, as subject them to our senses, or from consequences by an exact method of reasoning deduced from those experiments."

But no one was more convinced of the utility of this method than Sir Isaac Newton. But had such improvements in the electrical apparatus been made in his days as have been made in these, what would it not have enabled him to do? It would have helped him to demonstrate to the sight, his attractive and repulsive powers, and saved him the labour of writing so much about it, and which but very few capacities have been able to comprehend. Sir Isaac had doubtless an uncommon genius; but shall we say he was self-taught with regard to his doctrine of attraction and repulsion? Mr. Law knew otherwise, and was not afraid to tell the world so. [See note, p. 83.] * * * Sir Isaac Newton was doubtless the great man: but he certainly borrowed his attractive and repulsive powers from Behmen; for had he been possessed of instruments, as we now are, by which he could have clearly shown them, he would not have been silent; but it is too plain he was unwilling to declare from whence he had his knowledge. As to Behmen, he honestly and without disguise declares he derived his knowledge from God. And who but God, the author of nature, can unfold the laws of nature?

Now after having mentioned Mr. Boyle, Dr. Boerhaave, and Sir Isaac Newton, it would be doing injustice to my subject not to mention the ingenious Dr. Watson, who has written on electricity both in the experimental and medical way, the result of whose inquiries I find drawn up ready to my hand in a dictionary lately published under the article of electricity. "Mr. Watson's system naturally leads him to ask, by what denomination shall we call this extraordinary power from its effects in these operations? Shall we call it electricity from its being a principle neither generated nor destroyed, from its being everywhere, and always present, and in readiness to show itself in its effects, though latent and unobserved, till by some process it is produced into action and rendered visible from its penetrating the densest and hardest bodies, and its uniting itself to them; and from its immense velocity shall we with Theophrastus, Boerhaave, Nieuwenhuit, Gravesand, and other philosophers call it elementary fire? Or shall we from its containing the substance of light and fire, and from the extreme smallness of its parts, as passing through most bodies we are acquainted with, denominate it with Homberg and the chemists, the chemical sulphurous principle, which according to the doctrine of these gentlemen is universally disseminated? Whatever we call it, it seems certain that this power has many surprising properties, and cannot but be of great moment in the system of the universe."—This is by far the best and most sensible observation I have ever met with on electricity. The terra incognita or undetected part so long sought for unsuccessfully by Mr. Boyle, has fortunately been hit upon by Dr. Watson. The power called electrical (and to which insignificant term we are obliged to submit to through custom,) is indeed of the greatest moment in the system of the universe. This I have already demonstrated by several clear and convincing experiments. I would only here further observe, that this power or principle is of a truth everywhere, though unobserved, and that it is not then generated when made visible by experiments, any more than fire can be said to be generated from the collision of a flint and steel; for was there no fire within them, we might strike for ever, but not produce it.

CHAPTER VI.—Treating of the number Seven, and of the frequent mention of Fire, in the Scripture; showing also from whence the Fire shall come, that will cause the last conflagration, etc.

* * * Need we now any longer spend our time in conjecturing from whence the fire shall come, that shall cause the last conflagration? Some have supposed that it will come to pass by fire from heaven. Some that there is a central fire, and that it will burst from thence. And others that it is more likely to happen from a fiery comet. But all these are weak conjectures and cannot be supported. But experiments have now freed us from these perplexities; they discover and manifest to our senses such plenty of fire, that we know of no place, nor anything in which it is not to be found. The reason why we cannot discern it without the help of instruments is, because we are be not concurrent with that speaking : and that is the true breaking unto them that bread of life, without the eating of which, as he said himself, we have no life, and so also no real living knowledge of him.

21. That the first person he saw after his being raised from the dead was a woman, and even such a one as formerly had been possessed with seven devils ; in answerableness to the first Adam's process, who, immediately after his being awakened from the sleep, saw a woman besides him, even her that soon after, by her lust and the fulfilling thereof, opened a door for entrance to these seven devils into the humanity.

22. That in the last forty days of the second Adam, between his resurrection and ascension, during which time he showed himself alive, and spoke with his disciples concerning the things appertaining to the kingdom of God, the Turba, born or conceived in the first forty days of the first Adam, was wholly overcome, and the work of his redemption consummated.

Page 297. A. ult. This whole No. 1., concerning the hell in Christ's imperfect outward nature, I think might nearer and more properly be expressed thus—the hell in the human soul, which he took upon him for our sake, was its own fiery disharmonised nature, which he entered into (and it was a descent, because the light is of a superior nature to it), tintured and harmonised in his agony, and by shedding into it his inward immortal blood upon the cross. For by speaking only of Christ's imperfect outward nature, nothing more is denoted but what he had of this outward third principle ; whereas not this third, but the first broken off from the second, was the hell awakened in the human soul, which, by shedding his inward blood into it, was to be re-harmonised and turned again into paradise.

Page 301. A. i. Concerning that difficult place, 1 Pet. iii. 19., Behmen says nothing in particular ; but so much may be gathered from him in general, that the benefits of the work of redemption through Christ, being extended universally to the whole fallen humanity, he must needs have gone in spirit through all the regions, centres, mansions, prisons, or however else those many different places or states might be called, wherein any departed souls were detained. That his preaching to them was done after the manner and in the language, (if this may be called so,) in which the spirits do speak and communicate their mind to one another. And because, without doubt, there was a great diversity of those spirits that had been unbelievers in the days of Noah, this conquest of Satan, death, and hell, must needs have reached unto them also ; so that all of them that were but any way capable of grace and mercy (though all captivated under the powers of darkness), were made partakers thereof, each according to his own particular capacity.

Page 301. Q. 1. What do they say concerning Christ's resurrection, ascension, glorified body, and intercession in heaven ? Here, his sitting at the right hand of the Father, could fitly be inserted ; and then the question might be answered thus :

A. Of these five points they may say many great and weighty things, whereof in short the chiefest may be these following :—

1. That his resurrection was a springing up again of the paradisaical life out of death, so that all the properties thereof were perfectly chrysalised and harmonised, as they were in themselves on the outside of its covering. It is covered and hidden just as the soul or life is covered and hidden in the body. Now as we know of no part of the body in which the life is not present, so an electrical machine discovers to us that fire is everywhere as intimately mixed. By the help of this instrument we can look into the inside of nature and see the manner of its working. Sometimes I have been enabled to raise so much light by it, that this thought has struck me, 'Could the covering be removed, what a glorious shine would there be throughout the universe !'

And now a word to those persons, who, over-rating their understanding, often make themselves merry with the credulity of Christians, who believe that this world shall be burnt and purified by fire. To these faith is the evidence of things not seen. To you, who have no faith, conclusions drawn from the silly conjectures of weak men, are the ground and support of your unbelief. But will you believe your senses ? Will you let them determine the point ? Try experiments ! An electrical apparatus will convince you that fire may be collected in every place, which fire you will find to be the same as that which bursts from the clouds in lightning, the same as that which we make use of for all the ends and purposes of life. You will find too by receiving a smart shock from a charged jar, that there are powers in nature of which you had not the least idea. Now if you yourselves with the help of proper instruments can call forth the hidden fire and perform wonders with it, what shall not He do with it, who is its Creator, and who now rules and directs it ? You cannot, I think, therefore, after such discoveries as these, treat Christians with contempt for believing what has been revealed to them in that book, which they hold in the highest esteem, but which you look upon as a book of fictions.

But if my memory does not deceive me, I have read accounts of fire breaking forth in the body and consuming it, nothing of which was left, but just enough to convince the beholder that it was consumed by fire. Now why may not the internal fire of the world shake off its covering in the same manner. When God orders ["moves himself for the third time"], it will do so. The floor will then be thoroughly purged, the chaff and wheat will then be separated, that is, the good and bad, believers and unbelievers, will have a distinct abode ; one in an unquenchable fire without light, where the worm dieth not ; the other in a state of light and glory, where the fire has no such consuming destroying power, as we see it has here, but where it transmutes the life of all creatures into flames of love. You may conceive this from hence. Separate in your imagination the first four forms of nature (in chapter the second), from the three last. Now in these forms the creature (for such as nature is, such must be the creatures that are of it and in it), the creature, I say, can feel nothing but a continual strife of opposite powers contending with each other. This [root of nature] is the miserable state into which devils are fallen, and in which they are shut up in chains of darkness. Their first state of light and glory, which consisted of all the seven forms of eternal nature harmoniously working in one blessed, glorious union, they have changed for their present dark abode, that only consists of the opposing forms, always striving and contending with each other, and into which they can no more bring light than the extinguished taper can re-enlighten itself ; now this horrid, this beyond description miserable state, must be yours, if you die [without being regenerated in the essence of your soul, thereby] refusing the light of God.

2. That as his incarnation was an appearing in this four-elementary world, according to the fallen Adam's state and figure, so his resurrection was an appearing again in the paradisaical world according to the first Adam's primitive state, wherein he stood before his Eve.

3. That his resurrection was done in or by the power of his Father, and nevertheless also in or by his own power; according to the Scripture affirming this so well as that. The Father raised him up, is said in one place; and in another he saith himself, No man taketh my life away from me; I have power to lay it down, and to take it up again. Both which sayings are true, and easily reconcilable by his own words, saying, All what the Father hath is mine.

4. That his ascension after the last forty days, was a taking possession of that third angelical throne which Lucifer had lost; though as to this outward world, all his enemies are not yet put in subjection under him.

5. That he ascended into the central place of this principle, which is the place of the sun, from which Lucifer also was cast out; yet not to be considered as in this four-elementary world, but as in the inward world of pure light and glory, hid under the veil of this mixed out-birth.

6. That his sitting at the right hand of the Father is the exaltation of the humanity in his love above the wrath and anger of God, which before was kindled and predominant therein, and is now kept under. And that that place, or rather state, where the love subdueth the anger and generateth the paradise, is rightly called the right hand of God.

7. That by his sitting on this right hand, his now obtained rest, peace and establishment in the principle of light is to be understood, and that we are not to think of what we call a sitting in distinction from a standing; but that he sitteth in himself and standeth in himself, wanting no chair nor benches. His power is his seat.

8. That his glorified personal body, considered as to itself only, is still a creature, and continueth so for ever and ever; and that it hath a finite, visible, and measurable stature and figure, even that same which it had upon earth.

9. That the prints of the nails shall appear in this body to all eternity, and be more glorious than morning stars.

10. That he is in this body no more a man, that is, hath no more the marks of a male, but a perfect virgin image, as Adam was before his sleep, and as we all shall be after the general resurrection.

11. That this glorified body is in a far higher state of glory than ever the first Adam had in paradise, though the whole throne, or his whole mystical body of the Church is not yet brought unto perfection, nor yet capable of glorification.

12. That his intercession in heaven is not a particular act or doing, interrupted sometimes, and then begun again, as we might think that our various occasions upon earth would require; but a constant prevailing over and keeping under the powers of God's wrath; and always effectual, if we do not hinder it ourselves, by siding with the powers of the dark world, and making ourselves unworthy and incapable of his prevailing for us in the love and light. [Oh blessed consolation!]

Your soul in her present fallen state consists of no more than the four first forms of eternal nature; and the reason why you do not feel the misery of this wretched state is, because of the light and water of this world [in your animal flesh and blood, and outward nature] with which its [desire and] anguish is allayed and assuaged; but when death shall separate your soul from these, then will all the wretchedness of that horrible state be awakened in you.

You feel something of this even now under the cover of flesh and blood; all the uneasinesses that arise in your breast, every distressing thought, that disturbs your quiet, and take notice, discomposure as well as peace of mind arises from within, all I say issue from the state your soul is in; for were you in that state of rectitude, in which you foolishly suppose yourselves, you could not have an uneasy moment; nothing could possibly stir up the least anxiety within you. Whatever you feel therefore not right, is a proof to you of the non-rectitude of the state you are in. And if you cannot make that straight, which is now crooked, if you cannot alter nature and make it better whilst in this state, you have no certainty that it will be better in another. * * *

I will now attempt to explain what causes the shock we feel when electrified:—

By experiments the first and second, chapter the second, the eye has clear proof that there are in nature two powers diametrically opposite to each other; these powers never cease working after this manner, but the opposition brings forth another motion, viz. a whirling round; now whoever comes within the circle made by a chain or wire, between the bottom and top of a charged jar, will feel a shock or stroke as if a stander-by had struck him. This stroke manifestly comes to pass from the two contending powers; for passing contrary ways with such sudden swiftness and power through the body, they distend the vessels; which sudden and quick distention causes the sensation so much like an unexpected blow. But small animals, killed by electricity, show this beyond contradiction. Their vessels, being too tender to bear the power of the shock, immediately burst.

I conclude with imparting the invention of a planetarium, which curiously shows the motions of the planets:—

I have a round table, the diameter of which is near three feet, the height twenty inches; on the middle of this table, I place a round well polished plate of pewter, of the diameter of eighteen inches; on this plate I place six orbits of brass, but fastened to one another, and in such a manner, that six glass balls, of about three quarters of an inch diameter, can easily run between the orbits. Under the edge of the outside orbit, I put four supporters of sealing-wax, to raise the orbits above the pewter plate, so that the glass balls may just touch the inside edges of the orbits, and may have nothing to hinder their revolving. Over the orbits, about the distance of two feet, I suspend a copper globe gilded, of about nine inches diameter, to represent the sun, from this I fasten to one of the orbits a wire, as small as a hair, then by means of another small wire, reaching from the conductor to the gilded globe, I communicate the fire to it; from the globe it passes by the wire to the orbits, and from the orbits to the balls, which being caught between the contending powers are put in motion and driven round swiftly between the orbits. But at the same time that they run between the orbits, they also revolve on their axis, so that two motions are communicated to them and besides this, one half of the balls is illuminated.

Page 301. Q. 2. How do they conceive of the union of the Godhead to the humanity? A. As of an union between the soul and spirit. Not that they would compare the Godhead in Christ to the spirit of man, and his humanity to the soul; but only to say thereby so much, that as the union of these two makes up one only perfect intellectual being, which by neither of them alone can be made up, so the union of the Godhead to the humanity makes up one only personal second Adam and mediator between God and man, which cannot be made up by either of them alone. Man was wandered out from the love of God, and there was a real separation made between them: a real reconciliation and reunion, therefore, was needful, if man should not be lost for ever. But seeing that in man there was no power to reconcile and unite himself to God again, God therefore, not as Father (because men belonged unto the Father already, and were fallen moreover into the Father's fiery centre), but as Son (because he is the Father's light and love, which man stood in great need of after his fall), must unite himself to the humanity, not only to reconcile his children to the light world by his sufferings and death, but also for to be himself their head and king, etc.: all which required such a personal union of the Godhead to the humanity, as we may conceive between the spirit, soul, and body.

Page 301. Q. 3. Seeing the Divine essence is everywhere alike, wherein lies the difference of its union with Christ, from its union with any other man or creature? A. It is true that the Divine essence is everywhere alike, but only in itself, without a respect to man or other creatures; for with respect to them, it is notorious that it is not everywhere alike, that is, not in all of them equally manifest, nor communicating itself unto all of them in the same manner and degree: or else all men should be alike in knowledge, sanctification, glory, etc., and no different degrees between them could be found. That therefore there is and must be a difference, cannot but be plain; and that this difference lieth chiefly herein, that this union is a personal union, is evident also: for the God-man, Jesus Christ, is one individual person, and a person in the Holy Trinity, nay, the only person, seeing that without him we cannot conceive of another person in the Trinity, according to the common notion we have of this name. But such a thing cannot be said of any other man, though never so highly united unto God. Another difference the Scripture sheweth us, by saying that in him the fullness of the Godhead dwelleth, and that in him all the treasures of wisdom lie: which cannot be said of any other, angel or man, but all have only their particular gifts, according to the measure of their capacities, and as their different offices and stations do require.

In the places quoted out of the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, Behmen sets forth, not only man's being made, in and by the regeneration, one with God and Christ, according to the Scripture, He that cleaves unto the Lord is made one spirit with him; but also man's being nevertheless eternally distinct from God and under Christ, and that the union of the Godhead to the humanity of Christ is much higher for ever than the union thereof to any other man. So for instance, Ch. xlvii. 18., he says indeed, that in the perfect resignation Christ and man are wholly one (which he explains intelligibly enough, and truly, so that no true Christian can stumble at his expressions); but he adds also, that nevertheless no man can say, I am Christ, but only, I am his member, his branch, his dwelling-house, etc.; because the union of the Godhead to his humanity imports that the seven properties of rec-

But could the machine in this experiment be kept out of sight, the beholders would be greatly astonished; but whilst they see the apparatus, they are apt to conclude, that that is the cause, whereas the machine is only instrumental. The hidden powers of nature are the cause, which are clearly shown by this experiment, and made more easy to be comprehended. For here a man will naturally ask himself, what is the power that puts the balls in motion, and what is the light that illuminates them?

But I must here give a caution to inform the reader, if he has an inclination to try this curious experiment, that unless he warms the pewter plate, before he begins, his labour will be in vain. The want of knowing this, cost me much fruitless trouble. Some persons, from making one and sometimes two balls revolve, had positively, but erroneously asserted, that they could make many; but I found no such thing; and others, who attempted to make more revolve, have candidly confessed to me their inability. At first I thought it was owing to the want of more fire, or that this was wrong, or that not right, till at last warming the plate, I succeeded according to my wish.

The glass balls I found condensed the air upon their surface, and became moist, by which means the fire escaped; but when the plate was warmed, this counteracted the condensing power of the glass, and then the balls revolved with very little fire. But care must be taken, that the balls are not heavier, in one part than in another. * * *

Thus much from the publication of the Rev. Mr. Symes, which may be considered an enlargement of the 'Letter' in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' of April, 1762, and originated by the treatise of Freke, and which is here inserted as affording a further and immediate insight into the material relationship of Mr. Law's writings to the modern science of electricity and its developments.

After these extracts, and the references therein, and heretofore made to the authors who wrote upon the science in its infancy, as also to the treatises of Behmen, wherein it lies couched and apparent to the understanding eye, it will be needless on the present occasion to attempt a full or further resolution of the point in question; but it may suffice to direct the ingenious reader who shall feel interested therein, how to pursue the inquiry. Wherefore, such an one, having as the groundwork, a familiar acquaintance with the principles of Law and Behmen, (to which so lucid an introduction is afforded in the present treatise, and without which he will be unqualified to pursue such a research,) is now recommended to the perusal of Lovett's very interesting work, the 'Electrical Philosopher,' 8vo. 1774, also his 'Philosophical Essays,' 8vo. 1766, and the writings of the authors referred to in those treatises. And the result will doubtless be, a conviction similar to that experienced by the writer of these lines, that the philosophical discoveries of the last century, in connection with the above mentioned branch of science, are to be traced for their source to the work of Mr. Law now under consideration, namely, the 'Appeal,' with his other described concomitant writings.

Before closing this subject, however, in respect of the peculiar character of the present memorial, may be proper to insert a few so to speak reconciliatory remarks upon the contentions that existed between writers of that age and century, relative to the then recently propounded philosophy of Newton; that is to say, between the materialists or material caustists, and the pure metaphysicians, and tified and reharmonised nature (which in that discourse of his are the fountain of eternal living water, that was stopped in the humanity, by the fallen souls' essences, but digged again by Christ's suffering and death) are his, as his natural due and right, he having bought and paid a great price for them; as Behmen in the following figure of Abraham's buying the twofold pit for a burying place for Sarah excellently declareth. When contrariwise, the union of the Godhead to the humanity of any other man, imports only so much that these re-harmonised properties are his by free gift and grace of the giver. Chapter li. 7, the author doth not declare directly the difference between the union of the Godhead with Christ and with a Christian, but rather only the difference between our human soul and the Deity, showing that notwithstanding they come to be united, yet that is never changed into this: which he doth by several similitudes, but chiefly and most intelligibly by that of a piece of iron, made all fiery by its union with the fire, and yet never changed into fire, but keeping always its own iron nature, dark, gross, and obscure in itself, as soon as it is taken out of the fire. Chapter lxx. 60, he says something of the union of Christ with a Christian, to the same purpose as he did before; and then also of a difference which is for ever between Christ and all his members, whereby, also, the difference of the union of the Godhead with Christ, from its union with a Christian, doth manifestly though but in part appear. The occasion of this discourse is the figure of Joseph's eating a part, and his brethren eating a part, and the Egyptians eating a part also. And this figure he declareth by showing, that the God-man, Jesus Christ, hath a food which no other man can feed upon, according to his own words to his disciples, I have food which you know nothing of. And here he says the heathen woman's faith was his food. Truly, there is in this expression no difficulty at all; for he understandeth his delightful taking in, and being well pleased with man's faith, prayers, and praises; explaining himself in another place, that it is like as when a lover of music entertains himself delightfully with a melodious tune, feeding as it were his mind and senses upon the outward harmony which is so agreeable to his own inward harmonious constitution. Certain it is, that such a lover of music may be as much delighted in hearing a harmonious song, as another in eating and drinking the most delicious things; and as these do satisfy his fast and belly, so that doth the ear and mind. It is not therefore so quite impertinent to say he feeds upon it, especially here in such deep spiritual matters, where we cannot but take our expressions from sensible things. That our faith, prayers, and praises are due to Jesus Christ, is unquestionable; that they are not arbitrarily offered unto him, but necessarily, so that it is impossible by an internal impossibility, that his redeemed ones should not believe and trust in him during this time, and praise and give him thanks to all eternity, is unquestionable also; and that he is well pleased and delighted to receive and take in these offerings, nay, caused also thereby to show forth more of grace and mercy in this time, and of the wonders and riches of his love, wisdom and glory in eternity, is no less unquestionable also. Well, then, may we say, in a human manner of expression, he feedeth upon these things, no less than we feed upon his grace and mercy. And this even the more, because we can say, that as our feeding upon his grace and mercy preserveth our being his redeemed people, so his feeding upon our prayers and praises preserveth his being our merciful Father, Head, and King. For he cannot continue so to us, if we do a third class, embracing substantially some of the principles of both the others, though expressing their sense under new and more specific terms, derived from the electrical discoveries. The first of which may be considered to be represented by the general Newtonian admirers and mathematicians; the second, amongst other earlier and more famous names, by Lord Monbodo, as evidenced in the early volumes of his 'Ancient Metaphysics'—a work, which, notwithstanding the absurdities of many of the views contained therein (especially when examined by the brilliant light of Law's 'Letter on Warburton's Legend'), is, on account of the classic dignity of its diction, and its most interesting general subject matter, well deserving of perusal; and the latter by Jones, Lovett, and others. Each of whom, though pretending to have proved their respective cases, and confuted their opponents, must be said to have stood, though in varied positions, at about the same relative distance from the full truth, as also oftentimes to have been contending for, in effect, the same thing. Many have been the opponents and defenders of the conceived philosophical theories of Newton; but it is very manifest that the disputants were, perhaps without exception, unenlightened in the true mystery of nature.

Indeed, what Law observes concerning modern metaphysics (see extract, page 68—70, of this treatise), is equally applicable to the current philosophy of all these last ages, whether of the metaphysical or material school; and to none perhaps more than to that of our own day, if the 'History of Philosophy,' 4 vols. 12mo. 1845, is to be received as indicative of the character of the existing metaphysical science. This classification, however, is not to be understood as embracing Sir Isaac personally, who, as already intimated, well knew the true and deep ground of things, as set forth in Behmen; neither of course the ancient metaphysics of Cudworth, and the orthodox philosophers of antiquity—those prodigies of science and wisdom, derived indeed, originally, and transmitted down to them in direct channels, from the selfsame magical, cabalistical, pure source or fountain, which was re-opened in such transcendent freshness and fulness in the Teutonic theosopher. By whose writings, it may be here stated, the writer is not without his suspicions, that Cudworth was assisted in his profound and just contemplations of universal truth; one of the similes he makes use of in illustrating his argument in the 'Eternal and Immutable Morality,' Book iv. Chap. ii. 2—4, though expressed in his own style, being seemingly taken from the notable scheme of the 'Wonder-Eye,' in Behmen's 'Forty Questions of the Soul.'

However, it will be found, on a careful examination of Sir Isaac's words, that he does not state anything positively concerning the cause of the planetary motion; and it is only by inference and deduction from his manner of reasoning concerning their motion, that his students suppose he believed their motion to be produced by bodily impulse. And the reason of his affected and cautious mode of speaking in this respect, was doubtless, as conjectured by Law, that if he had ventured to refer to a 'poor illiterate enthusiast,' as the world considered Behmen, for the true philosophy of the universe, or had endeavoured to account mystically for the motions of the celestial bodies (mechanical physics and the philosophy of mind being then as now-a-days considered so perfectly distinct and unconnected), he would most probably have exposed himself and his system to certain rejection, if not contempt. He, therefore, artfully gilded his pill, by expressing himself in such a way not continue so to him; and if he had not a redeemed people that praised and owned him to be their head and king, he could not have the being of a redeemer, nor the character of a king over a restored humanity. So also says Behmen rightly in another place, that the praises, songs, and voices of angels and men, are a food of the holy fire; where certainly he doth not mean, that this fire wants such a food for the preservation of its own being in itself, or that it was not a holy burning fire before the creation of angels; but only, that it is preserved in its being unto them, that which it was unto them from their creation. For if they all did fall away from their obedience and attendance to that holy fire, this would indeed not cease to be in itself what it is, but it would cease to be to them, what it is to them as long as they continue in their duty. And what shall we say of the Jewish meat and drink offerings? We know God has declared, he doth not eat the flesh of bulls, nor drink the blood of goats; but nevertheless may we not say with the Scripture, (1.) that there was in those meat and drink offerings something which God expressly required of them that offered them. (2.) That this was faith, prayers, praises, thanksgivings, etc. PSALM I. (3.) That God delighted to eat these offerings, in that same sense in which the Scripture saith, the Lord smelled a sweet savour in Noah's sacrifice. This certainly was not the smoke of the burned beasts, but that which arose from Noah's soul and spirit; for the Lord took it in, was delighted therein, and so moved thereby, that he said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground. What reason then can be given for which the expression of eating should be more offensive than that of smelling, when both are referred to the same thing, and taken in the same sense? If then now faith, prayers, praises, etc., are not to be offered unto any man, but only unto God and Jesus Christ, as he is God and man (which that new song in the Revelation demonstrateth sufficiently), it is self-evident that the union of the Godhead to Christ imports much more, and is much higher than the union of the same to any of his members; and that all will be found concentrated in what was said above, viz., that the difference lieth chiefly herein, that this union is a personal union.

Page 301. Q. ult. How is the second person in the Trinity more united to the human nature, than the Father and the Holy Ghost? A. So as the light is more united to the light-world than the fire; for though we are not to think of any division or separation, yet from the light immediately, not from the fire, the light-world hath its name and properties. The Father is a consuming fire, and the Son his light and love. Now Adam was not fallen away from the Father's property, and wanted in his fallen state no fire, having awakened in himself the Father's fiery property. But from the Son's property of light and love he fell away, and this he wanted. The Son, therefore, not the Father, must have united himself personally to the humanity, that so the same, through the Son, might be reconciled to the Father. But that the Father is here not excluded, is evident sufficiently in that he sent the Son. If we then have no access to the Father but through the Son, whom he hath sent; he that is sent, and through whom, as through a way, medium, or mediator, we come to the Father, must be more or nearer united to us, than he that sent him, and whom we come unto through the Son. That which was disappeared and lost in Adam's fall, was that life and light which he had out of the light-world. Now, this life and light of man was in the Son, or, as Saint John saith, in the Word; that is, in him from whom the light-world hath its name and being. Un-as to allow it to be inferred that he maintained the motions and laws of the universe to flow from material causes; and this with the less hesitation, as knowing that, in regard to the essential point of mathematical calculations, it was the same thing whether his first principles were only hypothetical, or real; for the operation would go on as smoothly, and the conclusion come out as readily, in the one case as in the other.

"For supposing the planets to be moved by mind [or spirit], would not the same laws of their motion take place? Would not their 'fall from the tangent' be the same? Would not their velocity in the different parts of their orbits be as the perpendiculars to these tangents inversely? Would not a line drawn from the centre to the body in motion describe spaces in proportion to the times? Would not Kepler's discovery, that the cubes of the distances from the centre are as the squares of the periodical times, be equally true and deducible, by necessary consequence, from the laws of the motion. * * * But to have recourse to a projectile force, and assume it as an axiom, is assuredly the most violent paradox ever advanced by any philosopher."

But, to sum up these observations, would the reader desire to obtain a just apprehension of the truth of things, and by consequence a full view of the nature, imperfections and deficiencies of all the popular systems of philosophy, he must, in the first place, learn to understand the 'three principles of the Divine manifestation.' Without this, however learned he may be, either in philosophy or divinity, he will conceive of nature and divine truth but as the blind do of colours. Secondly, he will then apprehend how body is, in all worlds, the manifestation of spirit; and that nothing lives or moves in all the universe but spirit alone. Thirdly, he will understand what the dead and living materiality of this world is, and how originated. Fourthly, he will then understand what the elastic medium of unexcited electricity is, namely, the womb or ground of the four elements, and of all temporal creatural life and materiality; as of paradise itself. See particularly, Behmen's xlviii. Epistle and Table, Germ. ed. of his works, 12mo., 1730. [This may be symbolised by a triangle, round the angles of which, with the sides as the radii, are described circles; but when it is flown out into full manifestation, by a double triangle in a hexagon, from the centre of which, and intersecting each of its angles, and also around them, seven circles of equal magnitude are described.] Fifthly, that this elastic medium of electricity is the power-body of the metaphysician's favourite term, mind, that is, of the desire of nature, so copiously explained in the preceding pages; which again is the body of the divine lubitus to creation, perpetually issuing through and of the wisdom and word of the abyssal, supernatural Deity, who thus 'sustaineth all things by the word of his power.' Such were the key wherewith the reader might unlock the treasury of all authors, extracting therefrom what is just and solid, at the same time rejecting all that is fictitious and valueless. And such was, in some degree, the science which indicted that inestimable, though little appreciated work of Cudworth, just referred to, of 'Eternal and Immutable Morality'; which, however heavily expressed, belongs to the same superior category of wisdom as the treatise under notice, the 'Appeal,' and 'Case of Reason,' not to omit here a favourable notice of Dean Sherlock's strong practical wisdom, in his 'Immortality of the Soul.' [Note.—It were much to be desired that the remainder of Cudworth's MS. writings should be examined by competent judges, and such of them as to this life and light therefore, he must have united in whom it was, so as to make up by his union with it, such a perfect, substantial human person as that first was, which had lost its life and light, that so this life and light might be brought into the human nature again, and the humanity might be restored into the light-world. As, therefore, the light is more united to the light-world than the fire; so the Son also is more united to the life and light in the humanity, and so to the human nature, than the Father. Concerning the Holy Ghost, the same could be shewn also in like manner; and all may be found contained in the words of our Lord, saying, Father, the men were thine, and thou gavest them me, and I give unto them eternal life.

Page 303. No. 2. God hath no consultation within himself, etc. Though this may be sufficient for such as do understand Behmen's ground, yet it is not so for others; for it is only an assertion without a reason or demonstration thereof. Wherefore, then, I think the reason which Behmen giveth might well be added, viz. If God (here considered [N.B.] as in himself only, without any will towards nature and creature), had a consultation within himself, there must be something before, behind, or besides him, about which he consulted; there must be a cause moving him to this consultation, and a beginning thereof; there must also be thoughts and a variety of different conceptions in him, making such, or such images and representations of things, and comparisons of this method with that, until such a one were found out, as in which this or that could best be performed, etc. But now, he being in himself alone an universal all, will, power, sufficiency, ground, beginning, and end of all things, without any alteration, no such thing hath any place in him. This reason, I think, is the more needful to be added, and as significantly as possible to be expressed, because it is certain that if this be not well understood and minded, there can never be a true apprehension of Behmen's sense.

Page 303. No. 4. God, as manifested, eternally willed or purposed, and eternally generated a root of evil. This position is not consistent with Behmen, and though there is added immediately, which being good in itself, etc. yet this cannot rectify what is amiss therein. For God, not as manifested, but as manifesting himself, or in the very beginning of his manifesting himself through nature, generated, indeed, that which afterwards became the evil of punishment, but he never willed nor purposed that it should be so. In this eternal manifestation through nature, something was generated, wherein and whereby he shewed himself afterwards, in the creation, a loving God and father to the works of his hands. Why, then, not also something wherein and whereby he might shew himself an angry, just, and zealous God upon their wilful disobedience? Doth not justice become him so well as mercy? (When yet we do not say that this latter was generated from such a purpose, or directly to that end; but we can give another substantial reason why it must have been generated so as it was.) But now he willed indeed, or purposed, that all his intellectual creatures should love and praise him, and to that end he created them all into the light-world, wherein his love and glory are manifest. But he never willed nor purposed that any of them should leave his habitation in the light, and fall into that deep pit or ground of his manifestation, wherein his wrath in justice must needs be manifest in and to such a fallen creature. How then can we say or think that he willed or purposed, and eternally generated a root of evil? He generated that inferior part were found to be demanded by the public exigency, printed. This would be a suitable occupation for the qualified candidate for the proposed biography of Law, and editor of a new edition of the works of Behmen, Freher, and Law, etc. The world has well nigh run the circle of wisdom, as to the scope and truth of the Christian religion, and the nature and design of the whole system of created things; what is wanted, is only that the rubbish be cleared away from all the points forming the circumferential line, and it be made fully manifest in its true distinctiveness, harmonious unity, and perfection.]

With these intimations of the artificial, one-sided character, and imperfection of all the prevailing systems of philosophy, and that Newton's real sentiments, as also his ground, and that of the orthodox philosophers, have been but little understood; and how, without a knowledge of the principles of Behmen, all disputation upon metaphysical topics is but a mere chameleon controversy, or fighting in the dark—having thus placed the subject in a right point of vision for further consideration in the proposed comprehensive and philosophical memorial (which is all that is required in the present work), we now close our notice of the 'Appeal,' and return to Mr. Law's personal narrative.

Previously, however, in connection with these remarks and in illustration of what has been observed (page 404), touching the distinguishing characteristics of the latter series of Mr. Law's writings, it may not be inappropriate to insert the following letter, (notwithstanding what has been introduced of a similar purport, at the foot of the note of page 372,) the contents of which will, not improbably, meet with a lively response in the experience of many of its future readers. It was addressed originally to Mr. John Payne, the editor of a new edition of 'Kempis,' and of a 'Letter to Bishop Warburton' in defence of Mr. Law's character and writings, which had been ignobly aspersed shortly after his decease, by that prelate and author:—

"Philadelphia, Dec. 18th. 1767.—My dear sir,—I thank you sincerely for your kind and affectionate letter. I had almost given over my expectation of the favour, but was determined to venture one letter more to extort, if possible, an answer from you. Since I had the pleasure of reading your 'Kempis,' your 'Discourses,' and excellent 'Answer to Warburton,' I determined to push as far as modesty would permit, for a correspondence with you. Your letter, therefore, was in every respect favourable to my wishes; and I flatter myself that I shall be indulged with a continuance of your favours. My heart has for some years been deeply sensible of a fallen state, and I long groaned for deliverance from the bondage of my earthly life. I saw clearly that physical and moral evil were predominant in the present state of things, and that the whole human race were involved in a situation which I could not reconcile with the wisdom, goodness, and justice of God in creating them. The Christian religion seemed to me covered with darkness and difficulty; I read most of the deistical writers, and most of the answers to them. I was sometimes a deist and sometimes a Christian. I never could understand the doctrine of the trinity; and had an irreconcilable aversion to the systematical notion of atonement and satisfaction. A wrathful God, whose anger could only be appeased by the blood of his own Son, poured out in behalf of sinners, always appeared to me next to blasphemous. And I have often thought that the onion of Egypt was a better deity of nature, without which the superior part thereof could not consist; and these two he united, so that the former was hid under the latter, but never willed that the creature should break this union. Wherefore, then, I think that this position might be thus expressed—God in his eternal manifestation through nature, generated such properties as became accidentally the evil of punishment to the creature, upon its own, etc.

Page 302. This other question is proposed, belonging hereunto, But how will you avoid the consequences charged upon the reprobatis, if you assert that God, etc. A. If Behmen asserts that God as manifested, or God's eternal nature, or his formed word in eternal nature, did will and generate evil, it will be true that the consequences charged upon the reprobatis cannot be avoided. But if it can be made out, that no such thing is asserted by Behmen, then no such question can be proposed. And seeing this question thus proposed, depends only upon the next preceding erroneous position, No. 4. viz., God as manifested, eternally willed or purposed, and eternally generated a root of evil, which position is justly denied and rectified; this question, therefore, would not want any further answer, if Behmen's ELECTION, Ch. vi. 82, etc., were not quoted, and the expression of a formed word were not to be cleared up: so that it may be evidenced demonstratively, that by Behmen no such thing as this question mentioneth is asserted. Let us see then what he says, Ch. vi. 82, etc. I cannot find (and I am sure it cannot be found in any other place throughout all his writings) that he says, God as manifested, or God's eternal nature, or his formed word in eternal nature, did will and generate evil. This latter, it is true, he says in almost such words, but in no such sense as could give forth those consequences that are charged upon the reprobatis, which shall be evidenced by and bye. His own words relating to this matter are these—In whatsoever hath severed itself into the good, therein he willeth the good; and in whatsoever hath separated itself into the evil, therein he willeth the evil; as the Scripture says, Such as the people is, such a god they have. These words he explaineth according to his gift in these positions and expressions following—All beginnings, decrees, and predeterminate purposes arise in the formed word through nature. All evil proceeds from and out of nature and creature. The hardening in nature and creature originateth in the science or root of the creaturely self, so that if it turn itself into the wrath of nature, then it is laid hold on and hardened therein. All that where it is written, He hardeneth their hearts, etc., is performed and effected in the formed word of the eternal and temporary nature. Now let us in the first place inquire, what is that which he calleth the formed word. He answers himself, in this same paragraph 85, that it is the creation and creature. And so sometimes he understandeth thereby the whole creation in general; sometimes the angels in particular; and sometimes also man, according to the subject matter of his discourse. Here it is man; as he says expressly, vi. 104, Adam is the out-spoken, formed, creaturely word, and in this (not without, but in this) formed word, evil is willed and generated. But how, by whose instinct or direction, and by what means? Hath God, as manifested, willed evil, and that he might execute his will, put such a will to evil into this formed word? or hath he generated evil through the same, as through or by his instrument? No; God forbid. Hath God's eternal nature willed, and hath this generated evil in this formed word? No; far be this also. Hath then this formed word itself willed and generated evil? Yes; but not in that sense wherein this expression might be taken and is taken in this question, and which could bring forth such consequences as are charged upon the reprobatis. Well, what is then the meaning of this expression? A. This is the meaning: this formed word, viz., Adam, not as it was formed by God, in, as here is said, or out of, as it might be said better, but as it departed from that formation, or in its departing from the order of eternal nature, willed and generated evil. Out of what root, and by what means? A. Out of the root of his own free will, and by means of his own misusing the same. And that this is the only original of evil, and the efficient cause thereof, is Behmen's constant doctrine, and was rightly asserted so in the last words of the fourth position. If then not God, nor eternal nature, but only man, misusing his free will (which in the science or root of the creaturely self [N.B.] is prior or antecedent to the acts and deeds of his own formed human nature,) hath willed and generated evil, contrary to the will of God, and contrary to the order of nature, what consequence can be drawn forth from hence, and charged either upon God or his eternal nature? Truly, the sun cannot be clearer nor more blameless than this assertion is. If any would object, and say, If God had not given man a free will, he could not have misused it; and therefore, the giver is the cause of that mischief which is done by this misuse, I think he would not be worthy of being answered any further (though Behmen hath answered sufficiently), than by telling him the words of the Scripture, Woe unto him that says unto his Maker, Why hast thou made me so? But here will now be asked, Why then saith Behmen so expressly, All evil proceeds from and out of nature and creature? Is not this to charge nature as well as creature? and what nature, if not God's eternal nature, out of which man was created? A. No such thing; Behmen says right and well, and doth than such a one, and yet I could meet with no christian writer who did not [in effect, however the grossness of the idea was softened down under the term of vindictive justice,] make this monstrous tenet the very basis of his whole system. Providence at length brought me acquainted with Mr. Law's writings; and here the grand desideratum was found. His 'Address to the Clergy' was the first of his books that fell into my hands. I took it up with much prejudice in my mind against the author, whom I had always heard spoken of as an enthusiast. But I had not read half the pamphlet before my heart was visited with such sensations as I never felt before. My mind, which had hitherto been unsettled, dark, doubting, and yet anxious to find the truth, became serene, calm, and sweetly composed. I seemed as if I had got into another world, with a new set of ideas, notions, and sensibilities. I was happy beyond expression. I had found my God; I had found my Redeemer; I had found the origin and source of my disorder, and the only means of consolation and a perfect cure. Since this blessed period, all my doubts and difficulties have left me. I see plainly that there is no other road to heaven, but that which was trod by Jesus Christ himself; the same process must every individual of our fallen race pass through, before we can ascend with him to the heaven of heavens—a painful process, it is true;—self-denial, mortification, total contempt of the world, and death of the outward life, accompanied by earnest and continual prayer, are the only method by which we are to be divested of our fallen, and clothed with our redeemed life. The purifying fire light and spirit of heaven must consume the animal nature, and change it into a cloud of glory, a white robe, and a house not built with hands. This new body can only be imparted to not contradict by this saying, that which was said above, viz., that all evil proceeds out of man's misusing his free will. An hundred places of his can plainly show, his meaning is, not that evil lay in eternal nature, much less that God hath laid it therein, and willed or purposed that man should bring it forth thereout, as he may bring forth the poison out of an adder, wherein it lay before; but rather, that man brought the evil into his own nature, out of his own will. God's eternal nature is all order, regularity, and harmony; and so was man's formed nature also: no evil lay neither in this nor in that. But in man's free will lay the possibility of misusing it; which also was not evil, and would never have been evil (for it was essential to the will's freedom) if it had not went out into an act of misusing. This free will, in its deepest root is naturally antecedent (as mentioned above) to the acts or workings of man's nature. When therefore this got the first insensible disposition to turn away from the regularity and harmony of God's eternal, and his own formed nature, the evil was conceived in the womb of that free will. This turning consequently broke the order of nature, and made it all irregular; and then in this now broken nature, the evil was generated, and went forth in act and deed. And so it was introduced into nature, and nevertheless proceedeth also now out of nature. Not therefore can man's formed nature (and much less God's eternal nature) be charged with being the original of evil; but only man, or the creature Lucifer before man, must be charged with having misused his free will, and disturbed the order of nature: which disturbance is itself the chief evil, and lay not before in nature, which never would have broken nor disturbed itself. And therefore, to show that no evil proceeds from God, Behmen joineth nature and creature together, and saith it proceeds from them. Not from nature, as it is regular and harmonious in God and holy angels, and as it was in man; as if this had any evil in it, and were or could be an original of evil (for the free will is deeper and prior than all the acts of nature), but from nature, as it is now turned upside down, by man's misusing his free will. If, then, man's own nature, before its being disordered, cannot be charged with an evil intent or purpose, how much less can God's eternal nature be charged with such an evil thing?

This, I think, is clear enough to answer the question, concerning the consequences charged upon the Reprobates. But there is yet something behind, viz. these words of Behmen, In whatsoever hath separated itself into the evil, therein he willeth the evil: which will still be a stumbling-block to them that do not understand, according to Behmen's gift and declaration, what God is; but always imagine and frame, as he saith, some strange thing and afar off, when they will speak of God. To represent, therefore, his sense intelligibly unto such, will be the most difficult, if not an impossible thing. Yet I will, in the name of God, endeavour to do something, for brevity's sake in these following positions: I conceive with Behmen, and know it is his mind,

1. That God is love: and that this definition, given us by the Spirit of love in St. JOHN, is the most beneficial, and the only sufficient one to a true christian; who, in all his way homeward to his Father, whereupon he shall meet with many trials, is to own, to adore, and to worship in spirit and in truth, no other God but love.

2. That, notwithstanding this definition, there are many things not attributable to love, and yet attributed unto God, in plain expressions of the Scripture.

3. That therefore, only for our own better apprehension's sake, we may use the name, God, when we speak of our only adorable good, which is love. And when we meet with anything different from, inconsistent with, or contrary to the properties of love and light, we may use either that of universal being, or also that of wrath and fire, according to the exigency and different conditions of the subject matter.

4. That this distinction, between God and universal Being, or between light and fire, love and wrath, as it was not before, nor also in the creation of angels, but came in only by their fall; so it doth not make a division in God the universal Being, but is only to be referred to the division made in the creatures: but is nevertheless attributable to God so far, as the creature's being necessarily dependeth upon God's being, as further shall appear. Attributable, I say, because it is actually attributed unto him in the Scripture, calling him in plain words, not only light and love, but also a consuming fire.

5. That in God, as he is love, all his obedient creatures do live, and move, and have their being: but that a creature may rebel against God, that is against love, and may cease to live and move, and have its being in God, that is, in love.

6. That no creature, though rebellious, may cease to live, and move, and have its being in God, that is, in the universal Being.

7. That if the creature ceaseth to live, and move, and have its being in love, which is its heaven, it must needs at the same instant begin to live, and move, and have its being in wrath, which is its hell.

us, by an emanation from the heavenly flesh, and blood of Jesus, [our incarnate Redeemer, the 'engrafted word,'] and thus alone it is that he atones, and satisfies, and appeases a wrath in us [our disharmonized, sinful nature], and not in the everblessed God of love. [See also text of p. 432.]

I have taken the liberty to lay my sentiments in this short, confused manner before you, that you might see whether they correspond with your own, and how far the mystical writers have contributed to satisfy my mind, by directing me to a right pursuit of truth. I had all the advantages of a liberal education, that this country and England together could afford, having begun my studies at the college in this city, and finished them in the usual way at Clare Hall, in the university of Cambridge. I was always dissatisfied with the philosophy of our schools, and the metaphysics, though a favourite study, appeared to me quite superficial in the way they are commonly taught. I now see in what points they failed, and how far short they stopped in their inquiries after the truth. They had no ground and bottom to stand upon, and in metaphysics as well as divinity, they greatly erred in the very first setting off. For what true philosophy or sound divinity could be expected from two such senseless and absurd opinions as are universally maintained in all the modern systems, viz., a world created out of nothing, and a wrathful God. But I will say no more.

Have you seen the POOL OF QUALITY? I met with it by accident, and was charmed with it. The writer, I think, has somewhat in view much deeper than he has yet disclosed. Is he not a mystic? [The 'Fragment' inserted in the note of p. 412 is by him, and not improbably, was composed for that work, along with the other matter of a similar character contained therein, though an occasion

8. That God is in hell as well as in heaven, which the Scripture tells us expressly; and that from this expression it is evident, that the name, God, is taken in different significations in the Scripture. For God, according to St. John's definition, is not in hell, because love cannot be in hell, as wrath cannot be in heaven. If, then, nevertheless, the words of the scripture, Psalm cxxxix. 8, are true, telling us God is in hell, he must be there as he is an universal Being, or as Behmen declares it, He is manifest in hell as well as in heaven, yet not in the same manner of manifestation, but in each according to its state; so that in heaven is his love, and in hell his wrath.

9. That all the evil spirits have forsaken God, are departed and broken off from God, and have left their first habitation in God, that is, in the love and light.

10. That the evil spirits are not departed, nor can be broken off from God, that is, from the universal Being; and can never leave their habitation, or their living, moving, and having their being therein. But that they are still in God, though not in his love and light, and he is still in them, but not so as he was in them at their first creation.

11. That therefore, there is still a band between God and the evil spirits; yet not that band of perfection which is love, but an indissoluble band, tying and keeping them together, and consisting herein, that their created being so depends upon God's universal Being, that it could not be a being, even not for one moment, if God's being should or could withdraw from them.

12. That this band is that which keepeth them still in subjection, so that they must be obedient even against their will, and without their knowledge; and must do by constraint his will according to that world which they are fallen into, even that will of his which is manifest in the wrath: which wrathful will they have made themselves subjects and slaves unto, by departing from the freedom of the sons of God.

13. That this band imports a manifestation of God, the universal Being in them, and an influencing them with what they have made themselves capable of. So that it is a principle-truth, in what intellectual creature soever God is not manifest, and not influencing it according to his love, in the same he must be manifest and influencing it according to his wrath. Because they cannot be broken off from his universal being, but must live, and move, and have their Being, either in his love, or in his wrath.

14. That love and wrath were not both manifest before, nor also in the creation of angels; but only love. And that therefore, the wrath had then no will nor power, except in potentia, and upon the supposition of being stirred up by the creature; for it never would nor could have raised up itself. But that now, after its being raised up in and by the creature, it hath a will as well as love, and a power of influencing into whatsoever it can reach.

15. That this raising up the wrath, and making it have a will and power, did not rend the will of love into two, nor make two contrary wills in God, the only good; but did only in the formed word of God, or in the creature, open as it were a twofold door and way, in which that only will of God which he had in the creation, viz., that he will be glorified in his creatures, is now in a twofold manner, and in two contrary worlds performed: he being now glorified not only in the salvation of his children, but also in the destruction of his enemies, according to plain expressions of the Scripture.

16. That this twofold opened door, not having been so opened by God, nor decreed and pre-determined by him that it should be opened by the creature, doth evidence sufficiently, That God was not manifest, and had no will in the wrath, before and in the creation of angels; nor ever willed and purposed to be manifest, and to have a will therein: for so he would have willed or purposed that his own will should be broken, which would be in deed and truth to make two contrary wills in God.

17. That Behmen therefore instructs us rightly, by saying, That all the decrees and purposes, reprobations, hardenings of heart, etc., do not originate in God before and without the creature, but in the formed word, or in the creature, upon its having misused its free will, and separated itself into the evil.

18. That, now this door of wrath is opened, God is manifest, and hath a will therein. For, though the act of manifestation, and the effects thereof are the creatures, and in the creature, yet the wrath is his, and is not without, but within the compass of his universal Being, from which the creature cannot be broken off, and without which it can have no being. The wrath, indeed, is not in him, as he is our God, according to St. John's definition: for so the hell would be heaven, and the heaven hell; but it is in his universal Being, which containeth all, and without which can be nothing. For the properties of nature, kindled in the creature, are his, and so the wrath is his, according to the plain words of the Scripture. He is therein, though his love is not therein, and he is the ruler, disposer, and pourer forth thereof. A fire is kindled, saith he (viz., by the creature; of its insertion did not present itself. The author, as already stated, and his talented relatives, were great readers of Law, Behmen, and the truly spiritual mystic writers; of which the writer holds extensive evidences.] What are his views? What is his private life and character? Why does he not publish the remaining volumes? If he has published them, I wish you would desire Mr. Strahan to send them to me complete, for I have not yet been able to get the first two volumes. * * *

You may wonder, perhaps, my dear sir, at my writing to you in such a plain, familiar, inquisitive way; but I know your goodness will excuse me, when I tell you the reason. There are a few pious souls in this city, who are engaged heartily in the practice and promotion of true vital christianity, simple and pure, free and unadulterated with systematic notions or distinctions. They are anxious to know how this spirit is like to prevail; and whether there are any considerable numbers of clergy or laity, of the established or dissenting churches, who have embraced this universal scheme. Add to this, I cannot but feel a sincere love to you. * * * I am, dear sir, yours most affectionately in Christ.—Jacob Duché." Such may be considered a fair example of the natural effects of a due perusal of Mr. Law's later writings upon men of education, serious thought and learning, who had been unable to reconcile the popular representations of the Christian scheme, with the just and reverential conclusions of their own minds, respecting the nature and moral government of the Deity. And, it may here be remarked, when such individuals do not rest in their first illuminations, but, apprehending the Divine incentives thereby, 'go on to know the Lord fully,' by a perfect conformity to the spirit and life of Christ, according to the plain import or he saith not, I have kindled it), and shall burn unto the lowest hell. And again, See now that I, even I, am he, and there is no God with me : I kill, and I make alive, etc. Pray who is this ? Truly it is not God in love, as he was only so before and in the creation of angels : for love killeth not ; nor is it God in wrath, for wrath maketh not alive ; and yet it is God, even he with whom there is no other God. It is God, therefore, in his universal Being : for he containeth and speaketh both of love and wrath, and both of life and death, or heaven and hell ; in both of which He is now manifest, and hath a will and power, after and because the creature, by misusing its free will, hath separated itself into the evil.

19. That now of this wrath and wrathful will rightly can be said, In what creature soever God is manifest in wrath, in that creature he cannot will nor do, what he can and will do in such another creature, as wherein he is manifest in love : because the wrath cannot will and do what love willeth and doth, else it were not wrath, but love ; and so vice versa.

20.—That this willing and doing in the wrath, is indeed in the creature only, and not without it, and is the creature's originally ; because not only the wrath was impotent before and in the creation of angels, but is also still impotent in itself, and hath no will nor power but in the creature, and in the creature also not further, than as it is enlivened and empowered by the creature's own will and self-doing. But,

21. That nevertheless, this willing and doing in the wrath is also attributable unto God, as he is an universal Being : (1.) because of that band and dependence of the creature's being upon his being, spoken of above. (2.) Because the wrath is his, and was his from eternity, before it was wrath, and when it was sealed up among his secret treasures. (3.) Because many things are said in Scripture of the wrath, and expressly attributed unto God.

22. That, as in the kingdom of love and light, the inhabitants thereof cannot work without co-operation of the Holy Spirit of God, raised in them by their own humbling themselves, so that all their works (as also all our good works in this mixed world) are the works of God, though they are also verily the works of them that are his active instruments ; so also in the kingdom of wrath and darkness, the prisoners thereof cannot work without concurrence of the spirit of wrath, raised and empowered in them by their own exalting themselves, so that all their works are indeed verily and properly their own, nay, much more their own than in the kingdom of light : and yet are also in some sense and respect, the works of the wrathful Spirit of God, and of those dark properties of nature which they have made themselves subject unto. And this, because there is no living, nor moving, neither in this kingdom nor in that, without the spirit of this kingdom, or of that.

23. That, these words of the apostle, To whom ye yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants ye are, etc., though spoken by him with reference to another matter, are here also rightly applicable to this ; and as they are now true in a particular sense, relating to the mixed multitude of Adam's children, so they were also true as to their substance from the beginning, in a more general sense : nay, even from this beginning of Lucifer's fall, the truth of these words is derived down to all the children of man.

24. That therefore, as a servant doth either freely, or must do by constraint, the will of his master, so in both these kingdoms the will of that spirit is done which is the master therein ; yet with this great difference, that in the kingdom of light the will of the holy Spirit of God is done freely, willingly and joyfully, by that innate principle of love, which the holy angels kept unto from their creation, in full obedience and resignation. And in the kingdom of wrath, the will of the wrathful spirit of God is done in trembling, and, in a sense, by constraint. For, though verily and most properly it is their own will which the devils do, because it is not the will of God, in and to which they were created, but in and of themselves, and from their own ground, they raised it up, and endeavoured to put it in execution, as they do still ; yet this expression of—their own will, doth not make them absolute or sovereign lords and masters of the kingdom of wrath, but only servants thereof, and prisoners therein : for by their own will they have manifested and empowered the wrathful spirit of God ; to him they have yielded up themselves in obedience, and his will they must do, and do continually, even in and by the doing of their own will.

25. That accordingly, God, as love, willeth and worketh nothing in the devil, and the devil nothing in God, because he hath separated himself from God, and is dead to love ; and so that band or communion of willing and working in the light, that was between them in their creation, is broken. But that the devil, who is a living and active creature, willeth and worketh in the wrath of God, and the wrath or wrathful Spirit willeth and worketh in the devil, because it liveth and is manifest in him, and ruleth over him, as a master over his servants, and as a prison-keeper over his prisoners. And that there is now a band or communion of willing and working between them, because when that first band in the light was broken, this other in the darkness must needs have been of the Gospel directions, i.e., in an entire self-mortification, opposition to the ways of the world, earnest and constant prayer, and a humble hearty association with some simple, experimental, zealous outward section of God's people, (which latter is indispensable for the proper development of 'the new man,' and the true evangelical promotion of God's glory, in the salvation of our neighbour).—when all this ensues as the sole end of knowledge, yea of the deepest mystical and theosophical science, as it is made to do in the writings of Law (see his 'Way to Divine Knowledge,' the concluding pages of that work, wherewith it is proposed to close the above SECOND SECTION of this treatise), and more especially in those of the great Freher (as may be seen by a reference to his work, 'Microcosmos,' at the end of the discourse of 'the First Table,' which may be considered about the last of his Theosophic dissertations),—when this, we say, takes place, then the conversion of such individuals may be deemed to be complete. But, if they stop short of this, then it is with them, only as with a man who takes up merely a new opinion in religious matters, which, (as Mr. Law observed, in a conversation), however delightful and exhilarating, is of no more use or consequence to him, in regard to his salvation, than the helping himself to a new hat. To resume the narrative.

Among the friendships formed by Mr. Law during his residence in London or at Putney, may be mentioned that of the Hon. Archibald Campbell and family, (of Craven Buildings, Strand, afterwards of King Street, Grosvenor Square,) and his relative, Archibald Hutcheson, Esq., of Westminster, M.P. for the town of Hastings. Mr. Hutcheson was a man of piety, and, a little before his decease, which happened in the year 1740, he was visited by Mr. Law, to whom he expressed a made manifest, wherein he cannot be without willing and working : for by this band he is kept in being within the universal Being of God, and is not annihilated ; which also cannot be, because it is contrary to the fundamental rules, laws, and principles of eternity.

26. That this willing and working in the wrath, considered as on the creature's side, consisteth chiefly herein, that the creature, being departed from the will and work of love, having rejected the influence and co-operation of the holy Spirit of God, and having turned itself into the dark wrathful properties of nature, doth still move and act in them, and cometh innumerable strange, false, monstrous, and lying forms or images, in thoughts, words, and deeds, which are all evil, absolutely, without any limitation, and mere abominations to the holy will and Spirit of God, in the kingdom of love and light.

27. That this willing and working in the wrath, as far as it is attributable unto God, as manifested therein, and whose wrath it is, consisteth not only herein, that the active and restless properties of wrath, which are, and must be subservient to his manifestation in light and love, exert their own natural powers in the creatures fallen into them, and give them continually food, and quasi materials to their forming and imaging ; but also herein, that the Spirit of this wrathful kingdom (which is the Spirit of God, even he who in the kingdom of love is the Holy Spirit, but in this kingdom manifest as a Spirit of the fiery anger of God) delighteth, strengtheneth, and exalteth himself therein, and willeth that it shall beso, that he may manifest and show forth in and by them, the wonders of this kingdom. Like as we might think in an earthly similitude, that a kindled fire delighteth in a dry wood, strengtheneth and elevateth itself therein, and willeth, or naturally inclineth to have such food continually, that it may have something to consume, and to show forth therein its power ; all in a direct contrariety to the kingdom of light and love.

28. That all this, on the side of God, as manifested in the wrath, is good, and no evil may be found therein ; though it is the highest evil of punishment to the creature. For herein his justice is manifest, giving unto each creature, in due measure and right proportion, not only what it deserveth, but also what it willeth, and what it still maketh for itself ; for the works of their hands are their food. And this justice is in and to him as good as his mercy, though not so to the creature ; nay, so essential to him, and so inseparable from him on this side of the evil creature's own will, as his love and mercy on the other side of the creature's good resigned will. Herein also the wonders of the deep beneath are brought forth into manifestation, and thereby the great and holy name of God, though the creatures as much as in them lie think to revile and blaspheme it, is even hereby also magnified and exalted, contrary to their will, and without their understanding it. Wherefore Behmen rightly says, That as the holy angels praise God freely in his love and light, so the devils must praise him in his wrath, though not intending it.

29. That the dark properties of wrath, and so also the Spirit of this wrathful kingdom, which is God as manifested in the wrath, will indeed now (after having got a predominance in the creatures by the creatures own willing and empowering them in themselves) that their subjects and prisoners shall be what they are, and do what they do. And that because this their doing is absolutely evil in them, we may say well and soundly enough, The dark properties and the spirit of wrath in desire that his widow should choose a retired and religious life ; and, in recommending it to her, stated that he knew no person who would be so likely to prove profitable and agreeable to her in such respect, as his friend Mr. Law, if she could be situate within reach of his society.

To fulfil the last counsels of her affectionate husband was the early endeavour of Mrs. Hutcheson ; and after some little delay, and intercommunications with Mr. Law, a plan was proposed by the latter to Miss Hester Gibbon, who as yet was without any fixed plan of life, and it would appear, looking up to Mr. Law as her confidential friend, whereby her own private wishes, and the object of Mrs. Hutcheson might equally be attained. The two ladies consenting to reside together, he took for them a house at Thrapstone, a small market town in Northamptonshire, about ten miles from King's Cliffe, where he was now settled. Here, in the summer of 1743, they took up their abode, but remained only a short time, not finding the situation altogether suited to their tastes. Mr. Law then suggested that King's Cliffe might prove a more agreeable retreat, and also better adapted to their views and intentions, being a much larger place, and as having more poor within it : for it was their design, among other good works in which they proposed to employ their fortunes, (following herein the counsels of the ' Serious Call,') to establish schools for the clothing and education of the children of the poor ; as well as the continual relief of indigence and want. They acquiescing in this proposal, Mr. Law refitted a roomy house in a part of the town called the ' Hall Yard,' already mentioned as the ancient site of the palace of King John. And here, in the following year, 1744, the two ladies joined their good friend and spiritual adviser, being now settled down for the remainder of their lives. This house belonged to Mr. Law, having it is said been the property of his father : and at his decease, he bequeathed it, with all his other effects, to Miss Gibbon. It had a good garden annexed, and a close of pasture ground ; at the extreme point of the latter, at about a quarter of a mile distance, stand the small almshouses which he built. Some adjoining land was purchased and added thereto, at different times, by Miss Gibbon, and the whole devised by her to Mr. William Law, the son of Mr. Law's nephew, a solicitor, who, dying unmarried, devised it to his brother Mr. Thomas Law, the father of the present worthy possessor of the estate.

Shortly after their arrival, in the same year, Mrs. Hutcheson planted an acorn in one corner of the garden attached to the house, which grew up, and is now a towering oak, measuring about four yards round the trunk, and the largest tree in the neighbourhood. This fine tree is said to have been visited from time to time by noblemen and gentlemen, to ascertain the size to which an oak would grow in half or three quarters of a century, with the view of planting a park or forest of such trees ; though there must be taken into account the special care which had been bestowed upon this particular tree, of which in the nature of things forest trees must be deprived.

What was the particular economy of the household does not now appear, further than by a few traditionary reports ; but if we bear in mind what has been stated, relating to that point, by the elder Mr. Gibbon ; as also, that the directing head of the whole establishment was the pious and wisdom that indited the ' Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life,' we may justly infer, that all was conducted according to the principles and with the regularity of a religious house, though tempered with that prudence and consideration which, in respect to the previous habits of the ladies, the them, not without them, will the evil in them. Yet they will it not directly as it is evil, but as it is naturally the proper food, nourishment, and increase of their qualifications, and the only medium to the manifestation of their powers and wonders, which are all good in themselves. And this we may say, because (1.) the good cannot be willed in them by the Spirit of love, they having separated themselves into the evil: and (2.) because without either the Spirit of love, or the Spirit of wrath, upon which all their being and willing must depend, they can be and will nothing at all. The dark properties, and so also the Spirit of this wrathful kingdom, are themselves (according to Behmen's plain expression) enemies to the devil, and hate his perfidiousness, treachery, pride, and folly, wherein he still thinks to be their lord, when he is but their slave and prisoner, etc.: which is in them a good and sure mark of justice and equity, nay, of their subjection also to the love and light of God. Which latter especially doth more plainly appear from what this author asserts expressly, viz., That the devil is as it were abominable even to the kingdom of wrath, which accuseth and blameth him continually, because he hath spoiled and lost his own kingdom in the light, and dareth now still be so impudent, as to pretend to be a king in a kingdom which never was his own. All which plainly sheweth, That the dark properties and the Spirit of wrath will no evil as it is evil, but only as it is subservient to the manifestation of their great powers and wonders.

30. That therefore, when Behmen says, In whatsoever hath separated itself (by misusing his free will) into the evil, therein he willet the evil, these words do not contain nonsense, nor a contradiction to the plain words of the Scripture, repeated by himself an hundred times, God willet no evil; but a deep, substantial solid truth, worthy to be understood by a lover of the mysteries of God and of his kingdom, though not fit to be proclaimed to a promiscuous multitude of ignorant people: for certainly, the meaning of these words is not so gross and superficial as either malicious or short-sighted eyes might take it to be. Which now I think may appear sufficiently from the coherence of these thirty positions, though several more could have been added not impertinently.

Page 302. Q. 2. How shall we know when the word God in Scripture, signifies God only, and when it signifies (his) nature? A. If Behmen is understood concerning these two different considerations of God, it can be known without a great difficulty, at least for the greatest part, (yet only according to the measure of that understanding,) what of the words of the Scripture is to be referred unto the former, and what of them unto the latter. For though God as in himself only, without all nature and creature, is not an object of our understanding; and though, therefore, the Scripture doth not instruct us directly in this point, by telling and declaring what he is, yet it tells us that he is; and there are places in the Scripture, in which one thing or expression may belong to the former, another to the latter, and a third unto both, in a different sense. But I do not think that any place may be found, which only and altogether may be referred to the former; though there are many that only and altogether belong to the latter. For this is certain, and may be a sure and constant rule, That all the places and expressions wherein God is spoken of with relation to creatures, especially to men, so that either he be represented to them as their loving God and Father, as their King and Lawgiver, as their dreadful judge, etc., or they be instructed concerning his Divine attributes of righteousness, justice, mercy, omniscience, long-suffering, fatherly care and providence, etc.; and case would necessarily require.

As near as can be ascertained, the annual income of Mrs. Gibbon was from five to seven hundred pounds, and that of Mrs. Hutcheson about two thousand pounds; none of which, it is believed, was retained, or allowed to accumulate. As the expenditure within the house was remarkably frugal, great must have been the disbursement without; so great, indeed, as to make those at Cliffe, who remembered Mr. Law and his companions, say in relating it to parties still living there, that their acts of charity were boundless. The report of such munificence spread to places far from Cliffe, and produced applications from many whose wants were of a different character to those of food and raiment; who were often gratified by charitable donations.

The domestic arrangements of the establishment being completed, Mrs. Hutcheson, under the advice and superintendence of Mr. Law, immediately set about the building and foundation of the Charities already described, the first of which was completed before the close of the ensuing year, 1745. The following particular account thereof, taken from the printed original, may be deemed of interest, in this place:—

“CHAPTER I.—It is thought proper, to set forth this short Account of these Charitable Foundations, for several reasons:

(1.) That our present worthy and much-esteemed Trustees, who have had the goodness to accept of the care and protection of them, may, by this little Abstract of the state, nature, and appointment of these Charities, have as little trouble as possible in acquainting themselves with all that is required of them for their protecting and preserving these Charities according to their true destination.

(2.) That succeeding Trustees, as vacancies shall happen, may at their first entrance upon the trust, without the trouble of reading and searching into the long deeds of settlement, know all that is material in them, and have a full and certain insight into all the particularities of the nature and constitution of the several Charities which, by their election, they take upon them to keep up in their true uses and operation.

(3.) That hereby, as much as possible, all deviation from the first, true, and legally established order of these Foundations, which length of time is apt to produce in most things, may be prevented; there being a considerable number of these little printed books, to be carefully preserved for futurity, one of which is constantly to be given to every new Trustee at the time of his election.

(4.) That the Town of King's-Cliffe, for whose sole benefit these several Charities are established, may be fully acquainted with all that is granted and given to them in the original Deeds of these Foundations; both as to the nature, place, and value of the Estates, and the several uses to which they are appointed.

That by this means they may become true and proper witnesses of the right use and application of these Charities; and also be enabled how to complain, and where to seek for redress, if in after times any misapplication of them should happen.

For as these Foundations have their full legal authority, and unchangeable nature, from their all those places, also, wherein there is spoken of his will, counsel, decrees, purposes, election, and reprobation, etc.; and further, all those places which declare anything of his love and anger, of his great works and wonders, of his kingdom in the light and calling to it, of the Father's drawing, the Son's reconciling the Father, and the Holy Ghost's being poured out upon the children of men, etc.: they all are to be referred to the latter consideration. But in those places chiefly wherein his unity, greatness, infiniteness, omnipresence, unchangeableness, etc., are declared, there may be found this or that, which not only belongeth to the latter, but to the former also.

Page 302. Q. ult. How can you avoid the texts in Scripture, which attribute reprobation to God himself? How is the word, God, to be taken in those places? A. No text in Scripture attributes reprobation to God as in himself only, without nature and creature; and though the Scripture doth not determine this so expressly, by saying—God as in nature and creature, yet (1.) the whole series and concatenate harmony of the truth in its particulars, and (2.) also the divers senses in which we cannot deny but that the word God is taken in Scripture, do evince this assertion sufficiently. Let us not stick to words and notions, but consider only and even but simply, without subtleties, What reprobation is. We shall find it is an essential shutting up the kingdom of light and love, and an excluding the creature out of it; implying that the creature hath been therein, and presupposing that the same is no more capable thereof, or no more fit to dwell therein any longer. Now where is that text in Scripture that asserts, either that God willed or purposed in himself from eternity, before the creature was, that the same should be excluded from having communion with him, in his kingdom of light, love, and glory? or that he himself by his own doing, hath cast the creature out, and shut the door upon it? Doth not the Scripture plainly tell us, That angels and man were created to have communion with God, and to praise him in his light and glory? That the devil stood not or abode not in the truth, but left his habitation in the light; and that man lost his paradisaical state, by the devil's cunning craft and his own sinful lust? Truly, we must take this to be the first doing on the creature's side; and then we may take that other to be the consequence thereof, which the Scripture tells us was done by God, viz., the devil was cast out, and his place was no more found in heaven, and Adam was driven out of the garden. As no man of any sound sense can make this latter the foundation, and that former the superstructure; so also no man can separate these two from one another; but both together in conjunction are or make up what we call reprobation. Which in substance and reality is nothing else, but that God, who before was manifested in the creature, in his love, becometh now manifest therein in wrath; because (1.) the creature in its own will is no more capable of his manifestation in love, and (2.) because without him, as manifested either in love or wrath, there is for the creature no living, moving, nor having any being. From all this it is evident, that much more unto the creature than unto God, and unto God as without the creature not at all, reprobation is to be attributed. If we would consider man especially, whom both election and reprobation concerns, the matter would still be much more evident. But not to run out into this wide, open field, I shall say only this in short, according to Behmen's declaration,——Adam, with all his posterity, was to be as a harmonious instrument, which the Spirit of love manifest in him would play upon: and as to his own person, he was actually made and prepared so. But the spirit of this world creeping in, disordered the strings thereof (the pro-being settled strictly according to the last Statute of Mortmain, and enrolled in his Majesty's High Court of Chancery in the time and manner as that statute directs; so, if in any future age they should be either in part sunk or misapplied, a speedy and certain relief may be always had by an appeal to that Court. [In 1826, the Trustees, finding that they could not execute the Trust according to the letter of these Rules, applied to the Court of Chancery; and, by an Order of that Court bearing date December 22d. of that year, an Extension was given to the Rules, Orders, and Regulations of these Charitable Foundations. This Extension is noticed in the following Chapters; but the Court ordered that the previously existing Rules and Regulations be continued in force, except as they were thereby amended and altered.]

CHAP. II.—Of the Nature of these Foundations, and the Places, Quality, and Value of the Estates given for the perpetual support of them.

I.—In the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and forty-five. Mrs. Hutcheson set up a School in the town of King's-Cliffe, for the education and full cloathing of eighteen poor Boys of the town of King's-Cliffe, with a salary for a master well qualified to teach them reading and writing, and all the useful parts of arithmetic. On the 28th. April, 1756, the Foundress increased the number of scholars to twenty; and directed that every boy who shall have staid out his full time in the school, with good behaviour, be constantly put to some trade. [See MS. Order Book in the custody of the Agent, signed by the Foundress.]

Mrs. Hutcheson afterwards bought a School-house for the master, built a School, and four little Tenements adjoining to it for the separate habitation of four ancient and poor Widows, chosen out of the town of King's-Cliffe, with a weekly allowance. [By an Order of the Court of Chancery, Dec. 22d. 1826, the Trustees shall have power to nominate and elect an additional number of women and scholars to the said Almshouses and Schools respectively, with and subject to such powers and qualifications as by the existing rules and regulations, and the present new rules and regulations, are provided.]

For the perpetual maintenance of these Charities, the following Estates have by Mrs. Hutcheson's order and appointment been conveyed, surrendered, and sold for ever, in trust, to George Lynn of Southwick, William Pain King of Fineshade, Esqs, to the Reverend Chambers Bates, Rector of Easton, to the Reverend Wilfrid Piemont, Rector of King's-Cliffe, to Thomas Jackson of Duddington, Gent., to George Law of Morehay, Gent., Viz:—

(1.) At Northorpe in the county of Lincoln, a freehold inclosed estate, being one moiety of a certain number of closes, all particularly specified in the deeds of conveyance, leased now to William Watson of Northorpe, for seven years. The Rent £54. per annum. (2.) Another freehold estate, at Aslackton in the county of Nottingham, leased now for twenty-one years to Henry Hall, of Aslackton. The Rent £53. (3.) In King's-Cliffe, Heartake and Hullhill closes, leased to Mr. Buckby, for thirteen years. The Rent £18. 10s. (4.) Dealey's closes by the Spaw-Lodge, leased to John Billage, for thirteen years. The Rent £7. 10s. (5.) Buxton close, let to Mr. Whitehead, for three years. The Rent £7. (6.) The School close adjoining to the school-house, rented by Mrs. Hutcheperties of nature in him), and tuned them so, that they made up an instrument fit for himself. Now therefore, it was no more fit for the Spirit of God; but this departed from him, or ceased to be manifest in him, according to his former manifestation in love, and came to be manifest in him according partly to the first, and partly to this third principle, which both are his. And here man was reprobated, that is, excluded from paradise and heaven, wherein he could be no more, because he had it no more manifest in him. But now the Scripture no where tells us, that it was decreed or purposed by God, before man was a creature, that he should transgress and fall, and should be reprobated; but on the contrary, this the Scripture tells us, that man was chosen in Christ Jesus before the foundation of the world: which doth not presuppose (but rather contradict) that the fall was decreed by God, but only that it was seen and known in his wisdom; for an efficacious remedy was found out against it. And what was this else, but that afterwards in time, the same primitive manifestation of love in the humanity (though quite in another and much higher way) returned again, and called unto all men to give way to it, and to receive the same into themselves, as it still doth so. If they do, they are elected; that is, separated from the world, and taken in into this new or second manifestation of love, not without but in the humanity, and even in themselves. If they do not, they are not reprobated by a new, peculiar act or deed of God, as without them, or far from them above the stars; but only they continue in their being already excluded from having his love manifest in them, and from the communion with God in the light. And there is nothing that did or could exclude them, but their own having yielded themselves servants to the devil and the spirit of this world, and their wilful continuing to love this service more than the freedom of the sons of God, and the manifestation of his love in them, etc.

Page 303. No. 5. The reason of what is asserted in this position, declared in these last words, because the evil would have been from him, cannot give us a right idea of the thing; for it supposeth, as it were, that God could have willed or fore-ordained all things which have come to pass, but did leave it freely, upon consideration, that if he had done so, the evil would have been from him: which hath but a very superficial sense, and doth not represent rightly, what God is, according to Behmen's gift and declaration. It is true indeed, that if it could be lawful for us to say, God willed or fore-ordained all what came to pass, it would be lawful also to say, The evil is from him, and he hath willed it. But as this latter is the devil's lying assertion, so that former also is not much better; seeing that this dependeth upon that, and that is the ground of this. As we therefore rightly say, God cannot will the evil, no more than he can lie or die, so we must say also positively, and hold it firmly, That God not only did not will and fore-ordain, but also could not have willed and fore-ordained all things which have come to pass, viz., those that relate to the manifestation of his wrath; because God is love, and was manifest in light and love only, before and in the creation of angels, but in his wrath he was never manifest before the fall. Now God, as love, could not have willed or fore-ordained that the wrath should be made manifest, and get a predominion in his creatures, whom he purposed to create in and to his light, love, and glory (if we think he could, we do not yet understand with Behmen what a principle is): and in his wrath he could never have been manifested, nor could his wrath have manifested itself, if the creature had not manifested it; no more son. The Rent £8. Total Rent [at that time] £148. per annum.

(N.B.) Donatus O'Brien of Blatherwick, Esq. was, at the desire of Mrs. Hutcheson, and by a deed pole bearing date the twenty-ninth day of October in the year of our Lord 1753, added to the six above-mentioned Trustees, that the number of Trustees in this, as in Mr. Law's foundation, might be always the same, seven. And to show, as by a binding precedent, that at the death of any Trustee another should be immediately chosen, and invested with all the rights of the trust, in the manner the said Donatus O'Brien, Esq. hath been, that the number seven may be always complete.

II.—The School founded for the education and full cloathing of fourteen poor Girls of the town of King's-Cliffe, was set up by Mr. William Law [Presbyter of the Church of England], in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and twenty-seven, with a salary for a mistress, well qualified to instruct them in reading, knitting, and every useful kind of needlework.

He hath since, [1752—4?] built a School-house and School, and also two little Tenements adjoining to the school, to be inhabited separately by two poor ancient unmarried Women, or Widows, of the town of King's-Cliffe, with a weekly allowance, hereafter mentioned.

For the perpetual support of these Charities, he, the said William Law, hath conveyed for ever, in trust, to George Lynn of Southwick, to Donatus O'Brien of Blatherwick, to William Pain King of Pineshade, Esqs., and to the Reverend Chambers Bates of Easton, to the Reverend Wilfred Piemont, Rector of King's-Cliffe, to Thomas Jackson of Duddington, Gent., and to George Law of Morehay, Gent.,

(1.) The aforesaid school and school-house, and the two little adjoining tenements. (2.) A freehold estate at Northorpe in the county of Lincoln, being one moiety of a number of closes, all particularly specified in the deeds of conveyance, leased in the year 1753, to William Watson of Northorpe, for seven years. The Rent [at that time] £54. per annum.

The following direction was given by Mrs. Hutcheson on the 28th. April, 1756: Whereas it appears that in Mr. Law's Foundation the expenses come pretty near the full income of the rents given for its support, we order and appoint, that if it should at any time happen that the rents should fall short of the expenses, that then and for that time such defect be supplied out of the rents of the above-mentioned estate (viz. Mrs. Hutcheson's estate) given for the maintenance of a master and eighteen scholars. Provided that there be a sufficient surplussage of money remaining, after the full discharge of all the former appointments; but not else. [See MS. Order Book, signed by the Foundress.]

CHAP. III.—Of the Election of a Master or Mistress for the Schools, and their respective Qualifications, Duties, and Salaries, &c.

(1.) Upon the death of a Master or Mistress of the Schools, the Agent for the Trustees is immediately to give notice of it to all the Trustees. He is also immediately to fix a written paper upon the Church door at King's-Cliffe, with these words written in it, viz: Wanted a Master or Mistress for such a School; any person properly qualified may apply to the Trustees, George Lynn, Esq. &c., all whose names and places of abode must be mentioned in the paper that is fixed upon the door.

than the fire in a flint can manifest itself. Nay, his love cannot be concerned with anything, nor take any notice of what is in and belongeth to the wrath; except only so far, that it hath an eternal will, most essential to itself, to overcome the same, and to exalt itself over it, where it pleaseth, and where it is not resisted, by the creature's own wilful continuing in the misusing its free will. And therefore, when God foresaw that the creature would misuse its free will, fall into his wrath, and manifest the same in itself, he, according to this eternal essential will in his love, willed, purposed, or fore-ordained, that the wrath manifested in man should be broken and overcome by love, in and through the humanity of Jesus Christ; and that so the first manifestation of love in man should return unto him again, to the end that love might exalt itself, and triumph over the wrath, and show forth for ever, what it is. And therefore also this is the only purpose or fore-ordaining, whereof the Scripture tells us, that it was made before the foundation of the world. But no such will or purpose concerning the wrath, viz., that this should be made manifest, can be found in any place of all the Scripture. So then, the manifestation of the wrath is only and wholly to be attributed to the creature's misusing its free will. And so it is not enough to say—God did not, but we must say, He could not will or fore-ordain all things which come to pass.

Page 305. No. 6. God foresaw in his anger. This expression is right and good, frequently used by Behmen, and well enough to be understood by them that are acquainted with his style. But all this notwithstanding, the more to condescend to the capacity of such as do easily find scruples in words, and might here think or ask, Had God an anger before the creatures were made and fallen; he must then have been angry with himself, etc.? I think it might be thus expressed—God foresaw in the natural qualification of the three first properties of nature. For, in God was no anger before the fall, nor is in him even now; but in the first properties of nature, if divorced from the rest (which may be done in a creature, but not in God), there is such a qualification, as is and must be wrath and anger in that creature that hath made this divorce in itself. And this is called his anger, because these properties, and their natural, necessary qualifications, all good and harmonious in his eternal nature, are his. So therefore, when Behmen calleth it, his anger before the fall, he doth it only because it is that which, after the fall, is called so in Scripture; explaining himself sufficiently, That it had not, nor could have had this name before the fall, which it hath now after it, because it was then in God not such a thing as it is now in the creature: nay, [N.B.] that it is not anger in God properly, but only in the creature, and attributable unto God no further, than as he is manifest in the creature, and as the creature's being dependeth upon his being.

[ANNOTATION.—Connecting position 12, page 419, with these ravishing elucidations of truth—of indeed, the most glorious truths that can affect, awaken and convert the heart, viz. the love of God, and its consummating act in the intercession of Christ, (by which is understood the unceasing, eternal over-coming by Christ of all the wrath and sin in the human nature, where not obstructed by man's own wilful resistance thereto),—in such consideration, we say, may be especially perceived Mr. Law's ground of understanding in the extract from his 'Demonstration, etc.', inserted in the note of page 229, of the present work; as also, in the First Dialogue of the Second Part of his 'Spirit of Love,' to the doctrine of which objections have been made, even by some of Mr. Law's warm ad-

(2.) No man under twenty or above forty years or age, is capable of being received as a candidate for the mastership: this is an indispensable incapacity.

(3.) No one but a single woman, either a maiden or a widow, between twenty and forty years of age, is capable of being elected to be a mistress of the school. And if she marries after her election, she is to be immediately discharged, and a new one chosen in her stead.

(4.) In a vacancy of a master or mistress, every Trustee has an equal and absolute right of offering a candidate at the time of the election.

(5.) The election of a master or mistress is to be as speedy as is found to be convenient, not exceeding (if possible) three weeks from the time of the vacancy.

(6.) When two or three or any number of persons properly qualified are proposed by the Trustees, the election is always to be made by ballot.

(7.) No election of a master or mistress to be ballotted for, is to be made unless four, or three at the least, of the Trustees be present at the ballot, and unless the rest of the Trustees have had sufficient notice of the day appointed for the election.

(8.) The Agent for the Trustees is in his own person to wait upon every Trustee, and leave with him in writing the day appointed for the election.

(9.) The Salary settled upon the Master for teaching eighteen boys is twenty pounds a year, free from all taxes, parish rates, and all expenses for keeping his house in repair. The salary is punctually to be paid by four quarterly payments, at the four great quarters of the year, five pounds at each quarter-day. And every Lady-day quarter he is to be paid thirty shillings over and above his quarterly payments, to buy firewood for the school.

(10.) The Salary settled upon the Mistress for teaching fourteen girls is ten pounds a year, to be paid by quarterly payments as the master's above-mentioned, and at the Lady day quarter she is to receive thirty shillings over and above that quarterly payment, to buy firewood for the school.

(11.) If the master or the mistress shall be found taking in, or teaching in their respective schools, any other scholar or scholars, than such as are of the Foundation and put in by the Trustees, then twenty shillings for every such scholar shall be deducted from the salary of the master or mistress so offending; and if the same offence is afterwards committed again, such master or mistress is forthwith to be removed, and another chosen in his or her stead.

(12.) If a master or mistress shall be found to neglect the daily business of the school, or suffer the scholars to absent themselves from it; if anything scandalous is sufficiently proved upon either of them; or if they be not of a perfectly sober, decent, and christian behaviour, and of good example to the children, the Trustees are earnestly requested not to suffer the continuance of such a master or mistress—a more pious and virtuous education of the children than that of a common school, being the one great end chiefly intended by these Foundations: which end must be frustrated, unless it be an unchangeable rule constantly to discharge the master or mistress as soon as they fall into any scandalous irregularity of life, and cease to give good example to the children.

(13.) The master or mistress is not to be removed or discharged from their office, but by such a number of Trustees, and such notice given to all of them, as is required in the choice of a new master.

mirers; as not being satisfactorily cleared up.

But, in regard to the edification of some description of readers, it may not be inappropriate to insert in this place, the following observations immediately relating to the point now in question, extracted from a published letter of Mr. Law:—

“ * * * thus do these three states of man fully show, that our first perfection, our miserable fall, and blessed redemption, have all that they have in them, whether of glory or misery, merely and solely because God alone is all that is good, and can be nothing else but good towards the creature; and that neither angel nor man can be happy or miserable, but because it either hath, or hath not, this one God of goodness essentially living and operating in it.

What a number of things called religion are here cut off at once! Since nothing is life, happiness, and glory, but the one essential operation of the triune God of love and goodness within us; nothing is death, evil, or misery, but the departure or turning from this essential God of our lives, to something that we would have from ourselves, or the creatures that are about us. And how greatly is he deluded, who, living among the throng of religious schemes, thinks this, or that, or any thing in nature, can be his atonement, his reconciliation, and union with God, but the spirit, the body, and the blood of Christ, forming themselves into a ‘new creature’ within him. Then, and then only, is he that first man that God created, in whom alone he can be well pleased; but till then, he is that man whom the cherub’s two-edged flaming sword will not suffer to enter into paradise.—How is it now that we are to regain that first birth of Christ? Why just in the same way as Adam had it at first. What did he then do towards it? How did he help forward God’s creating power? Now creating again, or restoring a first life in God, is just the same thing, and the same sole work of God, as creating us at first; and therefore we can have no more share of power in the one, than in the other. Nothing lies upon us as creatures fallen from God, or is required of us with regard to our growth in God, but not to resist that which God is doing towards a new creation of us.

That which God is doing towards the new creation of us had its beginning before the foundation of the world. In Christ Jesus, (saith St. Paul,) we were chosen before the foundation of the world; the same as saying, that God out of his great mercy had chosen to preserve a ‘seed of the word’ and spirit of God in fallen man, which, through the mediation of a God incarnate, should revive into that fulness of stature in Christ Jesus in which Adam was at first created. And all this work of God towards a new creation is by that same essential operation of God in us, which at first created us in his image and likeness. And therefore nothing belongs to man in it, but only to yield himself up to it, and not resist it.

Now who is it that may be said to resist it? Answer. It is every one who does not deny himself, take up his cross daily, and follow Christ. For every thing but this, is that flesh that warreth against the Spirit. The whole life of the natural man resisteth all that essential operation of God, which would create us again in Christ Jesus. Farther, every religious man resisteth it in, and by, and through the whole course of his religion, who takes any thing to be the truth of piety, the truth of devotion, the truth of religious worship, but faith, and hope, and trust, and dependence upon that alone, which the all-creating word, and all-sanctifying spirit of God, inwardly, essentially,

CHAP. IV.—Of several other Particulars essential to these Foundations.

(1.) The Rector of King’s-Cliffe for the time being is always to be a Trustee. As soon as he is inducted into the living of King’s-Cliffe, and enters upon his first residence, he has a right to claim an admission into the trust. (N.B.) No other person of King’s-Cliffe is ever to be a Trustee; be he who he will, or of what degree soever, he is utterly incapable of being admitted or chosen into any share of this trust.

(2.) The future Trustees are to be constantly and for ever chosen out of the neighbouring Gentry and Clergy, not more than four miles distance from King’s-Cliffe. [By order of the Court of Chancery, Dec. 22d. 1826, the limits prescribed by the existing rules and regulations as to the residence of the Trustees, are extended to the distance of eight miles from the parish of King’s-Cliffe.]

(3.) Every Trustee has an equal right to put scholars into the school; but no Trustee is to put in more than two, till every Trustee has put in the same number.

(4.) The Agent for the Trustees is to keep a register bound book of the names of the children, their age, the time of their entrance, and by what Trustee they were put into the school. His business is, to receive the rents, make the weekly and other payments, provide every thing wanted in the schools, and observe the same method of cloathing the children as has been hitherto practised. At the general audit, the week after Easter, he is to lay his accounts before the Trustees, to be examined and passed by them.

(5.) The surplus of money at every audit, is either in part to be reserved for occasional demands, or the whole to be disposed of to such uses as the Trustees, at their annual audit, shall please to appoint; only under this restriction, that such money cannot be disposed of any other way but for the sole use and benefit of some or other of the members of these two Foundations. [By an Order of the Court of Chancery, Dec. 22d. 1826, the Trustees shall have the power from time to time, and at all times hereafter, as they shall think fit, to apply the accumulated and accruing surplus rents and profits (if any) of the said trust estates, when received, (but not to charge the same with the repayment of any sum of money by way of anticipation, mortgage, or otherwise,) in and towards the building of any additional almshouse or almshouses, or any new schoolhouse or schoolhouses, in and upon such part of the said trust estates as shall be most convenient for the purpose. Nevertheless so as that the present prescribed numbers of women and scholars, or so many of them as the said parish of King’s Cliffe will furnish, and the present prescribed salaries of the schoolmaster and schoolmistress for the time being, be not reduced or diminished by reason of the expence of any such additional building as aforesaid.]

(6.) All orders made by the Trustees at their audit, are to be entered into a book by the agent in their presence, that at their next meeting the observance of such orders may be enquired into, and such alterations or additions be further made as the Trustees shall judge proper.

(7.) It is the joint request of Mrs. Hutcheson and Mr. Law, that, as now so hereafter, the Agent for the Trustees be that relation of Mr. Law, who shall keep such a shop in this town as is now in being. But, (N.B.) no such tradesmen, nor any other relation of Mr. Law, that shall be an inhabitant of King’s-Cliffe, hath hereby any claim to this office; nor is he any further recomand vitally work in his soul."

From these, and the former passages to the like purport, the beclouded, downcast, penitent reader will perceive, how Christ is a perpetual atonement for the sins of the whole world; that he abides in the depth of the soul as an ever-present, infallible remedy for all human misery, as a 'well of water, springing up unto everlasting life,' ready to wash away our iniquities, and to impart unto us the Divine nature; and that by his process and conquest, he now possesses such omnipotent power over 'all things in heaven and earth,' and bears such infinite, inexpressible love to our souls, that not anything in the whole universe of being shall be able again to separate us from him, (Rom. viii. 38, 39,) with this single exception, however, of our own unwillingness to be saved by him.

Whoever thou art, then, (dear reader,) be thou as vile as a whole life of wilful accumulated sins and backslidings can have made thee, do but believe these glad tidings, and heartily embrace the gospel; do but cast off all obstructions to thy spiritual renewal by taking up the cross, by self-denial, mortification, earnest and continued prayer, total separation from the world, and the love and practice of all goodness; do but thus co-operate with thy covenanted omnipotent Redeemer, now waiting for thee in the birth and bottom of thy soul, (one chief instrument to which is living by rule,) and salvation will soon open itself in thy heart.

And wouldst thou also desire a clear intellectual apprehension of the truth and progress of thy renewal, then know what Christ, as thy indwelling sanctifier, is, viz., holiness, purity, peace, love, God. (Oh, meditate much upon these words, holiness—purity—peace—love—God!) Know also, that as thy actual Saviour, in all thy inward and outward trials of self and the world, he is the spirit of meekness, of humility, of patience, and resignation to God. Turn thy faith then, wholly and solely to Christ, under these various phases and manifestations of the one only Spirit of truth and goodness within thee, yea, with the same fullness of assurance and earnestness of desire as the lame, the sick, and the blind applied to him, when in the flesh, to be healed: so mayest thou enjoy a rational conviction as well as sensible evidence of thy being born of God.]

Ibid. Line 3. if it had been infused into them. This expression doth not declare the thing consistently with Behmen, though he may have used the same words in another construction, and with other circumstances. For in one sense, the love was infused into the devils; that is, given, offered, presented, so that it shone upon them, drawing, calling, and inviting them, no less than all the rest of the holy angels. Which was an infusion in such a sense, as Behmen declareth in the simile of a thistle, into which the sun continually infuseth its light, warmth and tincture, having no other will nor inclination in itself, but to do the same good to the thistle which it doth to the rose; when the thistle, for all this loving-kindness of the sun, doth still but remain a stinging thistle. But in another sense we must say also, that the love could not have been infused into the devils; for how can wine be infused into a vessel full already of stinking water? The wine may be poured out indeed over the vessel, and so was the love over the devils; but the vessel cannot take it in, so neither could they, because their own will, which they were full of, could not receive it. In short, God did all the good which he could do to them, he being unchangeable, and having no other will but to do them good; but they did nothing, nor would do anything, of what was their duty to do.

mended to it than as he shall be found to be of honest character and well qualified for it, nor to be continued in it any longer than whilst his behaviour is well and fully approved of by the Trustees.

CHAP. V.—Of the Election of the Widows and ancient unmarried Women, &c.

(1.) At the death or vacancy of a Widow, no one woman is to be chosen into her place. But always four, or three at the least, of the most ancient widows are to be put in nomination by the Trustees, and the election of every individual widow is always to be made by ballot out of such a number, in the presence of the Trustees. [By Order of the Court of Chancery, Dec. 22d. 1826. In case where a vacancy happens in an almshouse, there shall not be more than one poor woman qualified to fill up the same, it shall be lawful for the Trustees for the time being forthwith to elect her thereto, without waiting until there is a sufficient number of poor women for proceeding to a ballot; and that two poor women duly qualified shall be deemed a sufficient number for proceeding to a ballot.]

(2.) No widows are capable of being elected but those of the town of King's-Cliffe, nor are any such capable of having a share in the ballot who have already received the parish allowance for their support. [By order of the Court of Chancery, Dec. 22d. 1826. All ancient and deserving women, as well maidens as widows, of the parish of King's-Cliffe, who have not received parochial relief, shall be qualified for admission into the said almshouses.]

(3.) The two houses at Mr. Law's school, are as free for ancient maidens as for widows, providing they have the proper qualifications.

(4.) No election of a widow or ancient maiden is to be proceeded upon, till all the Trustees have had notice of the vacancy, and the day appointed for filling it up. Nor is any election to be made, unless three of the Trustees be present at it to oversee the ballot.

(5.) None are looked upon as qualified to be chosen merely because they are old and poor, but only such old and poor women as are of good report for their sobriety, industry, and Christian behaviour in their several stations. The want of these virtuous qualifications is not to be dispensed with; it being our whole desire and intention by these provisions, to reward the virtue and merit of such ancient women, and prevent their falling to the straitness of a parish allowance in the time of their age and infirmities.

(6.) If, therefore, in any after times any ancient women of ill manners, of unchristian behaviour, who have had the character of idle, gossiping, or slothful persons, should be nominated, or suffered to have a share in a ballot for any of these houses; such disregard of virtuous qualifications would be as great a violation of the nature and design of these charities, as if young women, or persons of another parish, were chosen in them.

(7.) No ancient widow or maiden that has more than forty shillings a year of her own is capable of being elected. [By Order of the Court of Chancery, Dec. 22d. 1826. No such poor woman as aforesaid, who has an income of her own of five pounds a year, shall be disqualified for such admission, but that all poor women having more than five pounds a year shall be excluded.]

(8.) The names of the women that are admitted by the Trustees as qualified, are each of them to be written separately in a bit of paper, folded in the same form, and sealed up. They are to be

Page 305. No. 6. permitted both for good ends. I say nothing directly against this expression, knowing not only that it is most common, but also that we cannot well avoid it. But I must say, nevertheless, that it is not sufficient to declare the depth; because God's permitting the fall for good ends, seems to presuppose that he could and would have hindered it, if he had not seen good ends therein. Which cannot be said by any that understands with Behmen, what God is. For such a one will grant indeed, that the fall must serve for good ends; but he will say also, that God could not have hindered it, and will be able to understand, that by so saying, he doth not make him impotent, nor derogate anything from his omnipotence, any more than by saying, God cannot save him that will not be saved, or, which is the same, that will not leave off his own will: which is a good and true assertion. No ill consequences, therefore, do follow from saying, God could not, but rather in abundance might they follow from saying, God could have hindered the fall, and did not, and says nevertheless still of himself, As I live, I will not the death of the sinner.

Page 305. No. 7. To the last words might well and pertinently be added—or a predestinate purpose of the free gift of grace. Because Behmen calleth it so also, and it is of a good consequence to express that all this is owned to be free grace; that when afterwards something is said of the human will, and its required turning, it may not be so easily mistaken, as if salvation were by Behmen ascribed unto man's will.

Ibid. No. 8. I see no reason why here, after these first words, God purposed or willed by an eternal will in himself, these words are added, which they call election, ROMANS. vi. 16. For (1.) It is certain that Behmen doth not call this will, election. (2.) That which is expressed in the four first lines of this position, might rather be called—God's universal call; which is so different from election, that the Scripture attributes that former unto many, and this latter unto few. And (3.) In the quotation of the Scripture there must be a mistake, so that one place is set for another; seeing that in ROM. vi. 16. nothing may be found which could here be referred to. But I think that which St. Paul saith is here meant, viz., that man was chosen in Christ from before the foundation of the world. And if this be meant, it is true indeed, that it is the first ground of election, nay, in a sense election itself, so far as it could be in God before man was a creature: but it is not yet that which Behmen calleth so, when he declareth what election is in its full sense, from which it is greatly different. For, that which was done in God from before the foundation of the world, reacheth all men; as in this position is said, that God willed to put his grace into all mens' hearts, without any condition required of them: but this which properly is called election, reacheth not all, but only a few; because not all, but [alas!] only a few do fulfil the condition that here is required, viz., to turn their wills into that grace.

Page 305. No. 9. Here I would not say, which they call God's clock-work, but rather—and they compare it to a clock-work. Because, though Behmen sometimes calleth it so, when he discourseth thereof, yet it is not an appropriate name, whereby this outward mysterium could be distinguished from the inward. But as the word mysterium is common unto both, and is distinguished by outward and inward, so also can this name of clock-work be, etc.

Ibid. No. 10. In general, I must observe, concerning this whole tenth position, that so many put into a hat and shaken about, whilst one of the schoolboys puts in his hand and takes one of them out, and that which is first taken out is the widow elected. And so again a second time, if a second widow is to be chosen. (N.B.) This method is to be practised in the election of a master or mistress.

(9.) It is earnestly requested, that it be an indispensable rule to have this Fifth Chapter, concerning qualifications, audibly and distinctly read by the agent in the presence of the Trustees before they proceed to the election of any widow, and that the master of the school be ordered to wait in the room during the time of the election. As also that the Third Chapter of this book, concerning the election of a master or mistress, be constantly read by the agent before the election of either of them be proceeded upon. And that the candidates which are admitted by the Trustees as qualified, may be ordered to be present at the ballot.

(10.) All the ancient widows, or maidens, are to have two shillings and sixpence paid them on every Saturday throughout the year, and ten shillings to each of them every Lady-day to help them to firing.

(11.) If a master of the boys, having behaved well, is through age or infirmities become quite incapable of doing his duty in the school, he is to be put upon half-pay, have a room allowed him in the schoolhouse, and a new master is to be chosen in his stead.

(12.) If the same happens to be the case of the mistress, she is to be put into one of the houses belonging to that school, without a ballot. But if there be no vacancy, she is to have half-pay till that happens, and any other farther provision that the Trustees shall judge her case to require. And a new mistress is to be chosen in her stead.

(12.) When it shall come to pass that there shall be no relations of Mr. Law, an inhabitant of King's-Cliffe, or properly qualified in the opinion of the Trustees, to be Agent, then some farmer or tradesman of King's-Cliffe, having more than ten pounds a year real estate in Cliffe, is to be chosen Agent by the Trustees, at a meeting appointed for that purpose; but such meeting is not to be deemed sufficient to form a board for that purpose, unless all the Trustees have been first informed of it, and three of them at least be present at it.

(14.) No orders are to be made, or entered into the book of orders as such, but those which are made by the Trustees at their annual audit, and such are to be entered into the book of orders in the presence of the Trustees by their agent.

(15.) All kinds of books, pens, ink, and paper that are used in either school, are to be provided for them by the agent; and every boy and girl at their going out of the school, are to have a new Bible, and Book of Common Prayer distinct from it, given to them.

(16.) All the girls are to be kept continually at some sort of work, useful to them and their parents. But no spinning wheel is to be brought into the school, or used there either by the mistress or any of the scholars.

(17.) No holidays are to be allowed in either school, but those of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide. In harvest time they are allowed to glean in the fields for their parents, after having said each of them one lesson early in the morning.

different things, expressed therein so shortly, do make the sense very obscure, as to my sight; but may be it is not so in the sight of others. In particular I have to observe (1.) The words, which God for wise and good ends permitted to remain in him, are tolerable indeed; but much nearer to the bottom would it reach, if it were said—that this principle of evil cannot but remain in him until the day of judgment, appointed for a separation of good and evil. (2.) The words, page 307 which is reprobation, are true, but do not give the whole or full sense of what reprobation is, according to Behmen's depth, and that sense wherein he frequently taketh this word. For, when a man, not having turned out of the principle of evil, is rejected by God to all eternity, this is his reprobation indeed, in its accomplishment and irrevocability. But, Behmen calleth that also reprobation, (and so election,) which is done in and with man in time, wherein it may be revoked and altered. For instance: as long as a man remaineth voluntarily under the power of the principle of evil, he is actually reprobated and rejected, because he is actually excluded from communion with God in his love and light. But such a man may, during this life, turn his will, and elect the principle of grace in him; and then he is by that re-elected actually, because he cometh to have actually communion with God in love and light. Though this also is not yet unalterable; for he may turn out of the grace again, and if he doth, he is reprobated again, etc. And still deeper, Behmen declareth also, how of all these alterations man maketh in time, may be conceived and said—such a man was elected or reprobated from eternity, notwithstanding that he changeth his will several times. (3.) The words, page 306, with his will, or at least a desire, may be taken in a right sense indeed, but may also easily give an occasion to object something, which might be prevented by saying—if he turneth not out of it effectually, or at least in an earnest desire to do so.

Page 307. No. 11. is called—God's manifestation in anger, awakened by man's sins, and his formed word in man, which is the fire, etc. Here the sense is very ambiguous; for, as for my part, I can hardly discern whether the meaning be this, that the principle of the evil of punishment in man is called God's formed word in man; or whether it be this, that anger is awakened by man's sins and by his formed word. And though I have reason to believe it shall be that former, yet I see not how the following definition can be applicable to this formed word, when it is said, it is the fire in man separated from the light, upon a misuse of its free will; though it is applicable to the principle of the evil of punishment in man. From whence then it appears, that this principle is not called by Behmen, God's formed word in man. But so's the thing to be conceived: Behmen calleth the whole man a formed word of God, from his very creation, before the fire in him was separated from the light, upon a misuse of his free will. And now, after it is separated, like as man retaineth, notwithstanding this separation, the name of a creature, so he may retain also that of a formed word, and may be called so: not as if this denomination were now so proper unto him, and did exactly declare what he is (which rather might be declared by calling him deformed); but only, because he is still the same creature in substance, which was formed by God, notwithstanding that he hath deformed himself. But to give the name of a formed word, directly to the fire in man separated from the light, is not excusable. And though it may be that Behmen hath such words, yet they will certainly stand with him quite in another construction. Wherefore, then, I think this particular of (18.) The master at his first entrance into the school in the morning is to pray with the children, and again at twelve o'clock, except on those days when they go to church; and again at their breaking up in the evening.

(19.) The mistress is to observe those hours, and forms of prayer, and chanting of psalms, as has been practised from the beginning in that school. [See the annexed "Rules."]

(20.) All the scholars of each school are to be brought before the Trustees at their Easter audit, in their new clothes, to be inspected and examined by them as they shall think proper.

(21.) The lending library in the schoolhouse, consisting of books of piety in English, are to be under the care of the schoolmaster, who is to lend them out according to the rules there laid down, for which he is to be accountable to the Trustees at their audit, or when they please.

The other small library, consisting of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin Bibles, and a choice collection of the most spiritual Christian writers in the learned and foreign languages, is also to be under the care of the schoolmaster, for the use and benefit of the neighbouring Clergy, to whom any of these books may be lent, but for no longer time than three months. And the Rector of King's Cliffe is desired to inspect the registered account of the books lent out, every quarter of the year, that any matter to be complained of, may be laid before the Trustees.

(22.) In witness of all these presents, and for the confirmation thereof, we have hereto this sixth of May, in the year of our Lord 1754, set to our names.—ELIZABETH HUTCHESON.—WILLIAM LAW." The printed account closes with an "APPENDIX, Containing a Draught of a Deed of Appointment, to serve as a Precedent upon the Demise of any of the Trustees for the Charities aforementioned."

The following "Rules to be observed by all the Girls," copied from an imperfect MS., fairly written, with corrections in the handwriting of Mr. Law, afford an insight into the devout and truly Christian principles, according to which Mr. Law's charity was conducted. It is however to be noted, that the rules antecedent to No. 10, are taken from a rough MS., of a more recent date, in the handwriting of Miss Gibbon.

The first three or four Rules recite the time of coming in winter and summer, the courteous behaviour to be practised, and the number of lessons to be said before the hours of eleven and five, in the morning and afternoon.

4. Every one, at her first entrance in the morning, shall kneel down by her mistress, and with her hands held up together, shall say the prayers appointed for the morning; and at their going away, shall, in their turn, say such prayers as are for the evening. and at their rising up, shall make a curtsy.

5. This method is to be strictly observed, till every child is very perfect in repeating those prayers. They must also be often and strictly commanded to say the same prayers night and morning, at home.

6. Every Thursday and Saturday, in the afternoon, they shall only say two lessons; and afterwards be examined, on both those days, in the catechism, making a curtsy at the end of every answer.

the formed word might be left out, and then the rest could be coherent, thus, anger, awakened in his fire in man, separated from the light, upon a misuse, etc.

Page 307. No. 12. If here shall be said, how they call the principle of grace, the nearest and most usual name with Behmen will be this—that they call it the second purpose of God in the blessed name Jesus; as they call the first purpose, according to which Adam was created, the first predestinate will or purpose of righteousness, out of the Father's property. That Behmen calleth that former God's temporary will of grace in the creature, I could not find, though much inquiring after it. If he doth, it will be very seldom, and the circumstances, or whole construction of his discourse, must declare why he calleth it temporary. But this name mentioned, is much in use with him.

Ibid. Line ult. the actual as well as original sins of parents are propagated. Though this is right and true in its right sense, yet I fear it will meet with opposition, and be thought contrary to the Scripture, where it says, The son shall not die for the sins of the father, but each shall die for his own sins. And therefore I think it might be a little explained to this purpose—that by the propagation of actual sins no more is meant, but that the actual sins of the parents infect and pollute their natural seed, and make thereby the turning of the will in their children more difficult for them, than it would be if their essences were not thus infected.

Ibid. (Page 309.) The words, from Adam as out of one lump, might either be left out, or put into another construction; because as they stand now, they make the sense, at least as to me, obscure. That this propagation is derived from Adam down to this day, is understood of itself; and that it was true in Cain, the first-born of a woman, as well as in all other children born after him, is no less evident. And a plain instance thereof we may see (according to Behmen's declaration) in that foolish persuasion of Eve, who thought in a carnal way, she had got the man of the Lord who would be the treader on the serpent. For this principle was so predominant in her first child, that instead of bruising the serpent's head in himself, he bruised the head of his brother, even of him who was a type of the serpent treader.

Ibid. To the last words, heavenly bodies concur, I think could be pertinently added—either aggravating this infection, if their aspects are bad, or lessening the same, by putting a stop to the effects thereof, if they are favourable.

Ibid. No. 13. although a turba enters into the seed. Instead of this I would rather say—although a turba may enter into the seed even of good parents. Because there is a turba already originally, more or less, in every seed of good and evil parents: of which turba is not here spoken, but of a turba which may enter; not which enters necessarily and always into every seed of good parents, but only which may enter from exterior accidents, or actions, or also from evil influences of the stars, etc.

Ibid. they reach not God, is right and true, and if I well remember, it is Behmen's own verbal expression; but plainer and less exposed to objections would it be, if there were said with a nearer termination, as Behmen useth sometimes to determine this expression,—they reach not God in his light, love, and glory.

Page 309. No. 14. The sense contained in the first two lines I would rather thus express—

7. Every girl, as soon as she can say the whole catechism in a ready manner, shall have a shilling given her, before them all, with commendation and exhortation to go on in her duty.

8. Every girl shall have sixpence given her, as soon as she can say by heart the morning and evening prayers.

9. Every one that shall get by heart the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighteenth, or twenty-fifth chapters of St. Matthew; or the sixth or seventh of St. Luke; or the eighteenth or nineteenth of St. John; or the fifteenth chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians, from the twentieth verse, shall have, for every such chapter, a shilling given her, in the presence of all the rest, with commendation and exhortation to love and practice the word of God. They shall also ever after repeat these chapters, one at a time, once every week, in a plain and distinct manner; at which time every other girl shall leave off her work, and quietly listen to the chapter that is repeating. At the end of which chapter they shall all [lifting up their eyes towards heaven,] say, Glory be to thee, O Lord, for this thy holy word; and making a curtsy, every one shall sit down in their proper seat. [Thus far in Miss Gibbon's handwriting, though with the Nos. altered to correspond to the Nos. of the here succeeding rules.]

10. No one shall talk, or laugh, or make any noise in the room where her mistress is; but every one shall keep their proper place, seated at some little distance from each other, whether at work or at their lessons.

11. Every girl that gives the lie to any other girl, or to any person, or that calls another, fool, or uses any rude or unmannerly word, shall, the morning afterwards, as soon as they are all there, be obliged to kneel down before her mistress, and in the presence of them all, say in a plain and distinct manner, these words:—

Our blessed Saviour Jesus Christ hath said, that whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire. I therefore am heartily sorry for the wicked words that I have spoken to my fellow christian; I humbly beg pardon of God, and of all you that are here present, hoping and promising, by the help of God, never to offend again in the like manner.

Then shall the girl that she had abused come and take her up from her knees, and kiss her; and both turning to their mistress, they shall make a curtsy, and return to their seats.

12. Any girl that shall be found out to have told a lie, to have cursed or sworn, or done any undutiful thing to her parents, or to have stolen anything from any other girl, shall stand chained a whole morning to some particular part of the room by herself, and afterwards, in the presence of them all, shall, upon her knees, repeat these words:—

The word of God teaches us, that if we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. I therefore, a wicked child, humbly confess before God, and all you that are here present, that I have grievously sinned against God, in lying, [or cursing, swearing, or stealing, as the case may be.] I am heartily sorry for this great sin, and humbly on my knees beg of God to forgive me. I desire you all to pray for me and to forgive me, and I promise by God's grace never to commit the like fault.

Then shall the mistress and all the girls kneel down, and the mistress shall say this prayer:—

Jesus Christ undertook from eternity to redeem fallen mankind, which was elected or chosen in him from before the foundation of the world. And this alteration I would make, only because Behmen says, in a place where he declareth this text, When Lucifer fell, the foundation of the world was not yet laid; and gives thereby, as it seems, to understand, that the choosing of man in Christ Jesus is to be conceived of, as following in order upon the fall of Lucifer. For so he says also in another place, If Lucifer were not fallen, man would not have been created. Because now Lucifer is fallen indeed before time, (seeing that time began only with the creation of heaven and earth,) but not from all eternity, we may say better—man was chosen from eternity, than from all eternity. And then also the following expression, from before the foundation of the world, is the Scripture's own, which therefore may be kept more safely than that, from all eternity.

Page 309 (also 311). to give up the will into God's righteousness, or anger-fire-will, to be slain, and suffer, and rule over sin. These words must needs be put into another and plainer construction; for they may be taken in a twofold sense, which yet on both sides will be obscure, and not intelligibly enough coherent with the last words. Though the meaning which is intended, may be understood by them that are acquainted with Behmen's style, viz. this,—the first predestinate purpose of righteousness requirerth of man, that he shall give up his own anger-fire-will into God's righteousness, to be slain thereby, and subdued under his love-will: which subduing of his own anger-fire-will he is to suffer, and in the power of his renewed love-will to rule over sin.

Page 310. Q. But can they will this? A. Yes: for (1.) this willing is not a work or doing, but rather a resting or ceasing from the works of their own will. If they can work in their own will, why not also rest from this their own work? when there is no constraining force from without, compelling them irresistibly to work, but only that force which is the nature of their own-will itself, and which cannot be called irresistible, as further shall appear. (2.) This resting is not to be done by a power of their own, but by use of the power of that first grace freely given them for that end; which must be no grace, and can signify nothing to man, if it doth not enable him so far, that he can will this. (3.) This willing is required by God, as the first ground or beginning of their restoration on their side; and God can require nothing of man, but what he hath enabled him to do. (4.) Man's own will excludes God, and shuts the door upon him: and to say—God shall open this door, not man, is to say—God shall open the eyes of a man that shuts them wilfully, that he may see the sun; and man is not required to do it, though he can open them, by that moving faculty which God hath placed in his eyelids. (5.) A wheel running the contrary way to what it shall run according to its master's will, must first be stopped, before it can be set by him to run that way which he pleaseth. And that this first stopping, as to the human own-will, cannot be done by God, but must be done by man, is evident from the difference between a wheel, which is but dead and passive, and a human will, which is a living active thing. But especially and chiefly is it evident from the nature of a will. And that this doth not make God impotent, is evident also from hence, that notwithstanding it is rightly said in one respect—God cannot, but man must do it; it is also rightly said in another—God doth it, and hath done it, because it is he alone of whom man hath this stopping grace. (6.) If we say, Man cannot will, we must needs say, God doth 'Almighty God, who art always more ready to hear, than we to pray, who desireth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should turn from his sins and be saved: We beseech thee to have mercy upon this child, who hath thus confessed her sins unto thee. And grant that both she, and all of us here present, may, by the assistance of thy holy Spirit, be preserved from all sin, strengthened in all goodness, and serve thee faithfully all the days of our life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.' Amen. Then shall all the girls rise, and making a curtsy, return to their seats.

13. Any girl that continues to commit these faults, after the third time Mr. George Law shall be called in, and he shall turn her away.

14. Every girl when she walks in the streets, shall make curtsies to all masters and mistresses of families, and to all ancient people, whether rich or poor. They shall also make a curtsy when they enter into any house, and at their coming out of it.

15. Every girl shall be constant at church at all times of divine service, as well on the weekdays, as on Sundays. They shall always go up to be catechised at those times that the minister appoints. They shall all learn to sing Psalms, and get those by heart that are most commonly sung.

They must always go to church at all funerals, and placing themselves at those times together, all of them join in singing the Psalm, that shall be then appointed.

16. Every girl that refuses, or neglects to observe these Rules, shall be turned away, and another chosen into her place.

17. The mistress shall every fortnight, on the Monday morning, constantly read over all these Rules to all the children in a plain distinct manner, that they may fully understand them. After which all shall kneel down, and the mistress shall say the following Prayer; every child repeating it after her, and at the end all saying, Amen:—

(The Prayer.) 'Almighty and most merciful Father, we give thee humble thanks for all thy mercies to us and to all mankind. We bless thy holy name for that thou hast called us to this place, to be brought up in thy faith and fear, to learn thy holy word, and turn our hearts to thee in the days of our youth. We here offer ourselves, our souls, and bodies unto thee. We humbly beseech thee to assist us with thy grace, that we may carefully observe these and all other rules of holy living, that shall be taught us. Grant, holy Father, that we, thus beginning our lives in humility and labour, in prayer and reading, may, as we grow in age, grow in good works, and at last obtain the salvation of our souls, through the merits and mediation of our blessed Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ. Our Father which art in heaven, etc.'

18. This prayer is to be said every morning, before they begin their lessons, or work, by the mistress, the girls saying after her. [Annexed to the Rules are the Prayers, which are these following.]

A Private Prayer for the Morning, to be taught the children.—'Oh, eternal and glorious God, in whom we all live, and move, and have our being, I bless thy holy name for preserving me from the dangers of the night past, and granting me another morning to praise thy mercy and goodness towards me. I, thy weak creature, wanting thy help and assistance, humbly beseech thee to be my guide and protector in all that I shall do this day. Grant I may set thee always before my eyes, and that knowing thee to be everywhere present, I may in all places be afraid of thinking, saying, hinder him; for the devil cannot force the human will, Voluntas cogi non potest, and there is no power superior to man but God. But now this latter, that God should hinder him, is false; that former, therefore, that man can will, must needs be true. (7.) If by this assertion, Man can will, were meant, that this willing is so efficacious, as that he can thereby take unto himself strength, salvation, life, and light, it would be false, indeed; because it would rob God of what is due to him only, and attribute to man what no creature can be capable of. But because there is no more meant by it, but that he can stand still from his head-strong course in own-will, and so be emptied of himself, and consequently able to receive into him that salvation, life, and light, which then will be given him by God, it must needs be true: because, as on the one hand it is consistent with the honour of God, unto whom all and every good gift is ascribed, so on the other, it agrees with the nature of a rational, living and moving creature; which cannot but justly be required to stand first still from taking in his own evil things, before he do receive the good gifts of God. (8.) The testimonies of such, as had not only a real experience in the work of regeneration, but also illuminated eyes especially, to see deeply what man is, what is in man, and what man's will is, all tending to the destruction of his own-will, are transcendently more firm and valuable, than all that reason can suggest in own-will's defence. (9.) The testimonies of the Scripture plainly confirm, that man can will; and even these alone should convince us of this truth, and keep under all that would make an insurrection against it. Moses, the mediator of the old covenant, says expressly, I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing; therefore choose life, etc. Pray, what signifieth this saying, and this command, if man cannot choose life by standing still and hearkening to the voice of God? And Jesus, the great Mediator of the New Testament, says: O Jerusalem—how often would I have gathered thy children together—and ye would not. Pray, how could he have laid to their charge their not willing, and their resisting thereby his will, if they could not have willed, and concurred with his will?

Page 311. No. 16. fulfilled God's righteousness, in the love and in the anger, turning it into divine joy. These words have indeed a sense in them, but more expressive and nearer to Behmen's ground would it be, if the construction were made thus—fulfilled God's righteousness, transmuted (or also filled) the Father's anger with his love and humility, and turned it, in the human soul, into divine joy.

Ibid. No. 17. Here I think it might be most proper to say what this redemption wrought in us is, and more explicitly, how it is wrought in us. Viz., that it is, according to the Scripture, a deliverance from the old Adam's life predominant in us; and is wrought out in us by means of his leading us by his Spirit, and our following after him, [N.B.] in a daily increasing conformity to his life and death. For what here is said in the last words, viz., through a gracious concurring efficacy of his divinity and humanity, is true indeed, but is not all; seeing that it relates only to what is on his side, but makes no mention of what is on ours.

Page 313. No. 18. had not been substantial in any of the faithful; that is, the six spirits in the soul had not been harmonised into one seventh substance. This explication of the word substantial, is indeed right and good, and intelligible to them that have read Behmen; but unto others it might or doing any kind of evil. Make me modest and humble in all my behaviour, diligent and laborious in my proper work, dutiful and obedient to my parents, masters and mistresses; and, above all, thankful to thee for all thy mercies. Fill my heart with thy holy Spirit, that I may love to pray to thee, delight in reading the holy Scriptures, be thankful to those that teach me my duty, and take daily care to remember and practise all that I am taught. All this I humbly beseech thee to grant me, for the sake and sufferings of my blessed Saviour, Jesus Christ. Our Father, which art in heaven, etc.'

A Private Prayer for the Evening, to be taught the girls.—'Almighty God, who art everywhere present, who sees and knowest all our words and actions, forgive me, I beseech thee, all the evils that I have this day done in thy sight. Grant that all the sins of my life past may be washed away by the precious blood of my Saviour, Jesus Christ; and that through his merits I may obtain the assistance of thy holy Spirit, to live soberly, righteously, and godly all the days of my life. Into thy hands, O God, I commend my soul and my body this night. Bless me, I beseech thee, with quiet rest and sleep, and grant that I may be early up at my praises and prayers unto thee. Bless O Lord, with thy favour and goodness, my parents, relations, friends, and enemies of all kinds; do good, I beseech thee, to their souls and bodies here, and bring them to everlasting happiness hereafter, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Our Father which art in heaven, etc.'

A Prayer to be said after the chanting of the Psalm, at Nine o'clock in the morning.—'O, Eternal God, fountain of all light and glory, who, about this hour of the day, didst send down thy holy Spirit, in the shape of cloven tongues, upon the apostles, send down, I beseech thee, the same Spirit of holiness upon me. Make my soul and body a temple of thy divine Spirit, that I may be always full of holy desires, and heavenly affections. Grant that I may watch and keep my heart with all diligence, be so careful of all my words, so just and pious in all my actions, that I may never grieve or separate thy holy Spirit from me. Lord fill my soul with heavenly light, with divine wisdom, that I may be delivered from the vanities and follies of this world; that I may love thee above all things, delight in holiness and virtue, and in all my actions seek thy honour, and the salvation of my own soul. This I beg through the merits and sufferings of my blessed Saviour, Jesus Christ. Our Father, etc.'

A Prayer to be said after the chanting of the Psalm, at or near Twelve o'clock.—'O holy and glorious Lord God, whose blessed Son Jesus Christ did, about this hour of the day die upon the cross for me and all sinners; let the return of this hour continually fill my mind with praise and thanks unto thee, for so merciful a Saviour and Redeemer. Grant that all sinful and wicked affections may die in me. Fill me with the holy, humble, and suffering spirit of my blessed Saviour, that I may evermore dwell in Christ, and Christ in me. And when thou comest, O holy Jesus, to judge the quick and dead, grant that I may be one of those happy creatures to whom thou shalt say, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you. Even so, Lord Jesus. Amen. Amen. Our Father, etc.'

A Prayer after the chanting of the Psalm, at Three o'clock.—'O blessed Lord God, from whose goodness I have received life and death, and everything that I enjoy, raise my heart unto thee, be plainer, and not meet so easily with opposition, if there were said—that is, none of them had nor could have put on the new-born humanity, or Christ's new paradisaical body, because this was not yet come down from heaven. And their putting on Christ only spiritually, in faith and hope, could be declared, if needful, by showing the difference between their eating manna and drinking water out of the rock, and a Christian's eating and drinking the flesh and blood of Christ. But if that former explication shall be left as it is, there might be made only this little alteration, viz., instead of saying, in the soul, might be said better—in the human nature. Because this harmonising the six spirits is not only to be referred to the soul, but to the whole human nature, and even to the body of man especially.

Ibid. No. 19. opening itself in the very womb. Pertinently could be here added—when the soul gets its life in the child; for so this opening would be more determined: and hereby would be intimated, that when the child cometh to be a living soul out of the first principle's properties of fire, the second principle of light also is opened; and this because of the incarnation of Christ, who dwelleth therein, and from that instant is ready to protect, to be united to, and to have the soul in his love, and with him where he is. [N.B.]

Ibid. No. 20. whose strong persevering act they call, faith. This is indeed true enough; yet so, that from this denomination of faith, even that also be not excluded which is but weak, and only to be compared, as the prophet doth, to a bruised reed, or to a smoking flax. For Behmen expressly calleth faith even that little also, which of this nature is in many at their departing this life; and whereof he saith, that they hang, as it were, but on a thread (of faith).

Ibid. he gives himself (that is, his Divine spirit, and spiritual body, and all the heavenly things and benefits accompanying both,) into the willing mind. All this is true also; but so that I think it should be a little limited, by an addition of some few words. For in this beginning, God gives not these things (especially the spiritual body) distinctly and manifestly, but implicitly and secretly, without the soul's knowledge or perception. But the soul is in this state, like unto Joseph's brethren, who knew not what a great gift of grace they had, when not only their money for the corn, but also their brother's silver cup, was laid into their sacks. See Behmen's explication in the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM.

Page 315. Line 5. in which fire in man they remain, even after they are forgiven; which forgiveness is the first justification or forgiveness. All this is also true and plain enough to him that understandeth Behmen's ground; but unto others that know not what or how the forgiveness is, it cannot but be obscure; and there might be objected, that the Scripture says nothing of a first and second justification, etc. Wherefore, then, I think it might be made plainer, so that the meaning might appear distinctly to be this,—in the central fire the sins remain, not only so as to appear no more, if the soul goes forward directly and constantly; but also so as to appear, and to lay hold on the soul immediately again, if the same turns back. And therefore, with respect to them that go directly forward, this justification needs not to be called the first, because there is not following upon it such another as could be called the second. But with respect to such as fall back, and yet rise afterwards and return again, it may be called the first, because in them the same process is then repeated again a second time. But if we understand by the word first, nothing more than a beginning or first degree of justification, which henceforward increaseth more and more, there is no difficulty in the matter, nor do I see that any such objection against it can be made.

Page 315. No. 21. Christ's dying in them. This, I think, might either wholly be left out, or explained by adding this, or something the like—or Christ's dying made in them their own. Because an ignorant one might easily misunderstand the meaning, and think the words of the Scripture to be a strong objection against it, where it is said, Christ risen from the dead dieth no more.

Ibid. We are to fulfil all the law of righteousness by the Divine substance in us. This also might easily be misapprehended, and wants therefore to be expressed a little plainer. For one might think the meaning thereof is, that the Lord Christ's fulfilling is defective and insufficient, if we do not complete it by our fulfilling the same with our works or sufferings. Whereas the meaning is no more than this—that it is defective in us, or unprofitable unto us, if we have not in us that Divine substance which hath all sufficiently fulfilled all the law. And that, by having the same in us, and by our being conformable thereto, our own great emptiness of the Divine righteousness is really filled. Wherefore, then, we are rightly said to fulfil it, though not we do it, but he in us; like as the apostle says, I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me.

Page 316. Q. How do they distinguish regeneration—pardon of sins, justification, sanctification, purification, and redemption? A. They are not so nice as to give a distinct definition of each of these names; but from their declaration of the whole redeeming work, it appears sufficiently that they conceive them to be but so many different denominations of one and the same principal thing, expressing only several respects and different circumstances thereof, all so connected, that none that I may love, and worship, and adore thy goodness, in everything that happens to me; that I may be free from murmuring and complaints, always taking everything to be for the best, which thy goodness suffers to fall upon me. Grant, my good God, that I may love all my fellow-creatures as myself; that I may be kind and tender-hearted to all people, sorry for their troubles, and glad at every good thing that happens to them. Grant I may love everybody as my blessed Saviour has loved me; that I may pray for them, and do them all the good that I can; that I may never say an unkind word, or do an unkind thing to anybody, whether friend or enemy. Grant this, O Lord, for the sake of my blessed Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen. Our Father, etc.'

A Prayer after the chanting of the Psalm, in the Evening.—'Blessed be thy holy name, O Lord, for preserving me from all the dangers of this day. Grant that I may receive this evening, as if it were to be my last; that I may so confess and bewail my sins before thee, as if I were never to see another day in this world. And as every day adds to the number of my sins, so let every evening add something to the truth and sincerity of my repentance. Lord, my time is a mere shadow, and passeth away like a dream; and as I now see an end of this day, so shall I soon see an end of my life. Teach me, therefore, good God, so to meditate upon my latter end, that the thoughts of death, resurrection, and judgment, may fill my heart with true wisdom. And when the time cometh that my soul must go amongst departed spirits, and my body fall into the grave, grant that I may then know and feel, how happy and blessed are those dead that die in the Lord. Lord, hear my of them is superfluous, and none can be separated from the rest. That principal thing is this, according to the Gospel, whereof it is the whole sum and substance in short, (viz.) The sinner is saved in and by Jesus Christ, whom the Father hath sent, to bring him back, upon his narrow way, from under the powers of darkness, into his kingdom of light. Now herein, they will say, all these names are contained, and do declare this only truth, but so, that each of them hath its own peculiar relation, either unto this or unto that particular thereof. And so, redemption expresseth in general this whole work, but with a chief respect to the Saviour himself, through whom man is redeemed, and to that great price he paid for him. Pardon of sins represents the same redemption, but as in its beginning, or as to its first effect on the side of man. Justification the same again, but with a relation to the Father, by and before whom, he whose sins are pardoned, is justified as one that hath fulfilled all the law; and thus also owned to have now a free access unto himself, through him who is himself his justification in him. Purification declareth of this redeeming and justifying work, that though it be wrought out and completed by Jesus Christ at once, yet it is not so in man, who wants continually and gradually more and more to be redeemed from his daily sins, failings, and infirmities, as long as he is upon the way; and even this is nothing else but a gradual purification, which intimates also something of the condition of this way, viz., that it is narrow, full of crosses, trials, temptations, etc., as so many proper means by which this purification is effected. Sanctification represents that same again, but so as to express more especially, in opposition to man's former sinful state, what by this redemption, justification, and purification is effected in him, both as to himself, and as in the sight of God, viz., holiness, without which he cannot see the kingdom of light. And regeneration expresseth in general again this whole saving work, but so that it declareth as on the side of man, what it is in and to him; how that which the Saviour hath done for him cometh to be done also in him, and so also by what means it is made profitable unto him: intimating also, moreover, not only his having been degenerated, but also his being redeemed effectually, in such a process as is directly opposite to his first natural generation.

Page 317. No. 23. He leads a new life from a new principle, as Christ did after his resurrection. These last words, as Christ did after his resurrection, I find might better be left out, because they cannot be applicable, without a great limitation to this new life of man. And in the places quoted out of the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, xxix. 8, 9; and ELECTION, x. 99, 100, I can see nothing to support such a construction. For though this is true, that in such a regenerated man Christ is really risen; and this also, that such a man leads a new life from a new principle, yet this new life cannot be compared to the life of Christ after his resurrection, but might rather be compared to his life in this world, before his death. Seeing that the soul of such a man is not yet, as his soul was, separated from the mortal body, and so not yet entered into that paradisaical state which he entered into at his death and resurrection; and that this expression, of leading a new life from a new principle, implieth only a ruling over and keeping under sin in the flesh, in opposition to the old Adam's life, which he lived before his regeneration, when sin was predominant therein: in which sense we cannot say at all, that Christ led such a life after his resurrection. And though this new life of a regenerated man, considered as to itself only, and as abstracted from what it is still joined to, may be truly said to be in and with Christ, according to St. Paul's word, Our conversation is in heaven, so that, in some sense, it may be said to be comparable to the life of Christ; yet this sense belongeth not at all to this outward principle, and is not in this world, but in its own heaven: nay, this life is not yet manifest, but, according to the Scripture, hid with Christ in God, and therefore not yet such a life as Christ lived after his resurrection, who wholly lived in paradise, and was able to show forth the glory thereof unto others. And moreover, I cannot see that it would be a fit expression to say, Christ after his resurrection led a new life from a new principle: for one might presently reply, that this were as much as to say, He led, before his death, an old life, from another or old principle; whereas, all his life was from the same principle, and he was the new or second Adam, not only after his resurrection, but also before his death.

Page 317. No. 25. all is from Christ working in us. This is well enough, indeed; but only for to prevent a needless and insignificant objection there might be said, —all is from God the Father, and Christ, working in us through the Holy Spirit. For then the words of our Saviour, No man cometh unto me unless the Father draw him (from the which something, with some appearance, might be objected), cannot serve unto any for such an objection.

Page 319, line 12. God hath chosen none but Christ in his members. This, I think, is one, and perhaps the chief of those expressions, of which in the next following question it is said, they seem to be less accurate than they should be. And it is true, that such as take more notice of the literal construction in the Scripture words, than of the coherence of truth in the interior scripture sense, and of this or that peculiar aim or intent in such or such a place of the Scripture, may have a good reason to say so of this expression; because the Scripture doth not say, God hath chosen prayer through the merits of my blessed Saviour, Jesus Christ. Amen. Our Father, etc.'

A Prayer on entering into the Church. —'Lord, receive me, I beseech thee, in this thy holy house of prayer, and grant that I may worship and pray unto thee, with as much reverence and godly fear, as if I saw the heavens open, and all the angels that stand round thy throne. Amen.'

A Prayer at the End of Divine Service. —'Blessed be thy holy name, O Lord, for this opportunity of serving thee. Grant that wherever I go, I may live and walk as in thy holy presence. Amen.'

To which the writer takes the liberty to add,
A Prayer to be said before every Meal. —Praised be thy holy name, O Lord, for this supply of my daily bread. May I partake of it with a humble and grateful heart, as knowing that I am a mere dependent on thy bounty, for life, and health, and every blessing. Amen.

Such are the particulars of the charities established at King's-Cliffe by Mr. Law, and under his direction; which, in common with all the other public acts and monuments of his life, are calculated to endear his name, and character for wisdom, piety, and benevolence, to the latest generations.

The reader who is acquainted with his 'Serious Call,' will doubtless have recognised the conformity of the incipient religious practices of the school, with the principles of piety as to regular hours of devotion each day, set forth in so rational and inviting a manner in that work, and so forcibly recommended therein to be observed by all orders and conditions of Christians, either fully or

Christ in man, but man in Christ; which is, as to the grammatical construction, quite the contrary. But as the Scripture words express that rightly, which the apostle in that place intended to express, relating to what was done before the foundation of the world, in that general election spoker of above; so also Behmen's words express rightly and significantly that which he would have expressed, relating to that particular election of which our Saviour saith, many are called, but few are chosen. For in that former, man was chosen in Christ; and in this latter, the same sense is not indeed nullified, nor contradicted: but more significantly, but more significantly, Man is chosen in Christ, the apostle could have said, Christ is chosen in man; because he was to declare, that in this election nothing is regarded nor looked upon by God but Christ, and that all what is not Christ, and Christ's in man, is reprobated. If, then, out of the numberless number of men, none is chosen but he that hath Christ in him, and none chosen for any other reason but for this only, that he hath Christ in him, and that he is a living member of that head, which alone hath a right to the kingdom of heaven, may we not as well say, in one sense, Christ only is chosen in man, as we may say in another, Man is chosen in Christ only? Nay, if all whatever is in such a man, besides his being a living member of Christ, is to be reprobated, what then, can we think, is there left in man, which could be said to be chosen, but only Christ? Just such another sense, running exactly parallel with this, we may find in the words of our Saviour, saying, None ascendeth up into heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven. In the which words, he attributes unto himself alone that which he makes all his living members partakers of; for they also ascend up with him by no other reason, but by this same, that they are his living members, and have in them, may also are in him, that which came down from heaven. This he knew and affirmed, and yet, notwithstanding this, he speaketh so plainly in these words of himself only, excluding all what he is not himself. If we, then, can say soundly, truly, and exactly enough, upon our Saviour's own words, that none ascendeth up into heaven but Christ, why may we not say also in the same sense, that none is chosen by God (to ascend up into heaven) but Christ, even Christ in his living members?

Page 319. Q. ult. A fourth important reason could here be added, viz. this,—because it is formed by concurrence of his personal body, wherein he hath redeemed us. So that upon this particular account, we are not only spirit of his spirit, but also flesh of his flesh; and bear, therefore, justly his name, as children ought to bear the name of their Father.

Page 320. they say, that this omnipresent body is the New Jerusalem, etc. Here, I think, the sense of Behmen could be represented more distinctly thus,—The universal body of Christ is that tabernacle of God with men, and that New Jerusalem spoken of in the Revelation; and that same also, but considered especially as formed in many thousands of heavenly human bodies, as so many living stones combined together, is that glorious temple prophesied of by Ezekiel, which shall be seen before the corruptibility puts wholly on incorruptibility. For though Behmen, in the places quoted out of the THREE PRINCIPLES, doth not himself make such a distinction, yet from a collation of other places of his, it appears sufficiently that this is his sense.

Page 321. Q. 2. But if it be omnipresent it will then be God. A. No; because it hath only a circumferential, etc. I had formerly used that expression of a central omnipresence, with relation to God, but not that other of a circumferential one. And though that former might seem to carry along with it this latter, which also would be well enough, and not hurtful at all, if but taken in a deeper sense than I see it is taken, when there is replied, If it be only circumferentially everywhere, it is not omnipresent, because it is not centrally present: for then it would evidence itself that this objection signifieth nothing, and that the one element is verily also centrally present in one sense, viz. in that which is required to its own kind of omnipresence, but not in another, viz. not in that which is attributable unto God alone,—though, I say, that former expression of centrally, might seem to carry along with it this latter also of circumferentially, yet here it doth not so in this matter; because I had declared what I mean by centrally, and that I do not take this word as in opposition to a circumference, from which its centre is distinct as a small point standing in the midst thereof, and being nowhere present but in its own narrow central place; but that I take it as in opposition to an out-birth or superficies, of which this so-called centre is the internal ground or bottom as great as, nay greater also than the whole outbirth, or all the circumference (if we will call it so). From whence I further showed a great and even a twofold difference, between omnipresence, as attributed unto God alone, and omnipresence (though I wished we might here have another word) as attributable unto the one element. And all this was declared to my thinking (as I said also in the conclusion thereof) so, as to be not only intelligible enough, but even palpable as it were, and obvious unto common sense. Seeing then, now, that if I should explain this distinction, as in the next following question is desired, I could not do it without another prolixity, nor hope to be plainer than I was in that former declaration, I think, therefore, these expressions of central and circumferential might be wholly laid aside, and the question here proposed, If the briefly, according to their respective opportunities and circumstances of life, as sure means where faithfully employed, of 'growth in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.' Which is, also, a practice no less earnestly recommended by the eminently pious bishop, Jeremy Taylor, in his 'Holy Living and Dying,' as by the most experienced masters of the spiritual life in all ages. And indeed, without a regular recurrence to God, physically as well as mentally, at stated times during each day, by all persons, whatever their spiritual knowledge and attainments, the life of God cannot be maintained in the soul, according to that true classical order of increase and development, which it was the design of the all-wise redeemer and vine-dresser of souls to promote, by his discourses on the efficacy of frequent and importunate prayer, by his divine sermon on the mount, concerning the duties and exercises that are to support the spiritual life, as it becomes generated by prayer, as well as to be the fruits of it, and by the example of his own continual practice, both in 'the flesh' and in 'the spirit,' in 'strong crying and tears,' and 'groanings that cannot be uttered.' In a word, the spirit of prayer is the only standard of a gospel christian: not particular opinions upon so termed evangelical doctrines, free grace, justification by faith, election, and the like, not studied discourses upon the fulfilment of prophecy, the downfall of popery, or the second coming of Christ, not even fervent exhortations to repentance and holiness, nor yet an ability to kindle a flame of seraphic love in the hearts of an auditory; but regular earnest psychological and physical devotion, and that outward conversation which flows from such a state of heart.

one element be omnipresent it will then be God; might be answered thus: A. No; because there is the greatest difference between what we mean by the omnipresence of God, and the omnipresence of the one eternal element. For when we say God is omnipresent, we understand that he is everywhere without any kind of extension or dilatation of his being; and even so as to fulfil all things, to dwell in all, and both to give and uphold by his presence every exterior being, remaining, nevertheless, himself free from them all, and comprehended by none of them: all which is attributable unto his omnipresence alone. But when we say (for want of another expression) the one element is omnipresent, we mean but thus much, that in this outward world (whereof as on one part it is the ground) there is no place to be imagined of which we could not say, The one element is there, but in its own interior principle: for if the spiritual ground, root, or bottom were not there, the outbirth thereof could not be there neither. This answer, I think, might suffice: but if it were thought needful, it could be declared further, by representing, That though we can say in a good and deep sense, God was omnipresent from all eternity; yet it would be great nonsense to say, He was everywhere before the creation. Because, before the creation, as there was no time, so was there also no where nor there, nor any place, but himself only, who wants no place for his being, but is much deeper than any place, etc. That only with the out-birth, place and locality began to be; and that therefore this outbirth, being neither greater nor less, but just so great as place and locality is, cannot but be said to be omnipresent, that is, in every place; because there is no place without or beyond its own extent; when there is nevertheless God without or beyond it, who is not confined thereto, nor comprehended thereby, and wants no place at all, etc. That this outward world is not God, nor suspected of being made god-like, by saying of it in such a sense, that it is omnipresent to itself: which can well be said, because there is no place therein in which it is not manifest, more or less, according to its own four-elementary qualification, etc. That so also the spirit of this world is not God, and yet is omnipresent to the whole extent of all his region; for there is not the smallest point therein, whereof we could say, he is not there, etc. That heaven and all the heavens of heavens are not God, because the Scripture says of them, they comprehend him not; and yet they must be omnipresent unto him, because wherever he is, either within or without this world, he is in heaven: and we cannot say that he is in heaven only with a part of his being, and the other part is extended beyond all heavens; but we must say, he is whole in heaven and whole also beyond all heavens: so that the Scripture expression, they comprehend him not, doth not mean that he is extended without or beyond them, but that he is deeper or more inward than all the heavens, etc. That the same is to be said also of the one eternal element; and that this omnipresence thereof, now declared and limited, I hope sufficiently, cannot make it to be God, nor equal unto God, because it is not thereby exalted from or beyond its being a spiritual corporality, into that much deeper and only spiritual Being which is God, of whom, by whom, and to whom it is and hath that inferior holy being, which it is and hath, etc.

Page 327. A. 4. life and strength from the death of the outward old man. Seeing that the inward man, being quite of another nature, can have nothing from the outward; and this can only by his own death make him way, or open him a free place for to display his life and strength from his own internal principle, I think it might be said more properly by than from the death; if this from imports what I conceive it doth, wherein I may be mistaken.

Page 329. A. 2. as a descent into its own hell. Here I apprehend that the particle as, might well be left out; because this sensibility of the soul's own anguishing properties, is really a descent into its own hell.

Page 331. No. 3. Upon this death, etc. This particular (upon several considerations, of which an account can be given, if desired) I would rather express thus, or after any other manner like unto this,—Into this death the soul must give itself up, as quite forlorn; and through this death it must sink down into that ground wherein Christ dwelleth, and whereout he is to raise a new life in it.

Page 331. Line ult. doubt—ariseth from the weakness of the fire of the spirit. Though this may have a good and true sense, yet more directly and particularly I think might be said—from the division in the fire of the soul, which partly tends unto God, and partly cleaves to the spirit of this world. For so the true ground of this weakness would be expressed.

Page 333. In the answer to question ult. that which to me seems to be the chief particular, is omitted, viz.—that God's pardoning sins is inseparable from a real going out from sin, and leaving it behind, or, as it were, beneath, and an entering into such another region as whereinto sin cannot follow after us, but must be drowned in the blood of Christ.

Page 335. No. 3. his former sins and guilt remain. That they remain was said in the foregoing particular, No. 2; and more expressive would it be if here were said,—his former sins and guilt lay hold on him again, for then he returns back into their own region.

"How often," remarked an eminent modern saint, when upon his death bed, to one of his attendant friends, "do we say we want to live nearer God. The great evil is that we do not resolutely pray more. We must have time for secret prayer, taken from business or sleep, if we have no leisure. Whoever resolved thus in the strength of God, without actually living nearer to God? It has been my rule and invariable practice for some years (continued he) to pray at least six times a day in secret; and with less than this, I have found I could not maintain uninterrupted union with God." Or, as the holy Bramwell (who was perhaps the most perfect resemblance of our Lord in mind, in spirit, complexion, way, manner, walk and conversation, constancy and earnestness of devotion, deadness to self and the world, zeal for the glory of God, and success in winning souls, that has ever appeared since the apostolic age) thus writes, in a letter to a friend, which the latter published after his decease, (and which, with some other extracts, we propose here to quote, as an enlightened practical interpretation of the views of Mr. Law, touching the spirit and practice of prayer:—"I am (said he) labouring to live as near to God as any one I have ever known, yea, as near as Saint Paul himself. I read more frequently his character, and study more closely his deadness to the world, his zeal, his love to souls, his labours, his being always ready for his change, and his desiring rather to be with Christ. But I am more than ever convinced that, to accomplish this, I must redeem time to the uttermost. I must sleep no more, eat and drink no more, than nature requires; and this calls for daily self-denial, such as I believe our Lord meant in his divine

Page 337. Q. ult. How then doth it attain rest? This question might very well be answered more circumstantially after this or the like manner. A. By sinking down into that ground wherein light can be enkindled by Christ : for every standing still is a continuing in this miserable state, and every rising up is an increasing of the same ; but sinking down is the only way for coming out from it.

Page 343. Q. 1. What is that principle, and why do they call it, liberty? A. It is (with respect to souls, which are but creatures,) that internal supernatural state of rest and peace, which Christ promised to them that would come to him, and take upon them his yoke, and follow after him. And they call it liberty, because it is free from, and superior to all those violent commotions that are and act in the inferior restless part of nature.

Page 343. A. 3. united in one will, viz. the will of the soul and the will of God. This explanation of the words, in one will, referring them to an union of God's will with the will of the soul, cannot stand. For they mean, in this description of the tincture, no other wills, but the will of fire and the will of light, which two are to be united into one, so that the fire may have no more its own fiery will, that is, its own destroying and consuming nature, or natural inclination, according to its fiery properties, but may have them subdued to the light, to act in concurrence with it, etc. The union of the soul's will with the will of God, and their becoming one, is not here denied ; but only said, what is meant by one will in this definition of the tincture.

Page 343. Q. What do they mean by the virtue of fire, and the virtue of light? A. They mean that wonderful efficacy which ariseth from the union of fire and light, which cannot be expected either from this or that alone ; and which is chiefly an uniting and harmonising virtue, able and sufficient to restore into their due order and concordance, all the disharmonised properties of eternal nature in the soul, and so of temporal nature also, in all things.

Page 345. Q. 2. Are there not several other lights besides the true one, and how shall we distinguish them from it? A. If you ask with relation to others, how to distinguish the true light from the false ones, in other persons without you, that make a noise and show thereof, that you may not follow them, and be misled or deluded by any of them ? they will tell you (1.) that as no man in this outward world followeth a light which only another seeth, or pretendeth to see, except he do thereby plainly own himself to be blind ; so also, and even much more (according to our Saviour's plain doctrine) must it be in the inward world, and upon our way to salvation. (2.) Then they will ask you again, What rules or directions you can give to such a blind man in this world, how to distinguish the light of the sun from that of the moon, and these two from that of a burning candle ; whether all your endeavours would not be in vain, because the light is an object of a seeing eye only, and where this is not, there a discerning eye cannot be ? But, nevertheless, (3.) they will tell you also, that no man is so blind as not to have something of the true light, though never so little, shining in his own conscience ; for Christ is the light illuminating every man that cometh into this world : which, therefore, if he will take heed unto, to follow it always, and never to run before it, and though he hear never so many pretenders to great and high things, to take nothing of them in, but what he sees agreeing and conformable to what this light plainly shows and directs him to, his walk will always be sure ; and so doing, he shall never follow another light without him, but only that which shineth in himself, and is given him to be his leader.

But if you ask, how one may distinguish in himself the true light from the false ones ; you must take this true light either as in its fullness, or as in a lesser degree. If you take it as in its fullness, they will answer, That it cannot be discerned but by him that hath really seen it so : and if any one hath seen it in its fullness, that he wants no direction from without how to discern it from a false light, or from a true lesser one ; because it bears and carries along with it, in its own essentiality, such a mark or character as cannot be doubted of. Christ, according to his promise manifesting himself to a soul, wants no testimony, either from angels or men, to prove him to be the Sun of Righteousness : and such a soul needs not to see any other evidence but his own light, to distinguish him from a devil transformed into an angel of light ; but with its own seeing eyes it shall see, according to his plain words, that he is in the Father, and the Father is in him. But if you take this true light in a certain inferior, and beginning or increasing degree, shining whilst the soul is still but upon the way to the full regeneration, or manifestation of Christ ; they will give you several marks of discerning, whereof this one only may be sufficient for every one, viz. the true light hath always three inseparable concomitants, the cross, love, and humility. Every light that shows a way how to avoid, escape, or refuse the cross ; how to favour selfishness, and to maintain the soul's life, according to its fiery properties, that its own essential cross may not be made known, etc. ; every light that is not accompanied really with love, (according to the plain doctrine of St. John) light and love being not only of one and the same Second Principle, but also of one and the same first property thereof ; and every light that leads not downwards into our own nothinginstructions.  I never saw so much need of continual prayer. I do assure you, I find it necessary to begin at five in the morning, and to pray at all opportunities till ten or eleven at night." Writing to another friend, he says :—"I am receiving more love ; it comes by drops, after agony of prayer. I could write it twenty times over to you, that it is continual prayer, with strong faith, which will produce every effect." He also thus addresses his daughter in a letter to her :—

"You know what I want concerning you, is this : that you should answer the end of creation, redemption, the call of the Spirit, and the means of grace ; and this by a life of devotion, giving up yourself to an agony, to that labour in Christ Jesus which will produce the image of God, the perfect love, the perfect separation from all things which are not in the life of union with your Redeemer.

To be singular, will be at the first your fear ; but look at your Lord, read his practice frequently in the New Testament, and consider how singular he was, and without the least fear of a frowning world. 'What is my duty?' this is the point, without the least regard to consequences. For this reason, retire from every company, however friendly, a number of times in the day. Mind not what looks or words you receive. Stay in no place where you cannot do this. Let nothing hinder the full salvation." Again, on another occasion, he thus writes to her :—"I long to see you eminent for holiness, for the divine life, receiving the image of your God, and speaking for your heavenly Master in every action. I am persuaded a work is before you ; and, if all diligence is given, if every mean is used, if faith is in constant exercise, if hope prevails, if your soul is fixed ness, and into that deep ground within ourselves, wherein the light was extinguished in Adam, and wherein only it can be kindled again, is absolutely false.

Page 345. A. ult. from the collision of the first four, etc. Instead of this, I would much rather say,—from the inkindling of the fire, which, by its flying up, displayeth, or, as it were, disperseth the soulish properties and essences, and makes them to stand in such a spiritual figure as is like a cross, etc.

Page 349. Q. ult. How do they conceive the light to arise in the soul? The answer to this question says, that the light is water rarefied, made thin and clear; and so places the water before the light, as a material cause before its product: when I cannot conceive it so, but must with Behmen say, that the light is prior. For, though in eternal nature, light and water are inseparable and co-eternal, yet I cannot but understand with him, that materiality cometh forth from spirituality, not vice versa; and that the light, as a pure spirituality, ariseth in the fifth form; but the water, as a spiritual materiality, in the seventh, etc. The conjunction of the eternal liberty with the restless part of nature, enkindles the fire; the separation of these two again, or the distinct exerting of each one's peculiar quality, is the breaking forth of the light. So that, according to Behmen, the light is not water rarified, but the free liberty sharpened by the harshness of nature. For which I refer to what was said thereof in the discourse on the seven forms of eternal nature. For as the light ariseth in eternal nature, so it doth, mutatis tantum mutandis, in the soul also. Water may be the air or æther condensed, and so it will be true that air or æther must be water rarified; but air or æther is not yet light, but only that expanse which is made so thin and clear as that the light can shine through it. Wherefore, then, I would answer to this question thus. A. They conceive that when the sharp properties of the soulish nature reach the liberty, they break out in a clear and open flame; and thereby this liberty, which before was nothing to the soul, comes to be its something, stands in union with it, gives unto it its own meekness, and receives from the sharp fiery properties again that glance or lustre which disappeared in Adam's fall, and which it cannot have without the fire; like as the soulish fire cannot have a clear flame without this liberty. And as therefore now fire and light are in love and union, so must needs also all the properties of the fiery nature burn in love.

Page 353. What are these inward senses of the new body? I have indeed nothing against the answer to this question; but yet I think there might well and pertinently be mentioned therein, that they are the same which they were in the first Adam's paradisaical body.

Page 355. Q. 1. What is inward Divine hearing? The place quoted out of the PRAYER-BOOK, page 10, I hardly know by what words to make plainer. The meaning is in substance this—It is a power opened again, and restored to the fallen humanity, by free grace, in Jesus Christ; by which the human soul is enabled to approach confidently to the mercy-seat erected in its own ground, and there to hear God speaking in it, according to David's words, saying, I will hear what the Lord will speak in me. Which speaking is a real word, not only sounding according to the light world's condition, but also operating, effecting, and giving forth something of what it speaketh; which in substance is nothing else but his mercifulness bestowed on us in and through Jesus Christ. But this I can add further,—it bears a true analogy to the outward sense of hearing, and is a perception of something answering to a plain and express or articulate human speech, though not comparable to any kind of earthly languages; and the soul, though it may never have perceived the like before, needs no instruction, but understandeth what is said immediately, the very first time, without any doubt, plainer and clearer than ever it can understand anything spoken in this world.

As to the other two senses, viz. smelling and feeling, whereof the next following question, page 335, asketh, whether they say anything? I cannot but answer, that Behmen says indeed nothing thereof, (especially not of the former,) in particular; but it is nevertheless evident enough, that they bear also such an analogy to what in our outward life is called so, and that they are different powers of the new regenerated life, restored to the humanity in and by Jesus Christ.

Page 357. Line 1. But inward motions and visitations are very dangerous, and the power of melancholy, etc. All this is true enough; but for my part, as all this cannot make me to deny, that there are such communications between God and his children, even during this their outward life; so neither can all this make me to see, that these things are more dangerous than the temptations from the devil, flesh, and world, which every one is subject unto. For, like as on the one side, all what any other soul in reality and truth enjoys, of the like heavenly motions and visitations, cannot help me in the salvation of my own soul, if it remains without me; so also on the other, all what he falsely pretends to enjoy, or what he (in a delusion, or as it were, in a drunkenness from the astral spirit) believeth himself to enjoy, and to be directly from heaven, cannot hurt me, if I leave it without me, neither approving nor condemning it, till there is given me a clear, sufficient evidence.

on heaven, you will be ready for all the will of God. 'One thing is needful,' which is, continual prayer. All will fail unless you labour in this way. Let the times be as frequent as possible, and the manner as fervent as possible. Full of expectation, look for the promise, and believe for the blessing. Be mighty in this duty. You will be strongly tempted to neglect prayer. Satan can continue his authority with all persons who do not give themselves to prayer." And again:—"I have you much on my mind. How is the work of salvation going on? Are you given to prayer? Have you confidence in God that he can cleanse from all sin? Do you believe he is willing? Do you seek it by faith alone? Do you plead and bring it to the present time? Are you quite determined to receive it, or to perish crying out? Do you thus strive to enter in? Oh, how I long for your full salvation, your living in God always, receiving all in union with Christ, your being one with him. Do let me hear in your next that the Lord is come, that he hath cleansed your heart, that you can witness without fear, of perfect love. Oh, cry, cry to God mightily! Never rest till pure within: I pray daily for you." So again:—"I rejoice to hear of your love to him who bled for you upon the cross! I know you will increase it by continual prayer. I want you to be fully devoted, to live at your Lord's feet, and receive all instruction from his word and Spirit. —To be saved from every wrong temper, to be saved into the mind of Christ and the image of God, and to live rejoicing evermore: this is your glory, your everlasting life. In this world you will be guided, protected, and comforted; and in your example you will be a blessing to Rules, for distinguishing false inspirations and enthusiasms from true ones, many others, I suppose, have prescribed, much better than ever I could do; and so, therefore, I beg to be excused, but will nevertheless, not to be wholly wanting, set down only this threefold one from my own practice, wherewith, for my part, I can be well contented. One thing I know is absolutely necessary, as the only great fundamental point or work, to be done in my own soul no less than in any other; viz., in short, the slaying of the fiery soulish dragon, and the raising again that new life that is captivated under him. All now what of inward motions points at this, or leads and directs thereto plainly, sensibly, and more or less effectually, cannot but be good and true. All what plainly, sensibly, and more or less effectually tends to the contrary, must of necessity be false. And all what hath not such a plainness and sensibility in and with it, under what shape soever it may appear, is not to be curiously searched into, and is of itself neither profitable nor hurtful; though it can be made to be both this and that, according to my own different behaviour about it.

Page 360. Q. What is death to sin, and resurrection from it? A. Death to sin is the soul's continual putting it off, going out from it, and leaving it behind; and its resurrection from sin is its continual entering into and laying hold on that opposite degree of a new life of righteousness, seeking the things that are above, which degree of life, every particular degree of dying is immediately followed by, and joined with.

Page 361. No. 8. The pearl may be lost and regained, but with difficulty, when it hath disappeared. This is true indeed, yet not so universally as it is here expressed, but only in its place, or kind and degree of disappearing. For there is also a total loss or disappearing, after which Behmen expressly saith it cannot be regained; viz. when it was once obtained, and is so lost as the epistle to the Hebrews declareth it. For then another sacrifice for sin would be required; whereas there neither is nor can be had any other but that which once was made in the Lord's death on the cross.

Page 363. After these twelve particulars, still another I think might pertinently be added, containing in substance—that all this order and method now propounded is not exactly and punctually to be applied universally to every individual person; but that every one is led to the same end indeed, and through the same principal ways, yet not exactly in this order through all the little by-paths, but as the Spirit of God is pleased, and sees it most expedient for every one, according to his peculiar constitution.

Page 363. Q. ult. What do they mean by union to Christ? and is the soul united to his personality or natural body, soul and spirit; or only to his Divinity and universal body? First I observe, that I see not, why Christ's personality, as to the most outward part thereof, here in this place, where it is especially distinguished from his universal body, is called natural: for though it be natural indeed, yet it cannot by this denomination be distinguished from his universal body, which is natural also. And therefore, I think it would be better to say—to his personality in body, soul, etc. And then I answer to this question thus. A. By union to Christ they mean nothing else but what he meant himself, in his last sermon to his disciples, and in his simile of the vine and branches, which are and must be in union with the vine, if they shall be able to bear fruit. And as now his personality in body, soul, and spirit, cannot be separated from his divinity and universal body, so also none of these distinct things can be separated or excluded from his union to the soul, but all must be implied therein, though not all in a full equality of sense, because not all can be equally capable of this union; which will therefore differ so, as an union between a branch and tree differs from an union between a father and his children, and as both these kinds of union differ again from the union in a red hot iron, between iron and fire.

Page 365. Q. 1. In what sense are they said to put on Christ's righteousness, who put on Christ, or Christ's universal body? A. In the same sense in which we can rightly say, we put on the first Adam's unrighteousness, by putting on in our natural generation, his universal body wherewith he fell. For, in his first paradisaical body he was righteous before God: now that body never sinned, nor put on any unrighteousness, but it disappeared only in his transgression. If then Christ hath brought, and formed it again into paradisaical flesh and blood, and if he is in this body the righteousness before God, in opposition to the first Adam's unrighteousness; we, by putting on him, or his universal body, by concurrence and efficacy of his personal body, must needs put on not only righteousness, but also his righteousness; and cannot in this body be looked upon otherwise than as if we had never sinned, that, and all that which hath sinned, being put to death.

Page 365. No. 3. They bid them be very temperate, etc. The places here quoted say in substance plainly and shortly this—The soul is a kindled fire; kindled not in the light and love of God, as it was in its first creation, but in the astral spirit and love of this world, and the things that are good and pleasant therein, but especially of its own elementary body. This kindled fire now desireth food from that principle wherewith it is joined in love; and this food (be it taken and con-all around you.—I know it is neither procured nor retained by the number of times of prayer; yet if you are fully in earnest, you will be often before the Lord on your knees, pouring out your heart and pleading with him, till your cup is full and running over." Thus much in illustration of the true evangelical practice of devotion, and of the right objects and mode of its exercise. For without a specific object in view in devotion, and that object the only one contemplated by the gospel, namely regeneration, or the crucifixion of the old carnal man and the raising up of the new Christlike nature in his stead, to which all the other parts and acts of religion are likewise to be directed—without this mystical knowledge we say, we may offer up very regular and dutiful prayers and supplications, but shall probably never attain to the true end of prayer above mentioned, viz. a real death to self and a real birth of the Spirit, a rising out of ourselves and an entrance into the light and life and liberty, and real enjoyment of God, into a state of Christlike perfection and stability in Divine virtue. Now as without doubt this character of devotion (though including its numerous degrees, from the simple regular devotion of the school before alluded to even to the highest accomplishment of it as exhibited in the life of a Bramwell or a Lopez) was implied in Mr. Law's discourses on devotion and recommendations of regular hours of prayer, in his 'Christian Perfection,' chap. xii., and 'Serious Call,' from chap. xiv., may we not venture to conclude it to have been his own practice? And this not only from the character of him contained in the testimonies already presented to the reader, but also from this further report concerning sidered either as only spiritual, such as the soul feeds upon by false imagination or lust, or also corporeal, such as the outward body feeds upon) is no more paradisaical, but earthly. And so therefore, even upon this only account, sin is not only very nearly related unto, but also quite inseparable from it. And though it is now not sin directly and absolutely, to eat and drink earthly meat and drink, which our mortal body wants for its subsistence; yet it is originated from sin, belongeth not to paradise, and must perish together with the mortal body; nay, it worketh also and causeth sin, if taken in superfluity, because the soul's kindled fire is more thereby enkindled in that kindling of its own, which is an enmity to God, and is thereby hindered also from pressing forward to a being new kindled in his light and love.

Page 365. No. 4. They advise fasting, etc. In the THREEFOLD LIFE, Chap. xvi. 31., where Behmen says something of fasting, I can find nothing but what is very plain, and conformable to what just now was said. He means by fasting nothing else but (besides a continual temperate sober life) sometimes an abstinence from all eating and drinking, yet without appointing certain days, times, and seasons for it, but leaving that to every one's discretion, according to his circumstances; and says, that as the earthly food fills the belly, and the superfluity thereof makes it thick and unable to work, so the earthly spirit fills and impregnates the soul, and makes it unfit for spiritual things; and that then the Spirit of God departs from such a soul, at least for that time, finding no open place to dwell and work therein.

Page 367. No. 7. That prayers are to be made with respect to the eternal internal powers of the days, etc. I find nowhere that Behmen says such a thing; but so the matter lieth, — In all the printed prayer-books of his nation, divers and peculiar morning and evening prayers are prescribed for every day, some of which are made with a respect to the seven days of the creation. Accordingly, then, Behmen, knowing the mystery thereof deeper than those common books, which mention only the creatures brought forth on such or such a day, wrote his prayers with a deeper respect to the eternal powers thereof; yet never said that the prayers were to be made, or must be made so by every one. As he himself had no necessity incumbent upon him for to do so, so he hath not laid it upon any other; but he that can and will, and understandeth what he doth, may do so freely.

Page 367. No. 7. That prayers are to be made with respect to the eternal internal powers of the week, or seven spirits. The more I look it over and consider, the less can I find of such a thing. No such expression may be found in the German original: and in those few prayers the author hath set down, he makes only sometimes an allusion or accommodation to those planets after which the day is called, and raiseth the mind above them into that which is their deeper ground; and this very sparingly too, not as if he had designed everywhere an equal exactness, but only so as this or that was obvious to his mind. So for instance, in the first prayer of this kind, on Monday noon, he says nothing at all in a peculiar or proper reference to this day and hour, but only a general contemplation of his state, both as to the creation, fall, and restoration thereof; which, as he saith also himself in the title, may be used whenever one finds himself in his devotion thus touched. In the second, for the same day and hour, he considereth (as the title says), the day's quality, and raiseth the mind into the inward moon, which is the heavenly substantiality. But in the words of the prayer itself, every one may see that there is nothing peculiarly expressed, which did or could belong unto this day more than unto every other. In the third, on Monday evening, which the title says is concerning a descent of the mind, like as the former was an ascent thereof, nothing more can be discerned but an allusion to the outward moon's changeableness, increase, and decrease, and this but obscurely too. The substance thereof is a contemplation of our misery, both spiritual and bodily, and an earnest groaning for deliverance; all which is not in a peculiar manner more fit and proper on a Monday noon, than on any other day and hour. On Tuesday, no foot-step more of such an allusion or accommodation appears at all; for he presently begins to consider the ten commandments, without giving a reason for it. And though it might be said, that he chose this matter for this day, because of that communion or relation between the fiery Mars and this fiery law, yet it is as fit and proper, and as needful also, for any other day, as it is for this. And so, if he had not been prevented by death, he might easily have found matters, fit more or less for every day, or capable of such or such an accommodation, but not altogether appropriable unto one only, with exclusion of the rest.

Page 367. No. 8. Concerning the Lord's prayer, Behmen says that it expresses the eternal generation, the three principles, the fall of man, and his regeneration. What he observeth, according to his peculiar gift in the language of nature, as to every syllable, and sometimes as to single letters, cannot be expressed by a paraphrase. But the whole substance in general he hath set down himself in these or the like words, — Every true prayer is not only a desiring, longing, and asking, but also an obtaining, taking in, and possessing. In the first words of the Lord's prayer the soul's him, that 'he would never remain in any company or conversation beyond two hours at a time.'

And here, occasion may be taken to refer to the 'Spiritual Retreats' in the church of Rome, (for a week fortnight or month at a time, either once or oftener as may be convenient each year,) originally invented by those practical saints, and burning and shining lights in their generation, Ignatius Loyola and the first members of the Society of Jesus, for the especial practice of 'Spiritual Exercises,' under the conduct of prudent and experienced directors, spiritual physicians, holy men, filled with the Spirit—as being admirably adapted to aid the soul in its progress, for a time banishing all earthly thoughts out of it, and replenishing it with heavenly gusts, attractions, and communications, rendering it again all hunger and thirst after God. It is a matter of surprise, we say, that such an institute has not yet had a place among the numerous admirable provisions of the protestant church of this country, for the refreshment and building up of the divine life in the soul; (at all events among the higher means of grace and divine intercourse discovered by the earlier methodists,—those experimental religionists, whose original and true character as a society was and should be that of a pioneer to the established church, and nursery of her spiritual children and worshippers; whereby that standing reproach against her might have been wiped away, that though in possession of the purest principles and soundest theory of Christian truth, she is not furnished with any systematic means for carrying them out into operation, and conducting such of her children as desire to live the Gospel, up to all the heights of christian perfection, nay, that will raiseth itself and enters into God ; in the seven petitions it declareth and asketh what it wants ; and in the Amen it compriseth and taketh altogether, and dwelleth therein, or eateth thereof, and strengtheneth itself thereby.

Page 369, Concerning Behmen's sense of the ten commandments. His interpretation, as to the first goes not so directly nor principally upon what is common, viz. a plurality of gods, a making and having idols, a loving and applying his heart to this or that creature, etc., though all these things be included as particular lesser branches ; but the chief thing is, that he says, a full relying or depending upon and cleaving unto God only, an acting and working of the soul's will with and under God only, a ruling with him over all creatures, without appropriating unto itself anything, a casting the soul's desire into his love only, and in a word, a leaving and going out from selfhood in the very deepest sense, ground, and bottom, is in this commandment required : and even selfhood is that principal other god, which man set up in his first transgression, and which is still the maker of all the other gods or idols, numberless in variety, which every one sets up according to the peculiar constitution of his corrupted nature.

Of the second Behmen hath nothing, because it is not in the Lutheran church. Dr. Luther hath left it out, saying that it is but an explication of the first words. Note.—The original numbering of the commandments of Behmen was altered in the arrangement, on p. 44.]

Of the third (which in the Lutheran church is the second), he saith that it reacheth much further and deeper than generally is apprehended ; and that the name of God is taken in vain not only in cursing and swearing, and where the name God is directly and expressly named vainly, but also in a more general sense in all our speech, and every word thereof, though there is no express mention made of God, if the same be not according to simplicity and truth, but formed more or less by the serpent's seed or ens in us. And his ground hereof is shortly this : Adam had his speaking faculty out of eternal nature, wherein all the names or powers of God are manifest, moving and working ; and his giving names unto everything was an imitation of their being spoken or brought forth into being and substance by God. Though now this be lost in the fall, as to man's paradisaical speech, yet something answering thereto, according to this third principle, lieth still in the human speech, and in all the languages. And whereas now before the fall, all the words were formed in conformity to and by concurrence, nay, predominancy of the holy names and powers of God in the light world, they are now formed more or less in conformity and by concurrence, nay, many times in a full predominion of the serpent's ens. Whereby then all manner of false abominable images are figured, and so the powers of eternal nature and the names of God are abused after the same manner as the devils do, though it be in another principle, wherein there is a mixture of good and evil. Concerning all which, Behmen hath a large, plain, and well intelligible discourse in the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, Chap. xxii.

In the fourth (which Dr. Luther hath only in these words—Thou shalt hallow the Sabbath, leaving out all the rest), Behmen leaves indeed the seventh day of the week, as an outward symbol in its place, and owneth that the hallowing thereof is here commanded ; but he insists also chiefly upon that internal Sabbath which Adam was set into in paradise, and which we are to come into again in Jesus Christ, viz. a ceasing from our own will and work, and resting in the love of God, that he may work in us. For if this be the true inward ground of that outward, the law, being spiritual, understands certainly the inward in the first place, and the outward in the second, as in subordination to that.

And so also,

In the fifth he owneth indeed that we are commanded to honour our outward natural parents ; but he maketh also a deeper application thereof, saying that God is our Father, and his outspoken word in eternal nature our mother, in whose womb we are conceived and nourished, and into which we are to return again from the strange mother of this world. If I am your Father (as the Lord saith by the prophet), where is my honour given me by you ? etc.

Here now Behmen's prayers upon the ten commandments are at an end ; but what he would have said in substance upon some of the rest, may easily be gathered from several other places, viz.

In the sixth he would not only have reflected upon killing our neighbour with the hand, or with the tongue, which is commonly understood therein ; but also chiefly upon that spiritual killing, stifling and keeping under (in the Scripture called crucifying) Christ and his spirit in ourselves.

In the seventh he would certainly have spoken of that marriage-band the first Adam was tied with to the heavenly virgin, the wife of his youth, against which we all do still deal treacherously, more or less.

In the eighth he would not only have said that all manner of deceit, used in the world, to cheat our neighbour of his goods, is forbidden ; but also chiefly appropriating unto himself anything either of spiritual gifts, or of worldly possessions. For though even these latter may be had by a right and lawful title, yet the soul directly commits a robbery with respect to God, if it doth she perversely closes her doors six days out of seven against those who love to worship in the courts of the Lord, in the place where his honour dwelleth.) To which indeed, persons of all classes might have the privilege of resorting, as they retire annually for a season for the benefit of their bodily health, and obtain a renewal of those solemn impressions of death and eternal things, and be reanimated with those holy resolutions and efforts to live to God, which were in such continual danger of being weakened, or might have been lost by them, whilst engaged in the anxiety or commerce of the world. May the present hint be so amplified in the proposed larger memorial, as to originate the adoption of so admirable an invention and machinery (not even excluding the articles of entire 'confession' and 'restitution' from it) for the relief of the soul, in her pressing emergencies, in this section of the Church of Christ.

Similar hopes and wishes may also be expressed with regard to the suggestions concerning the institution of 'Theosophic Colleges,' introduced into various portions of this treatise, (Pages 238, 251, 252, 253, 87, etc.) that is, for the express cultivation of experimental wisdom and truth, by the establishment of a perfect system of cultivating the divine nature in man to its fullest maturity, even to the re-endowment of the soul with the highest degrees of purity, holiness, super-sensual wisdom, and alchemical powers. For as the natural perfections of Christ increasingly manifested themselves from his infancy to manhood, so the principle of Christ which is by grace in every man, is, now, under the action and influences of his glorified nature, capable of a similar develop-not attribute all unto him alone, and owns not deeply and really that all is his. etc.

As to the ninth and tenth, I find nothing but what would be conformable to what is ordinarily understood therein.

Page 369. Q. 3. The particular sentiments concerning those three or four requisites may be these following, viz. They say,

(1.) That the narrow way, as to its inside, is the inward process of regeneration; and as to its outside, a course or manner of life contrary to that of the wicked world.

(2.) That as to the former, or inside, it is called the narrow way, chiefly because every one shall meet upon it with manifold temptations, and as it were, many narrow holes, through which the will-spirit of the soul must creep, and everywhere be stripped of something which his natural will is not willing to be deprived of.

(3.) That these are those manifold particular deaths mentioned above, every one of which is followed immediately by such a degree of life, as is always answering proportionably to the foregoing degree of death.

(4.) That it is called also the narrow way upon this account especially, because they that walk upon it shall find a great opposition from the anger of God, kindled in the whole fallen humanity, which if they fight against it with his love, will many times press the soul so down, as if whole mountains laid upon it, and bring it into such a straitness, that as to all its sensibility in that state, the whole world is too narrow for the same.

(5.) That as to the latter, or outside, it is also justly called the narrow way, because of the great oppositions and difficulties from the world and our own corrupt flesh, which both inviting and drawing the soul one way, and laying innumerable impediments in the other, cannot but make the same to be as it were a small foot-path, in comparison to that broader way that leads into perdition.

(6.) That both in this and that, viz. both inwardly and outwardly, the cross, and the yoke of Christ is to be taken up and carried after him.

(7.) That by so doing the wickedness of the mixed world must needs be avoided; for he that bears the cross of Christ can certainly not walk in the counsel of the ungodly, nor stand in the way of sinners, nor sit in the seat of the scornful.

(8.) That this wickedness is in general expressed by the apostle's lust of the eye, lust of the flesh and pride of life; and that which each of them is more particularly, every one will be told in his own conscience, if he be but willing to hear the voice thereof.

(9.) That all this, thus practised, is nothing else in the very ground and bottom, but a continual SELF-RESIGNATION; for it is always a leaving behind its own will, and giving up itself into the will of God. And

(10.) That all this in its order and progress, is also nothing else but the WAY FROM DARKNESS TO TRUE ILLUMINATION; for the soul say they, is not capable of true illumination as long as it is filled and darkened by all manner of impurities in its own will; like as a water is not capable of receiving the sun's light and representing its image, as long as it is thick and muddy; but when the soul, putting off all what is of that nature and kind, resigns itself to God, his light is ready to illuminate the soul, and the soul, like as a purified water, is able to receive that illumination.

Page 368. Q. What are God's calls to repentance? A. Here is not asked, I suppose, with respect to anything that is without man, as for instance, the word preached, public and private calamities, pestilence, earthquake, and the like, which all may well be called so; but only with respect to what is done by God in man himself: and thereupon they will answer, That these calls are the secret motions and dictates of every one's conscience; for this doth tell him that he is to depart from evil, and do good. In the conscience God meets the sinner, and none living can say, that he never heard such a call in his life.

Page 370. Q. What do they mean by this shape? A. They mean that spiritual figure or image, which is opposite to the soul's former divine image, and which, the beastly properties and qualities it is infected withal, must needs represent to the intellectual eye, considering them and finding a conformity between the soul and such or such a brutish creature. For as every thing hath its outward form or figure according to the various compositions of its parts and dimensions, so it must have also, answering thereunto, its inward shape or figure, arising from the various combinations of its spiritual properties. And if the soul had once the image of God, when all its properties were harmonised, it must now needs have that of a beast, when they all stand in disharmony, and exert such operations as are conformable to those of a beast, either tame and harmless, or wild and hurtful. [N.B. The ground of the asserted heathen doctrine of the transmigration of souls.]

Page 375. Q. 2. This seems to be a strange doctrine; pray what do they mean by it? A. It is certain that neither this doctrine, nor this manner of expression is strange to the mystics: with ment and exaltation, even to the manhood wisdom and power of its head and parent.—“Greater than these shall ye do,” was the promise of Christ to his future faithful and illuminated followers, “because I go to the Father:” but who hath believed, and duly fathomed this infallible promise and assurance? Or is it (with numerous other passages of a similar purport,) to be received as an unmeaning declaration, designed rather to mystify, than to raise the understanding of the sons of God to the prerogatives of their restored birthright? Did the Spirit of wisdom, when thus contemplating the results of redemption, in the glorification of the head and life of the human nature, and delivering its oracles thereupon, use expressions without meaning, or not calculated to instruct the sons of men, to whom they were addressed? As we know this to be impossible, so we may be assured, there is an exaltation of the divine principle in the human nature on earth, which the world as yet has had little knowledge of: and further, that what is requisite thereto, is simply the use of right means, analogous to those of our schools and universities for the education of the rational man, terminating in the highest accomplishments of learning and science. Which means, through the fundamental opening of the powers that work both in nature and grace, contained in the writings of Behmen, are now fully afforded, and might be carried to an at present inconceivable perfection, in the exercises and experience of a Theosophic College. To which holy and sublime discipline and tuition, it may just be remarked, none at first ought to be admitted, but as they were found to be desirous for it, for a holy purpose, such, for instance, as the missionary work to the whom in their declaration of this state, nothing is more frequent, than to speak of a transcending, surpassing, leaving behind or beneath, being up above and transported beyond all creatures, holy angels, etc. and even themselves also; and an entering, sinking down, melting away in an uncreated abyss, etc. And they do not mean thereby, that ever a soul puts off its nature and creature, and hath no more other creatures standing besides itself in the same degree of being; but only that it cometh into such a state of holy silence, as wherein no creature is perceived, and the soul hath no other object but what is uncreated. And that they mean nothing else but this, you may clearly perceive from these words of the famous mystic, M. Eckhard, saying, Orieatur in me Diapsalma, hoc est silentium sacrum omnium rerum exteriorum, et quiescebant etiam omnia interiora mea, cum suavissimo cordis celestia quarentis jubilo, cum oblivione omnium rerum, cum plenaria abnegatione mei ipsius, ita ut sola, tui, O Deus remaneret notitia. . . . Tunc rapiebar in oblivionem mei ipsius, in Te, . . . a Spiritu S. ducebar in abyssum, etc.

Page 375. A. 3. No. 1. So as this first position is here expressed, it cannot stand conformable to Behmen's mind; but I think it might well be thus expressed,—that God's essence of love and meekness (or the divine virtue—virtue belonging more properly to the second, and power more properly to the first principle,—the fire of love, the holy light's virtue, the heavenly ens or substance) was before the fall, in and to the soul a spiritual oil and water, whereby its fire was refreshed, fed, and strengthened, and its shining light kept and preserved.

Page 377. Q. 1. Why is a medium necessary; cannot God forgive sins without it? A. If by forgiveness of sins, is understood only such a pardoning, as whereby an earthly prince may clear or pardon a malefactor, God not only can, but hath also actually done so with our first parents. But now the soul wanted not only such a forgiveness, but a new birth; and this new birth could not be brought forth in him, without a foregoing undoing, drowning, or washing away the sin in the old man, which, without a medium, cannot be done. And as then there is a necessity for a mediator, so also for a medium, as an instrument of that mediator. This medium is blood and water: without bloodshedding, is no remission of sins; and the Mediator came not with blood only, but with water and blood. In the baptism, though the Mediator's blood is not excluded, yet the water chiefly (as the beginning, ground, or if it might be said so, the first rudiments of blood,) is considered; because this is, or makes also the beginning, or lays in a sense, the ground of that new birth. And the reason why it must be water, not any other thing, depends upon the inward ground of man's paradisaical body, which he had lost and wanted. If then, there was, and is the same analogy between the inward and outward water, which is between the paradisaical and elementary body of man, the reason is plain, why elementary water must be used in the outward baptism. Moreover, man is to lay hold by his will, faith, and imagination on God, through the Mediator, and, consequently, also on that medium which the Mediator useth; for it is plain, that he cannot lay hold on God, nor come to God immediately. His will, faith, imagination, are, by his fall, departed at such a distance from God, and so corrupted, that they cannot, especially in this beginning of regeneration, lay hold directly and immediately on God's pure spiritual being; like as also God in his holiness cannot lay hold on, nor be united immediately to the soul in this state: a medium, therefore, fit for both, is necessarily required, in which they both may meet. And this medium can be no other but on God's side the inward water of eternal life, because this is the same light's materiality, wherein God had created man; and on the outward man's or body's side, the earthly or elementary water, because man's body is also become earthly or elementary. etc.

Page 377. Q. 4. Why was elementary water made use of as an outward medium? The chief reason hereof was given just now; and that which here is desired to be made plainer (from the Two Testaments, iv. 9.) can have no obscurity, if man's falling away from that principle of meekness wherein God dwelleth, and which was shut unto man, as to his spirit, soul and body, is but considered. For if there is in baptism such an infusing of the water of eternal life into the soul, the soul hath thereby, as it were, a little gate reopened unto her, which, in its progress, may be made wider and wider, and through which it may go out from its own natural fiery properties into the light, love, and meekness of God; for which end, also, this gate is opened in baptism. In the other place (THREE PRINCIPLES, xxiii, 28.) this same is also said, though with other and deeper words, and more circumstantially, to show that as the beginning of the life is, so must also the order in the regeneration be. etc.

Page 379. trembling. I remember that but lately was asked, why trembling was necessary to repentance? Now in the places quoted, viz. pages 20, 21, I find in the High Dutch no such word as could be rightly expressed by trembling; but that word signifieth properly and directly a violent breaking. And why this is necessary he gives a plain reason, which may be illustrated by the simile of a hard stone, not able to receive any impression until first the hardness thereof be broken, or of a lump of ice, which must first become melted into water, etc.

philosophic and religious colleges of the East, having already attained to an approved degree of solid classic and mathematical erudition, and practical acquaintance with the applied sciences, and the discoveries thereof.

[ANNOTATION, extending to page ; the substance of which, as appears to the writer, may be as appropriately inserted here as on any future occasion.——As the present work is professedly to furnish the candidate with all the needful directions, and as far as may be materials for completing that which is required to be done by him, as summarily expressed upon the title page; whereby the relative positions of all nations of what are called Heathens, Jews, Turks, and Christians, upon the great human tree of Adam and Christ, with their respective religions and learning, shall be therein distinctly seen and understood by each of those several branches thereof: and as the clue to the true mystical divinity and philosophy of the latter branches from and in the line of the Mosaic dispensation, has been manifestly furnished in the preceding portions of this work, there remains only to be accomplished the same thing with regard to the former and more extensive branch, that is, to afford a key or insight to the learning and philosophy of the Eastern nations. So that a duly qualified missionary (of a Theosophic College, as above contemplated), in faithfully examining their systems and sacred books of religion and philosophy, shall be able to decipher, under its numerous elaborate veils and coverings, enigmatical and mystical forms, the truth, according to our Bible history and Christian theory, as interpreted and elucidated in the writings

Page 383. Q. 2. How did John's baptism differ from our Saviour's? A. (1.) John baptised only with a spirit of anointing to repentance, in order to the forgiveness of sins; but Christ with fire and the Holy Ghost. (2.) John's baptism was to prepare the way for the baptism of the spirit of Christ. And, therefore, also (3.) John's baptism had not yet those glorious effects, which our Saviour's baptism had after his resurrection, because, in John's baptism, the Holy Ghost, in a certain true sense was not yet; the blood of atonement was not yet shed, and the anointing tincture not yet prepared. But, nevertheless, John's baptism belonged, not to the types of the Old Testament, but stood, as it were in the midst, between those types of the old and the real substance of the New Testament, partaking something both of this and that, and being, therefore, different also both from this and that.

Page 383. Q. 3. Why was John of the lineage of the priests? A. Because, as the types were now to be brought out of their shadow into the substance, or out of the law covenant into the covenant of grace; so also that agent, which in this beginning was made use of, must first have been endued with the spirit of the law-covenant, as the priests were especially, that handled the circumcision and bloody sacrifices; that so with this spirit a beginning, and from this a progress might be made into the covenant of grace, and in this progress the former might be overtaken and fulfilled by the latter: which could not have been so, if John had not been of the lineage of the priests; but the order, coherence, and harmony of the whole, would have been broken in this part.

Page 383. Q. 4. What was Christ's baptism by John? or why was Christ himself baptised? A. Christ, as a public person and representative of the whole human race, and as one that was to go through the whole process of regeneration, must needs have made also this beginning thereof with being baptised by John: for thus (saith he himself), it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness.

Ibid. Q. ult. What is the true order of administering baptism? Here, I think, the practice of the primitive christians enquired for in the church history, might give the best answer. In the place quoted from the THREE PRINCIPLES, xiii. 30, Behmen represents it very simply, and without any ceremonies, minding only the sprinkling of the water in the name of the holy Trinity, as the only needful and principal transaction.

Page 385. Q. 1. Why doth baptism precede the Eucharist, or Lord's Supper? A. Because the beginning or generation of the new life (which is made in the baptism) must needs precede the feeding or nourishing the same, which is done in the Lord's Supper.

Ibid. Q. 4. How, or in what sense, were these types of it? A. As in the Lord's Supper, an union is made between man and what man feeds upon; so, also, was such an union (but only in its kind and degree, according to the nature of that dispensation of the covenant) made in the paschal lamb, in the sacrifices, and add also in the shew bread. But as these things had not in them the real heavenly substance manifested, but were only like as shadows thereof, pointing thereat, directing thereto, and showing what there was to be expected, believed, and hoped for; so, also, they could not fill nor satisfy the partakers thereof with that heavenly substance itself, whose types they were; but, nevertheless, were they such medium, as by the right use of which men approached in faith unto God, and God drew near in mercy unto men. So, therefore, not only (1.) a bare likeness which there was between these shadows of the Old, and the real substance of the New Testament, but also (2.) that benefit which the church of God received by them; and, more especially, (3.) that ordinance, whereby they were so instituted with a reference to the substance to be manifested in Christ, made them to be called holy things and types thereof.

Ibid. Q. 5. How were they brought into substance by Christ? A. Successively and gradually in his incarnation and whole process of suffering and death, resurrection, and ascension. For the real substance of the New Testament, in opposition to the shadows of the Old, is nothing else but the perfect image of God, the heavenly humanity, the holy tincture of light and love, the bread and water of life, etc.: all which in and to the first Adam was disappeared and withdrawn into its own principle or heaven. When, therefore, in the second Adam all this came down from heaven again, and when he had fulfilled all righteousness, and was gone through death and hell, and had led captivity captive, and communicated these things or heavenly gifts to believers, both dead and living, then the types thereof must needs have ended; for there was no more need of a feeding on things, that only represented as in a picture what was to come, but a taking in (as to the inward man), and being really fed and clothed with and by the heavenly things themselves, that were typified before.

Page 387. Q. 1. Is Christ's particular soul given to believers? A. Yes, in such a sense as the spiritual being of a soul can bear; not importing that the individual soul of his human person is out of him transported into the persons of believers, and makes them to be Christ, but only that between his soul and the souls of believers such an union is made, as there was before between the first Adam's soul and the souls of all his children, which makes him to be the root and them the branches. For if his light, inseparable from his soul, enkindles and tinctures their fiery souls, they and scope of the great authors referred to in the present work; and demonstrate to his attentive and intellectual hearers, in the several seats of eastern learning, the identity of the ground and principles of truth couched in their sacred mysteries, (and therefore known to their pious and learned predecessors in remote antiquity, the early descendants of Shem, probably of an epoch even anterior to that of Abraham, the 'father of the faithful,' of Jews, Christians, and Mahometans.) with those of Christianity. In which he would necessarily commence at the foundation of the NOTHING AND ALL, and the eternal generation of the POINT; and proceeding step by step self-evidently, through all the 'fluxions and developments of the point,' as centre, cross, triangle, septenary, etc., into nature, with its three principles and their productions, (page 51,) would embrace the entire ground and superstructure, and comprised verities of the Christian scheme, thereupon unfolding to them the whole 'MYSTERY OF CHRIST' as contemplated by the Apostle Paul; at the same time illustrating his subject, where needful, by mathematical diagrams, which however perfect and true, intellectually or physically, can only be so, because they are ectypes or symbols of the nature and constitution, or so to speak, generation of eternal life and truth, that is, of the supernatural God: all according to the recondite philosophy opened in Behmen, and illustrated by his great original interpreters, Freher and Law.

For truth is one, at all times, and in its ground and earlier developments must always be the same. If therefore Noah and his family may be supposed—as they must be for abundance of rea-owe indeed the original of their soulish being, as to itself, to the first Adam, their natural father; but the original of their renewed soulish image, or the reunion of soul and spirit, they owe to the second Adam, their spiritual father, or to his soul and spirit.

Page 387. Q. 2. Is his particular glorified body given to believers, or only his universal spiritual body? A. Both together in conjunction; for neither of them can be given without the other. And though the former chiefly may be considered as the giver, and the latter as the gift, yet it is not so in this case, as our reason tells us it is with other gifts and givers; as from the nature of the thing is plain, and by that simile of the sun's particular glorious light-body standing in a circumscribed place, and the sun's universal unformed body extended throughout all this principle, may be illustrated.

Ibid. Q. 3. If this were true, would not his particular body be omnipresent as well as his universal? A. No, no more than the sun's particular body is required to be omnipresent, as well as the universal body thereof; when, nevertheless, without a concurrence of its particular body, nothing could be formed in or of its universal body in all the world. For, if there be given a power and virtue of Christ's spiritual formed body, this power and virtue is certainly in and of his particular body, and proceeds from the same and stirs his universal body; and, without this proceeding from his particular body, or flesh and blood (which he saith is meat and drink indeed), no paradisaical bodies and mystical members of him could be generated in and of his universal body.

Page 387. Q. 5. What is the true meaning of these words of Christ, Take, eat, this is my flesh? A. The words of Christ must, according to St. Paul's doctrine, by a spiritual man be spiritually discerned, for they are, as the Lord himself said, spirit and life; and, therefore, they must be distinguished, but not separated from that outward act which he then performed, when he spoke these words. He took in his hands the bread and broke it, and gave it unto them: this was an outward visible act in this elementary world, wherein they saw with their firmamental eyes nothing more than what everyone of us would have seen, if we had been then present, viz. that he had natural bread in his hands, not flesh; and so, also, not blood in the cup, but wine. But now, if he had given them no more but what they thus saw and took, he would have fed only their earthly stomach, and natural life in this world, which would have profited them nothing to the kingdom of heaven. His words, therefore, cannot be principally referred unto that elementary bread which they saw and took; for truly that bread was not his body, which was to be broken for them to the remission of sins, though it was according to St. Paul's explication, a communion of, or had communion with his body. He gave them, therefore, at the same time, together with this bread and wine, as to the inward heavenly world, his real flesh and blood, to be taken by their inward man, and unto this his words, being spirit and life, must be principally referred; and, though they are not to be separated from the outward elements, yet unto each must be attributed only that which it can be capable of: and always in this act the two principles, viz. the outward and inward, must be joined and minded together, so, that the outward visible act be referred unto this world, and unto the outward man, but the words of Christ, which he saith are spirit and life, unto the inward; and the connection between them be understood in that communion which the bread hath with his body, and the wine with his blood, consisting not only in that assimilation which is in the breaking and pouring out, attributed both unto this and that, but also, and even chiefly, in the interior quickening and strengthening tincture, which is the highest, as to this outward principle, in bread and wine. So far therefore the Calvinists say well enough, that bread and wine are a symbol or sign, for indeed they are so; but when they add only a sign, and a sign of an absent or far distant thing, this is false. The place quoted from Behmen's THREEFOLD LIFE, which is said to be not rightly translated, is in substance this,—The outward mouth of Christ's disciples took and gave to the belly that bread which Christ gave unto them; but that word, when Christ said, Eat, this is my body, was, or came forth from Christ's eternal or inward body, and was surrounded with heavenly flesh and blood: this the soul took, and put it on as a new body. Thus there were together at once in the hand of Christ two kingdoms, or two principles, viz. a heavenly one, and an earthly one; but you must know, that the heavenly cannot be comprehended and carried about from place to place by the earthly, etc. Now, from hence it can be plain enough, that all what was said hereof above is conformable unto this, and that the true meaning of these words of Christ, Take, eat, this is my body, cannot be apprehended, found out, or understood, in one principle only, nor by a man that liveth and is immersed only in this outward principle: further, that from hence all the disputes arise, and needs must arise, between the divided parties of Christendom: and lastly, that the true meaning of these words of Christ (when in each principle that is understood which is therein, and belongeth thereto, and when they both are taken jointly, and unto each is attributed what it can be capable of) will be this,—(1.) With reference to the inward world, Take and eat with your inward man, will, faith, desire, etc.—this (not this visible bread, for this is not in the sons, for they lived within a short period of the very man whom God created in Paradise, and had doubtless often heard the story of the creation, from those who had received it from the lips of Adam himself: if they may be supposed to have been well versed in the knowledge of God, and in the grand system of truths appertaining to the origin and constitution of man; and if the ground and philosophy of things is now fundamentally opened, as it is incontestibly, we have then a clue to all ancient philosophy, however corrupted through the lapse of time and the ignorance or apostasy of its guardians, or concealed in the fables, allegories, and symbols of the ancient mythology and hieroglyphics, or couched in the present philosophy of the eastern nations. And, taking into consideration the miraculous circumstances of the preservation of Noah and his family, their faith and piety, and also the fact of their being appointed to be the head of a new world, together with the divine wisdom which directed them, we cannot do otherwise than conclude, that great care was taken by them on entering the ark, to preserve all sufficient documents relating to the history, religion, philosophy, and genealogy of their forefathers, for the benefit of their future posterity; as also, that the same wisdom and piety after the flood, would take care to institute an order of priests or magi in each of their families, to whom should be committed their sacred oracles and traditions, the maintenance of the true worship of God, the cultivation of philosophy, and the education of youth. And when is further taken into account, that early age of the world, when men were possessed of physical constitutions that could endure upwards of nine hundred years, as likewise of inward world, but this) which I give you here with my word spoken unto your inward man, is my body. And (2.) With reference to the outward principle, Take and eat with your outward hands and mouth—this bread, which you see I break and give unto your outward man, is the communion of my body. So hath St. Paul explained and paraphrased it; nothing therefore can be excepted against it. But nevertheless, without any contradicting him, the words may be left also in their own construction, and can be rightly understood (if the principles are but rightly discerned) so as they sound, viz. Take, eat, this (bread, not as to its perishable substance, but as to its pure, inward ground of the heavenly tincture which is therein) is my (universal) body.

Page 387. A. ult. No, but it is under them, etc. Although this answer is sufficient, if it be rightly understood, so that I have nothing to say against it, yet it may easily also be misunderstood, seeing that the words in and under are a little ambiguous, and bring therefore along with them something of an obscurity. For as there is indeed a true sense wherein we can say, This invisible body is not in but under the outward elements, so there is another also, no less true, wherein we can say again, it is in the outward elements, viz. so as paradise is in this world, and it is not under, but above them. It is then indeed in the outward elements, yet not as in their sphere of being, or as belonging to their kind; but it is under them, or hid as it were behind their veil.

Page 390. Q. 1. Is Christ's body only participated of in the use of bread and wine? A. No: for Christ hath not confined himself to this use of bread and wine, but to the faith of man: which faith, if it be always living and operating, may always eat and drink of Christ's flesh and blood, whosoever it turneth itself thereunto, and maketh it to be its object; which it can do as well without, as in this use of bread and wine.

Ibid. Q. 2. Why then is that outward medium made use of? A. (1.) Because of reasons like unto those, that in the baptism required an outward elementary medium: for man also was become outward and elementary, and having disordered himself in all the principles, he wanted a restoration in all of them; and in order thereunto, each principle in him was to be fed by its own likeness. (2.) Because of the communion of saints in this outward principle: for there is in the use of this bread and wine a holy band of union tied, even outwardly also between the members of Christ, participating of this common food; which union cannot be made in this outward principle without an outward medium.

Page 390. Q. 3. To what end is the tincture of the elements conveyed to the soul? A. Although the tincture of the elements is not properly or directly conveyed to the soul, but to its own likeness in man, yet it may be said also to be conveyed to the soul, as the chief agent in man; and though this tincture is made use of but as a medium, so that no ultimate end may be fixed upon it, yet it may be said also, that it is done to this end, that the soul might have again, in due order and purity, what she had, as to every principle, before the fall.

Ibid. Q. 4. To these two particulars, this third one might reasonably be added, — to complete the image of God in man, which doth not consist in soul and spirit only, but in spirit, soul, and body.

Ibid. Q. 5. Why hath the soul need of food? A. Because it is not a self-existent nor independent being. This makes even the holy angels also to have need of something for their food: and from the intrinsic essentiality of the two eternal principles, the reason is yet more plain and evident. The first cannot consist without being continually fed, softened, and sustained by the second, and so thereby kept in union with it. But if that first be rent asunder in the creature from the second, it can be nothing else but a perpetual hunger and dryness, never filled nor satiated, etc. And for such a state the soul was not, nay, could not have been created.

Ibid. Q. 6. Why hath the soul need of a body? A. The soul, considered as after and with respect to the fall, must of necessity, and according to plain reason, have need of what she lost in the fall, which was her glorious body: and considered absolutely in its creation, and as to its own soul-like being, it had need of a body also, because it was to be a full image of God, as manifested in and through eternal nature, wherein there are not only the fiery, but also the light's properties, and the heavenly corporality as well as pure spirituality.

Page 392. After the two particulars here mentioned, I think could well be added, — (3.) because it hath continual need of keeping faithfully to that fraternal band or association, and therefore also of renewing frequently that covenant or confederation, which in this sacrament is made between the members of Christ, in opposition to Satan, the world, and their sinful flesh.

*Ibid. Q. 3. No. 2. That same which here is said of a man in a state of renewal, Behmen saith expressly of the beastial man, or earthly flesh and blood, wherein dwelleth no good thing, and which is so, as to itself, in every one living, more or less. But notwithstanding Behmen's words, it is very rightly said, as by an explanation of Behmen, The man, in a state of renewal, receiveth, as to his outward earthly flesh, the judgment of God, for the breaking and killing the lusts of the gross body: and there is no difficulty in the matter at all. Every property in man receiveth what* correspondingly vigorous intellectual powers, and great natural light, they doubtless were enabled to prosecute the study of natural and divine philosophy to an extent, of which we at the present day cannot form any conception. And, comparing the dates of the flood, the call of Abram, and that of Moses, also the different ages of the descendants of Noah, as related in the tenth and eleventh chapters of Genesis, as also from many other considerations, we may farther conclude, that from them was immediately derived the renowned learning, and magical and cabalistical science of the ancient Chaldeans and Egyptians, in which, as the Scripture informs us, Moses himself, by the providence of God was educated: who probably knew no other wisdom, divinity, and philosophy, than what he had been taught among them. For, as to the Jewish dispensation, which he was the instrument of instituting, in regard to the revelation of original truth, it was as truly on the outside of wisdom as of religion, and but a temporal appendage or monument to both, erected by God for an especial peculiar reason and purpose of his grace and wisdom. And (as will appear evident on a little reflection,) when Moses had prepared his memorial of his times and nation, in order to render it complete, he did not anything more than take the natural and evangelical history of the preceding two thousand years, concerning the creation, etc. preserved in the sacred colleges of learning and religion of Chaldea and Egypt, as known to him by his education, and condense, purify, and reproduce it in the brief, yet sufficiently comprehensive form, in which we now have it in the first eleven chapters of Genesis, and then tacked it on, as a kind of preamble, to his own Jewish history:

it is capable of. The lusts of the gross body are condemned by God, and his judgment and curse lieth upon them, as well when a man eats this bread and wine, as when he abstaineth from the same : this every one will grant. Now then, when a man receiveth this mysterious bread and wine, the testament or covenant of grace, and all what on God's side belongeth thereto, or dependeth thereupon, or is necessarily consequential to it, is stirred in or upon that man, and so therefore that judgment also upon the lustful outward flesh. If, then, the receiver of this bread and wine is in a state of renewal, and able to receive Christ's body, he receiveth the same as to his inward man, but he receiveth also, as to his outward, that judgment of his sinful flesh, nay, thereby his inward man is strengthened to judge down, to break, and kill himself his own lusts in the flesh. But if he be not in a state of renewal, he receiveth indeed that judgment under the elements, yet he cannot be sensible thereof, but rather a greater enlivening and strengthening of his own lusts is made, and Satan gets a wider gate of entrance into him. So, therefore, only the man that is in a state of renewal can receive it thus profitably, for a destruction of his outward sinful, and an increase of his inward holy man.

Page 392. Q. penult. Why may not infants receive this sacrament? A. Because they cannot try themselves, nor discern the Lord's body ; nor have they a will, faith, desire, or hunger after it, nor any sensibility of their wanting it, but only that ground wherein these things may be raised in their time. But especially also, because they know yet nothing of that brotherly band of union and communion of saints, which every one freely, willingly, with due understanding thereof, and earnest purpose suitable to it, is to enter into ; which is the chief end of this outward sacrament, and which of infants cannot be required.

Ibid. Q. ult. What was the true apostolical way of celebrating the Lord's supper? A. The records of antiquity may give the best account hereof. What Behmen says thereof is very short, and making no reflection upon any ceremonies, but mentioning only that which is declared by St. Paul.

Page 394. Q. 4. May it not be called a commemorative or representative sacrifice? A. That there is in this supper not only a commemoration, but also a representation of the Lord's sacrifice, is true and plain, both from the words of our Saviour, and from his breaking the bread. But upon what account it should be called such a sacrifice, I cannot see. Christ is not offered up to God in this supper, but only a remembrance is made of his having been offered up once on the cross, and he rather offers and presents himself with all his benefits unto man, which man, if yielding himself up to obedience, is himself a living sacrifice, and ought to be so not in this celebrating the Lord's supper only, but also in all his life. [See LAW 'On the Sacrament,' on this point.]

Page 394. How do we eat of the sacrifice of Christ, by eating of the Lord's supper? A. Not only by a thankful commemoration of his sacrifice, made once for us, and without us, on the cross, but also and even chiefly, by taking into ourselves and strengthening our inward life with the effectual power thereof, which is to crucify and kill the lusts and love of this world, and of ourselves in our mortal bodies and astral mind ; and so to be made ourselves also, in different respects, a living sacrifice, both as to every communicant in particular, and the whole fraternity in general.

Ibid. Q. ult. What do they mean by the inward word? A. The living of itself, and therefore also quickening, enlivening, comforting, raising, and upholding Spirit, power, and virtue, which is contained in, and so hid under the outward word, that not every one, and no man always, according to his own will, can be sensible thereof, when he looks upon the outward letter killing, and killing only, if it be separated from that Spirit. Which inward hidden word is in such a manner different from the outward letter, as for instance an almond kernel is from the almond shell, or as the pure sweet honey from that wax frame wherein it is contained.

Page 396. A. 3. These differences between the calls of the inward word are obscure, and have something of confusion in them ; and I, not knowing from what places they are taken and expressed so, can say but this thereof in general, viz. That all men are called, and the differences of these calls are rather on the side of them that are called, than of the Word or Spirit calling them : for every one hears these calls only according to his state, or progress made in his way, or also disposition for an entering into the way. In some the Word is unformed indeed, and in them very little or no disposition at all to obey their call, that it might be formed ; in others, it is in a beginning of formation, more or less, but not yet fixed ; and in others again it is really born, and hath made its abode in them, etc.

Page 396. Q. 4. How shall we discern the speaking and calls of the true Word in us from those of the Father ; or how may we discern the true word from the false? A. The speaking and calls of the Father are always (viz. in the beginning of the actual conversion of sinners) preceding those of the Son, and, according to his fiery nature, and the dispensation of the law, they are dreadful, and accompanied with terror and trembling, more or less, according to the sinner's state and complexion :

thereby also providentially preserving a duplicate account of the creation, or counter check to the original, in case it should be corrupted in after ages, the chief and especial object of which being ever the same, viz. that of the Gospel, or a record of the fall and the redemption, with a correct register of the line of the covenant, or unbroken chain of the descent of the 'promised seed' until his appearance (Gal. iii. 19,) as the actual Redeemer of mankind, the second Adam, etc. : which will account for the brief history possessed by Jews and Christians of the first two thousand years of the world.

This then, we say, being the only desideratum to be supplied, to enable the candidate to complete the requirements of the title page, namely, to afford a clue to the science, and to the only natural way or means of propagating a true rational FAITH IN CHRISTIANITY AMONG THE INTELLECTUAL HEATHEN NATIONS, whereby a nation might literally be 'born in a day,' and from which the 'obedience of faith' (Rom. i. 5.), would necessarily follow, we shall now with that intent, and as we think sufficient for the purpose, present the following extracts to his consideration. In the perusal of which he will bear in mind, that not every particular thereof is to be received as simple and orthodox truth, but that they are altogether, intended to open out to his apprehension, a glimpse of that intricate path he is to explore and pursue, which shall bring him to the desired goal. As also, that, whatever attempts he shall occasionally meet with, in the course of his reading, in any profound historical or philosophical disquisitions concerning the original science of the eastern na-when contrariwise the following ones of the Son are healing, comforting, refreshing, according to the nature of light and love, and the Son's dispensation of the gospel. But as to a discerning of the true Word from the false, the chief if not the only thing requisite and sufficient, (as I am for my part apt to think) in all cases, is in short, a deep, sincere, and attentive *mind*ing of our own selfishness, with an impartial examination whether the same, by such or such a word, be set forward or turned backward; for this cannot but be true and really beneficial, when that other must needs be false and hurtful. But if this setting forward or turning backward by no examination be discernable, then also no regard is to be had to such calls, words, or speakings, no obedience is to be paid unto them, and neither hurt nor benefit is to be expected or feared from them.

Page 398. A. 2. No; none but such are true members. Seeing that here is spoken only of the invisible church, or of them (as it was explained, page 396, A. ult.,) that are in Christ, I cannot understand, why here is said, that none but such are true members, whereby it is plainly granted that they who are not in Christ are false or dead members, whereas they are no members at all of the Church (which can have no dead members), but only of the outward mixed congregation.

Page 399. Q. 1. What do they mean by Antichrist? A. That mystery of iniquity (common unto all the divided parties of Christendom, and exerting itself in the one of them more, and in the other less, according to their different circumstances) which professeth indeed the name of Christ, but liveth and acteth contrary to the spirit, will, and pattern of Christ; not suffering itself to be taught, led, and guided by him, but setting up itself, and suppressing all the rest, according to its own will, for its own selfish ends, and upon the principles of its own corrupt reason, all tending to greatness, splendour, and love of this world.

Ibid. Q. 3. Which do they account the chief error with the Antichristian papacy? A. The departure from the leading of the Spirit of Christ, according to the pattern of his love and humility, and the exalting itself into a worldly state, and then also persecuting those that resist or witness against it, cannot but be the chief, because it is the ground and deep foundation of all the rest. But if this question means the chief error in opinions or articles of confession, I could not say, in particular, which is the chief; but think that for several of them something might be produced, which could make it the chief in this or that particular respect.

Ibid. Q. 4. In what consisteth the Antichristianism of the Reformation? A. Though this be answered already, at least in part, in the above question, What do they mean by Antichrist, yet this may be said here in particular, That it consisteth in not leaving to the Spirit of Christ his right and due, viz. his inward dominion over the souls of men; but presuming to be themselves their leaders and teachers, and directing them, not to Christ in everyone's own ground, but to their particular parties, and the outward rites, ordinances, words, doctrines, and ceremonies thereof, all crying, Lo here is Christ! And then again in hating, persecuting, and killing one another, at least with the tongue, if not with an outward sword.

Page 400. A. 1. soon after the time of the apostles. Seeing that the preceding particular of a false church in the true one is universal, and extends to the whole course of time, from the beginning of the generation of men, this particular also might be represented more universally, and its beginning be placed in the time of Cain, rather than after that of the apostles. And this even the more, because in the beginning of this answer was said, They give an account of the state of the church, from the beginning to the end of the world.

Page 400. No. 5. The golden candlesticks were withdrawn, etc. Behmen's meaning in these expressions, is in plain words this,——The glorious light of the gospel, and the extraordinary gifts of the holy Spirit of God, which the Lamb of God, after he had satisfied the Father's fiery anger and justice, and broken in the humanity the seven seals of the book of life, had bestowed on the church, were, when the church would walk no more in that light, taken away and sealed up again, or hid to the church under the same seven seals of the Father's wrath: wherefore then, instead thereof, the seven vials of his anger and indignation were poured out from his throne, etc.

Ibid. No. 8. not wholly free from wickedness, strife, and contention, etc. In that state of the church which Behmen calleth Zion, no such thing will be; nor hath he anywhere declared his mind after such a manner, but said only that Zion will not be so universal, as that there shall be left no wicked man more upon earth. If strife and contention should still be in that state, what prerogative could it have above the beginning or infant state of the apostolical churches? And, moreover, many places of the Scripture speak expressly and directly to the contrary.

Page 401. Q. Do they admit of a supreme pastor or pope? A. They admit of none now in being; and as to the future, I can say nothing positively. The words of Behmen alleged from the FOURTH QUESTIONS, Answer xxxix, make not plainly enough for this purpose; but rather, if they are compared to some other of his places and expressions, it is plain that he understands them of Christ, the only head of the church, and only true shepherd and bishop of souls.

tions, to fix the sense of the mysterious emblems, traditions, dogmas, rites and ceremonies, related therein, he will regard all such speculations, theories and hypotheses, through the one only infallible medium of the eternal unchangeable principles (again revealed in these last ages, in their pristine freshness, but with fulness of maturity,) of Behmen, as comprised in brief in his CLAVIS. So that, consonantly therewith, whenever the candidate finds mention made of the number seven, seven demi-gods, seven planets, etc., (whatever opinions or conjectures, we say, the authors themselves may put forward in solution of the mystery,) he will always understand thereby the seven properties of nature, as the ground thereof. For, as already intimated, the antediluvian patriarchs Noah, Shem, and their early descendants, being well versed in the philosophy of the eternal and temporal birth of things, embodied their science in such material figures and schemes as they deemed to be appropriate emblems for its preservation and propagation: which in time became corrupted. And as the seven working powers or properties of nature are the only doers and creators of all things that ever were, or are, or will be done and created, hence the number seven is found so often and variously introduced in their systems of philosophy and theology. And so likewise of the number three, etc. Thus much by way of GENERAL DIRECTION to the candidate.

With regard to the existence of true evangelical knowledge, wisdom, and piety, at the present day in the eastern nations, however absurd and idolatrous their religious theories may appear to the uninitiated observer, or popularly educated, unphilosophic Christian missionary, it may be inferred

Page 402. Q. 3. Will not their errors and superstitions be imputed to them as sinful by God? A. They will be burnt up in the last fire, as straw and stubble; and so they shall suffer loss of these things, which were, if not directly sins and sinful, yet at least so many effects and products of sin, and not able to abide the fire.

Ibid Q. 4. What is an honest, simple, christian to do amidst variety of sects and contentions? A. He is to meddle with no contentions, but to keep his heart peaceable in himself, and in love with all men, of what persuasion soever they may be; and to mind nothing but the inward work of the Spirit of God upon his soul, in all his outward performances, as knowing that nothing can avail him nor make him acceptable unto God, but his own being made a new creature in Jesus Christ.

Page 404. Q. 2. Pray what do they mean by these two last assertions? A. They do not mean that the civil magistrate is the head of the church, that is of them that are in Christ, but only of the outward congregation, as the same is in this world, wherein the magistrate is ordained, authorised, and commissioned by God to have an inspection over, and care for the welfare of his subjects. And that the priests have no such outward power, commission, and authority given unto them by God, or Jesus Christ, but that their power and authority is only spiritual. Wherefore then, with respect to the outward congregation, they are not rulers nor governors, but rather servants of the same, as to the outward functions; when, nevertheless, with respect to the spiritual kingdom of Christ, they are not servants, but are or ought to be fathers or elders, excelling their flock in age (of the inward new man), and in experience of things belonging to the kingdom of heaven. And this makes them to be worthy of double honour, which is nowhere applicable unto any servant.

Page 403. Q. Do they say that a lay-man may administer the sacraments, and perform the other parts of the ministerial function? A. In Christ is no distinction between a priest and lay-man, but all that are anointed with his Spirit are priests: all, therefore, by virtue of this anointing may, without any doubt or question, administer the sacraments, and perform all the other parts of the ministerial function; that is, they are in themselves, by the Spirit of Christ, qualified for it sufficiently. But, on the other hand, seeing that in the outward congregation there is such a distinction, and that God is a God of order, no layman may attempt to do such a thing, except in cases of necessity where no priest may be had.

Page 405. Q. Is not confession to a priest, and absolution by him, although he hath only ordinary gifts, of great use? A. To such as have only an ordinary understanding of things belonging to the kingdom of Christ, it may be of great edification; but as an universal rule for all it cannot be set up.

Page 410. Q. 2. What do they say of tithes? A. No more but that Abraham's giving tithes unto Melchisedec, denotes in the inward mystery, or is a figure of the full restoration of man, or of the completing in him the image of God again. Man is to give the tenth property of the human properties of his soulish fire unto Christ; and Christ giveth thereto his blessing, his love-fire, light's tincture, and heavenly substantiality (as Melchisedec, the type of Christ, gave with his blessing bread and wine), by which conjunction of these two, the image of God in man is completed. If it should be asked, What is meant by the tenth property of the human properties of the soulish fire? I must confess that I cannot sufficiently penetrate Behmen's sense; but think, nevertheless, that it may be enough to understand in simplicity the whole fiery soul, without dividing the same between Christ and the spirit of this world. For as, in the tenth number, there is a fullness of numeration (which is so also in, and hath even its original from, the ten forms or eternal properties of fire), and a falling back into the first; so the whole soul must first fall back into its ground, and be first given up wholly (which it cannot, if it be not at the end of its own numeration in selfishness), before it can receive this blessing, and be reunited to the heavenly substantiality in Christ. [N.B.]

Page 416. Q. 1. What do they particularly deliver concerning the Revelation of St. John? A. Besides the several particulars of the whore, beast, dragon, etc. mentioned above, they say,

(1.) That the time was not yet, wherein the mysteries of this book could be unfolded and plainly understood; but that it draweth nigh, and that this gift will be a key to them.

(2.) That, therefore, they who have endeavoured to explain that book, are not to be insulted nor contemned, though they mistook frequently.

(3.) That the mysteries contained therein are to be understood, not only with respect to the whole body of the church, both as pure and as apostatised from her purity, but also with respect to every individual person that is a member of either this or that. [See note, p. 111.]

(4.) That all the numbers seven, occurring therein so frequently, and applied now unto good, holy, and heavenly, and then also unto evil, impure, and hellish things, have their certain respect and relation to the seven properties of eternal nature, considered either as in their union and harmony in the light world, or as disharmonised in and by the creatures of this and of the dark world.

(5.) That in the representation of Christ, standing in the midst of seven golden candlesticks, and holding seven stars in his right hand, etc., not only the humanity, but also the Deity, or the

from a variety of considerations; among others, from this, that their immediate ancestors were the patriarchs of old, of the line of Shem, and who therefore may be considered to have held a similar election as the people of God, to that of the Jews afterwards. And then again from numerous passages of St. Paul's epistles, where is implied or reflected upon, "the hope of the gospel, preached to every creature under heaven." In accordance with which verity it was, that the pious Magi, (eastern patriarchs, philosophers and divines, heads of the schools or countries from whence they came, for tradition represents them as kings,) being immediately directed of God where to find him whom their impatient souls longed for, came to Jerusalem, humbly inquiring for the Jewish Messiah, (by which they however understood their long promised, long hoped for 'seed of the woman,') and who on beholding the holy child, were doubtless filled with that same Spirit of divine rapture, which made holy Simeon to exclaim, 'Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation.'

If now these oriental descendants of the patriarchs, (having had no more religious communion with the Jews, than the latter, or the descendants of the former have had, since the rise of Christianity, with the present elect of God, the christians;) if they could for two thousand years at least, that is from the time of Abraham, maintain such a spiritual worship of God among them, as is manifest they did (by which is not meant the idolatry of the masses of the people, sacerdotal or laical, which is ever the same under all dispensations): if such was the purity of heart and holiness be-eternal Word is expressed, as having conquered the fiery anger, and keeping it in his power.

(6.) That the seven churches in Asia, and their angels or bishops, are typical of so many periods of the church, from the beginning of Christianity to the end of the world.

(7.) That the book of life, sealed with seven seals, denoteth that human paradisaical life, which in the first Adam disappeared, when he disordered its seven harmonized properties, which thereby came to be so many seals, not to be broken but by the Lamb, etc.

(8.) That the vials of wrath are first poured out in the courts of kings and princes, and in their councils.

(9.) That the seven thunders, or rather their voices, which John was prohibited to write down, came from the fiery first principle, which man is not to know, nor to inquire into, but to rest in the meekness, light, and love of the Lamb.

(10.) That the eminent vision of the woman clothed with the sun, having the moon under her feet, and being in travail with a male child, and the dragon casting after her a flood etc., is not only a figure of the whole church, fulfilled in a measure always, and still to be fulfilled eminently in the time approaching, but also a circumstantial figure of the whole work of regeneration in every particular soul, attaining unto its accomplishment during this temporal life.

(11.) That the figure of the strong angel's coming down from heaven with a great chain and key of the abyss, and binding the dragon, was not fulfilled in the time of Constantine, nor ever since, but belongeth to the time of Zion, or of the Lily.

(12.) That the new Jerusalem coming down from heaven (as also the mystical temple of Ezekiel) is to be referred to a state of the church upon earth, or in this third principle before the end of time. etc.

Page 416. Q. 2. What do they say concerning death? This question is particularly answered afterwards, page 422. and this only may be added,—that death is a shutting up or suffocating of the tincture, and that the most terrible thing therein is the dissolution of the four elements, which is a breaking off of the third principle from the first: and because now this third principle was so nearly consubstantiated with man, had captivated him, and taken possession of his will, this breaking off cannot but be dreadful to him, and accompanied with pains, more or less, according to the inward and outward condition of his soul and body.

Ibid. Q. 4. What do they say concerning the resurrection, and the day of judgment? A. Concerning the resurrection is spoken afterwards, page 430, but this might be added more particularly,—that the dead shall hear the voice or call of God from within, viz. in the depth of their own souls, whether they be in happiness in the second, or in misery in the first principle. And that every particular receptacle, viz. that of the earth, water, air, etc., when the universal mysterium is moved, must give forth again all that it hath taken in of man. Concerning the day of judgment something also is said, page 430, and this might be added,—that in a manner contrary to that, or going as it were backward to that order, in which the world was created, its dissolution shall be. That the fire of nature (not an elementary fire, which would not consume earth and stones) shall kindle itself. That in this kindling the separation of good and evil in all things is to be done, everything entering into its own principle; and that this strictly is the last day, time being then no more.

Ibid. Q. 5. Do they tell us what will be the state of things after the day of judgment? A. As to this, I think, they say nothing but what in general may be expressed, as commonly is done, by an eternal happiness in the vision and fruition of God, and an endless misery in the separation from his light and love.

Page 418. No. 2. This particular would be more plain, if the other part of the reason were added, thus,—which (wrath of nature) they are all subject and liable unto, at least as to their outward man.

Ibid. No. 8. saints war not as Christians, but as heathens. These words are universally, without limitation or exception, true. But if this limitation here mentioned be added, viz. when they war unlawfully and seek self, this position is inconsistent with No. 4. And the matter is plain. If any war unlawfully, and seek self, they war not as saints; this is self evident. But if the saints (as in this instance Abraham was) war lawfully, and seek no self, they war not indeed as those heathens, but also not as saints; for all this lawfulness is only in and belongeth merely to this outward principle, wherein there is a mixture of good and evil, of right and unright, and whereof even the saints also are children, that is, natural men or heathens, as to their outward man. This therefore (not their inward sanctified ground) is the property which wars in them; and the only difference between the wars of these heathens and heathens, so vastly different from each other, (the former being merely heathens and nothing else, and the latter heathens only as to their outward man, but saints within,) consisteth herein, that the merely heathens seek self, war for ambition and covetousness, raise up themselves their heathenish property, and manage their war in fore God existing among them (heathens as they were called), founded on the eternal principles of truth and morality discerned in their own minds, and the original evangelical proclamation contained in their sacred books and traditions; and if these three Magi would carry home to their colleges and divines, as doubtless they did, the information of the long promised Saviour being come, that so it might be recorded in their annals, (which fact, with the history and results of his redeeming process, would also be confirmed and communicated to them some thirty-six years afterwards, by some of the "devout persons from every nation under heaven," who had been assembled at Jerusalem at the period of Pentecost, after Christ's resurrection,) what knowledge of Divine truth, we say, may there not be secretly existing at the present day, among the true mystical divines and illuminati, in the national colleges of the East? For God is the same yesterday as he is to day, and for ever: he dwells essentially (as a central point, or Spirit of life and divine knowledge) in the depth of every soul, be it Heathen, Jewish, Mahometan or Christian, and (so universal is his love and grace in Jesus Christ) never fails to open the usual regular development of himself (by his all-speaking Word, and all-illuminating Spirit) in every heart that turns its faith absolutely to him, as a Spirit of goodness, purity and love; which dies to its serpentine, rational, bestial self, and shuts the doors of its senses to the world. And in what a state of evangelical readiness may not such nations (that is, in the several centres and fountains of their philosophic, moral and religious learning) be supposed to stand, to have the 'eyes of their understanding their own will, all which is unlawful. But in such a case (as Abraham's was) of the saints warring, they war not for such ends, nor from their own drift; but God makes use in his anger and justice of the heathenish property of the saints, and thereby opposes them that are mere heathens, as he did here with Abraham. And this, therefore, makes it so far lawful, as that it can be tolerated in this outward principle; but, nevertheless, into the holy light-world this heathenish property cannot enter, neither in Abraham, nor in any other saint, for it is not holy: which by the figure of Melchisedec, and what he did to Abraham, is represented plainly enough. And if it now was so with Abraham, David, and other warlike saints, under the Father's fiery dispensation in the Old Testament, it will certainly be much more strict with christians, under the Son's meek dispensation of love, in the New. etc.

Page 420. No. 9. I see not how this spiritual subtlety from the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, lviii. 24, etc., can be referred to this place; for it hath a quite spiritual sense, not relating at all to outward possessions in this world, but to the wonders of outward nature, showing how they may be taken along with us through death, and brought into the kingdom of Christ, in the holy light-world.

Ibid. No. 10. If governors are verily in the inward process of regeneration, as Joseph was, they cannot but mind, how God carries on his work in them, after a spiritual manner, in the spirit of love and tenderness, and for their good: and, in conformity thereunto, they also cannot but manage all things about their subjects in a creaturely manner, in the same spirit, and to the same end. But if they are not, no wonder that they do not govern so as Joseph did, but so as we see they generally do.

Page 422. No. 7. near and far off are all one. The meaning of this expression is plain and simple. If there were in the light and love of God, a distinction between near and far off, God were not everywhere in the light or angelical world equally. They that are therein, are not nearer to him when they are in the kingdom of Christ, nor further from him when they are in that of Michael. Near and far off are things belonging to this outward principle, like as also time, which if dissolved, must be dissolved also: when, nevertheless, even in this principle, also something the like may be observed in our mind, spirit, thoughts, etc., with respect to which, it is not further to the West Indies than to Westminster; our thoughts being able to be as swiftly in the one place as in the other. John Engelbrecht, in his Vision of Heaven and Hell, saith, I remember, that which might be accounted as a thousand miles from him, he could see and discern as plainly and distinctly as that which was next to him. So that, indeed, not all manner of distance is utterly excluded from the creatures in the light-world; but that, nevertheless, all near and all far off from God, have lost in that world all their distinction. etc.

Page 426. No. 13. bad wishes or curses hurt them. Here, I think, this caution might be added,—that it is not fit for the children of God, nor lawful, to curse or wish bad wishes to damned souls: because they thus sow their seed into hell, and will certainly reap the fruits thereof, if a revocation is not made by repentance.

Page 426. No. 14. To the first part of this position might be added,—chiefly if this be done at their departure from this body; which is also expressly added by Behmen. For afterwards indeed, though it be not denied as utterly impossible, yet it is not a thing so easily done. And in the latter part of this position, Behmen's sense is not expressed, which is this,—The soulish spirit of a living saint may go along with his departing brother, to assist him in his way through darkness and fire; but when he is in the light, he can help him no more to have a greater glorification, but that spirit returneth unto its own soul: and the glorification of his brother is not from the assistance, prayers, or help of any other, but only from and according to his own essence, will, and works.

Ibid. No. 17. This raising and disturbing cannot be extended universally to all the departed blessed souls. But those that have put on their new body must be excepted: none living can raise nor disturb them, but they can appear of themselves if they will, and find it agreeable to the will of God.

Page 426. No. 18. The sense of this assertion is plain and easy: and the meaning of the words of Behmen is not this, that we are in the deceased blessed souls, as a soul is in a body, or one vessel in another; nor that we are one individual substance with them, and have their own personal knowledge and senses. But that we, if renewed with them by one and the same spirit of Christ, and to opened, to behold the 'mystery of Christ' as it could be unfolded to them by a truly enlightened Theosophic Missionary! And then to hear him deliberately read to them, as under the especial authority of God, Saint Paul's epistle to the Colossians and to the Ephesians—verily, they would leap for joy, and sing unto the Lord with shouting! The following are the extracts:—

EXTRACT I.—“A man cannot conceive the wonderful knowledge (writes the learned translator of Behmen's book of the THREE PRINCIPLES in his preface to that work,) before he hath read this book thoroughly and diligently, which he will find to be contained in it, when he is weighing and deliberating upon the matter as he readeth, and that without hard study; for it will rise in the mind of itself, with a ravishing sweetness and content. And he will find that the THREEFOLD LIFE is tenfold deeper than this, and the FORTY QUESTIONS to be tenfold deeper than that, and that to be as deep as a spirit is in itself, as the author saith, than which there can be no greater depth, for God himself is a spirit.

And accordingly, there appear some glimpses of the most deep mystical Oriental learning here and there, which is not discovered in any books, and therefore some of the learned men of Europe think it may be past their reach; but they will find that ground in this author, which will make such things easy to be understood, for the time of disclosing those grounds so plainly was not till now, that the mysteries which have been hid since the world began, should be revealed. Those that had the spiritual understanding of the natural mysteries were called Wise men, and they that understood the Divine mysteries were called Holy men, and they were patriarchs, prophets, preachers, apostles, evangelists, and believers. The wise men of all nations wrote darkly of their mysteries, not to be understood but by such as were lovers of those things, and so the very Scriptures themselves which contain all things in them, cannot be understood but by such as love to follow, practice, and endeavour to do those things which they find in them ought to be done; and those that one and the same light-world, are able to see in that one light, into the blessed souls, as into our own members; and to understand, by virtue of that one spirit, which is in them and in us, what, where, and how they are, etc. As in this world we see not all by one individual eye, hear not by one and the same ear, and feel not in one and the same personal body; and yet we see, hear, and feel by one and the same light, air, and living faculty of feeling, which is in all, and which enables us to understand what by others also may be seen, heard, and felt: so is it in the light-world also, after its kind and manner. As it is, therefore, rightly said, We are all in one land of the living, so it is also rightly, We see all of one spirit, to wit, that of Christ, become man in all of us.

Page 428. No. 21. Abraham's bosom is the christian church, etc. Seeing that this definition of Abraham's bosom might be so understood, as if thereby were meant the christian church militant upon earth, which, though in a sense true enough, is yet not so used in the Scripture, nor by Behmen, there might only be added some or other word, declaring that it is—the christian church as in the second principle of light.

Page 430. No. 23. The perfectly regenerate have their new body and soul, but in different principles, etc. Behmen saith no such thing; what the English translation says, I cannot tell, nor can I see what sense there could be in these words. He saith expressly, Betwixt those souls that have not yet put on their new body, and those that have put it on, is still a gulph indeed, but not a principle; for they are both in one principle. If, then, different souls, and in so different states, are nevertheless in one principle, how can one and the same individual person have his soul in one principle, and his body in another, different from that? And again, Behmen doth not say, They have their body in paradise, and they have their souls upon the cross; but they shall have it so, or they shall be brought into paradise again, etc. But this is Behmen's sense, and the plain construction of his discourse is this, viz. Those souls that in this life have put on the body of Christ, must, nevertheless, still wait for the resurrection of their paradisaical body: for, though they are indeed in paradise, or in the paradisaical world, yet they are not as yet in paradise so, as they were at first (in Adam) created and introduced into paradise; this third principle being not yet turned into paradise, and the paradisaical joy being not yet manifest in them, as to its completed fullness, because their good and holy works were all done or wrought by them in this world, and in their inward and outward body, which works, therefore, cannot be enjoyed by them before the resurrection of their body, and their being introduced again into paradise, as manifested in this restored third principle. And upon this ground he declareth, That as this doth not make two paradises, but only two degrees or different manifestations of paradise, so, also, not two bodies of the saints, but only two degrees or manifestations of their paradisaical body; and that, from hence it is plain that they bear indeed Christ's body in God, in that state wherein they are now with Christ; and that, nevertheless, they still expect their first Adamical holy body with its wonders, which they shall put on with a paradisaical qualification. (And now he adds.) For the purpose of God must stand. He created the first body into paradise, to remain therein for ever; it shall, therefore, be brought thereinto again, and the soul upon the cross of the ternary in the mouth of God, from whence it came, etc. Here is no separation of soul and body to be thought upon; but, as in the first creation, the whole man was formed and spoken or breathed forth by God into paradise, so in the full restoration it shall be done again. Soul and body are now indeed in God and in paradise; and the soul especially is upon (not in, nor under the cross, as it was in this life time, but upon) the cross, in the majesty, surrounded with light; but, with respect to the future state, it is still as it were in his mouth, or power of breathing it forth into its lost primeval state, and by that mouth of God it is not yet breathed forth, or introduced into paradise as restored and manifested in this third principle: which also cannot be done before the resurrection of the body, and the separation of good and evil in this mixed world."

With the omission of a few immaterial paragraphs, such as Freher's 'corrections and completions of the Rev. Mr. Waple's synopsis of the scope and contents of Behmen's philosophy,' undertaken at his own request, and for his own satisfaction. Which, however, was not the only instance wherein a similar service was rendered to him; for amongst Freher's MSS., we find one entitled, "Three Conferences between a German Theosopher, and an English Divine," consisting of a series of queries upon points of recondite truth, put forth by the latter, and answered at large by the former, who were the parties here in question.

led their lives in such a way, came to understand those mysteries from which they were written. And in several nations their wisdom hath had several names, which hath caused our age to take all the names of the several parts of wisdom, and sort them into arts, among which the Magia and Cabala are accounted the most mystical; the Magia consisting in the knowing how things have come to be, and the Cabala in knowing how the words and forms (or signatures) of things express the reality of the inward mystery. But he that knoweth 'the mystery,' knoweth both these and all the branches of the tree of wisdom in all real arts and sciences, and the true signification of every idea in every thought and thing, and sound, and letter in every language. And therefore this author, having this true knowledge, could well expound the letters of the names of GOD, and other words and syllables, the signification of which, he saith, is well-understood in the language of nature. And, as 'one jot or tittle of the word of God shall not pass away till all be fulfilled,' so there is no tittle of any letter, that is proceeded from that eternal essential WORD, as all things are, but hath its weighty signification in the deep understanding, in that word from whence it came, even in the voice of all men, and sounds of all other creatures. Also, the letters and syllables of a word of some language, do express something of the mystery more exquisitely than of another; and therefore, (I conceive) the author useth sometime to expound words borrowed from the Hebrew and Greek, and some Latin words, and other words of art, as well as German words, and not always words of his own native language only, according to their signification in the language of nature. For that language doth shew, in every one's mother-tongue, the greatest mysteries that have ever been in the nature of anything, in the letters of that word by which it is expressed. Therefore let every one esteem those expositions of his according to their high worth; for the knowledge of that language is only taught by the spirit of the letter."

"It is thought (observes the editor in continuation) that people cannot have that understand-

And now, after the preceding extracts (without reference to other of Freher's works), it is for the reader to consider, as before stated, how far Lee, the learned, the accomplished and gifted Lee, whom Professor Ockley, in a letter to Dr. Haywood, published in the first edition of Lee's 'Dissertation on Esdras,' and dated Swavesey, March 16th, 1720, designates "the greatest writer of the age, by far," was justified, in his 'Poem,' (after apostrophising Behmen as the "fountain of science, art and mystery," before whom, "all past sages veil and disappear," and "alone by eminence the Divine,") in describing Freher as a philosopher, the 'second to Behmen,' up to his day. [POSTSCRIPT.—It is but proper to state that since the above was in the press, the writer has found a slip, in the handwriting of Leuchter, attached to one of Freher's books, which runs thus: "The author of these writings was Mr. Dionysius Andreas Freher, from Norimberg; they were written (in London) in the years 1717, 1718, and 1720," (he being then 68—71 years of age.) What is inserted on p. 206 and 258, is however perfectly consistent herewith, on many accounts. For either one or other of these worthies, GICHEL and FREHER, was meant by Lee; who were intimate with each other, and about the same age and theosophic genius, the former being born in 1738, the latter in 1749, though not commencing authorship till he had long passed his fiftieth year.]

The first reflection which naturally suggests itself, after a careful perusal of the above 'Observations,' is this: What a noble popular compendium of theology, and classic text-book of Christian doctrine, would Mr. Waple's work have formed, with the above corrections and alterations introduced into it! As also, would doubtless immediately follow, a hope that the MSS. in question—indicative, as the nature and profundity of the subjects therein treated of attest, of no mean attainments on the part of the author—may have been preserved, as an honourable contribution by him to the establishment of Christian truth and doctrine, and to the facilitation of the attainment of theosophical knowledge, for the benefit of posterity. The writer of these lines regrets, however, to state, that a considerable doubt may be entertained of their being now in existence, inasmuch as, after some research, it has been impossible to obtain any tidings respecting them. In the preface to 'Waple's Sermons,' 3 vols., 8vo. which were published after his decease, there is inserted a brief memorial of the author, wherein the following passages occur, which may perchance lead to some further light being thrown upon the subject:—

"As for the author [of these Sermons] of whom some account might be here expected, as he was careful that his life should be indeed hidden from the world; and as certain private memoirs of his own life written by himself (wherewith he acquainted an intimate friend in confidence some years before his death,) were probably destroyed by him together with some other valuable papers, when he began to apprehend the approach of his dissolution, lest it might happen that some or other might make a bad use of them, since they are not now to be found after the strictest search made for them; the reader must be contented (without having the veil drawn from that which was hid with Christ in God) with that most authentic testimony which he hath left of himself in his last will and testament, wherein is to be seen the true picture of his mind." In another place is mentioned, that "he gave a very large and curious collection of books, which at great expense he had been for several years amassing, to the library of Sion College, in this city." In another it is observed concerning him, that "his great reservedness may indeed be esteemed by some a fault; and I deny not, (continues the editor,) but by it we have lost some excellent productions of his, of various kinds. But he was a person who had so studied human nature, and was so well acquainted with the springs thereof, that he found but too great reason for his general diffidence, both of himself and of the rest of mankind."

From these passages it would appear that his papers were destroyed, and amongst them the MSS. in question; nevertheless, may we not venture to hope that the results of so much study and labour, as they undoubtedly were, which had been corrected with so much pains and exactness, as we have seen, and which were in themselves of such intrinsic value and excellence, conducing to the best interests of mankind, in the diffusion of Divine light and truth, and the promotion of practical piety—that, by the providence of God, they have been preserved, and will yet be brought to light, in due time.

It was proposed, p. 328, to have closed the extracts from Freher, in this POSTSCRIPT, with the above 'Observations upon Mr. Waple's writings,' as being from their nature, a suitable termination to them. Upon further consideration, however, it had been more complete,—as affording a particular insight into the highest science, and showing how it does and must, when true, naturally ing now, by such as know not what is in man, for want of examining what is in themselves. Yet they may well perceive, that the ground of what hath ever been, lieth in man; for whatsoever any man hath been or can be, must needs be in that man that attaineth to it, as the ground of the most excellent flower is in the root from whence it groweth. And then sure the ground of all that was in Adam, or any since, or that shall be, is in any one of us; for whatsoever ground lay in God, the same lieth in Christ, and in him lieth in us, because he is [seminally] in us all. There is nothing but may be understood, if we do but consider how everything that ever was * * *

And again, on another occasion, the same writer observes:—

"This author, Jacob Behmen, esteems not merely his own outward reason, but acknowledges to have received a higher gift from God, freely bestowed upon him, and left in writing for the good of those that should live after him. And in his writings he has discovered such a ground and such principles, as reach into the deepest mysteries of nature, and lead to the attaining of the highest powerful natural wisdom, such as was among the philosophers, Hermes, Confucius, Zoroaster, Pythagoras, Plato, and other deep men, both ancient and modern, conversant in the mysteries of nature.

These principles lead to the attaining such wisdom as was taught in Egypt, in all which learning Moses had skill; to the wisdom which was taught in Babylon among the Chaldeans, Astrologians, and wise men, among whom (in after times) Daniel was educated; and to that wisdom of the East from whence came the Magi, who were led by a star to Jerusalem and to Bethlehem, where they saw the child Jesus, the 'hope of the nations,' and worshipped, and so returned, whom God himself was pleased to warn and direct what to do.

The ground and principles in his writings lead to the attaining the wisdom which Solomon had, and wrote in a book (which has not yet been extant with us, but was reported to have been in the East,) wherein he treated of all plants, from the cedar to the moss that grows upon the wall, and issue in simple practical piety of the gospel form and mode and spirit, (according to the unvarying experience of all the sons of wisdom, from the conclusions of 'the Preacher,' down to those of Mr. Law's 'Way to Divine Knowledge,')—to have presented in this place, Freher's Treatise of 'MICROCOSMOS,' or the theosophical and evangelical science of MAN: being a compendious enlargement of a German publication, which is thus entitled: "Eine kurtze Erönnung und Anweisung der Dreyen Principien und Welten im Menschen, In unterschiedlichen Figuren vorgestellt: Wie und wo eigentlich ihre Centra im innern Menschen stehen; gleich sie der Autor selbst im Gottlichen Schauen in sich gefunden, und gegenuertig in sich empfindet, schmecket und fuhlet. Samteiner Beschreibung der dreyerley Menschen, nach art des in ihme herrschenden Principii oder Geistes, Worinnen sich ein ieder als in einem Spiegel beschen kan, unter welchem Regiment er in seiner Lebens-Gestalt stehe und lebe. Nebst einer Anweisung, Was der Streit Michaels und des Drachen, auch was das wahre Beten im Geist und Wahrheit sey: Abgemahlet und vorgestellet, Durch Johan Georg Grabern von Ringehausen, und Johan Georg Gichteln von Regensburg; Im Jahr Christi 1696. Auf vieler Berlangen aufs neu- dem Druckubergeben im Jahr 1736." But, as the insertion of the treatise would have extended this publication to a much greater and perhaps inconvenient length, it may suffice simply to refer to the work, as worthy of perusal in this place, and to express a hope that it may be published for delivery herewith.

As also, with reference to the elucidation of the original science possessed by the primitive post deluvian patriarchs of India, Persia, China, etc., and to the affording of a clue to the TRUE MEANS OF THE CONVERSION OF THE INTELLECTUAL HEATHEN NATIONS—the subject of which is now under consideration in the ANNOTATION current at the foot of these pages—we might on the present occasion, and perhaps not out of place, have presented the whole Genesis of things, according to Behmen, as popularly and scientifically interpreted in the A. B. C. D. and also E. Dissertations of Freher, described in pages 6 and 7 of this book: but for similar reasons that is foregone. Nevertheless, in consideration of the essential connexion of the philosophy treated upon in those dissertations with the subject of the underneath ANNOTATION, we have deemed it advisable to give an outline or Summary of their Contents, which we now present for perusal. Therewith also reiterating a hope, that, through the instrumentality of the present work, and according to the PROSPECTUS to be affixed at the end of it, the publication of an entire edition of FREHER'S WORKS, uniform with a NEW, CORRECT and COMPLETE, STANDARD EDITION OF BEHMEN AND LAW, including a notice of all the little rills that have contributed to swell the stream of true theosophical science since their day, may be demanded by the public.

THE CONTENTS of the A. B. C. D. and E. Volumes, of FREHER'S JUSTIFICATIONS and DEMONSTRATIONS of the PRINCIPLES of TEUTONICUS, are these:—

(II.)—OF GOD, CONSIDERED AS MANIFESTING HIMSELF THROUGH ETERNAL NATURE. [Of the two eternal principles. Of the seven properties of nature. Of darkness, fire, and light.]

Which, themselves, in their war and fighting are this third.—A character of the three first forms explained. Some of all living creatures.

His ground discovers the way to attain, not only the deepest mysteries of nature, but the wisdom of faith, which may even bring our inward eyes to see such things as Moses saw in the mount, when his face shone like the sun, that it could not be beheld; such things as Gehazi saw when his master Elisha had prayed that his eyes might be opened—his inward eyes, for his outward were as open before as any of ours seeing he was a servant to so great a prophet—and so they were opened, and he saw angels fighting for Israel; such things as Stephen saw, who beheld Jesus sitting at the right hand of God, and his face shone like the face of an angel, at his stoning; and as Paul, who saw things unutterable in Paradise, when his outward eyes were struck blind. Such wisdom indeed, as understands all mysteries, even that divine art, by which Moses wrought his wonders above outward nature, which our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ himself knew and practised, and which he, the source of all wisdom and power, is ready to impart to those of his faithful disciples who are called and qualify themselves to receive it.

By the study of this Author's writings, men may come to know (every one according to his condition, property and inclination) how all the real differences of opinions of all sorts, may be reconciled, even the nicest differences in all ages. That which seems different in the writings of the profound magical, mystical, chemic philosophers, from that which we find in others, may be reconciled, by considering that this author teaches, that the names which were given by the original philosophers to the seven visible planets, signify the seven properties of the eternal nature, and are the cause of all those things, which are by modern experimentalists in nature, frequently accounted the first and deepest causes of all.

Thereby also the differences in religion may be so reconciled, that the minds and consciences of all doubting persons may be satisfied about the most difficult points relating to creation, corrupexpressions of Behmen concerning these three first forms.

The fifth and third but one. What it was before, and what it is now, explained by a simile of a wicked raging man, renewed; and of the air, turbulent and appeased. Related to the Holy Ghost.

The sixth and second one. The difference betwixt what it was before, and what it is now: declared by the words of St. James concerning the tongue. Why this sixth is called sound, intellect, etc. And what communion these expressions can have with mobility, explained from our speech and thoughts. Related to the Son, who is but one, and yet another Word, when etc.

The seventh and first one, the seventh (notwithstanding the manifold denominations thereof) shows by its own deadness, that it is the first in perfection; as the first was the seventh in beginning. Related to the Father, who is the first, and the last.

The generation of the fourth (the fire) must be most of all enlarged upon. The condition of the three first forms is recalled to mind. If this had been so of itself only, there could be no possibility for etc. But there is something with them secretly, and unto them incomprehensibly; the lubet. The difference between these two, declared by similes, taken from our mind, and stomach; and further by their own different essentiality. From these two, a twofold desire within each other, neither of which can satisfy itself.

Some preparatories to the kindling of the fire, explained by a simile of rubbing two pieces of hard wood. Note (1.) the free lust, or lubet, is the mystical cause of the desire after rest: (2.) this desire (or hellish hunger) is false, arising from own will and self-love. The manner, by which the three first raise a transient conjunction; and so, a fire indeed, but only to be compared to that of a swift lightning; though with a great difference. Upon account of which it is rather to be compared to that of a flint, when fire is struck out indeed, but without light, or at least etc. The simile of striking fire and kindling a candle, much recommended. The lubet's twofold resolution, viz., for a nearer conjunction, and further separation.

The great difficulty, and yet necessity of this conjunction; and the great work (neither easy nor pleasant) to be done thereby. Here, and here only God is called a consuming fire. Here Lucifer etc. found him so. In the generation of this fourth form lieth the contradiction.

The contradiction lying here in this single word of a conjunction is reconciled. That this conjunction must needs be made by nature and by something without nature is proved. Further the necessity of this conjunction is demonstrated by four arguments. Note especially, what here is discoursed, of omnipotence, and omnipotence. Of the transmutation of metals. And of the process of our regeneration.

The great stambling block in transmutation is mentioned; but the reconciling and vindication of Behmen is delayed till the conjunction itself, and what belongs thereto, be declared. The name conjunction improper, quite relating unto time. It is an eternal conjunction without beginning. Principle what. What is meant by an eternal conjunction.

This conjunction a most dreadful thing. Now all is a fire. The abyssal will is manifested. Must be understood from the process in our regeneration. Terror is on both sides. Why on side of the wrath, and why on the side of eternal liberty. Our Lord Jesus hath felt it etc. and all his etc. This fire is the first born of this conjunction, illustrated by our element fire; what it hath from nature and what from liberty; is still in contrariety; which is the cause of its destruction. In eternal nature the fire not only consumes but also generates again its food, the water. This fire properly the first principle, though Behmen gives this denomination to the dark world also, either by itself alone, or in union with the fire, upon different accounts.

The effects of this conjunction. Made by a crack (1.) on the left hand, as to the first form. Illustrated by a simile of a great piece of ice. As to the second and third forms. And further as to the triangle; now a cross. (2.) On the right hand; the second birth of this conjunction, the light; declared by paraphrasing THREE PRINCIPLES ii. 9—13. And further, the glorious transmutation of the three first, declared in the same paraphrase.

The lubet's returning home triumphantly; and setting the first temperature all in another condition. Temperature in substantiality. Saturn married unto Luna; Mercury confederate with Jupiter; Mars embracing Venus; Sol with its fire and light. All in one individual will.

The most considerable point now to be considered and demonstrated. The glorious transmutation of the three first, and their impotent flying away, two things, as different as day and night; or right and left; or as the first and second crack. The latter explained by heaven and earth's fly- tion, salvation, and restoration, so clearly, that all will love one another; and that hard lesson, to love our enemies, will be readily learnt: and men will quickly contribute to the studying that one necessary thing, that treasure hid in the field, that gold of the kingdom of heaven, that precious pearl, that all in all, faith and love, Christ and God, when they shall perceive that all this lies in every soul in one measure or other, and may be found, and the way to it [v. GRAMMAR OF WISDOM, p. 8, 9.] set down so plain, that every true seeker may find it.

Thereby the writings of all men will be understood, and the very darkest mysteries contained in the writings of the prophets and apostles will be made plain and easy. And when that appears which is now hidden, when that excellent glory shall discover itself to men, they will not only see it, but walk in the way of it, and so attain it in the highest degree of every one's capacity."

From these extracts the candidate may perceive, that a knowledge of the Magia and Cabala is involved in a right fundamental apprehension of 'the mystery' opened in Behmen's writings. How essential this knowledge is to him who would trace out the primitive science, religion and philosophy of the ancients, amidst the corruptions and disfigurements of a hundred generations, may be seen from this consideration, that the original Cabala was nothing else than the "one language," mentioned by Moses, Genesis, xi. 1, implying necessarily in the learned, a scientific knowledge of the magic nature of things, and by consequence, an acquaintance with the philosophy of the eternal and temporal universe, and the creatures thereof; also an ability to express the sense or understanding of the mind, whether consisting of simple or complex ideas, by intrinsically exact signatures; either of single or compounded sounds, of letters, syllables, and words, or in writing, by hieroglyphic forms, whether of simple or combined designs: and which was the original of the oriental and Hebrew philosophy, languages and characters of writing. For, as we find from Genesis, ii. 20, such was, and indeed must have been the science and ability of Adam, the head and parent ing away before &c. in the Apocalypse.

Of transmutation and annihilation with respect to this third principle. Our common concept hereof exceeding low, and why. Illustrated only by day and night. Shadows, chimeras, etc. cannot be annihilated, and why. Nor changed into each other. What place is; and what to dwell in itself.

Of annihilation with respect to eternal nature. What is annihilation? None can be, and why? In Adam's fall was no annihilation, but only, etc.: so also in his restoration. Nay, in this, the three first cannot be so deeply annihilated or swallowed up, as etc. Even all our evil works shall follow us. Even much more the three eternal roots thereof. If man could fall again, whither should he fall? etc.

Of transmutation with respect to eternal nature. None can be, and why. Distinction and oneness must be together, the former looking forward, the latter backward. Each is to keep to its own peculiar office. They are not only three in the temperature, but also seven in the temperature, and in nature, and in the midst between temperature and nature. This is further explained by showing how nature is taken differently. Upon this difference, the different enumeration of the forms depends. Why no passage from darkness into light, but through the fire. Hence is evident the three forms on the left hand cannot be transmuted into the three on the right hand, so as etc. And what further follows, is for this demonstration also.

Here we find the two eternal principles. By an eternal opposition is meant quite another thing than etc. (1.) Not as day and night by turns. (2.) Not as black and white in one superficies. God knew not the fall of Lucifer. (3.) Not as good and evil. In eternity but one good thing. Friendship and harmony between darkness, fire, and light, declared by root, stock, and branches. Darkness, fire, and light, all three good, not good and evil with respect to themselves; nay to creatures also etc. Where the opposition of good and evil is. Behmen could not so much as have dreamed of an eternal opposition of good and evil. The question, How could he write hereof so positive, and with such an assurance? answered.

What this eternal opposition is, is declared by looking on the first step, made out of the eternal unity or oneness. There is really opposition, but all good, not good and evil. Will and desire, how one; and how two. And differences between them. All good. Eternal will, neither darkness nor light. Desire necessarily dark, but (N.B.) not without itself. 'I will, not desire. The difference exceeding subtle; but remember this is the first step. God and nature by Behmen not confounded. Will and desire as light and darkness. Who can pick up here such an opposition as of good and evil? To whom could darkness have been evil? What reason to call it evil? But here lies the knot etc. Adam's nakedness. The light not properly good from eternity. Darkness would never have done any hurt, if etc. After all this, what shall we say of God? etc. A state may be attained, wherein all this opposition is vanished away. Behmen, justly called PHILOSOPHUS CENTRALIS.

The consequences of this consideration. An objection that the three forms are thus transmuted only by halves, is answered. John, i. 5, the light shineth into darkness, but the darkness comprehendeth it not. Why can it not, or will it not? is answered. Why not, when it is a desire after light? is answered.

How darkness was; not was and yet was. So the glorious transmutation was done, not done, and yet done. Lucifer could not have been the cause of darkness being what it is now, if it had not been something in and to itself before. This is demonstrated (1.) because God hath not created it so; and Lucifer is but a destroyer. Beginning and end in a broken ring appears. (2.) Because, if darkness was by the light quite annihilated, Lucifer must have annulled this annihilation. And is thus set upon the great white throne. (3.) Because, if the three inferior forms were transmuted into the three superior forms, so as etc., Lucifer was stronger than this omnipotent transmuting tincture, and went directly forward etc..

Darkness had no beginning, and darkness had a beginning; both true. The higher, and more intellectual truth of that former, is demonstrated. (1.) Upon supposition that darkness was in Lucifer's fall created by God: by showing what nothing is; and that darkness must have been something to the abyssal eye, before it was something to itself. Eternal without beginning. (2.) Upon supposition that darkness was not created, but only manifested: by showing that then it must have been something hid before this manifestation. Eternally something without beginning.

of the human race, who gave names to all things, and what he called each, 'that was its name,' and perfectly expressed its nature, as indeed intuitively apprehensible to all man-kind of those days.

[The Jews pretend, though it must be supposed without understanding, that God imparted the secret of the Cabala to Moses on the mount, and he to his successors, but only orally; and thereupon have formed a fabulous ignorant scheme, as that the Cabala is a kind of conjurational knowledge, whereby, on the pronunciation of certain mystical names, angels can be made to appear, spirits raised, &c.: thus does unenlightened human reason at all times with the things of God. But he whose face shines, as afterwards did that of Moses, needs not any outward teaching of the mysteries of nature: and, indeed, it only wants a light face or mind (which is what we herein aim at giving) to trace out unquestionably, the descent of the pure truth and wisdom, in the monstrous corruptions of the present oriental philosophy, and subdivisions of the ancient languages.]

Now, although the magical and cabalistical science and powers did not exist in the same absolute perfection after the fall, in all the descendants of Adam, yet it existed in very great perfection in the antediluvian patriarchs, down to Noah and Shem. As also, but with still less, though yet great power of understanding, (along with which must be taken into account the great advances and discoveries that had been made, in the practical applications thereof, in natural arts and sciences, during the first fifteen hundred years of the world,) in the pious post deluvians and Magi, down to the period when that branch of the descendants of Noah, located in Shinar, set about building the tower of Babel,—much greater indeed, than it has ever done since, though it exists even at the present day in a greater or less degree in all languages. Which degeneracy and ignorance by the way it may be observed, is solely owing to the corruption and darkness of the mind, by reason of its sinfulness. For the Virgin of the Divine Wisdom, who was given to the soul of man to be his bride, his light and perfection, and originally dwelt within his mind, enabling him to

A strong objection, that darkness is but a privation of the light, answered. Chiefly by considering this privation in ourselves, or in our fallen and regenerate condition. A foundation axiom is, God dwelt in the light from eternity.

Epitome of all what was declared hitherto. No way, neither on the right hand nor on the left, but what will lead us to this truth, that darkness had no beginning. For whether we say, (1.) darkness had a beginning, or (2.) light had no beginning, or (3.) light had a beginning; all turns to the selfsame end. The sense of this expression is limited, by saying an eternal beginning, or a beginning without beginning. These two positions, darkness had no beginning, and darkness had a beginning, compared: both owned, as without contradiction; but the former much preferred, as much deeper, more solid, really central, and therefore not obvious unto everyone.

The conclusion. A symbolical figure or plate, showing temperature—nature—and temperature. (III.)—A DISCOURSE IN ANSWER TO AN OBJECTION, CONCERNING THE DESIRE'S ATTRACTING ITSELF.

Pregnant reasons for this discourse. Light will not be laid hold on by force in deep speculation. The position, and the consequences said to follow from the same. The next immediate consequence, flowing forth freely. The will is not a desire, and the desire not a will. Differences betwixt them. Desire hath nothing to attract without it. What the meaning is of attracts itself. Here no distinction yet, between attracting and attracted.

A proper simile, from our mind and senses, runneth from hence through all the discourse. The next immediate consequence. Difference betwixt mind and senses; and so God, and nature. There is a self in the latter.

Desire attracting itself, a good significant expression. Explained from our simile, and applied to eternal nature. This itself is the only thing reason is deluded by. By sharp inquisition after what is attracted, nothing can be found, neither within nor without. Objection.—Such a state is attracted, as the desire will raise itself into. Answer.—This is true on the left hand, but false on the right, etc. And all what followeth further is in answer to this objection:

That (1.) a state of rest is not attracted by the desire, is demonstrated from the nature of attraction, which is an approaching unto union; when contrariwise, etc. That (2.) this state of rest in our senses and the light in eternal nature are not that which the desire is filled and impregnated with. (3.) What it properly is wherewith the desire filled itself, and which is attracted by it. Full of light, to be understood according to the left hand. Light of the moon, and of astral reason, near related to, etc. Self or selfishness. Covetousness, as the second element of hell, almost the same; devouring heaven and paradise, and yet, nothing but itself. Conclusion.

(IV.)—AN EXPLANATION OF THAT SCHEME OR FIGURE OF TEUTONICUS, (being the First of the THREE TABLES, v. page 27.) WHEREIN GOD IS CONSIDERED IN THE UNITY AND TRINITY, WITHOUT ALL NATURE AND CREATURE. Which Discourse shortly after its commencement was interrupted in order to an EXPLANATION, which is here given, of THE TABLE OF THE DIVINE REVELATION (v. p. 32.) appended to the Book of THE ELECTION OF GRACE.

God Δ unintelligible; undeclarable; and why? Poiret's Eruditio Superficiaria et Solida. Thou canst not see my face. From his (even affirmative) expressions we are to learn rather, what God is not, than what he is. Nothing an affirmative expression; and Behmen's affirmative expressions lead us only to a negative apprehension: e.g. meekness and softness. Paraphrase upon THEOS. Q. i. 1, 2. Introductory observations. The Scheme. Every letter, word and syllable of which is set down significantly and exactly, in its proper place and relation, and must be so regarded, or the greatest confusion will be caused. . . . [Here the discourse interrupted, and the other Table desired to be explained.]

Behmen's scheme of God Δ . Manifestation, a progress from internal or central, to circumferential. Abyssal nothing and all, most abstruse; and yet a key. Abyss and byss explained from a resemblance we bear thereof within ourselves. And references, for abyss and byss. Nothing, i.e. none of all particular some-things. All rectifies nothing. Nothing here with respect chiefly to its own something. Hath a will and is a will, (God here not distinct from his habitation,) both well expressed. Hitherto the Unity.

The Father. Behmen vindicated in saying, the Father an obscure valley without the Son.

govern, to see and rule over all things as the crown-prince of God, (and who indeed is still there, though in her own principle, ever waiting and desirous to resume her lost position,) can no longer illuminate and glorify it with her intellectual lustre, no more than the rays of the noonday sun can penetrate and glorify the parts of a muddy and stagnant pool of water. Hence it is, that man must be regenerated, sanctified and purified, (even beyond the e degree of the scale of Wisdom, page 43.) before he can regain his true place and dignity in God's creation.

We say then to the candidate, how essential the true knowledge of the Magia and Cabala is, in order to a clue to the ground and harmonisation with truth of the philosophy and divinity of the Eastern nations, may be seen from this fact, that the primitive descendants of Noah, the earlier branches of the Chaldean and Egyptian nations, (the progenitors of the Asiatic and Hebrew races, and fountains of their wisdom and philosophy, arts, sciences, and religion,) were acquainted with the magic and cabalistic arts, and wrote their science accordingly, as to be found yet existing however corrupted, and indeed constituting the present recondite oriental and Hebrew philosophy. And therefore the acquisition of this knowledge must be obtained before endeavouring to unravel their mysteries of philosophy and theology, and to demonstrate to them their respective positions on the tree of human nature, and relation to the other branches thereof. With respect to which knowledge, we would just repeat the intimation before quoted—that he that knoweth aright 'the mystery' knoweth not only the Magia and Cabala, but all the branches of the tree of wisdom. Therefore let the candidate apply himself to this science, the gate of which, we again incidentally remark, is true regeneration, as signified in the gradations of the GRAMMAR OF WISDOM, p. 8, 9, (and the most favourable spot for the cultivation of it, a Theosophic College.)

We do not, it will be observed, enter into a consideration of the Jewish cabala, that is into an elucidation of the mysteries of God and nature comprised in the signatures of Hebrew letters, Delight. Reason thereof in impression of the will. Which is explained largely; from infinite latitude, without etc.; not such a one as the bottomless pit, etc. Cannot love itself. Abyss and Byss, Father and Son one, in the highest sense. Who seeth me, seeth the Father. The Father greater than I. What the Father were, if he were without the Son. Motion. Spirit how distinct from Father and Son, and yet also one. Sci-ence. [Science and Sciencz are better spoken of than here, in the "Seventh Conference about Predestination," at the end of the 'Fifth Property.']. JE-HO-VA; and references to Behmen.

God in Trinity. How the three distinct names, viz. Father, Son, Spirit, are to be taken here. They are rectified by this repeated expression. Word in God, and Wisdom; why to be taken together. Wisdom here, not properly in, but under God; and nearest to nature and creature.

(V.)—OF THE FURTHERMORE EXTERIOR MANIFESTATION OF GOD, THROUGH THE CREATION OF ANGELS. Wherein is treated of material causes.

The first motion of God to the creation of angels, shall not be inquired after. Demonstration that the Angels are out of God. They are children of God; who is fire and light having darkness under his feet, which was first manifested in their fall, when they did like Ham; which is proved by Paul, If we are the offspring of God, the Godhead is not like etc. If Angels out of nothing their fall must have been a relapse into nothing, not a downfall into darkness. Reason thinks to honour God more etc., but he is not more honoured by an image of gold, than by one of clay. Speculation the mother of all our inventions. Consider what this nothing is, and the impossibility will shew forth itself. God cannot send forth his word beyond the infinite sphere of his all-filling existence.

If angels not out of God, what is the meaning of their bearing his name written upon them? What is that spark of divine being, in all the mystics? What is that breath of life, breathed into man? If the life, which was the light of man, was in God, and was God, before man was made, how came it into man, but out of God? and what is the seed of God, remaining etc. From whence are the wonderful magic powers of angels, and stupendous effects of faith in men? Our regeneration gives an all sufficient testimony. We must be born again, from above. If not so, what can the mysterious communion signify, typified by the first Adam and his wife? What are the names, Christ's; God's; Saviour's? What is be like unto him; sitting upon his throne; become one spirit with him; ascend with him into heaven? What is the distinction betwixt a son and servant? Go to my brethren. I ascend to my father and your father. The devil's cunning craft. The foundation of christianity dangerously undermined, and deprived of etc., if this truth be denied: acknowledged by many that shall come from the east and from the west etc.

The consequences examined, by similies:—1. If out of God, they are God, is shown to be false. The true consequences are, (1.) They are distinct and different persons. (2.) They bear his name. Females rel. to regeneration. (3.) They are alike him, men and whole persons. (4.) They are under his direction and government. All this follows exactly as to God and his children, and the reason why. But (5.) for an addition is granted freely, If out of God, they are Gods. Reasons, both from before, and from after eternal nature, why this consequence, they are God is false; and this, they are Gods; and if Gods out of God, they are not God, is true.

II. If out of God they must be part of God. This is shown in our simile (1.) to be false, as to soul and spirit, but (2.) it is granted to come a little nearer as to body. Wherefore we should look into the magical generation. But to give greater satisfaction we will keep to our simile. Wherein is shown again, the consequence is false in the common grossest sense; and the Scripture partaking of the divine nature is the only true immediate consequence, as in this world, so in that superior world also.

If this partaking of the divine nature such a stumbling-block also, who laid it in our way? Our saying out of nothing is a far greater, and a real one. Strange consequences of this out of nothing are touched. The in him (which might more easily) does not confound God and creature, and there is no offence taken. Why then at the out of him? They are equally gross in their utmost sense looking towards materiality. Both the in him, and the out of him are infinitely surpassed by our being one, as he is one with the Father. Here the proper argument for reason's saying, We are confounded with God. But that we are not is plainly proved. What hurt (if; if; if) would be done, to say, we are part of God. So hath Behmen said of Lucifer; regarding notenticing words which human wisdom teacheth. So our Lord Jesus also, I am the true vine etc.; not solicitous what his words, and other conventional forms and combinations, no more than we attempt to explain the mysteries couched in the corresponding symbols, hieroglyphics, and other characters of the Persian, Hindoo, Chinese and Egyptian philosophy; such particular erudition being ascertainable by a study of the respective books which treat upon such subjects. But what is herein aimed at, is to indicate that system of fundamental truth which was the ground and subject of those national and distinguished modes of representation, whereby they may be severally reconciled with each other, and with Christianity—assuming indeed, which is incontestible, that the original inventors thereof, the primitive philosophers, and their successors, were men of at least equal ingenuity, strength of understanding, and integrity of mind with ourselves, and that truth and nature were the objects of their contemplations, and not merely lying inventions, of the spirit of error. And this we consider to be effected, by displaying in an orderly and demonstrative manner, the scope and sense of Behmen; in the centre of whose mind, as we have already sufficiently expressed our conviction, was afresh originally opened, the birth, or rather the inward and outward manifestation of truth, of the divine wisdom and of nature, and that in regard to the evangelical purposes of God, as also in accordance with the epoch of time. For, as the holy trinity of Father, Son, and Spirit, (who is truth itself, and whose word is truth) have each had their manifestation in the great acting mystery of redemption, of man and of the creation, so there remained only the manifestation of wisdom, the personal or virginal embodiment of the triune spirit of truth and love, to complete the revelation of the Divine nature to man: which is the manifestation we declare to have been opened in Behmen, not to terminate in himself, but with regard to all christendom and to the world, to be henceforth carried forward in its proper developments and discoveries, until the end find the beginning, and they be manifestly one. For, as in the order of consideration, the Divine wisdom flows from, or is the perfection and crown of the triune life in God, so must it do and disciples could have inferred. The branch wants no demonstration how near it be related to the vine. Our out of God so established that the gates of hell shall never prevail against it; how then the philosophy of this world, by its material cause? Transition to the III. alleged consequence, viz., material cause; and why the anatomising thereof is undertaken.

What is meant by materiality. Material and visible, spiritual and invisible, not the same; showed from, if our earthly house etc. Materiality and material cause in this temporal world, what. Great difference between matter and spirit in general; and a far greater between our gross matter and the pure matter of the eternal world. Yet, we say, (1.) of material things, (2.) of spiritual, and (3.) of material and spiritual, the same out of; who then sees not the great difference in sense? What is implied in the out of, when said in the grossest sense. What shadow of answerableness hereunto, when the same out of is said of spiritual things out of spiritual, or, of material things out of spiritual properties. (N.B.) A discourse with the six forms of nature, concerning the material cause of their material eternal house. Oneness united with distinction. Descent from spirit to materiality. What combineth the two extremities. The six, no material cause, nor answering to a material cause of the seventh. Whether the nothing be a material cause of things, or no.

Material cause considered again. Carved image out of wood. A plant out of the earth; smell, colours. Spark of fire out of a steel and flint. Flame out of wood etc. Innumerable great flames out of a little one. Heat, light, air, out of the fire. Four elements out of each other. All four out of one ground. Elementary spirit and body out of the four elements.

The seven metals out of no material cause. That spiritual properties are sufficient for the bringing forth materiality out of themselves without a material cause, is demonstrated, from the philosophical work, where is shewn that the first cursed matter is not the material cause of the blessed stone. This is indeed out of that, and so that out of this, but this out of makes no material cause; the consequences follow not. Further is this demonstrated from Scripture, Thou fool... God giveth it a body. And further again from our regeneration, where is largely shown, that our earthly body cannot be called a material cause of our glorious body; but rather this must be called a material cause of that; if the doctrine of material causes a rule for every thing; and reasons why so. Out of and out of different. That the dark spirituality is much nearer than the light's materiality, to what we understand by material cause. Proved from the gulph between three and three: and from St. John's out of the will of man, and out of God.

The former position (commencement of last §) is (after some hints at the rainbow, tempest, hail, thunderbolts, etc.) further demonstrated from the prodigious quantity of waters in the deluge; out of the fountains of the great deep, and the windows of heaven. Storehouses of wrath. Treasures sealed up. So, storehouse of mercy. Hitherto as in opposition to what is brought forth out of material causes by nature. Now, as in opposition to what is out of material causes by art, it was intended to have considered, man. The effects of divine and of dark magia. That nothing impossible to him that believeth. Joshua. Elias. Jesus and Apostles. Dark magic glasses. Man's speech. The omnipotent fiat. Natural propagation. Regeneration only with respect to Paul's saying, Ye have not many fathers... I have begotten you: and, faith out of hearing. After all, that man was the image and likeness of God. Signatura omnium rerum. All this would have shown the sufficiency of spiritual properties for producing; altering; and swallowing up. But etc.

These two, out of themselves and without a material cause, must be joined together. Reasons why. The former implies not out of nothing, because they act forward. The latter implieth, (1.) they have not and want not a material cause; proved from their acting forward. Material causes not in infinitum. Gulph. Orderly coherence without interruption in the Divine manifestation. Secondly and chiefly, they answer not to a material cause; proved from their needful unalterableness. By saying this or that we break etc., but by joining the former two we keep up union and distinction. If ye say out of nothing, what prerogative leave ye to God? He is Alpha and Omega. So, he is not confounded with creatures, but rather etc. The out of nothing not utterly rejected. If eternal nature out of him (as is plain from the desire), all what out of eternal nature out of him also. The will of God the only cause of all things; true, but taken in the wrong. Band of union; the eternal character. ☉. This is the ground why we cannot say, out of nothing. And why no possibility for reducing anything into nothing. Objection.—Such a band empties the fullness of, and lays a constraint upon God. Answered, by rectifying this, and utterly denying that. This discussion of material causes closed.

[The remainder of this dissertation, as confirmatory of the intimations of this treatise, touching some of the evangelical wonders shortly at hand, and which may be expected to ensue from the establishment of Theosophic Colleges, (in regard to pure sanctity, theosophic or intellectual light, and the re-investiture of the soul with the omnipotent powers of faith,) we give in its entirety, so far as that particular subject is concerned.]

"This being out of God was now the chiefest thing that, with a particular respect to holy angels, must have been declared and demonstrated. Besides which, seeing now nothing more in Behmen that could have had either difficulty or obscurity in it, if this, and especially if the generation of the seven forms of eternal nature be apprehended, I would not have enlarged further, but intended only to set down his principal places, treating of their creation, glorious condition, order, and distinction, with respect both to the number three and seven etc. But since I am desired further to give a short abstract of those several particulars, which he states concerning them here and there in his writings, I shall do it accordingly; though it can hardly be so done, as that all his places could be recited touching every particular thing, because they are so dispersed, and the greatest part of them would require to be repeated several times, which I think would cause both confusion and tediousness: wherefore I shall put them all together in the conclusion.

First, then, as to their creation, he saith, They were created out of God; out of his powers and wisdom, out of his eternal essences, out of fire and light, out of eternal nature, out of the

be in all the sons of God: who, and indeed all that are capable of rational enquiry, whom this new dispensation may reach, have now the strongest and highest inducements not only to implicitly embrace the Gospel, in a strict obedience and perfect conformity to the precepts, spirit and example of Christ, but (by the aid of this revelation of all the powers that work in nature and grace) to seventh form of eternal nature, out of all the powers and virtues of God, etc. All which different expressions may easily be found to agree with each other, without any contradiction, if the seven-fold generation of eternal nature be more or less understood.

He saith, that God, by moving himself, (the ground of which moving on the side of God, as hath been mentioned already several times, is that only thing which we know not, and which shall not be inquired after by the creature,) hath figured an image of himself, like as a little God. Or that the word of God, verbum Domini laid hold on the fountain spirits, apprehending them by the flat in his will, and compacting them, or as it were driving them together, like as from a displaying into narrowness. By which compacting and driving together, (so again done afterwards, more outwardly and grossly, as to the materiality of this third principle,) their creation was effected, where of especially may be considered what he saith, AURORA, xvi. 13—21, and I. INCARNATION, ii. 1—25.

But if there should be objected, and said, What Behmen saith in these two places is unintelligible—why could he not have declared it plainer, to remove offences and obstacles, and to make an end of controversies—it must be an absolute impossibility to understand this creation distinctly, and so he may be suspected of having not understood himself etc.? It may be answered with confidence and verity, That these two places, and so also all his others, are much more intelligible than all the chymical writers are, in their enigmatical descriptions of the process of their philosophical work: who indeed are altogether unintelligible to everyone that is not himself a true philosopher and possessor of the art, and hath not the spirit of understanding in himself, for unto such they are intelligible enough. But why should others complain of their darkness and unintelligibility; or how can they say, that there is an absolute impossibility to understand and to declare this philosophical process plainly? seeing that the only reason of their being so abstruse and retired in their words, is that exceeding great danger, which manifestly lieth in a plain publication of this secret work, not only with respect to the world, but also to themselves; whereof they are wont to say, that they should lose even their eternal salvation, if they should go beyond their limits, in making known unto the world that, which God will have kept secret from its eyes.

If now this can sufficiently excuse their enigmatical way of writing thereof, why shall it not also much more excuse the abstruse expressions of Behmen, used in this matter especially; and not only because no other utterance was given unto him, but also willingly and purposely, as to several circumstances thereof? seeing that this is indeed of a far greater importance, and of much more dangerous consequences to the children of men, than ever that can be.

If Lucifer had not known (these are his plain words) the manner and method of the creation, and the whole working process of the magical powers, he might have been a holy angel unto this very day. And so he saith also further, that God placed another exterior king into the room of Lucifer, in this third principle, whom he could name indeed, but would forbear it, because of the dark magia; and though he named him afterwards in another place intelligibly enough, because this is not of such great importance, yet he was so cautious in his expressions, that he said no more but what he was permitted to say: of which kind there could also be produced several further instances from his writings, if necessity did require it. But, to return to our present matter; the whole tenth and eleventh chapters of his MYSTERIUM MAGNUM are worthy to be taken into a serious consideration, and may be found to be a great deal plainer as to this or that particular, than are the two former alleged places.

There he saith expressly, that this great danger was always and is yet still the only reason, why this magical generation was kept so very secret from the beginning of the world, until this present day; when we nevertheless cannot say, that it was altogether unknown and unintelligible, in a whole universality to all the children of Adam, which would not be true. Like as he also saith it not, but granteth plainly, that for instance, Moses had, indeed, a true knowledge and understanding thereof, though not always according to his own pleasure, nor in his own reason and capacity, yet he had, and must have had it in that instant time, when those magical powers were opened in him, and when the spirit of his will and imagination was concurring with them, in an actual performance of those works, he was called and commanded to effect by them.

To say therefore, It is absolutely unintelligible, is to deny that man's internal deep is a dwelling place of those magical powers, and his will and imagination to be a living agent, capable of being instructed by the Spirit of eternity, the only supreme director of the divine magia how to act and do: which yet cannot be denied. If man really acts with them, and performeth this or that stupendous work by them, he certainly knoweth the way, manner and method, by which his work is done, and can also declare it unto others, if he be permitted. Or else, would it not be the same absurdity, as if we should grant on the one hand, that a skilful watchmaker can make and hath actually made a curious artificial watch; but would pretend on the other, that it is beyond his understanding, and quite unintelligible to him, and that he therefore cannot tell or declare unto anybody, how he made it? As to BEHMEN, it is with me, and I am sure with many others also, beyond all doubt and question, that he verily had a true and deep understanding, not in his reason, but in his eternal spirit, of the manner and process of the whole creation; nay that he really and fundamentally understood even the way and method of the necromancy itself, not in practice as the devil's agents do, but in the ground and depth thereof, wherein they are blind and ignorant. But none can pretend that he should have declared these magical powers so, as that the children of men could play with them according to their good pleasure. [Which they would assuredly do, as their present vain researches in alchemy, without first of all becoming truly converted to God, evangelically regenerate and pure in heart, do testify.] He hath done faithfully what he was commanded to do; that is, he hath declared them plainly and intelligibly enough, as to that which can serve us in the process of regeneration. There can be no difficulty to him, that desireth earnestly to follow that direction, given forth through him by the Spirit of God. Let us therefore first pass through this process, [to be set forth in the GRAMMAR and EXERCISES OF WISDOM, with all simplicity, order, and amplitude,] and arrive at that gate which he pursue the cultivation of the incorruptible seed of the word, (in the death of the old nature, and the resuscitation of the new,) with such regularity and conscious certainty of progressive advancement, even unto the attainment of the perfect manhood power and light, of its parent and head. For as all life tends to maturity and perfection, under proper advantages and culture, so must it be with went through, and then, when this is opened in ourselves, we shall see what we see not now, and what he saw not also himself, before that time. But (N.B.) if we think we must understand these things beforehand, and want not such living, self-experimental process thereto in ourselves, we presume to look into the eternal world with a temporal eye, or to pierce with our firmamental eye through a thickstone wall. ["A man must be in paradise, before he can do paradisaical work," (and so as to the philosophical process.) writes Mr. Law.] And if we would conclude, that he could not have seen and understood these secret things in the eternal world, because he could or would not declare them so plainly and intelligibly, as that we could understand them as well as he is said to have understood them himself, we make the same consequence as if we should say, that nobody ever understood the process of the philosophical work, because none would declare it so, that everyone could make gold according to his pleasure.

This as to Behmen himself. But as to others, that were more or less at all times, both under the Father's dispensation in the Old, and the Son's in the New Testament, called unto and exercised in the divine magia, it cannot be denied nor questioned at all that, if they were the children of God, and did the works of their Father, (as the Lord Jesus said unto his disciples, that they were to do even greater works than he had done himself upon earth,) they certainly knew their work, and the way, manner and method also how it was done, like as he knew it; for they were not dumb, blind or dead instruments in his hand, but living and understanding agents with him, though inferior to him. And if these children of God are, at such a time, in a peculiar manner in their Father's workhouse, and in his all-filling presence, they see and know also certainly the works of their Father, and the way and method how they are done by him; for though his works be infinitely superior to theirs, yet the manner of performance is quite the same, differing only by a degree of excellency, as an universal differs from particularity. And though their knowledge, in a mutual comparison of themselves, may be different also, so that it can be not only greater in one and less in another, according to their several different abilities, calling and capacity, but also that it may be in the same person greater at one time and less at another, according to their various practice and experience, and to that degree wherein the Spirit of God is pleased to open their understanding, to enable their faculties, and to set them either at this or at that work; yet of none, and so also not of the very least of them can it be said, that this manner and methodical process of the magical powers is unintelligible. But it is verily and really easier to them in such a state and time, to see and to understand, with their own seeing eyes, and internal intellect, (I say not reason and human wisdom, but intellect, which is as far above reason as eternity is above time,) the way and manner how God their Father made all things out of himself, by his omnipotent will and verbum Fiat, than an external earthly man can see, know and understand, how a painter hath painted such or such an image with his hand and pencil. If this only be excepted, which hath been already several times expressly excepted, and again but recently, which doth also not appertain to the actual work, or process of the magical powers itself, with respect to the creature a posteriori.

And this I may say confidently, knowing that I say the truth, and knowing it, not only because Behmen saith the same by other expressions, (whose authority is justly much esteemed and valued by me), but because also I know another testimony thereof, which is of far greater authority than one thousand outward witnesses can be. Wherefore, I am also well assured with Behmen [N.B.] that this knowledge and understanding shall be raised up out of the dust and darkness, in the due time of God, and shall not be further so hidden, unknown and unintelligible to the children of man, as it hath been to the generality thereof, from the beginning of the world. [Query, by the instrumentality of Theosophic Colleges, in the orthodox fathoming and fixing the progressive science of enlightened Gospel Christianity?] And certainly this same manifestation through Behmen, (though still unintelligible to the greater part of mankind, nay to the outward reason and human wisdom of every one without distinction, as it also will be to the end of the world, yet intelligible enough to some or other internal eye and intellect, [e.g. Law], nay much plainer than it was declared before him at any time,) is a sure prelude, or forerunner, bringing the glad tidings of a clear approaching day.

But as to this our present age, blessed be God omnipotent, those magical powers as to their working process, are still unknown unto men; but when another generation shall be upon earth, they that then live shall again bless and praise him, that he hath unlocked his secret treasures, and hath poured out the Spirit of understanding upon them that know him, and are deeply rooted in true love and profound humility! [To which, among other noble ends, may this treatise have the blessed honour of immediately conducing; as it is calculated to do, by its orthodox evangelical character, embracing a notice of all the branches of divine science and wisdom, presenting them in their right mutual relations, and pointing the whole, not to a rest in themselves, but to their true end, absolute Christ-like devotedness to God, in order to true regeneration, and so the progressive realization of all the accomplishments and prerogatives of the new creature; being founded not upon mere notion or imagination concerning Scripture doctrines, but upon an enlightened philosophical apprehension of the whole mystery of godliness, and the highest, deepest, purest, latest experimental discoveries of Gospel truth, as likewise of the direct practical process of arriving at such maturity and fruition of the re-integrated divine life in the human nature. The writer thus confidently expresses himself, as he cannot but consider the present work to have been begun and carried on solely under the guidance of the providence of God, who alone has been his teacher, directing his understanding day by day as the sheets were required by the printer, and enabling him to obtain possession of the necessary books, however rare and curious (though in some cases but two or three copies of them in existence), just as he required them: indeed, he had never even been told of the existence of the revealed philosophy of recondite truth, nor had his mind directed to the subjects embraced by it; but he has traced all out, with the books and ancient MSS. expressly treating thereupon, merely from a natural instinct of spirit, as it were a germ in his understanding, vegetating and gradually outflowing of itself, and finding its own suit-the principle of the Divine life. Such assistances then, being all amply provided, what remains but to duly realize the grand promises and assurances of Christ, relating to the blessings and prerogatives of the perfectly restored image of God? As to the results of such experimental researches into the science of Christianity, of the Divine wisdom and powers of nature, by diversified com-able nourishment, from first to last. But to proceed.] In the mean time I do not for my part, desire to know or understand anything more thereof, according to my own will and pleasure, but I can be satisfied with that little which he was pleased in his mercy to let me see and know, for I can acquiesce therein without offence, doubt or scruple; and so expect the coming of his appointed time. What offence could I take, if I am convinced on one hand, that angels and men are verily gods out of God, and that they are his children, generated out of his eternal essences, bearing his name, partaking of his nature, and being designed to be one with him eternally; and on the other, that they are not confounded with him, or he with them, any more, than Moses and Aaron were confounded with that serpent they made out of their rod, etc.; both which I think is made out hitherto sufficiently. But for the rest, I may also have great reason to be very circumspect as to all my own expressions, and especially about this dangerous matter, therefore I shall now lay it aside, and return to what is said further by Behmen of the holy angels.

He saith then further, that they were created after the image and likeness of God, no less than man, though with this difference, that man was also ordained into this third principle, created after the fall of angels, which they therefore have not." [To return now to the summary of the Contents.] They were the first creatures. They had a beginning, though not their essences. To what end created. Their personal being their own propriety.

SECONDLY. As to their order and distinction. A resemblance of the Holy Trinity. Three kingdoms. Seven princely courts, etc., etc. THIRDLY. As to other circumstances of their blessed, glorious condition. The same figure and members as man in his creation. Spirit, soul, body, five senses. Breathing love and humility. All one harmonious instrument, etc., etc. FOURTHLY. As with relation to man. Ministering spirits. Lovers of children. Guardians to cities, nations and kingdoms. References for all these particulars, with a foregoing kind of apology for the imperfection of his AURORA.

(VI.)—OF THE FALL OF LUCIFER, AND ALL HIS ANGELS.

Lucifer's fall. Reasons, why so shortly here discoursed of. References, for the ground, why he excelled in glory all the rest of holy angels. References, as to his kingdom being the room of this now third principle. His fall, and the cause thereof, in a great variety of Behmen's expressions; and references for the same. Why still called a prince of this world; and references for it. His fall, the occasion of the creation of this temporal universe; and references to places in Behmen for this position also.

(VII.)—OF THE CREATION OF THIS OUTWARD THIRD PRINCIPLE, WHEREIN WE LIVE AND MOVE AND HAVE OUR OUTWARD BEING.

What the creation is; and why made. Beginning of time implies an end. The vulgar opinion (though in a sense not hurtful) exploded. And a twofold objection, that Behmen makes Lucifer either a creator of earth and stones, or a binder of the sovereign will of God; answered. As to the first, the whole matter is largely represented. As to the second, it is shown that it stands upon a false hypothesis, and the whole matter is further circumstantially declared. According to the description given by Moses, Gen. i. 1, In the beginning, etc. [On account of its importance, we give the entire of the above section, up to the dissertation on Gen. i. 1, thus:—]

"From what was said before it might now be plain already, but is here to be made plainer, that the fall of Lucifer was the only (causa sine qua non) cause, or rather the only occasion of the creation of this our third principle, which is nothing else but a temporary, coagulated out-breathing or exhalation, and so a visible representation and manifestation of the two interior, eternal and invisible principles, brought forth into war and opposition to each other by Lucifer, but settled again in this world, by the infinite wisdom and power of God in such a combination, order, proportion, and harmony, that (notwithstanding all their contrarieties, wherein they both act their parts upon this one only visible stage,) they must both be subservient to the keeping out and under their former prince, and to the greater manifestation of the glory of the omnipotent Creator. And so, this creation is not a bringing forth of any such new or strange thing as had not been before in any wise or manner; but is only an alteration of that state which was before the fall, in the particular kingdom or region of Lucifer. Which alteration was made by God for the better, after that Lucifer had brought forth an alteration upon it, for the worse. For he had utterly spoiled, darkened and wasted it, and made out of a pleasant angelical garden, a dark den of lions, dragons, and tigers, a habitation of devils, and a hold of every foul, unclean, and hateful spirit. Which it would still be, if God (the Father especially, unto whom this first moving in the creation is properly and fundamentally attributed) had not moved himself, and had not made another opposite alteration of the whole state of this kingdom; and this chiefly by the light and water in this third principle, which he produced again, but of an inferior and exterior kind and degree to what it had been before it was spoiled by Lucifer. For thereby on one side, the prince of darkness was utterly cast out from all his former possessions; and thereby also on the other, the pure transparent materiality, or the seventh form of eternal nature (as to this particular region darkened, obscured, and grossly compacted by him,) was taken away from under his tyrannical dominion, and instated in such (as it were) a middle state or tolerable condition, as from which (though it must now during the time of this mixture of good and evil be subject unto vanity) it can and shall be purified and refined by fire again; and so be restored into its primeval glorious transparency. Wherefore it is that this first creation, brought to pass by a foregoing spoiling, carrieth along with it of all necessity, a second or new creation, or restoration into the primeval state; and this beginning of time implieth absolutely an end of time also: and this even so naturally and inseparably that Teutonicus had no scruple to say, that if we knew exactly the hour and minute of that sixth day wherein the creation was accomplished, we could also know the year and day of that fiery trial whereby it shall be delivered again from the bondage of corruption; for the beginning and the end are thoroughly alike to each other, and this latter is most naturally, or according to the immutable laws of eternal nature, contained in the former. But the eternal Father hath reserved in his plexions and characters of highly regenerate sons of God, we may rest assured they will, as the discoveries of physical science, surpass any imagination that could be previously formed of them. In the meantime let us rejoice to know, that the way is now clear and open for man to regain that high station and dignity conferred upon him at his creation, Gen. ii., 15., as the illustrious opener own power the knowledge both of this and that; and it is not at all for us to know his secret times and seasons.

Here then to have a due conception of what the creation is in general, before we come to consider it particularly, that vulgar opinion which is generally had thereof, is in the first place to be removed. For though it may be pleaded, that it is not only consistent with the outward letter of the Scripture, but it may be granted also that it can be consistent with piety and integrity of heart, so as to do no hurt unto them that hold it in simplicity of mind, because not able to look into the deeper ground; yet, nevertheless, it is inconsistent with the recondite wisdom of God, which is behind the veil of Moses, and may do such hurt unto an enquiring mind, as to keep it out from the understanding of those secret mysteries that were implied indeed from the very beginning in the outward letter of the Scripture, but not unfolded to the generality of mankind, except only now in this latter age of the world; wherein they will manifest themselves, though not unto all sorts of people promiscuously, but unto them only that seek the wisdom there where it can be found, and that cannot be contented with a broken superficial knowledge, but desire instantly to look deeper into the eternal ground, to understand the whole connexion between eternity and time, and to apprehend how, and why the latter of an absolute necessity (viz. after the fall of Lucifer,) must have been brought forth out of that, and why it must also of the same necessity be swallowed up into that again.

This vulgar opinion then, considereth the creation of this world, as a work of the free, pre-terminate or fore appointed will and pleasure of God only and solely, without making any reflection upon the foregoing fall of Lucifer, as if it had no communion nor connexion therewith at all; and thinketh that by saying, God was pleased in his infinite wisdom to make this third principle, and all the creatures therein, so as they are now, or (if it is able to look a little further) so as they were before the fall of man, and the curse was pronounced upon them, it hath expressed the whole mystery so solidly and deeply as that nothing more can be added, but that we must fully acquiesce with this free will and pleasure of God, and ought not to enquire any further. Let now this superficial opinion stand in its place for the common people, to whom it may be sufficient and well enough, if they make but a good use and application thereof to a Christian-like behaviour; but as to Christian philosophers, it is certainly very short of being sufficient to reach the ground and bottom. For these (to mention only two or three general instances, and to pass over an innumerable multitude of particulars) will never say, That it was the free, fore-appointed will and good pleasure of God, the Father of Light, with whom is no darkness at all, nor any variableness nor shadow of turning, that there should have been darkness upon the face of the deep; nor that the earth, but for so much as one single moment, should have been without form and void: nor can they grant that it was his prefixed holy will and intertion, (arisen and established absolutely in his own counsel, before and without any reflection upon what was actually done by his rebellious creatures,) that there should be such dry, barren, howling wildernesses upon earth, full of tearing beasts and venomous worms, insects and serpents, and such rough, hard, and horrid rocks and stones, which never were nor can be of any use to man, whom yet all the creatures of this world were designed to be put in subjection unto. But that the cause of all such and the like things, and most especially of that never-ceasing strife and war, whereby both living and lifeless creatures upon earth do continually persecute, murder, and destroy one another, must certainly be found out somewhere else, and not be attributed to the absolute holy will and good pleasure of God the Almighty, who is the only goodness itself, and in nowise good and evil. This is the sentiment of Christian philosophers, who yet will not proclaim it publicly to the promiscuous multitude of (as well divines as laics) because they know that it cannot be understood nor accepted by any, unless it be such as are able to look into the ground of eternal nature, and to give a satisfactory answer to that objection which here doth presently arise.

For our dark natural reason, having no true idea of what the creation was, cannot but say, [Objection] If God had not himself alone created all visible and invisible things, without all exception, then there must have been some other creator besides him. And if he had not created them according to his own unlimited will and fore-appointed pleasure, so as they now are, then there must have been some creature that hindered his absolute sovereign will, and constrained him to make them so and so, when otherwise he could have made them better, and settled them in a state of perfect concordance, without any contrariety, hurtfulness, war, and opposition. This creature now could not be supposed to have been any other, but even Lucifer himself with his angels; which yet to say or think would be an abominable thing, etc. This same was not only objected unto Teutonicus by some that misunderstood his writings, and could not apprehend the generation of eternal nature, but it was also most perversely laid to his charge by others, that he held such a doctrine as that Lucifer had made the earth, rocks and stones, and the venomous and hurtful creatures, and was thus a creator of them, besides Him, of whom the Scripture saith, that he created heaven and earth and all that is therein:—whereby we are the more confirmed (said those ignorant opposers) that this shoemaker intended to teach us afresh that old damnable doctrine of Manes, babbling of two contrary Gods, a white or good, and a black or evil one. But truly this altogether is so far from his mind and sense, that it hath no communion therewith at all, as may plainly appear unto everyone that hath but a small understanding of the process in the mutual generation of the forms of eternal nature, and will but search a little into this matter. But I think it most proper and necessary that this objection should be examined and answered unto, before we descend to a particular consideration of this creation; and this for a defence of the truth, and innocence of our author. It hath two parts, both which are to be considered distinctly: for it saith (1.) that Teutonicus made Lucifer a maker or creator of earth and stones; and (2.) that he makes him a binder or controuler of the free sovereign will of God, whom he constrained to bring forth the creatures of this world in such or such a condition.

Concerning the first part, the whole matter is easily thus to be conceived. [Answer] Before of the works of God, in the light of Divine wisdom causing them all to show forth their hidden wonders, virtues, beauties and perfections, "to the praise of his glory."

We now continue the extracts, in reference to the first of which we repeat our advertisement, that 'not every particular is to be received as simple and orthodox truth, for the writer (an in-the revolt of Lucifer, as long as he was a holy angel of light, all the seven forms of eternal nature stood in the most perfect union and harmony, both in himself, and without him in his whole kingdom. The six properties therefore, generated the seventh most gently, softly, and sweetly, in a clear, pure, crystalline transparency, according to the nature of the light; which then had the predominance over all the rest, as they do still throughout all the other kingdoms and regions of all the holy angels, that kept their habitation in the light, and as they shall do again in the place of this now defiled and cursed third principle also, when they shall be re-harmonised, and the whole principle be purified by fire, and so be restored into its former glorious condition. When now Lucifer, in unanimous concurrence with all his angels, by his perverse will, desire, faith, or magia, stirred up the fourth form of fire, first and chiefly within himself, intending to raise it up above all the rest, and to exalt himself therein as an almighty, most sovereign monarch, the whole harmonious order of eternal nature in his created being, was presently broken. But this could not have been done as in and to his own particular creature only; but by this selfsame act and deed, his fiery spirit went also actually forth from him in his false magia, into all that was without and besides him, intending to conquer and to trample all under his feet, and so to be alone the supremest all in all. Thus now he poisoned, infected, and polluted all what he could enter into; all that gave him any admittance, or in anywise condescended to his will. He stung as a fiery serpent, not only into the other angelical thrones, and provoked them to do the same which he did, from whence came the war in heaven between Michael and the Dragon; but he went also out against God himself, his father and creator, intending to bring him under into subjection. The whole harmonious order therefore of eternal nature, wherein darkness and fire had stood from all eternity in subordination to the light, was thus immediately broken without his particular creature also, wherever he could get any admittance; not broken indeed as to God his creator, for this was really too strong for him, nor was it broken as to the rest of the holy obedient angels, for they resisted him and kept him out, but it was broken in his own whole region or kingdom, for there only he could prevail, seeing that this stood in subjection under him, and was by birth-right, his natural due possession, whereof he then was the only king and ruler. There, therefore, he found a free admittance and condescension to his will, with the four first forms of nature, which he could raise up, and so subdue the rest. Throughout all his dominion therefore, but nowhere else beyond it, though he designed it everywhere, the harmonious order of eternal nature was actually broken. For that which before stood in the midst between three and three, was now by his false magia dislocated and removed from its appointed place, and could no more keep under the darkness beneath, nor any more give forth a shining glorious light above. So, therefore, the three inferior forms on the left hand, swallowed up before from all eternity, by the three superior on the right, came to be raised up out of their hidden deep, and were set in opposition, and enabled to act according to their own will and inclination. Wherefore also, they exerted presently their own peculiar qualifications, most intrinsic and natural unto them when not kept under by the lightness of light and love. What now their peculiar qualifications were, was formerly mentioned sufficiently, and is now here plainly to be seen by those fruits or products they brought forth immediately. To generate the seventh form of materiality, is common unto all the six, and none of them can be excluded therefrom; whether they stand in union or in disharmony, they can never cease to generate the seventh. Materiality therefore, must still have been generated in all this disorder and confusion, no less than before, in their concordance. But what kind of materiality could now here have been generated, when these three inferior forms of darkness had got the predominion? All the former purity, sweetness, clearness, softness and meekness was abolished: the whole region had before been full of light and glory; but now that was extinguished, and there was darkness upon the face of the deep. Before, it was a dwelling-place of meekness, tranquility, and love; but now, it was turned into fierceness, tumult, wrath, envy, hatred and anger. The harshness having now the greatest hand in the generation of the seventh form, attracted, astringed, and compacted, without any resistance or restraint, in the extremest force and vehemence; and this still so much the more and stronger, as it was more stirred up and exasperated, on one side by its own stinging prickle, and on the other side, by its own turbulent whirling wheel. The seventh form therefore, which should have been generated sweetly and gently, pure, transparent, thin, subtle, fine and crystalline, by the predominant concurrence of the three superior forms of light, could not have been so generated any more within the sphere of this disharmonised region; but must now have been generated only according to the predominant property of the three inferior forms of darkness, that is, it must have been made dark, thick, gross, obscure, hard, rough, ponderous, earthy, stony, and rocky. And this not only in such or such a particular place of this region, as now is this earthly globe, but everywhere throughout this whole kingdom, though not everywhere equally alike, but here more and there less, according to the various conditions of several places different from each other; and according also to the different activities of those diabolical agents that stirred and exasperated the forms of nature either more or less, or after this or that peculiar manner. Like as we may observe an outward resemblance thereof in the ice, congealed out of a soft water, or other liquid, which is done everywhere in all the world, wherever this astringing power can prevail; and yet is not done everywhere equally alike, but more in one place and less in another, according to the different conditions of those liquors that are capable of being congealed, and according also to the various degrees of this congealing force.

This now is a short abridgement of what Teutonicus saith of this matter throughout all his writings, but more especially in his AURORA from the xliith to the xlvith chapter, where he declareth this fall and work of Lucifer most particularly with all its circumstances, and with respect to all the forms of nature from the first unto the seventh; worthy indeed of all consideration. But who can say here with any sense, that he giveth unto him the character of a maker or creator? Is he not manifestly represented in all his pages and lines as a breaker and destroyer? For he is not said to have himself generated the dark, gross, impure materiality; but the three first forms of dark-genious philosopher, but not favoured with the full lights of Behmen,) has grossly erred in many of his conceptions, but the study thereof with the other accompanying extracts and references, may afford to the candidate a further assistance in the pursuit of that intricate yet sure path which shall bring him to the desired goal.' The work from which it is taken, is entitled: "La Vérité," ness, in their predominance over the three of light, have generated it so, as soon as they had extinguished and swallowed up the light. But Lucifer is only said to have been the chief agent, who stirred them up thereto, by his strong stirring and exasperating the violence of the harshness and fiery strength; and this the Scripture saith itself implicitly, when it calleth him Apollyon, and more explicitly, a liar and murderer from the beginning. And though he were even expressly said to have generated the dark and gross impure materiality, in such a sense as now in this world a dark, false magician may be said to produce or generate this or that material thing, (which he doth not as by himself, or by his own sufficiency, but by the forms of nature, which he disorderly and maliciously abuseth, and which alone can properly be said to have produced it,) yet even then also, this production made by Lucifer from the beginning, could not at all be called, nor be considered as a making or creating work; but only as a perverting, breaking, defiling, and destroying of that which before was holy, clear, and pure. Teutonicus therefore, made him not a maker of earth and stones, but he made him a spoiler and waster of that blessed crystalline earth, which he used to call ternarius sanctus, and which had been full of the light and glory of God, as well in his kingdom when he was an angel of light, as in the other angelical regions: and he saith that he was the only cause of that first spoiled condition of the earth, thus described in the beginning of the first chapter of Genesis, The earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep. But if these opposers think this to be contrary to the truth, let them declare more solidly what the Scripture means by calling him a destroyer and murderer from the beginning, and let them show us what he destroyed and murdered, before the creation of this world. Did he not murder the light in his own creature, and in his whole region, and raise up instead thereof the darkness, whose prince he is unto this day? And did he not waste his own kingdom, his glorious inheritance, his holy, clear, paradisaical earth, the seventh form of eternal nature, his pleasant angelical garden, full of glory and delight, making it really dark and empty, void and without form, and destitute of all that beauty wherewith it had been adorned by his Father and Creator? So that Teutonicus might well say of him, If all trees were writers, all their branches pens, all the mountains books, and all waters ink, they would not be sufficient to describe that lamentable condition which Lucifer with his angels, brought upon his region. As little therefore, as he had created that former pure transparent earth, whereon he dwelt in the light before his fall, so little also did he create this outward earth. He caused indeed, the forms and powers of darkness to generate, in their predominance over the light, such a dark, dead, dry, rough, and gross materiality everywhere throughout his whole region; but it was God and he only, who created, that is, formed and settled together in one globe, this dispersed impure matter, and rectified it again, by restoring unto it light and water, in the same manner as it had before, (though not in the same internal degree of glory, beauty, and excellence, which was not to be done in this beginning of time, but to be reserved to the end thereof, as hereafter will appear) and replenished it with innumerable creatures of all sorts and kinds; altogether representing those that were also before upon that former paradisaical earth: which certainly Lucifer would destroy and make void and without form again, if his power were equal to his will, for he is a destroyer of all the creatures of God, and a setter up of his own dark lying figures, formed by his own will, in his false magia. So that it is a great ignorance and misapprehension, if not a great perversity to say, that Teutonicus made Lucifer a maker or creator of earth and stones.

But now further, as to that second part of this objection, whereby it is said that [Objection] if it was not the free fore-appointed will and full pleasure of God, that the creatures of this world should be so as they are, then Lucifer must have hindered and constrained him to make them so and so, when otherwise he could have made them better, and settled them in a state of perfect concordance without any contrariety, hurtfulness, venom, war and opposition, etc. [Answer] This is quite erroneous, and stands upon that false hypothesis, that the creation of this third principle hath no connexion with the fall of Lucifer, but is a free, fore-designed work of God, to be considered without any reflexion upon what was done by this revolting angel; which is justly called a false hypothesis, inasmuch, as this creation is a work of God a posteriori, made only to rectify and restore that which was spoiled and destroyed. For if Lucifer had not fallen, no creation of this third principle would have been brought forth, nor could any alteration have been made in this region; for it stood already in the highest degree of glory, light and dignity, and must have continued the glorious inheritance and possession of their great prince and hierarch for ever and ever. Whether God would have been pleased to create some other things, and so to have manifested his goodness and glory unto some other creatures, besides the holy angels, or whether he would not, we are not to determine; but only this we may freely say, that if Lucifer had not revolted, and by his revolt laid or "Les Mystères du Christianisme, approfondis radicalement, et reconnus physiquement vrais, 1771." And the author (a member of the Romish church) thus prefaces the work on the title page:—

"Le nom de LA VÉRITÉ déclarera sur chaque feuillet de celivre, qu'elle seule en a dicté le contenu à celui qui le met au jour: il devoit ce tribut à sa gloire. L'ordre, que demandoit cet ouvrage, ■ nécessité sa division en DEUX PARTIES: chaque partie forme un Volume.

La Première développe L'HISTOIRE GÉNÉRALE DU MONDE; base des saints livres, qui constituent l'Ancien Testament des Chrétiens.

La Seconde éclaircit les TROIS GRANDS MYSTÈRES, ainsi que les QUATRE ÉVANGILES DE JÉSUS; base de nos SEPT SACRÉMENTS, de tous nos Dogmes-Théologiques, et de toutes les cérémonies de notre Loi Nouvelle."

The work is professedly composed for the conviction and conversion of unbelievers in Christianity. At the close of the 'preliminary discourse' to it, (for it is our intention only to present detached extracts by way of clue for the candidate), the author thus observes:—

"Je ne donne mes trois premières Sections que comme une préface; mais la quatrième, à laquelle commenceront mes Preuves physiques, sera d'une très grande importance à peser mûrement: elle contient, avec la clef des Mystères Egyptiens, celle des HIEROGLYPHES ou Chîfres consacrés à leurs Dieux; lesquels étant aussi employés dans la mystique expression de nos Dogmes, ne doivent jamais être perdus de vue par mon lecteur.

waste his kingdom, no creation, no transformation, nor any alteration could have been made in this region. For the two eternal principles had then continued in their harmonious order: darkness and fire must have abode in their subjection to the light to all eternity, as they stood therein from all eternity. This third principle therefore, could not have been made, especially not in this region, a distinct representation and manifestation of their several divided properties, as it is and must be now. If then, there was no fore-appointed will and decree in the counsel of God, before and without a reflection upon this sad apostacy of Lucifer, to create this third principle, and to manifest therein a visible figure of the two eternal principles in their opposition to each other, how could this will of God have been hindered or limited? And how can he, who is only to restore a thing spoiled by another, be said to be constrained by that spoiler to restore it so and so; especially when this restorer is all sufficient to show forth thereby his power and wisdom, and to make use of that same spoiling for the greater illustration of his own honour and glory? It may be said indeed, That he is occasioned to accommodate his wisdom to the condition and circumstances of that spoiled thing, and this in a sense, may be said also of God; but how can this be more derogating from his honour and glory, than it is when we say, and say rightly according to the truth, That he created such angels as could revolt against him, and that he gave unto them such thrones and possessions as could be spoiled and wasted by them? Seeing that by their revolt they did no hurt at all unto him, but hurt only themselves; and that he hath restored, and will restore what was spoiled, so as that even this spoiling itself shall serve to the greater exaltation of his might, honour and glory.

The fall then of Lucifer was foreseen indeed from all eternity in the mirror of eternal wonders, and so was the creation of this world also; and though there is or was no real before or after in that eternal all seeing eye, yet with respect to our understanding, the fall of Lucifer is fore-going, as it was also actually, and the creation of this third principle is following, and so following, that it depends upon that, and was not decreed beforehand, or without respect to that, but only in consequence and relation unto that. For when these things stood thus in this depraved state, what was there to be done, both with Lucifer and with his corrupted region? Should God have left him alone, so as to give over this whole kingdom into his absolute power, to exercise therein his sad tyrannical dominion, according to all his own will, in despite of God and all his holy angels? No, this could not have been done at all. For this region was not Lucifer's propriety, but his Creator was the only proprietor thereof; and it was only given unto him by birthright for an inheritance, if he would continue an obedient son. When he therefore departed from obedience, it was but just with God to thrust him out, and to take from him his inheritance. And moreover also this region, considered especially as to the seventh form of nature therein, neither had, nor could have revolted, nor committed any iniquity against its Creator; seeing that it stood only in mere passiveness, and must suffer itself to be defiled and polluted, having no ability to resist, because it was only a generated body, without any activity of itself, and could therefore not hinder its alteration and pollution, brought in upon it by the now predominant forms of darkness. How then, or by what equity could it have been punished with being given over into the arbitrary government of this apostatised prince of darkness? Unto whom it must now (until the power of omnipotence in the following creation appeared for its deliverance) have been subject indeed, but this constrainedly, not willingly; for it is natural and intrinsic unto every, even the most senseless thing, to incline to continue in its own state, rather than to be brought down into a lower and worse condition. It was then not only justice and equity with God, but was also of the highest necessity for the maintaining of his honour and glory, to take this region away from under the subjection of this rebellious angel. But this could not yet have been sufficient for its restitution, but it must further also be refined and purified by fire, and so restored into its former beauty and excellency; for it was defiled and corrupted so that the glory of God could not appear, nor dwell, nor represent and manifest itself therein. But now further, this purification by fire, and so this full restoration into the primeval glory, could not have been done then immediately, for it was a vacant throne, destitute of its natural prince, and in the counsel of the most Holy Trinity it was decreed, that another king should be raised up instead of Lucifer, after quite another way and manner, unto whom this region should be given for an eternal possession: for so saith the Scripture to this purpose, that we were chosen in Jesus Christ before the foundation of the world; and though this king should have been Adam the First, yet it was also seen and known beforehand that he would not stand firm in the hour of his temptation, but fall back, and so bring thereby another defilement upon this region again. And therefore (though not therefore only, but for several deeper, fundamental reasons, which could be produced if this did not suffice) it was not, nay it could not lès CABALISTIQUES, parcequ' ils sont à décomposer, les uns par Syllables, les autres par Lettres; et il sentira dans la suite, combien cette seconde Clef lui importoit à connoître."

And further, in the body of the work, in the second Section, he thus speaks:—

"Le fondement de mon explication sera d'abord compris par ceux qui, possédans la Science radicale des Nombres et des Caractères sacrés, doivent pénétrer par elle avec facilité dans la profondeur de tous les secrets des Philosophes. Si je veux que ceux-là me jugent un interprète exact, et en même tems circonspéct, il faut que je les renvoie au dixième et au seizième chapitres de nos merveilles "CLAVICULES DE SALOMON."

And now in the following detached extracts concerning the Scholastic Theology, its ignorance of the ground and truth of things, etc., he proceeds:—

"A l'égard des DOGMES de CROYANCE qui furent saints, ou statuéz à perpetuité pour fondement de notre Catholicisme, [i.e. before the great corruptions had entered into the Romish Church] on les a rassemblés dans un précis symbolique, ayant par cette raison le titre de SYMBOLE: Je manifesterai ci-après que les différens articles, dont il est composé, sont aussi vrais dans leur essence radicale, que leur Tissu les fait paroître extraordinaires à notre primitive conception. Il fut en même tems ordonné que chacun réciteroit tous les jours ce SYMBOLE, afin que les Points de doctrine qu'il contient demeurassent incessamment présens à notre mémoire.

Leur diction merveilleuse, composée en Langue Greque, fut enrichie d'expressions cabalistiques: de maniere que pour en saisir positivement le vrai sens, il faut être versé, non seulement dans la Langue anclenne, mais encore dans la Cabale syllabique des Philosophes Grecs: chacun le have been purified then, by such a purification as it is to pass through at the end of time, and so neither could it then have been restored into that same light and glory wherein it stood before, but another expedient was in the meanwhile found out in the wisdom of God, whereby his whole will and counsel most wisely could be performed; and this was the creation of this our outward third principle, wherein the two interior principles are left indeed in their contrariety to each other, (not by any necessity or constraint laid upon the creator by his rebellious creature, but by his own wisdom, for the greater manifestation of his glory, and the greater confusion of this spoiler,) and do both actually send forth their influences thereinto, according to their several divided properties, but are nevertheless so far harmonised and knit together in order, measure, weight and proportion, that neither of them can entirely prevail against the other; that the dark and fiery principle, which is destroying in its own nature when alone predominant, cannot alone exert its power and dominion, but must only serve the principle of light, for to move and stir it up, that so they both concurrently may be subservient to produce and manifest the secret wonders of God, whose shadows shall appear hereafter in eternity; and that they both may keep out and under their former prince, who is now only a prince of darkness. For though he may have an access in that dark and fiery part, with respect to which he is also still called a prince of this world; yet seeing that this is nowhere alone, but hath always and everywhere more or less an opposite part of light and water with it, he is everywhere resisted and excluded, except where men by their own malice, give unto him an open door. And moreover this whole principle, seeing that it is quite of another and exterior condition, nature and order, than that wherein he was created, availeth him nothing at all, nor can he make any use thereof, though he still is and liveth within its sphere. He can see no more in the light of this principle than he can in his own darkness; and the water of this principle can refresh him no more than his own fire can. So therefore he only is disappointed and deluded in all his designs, but the glory of his Creator exalted in all his works. And there is rejoicing even in heaven also among the holy angels because of the creation of this outward world, whereby this whole region is delivered from his tyranny, and is set in such a state as from which, (after the time shall be accomplished wherein it must be subject unto vanity, because of the transgression of man,) it may be restored into its primeval dignity, and so re-united to the other two angelical hierarchies.

So then the creation of this third principle is not at all such a work as is commonly apprehended by the vulgar, but quite another thing; to declare and demonstrate which much more might indeed be added, but it will still evidence itself more and more hereafter. Here therefore it may suffice only to have said in general, That it is nothing else but a transformation of this whole polluted kingdom of Lucifer into another exterior state, and inferior degree of goodness, light and dignity, made in order to bring it up in due time again, through the purifying fire into that primeval glory wherein it stood before the fire was stirred up, and the darkness set in opposition against the light. —

Having thus seen the connexion between the fall of Lucifer and the creation of this third principle, and what this creation is in general; and having given, I think, a sufficient answer to that twofold objection, we are now further to consider this whole outward creation more particularly, according to the description given forth thereof by Moses. In the beginning then God created the heaven and the earth, saith Moses. By the word of the Lord were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth, saith David: and In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and God was the word; the same was in the beginning with God: all things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made, etc., saith the apostle John. All three say concordantly one and the same thing of the creation, though the words of the Apostle reach further, and imply much more than those of Moses and of David. For this beginning which Moses speaketh of, is only the beginning of time; which according to his following description, must of necessity have been brought forth after the fall of Lucifer. But the beginning mentioned by St. John is not this beginning of time only; for he saying that without the Word, which was in the beginning with God, not anything was made that was made, includeth manifestly the creation of angels also, which verily had its beginning before the beginning of the creation of this third principle: whereas Moses saith nothing at all neither of the creation of angels, nor of their fall explicitly, but was only, and (for reasons declared elsewhere) very shortly and obscurely too, to describe the outward creation of this our visible world.

So then we have now here already two beginnings, different from each other by degrees of being more exterior and more interior. For the creation of angels belongs not at all unto time, nor was the beginning thereof a beginning of time; but the time of this third principle is such a necessary

J'avoie, qu'auparavant de les entendre, l'imagination confuse en ses idées ne peut nous faire concevoir, que la Vérité la plus pure, que la Raison la mieux éclairée, que la Sagesse la plus éclatante, ayant été, et soient, notoirement réunies dans ce Bloc miraculeux de SANCTIONS divines, sur lesquelles notre Sanctuaire théologal a été bâti: mais en revanche, quelle justesse, quelle précision, quelle exactitude, n'y reconnoit-on pas, dès qu'on a réussi à soulever tant soit peu le magnifique Voile dont nos Peres Grecs l'ont saintement couvert et orné.

Ils imiteront, par leur ingénieux travail, celui des REVELATIONS plus anciennes de Moïse, d'Esdras, et des Prophètes d'Israël: c'est pourquoi les noms et les livres de ceux-ci, qui avoient été vénérés comme saints par l'ancienne Loi, durent être également sancifiés par les canons de notre Loi nouvelle.

Pour revenir à notre sainte REVELATION, c'est-à-dire au Voile nouveau, ou à la Vélation nouvelle de nos Dogmes Chrétiens, j'ai prévenu mon lecteur qu'elle est fondée sur celle des Juifs: c'est ce qui a autorisé nos Théologiens scholastiques à comparer les figures des deux Loix: mais ils ont tellement contourné leur Sophisme badin sur les diverses REVELATIONS, qu'aujourd'hui ce nom, interprété tout autrement que ne devrait permettre sa signification naturelle, augmente l'obscurité des idées que chacun s'en forme.

unavoidable consequence of their fall, as an earthly room or place is of a gross compacted body. We must say indeed, that the creation of angels had a beginning, for though their essences were eternal, yet they were not formed or figured creatures from eternity; but we cannot say this beginning imports a time, no more than we can say, that it imports such or such a determinate extension of room and place; though really something answering unto both is imported, which because it is surpassing our outward condition, wherein all things are grossly compacted, our earthly tongue hath no denomination to express or represent it by conveniently: for though it imports not a time yet it imports a lower state than eternity is, when considered absolutely as to itself, without any respect to creatures. The mighty angel in the Revelation, swore by him that liveth for ever and ever, who created heaven and earth, and the things that are therein, there should be time no longer, but in the days of the voice of the seventh angel, the mystery of God should be finished. Now this mystery of God is wholly relating unto man, created after the creation of heaven and earth, and all of the things that are therein. If then there shall be time no longer, after the finishing of this mystery of God, there was also no time before this mystery of God had its actual beginning in the creation of heaven and earth and the things therein, though there had been another beginning already before in the angelical creation.

It may seem superfluous to insist so much upon this difference, the notion whereof may be plain and notorious enough, but I think it not so, because these two beginnings are not yet all that the words of St. John are applicable unto; but we shall find two other beginnings more, both which are much deeper, and far more intrinsical, because without any relation unto creatures, and which do differ also from each other by such a difference as might be said in this or that respect, to bear some analogy to this, whereby the beginning of time differeth from the beginning of the creation of angels. Seeing then that these two posterior beginnings are nearer to us (because both relating unto such creatures as stood originally in the same degree of excellency, having both been created after the image and likeness of God), and are therefore more comprehensible, we must needs look upon them with attention, and procure in our mind a true idea of that difference whereby they are to be distinguished from each other, if we expect to have any good apprehension of those other two beginnings that are much more abstruse and remote from our eyes. For they are all four to be taken notice of, if the expression of the Apostle, and that excellent explication which Teutonicus giveth forth thereof, shall be fully understood.

If we then look deeper, beyond both this and that creation into the generation of eternal nature, we shall find that something like to a beginning is to be understood there also, which is implied in the denomination of a principle, and which has been spoken of sufficiently before, where it was called an eternal beginning or a beginning without beginning. And this is the lower beginning of these latter two, answering in different respects both to the beginning made in the angelical creation, and to the following beginning of time in the outward creation also. For as to both these, eternal nature is as it were successively and gradually descended—down lower and lower, and hath manifested in the former more secretly and unitedly, and in the latter more openly and separately all its hidden powers and energies. Seeing that in the beginning of the angelical creation, its darkness and fire, though both co-operating indeed subserviently, were still hid and kept under in subjection, and the light only was made manifest in all the holy angels. When contrariwise in the beginning of time, or in the outward creation, it hath openly displayed both darkness, fire and light, in a plain distinction and division, obvious everywhere, and made even a visible and transitory representation of each of them particularly.

But further, if we now look deeper again beyond eternal nature and its eternal beginning itself, into that transcendent, abyssal, incomprehensible generation of God, who there generateth God, or spreadeth forth himself into Father, Son and Spirit, spoken of lately in the explication of that SCHEME or TABLE, which considereth God without all nature and creature, even there also there is still in a higher and more recondite sense, a beginning, or rather something as quite afar off, and only with relation to our apprehension answering thereunto, to be conceived, which more than any of all the former wanteth indeed a peculiar and more convenient denomination; for this of a beginning is much too gross and low; but seeing we have no better, we must call it a beginning too, and be contented with that difference whereby we can distinguish it from all the others in the apprehension of our mind. For it is rightly said, that in our apprehension only it answers to a beginning; and yet it is rightly said also, that a real ground of this our apprehension is in the thing itself; which would be plainer on both sides, if we could have another and more significant denomination than that of a beginning is. And this is the inmost or deepest beginning of all, beyond which there is no other to be looked out for more, and is answering in different cités s'étant étendues sur LA PRESCIENCE divine, sur LA PREDESTINATION, et sur les effets physiques de la GRACE DE DIEU, par laquelle seule tous les hommes existent, vivent, et se perpétuent, il est né sur ces matières théologiques des disputes singulières, qui ne sont appuyées de part et d'autre que par des Documents scholastiques à perte de vue.

J'ai déjà dit qu'une longue négligence des Lettres ayant fait éclipser toute connoissance de nos termes mystiques, nous avions généralement perdu de vue les fondemens naturels de notre sainte Religion, et que depuis ce tems nos Ecoles de Théologie, en ne préconisant que des Theses antiphysiques, étoient néanmoins réputées enseigner de solides Préceptes. Or, attendu que ces Ecoles font un obstacle de plus A LA DECOUVERTE DU VRAI, je vois une nécessité de les combattre en forme, avant de dévoiler la simplicité véridique de nos plus grands Mysteres. Elles feront donc l'objet de ma section suivante * * * (Thus far out of SECT. II.)

Prévenu par mon instruction générale quelle est la véritable essence de nos Ecoles de Théologie, l'on sera bien aise que j'en rende la preuve tout-à-fait sensible, dans un Examen sérieux de leurs Documents sur plusieurs Points interessans de notre Religion Romaine: J'entre en matière.

LES REVELATIONS. — Je prie mon lecteur de réfléchir, que comme le mot, VELARE, signifie voiler, de même REVELARE doit nécessairement signifier dévoiler, ou voiler de nouveau ce qui auroit déjà paru sous un VOILE primitif. Par tant c'est une Erreur-de-fait à nos Auteurs modernes de vouloir, par leur Traduction Françoisse du terme Latin REVELATIO, lui attribuer un signifirespects to all the following three, but nearer and more especially to that next eternal beginning made in the generation of eternal nature; seeing that these two are both relating to the manifestation of God unto himself only, when the other two have their only relation to the manifestation of God made by and unto creatures. Wherefore also this answerableness whereby this deepest abyssal (or rather byssal) beginning answers to the beginning in the generation of eternal nature, is as far above that whereby it answers to the angelical beginning, as God the creator is above the creatures; and infinitely more different from that whereby it answers to the beginning of time, than a bright shining light is different from a dark shadow, caused by the interposition of an obscure body, which was even actually done by the fall of angels in this outward creation. When it doth nevertheless truly answer more or less to all the three following degrees of beginning successively, and unto each according to its own either nearer or more remote condition. So that therefore as to all these four, the words of St. John are to be understood, when those of Moses speak of the most outward and lowest beginning of time in the temporal creation only. Which apostolical words we shall now further take into more particular consideration, beginning from that which is the deepest and inmost, and so proceeding down to that which is the lowest and outmost of all; which also alone is to have an end, not in any deeper, but only in such a sense, and according to such a manner as is directly opposite unto those circumstances, in the consideration of which it can alone properly be said to have had a beginning, nay, which made, or even were themselves this very beginning of time." [To resume the Summary.] (1.) Abyss without all beginning. (2.) Abyss itself the beginning of all posterior things. (3.) Abyssal Nothing and All is God himself, though not yet to be considered as Father. Abyssal condition. Trinity. Father Son and Spirit had a beginning; reconciled with Behmen saying, the Father is beginning-less. That the distinction between the Father and the Abyssal Will is cum fundamento in re, is plain from Scripture. This beginning not related to the abyssal will, but to its actual moving.

The word was (if we say) generated in this beginning, we say true enough, but not yet all. This was impleth also its having been in the Father before this beginning: shown from the Scripture, I am in the Father, and the Father is in me. Why the Son is called the word of the Father, is largely declared by the generation of our word.

To declare that, and how, Father and Son are one and not two; and yet also two, and not one, is first shown what Teutonicus understands by Unity, by Abyss, by God, by Father, and by Son, Word or Byss. The real ground of the Father and Son being one, is this, that not only the Son is in the Father, but also the Father in the Son. How the Father can be in the Son when the Son is in the Father, explained. That Father and Son are one, not two, is demonstrated. (1.) In the Father is all, and in the Son is all what is in the Godhead. (2.) The glory is the Father's, and the glory is the Son's. (3.) The Father's is all power, and the Son's is all power. (4.) I am the first and the last. (5.) No man has seen God; and we have seen with our eyes. The pure in heart shall see God, reconciled declared and demonstrated, by showing, how God here is taken. An objection that the Jews were the peculiar people of the Father, answered. Objection, This makes two eternal Gods, a visible and invisible one. Answer, No. Philip's request, and the Lord's answer. Not we the makers of the trinity.

Again that Father and Son are also two, not one, is declared and demonstrated, from the Abyss being not a Byss, and the Byss being not an Abyss; (and hereafter, further in the words, with God.) God, not always taken in the same sense and respect. The many strong holds of antitrinitarians. Reason cannot be pulled down by another reason; but only by etc.

And the word was with God. Difference between in, and with him. The father's bosom; and why called the father's. Son with the Father, upon the Father's throne. And God was the word. Complaint against the English translation. The apostle goeth directly forward, explained and proved. Distinction and unity must be together. God his own beginning, and his own end. Two, and one. God was the word in which was life. In the following words, the Apostle descends down unto things; and so unto eternal nature, which is the first of things.

As to the second beginning, these words of Saint John are explained in some positions. Lubet with desire; why and how. How it goeth along with it, explained by a simile. The first original will was itself that lubet, and itself that strong desire; declared and proved. All things, (all the forms of eternal nature) made (or caused to be what they are) by him; declared particularly as to all the seven forms.

As to the third and fourth beginning, without him was not any etc., because all in eternal nature was made by him. In him was life; must be understood with respect to the fall. In the Father without the Son no life for men and angels. Father, men were thine . . . I give unto them on directement opposée à celle que sa dérivation du Latin lui rend propre.

L'on doit d'ailleurs comprendre, que, sans offenser de propos délibéré la Raison et le bon Sens, on ne peut envisager, dans les REVELATIONS Théologiques, qui sont contenues aux livres de Moïse, des Prophètes, ou des Evangelistes, aucun dévoilement des Choses Divines; puisque les grandes Vérités, que leur Textes sacrés nous enseignent y demeurent obscurément cachées pour les commun des hommes: hé! que dis-je, pour le commun des hommes? nos plus fameux Théologiens d'aujourd'hui conviennent franchement qu'elles sont impénétrables pour eux: il est vrai qu'ils ne parlent et ne pensent ainsi, que parceque le fondement de leur savoir théologique est la SCHOLASTICITE.

Si donc, en ne pénétrant pas eux-mêmes dans le secret des choses dévoilées, leur plaisir est de nous entretenir de ces mystiques Révelations, comme si elles eussent dévoilé les Vérités divines et éternelles; il est évident que leur assertion à cette égard demeure vaine de soi, tant parceque le fait l'anéantit, que parceque le mot REVELATIO exprime le contraire. Elle ne doit conséquemment paroître à nos yeux que comme une Thèse d'Ecole, ou de Récréation, propre à aiguïser les sens spirituels de la jeunesse. En effet l'on ne peut mettre en dispute scholastique des propositions aussi révoltantes pour le jugement humain, sans que le jeune Ecolier n'en soit vivement frappé: par où il lui reste dans l'imagination une impression plus forte de la Vérité naturelle, qu'on ne lui conteste que fictivement.

Il est sensible que nos Théologiens, en qualifiant Moïse le premier Ecrivain sacré, voulurent jouer et plaisanter d'une seconde manière sur le mot REVELATIO; et ce fut pour rendre le fait en-eternal life. And the life was the light of men. Life and light, not so distinguished before the fall of man; both one, and yet also two. And the light shineth into the darkness. Especially in men and angels, before they extinguished it. Eternal darkness and death not absolutely nothing etc. Darkness comprehended it not. If light shall be light, darkness must be darkness. [End of the discourse on Saint John's words, In the beginning, &c.]

In the beginning God created etc. Herein, in one sense, a work preparatory for the creation; and, in another, a complete account thereof, containing all etc. The first is declared by a simile; to stop a misapprehension (as if there had been already stones, rocks, etc.). Behmen's sense is plainly represented, and he vindicated, by showing it is rightly said that, if this fire be not quenched, a black soot will not cease to be generated. That this kingdom must needs have been taken away from Lucifer, and he be cast out. Why; and by what means? By creation; which implieth chiefly a compacting and bringing down lower. Declared by light and water which exclude him. All this more evident from, In the beginning: for this not the beginning of Lucifer's revolting, but of God stopping him. Beginning of time; place; palpability. Denomination of a third principle. From hence plain, (1.) the earth of the vilest excrements. (2.) Why it consists of an innumerable multiplicity of materialities. (3.) Why in all a mixture of good and evil. (4.) That, and how everything may be changed. (5.) That, and how this mixture (as before the curse) consistent with, God saw all . . . very good. (6.) That the earth belongeth unto the centre of Sol. (7.) That this work was preparatory. Which last expression could still be made plainer, (1.) by earth was void; (2.) by darkness upon the face etc., (3.) by spirit of God moved etc.

The second begins by an earnest declaration against our own learning, labouring, running, making, and expolishing images etc., which it was necessary to say thus plainly and chiefly for the writer's own security; having in all a twofold end. The thing itself proposed but in one page, by the example of Teutonicus, and referring to his declaration. Concluded with some instances of his mockers being dreadfully punished. And with references to Behmen.

The seven days jointly considered, in fourteen positions. (1.) The literal sense true, but a deeper hid therein. (2.) Seven days, seven properties of eternal nature. References. (3.) Seven days so linked together that every following day flowed etc. (4.) After the method in eternal nature, the whole temporal nature in these seven days produced. And why so. (5.) All what is in eternal nature, and its eternal seven, is in temporal nature and in its temporal seven also. (6.) Temporal nature must needs have been brought forth in seven, (7.) and just in seven days, or seven circumvolutions of the earthly globe. (8.) In these seven days all things restored, not only, after the same process; but also in the same fashion of order, state and government; but not the same degree etc. (9.) Therefore this world a principle. This description reconciled with some other sayings of Behmen. (10.) Five reasons for the truth of Behmen's words, that the process in the creation is more easily to be understood in the regeneration, than any outward etc.; and a sixth reason at the end. (11.) We see this world but half, and how we may see it whole. (12.) The seven days may well be called after the seven planets. (13.) The three first days, without sun and stars, reunited by Christ's three days in the earth to the perfect number seven. (14.) The eighth day therefore in the Christian church justly substituted in the place of the seventh.

The first day. (1.) The impure materiality gathered together. (2.) Darkness upon the face of the deep, better upon the superficies of the abyss. What Behmen means by three births must here be understood. (3.) These three births explained. What Lucifer hath done; and where the effects of his doing. (4.) Behmen vindicated, about Lucifer extinguishing the light. Darkness but upon the superficies of the abyss. (5.) If these two could have been totally divorced, no light could be produced. (6.) God said, let there be light. Behmen's declaration of God's speaking, unintelligible, but useful, if etc. References. (7.) This light not bright shining etc. (8.) The reason, why. (9.) Query, the first property being predominant, from whence then, and how came this light? Answer, It is intelligible, if etc.; but not expressible so, as etc. Something said thereof as to the Microcosm in the third of the THREE TABLES. (10.) The production of this light plainly to be understood in the compaction of this day; largely explained, and references.

(11.) This light to be considered also as diffused through all things, even earth and stones; declared. (12.) Here the ground, first, of signatura rerum; secondly, of things subservient to dark magic; thirdly, of things quite contrary; fourthly, of transmuting herbs or flowers; fifthly, of every thing having somewhat of goodness in it. (13.) God saw all—good. Darkness in one sense, not among the things which God made; but in another, he so made it, as he made earth and stones. Not therefore here called good, when yet, in a sense, it is good also. (14.) God divided etc.: in eternal nature they divide themselves. This expression therefore relates first, to Lucifer's disorder; core plus antiphysique, qu'ils y ajoutèrent qu'il étoit le plus ancien des Ecrivains du Monde.

Je ne conçois par comment une double Erreur aussi constante, aussi choquante, que celle-là, démentie par Moïse lui-même dans toutes ses FIGURES GENÉSIQUES, peut être devenue l'Opinion la plus générale des Ecrivains de nos derniers siècles. Est-ce qu'il n'a pas dû leur sauter aux yeux, que les choses divines écrites par Moïse ne pourroient pas être nommées des Révélations, si réellement il en eut été le premier Vélateur? Celui qui voila primordialement les mêmes choses divines; écrivit nécessairement avant Moïse, puisque Moïse n'a fait que les dévoiler.

J'admire plus que personne l'ouvrage exquis de cet Auteur célèbre; parceque ayant trouvé le secret de sa Cabale, sa même Clef du Nombre 5 m'a servi pour m'introduire dans son magnifique PENTATEUQUE. Je l'y ai suivi pas-à-pas, et après avoir décomposé ses Bouquets Artistiels de Fleurs Grecques et Arabes, Syriaques et Chaldéennes, j'ai reconnu dans lui une Science profonde, un Génie fertile en idées toutes sublimes, et un art infini pour leur arrangement: mais j'ai reconnu aussi que LES CHOSES SAINTES qu'il y revêloit pour les faire servir à la Gloire du seul Dieu que nous adorons, avoient été précédemment voilées.

Où, l'Egypte en étoit mystiquement imbuë depuis le grand Hermès son législateur, c'est-à-dire plus de quinze siècles avant que Moïse naquit. Elles y servoient au culte de Sept Dieux principaux, honorés en sous-ordre d'un Dieu SUPREME, appelé le Seul Incréé. La Chaldée, la Syrie, et la Grèce, adoptèrent la même Religion, et la nommerent Ethnique, c'est-à-dire Nationale, parcequ'en la suivant, on étoit censé ne former qu'une seule Nation. Je donnerai ci-après une idée plus nette de cette Loi.

secondly, to their compaction; thirdly, to their being both together everywhere. To what end divided. Lucifer a prince of this world; may from hence conclude etc. This division of great importance. (15.) God called . . . day . . . night. Not arbitrarily; proved from Adam's nominating everything; and from Behmen's excellent declaration of these two names.

The second day. (1.) The first and second properties of eternal nature. (2.) The first and second day of the creation. (3.) Firmament to be considered in a twofold sense. (4.) Firmament, in the first sense, the gulf betwixt time and eternity. Schluss. An outward representation thereof in the visible firmament. Gulf not proper, and why. No benefit to have a distinct notion thereof, if but a notion. If we are at the borders of time . . . impossibility of breaking . . . will open in our sensibility with such an astonishing etc. (5.) Water under, and water above the firmament: what, where, etc. And references to Behmen.

(6.) Firmament in second sense what; Schamaim. Two tinctures divided, not divorced. Correspondence between heaven and earth. (7.) Here the ground of the two sexes. Man was above etc. (8.) Chief benefit of this dividing; as to the macrocosm the stopping of Lucifer, and as to the microcosm the breaking his fall. References, for word him-mel. References, for the second day. Conclusion; firmament will bring forth another age. Not all to be rejected promiscuously, because not understood.

The third day. (1.) Connexion of this third with the second. (2.) This dividing of waters and earth the last footsteps of the second property, and but as an appendix of that former. (3.) Meer, what, in the language of nature. (4.) Behmen cleared, and largely explained, concerning the water's quenching the devil's fiery wrath; chiefly with respect to Sodom etc. (5.) The three first properties considered; and so the three first days. Compacting. Dividing the tincture. Their combination. Each after its kind. References for the third day. (6.) How the earth came to bring forth, a whole day before heaven etc., answered. See Behmen.

The fourth day. (1.) This of the greatest consideration, and why. (2.) The Sun's production largely declared in analogy to the fire in eternal nature. Travailing of the whole outbirth, double then. Liberty, here the inmost generation etc. References. (3.) Generation of the planets cannot herefrom be separated; and why. (4.) They are considered in general, as to up and down. (5.) In particular. First crack or shrack, Mars. Second crack, Jupiter. Pearls not to be ridiculed. References to Behmen for generation of the planets.

(6.) Sol, tincture of fire. Number eight opened. Sun's light one light with God, if etc.; explained. Compared to the light in man's eye. Sun's supernatural eclipse, at Christ's death. References for this. (7.) Sun's several denominations. (8.) Reference to Behmen's THREEFOLD LIFE, ix. 105, 106, explained; and afterwards, he vindicated. What the Sun is. Upon three postulata is largely demonstrated that Sol is the centre. And further the same is demonstrated from the kindling or opening of the Number viii. Earth immovable. Objection from Scripture, answered. Absurdities of the sun's moving. Now Behmen vindicated in saying, It was reserved unto opening of the seventh seal. (9.) Sun's office. References to Behmen. (10.) Heathens had reason to worship the sun, rather than etc. (11.) Sun's metal, why so beloved. References. (12.) Gold purified seven times. (13.) To collect places for philosophical tincture not profitable. (14.) Gold and silver shall be given to kingdom of Christ upon earth, as an ornament.

(15.) The six planets and their metals in what order to be considered. Up and down, relating to their properties and centre; and references. (16.) Mars first (not Saturn, Luna) and why. (17.) Mars' nature and office; various denominations. Behmen gives unto eternal the names of temporal things, because etc. (18.) Mars' distance from Sun. (19.) Mars ruleth the first hour of the third day. (20.) Behmen vindicated concerning the time of Mars' revolution. (21.) Relation of Mars to Sun, and to Venus: so crack, fire, and light; so also iron, gold, and copper. Mars hath no body of his own; Saturn compacteth it for him; therefore devours etc. If this relation were not so, iron could have no toughness: Venus also could have no body without Mars, who showeth his redness in copper. Because of this relation, these two more easily transmuted. References for Mars and iron.

(22.) Jupiter the causer of meekness in every life, minded and understood by very few; yet, much more therein, than we can think of: this meekness quite another thing than etc. References for what a life is. If Jupiter not in the midst, Saturn would unite with Mars, breaking through etc. (22.) Jupiter's residence in the brain; and he the brain of the Macrocosm. (23.) Tin, Jupiter's metal. The third degree given forth by the lubet. References, for Jupiter's nature and office.

(24.) Saturn's nature. Saturn with Sol ruler and former of all this third principle. (25.) Sa-

Observons que Moyse élevé à la cour d'un Roi d'Egypte, y avoit dû recevoir une excellente éducation, à laquelle il joignoit une Sagacité d'esprit supérieure: de là on doit juger qu'il lui fut plus facile qu'à tout autre de s'initier parfaitement dans l'Arcane du Culte qui étoit pour lors rendu aux Dieux, aux Demi-Dieux, et aux Héros. Faut-il que nos Savans modernes n'en aient pas seulement étudié les Noms, et qu'ils ne se représentent que des Historiettes vaines et frivoles, en lisant le docte Recueil que nous appelons FABULÆ GENTILIIUM ET PAGANORUM?

Ce titre nous déclare que parmi les sujets tant Arabes que Grecs du Monarque d'Egypte, ceux que l'on y qualifioit GENTILES ET PAGANI, c'est-à-dire les petites-gens et les villageois, devoient croire aux Paroles textuelles de ces Historiettes sacrées, sans les comprendre: Mais il s'ensuit que les Grands-Seigneurs, sans peut-être les savoir expliquer, savoient d'ailleurs que leur Texte contenoit des Enigmes essentiellement véridiques: il s'ensuit encore que le Voile devoit être entièrement levé, soit pour les Aigles de la Philosophie, soit pour les ANGES-ŒS, tels qu'étoient, et les Rois, et ceux qu'il leur plaisoit d'élever à la dignité de Prince des Prêtres.

Il est étonnant que les Vies des Dieux, Demi-Dieux, et Héros de l'Antiquité payenne, dans lesquelles nul prétexte de Religion n'a pu nous détourner d'approfondir, fassent également pour nous une Science purement scholastique. Quoi! chacun se fait une gloire de ne pas ignorer les Textes divers, et personne ne s'applique à pénétrer dans les Merveilles de la Nature, qui y sont encloses: Le Beau Mérite pour un homme d'esprit, d'avoir chargé sa Mémoire de ce qu'il n'entend pas.

Si Moyse s'étoit borné à un passetemps aussi risible et aussi infructueux, jamais il n'eût découvert, saisi, et admiré les beautés allégoriques de ces Fables. Quand il les comprit bien, elles lui turn's station, where; and why. (26.) Saturn's residence the brainpan. (27.) Saturn's metal more profitably considered with relation to ourselves. References for it; and references for the original and nature of Saturn, compared to references for Saturn's property in eternal nature.

(28.) Venus only hath a proper light; why. (29.) Venus a true daughter of the Sun, explained by similitudes, and defended against men of learning, sincerity, and sense, (saying planetas evolasse a Sole) qui si tacuissent philosophi mansissent. (30.) Venus considered with relation to Jupiter. Jupiter causer of meekness, and Venus meekness herself. As she appeaseth Mars, so she makes Jupiter humble. Immense riches here; shown from Lucifer's fall. Order of the seven properties in the AURORA, altered in following books; and alteration in this third principle as to Jupiter and Mercury. An important consideration that Jupiter is not able to . . . but that he must be empowered, first, by another; secondly, standing on the other side; thirdly, having a proper light; and fourthly, being a female power. Jupiter a causer of, and Venus meekness itself, reconciled, Venus wants, besides Mars such another confederate as hath those five requisites, that are nowhere but in Jupiter. Mercury and Jupiter make a square; shown. All these things but little fragments. 'Behmen wrote in the divine light, and not to be read by spectacles of our own making.' References for Venus and her metal, copper.

(31.) First of Mercury (not the planet) must be said something, and why. (32.) What mercurius, in the language of nature. (33.) Behmen reconciled and vindicated in calling the sixth property, mercurius. References for sound in the sixth property. (34.) A twofold word; in the Father's centre, mercurius. Mercurius in every principle. Behmen's several expressions. (35.) An objection that Behmen confounds God and nature; answered. (36.) References to Behmen for sal, sulphur, and mercurius.

(37.) Mercury's original; and why his place exchanged with Jupiter. (38.) In Mercury the knowledge of what is in the centre of nature. (39.) Mercury causeth in Jupiter, understanding. (40.) Mercury, hath from Jupiter his good temper and inclination. (41.) Mercury's proper office. (42.) Mercury hermaphrodite. (43.) He ruleth the first hour of the fourth day; and this fourth day of the creation proper to him. (44.) Mercury's metal, quicksilver. References for Mercury and his metal.

(45.) Luna the last and lowest, why. Heaven and earth come into conjunction. (46.) Luna's office, a mediator. (47.) Luna, wife to all, but chiefly to Sol. (48.) Luna more desirous after Sol than any other, and why. (49.) Why this so peculiarly offered to our consideration. (50.) Luna half dark, half light; why, and Behmen vindicated. (51.) Luna draweth in the shine of Sol; receiveth only the pale colour. Declaration of Behmen, vindicated. Greater light, and lesser light, though no light, can well be justified, according to Behmen's ground. (52.) Luna false; fugitive; Behmen vindicated. (53.) Luna ruleth first hour of second day. (54.) Luna's metal, silver. Man's body before the fall compared to pure silver. References for Luna and her metal. Metals in general; a water and oil kept under by wrathful properties. The first creation discovered therein.

(55.) Fixed stars came forth with the planets, and why. (56.) Must be conceived both as prior, and as posterior to the sun, and why. (57.) Stated, what. All, the whole nature. The manifold powers of eternity; looking-glass. An outspoken word, enabled to speak out again. A quintessential spiritual substance. That which is superior, in dignity more than locality. A quintessence of the four elements. Inferior to the planets, as a body to the soul; shown from, essences. Not a material palpable thing. Fire and water, explained from water's matrix, and water compacted. Not consumed, nor extinguished, because this water, like oil, &c. (58.) In their creation great things, but the world's wickedness, etc. (59.) Stated, just so many, as many essences stood open when the sun kindled. (60.) This number infinite; not to the Creator. Argument for immortality of souls. (61.) Why fixed.

(62.) All but one harmonious instrument or kingdom. Like a watch. (63.) Each hath the properties of all, but, etc. (64.) Each its proper office. (65.) Each inclined to bring forth its wonders. (66.) Many stars not seen. Why. (67.) Wrath, the original of their wheeling about. (68.) Their effects. For a general idea of the connexion . . . may be added, what Behmen means, by astrum. (69.) MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, xiii. 7—17, of astrum and astrums, and paraphrased. References for the fixed stars. (70.) The most profitable consideration of the stars, with respect to fallen man. And references for the same.

Concerning the spirit of this world, generation of the four elements, and sal, sulphur, and mercurius. Now the spirit of this world arose from the union of all the moving powers. Simile of an instrument, its strings, sounds, and harmony. Another of a watch. Spiritus mundi considered: first, with respect to what is immediately above him; secondly, with respect to himself only, servirent d'aiguillon pour entreprendre un vol, non moins élevé, non moins hardi, non moins heureux, que celui du grand Hermès. Il fut frappé sans doute, d'y voir les noms et les faits des Personages qu'elles représentent, annoncer, par le secret de leur Cabale, les Vérités éternelles du Monde; d'où l'on droit que les hommes les y apprissent réellement PAR LA BOUCHE des DIEUX, ou par celle de ces Héros fictifs, qui estimés incomparables à cause de leurs prodiges, semblaient justement placés au rang des Immortels?

Une seule chose déplût à la Muse d'Israël: car j'observe en passant que le nom Grec ΜΟΥΣΑ sous lequel notre illustre Hébreu fut connu des Arabes, signifie Muse; et dans le fait sa Genèse, qui renferme la science de l'Univers enseignée cabalistiquement, mérite bien d'être appelée un ΜΟΥΣΕUM. Il ne put souffrir qu'un fond si riche, si digne d'être transmis à la postérité la plus reculée, restât couvert par des Enigmes, dont le caractère sacré pouvoit porter ceux qui ne les comprendroient pas à l'Adoration des faux Dieux. [The writer understands that the verities of the creation, fall, redemption, etc., were composed and veiled by the primitive post-diluvian philosophers in fabulous or figurative relations; and that Moses, coming to understand the truth in its ground, resolved to represent it in a new form, more pure, simple and evangelical?]

Il entreprit donc de travailler un VOILE tout neuf, qui tissu avec un fil historique, de même que celui d'Hermès, ne représentât que des Personages humains, en place des feintes Déeses Egyptiennes: or il s'agissoit que ces hommes figurés, en revoilant les mêmes Vérités physiques dont des Dieux et Demi-Dieux avoient jusques-là été le Symbole, les exprimassent par une Confabulation qui fut digne de succéder à l'ancienne.

where he is largely and plainly declared. True way to get understanding. Thirdly, with respect to what is immediately under him; where, sal, sulphur, and mercurius, his spiritual object, and the four elements, his exterior habitation, must be considered. (1.) The three common principles: harshness, sal; stinging motion, mercurius; anguish, sulphur. Understood by the wise heathens, [by the primitive philosophers, both as to the outbirth and ground, though by some supposed not. Ed.] Character of the Trinity in all things. Here should be added oil, and sulphur, if . . . but, etc. (2.) The so called four elements. Their generation declared, from the one pure element; from the four first properties of eternal and temporal nature; from the sal-nitral crack and kindling of the fire: it is not meant thereby the eruption of the fire in the centre, on the fourth day, but, etc. References for the spirit of this world; for sal, sulphur, and mercurius; for the eternal one element; and for the so called four elements. [The Candidate will doubtless now apprehend the benefits of a clear intellectual knowledge of these points, in reference to the subject of the under-current ANNOTATION.]

The fifth day. (1.) From the fourth day, the springing up of this third property properly to be reckoned. (2.) Opening of this fifth jovial motion out of the fourth. (3.) Behmen considers all the living creatures here on this day, and why. (4.) They are not out of so many pieces of clay. Concerning their original, Behmen's expressions different, and yet concordant. Why. Largely explained, and Behmen vindicated, as not contradicting, but giving the true sense of Moses. Variety, the astrum. Aftersound.

(5.) Four kinds of living creatures, and in each of these varieties a subordinate numberless variety; why. A difficulty concerning the fire's astrum, resolved. (6.) Distinction in two sexes. Cause of their propagation is seeking the love. Only the serpent excepted, in the division of sexes. (7.) Several creatures have a mixed original, out of two mothers. (8.) Some have blood, others not; these through the devil's will. (9.) Some clean, others unclean, and reason thereof.

(10.) The final cause of their creation, declared in a connexion of what is to be considered both before and after. (11.) Necessity of this appearing in the eternal magia. (12.) The condition of the living creatures before the fall, as to their food, clothing, and cruel, wrathful properties. (13.) None is able to speak; yet the fowls understand the language of nature, in their kind. Tower of Babel. (14.) In all a character of the Trinity; but in none so as in man. They are but for food and propagation. References for the living creatures.

The sixth day. All what Behmen saith of the creation of man depends upon the seven properties, the two principles, and the fall of Lucifer. (1.) Original and formation of his body. Haadamah, Haarez, Behmen's different denominations. Two-fold, also three-fold body, etc.; must be left to him that hath the true pearl, in the regeneration. References for man's body.

(2.) The breathing in was one life, but also three, or three-fold. Fire; light; air. Spiraculum vitarum. This triplicity demonstrated. First, airy breath, outward part of the soul; exterior spirit; mortal soul, explained. Secondly, fiery breath; properly the soul; worm that dieth not; why. Dry, magic-fire. Cross. Fire-eye: root, and original of life; yet also life itself. Thirdly, flaming breath of light and love; properly, spirit of the soul; properly, that noble creature because of which the eternal Word was made flesh. Hence plain, first, that like as in eternity; so also here the fiery soul stands in the midst. Secondly, their different degrees of nobility. Thirdly, that the soul is only an inseparable propriety of man. References to Behmen for this threefold breathing.

(3.) The image of God commonly so described, that it be not erroneous, but imperfect. No man is blamed thereby, and why. It consisted chiefly and fundamentally in this threefold life, and in the union and order of these three. Both as to this, and that declaration, man had no law, but an ingrafted principle, truth, as an excellent character of uniformity with his Creator; till this, because of his wavering, was turned into a law. References to Behmen for what has been said of the image of God.

The seventh day. From the work, and rest of God, is plain, these seven days signify quite another thing than etc. (1.) In outward nature was an order and succession of these seven days. But (2.) with respect to eternity, work and rest equally co-eternal, and perpetually together. (3.) In what sense the seventh is prior to the sixth. Declared as a key to several obscure places. (4.) e. g. Out of the seventh day the first took its beginning. (5.) The seventh day in eternal nature always combined with the first. (6.) God rested on the seventh day, in the substantial temperature, or end of nature, etc. (7.) Behmen's several denominations of this seventh day in eternal nature. (8.) This seventh day considered with a particular respect to man: and first, as in his creation; (9.) further, as in his fallen state; (10.) and lastly, as in his restoration. The seventh

Mon lecteur conçoit déjà la sagesse de ce grand dessein, tendant évidemment à renverser les vains simulacres des fausses Divinités, pour faire adorer uniquement LE SEUL DIEU, UNIVERSEL CREATEUR. Mais peut-être ne distingue-t-on pas encore qu'il a fallu que Moïse réunit, avec la science hiéroglyphique, ou pleinement radicale, de quatre langues, toute la finesse de l'art des Cabales, et toute la fécondité d'une imagination vive et majestueuse, pour, par les noms et les faits nouveaux de ses humains personnages, par les nombres des années qu'il les fait vivre, et des Époques attribuées à leurs Gestes insignes, par son bel ordre général qui figure une suite intéressante et susceptible de probabilité dans une Histoire toute miraculeuse, redire sous une Voile aussi spirituelle, aussi magnifique, aussi parfait, qu'avoit été le premier, et néanmoins entièrement dissimulable, tout ce que celui-là contenoit d'essentiellement vrai.

L'on prendra, dans mes sections suivantes, une connoissance plus exacte des admirables Révélations qui ont été mises au jour par Moïse: j'y confronterai pour cet effet, par une double dévoilement, d'une part les Déités les plus fameuses de l'antique Religion d'Hermès; d'autre part, les figures substituées par Moïse dans son Tissue qui porte le nom sacré de LA GENÈSE, parcequ'il roule sur la Naissance du Monde, ou sur les Principes de la Nature. Mais ici je dois poursuivre mes preuves de la scholasticité de nos Théologiens actuels."

The Author then reviews the subjects of Providence, Prescience, Predestination and Grace, as treated by the schools, and next proceeds upon the following topics:—

L'ÉCOLE en général. — Par les différentes Thèses, scholastiquement théologiques, dont le fond vient d'être éclairci, l'on doit être en état d'apprécier le mérite fondamental de toutes les autres.

day the paradise, reopened through Jesus Christ. The true image of God, new restored in Jesus Christ, who therefore both the eighth day and the seventh. With respect to the whole creation, this seventh day that seventh blessed age, wherein the mystery of the kingdom of God shall be finished. References for the seventh day.

(VIII.)—OF THE FALL OF MAN, FROM HIS PRIMEVAL GLORY AND PERFECTION, DOWN INTO AND UNDER THE DOMINION OF THE SPIRIT OF THIS WORLD.

Man's primitive state of glory and perfection, in the strictest sense always taken for what he stood in, when but one single person. This state considered. (1.) As to the foundation-pillar. Interior body penetrated the exterior. Red hot iron. (2.) As to the manner of his eating and drinking. One element's greening [pa-ra-dis-ing] through the earth, the outward local paradise. (3.) As to his magical generation. Eternal nature not rent asunder when he was formed upon the cross, and brought away from it into another world, etc. (4.) As to his clothing. Naked. Iron and fire. (5.) As to his labour. Why the tincture so much searched after; and why found by so very few. References for these subjects.

The first forty days. Behmen contradicts not Moses. Every number forty in Scripture related hereunto. The five instances . . . relating to the five degrees of nature. The first and second Adam's process, parallel. References for these forty days. The great mystery of iniquity conceived. Adam began by little and little, etc. Tree of knowledge arose; law came in, etc. But we will consider in these first forty days, only in general the following three things:—

First, That, and why Adam must have been tempted. This both lieth indeed in understanding (1.) what he was, and (2.) to what end he was created. But much deeper it lieth in our own internal ground. The word temptation, here not yet proper. Temptation here a representation of each principle in man's three-fold looking-glass. Explained. Let none blame God. Necessity of such a temptation [or proba], and more arguments for the same. References to Behmen.

Secondly, How, and by whom, man was tempted. Might now seem, but is not superfluous. Spiritus mundi comes here chiefly into consideration, and why. No such evil design as to kill, etc. in any but the devil. His twofold design, (1.) To manifest his wonders; (2.) to get the Eternal Virgin, who manifest only in man. He the original of all delusions. References.

Thirdly, The end and consequence of this temptation. Sleep, death. Simile of oil in a burning lamp. As Adam's eating, so his death in sleep. References for Adam's sleep. Production of the woman, in eighteen positions. (1.) Generation of eternal nature and man's original in the first creation must be understood. (2.) Man fallen home [to the back ground of eternity, and a birth deeper than his Virgin.] to the holy name Jesus, who was now the second Creator. (3.) This not contrary to what before of the spiritus mundi or exterior fiat. (4.) Neither this nor that without man. (5.) Adam's sleep, and being divided, the first token of God's love and mercy. Proved. (6.) The scope of Eve's creation; so much lower than that of his, as etc. (7.) She never stood in virgin purity. (8.) Was infected with Adam's twofold lust. (9.) All this reflects rather upon him than her. (10.) Rib, and the half cross in the brain-pan. (11.) Adam's body really broken. (12.) Rib sheweth her the weaker part. (13.) Something also out of all his essences was extracted; which now a loss to him; but not so if he had brought forth, etc. (14.) Adam's paradisical rose-garden. Out of which the woman, what; and why she cannot pretend to any superiority. (15.) What left to Adam. What given to Eve. Christ of the woman only; yet a man, and why. (16.) Not meant that Adam had a soul only, and Eve a spirit only. Why cannot these two bring forth the whole image again; and why must every child partake of this division? The first is considered and answered largely. The second, especially from the fiat's incorporation into all the essences, being authorised so by God. Hermaphrodites. (17.) How the soul came into the woman's body. (18.) Formation of her body; in three hours. References to Behmen for all this matter.

The second forty days. Adam and Eve, their state in paradise. The tree of knowledge, etc. (1.) Its original in a seeming contradiction described by Behmen. But (2.) reconciled, and shown that both is true. (3.) What tree it was: not in paradise, but in the garden. (4.) Why called so, and how distinct from the tree of life; declared by a paraphrase of MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, xvii. 10–16. References.

The serpent, its original, subtlety, and near relation to the devil, after a threefold previous observation declared: and references. All the rest in twenty-three positions.

(1.) Adam awakened by the spirit of this world. (2.) Knew presently, and wanted not to be told what Eve was. (3.) Therefore shall a man leave, etc., seem not to be Adam's words. (4.) God's command declared by Adam unto Eve; and reasons for it. (5.) Eve had also from Adam the lust against that command. (6.) These two showed forth themselves in Eve. (7.) This lust the devil knew; and so he knew the serpent fit for his design. (8.) This design could not be ex-

L'Ecole fut, et sera toujours, un Badinage ingénieux, soit qu'elle traite des choses saintes, ou des choses prophanes; et, en conséquence, nos Ecoles de Théologie ne dictent, et ne doivent dicter, aucun Document qui puisse être essentiellement instructif de la Base du CHRISTIANISME.

J'affermais l'esprit de mon Lecteur dans cette Vérité, indubitable par elle-même, si je lui manifeste que la Philosophie et la Science des Lettres ne sont pareillement que badinées par tous ces Professeurs scholastiques, qui ont aujourd'hui la fausse Réputation de nous les enseigner.

Personne ne disconviendra que les deux excellens Livres, qui nous ont transmis, l'un cette fameuse Loi des Dieux et Demi-Dieux, qui furent imaginés pour les Egyptiens par le grand Hermès, l'autre, la Loi des Patriarches, qui fut écrite par Moïse pour les Hébreux, font, et feront à jamais, révéler ces deux Législateurs, comme des Philosophes, qui furent parfaitement instruits des Secrets de la Nature, et non moins versés dans la Science des Lettres.

Si donc les Documents qui nous sont donnés sur Les Lettres, et sur la Philosophie, n'étoient pas de pures scholasticités, n'est il pas évident qu'après avoir fait nos études avec application, sous des Professeurs renommés, chacun de nous devant dès-lors être devenu Lettré et Philosophe, on pourroit pénétrer dans les Textes philosophaux de ces deux Auteurs? Mais nous voyons que ceux, qui se prétendent des Philosophes et des Gens Lettrés, de même que les Docteurs scholastiques qui ont été leurs Maîtres, comprennent seulement que le premier Livre contient des Fables Allégoriques, et le second nos Figures de la Genèse.

La PHILOSOPHIE.—Les idées singulieres, que l'on nous a données dans les Ecoles ont tellecuted without a conjunction of these two. (9.) Such a conjunction could not be made without a third convenient thing. (10.) This third must have been so, and so. (11.) And this was the tree of knowledge.

(12.) The whole order of this magical operation. (13.) Eve could not be sensible immediately of the great alteration. (14.) Both died, and what a dreadful thing this eating, and dying to the one holy paradisaical element, see at the death of Christ. (15.) This dying not understood with respect to paradise; explained by similies. (16.) This dying imported an educing into predominance a latent earthly life and body. (17.) And this further, a gross compaction, opening of eyes, feeling of cold, &c. Slavery, bestial properties, etc. (18.) Devil's triumph.

(19.) They heard a twofold voice, according to the twofold word in eternal nature. (20.) Where art thou? The true eternal helpmeet called, and here Eve must be excluded. (21.) They heard also the angry, dreadful voice of the Father; plain from etc.

(22.) The gracious promise. Now [as all must be undone] Eve concerned; and Adam must be excluded. Declared circumstantially. The inspoken word, what. A little gate re-opened. An obscure prophesy; and why. (23.) Of their being driven out, by etc., nothing need be said here more, because etc. This driving out after the promise, a solid argument for universality of grace. References for the whole process. And references for man's miserable condition under curse.

[Remark.—What enlightened orthodox, evangelical reader, does not feel all this to be a con-natural knowledge, now it is declared. And if so to the poor mind of man, born in the dregs of time, and the last darkness and ignorance of debilitated human nature, what must have been the understanding of the primitive post diluvian philosophers, "sons of God," as the Scripture calls them, awakened as it was by pure Adamic traditions! This, in reference to the subject of the ANNOTATION, p. 450, et seq.]

IX.—OF THE NATURAL PROPAGATION OF MAN, IN THIS NOW CURSED FOUR ELEMENTARY WORLD.

Title ambiguous. Bivium, in THREE PRINCIPLES and MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, thus:—"Our author, having hitherto at large treated of the fall and curse, and of man's being driven out of the garden Eden, stands now as it were at the parting of a way, the two different paths whereof do bear the same name indeed, but are nevertheless so much distinguished from each other, as that they cannot be walked in or looked over at once, when yet they may at different times, which he also himself hath done, going through the one in his MYSTERIUM MAGNUM, and through the other in the THREE PRINCIPLES.

In the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM he declareth now further, how this Adamical Tree (for so he styleth the first progenitor of all the earthly generations) hath set forth and displayed himself in branches great and little, both into a numberless multitude as to individual particulars, and multiplicity ment égaré l'esprit de la plupart des Hommes, qu'aujourd'hui l'on prostitue la qualité de PHILOSOPHE, sans le moindre discernement.

On la donne d'abord à des Auteurs de Systèmes, dont les ouvrages pechent par défaut d'Assi-ette, ou de Sol fondamental; en sorte que malgré qu'il soient bien dits, lumineux même, et profonds dans leur genre, il ne peuvent exactement servir qu'à scholastiquer sur les Rotations diverses de plu-Globes éloignés du nôtre, et sur les Attractions, ou Répulsions, diversement aperçues dans les Atomes qui les environnent: Tels sont le célèbre Newton, Descartes, Gassendi, Leibnitz, et quel-ques autres, qui furent assurément bien moins PHILOSOPHES, que ne l'ont été, ou Molière, ou La Fontaine.

L'on accorde pareillement ce Nom incompromis à nos Contemplateurs modernes des Feuilles, des Fleurs, et des Fruits de l'Arbre de l'Univers; lesquels n'en ont aucunement exposé à nos yeux le Principe Animateur. Ils sont pourtant dignes d'être lus et admirés, parcequ'ils ont joint à leurs exactes et curieuses Descriptions tous les Agréments d'un Stile élégamment et nettement concis: Tels sont Buffon et Daubenton, Pluche, les Auteurs Encyclopédistes, et quelques Académici-ens de réputation.

Oui, si la Dissection des corps visibles étoit capable de nous faire connoître parfaitement L'ESPRIT DE VIE QUI LES ANIMA, les Recherches de ces Savans en Curiosités naturelles pourroient alors faire partie de la Philosophie: Mais aucun de leurs ouvrages ne peut nous conduire à discerner l'Essence magnétique des Philosophes; ce Feu magique et sacré que les Vestales durent entretenir avec tant de soin, selon la belle figure de Numa; ce CUPIDO des Latins, qui naquit de la Vénus des Grecs; en un mot, ce vrai Principe de l'Amour naturel des vivans, que la Cabale syl-labique des Grecs m'a fait reconnoître dans leur nom Φιλ-ία, parcequ'il renferme ainsi Φιλίας-ία, AMORIS VIS-ET-VOX. C'est lui dont la Science approfondie a seule pû constituer de tout tems les PHILOSOPHES.

Nos modernes sont ridiculement imbus d'une toute autre signification, prêtée à ce nom par les Ecoles; elles leur ont comme persuadé que la Philosophie doit signifier l'Amour de la Sagesse. De cette badine interprétation naît une Hypothèse encore plus éloignée de la Raison; savoir, que les hommes qui prennent le ton de Moralistes, ou qui se flattent de corriger les vices moraux par leur Ecrits, peuvent, comme Amateurs de la Sagesse, être qualifiés Philosophes.

Ce n'est pas tout. Nos Docteurs scholastiques osent même avancer qu'un homme solitaire, austère, misanthrope, a droit à cette qualification: et je ne sai s'ils ne la conféreront pas bientôt à ces Puristes nouveaux de la langue Française, [A.D. 1771.] qui nous font apparemment remarquer leur extrême Sagesse, lorsqu'ils multiplient leurs efforts pour que nous écrivions comme on prononce aujourd'hui, et comme on ne prononçoit pas autrefois: s'ils ont conçu le grand Dessein de faire par la disparoitre tout vestige de l'Etymologie, Greque et Latine, de nos mots, ils pourront bien y réussir. Hé j'appergois vraiment qu'une si belle Entreprise doit les faire nommer et des SAGES et des SAVANS, selon le Stile de nos Ecoles.

Quoiqu'il en soit, prions tous les Savans modernes dé se rappeler les Regles de la Syntaxe Greque: elles nous enseignent que dans les Noms composés de deux Substantifs, ce fut toujours le Génitif qui dût commencer le mot: Géographie, Géométrie, Astrologie, Astronomie, Théologie, Etymologie, et tant d'autres Composés-Grecs, dont notre Langue a retenu l'usage, en sont preuve. C'est pourquoi si l'on avoit voulu conformer des deux Substantifs Φιλία et Σοφία, un seul nom qui also, as to differences and varieties of tribes, nations, people and languages. In him the mixture of good and evil began, and by eating of the tree of knowledge he was now become himself a living tree of good and evil properties. This mixture therefore, unfolded and showed forth itself in the first beginning of human propagation by Cain and Habel: of whom the firstborn (like as commonly, if not always in the following generations also) was a figure of Adam's own outward, sinful image; and the younger, in whom the woman's seed began to bruise the serpent's head, a figure of that inward, holy, virgin image, which should be restored in the fullness of time, and so a type of Christ, who therefore in conformity unto his antitype, must depart this four-elementary life without having issue therein, and another seed, namely Seth, must have been appointed to Eve instead of Abel. So that now further from these two the propagation of mankind went on. For as to the rest of Adam's sons and daughters not particularised by Moses, they come not into consideration with our author, who says that Moses named only them that in a direct line descended from Adam, and were the chief representatives of times to come, with respect on one side to the kingdom of nature, and on the other to that of grace. From Cain then, who minded nothing but this world, and the natural wonders thereof, a peculiar line or race came forth in seven generations, unto Lamech, which our author calleth the line of wonders; and from Seth another in seven generations also unto Enoch, which he calleth the line of the covenant. And then he declareth also further, how after the flood, by the three sons of Noah, this same Adamical tree spread forth itself again in a threefold kind of men, distinguished chiefly as to their internal threefold signature, wherein they stood in the sight of God; saying generally that, in all the names expressed by Moses, and chiefly of the patriarchs before the flood, both in the line of Cain and of Seth; in the number of the years of their age, wherein they begat that particular son, who is mentioned by name; and further in the years of their following, and of their whole life; and, as to them that lived after the flood, in the number of their sons, called then especially by name, exceeding great mysteries lay hid. And that the whole course of this world's propagation and alteration of nations and kingdoms, their several conditions, their appointed time of rising and falling etc. until the end of time, shall be found and seen plainly therein, in its own due time; when the great branches of this Adamical tree shall no more say they are trees by themselves, but see they are branches of one only tree, all partaking of one and the same sap." [The Candidate will note the particulars of this extract, in reference to the undercurrent ANNOTATION.] Curse, what; explained by declaring two places of Behmen, the latter by a simile of the sun and earth. References, for the curse.

Here a wonderful explanation of Psalm cxxxix., is intended. What Behmen saith of the seed, AURORA xxvi. What in APOLOGY STIEFEL, Text IV. Point ii. 87—135; declared in more short positions. References for some general reflections relating to this matter.

exprimât l'Amour de la Sagesse, la construction de ce mot eut été nécessairement SOPHOPHILIE, et nullement PHILOSOPHIE.

J'ajouterai que ceux qui traduisent le nom Grec Σοφία par Sagesse, n'ont pas senti parfaitement l'expression Latine SAPIENTIA, par laquelle il est fidèlement rendu. SAPIENTIA sort du verbe SAPIO: il exprime l'art de SAVOIR la substance des choses, et ce n'est point là ce que nous entendons par notre Sagesse, dont il n'est du tout pas question dans le nom Grec Φιλοσοφία.

En veut-on une seconde preuve? elle est dictée à toute le monde par le seul bon sens. Chacun de nous sait que les anciens Philosophes furent des Savans, et que la Philosophie fut réellement une Science. On ne dira pas que l'Acte d'aimer la Sagesse fasse une Science réelle, puisque cet Amour est par soi incapable de nous rendre savans: Mais la Connaissance de l'Amour inné dans les Etres, de cet Aiman, ou aimantine Attraction, que le Créateur inséra dans l'Essence de la Nature, afin de perpétuer la durée évolutive de ses Productions diverses, s'annonce de soi même pour devoir être une Science très vaste, très profonde, et très difficile à posséder éminemment. Or voila celle des Philosophes.

Quelqu'un objectera que VOLTAIRE, qui a écrit sur la Philosophie, doit la connaître; et que cet Auteur célèbre en interprète le nom, l'Amour de la Sagesse: Je le sais; mais il n'en résulte d'autre preuve, si non que VOLTAIRE lui-même, ce Génie heureux, si fécond en idées également nerveuses et brillantes, si admirable en sa manière toujours neuve, toujours riche de les exprimer, si révolté contre les Préjugés qui lui ont paru offenser la Raison, n'a jamais réfléchi sérieusement, ni sur le Nom Grec Φιλοσοφία, ni sur la vraie consistance des Ecoles, desquelles seules il a pu tenir cette vicieuse interprétation. Delà il me permettra bien de conclure, que son TRAITE' SUR LA PHILOSOPHIE ne doit avoir nul rapport avec la Science que les Anciens ont caractérisée par ce nom, à laquelle il est constant qu'il ne s'appliqua jamais.

LES LETTRES. — J'étonnerai bien d'avantage mon Lecteur, si, après lui avoir prouvé que la Philosophie n'est nullement connue des Savans de notre siècle, j'ajoute qu'ils ne sont pas plus versés dans les LETTRES, et que c'est uniquement par un langage scholastique qu'ils se prétendent des Gens Lettrés. La preuve suit. [The Candidate will especially note what follows.]

LES LETTRES expriment naturellement par leur nom, les Figures littérales, qui nous servent à coucher sur le papier les Mots d'une Diction. Je vois que l'on nous apprend dans l'enfance à en distinguer les caractères, à les assembler, et à prononcer les mots qu'elles composent, précisément comme on instruit des Perroquets.

Par le résultat de cette Méthode des Ecoles, il arrive que personne ne s'avise plus de réfléchir sur la Forme de chaque LETTRE, d'en rechercher la Signification, et d'en concevoir radicalement les Beautés. Ce sont pourtant les Beautés incluses dans leur Forme, qui les ont fait nommer, au plus juste de tous les titres, les BELLES LETTRES; et c'est qu'il semble que tout le Monde ignore aujourd'hui.

Il est sensible que la Forme, qui fut essentiellement distinctive des LETTRES dans leur origine, n'a pu être indifférente: car il s'agissoit de figurer par elles ce que l'on vouloit faire savoir sans parler, afin de pouvoir instruire les absens, ou la postérité, de ce qui ne pourroit leur être dit de vive voix.

Dans cette vue, comment ne ce seroit on pas étudié à conformer des caractères, qui devins-

The first thing after conjunction of the tinctures is strife and fighting; between what. For what they wrestle, viz. the heavenly Virgin; declared from the tincture. Why no Virgin can be brought forth. Præmonition, (1.) concerning the outward character of male and female. (2.) Concerning the order of all these things.

Female tincture takes the blood, to hold fast, etc.; declared from the generation of water in eternal nature, which, as the water of life, hath all powers.

As in the two tinctures, = delusion; so in the spiritus mundi (even more than in the tincture.) And so in the fiat also; but in both, needful and beneficial. Declared from the sweetness of the blood. Expression of thinking, delighting, etc., explained and vindicated by similes.

All delight turned into anxiety; (1.) by the spiritus mundi bringing in the four elements. Longing. Tincture's withdrawing: and yet remaining. Spiritus mundi more confined in his delusion. (2.) By the blood's being stifled; from whence tumult and uproar. In these two, the first essential death to paradise. A twofold sense and respect. Perpetual continuation of the first Adamic death.

Tincture made false, and full of anguish. Fiat also struck with terror and made to tremble. Signature imprinted in this terror or crack, into all the parties (viz. to disperse) and effects thereof, declared from eternal nature.

Crack or shrack the proper uproar-maker with its tough and hard property. Skin. Tincture and spiritus mundi, flying up also. Head. Brain-pan. Neck. Veins.

According to Behmen, we go here to the generation of life; declared in continual answerableness to eternal nature. Death, the worm to the generation of life. The only difference between the process in eternal nature and this generation of life, from the astral spirit. In the second joyful crack, the beginning of life. The soul thus introduced into the perishable life of this principle; after the same manner, as in eternal nature into the light of the second, but not to the same end. Generation of the tincture. (N.B.) In the light of the Virgin all mysteries may be found: and how this is done in a conjunction of the Virgin's light with the astral.

The rest in forty positions. (1.) In the heart the life is generated; and the life generates the heart again. (2.) In the rising of the life, the three first properties indissolubly knit together. And the tincture is their etc. Why this repeated. (3.) Before the kindling of astral light, no soul. (4.) Soul's dreadful fall, here known. Its light is borrowed; not generated directly forward. (5.) Soul, cause of all the members, viz., internal and principal. The two cracks characterised in the gall. Behmen defended in part, concerning gall above the heart.

(7.) Sum of Behmen's dialogues between the four elements. Fire, heart; water, liver; earth, lungs; air, bladder. (8.) Difficulty in the order, wherein Behmen placeth these four habitations of the elements; resolved in part. (9.) A plain evidence of the soul's most lamentable fall. (10.)

sent, par eux seuls, supplétifs à la Parole? Considérons attentivement la chose, et nous comprendrons qu'il faut par nécessité naturelle que chaque LETTRE soit une Figure, devant représenter à notre œil une idée intelligible.

De là nous jugerons que la première LETTRE des mots radicaux a dû être plus spécialement caractéristique de l'objet exprimé par chacun de ces mots: d'autant qu'elle nous déclare la première idée représentative de l'objet, qui affecta l'Auteur ingénieux des LETTRES, lors qu'il tacha de peindre ce qu'il auroit dit. Mais comme la même idée, représentée en une Figure peut être applicable diversement à plusieurs objets, il fut visiblement nécessaire de conjoindre à cette première LETTRE, une, ou plusieurs autres Figures littérales, pour mieux définir l'objet particulier qu'on exposait à la vue: c'est sans doute ainsi qu'ont été formés les différents mots de l'écriture.

Ceux qui ont vraiment étudié LES BELLES LETTRES, ont dû s'attacher d'abord à connoître positivement les Idees signifiées par la Forme de chacune; ensuite à combiner leurs diverses connexions, pour découvrir ce qui fut symbolisé originairement par les mots que nous appelons RACINES.

Quand on a bien étudié, bien approfondi, bien reconnu l'expresse Signification de tous les mots radicaux d'une langue quelconque, il est censé que l'on doit être devenu très savant; sur tout si l'on a rectifié, ou assuré, la justesse de ses découvertes, en remontant étymologiquement jusqu'à la Langue Mere, dont les Racines de nos Langues sont tirées. Car alors, dès que l'on jette les yeux sur les Lettres qui composent le Nom, ou d'une Plante, ou d'un Minéral, ou de telle autre chose que ce puisse être, l'on aperçoit l'Usage et la Propriété de la Plante, la Nature et la Qualité particulière du Minéral: En un mot, l'on pénètre dans l'Essence de chaque chose, parcequ'il a été naturel de spécifier l'Essence de chaque chose, en la figurant par des Caractères, qui la rendissent sensible à notre conception. Voilà l'unique Science qui puisse constituer un Homme LETTRÉ.

Tous les Philosophes de l'Antiquité posséderent cette connoissance exacte et radicale de leurs Lettres: c'est pourquoi quand ils vouloient écrire de maniere à n'être entendus que par les Savans, ils confabuloient une Histoire, un Songe, ou tout autre Récit fictif, avec des Noms PROPRES qui révéloient, par leurs Caractères littéraux, le Secret des pensées de l'Auteur. [N.B.]

On ne pouvoit conséquemment apprendre les Secrets des PHILOSOPHES, qu'en décomposant les Mots mystiques de leurs ouvrages, qui, s'ils n'étoient pas des Noms propres, étoient toujours écrits en Caractères distinctifs: l'œil de l'Homme LETTRÉ les auroit encore distingués sans cela, mais l'on conçoit sans doute qu'il a toujours fallu être initié dans la signification des Figures littérales, pour, après avoir compris les Noms dont la Décomposition étoit nécessaire, pouvoir s'assurer du sens, que chaque Partie décomposée devoit exprimer.

La Connoissance de ce qui étoit à décomposer dans un Ecrit philosophal a été nommé la Science de la Cabale, parceque le Terme Grec το KABBAAEIN signifie exactement, quod FORE DECOMPONENDUM SAPIENS VISET: c'étoit vraiment un art, qui exigeoit beaucoup de Science, parceque certains mots mystiques ne devoient pas être disséqués par Lettres, mais par Syllabes: de là vient notre distinction de la Grande CABALE, et de la CABALE Syllabique. Celle-ci fut beaucoup plus pratiquée par les Auteurs, tant Chaldéens que Grecs; et nous verrons qu'elle suffit, pour percer dans les Ecrits de Moïse, des Prophetes, et des Evangélistes.

Il y eut des LETTRES d'une forme particulière, que l'on consacra pour les seuls Mysteres de la Loi Egyptienne: Elles furent nommées par les Chaldéens et les Arabes: : : : Divani, c'est-à-Original of hands. Stretching forth, explained and illustrated by a simile. (11.) Stomach; guts. Behind; beneath.

(12.) Establishing of the astral kingdom. Gate, where the children of this world wiser than etc. (13.) The deepest ground of the spiritus mundi's seeking and longing after the eternal Virgin. (14.) A query, how could sun, stars, and elements have known the Virgin in Adam, when they never were in the second principle? is answered. The greatest comfort for a wandering soul. (15.) Most all hitherto, common unto men and beasts; we must rise up higher to see the image of God. Freedom of will. And here Behmen invites all that are hungry and thirsty, etc. (16.) Contents of Behmen's large and excellent discourse.

(17.) Free will considered, but as in an exterior court. Two principles, as two semi-circles, back to back. Flash. Regeneration in a general sense. Original of the will sheweth it to be free. Proved; objections answered etc. Three sayings explained, reconciled, and found agreeing. No constraining power, neither in darkness nor in light. A prevailing power common unto both; transferred from the one to the other by the will. If this in man, it is in vain to seek after it in God. The whole sum and conclusion of all.

(18.) Speech, senses and mind take their original after the same etc. (19.) Before the light of life, the body but a beastial figure etc. (20.) Original of the tongue and eyes. First, and second will. Flash or crack. Rejoicing power. (21.) This latter paradisaical; not so in beasts. Here an irrefutable argument for free will. (22.) Here, the eternal Virgin espoused to the spirit of the soul. Her throne both in the head and heart. (23.) Star in the eyes. (24.) A precious and profitable observation in the near connexion with, and in the great difference of the tongue's original from that of the eyes.

(25.) With the rising of the life, each of the three principles taketh its own light; explained as to each in particular. (26.) Here the tincture also of all the three principles ariseth. Second principle admitteth no light from nature. First and third nearly related. (27.) Tincture is the spirit's habitation, and is three-fold. The first principle's tincture, the terrible light of the sun: an expression here proper and significative, and not contrary to etc. (28.) Tincture of the first principle, compared to the strong might of God; and what its offices and effects are in man. (29.) This tincture of the first principle is that wherein the devil tempteth man, explained particularly as to the fiery bitter and harsh essence. (30.) This now is the first principle with its tincture; but in the light it is another thing. Out of this eternal depth (of first principle) the worm of the soul is originated.

(31.) This is now further demonstrated from the five senses. From whence is thy seeing? (32.) What is that which maketh thy hearing? The sounding of the tincture in man much nobler than that in beasts. (33.) The same of smelling, tasting, and feeling.

dire, de Dieu, ou de la Loi. Les Syriens et les Grecs les appelerent Ἱερογλύφιδες, Caractères sacrés: Nous les nommons d'après eux, les Hiéroglyphes Egyptiennes. Ces Hiéroglyphes ne sont pas difficiles à expliquer, quand on connoît à fond l'Expression des Lettres ordinaires; parceque c'est leur même sens caractérisé par une Figure différente. L'HOMME LETTRE ne doit rien ignorer de tout cela. [much less the Theosophic missionary to the Eastern Colleges.]

VOLTAIRE, et plusieurs autres Ecrivains illustres, qui nous forcent d'admirer leur Génie, et leur Elégance, dans tout ce qui sort de leurs plumes, conviendront assurément, qu'ayant été trompés par nos ECOLES de la Philosophie et des Lettres, ils n'étudierent jamais, ni les belles Lettres que nous tenons des Grecs et des Phéniciens, ni la Science qui seule a pu être appelée Philosophie, suivant ma précédente Explication. Je ne les offense donc point en décidant qu'aucun d'eux n'a pu se dire jusqu'ici, ni PHILOSOPHE, ni LETTRÉ, que scholasticquement. * * * [End of the three first Sections.]

LES FONDEMENTS-DIVINS de la Genese. — J'ai dit que le docte Moyse, digne Emule du Grande Hermès, avoit renfermé dans les Noms, les Années, et les Faits miraculeux de ses PATRIARCHES, les mêmes Documents qu'il avoit reconnus et admirés dans la Théogonie des Egyptiens: pour mettre mon Lecteur en état d'en juger, soulevons les Voiles mystiques, dont LES DIEUX du Paganisme, dont LES PATRIARCHES des Israélites, furent également couverts.

Je suppose qu'on a lû tous les Historiens qui ont écrit sur les Divinités, sur les Loix, et sur les Rites religieux de l'Egypte. Le Phénicien Sanchoniaton les rapporte en Philosophe: je ne sais si Manéthon fut bien au fait des beaux Fragmens qu'il recueillit: Hérodote, en feignant un voyage qu'il avoit fait, dit-il, chez les Egyptiens, pour s'en instruire, me laisse entrevoir qu'il n'avoit pas eu besoin de sortir de son Cabinet, et qu'il n'écrivait pas en aveugle. A l'égard de Diodore, d'Eusebe, de Plutarque, ceux-là ne furent qu'Historiens, sans aucunement posséder les Secrets philosophaux de l'Egypte: Dans les Auteurs qui ont écrit d'après eux, le plus fidele est Du Pin: mais les Recherches de Dorigny ont plus de mérite pour l'article des DIEUX.

L'on voit dans tous, que la Religion des Egyptiens leur prescrivit le même usage de la Circuncision, des Ablutions, des Fêtes divines, et des Sacrifices annuels: le même respect pour le Sacerdoce, pour les Temples, pour les Oracles des Rois, des JUGES, des PROPHETES; les mêmes Commandemens, Sanctions légales, et Conseils moraux, qui firent depuis la Base de la Religion Mosaique.

Je suppose encore, que l'on aura fait attention aux premières Dynasties des Rois Egyptiens; à ces ROIS, DIEUX DU MONDE, dont ils croyoient que leurs Souverains étoient issus: Il est sensible que, conséquemment à cette opinion, ils durent s'estimer la Nation la plus noble de la Terre, et la plus favorisée des Graces de l'Eternel, comme les Juifs se sont dits le Peuple de Dieu.

L'on doit de plus avoir observé, que, suivant les Chroniques divines et royales des Egyptiens, l'Origine de ce Royaume remontoit à celle de la Création du Monde: et que les Israélites croyoient pareillement avoir, dans leurs Annales, une Filiation non interrompue depuis le premier Homme créé.

J'en conclus préliminairement, vû que les deux Systèmes de Législation d'Hermès et de Moyse sont uniformes dans l'Objet légal, et dans les Principes radicaux, "Que ces deux Philosophes n'ont pu nécessairement enseigner sur DIEU et sur LA NATURE, que les mêmes Vérités, et par tant la même Origine de l'Univers, la même, une, et perpétuelle Religion, malgré l'extreme dissemblance

(34.) The sum of Behmen's Sixteenth Chapter, and his considerable preface. (35.) Wisdom's speech: mine is the light.. thy desire after my virtue, is my own drawing etc. (36.) Mind is the desiring will. The sharp power not immediately in the will, but in its piercing sight. (37.) Original and generation of blood. Why eating of blood forbidden unto man.

(38.) Five senses considered as five counsellors. In the generation of our words all three principles concerned. (39.) Original of the great difference of men, chiefly as to mind, will, tincture, etc. (40.) The contents of the rest of the Sixteenth Chapter; all plain, in eleven short positions.

X.—OF MAN'S REGENERATION, THROUGH THE BLOOD AND DEATH OF CHRIST.

This Behmen's only aim. The meanest need not complain of obscurity; the strongest will find strong meat enough etc. Excuse of this writer, who only writes according to the measure of his experience. Behmen's places in great abundance.

Some general observations. (1.) Regeneration, what it presupposes; and what it implies; and what it is. (2.) Name regeneration, ambiguous: as to the whole man, better restoration. As to the body and exterior soul, better conquering, and keeping under. As to the soul, better renovation. Only the spirit's glorious body, properly regenerated. An objection, If the soul cannot etc., because its process cannot be repeated; how can the spirit, whose generation wholly dependeth upon that process? is answered. These differences not made in imagination by a nice and superficial curiosity, but etc.

(3.) Regeneration taken variously. One transaction, the regeneration properly: and this again in a two-fold sense. Behmen's saying, None regenerated, who do not understand etc., explained and defended.

(4.) The whole work winding, and turning inwards. (5.) Beginning, placed differently in various respects. Progress, putting on Jesus Christ more and more, as to his death and life. Consummation, though expressed by great variety, a re-union of the tinctures. (6.) Perfection, how far attainable in this life, and how far not. King's daughter all glorious, within. (7.) The most considerable agent on man's side, declared as in opposition to his generation. Vine and branches.

The great and principal transaction, which was properly the fall, at the end of forty days. And what here this great and principal transaction is, expressed variously. Conformity to the life, and to the death of Christ.

From hence is plain, what was said above of soul and spirit. Soul but renewed. The sensibility of the soul's generation can be repeated. How the soul nevertheless also rightly said to be regenerated, explained from its connexion with the will.

Of what is Christ in us? in eighteen positions. Like as, What is regeneration? so this also is generally answered but by halves. (1.) By saying, we know not what Christ is in us, we lay down a testimony against ourselves. (2.) He that hath . . . need not be told . . . but cannot declare it so, etc. Behmen's intent in writing.

(3.) Not only the Spirit of Christ, and not only the light, but also the new light's body must des deux Chronologies, et des deux Cultes extérieurs.¹⁷

J'avoue que ma conclusion est combattue par un Préjugé très général: J'avoue encore que ce Préjugé doit paroître fondé, tant que l'on ne voit pas clairement l'IDÉNTITÉ DE DOCTRINE que j'annonce exister au milieu de la Diversité des deux Histoires et des deux Cultes: mais si je la prouve, le Doute cessera; et il ne s'agit pour cet effet, que de dégager la Substance dogmatique des doubles Figures, qui nous l'ont voilée si diversement.

Commençons par approfondir quelle fut cette Substance dogmatique dans la Religion Egyptienne; Religion si belle, que non seulement le Pays, entier des Missorains, qui comprenoit la Thébade et l'Éthiopie avec notre Égypte moderne, mais que l'Arabie, la Nubie, et le reste de l'Afrique; que la Syrie, la Chaldée, la Babylonie, la Perse, et l'Inde dans l'Asie; que la Grèce, l'Italie, et les autres Pays méridionaux de l'Europe, la regurent unanimement comme LOI DIVINE, à la vue du Texte merveilleux que le grand Hermès intitula, par 4 Lettres Arabes, : : : : Thooth. Leur signification étoit DEUS IGNIS—IGNIS DEUS, c'est-à-dire, [Heb. xii. 29.] Dieu est pur-Feu—le pur-Feu est Dieu.

Premier DOGME.—Tout Egyptien devoit croire qu'il y avoit UN DIEU SUPRÊME, sans Nom, parcequ'aucun Nom ne pouvoit le définir, et sans commencement. Les Qualifications de ce Dieu suprême étoient, le seul Incréé, le vrai Vivant, le Dieu inconnu, l'Esprit Pere de tous les Dieux. Pour l'invoquer, on se servoit du terme: Lah, ou: Allah, sous lequel il est encore aujourd'hui adoré dans tout l'Orient; mais dont l'Expression littérale est ESPRIT-PIERRE: elle designa l'Esprit divin, comme étant la Pierre fondamentale de tout.

L'on employoit pour le caractériser la Lettre Arabe, qui se prononce o, ou, et u: cette Lettre est un Symbole du pur-Feu. L'on y ajoutoit aussi la Lettre: KH, correspondante au X des Grecs, par où l'on formoit: Khou: il existe encore parmi les Musulmans un respect infini pour ce Nom divin, lequel est répété, en invoquant l'Etre suprême avec Enthousiasme jusqu'à cent et une fois, par une sorte de leurs Prêtres appelés les Derviches-Crieurs. La signification hiéroglyphique de cette seconde Lettre est ESPRIT-FORT, de manière que les deux Lettres ensemble disent pur-Feu de l'Esprit-fort, conséquemment de Dieu.

D'autres conjointoient à la Lettre symbolique du pur-Feu, la Lettre: a, qui, comme première Lettre de l'Alphabet, annonçoit le Principe: ainsi: aou exprimoit FEU PRINCIPE, ou pur-Feu qui est notre Principe.

Mais la Figure du Dieu suprême, qui paroît avoir été la plus fameuse d'abord chez les Arabes Missorains, et ensuite chez tous les autres Peuples du Paganisme, ce fut de doubler la Lettre: u, en rendant la première, consonne, et d'y conjoindre le mot Arabe: Elkhan, qui veut dire, le Souverain, ou le Monarque: à l'égard des deux premières Lettres, elles signifioient Feu du pur-Feu: et comme ce FEU DU PUR-FEU est celui qui nous anime, il a été naturel de le reconnoître pour le KHAN, ou le Monarque universel: c'est ce qui fut exprimé par le Nom emblématique de: Vuelkhan, lequel se prononçoit, par l'Elision ordinaire, Vulkhan, et dont les Phéniciens ont fait leur Dieu du Feu, VULCANUS.

L'on ne sera pas surpris, à présent que l'on connoît radicalement cette antique Figure Egyptienne de L'ETRE INCREÉ, du Témoignage qui nous est rendu par les Historiens de l'Égypte, que le premier Temple de ce Royaume avoit été dédié au Dieu VULCAN: c'est comme s'ils disoient que sa Dédicace fut, AU FEU DU PUR-FEU, AU MAÎTRE DU MONDE. On voit que pour se concilier avec be mentioned in the answer. Before the conformity to Christ's death, we are not actually his members; though we may be his. (4.) When this brought forth we may say, this is Christ in us. A passage of Behmen, where both taken together.

(5.) If we will say how that which is in us can bear the name of Christ? we must first consider Christ's glorified body, and the first and second Adam, both as to distinction and union. (6.) Christ had a four elementary, and a one elementary body, proved. Is opposite unto the first Adam, yet also the first Adam himself; explained. (7.) Why he must have had them both, at once. (8.) His now glorified body of the same figure and stature etc. (9.) Not so vast as to fulfil etc; and one element not so shut up etc.

(10.) One element, and four elements considered as unformed, and as formed. (11.) This doth not make two bodies; yet must be considered distinctly, and why.

(12.) From hence the dispute, concerning the omnipresence of Christ's body, can easily be decided. (13.) This omnipresence, maketh not the one element to be God, nor equal unto God.

(14.) Presence and omnipresence, relative expressions. As attributed to God, it is (1.) a central omnipresence; explained. (2.) An omnipresence without extension. Explained, and shown that neither this nor that applies to the one element.

(15.) This one element put on, makes none to be Christ, but only his member. So would it have been as to the first Adam, etc.: and so it is still with the four elements. (16.) Difference between Christ's glorified body, and bodies of the saints: also between themselves.

(17.) A question, Whether this new body be natural to the soul, etc., answered distinctly. Such a body was natural to her, in one sense; but not a propriety in every sense. It is not natural now; explained and proved. The twenty-four elders own it so. Simile of fire and iron. (18.) For a conclusion; the first and second Adam both within us, in war and opposition. A good and sure way, to find out what Christ is in us, by considering not only what the first Adam was, as to himself, before the fall, but also what he now is in us. Like as the first Adam could do us no hurt, if he were not within us; so the Second cannot do us any profit, if he be only without us.

XI.—OF THE ETERNAL WORD'S BECOMING FLESH; OR OF THE PURE IMMACULATE CONCEPTION AND INCARNATION OF OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST, IN THE WOMB OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY.

A fundamental position, That the restoration of the first Adam could not be effected, but by the eternal Word incarnate; and that the understanding of the second Adam is inseparable from understanding of the first: demonstrated.

Of the blessed Virgin. Mary signifies, a deliverance out of the valley of miseries and calamities; explained. And that such a thing must have been done with her, before the incarnation etc., demonstrated.

(1.) Against Θεοτόκος, in the Greek church; and what he called her the mother of. (2.)

tous les Peuples, il ne s'agit que d'entendre leurs Langues et leurs Figures: d'ailleurs chacun devoit sentir, au seul nom de DIEU DU FEU, qu'il n'a pu être approprié par les Philosophes qu'à l'Etre éternel que nous adorons; parceque toute Lumière et toute Vie ont nécessairement un Feu pour Principe: ainsi, qui dit, LE DIEU DU FEU, dit, Le Dieu de toute Vie et de toute Lumière.

Ceci m'oblige à développer la Fable Phénicienne, selon laquelle nous voyons ce même VULKHAN des Egyptiens, être qualifié Fils du Dieu JUPITER, et de la Déesse, JUNO, Mari de la Déesse VENUS et Fabricateur des Foudres divines, qu'il remet à la disposition de JUPITER.

Mon Lecteur sait sans doute que JUPITER, annoncé dans son Histoire comme le Roi des Cieux, a été un Symbole très expressif de l'Esprit de l'Air: il n'ignore pas que l'Air contient un Feu vivifiant, qui est vraiment incorporé dans sa Substance: de-là, comme l'Esprit qui regne dans l'Air, distribuée universellement ce FEU-DIVIN dont nous sommes tous vivifiés, il mérita bien d'être nommé le Pere de la Vie, ou le Pere du Dieu du Feu, qui seul est la Vie de tout Etre vivant. Ce n'est qu'une répétition de ce que son nom exprime, puisque Ἰου Πατήρ signifie le Pere de l'Unique, c'est-à-dire, de Dieu.

Le nom de JUNO, qui lui est donné pour Femme, signifie exactement la Pensée de Dieu, en Grec Ἰου Νόος, MENS UNICI: dans le fait si l'Esprit de l'Air (que les Philosophes nomment plus communément l'Esprit de l'Univers) n'agit que selon la Volonté de l'Etre-unique, ou de Dieu, ainsi que nous n'en saurions douter, il faut bien que LA PENSÉE DE DIEU soit comme mariée avec cet Esprit aérien; et l'on conçoit, à l'égard du Feu-vital, dont ce même Esprit est appelé le Pere, qu'il n'y a que LA PENSÉE DE DIEU qui puisse naturellement l'avoir enfanté.

De ce que Vénus fut la Déesse de la Génération, la nécessité de son Mariage avec LE DIEU DU FEU se rend sensible; car le pur-Feu de l'Eternel est seul capable d'animer l'Esprit génératif des Créatures. Enfin comme les Éclairs et les Tonnerres ont toujours le Dieu du Feu pour Principe, on sent que Vulcan doit nécessairement forger, et administrer à Jupiter tous ses Foudres.

Chacun doit appercevoir, au milieu de ce Tissue Théogonique des Phéniciens, une Instruction philosophale pour les vivans: on leur enseigne par Allégorie, que quoique le pur-Feu de l'Essence divine soit la seule source de la vie et de l'animation de tous les Êtres, nous ne recevons néanmoins notre Esprit de Vie, émané de son Feu animateur, qu'après qu'il a pris une Substance élémentaire dans le Corps-spirituel de notre Nature-humaine; et cela parceque les seuls Elémens-humains peuvent nous insinuer, nous rendre capables de sentir, et nous faire conserver sa Divine impression.

Observons que, dans la Loi de Moïse, l'Etre supreme conserva les Qualifications Egyptiennes de seul-Incréé, de Vivant-nommé, et d'Esprit-Pierre; Moïse y ajouta seulement qu'il étoit LE SEUL DIEU. Il ne vouloit changer à la loi d'Hermès que la Pluralité de ses Dieux, qui faisoit diriger, par le peuple ignorant, une Adoration due au seul Créateur, vers des Êtres qui ont été constamment créés: c'est pourquoi il ingloba, dans sa Figure historique d'ISRAËL fils d'ABRAHAM, la même instruction qu'il avoit découverte sous l'Embleme de VULCAN fils de JUPITER. Mon Lecteur va le concevoir.

Le nom Arabe: : : : Ab-raham signifie l'Eau de Miséricorde, et le Pere de la Miséricorde; car en même tems que le mot: : : : Ab est expressif de l'Eau, il correspond aussi dans cette langue au

Against the Roman idolatry; and that he (Behmen) exalted her much higher than either, etc. No mediatrix, and why.

(3.) Against Stiefel, Meths, and Tilkin, concerning Mary's perfection. Perfection differs from perfection, so far as the one element from the four elements. Explained and considered in the person of Christ, whose perfection and imperfection is shown. Not a vain curiosity. Further demonstration by considering what the curse is; and that the four elements are in a sense the curse, etc. Stiefel's perfection rejected; Behmen's, in union of two tinctures, asserted. But what is this to the husk, the residence of sin, the tomb of sin. Difference between the second Adam and all the saints. I counsel thee to buy of me etc. Mary's perfection by faith, rejected. Tilken's dream of Mary's high descent, refuted.

(4.) Against (the learned) Weigel, Schwenckfeld, and Felgenhauer, of Mary's virginity. Their opinion greatly different from Tilken's; wherein, and how. No virgin in this world; and no male or female in the paradisaical world; and why. They may be joined in one person, but without mixture. This without mixture takes all Weigel's scruple away. A re-union of Sophia and Adam must have been made; but how, and by what means? Answered and explained, From the beginning of the promise to Eve, till Mary; all without mixture. The same more evidenced by considering what person the second Adam was to be. Sophia without Mary could not; and Mary without Sophia could not etc. What virgin Mary was, before the blessing. Yet in greater purity than Eve, before known by Adam. What virgin Sophia is, declared in Behmen's simile of the macrocosm. Conjunction between Mary and Sophia and the manner thereof; not from without, not with her outward essences in flesh and blood, but etc. References for all these things.

What JE-SUS, and what CHRIS-TUS each by itself, and what both together signify in Behmen's natural language. In each the Deity and humanity individually connected; and Behmen owns, all that can be said of the one, may of the other also, but etc. Reason and occasion of Behmen's large discourse, and manifold distinction between Jesus and Christ. And he defended in his nicety and superfluity. All reduced to three heads: (1.) distinction between Deity and humanity. (2.) Humanity, taken from man, and that brought from heaven. (3.) Christ as promised, and as incarnated. And explained, with application to five errors of Stiefel. References.

Behmen's Treatise of the INCARNATION, Part I, Chapter x, translated, in a construction of things, rather than of words.

The chiefest thing for understanding the incarnation lies in due distinction between that body, or flesh and blood he took from Mary, and that he brought down etc. That former known too mot Grec 'Αββὰ, Père. L'on apperçoit sans doute qu'à la faveur de ces deux significations, Moïse rassembla dans son personnage d'ABRAHAM, les mêmes idées que représentoit la Fable du Dieu JUPITER.

Or, en donnant à son ABRAHAM un fils appelé : : : : : ISA-HAC, comme ce nom Arabe signifie le vrai Sauveur, il nous figure aussi sensiblement par lui, que la Mythologie par le Dieu VULCAIN, ce même Feu pur, cette même divine Essence, qui peut seule, après s'être vêtue d'un Corps humain, (pris dans la substance de l'Air) opérer la Vie et l'Animation de tous les hommes; ce Feu divin que l'Esprit de l'Air leur administre, est bien à chaque instant leur Sauveur véritable, puisque sans lui l'on cesserait d'exister.

Second DOGME. — Les Egyptiens devoient croire qu'il y avoit Sept autres Dieux immortels, mais non pas incréés. On leur expliquoit, "Que ceux-ci avoient été créés par le Dieu supreme, pour être éternellement les Créateurs, Directeurs, et Modérateurs particuliers de tous les Etres mortels;" en conséquence, une Loi prescrivait "qu'ils fussent honorés, chacun leur jour, alternativement."

Cette Loi fut d'autant plus sage, que par leur Honoration septenaire, Hermès réussit à déterminer l'usage d'un moyen facile, et invariablement sûr, pour calculer à perpétuité la Révolution du Temps: chacun appercevra que je parle de l'Etablissement des Semaines, adopté depuis par tous les peuples de l'Univers, et dans lequel nous voyons encore à présent, (par les noms des Divinités payennes qui distinguent chacun des Sept jours) la primitive distinction des Sept DIEUX créés immortels, selon la Religion d'Egypte.

[The following striking passage, so coincident with the writer's own inferences heretofore presented, occurs in Behmen's MYST. MAG. xii. 19. Treating of the seven days, in the creation, and their respective names, he says, "It is very likely that the ancient wise men [the original or primitive post-deluvian philosophers.] have understood somewhat thereof in the light of nature, which they have kept secret and mystical, rather deciphering it by figures than clearly explaining it. And it is to be seen in the names of the seven planets, that they have for certain understood the same, in that they have given them names according to the seven properties of nature; which do so wholly agree and accord, as well with the creation as nature, that methinks [N.B.] they have in part understood the ground of the creation aright, seeing the names of the planets have their rise and derivation so fully, and punctually out of the language of nature: but the reason why it hath not been made clear, plain, and manifest, is (as before mentioned) because of the false magic that it might remain hidden unto the artists of juggling and collusion in nature, by reason of the great abuse; wherefore we also shall still let it so remain, and yet hint enough, etc. etc."]

Moïse a trouvé ce Calcul hebdomadaire si utile, et les Personages-divins, qui en distinguent les jours, si véridiques, que pour les conserver dans sa Loi, il a imaginé fort ingénieusement 7 Jours d'une Création mystique de notre Univers, par laquelle il a commencé son livre de la Genèse. J'en ferai connoître le Mystère et la Vérité dans la Section qui doit suivre celle-ci. [Herein, a false notion.]

Les 7 DIEUX créés pour être immortels, furent appelés Dieux-principaux, par la raison que leur Essence les constituoit nos Principes naturels. Il est bon d'observer sur le Chiffre 7, qui semble ici ne désigner que leur nombre, que sa Figure est un Hiéroglyphe Egyptien; c'est-à-dire, un CARACTERE SAINT, ou consacré dans l'origine des Caracteres littéraux inventés en Egypte, pour symboliser la VIE: c'est pourquoi la lettre Z des Grecs, qui n'expose à nos yeux que le redoublement du Chiffre 7, est employée comme lui dans leur Ecriture, et pour caracteriser le nombre SEPT, et pour annoncer la VIE, en qualité d'initiale du verbe Ζάω, vivo. Il arrive de là que l'Expression figurée par les 7 Dieux-principaux promettoit exactement, sous des Divinités feintes, une much : this latter cannot be known, except, etc., nor be declared so, as that etc. Order of consideration : (1.) Of the outward body. (2.) Of his soul and spirit. (3.) Of this heavenly immortal body.

Of Christ's outward body. Behmen's saying, Christ never had a quite earthly body, altogether alike unto ours, explained, reconciled with Scripture, and he vindicated. Why Christ must have been a male, three reasons ; a plain, a deeper, and deepest.

Of Christ's soul and spirit. They that say, Christ had no soul, but his body was animated by the Deity, pitied rather than refuted. Tilken's opinion, of a soul from heaven, convinced of absurdity. And some sayings of Behmen explained ; and shown, that they favour not Tilken's opinion. As the soul of Christ a human soul ; so his spirit, a human spirit.

Soul and spirit commonly not distinguished ; or if, the spirit of the soul confounded with the outward spirit. Consideration what they are in us, from the two eternal principles. Soul, what ; and spirit, what. Spirit only can dwell essentially in the second principle ; explained. The soul introduced into the light-world, significant enough in a popular sense : but better—shall be brought in union with the light-world. Soul as spirit not capable of etc., but all its capacity dependeth wholly upon its union with the spirit.

The soul, a true representative of the Father ; the spirit of the Son. The soul's figure, a sphere or globe with a cross through it. A fiery eye ; explained. A tree. A human figure. But the first only, without relation to this or that, says what the soul is in itself. Explained, both as to cross and globe.

Historical relation of N. S. [This most extraordinary narrative is recounted after a somewhat diversified manner in the biography of Gichtel, a work published many years after this account was penned. Freher, however, being a correct man, this account might serve to modify that ; and both be of profit, to the rightly qualified reader.] The spirit's proper figure, a human figure ; and why.

Differences between soul and spirit considered, in the simile of a flower out of the earth ; and in that of fire and light. Further in ten short positions. (1.) The simile of fire and light, defective. (2.) Because in the consideration of this, our object but one principle, whereas in considering soul and spirit must be two. (3.) In the spirit (not soul) the image of God. (4.) Spirit, an image of the soul. Soul not an image, but a central fire. (5.) Spirit the only living image, both with respect to God and to the soul. (6.) Soul cannot feel itself, and why. (7.) Spirit preserved by the soul's standing steadfast in etc., and preserveth the soul again. (8.) Spirit dependeth wholly upon the soul's free flame ; but not reciprocally. (9.) Spirit cannot be spirit without the soul, but soul etc. (10.) Soul loseth only its flame. Simile in outward fire ; and instance of Lucifer franche exposition des Principes qui doivent à perpétuité constituer la Vie, ou l'existence animée de toutes les Créatures sujettes à la Mort.

La doctrine qui les concernoit disoit ; " Qu'ils parcouroient sans cesse le Monde ; qu'ils y apparoissent aux yeux des hommes, tantôt sous une Figure, tantôt sous une autre ; que tout le bien, ou le mal, qui peut arriver aux Êtres mortels, dependoit entièrement de leur Concours bénéfole, ou de leur Décision contraire : enfin, que quand nôtre sentence de Mort étoit prononcée par eux, elle étoit irrévocable." Voilà pourquoi leur Tribunal souverain portoit le nom cabalistique φά-τυμ, indiquant φάτον τυμμα, DICTUM VERBERATIO : Mon Lecteur y appercvra sans peine la vraie origine du Dieu que les Phéniciens établirent depuis comme Maître absolu des Destinées, et qui fut révéé sous le nom ΦΑΤΥΜ.

Mais pour lui faire distinguer que toute la Doctrine Egyptienne sur les 7 Immortels, appelés Dieux-principaux, étoit naturelle et indubitable, il faut manifester leur Essence.

Les deux premiers que le grand Hermès nomma OSSIRIS et ISIS, et qu'il déclara Mari et Femme, représenterent * * *."

And so the author proceeds, explaining cabalistically the nature of the seven deities, with numerous particulars incidental to his subject : in which, however, he is for the chief part, wide at sea ; as must invariably be the case with every one, however ingenious, who attempts to unfold the mysteries of truth and nature, without being possessed of a thorough knowledge of the principles and primary developments of truth and nature, as opened in Behmen. And thence, through the Seven Days of the Creation—Adam and Eve—the Children of Adam—the Ark of Noah—the Deluge—Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. And so in the Second Volume, with respect to the fundamental verities of Christianity. [It was intended to have extended these interesting extracts further ; but the above will probably suffice for the present purpose.]

After noting down the substance of the remarks forming the commencement of the present parenthetical ANNOTATION, (p. 450,) which were the result of meditations upon the first eleven chapters of Genesis, and other portions of Scripture, according to the inevitable ground, and the natural and evangelical flow of things ; (these indeed assisted by occasional friendly conferences and disputations with a devout and enlightened friend,)—after so doing, we say, and then being led to the last mentioned treatise "La Vérité," the writer hereof went round to the booksellers to inquire if any works extant upon the most ancient magic cabalistic learning and philosophy, such as that, in which (the Scriptures inform us) Moses was educated ; whereupon he met with "Maurice's Indian Antiquities, etc.," and also "Sir William Jones's Works." The perusal of these volumes, it is perhaps needless to say, afforded him equal surprise and gratification, as most felicitously confirming the justness of his original inferences and presumptions expressed in the above-mentioned remarks, and as offering a further clue to the resolution of the grand question, which constitutes the desideratum of the present day's christianity, theology and philosophy, viz., the true means for the conversion of the intellectual unbelieving nations. To these works therefore, with the references they contain, the candidate is here remitted.

As, likewise, to the second volume of Tryon's "Way to Health and Happiness," entitled, "The Knowledge of a Man's Self, the surest Guide to the True Worship of God, and Good Government of the Mind and Body : in Opposition to Tradition, Custom and Bigotry. 8vo. 1703." Tryon was a pure, unsophisticated natural philosopher, and religionist, founding all his considerations upon the sure, simple, original principles of nature, afresh revealed in Behmen. And in this work will be discovered, the secret or ground of the purifications, mortifications, austerities, and other religious rites of the ancient and later oriental devotees, as described in Maurice, and other writers and banished out from the fire, the great city of the Almighty Father. Elucidation of what easily might be misapprehended, concerning the spirit of this world's dethroning the spirit of the soul. The soul's losing its burning flame, with respect to the second principle explained, by simile of the oil of a lamp. The unregenerated soul's spirit. The regenerated soul's two-fold spirit. From hence the soul's warfare.

A large digression, in forty-four positions. (1—6.) Mind, in general; and etc. (7—8.) Senses and thoughts, in, from etc.—(9—15.) Will, and its generation. (16—18.) Will—spirit. Two now. (19—20.) Science of the groundless will. Declared by a simile.—(21—23.) Imagination, between will and will. (24—25.) Desire and imagination, two collateral branches. (26.) Hunger.—(27—33.) Understanding, reason, subtly. (34—35.) Understanding, its original, and residence. (36—37.) Reason's original and residence. (38.) Reason distinguishes not man from beasts. (39.) Behmen, no dispenser of reason. (40.) Consequences of this axiom, Reason cannot know itself.—(41—44.) Phantasy, which captivated Lucifer.

Generation of the spirit, in a twofold description. (1.) Faith is originally but a will, this will is a seed etc. (2.) The spiritual generation is done in nothing, or by a real progress from something into nothing. Explanation. Losing and keeping of the soul. The spirit is nothing, when the soul its own something. This nothing here more significant, than all the somethings that could be named; its pregnant signification on both sides. Herein the only key to the understanding Behmen: from this ground he hath written etc. These two descriptions are of one thing; but so, that in the first the whole process is declared; and in the second, reflected especially upon that great transaction etc.

Analogy between the generation of eternal nature, and generation of the spirit in the soul. Flame. Liberty. Conjunction. Two-fold crack. No annihilation. Falling back; into nothing; into the hands of God—of the living God. All this expressed in the language of Teutonicus. First crack the basis of everlastingness. Woman in travail hath sorrow, etc., here eminently applicable.

This generation of the spirit, not so applicable to the spirit of Christ, though he went through the same process. May be called rather—an entrance of his spirit into the light world. Further explained from, His disciples followed after him in regeneration.

Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit. (1.) What spirit this is spoken of. (Leah, Rachel.) Plain, from saying my spirit. (2.) What this commending signifies. Christ's death, directly opposite to the first Adam's death; declared as to several considerable particulars. This commending, not chiefly a petition to be protected against infernal powers; but a delivering the whole image etc. Spirit himself protector to the soul.

(3.) Why not, my soul, nor my soul and spirit, but spirit only? The reason given by saying, The spirit went up into heaven, the soul down into hell, and the body in the grave; is exploded, and shown, what here was separated. That the soul alone could not have been a plague unto hell: and for want etc. And the true reason is declared. To say, The spirit had soul and body under his wings, is much, but not yet all. The soul was in the Father's hands already. Hell more properly in the soul, than soul in hell. Soul in hell so properly, as before hell in soul. By taking in the spirit, hell could no more be in soul, much less the soul in hell. Why no mention of body; could be made out, chiefly from the first forty days in paradise, and the forty after the resurrection; but etc.

historians; and doubtless, also, of the Mosaic purifications, and the doctrines relating to them; being indeed, nothing else but true natural religion, dictated by right reason.

The next extract we propose to insert, in addition to what have been above presented, is from a modern French publication, written in defence of a celebrated work (to which attention is here called, though it is appreciable only by the duly qualified reader), entitled "Les Soirées de Saint Pétersbourg," against a criticism on it in the Paris "Journal des Débats," of the first of August, A.D., 1821. We may likewise mention in this place, among other French treatises, deserving of perusal, "La Philosophie Divine, appliquée aux Lumières Naturelle. Magique, Astrale, Surnaturelle, Céleste et Divine; ou aux Immuables Vérités que Dieu a révélées de Lui-même et de ses Œuvres, dans le Triple Miroir analogique de l'Univers, de l'Homme, et de la Révélation Ecrite. Par Kaleph Ben Nathan. (3 vols.) Paris. 1793." Also, "L'Ombre Idéale de la Sagesse Universelle (in Latin and French). Paris, Chez Madlle. Jablier, Sœur du R. P. François-Marie (the author), 1679," which is a most ingenious and erudite compendium of universal evangelical philosophy. The extract from the "Opuscules Théosophiques, par un Ami de la Sagesse, Paris, 1822," is then as follows:—

" J'aborde les observations critiques de l'article, sur la théorie des nombres, effleurée par M. de Maistre, et en particulier sur sa prédilection pour le nombre trois, dont on a cru profiter pour lui jeter un ridicule. Quelques plaisanteries plus ou moins bien tournées, n'ébranleront point une théorie transcendante, consacrée par nos livres saints comme par la philosophie des plus grands philosophes de l'antiquité. L'ironie ne fut jamais une réfutation; la légèreté adopte cette arme fragile, mais la légèreté seule en reçoit impression. Si l'auteur de l'article dont je relève les erreurs croyait au christianisme, ce nombre trois lui paraîtrait respectable, comme symbole du dogme sacré de la Trinité. Allez donc et intruisez toutes les nations, les baptisant au nom du Père, du Fils et du Saint-Esprit. S. Math. xxviii. 19. S'il adoptait la Genèse, il ne devrait point s'étonner d'entendre dire que l'homme porte l'empreinte de cette Trinité, créé qu'il est, à l'image et à la ressemblance de Dieu."

On pardonne aux savans modernes de vouloir tout soumettre au calcul; on convient avec les Newtonniens, que la nature entière est régie par des lois mathématiques; on tombe d'accord, enfin, que tout l'univers a nombre, poids et mesure; pourquoi donc ne pas vouloir passer cette théorie à un apologiste de la religion, puisqu'on l'adopte avec les physiiciens? L'objection me semble plausible. Mais, me dira-t-on, M. de Maistre applique ses nombres, et en particulier son numéraire chéri, non seulement à l'organisation du monde, mais au moral, à l'âme humaine, à la grammaire, aux arts et aux gouvernemens, et il faut avouer, (dit l'auteur de l'article,) que M. de Maistre développe cette singulière idée par quelques considérations très belles, ensuite par d'autres subtiles, puis enfin, par les rapprochemens les plus bizarres. La critique est toujours, comme on le voit, adoucie par un éloge; mais comment une théorie que l'on peut si bien développer et ap-

Of Christ's heavenly immortal body. Christ's glorified personal body. Universal body of the Eternal Word. When Christ considered relatively, as head of the church, both must be taken together; demonstrated. Christ's personal body, and bodies of the saints, must be one, and yet distinct. Distinction, wherein; oneness, wherein. Explained largely from what the first Adam should have propagated, if he had not wandered out; and what he hath instead thereof actually propagated.

What body the Lord gave in his last supper. Not the outward visible; proved. Not only his universal, but also personal body, implied in this giving; proved. The manner of this giving illustrated by simile, of the sun's giving substance, growth, life, etc., to plants and trees. But, because of a defect in this, another simile must be joined, of the sun's producing its own visible image in a glass.

The former simile unfolded, in twelve positions. The sun's generation, and manner thereof, and the generation of eternal nature, must be understood; for upon both this and that, all weight and emphasis depends. (1.) The visible sun, an emblem of Christ's glorified personal body. (2.) That which without the sun's central place, answers to the universal body of the eternal Word. (3.) Upon what account called universal body of spiritus mundi, and of eternal Word, rather than of sun, and of Christ. (4.) Upon what account rightly also, universal body of the sun, and of Christ. (5.) In every place without the sun, that very same which in the central place; so etc. (6.) If it were not so, there would be no reciprocal communication, neither in this third, nor in the second principle. (7.) Sun, the only glorified place, though all partakes of that glory; so also, etc. (8.) Without the sun, nothing but death in this principle. Sun only hath the key; so also etc. (9.) Sun raiseth life, in a process answering its own production on the fourth day; so also, etc. (10.) In this process, sun raises its own image in the tincture; so also etc. (11.) Sun communicates not its personal body, yet without this nothing can be effected in the universal body; so also etc. (12.) A concurrence of the plants and trees with the sun is required; so also etc.

Query, Whether Christ as to the humanity, a creature, or uncreated? Answered, (1.) with respect to them that own him a Son of man. (2.) With respect to them that insist only upon his being the Lord from heaven, (as Weigel, Schwenckfeld, and others,) is answered, by this distinction between his personal and universal body. In from heaven, the universal body tacitly implied. As to that, he is a creature; but as to this, uncreated; and reason, why."

[End of the Summary of the Contents (commencing p. 461) of the first Five Volumes of Freher's DISSERTATIONS UPON BEHMEN'S CENTRAL PHILOSOPHY.]

POSTSCRIPT—in modification or erasure of that on p. 460. Freher, it appears, resided with the Rev. Mr. Waple up to the time of his decease, which event occurred A.D. 1712. It further appears, that the serial representations of Behmen's philosophy and divinity, a Summary of the Contents of which has just been presented, were composed by Freher between the years 1699 and 1710, and that they were the first of the theosophical productions of his pen. These Discourses, with those commencing p. 259 and ending p. 326, (or rather the originals of the latter, for these were printed from Law's own MS. amended copy,) were doubtless occasioned by the Author's desire to represent Behmen's writings in their proper light, and by the objections of incipient searchers after recondite truth (whom he deemed worthy to be assisted in their inquiries) to certain particulars therein, not duly apprehended by them. That this was the case with respect to the Rev. E. Waple, there can puyer, serait-elle chimérique? M.A., ne devrait il pas comprendre que le ternaire doit se retrouver partout, puisque la nature, tous les êtres qui la constituent, tous les faits qu'elle nous présente, ne sont que les résultats variés de l'existence d'une trinité incréée, ou la manifestation des puissances d'un être tri-un?

S'il se trouvait que les trois personnes de la Trinité chrétienne fussent trois facultés co-éternelles d'une même essence, comme cette essence est indubitablement, nous l'avons établi plus d'une fois, la cause unique et réelle de toutes les existences, de tous les faits physiques, moraux ou spirituels, le ternaire divin ne doit-il donc pas se manifester universellement dans les sciences qui ne sont que des descriptions; dans la grammaire, qui est l'expression de nos facultés; dans les arts, qui ne sont que ces facultés mises en action, en accord avec des lois mathématiques pré-existantes; dans les gouvernements, qui sont des corps politiques; enfin, et principalement dans l'homme, la plus parfaite des créatures, image même du modèle divin? ***

Je dois faire observer avant de quitter les nombres, que M. de Maistre subordonne les mathématiques elles-mêmes à la métaphysique: il connaissait trop cette science pour ne pas savoir que les nombres sensibles proviennent des nombres intellectuels. Dans les mathématiques, en effet, comme dans toutes les autres, l'essence est avant la forme, la force avant le mouvement, l'unité avant le nombre, le point avant l'étendue. Existerait-il des nombres sans la pré-existence de l'unité incréée? Cette unité ne les contenait-elle point en puissance, puisque tous émanent d'elle, en y joignant le zéro, qui n'est que le néant? Dans la science de l'étendue, il est constant que les géomètres présupposent toujours l'existence du point, sans longueur, largeur ni profondeur: supposition d'accord avec l'essence des choses, car c'est ce point, hors de l'espace, qui engendre la ligne droite qui forme elle-même la surface, seule nécessaire ensuite pour construire les solides et mesurer l'étendue, qui se trouve ainsi dérivée elle-même du point intétendu, puisqu'elle est toute composée de surfaces, etc. Tout l'édifice des mathématiques est donc basé sur des notions métaphysiques existantes dans notre entendement, et calquées sur la mathématique intellectuelle. Il en est de même des axiomes: pourquoi n'en demandons-nous pas la démonstration? Parce que nous trouvons en nous-mêmes la certitude à priori qu'ils sont vrais; mais pourquoi sont-ils vrais? Parce que l'unité incréée, en engendrant tous les nombres et tous les êtres, a caractérisé d'une manière invariable leurs rapports, et que nos âmes, émanées aussi de cette première unité qui les a si magnifiquement dotées, possèdent elles-mêmes la connaissance innée de ces rapports. Mais en voilà assez sur cet article, qui paraîtra trop abstrait." Thus much, from the 'Opusculs Théosophiques,' as an introduction to the next and final subject of our present consideration, namely, concerning the point, or spirit of Life, with its fluxions and developments in eternity, and thence in time, as referred to p. 51, and elsewhere throughout this treatise.

Being well versed in the philosophy of Behmen, in Freher's elucidations of its several parts, and in the theological application of it by the standard English evangelist, Law, especially in his be little doubt; and what is meant by his "writings about J. B." p. 329, (the critical "observations" upon which by Freher occupy the subsequent pages up to p. 459,) must be understood to be the Rev. E. Waple's exercises in J. B.'s philosophy and divinity, according to the above A. B. C. D. E. Dissertations, "which," Freher there adds, "he desired Me to Correct and Complete."

But further, it is evident to the writer, that these 'Dissertations' were the writings which Law chiefly consulted, after making the acquaintance of Behmen (about A.D. 1733), that is, after he had for a sufficient time studied his works alone, so as to have obtained a practical and general knowledge thereof: as he in his "Way to Divine Knowledge," p. 240, directs the searcher after truth and wisdom to do; and likewise recommended to the Rev. Mr. Neve, in a letter to him, a copy of which has already appeared in this work. Indeed, it would appear, that his first philosophical writings, (including the "Appeal,") were founded upon the special elucidations of the particular subjects upon which they severally treat, contained in the above described 'Dissertations;' as likewise, the leading work of the 'last series' of his writings, upon certain portions of other of Freher's treatises, — to be however more particularly referred to in the brief memorial introduced underneath. In Freher's writings, then, he enjoyed the advantage of a resolution of all doubts and difficulties with respect to the exact sense of Behmen, or to particular points of recondite truth, that might have been the subject of his meditations. — And now we arrive at the cause or reason of the entire change in his character of thought, which ensued between the year 1732, when the "Three Letters to a Lady inclined to Rome," were written, and the above period of 1737—40; which hitherto has not been clearly understood. And indeed, it is difficult to conceive the possibility of obtaining such a thorough fundamental apprehension of Behmen, as is implied in the authorship of the treatises which issued from Law's pen during the latter mentioned period, from a brief unassisted study of his books, even taking into account Law's amazing capacity, penetration, and strength of understanding: but now the matter is plain. In addition to his own study and apprehension of Behmen, he had the advantage of Freher's — serial and methodical, general and particular, direct and annotatory elucidations, with their symbolic and other illustrations, of the scope and sense of that author: who was himself a native of Germany, a man of profound erudition, "of great accuracy of thought, and coolness of mind, as well as of a most holy and primitive life," so writes the learned Dr. Francis Lee, from his own personal knowledge, "who had read all Behmen's books in the original, more than ten times, though not without the greatest disgust imaginable in the beginning." Thus it was that Law obtained his acute and penetrating apprehension of Behmen; which, nevertheless, was peculiar to himself, and could only be the result of such theosophical instructions falling upon such a ready prepared genius, accomplished casuist and logician, orthodox theologian and mystical divine, as he was in the year 1732; and hence the variation or rather philosophic enlargement of his views, so strikingly manifest in his subsequent public writings. — The Candidate will, therefore, in his considerations of the latter division of Law's mystic-Elias character, not fail to assign to Freher, his proper place in the providential formation of it.

We conclude this Postscript by presenting the following interesting extract from a 'Notice Biographique sur Louis Claude de Saint-Martin. By J. B. M. Gence. Paris, 1824,' whereby it will be seen what has been done in France with regard to the writings and philosophy of Behmen. Law's "Way to Divine Knowledge" was translated and published in French, by a friend of Saint Martin, A.D. 1805, who prefaced it by a tract, entitled "Le voix qui crie dans le desert."

latter writings, the "Spirit of Love," "Letters," "Way to Divine Knowledge," and "Confutation of Warburton," and having also sufficiently mastered the above designated studies, the learned and scientific candidate will now be prepared to enter upon the last particular involved in the subject of the present ANNOTATION, namely, the nature and true relations of metaphysical and mechanical philosophy; that is, beginning at the very foundation of things, of the Nothing and All, and the eternal manifestation in the Point, to trace out systematically, the fluxions and developments of the Point, in nature with its powers and qualities, but chiefly with respect to our globe and universe and all its subjects, in their respective classes and relations, and histories (including that of Man), from the creation down to the present time, and all in the technical phraseology of modern experimental science and erudition: at the same time, taking care at every suitable opening in the demonstration, as the sum and substance of the whole, to apply the subject evangelically, that is, showing how the whole frame and constitution of things have but one voice and one language to an enlightened understanding, namely, the voice of the gospel. Which theosophical and scientific knowledge is an indispensable qualification of the missionary who shall go forth to proclaim to cultivated reason, the God of nature "in whom we live, and move, and have our being," and by whose eternal speaking word "all things consist," to be the author of Christianity: as witness Henry Martyn, who, it may be perceived through the narrative, for want of it was continually nonplused by his Parsee, Moonshie, and famous Shiraz controvertists, and (as he in effect admits, in common with more recent learned missionaries,) could make no true progress in his pursuit.

With then these preparations and defences, and with regard to the mode of execution of such a sublime task, Oken's "Physico-philosophy" may now be taken up for perusal, with other treatises of a similar attempt and purport. We say with such preparation of mind — for there are many passages in Oken's work, as also in the writings of other rationalists of corresponding research, among which might be classed the indefatigable scribe and idealist, Swedenborg, (whom, by the way, as a theologian, "Mr. Law," according to a Letter in the writer's possession, "thought the greatest visionary he ever read,") which would almost inevitably lead an unsettled reader, a novice in orthodox philosophy and divinity, into materialism and Spinozism: which authors having no true understanding of the three principles of the Divine manifestation, and of the seven properties of nature, yet attempting to explain the foundation and primary developments of things, their theories in such respect can be at best but a texture of phantasy and common truth, however ingenious plausible and natural they may appear to novices in recondite science. And it may be a question, whether the materialism and rationalism, with the heathenish ignorance respecting the nature and design of evangelical Christianity, which prevails at the present day, amongst a certain class of physiciens, individuals in other respects of highly cultivated minds, may not be attributable to the incorrect and imperfect principles of such philosophical writers as Oken; upon which the scientific and most attractive portions of their treatises appear to be founded. [Of the latter circumstance, there cannot

"Saint-Martin (Louis-Claude de), savant et profond spiritualiste, dit le Philosophe inconnu, naquit à Amboise, d'une famille noble, le 18 Janvier, 1743. Il dut à une belle-mère attentive les premiers éléments de cette éducation douce et pieuse, qu'il fit, disait-il, aimer, pendant toute sa vie, de Dieu et des hommes. Au collège de Pont-Levoy, où il avait été mis de bonne heure, le livre qu'il goûta le plus, fut celui d'Abadie, intitulé, l'Art de se connaître soi-même: c'est à la lecture de cet ouvrage qu'il attribua son détachement des choses de ce monde. Mais destiné par ses parents à la magistrature, il s'attacha, dans son cours de droit, plutôt aux bases naturelles de la justice, qu'aux règles de la jurisprudence, dont l'étude lui répugnait. * * *

Malgré son goût pour la philosophie interne, une carrière non moins active que celle des exercices militaires, s'ouvrit à lui. Initié par des formules, des rites, des pratiques, à des opérations qu'on appelait théurgiques, et que dirigeait Martinez Pasqualis (voyez la Biographie universelle), chef de la secte dite des Martinistes, il lui demandait souvent : Maître, eh quoi ! faut-il donc tout cela pour connaître Dieu ? Cette voie, qui était celles des manifestations sensibles, n'avait point séduit notre philosophe. Ce fut toutefois par-là qu'il entra dans la voie du spiritualisme. La doctrine de cette école, dont les membres prenaient le titre hébreu de Cohen (Prêtres), et que Martinez présentait comme un enseignement public secret dont il avait reçu la tradition, se trouve exposée, d'une manière mystérieuse, dans les premiers ouvrages de Saint-Martin, et surtout dans son Tableau naturel des rapports entre Dieu, l'homme, etc.

Après la mort de Martinez, l'école fut transférée à Lyon. C'est là que, muni des armes d'une doctrine opposée à celle des encyclopédistes, qui ne menagait que trop de se propager, Saint-Martin, destinée en quelque sorte à combattre l'athéisme philosophique, comme il devait un jour attaquer de front le matérialisme révolutionnaire, publia son livre des Erreurs etc. En détruisant les doctrines erronées d'une prétendue philosophie de la nature et de l'histoire, il rappelle l'homme à la Vérité fondée sur le Principe même de la science, et sur la nature de l'être intellectuel ; mais il n'emploie les traditions de l'Ecriture qu'à l'appui des preuves, ou énigmatiquement, pour ne pas trop heurter les lecteurs imbus des théories sorties de l'atelier du baron d'Holbach. Cette même école de Pasqualis, dont les opérations cessèrent en 1778, vint se fondre à Paris dans la société des G. P., ou dans celle des Philalèthes, professant en apparence la doctrine de Martinez et celle de Swedenborg, mais cherchant moins la vérité que le grand-œuvre. Saint-Martin fut invité, en 1784, à cette dernière réunion ; mais il refusa de participer aux opérations de ses membres, qu'il jugeait ne parler et n'agir qu'en purs francs-maçons, et non en véritables initiés (c'est-à-dire, unis à leur Principe).

Saint-Martin suivait volontiers les réunions où l'on s'occupait, de bonne-foi, d'exercices qui engageaient des vertus actives. Les manifestations d'une ordre intellectuel, obtenues par la voie sensible, lui décelaient, dans les séances de Martinez, une science des esprits : les visions de Swedenborg, d'un ordre sentimental, une science des âmes. Quant aux phénomènes du magnétisme somnambulique, qu'il suivit à Lyon, il les regardait comme étant d'un ordre sensible inférieur ; * * *

Amateur de tout ce qui pouvait lui faire reconnaître une vérité, surtout dans les sciences soumises à des principes exacts, l'étude des mathématiques dont Saint-Martin s'occupait pour y découvrir l'esprit que pouvait receler la connaissance des nombres, occasionna sa liaison avec Lalande ; mais ils étaient trop antipathiques ; elle dura peu. Quoiqu'il ne crût pas à son athéisme, il le voyait néanmoins placé de manière à s'enfoncer de plus en plus dans ce système. * *

perhaps be offered a better illustration than is contained in an extract from the "Zoist," (a publication said to be devoted to the interests of 'Mesmerism,' 'Clairvoyance,' &c.,) which appeared in the "Morning Herald" Journal, of the 5th or 6th November, 1849. The article in question is a phrenological lecture upon the head of Rush, the murderer; but what we here call attention to, as exhibiting the learned lecturer's acquaintance with the nature, design, and vital transforming energy of Christianity, are his concluding practical remarks, where, speaking of the high degrees of moral pravity indicated in the form of Rush's skull, he intimates to the auditory, they may consider themselves fortunate that nature had not so organized their brain, or they had been subject to similar crimes! a most edifying piece of information truly, and quite in consonance with the opinion, that the Gospel is "merely a human book, like any other book," and its doctrines and precepts but a "kind of spiritual police!" But it may be very properly asked, wherein can it be perceived, whether the speaker be a Heathen, Jew, or Christian? And yet the subject of his discourse is of the very essence of Gospel philosophy.]

Oken's work though imperfect, is however an attempt in the right order of procedure for a physico-philosophical treatise, and in such respect, as well as with regard to its scientific developments, is recommended to the notice of the Candidate. To whom alone, as we have said, it belongs to open out the whole philosophy of physics, in a logical, simple, universal manner : which for the reasons above intimated and others, could not be done by this or any physico-philosopher heretofore, though their labours, like Kepler's, and others', in respect to the Newtonian discoveries, shall stand in their due place of honour, when the grand problem of nature and creature shall be fully demonstrated. Which, as before observed, will be so accomplished, as that the world on beholding it, (as with the Newtonian mathematical translations and developments,) shall declare with acclamation, It is the truth !—it is Man—nay, it is the Virgin ! And so also, that every wherein it shall appear, as a golden thread of divine wisdom running through the whole, an attestation by nature to the truth of the gospel, and an answer to the one only essential question to man, What must I do to be saved?—A question, which every man of sense and reflection must have asked himself, at one time or another, in the intervals of worldly trial and mental harassment ; yet which, strange as it may sound, scarcely one spiritual professor in a hundred will answer in a clear, rational, demonstrative and satisfactory manner, however able he may be to quote Scripture words, or to discourse according to the modern evangelical custom. The answer is, however, brief ; and here it is in its two parts : Thou must be virtually, actually, sensibly born into God, into his light and love : and the way to be thus regenerate, is by an undoing, a mortifying, a crucifying, and actual death of thy natural self, of thy tastes, desires, habits, customs, pleasures ; an entire breaking with the world and all worldly friendships ; and an unceasing striving, wrestling, praying, groaning, agonizing for God, till he open the door, and take thee into himself. This is the way to salvation, clear salvation, devoid of all blind sectarian notions about it ; as to whether it be by faith or works. And (though

Ce fut à Strasbourg que, par l'organe d'une amie (Mme. Brechlin), il eut la connaissance des ouvrages du philosophe teutonique, JACOB BOEHM, regardé en France comme un visionnaire; et il étudia dans un âge avancé, la langue allemande, afin d'entendre et de traduire pour son usage, en français, les ouvrages de cet illuminé célèbre, qui lui découvrirent ce que, dans les documents de son premier maître, il n'avait fait qu'entrevoir. Il le regarda toujours depuis comme LA PLUS GRANDE LUMIÈRE HUMAINE QUI EUT PARU. Saint-Martin visita l'Angleterre, où il se lia, en 1787, avec l'ambassadeur Barthélemy, et connut les œuvres de William Law, qui renferment un Précis des livres de J. Boehm. En 1788, il fit un voyage à Rome avec le prince Alexis Gallitzin, qui dit à M. Fortia d'Urban, ce mot remarquable : Je ne suis véritablement un homme que depuis que j'ai connu M. de Saint-Martin. * *

La vue intérieure et recueillie par laquelle l'homme cherche à opérer en lui la connaissance du Principe même des réalités, vue bien supérieure à l'intuition purement rationnelle de Kant, est l'idée qui finit par dominer dans les écrits de l'auteur, dans celui même de la forme la moins grave, sous laquelle il a dérobé sa philosophie, lorsque le sujet pouvait prêter à la satire. Un ton de gaité, qui lui échappe, et qu'il se reproche, était plutôt dans son humeur que dans son tour d'esprit méditatif et dans son caractère porté à la bonhomie. * *

A cette époque, les vues et les sentiments élevés qui lui faisaient admirer son bon philosophe allemand, se répandaient jusque dans les questions de l'ordre naturel qu'il traitait. D'après ses aperçus devenus plus féconds, porté à découvrir, sous la nature temporelle et visible, un monde intérieur et invisible qu'elle devait manifester selon lui par la culture à l'homme intellectuel et moral, il ne pouvait rester étranger à aucune science. Il suivait le progrès des découvertes dans chaque genre de connaissances, et en comparait les données avec celles qu'il avait acquises dans Jacob Boehm et par ses propres réflexions. C'est en fouillant ainsi dans un monde inconnu, qu'il composa et produisit l'Esprit des choses, où il s'efforce de soulever un coin du voile, et de jeter quelques lueurs sur une nature qui lui semblait n'avoir été dévoilée par une sorte d'inspiration, que pour les regards de Boehm. On conçoit, dans cette hypothèse, que les sciences, dont il avait parcouru le cercle, étant alors bien moins avancées qu'aujourd'hui; si l'on excepte ce que la connaissance de l'homme intérieur avait pu lui révéler par la méditation, il a dû rester en arrière dans plusieurs de ses explications, qui ne s'accordent pas toujours avec les nouvelles découvertes, indépendamment de ce qu'elles s'éloignent nécessairement des opinions reçues.

Malgré l'étendue de ses connaissances, et l'originalité de ses idées qui lui faisait tout ramener à son spiritualisme, on admirait dans Saint-Martin un sens droit et une modestie simple et aimable. Son caractère liant et son esprit communicatif lui eussent acquis sans doute beaucoup de partisans; mais il ne cherchait point à faire des prosélytes: il ne voulait que des amis qui fussent disciples, non simplement de ses livres, mais d'eux-mêmes. Il tenait un journal de ses liaisons; et, de même que les traductions de son cher philosophe étaient des provisions pour ses vieux jours, il regardait ses nouveaux amis comme des acquisitions, et il se jouait très-riche en rentes d'amies. A voir son air humble et son extérieur simple, on ne soupçonnait ni la science profonde, ni les lumières extraordinaires, ni les hautes vertus qu'il recélait. Mais la candeur, la paix de ses entretiens, et, l'on ose dire, l'atmosphère de bienfaisance qui semblait se répandre autour de lui, manifestaient l'homme sage et le nouvel homme qu'avaient formé la philosophie et la religion. * *

On peut juger que les espérances d'un homme qui avait une faim si vive des réalités, ne pou-some four, six, or even nine months, with great fidelity and diligence, and under special tuition, and spiritual communion, be requisite for the entire process, according as the vanity and corruption of the individual be less or more,) it is the shortest, directest, and the only way, as nature as well as scripture do testify. And from this spiritual and essential renovation, as a new creation of man's interior, it is, that, (by proper instruction) shall be made to flow forth every true moral and intellectual virtue, beauty, harmony and perfection, to the blessedness of his neighbour, his country, the world, and the whole creature around him: as contemplated by the enlightened advocate of innocence, purity, order, truth, and love. the mouthpiece and philosopher of simple nature, and true Christian sage, and philanthropist, Tryon.

The following are a few of the positions in Oken's work, referred to in the above remarks as having a natural tendency to lead the theosophical novice into the darkness of materialism, Spinozism, and rationalism. (It had been well for this philosopher to have purified his views by a study of the orthodox metaphysical disquisitions elicited by the deistical and similar controversies in this country at the early part of the last century.)

"God carries the universe within himself while he thinks; he posits the same while he speaks. —Motion has emerged directly from the eternal, is the primary function itself repeated. —Motion is the ever self-manifesting, consequently, progressive God. —The primary sphere is rotating, for it has originated through motion; the motion of the sphere cannot however be progressive, for it fills everything. —God is a rotating globe. —The universe is God rotating. —The material universe is called nature. —There can be only one nature, as well according to time as to space, and to divine animation. —There is only one God, whose operations expressed, or materially posited, are nature. —Nature has originated out of nothing, like time and space; or with these has nature also been. —God has made heaven and earth out of nothing. —God has not found matter co-eternal with himself, and like an architect, arranged this to his fancy; but he has, out of his own eternal omnipotence, by his will simply evoked the world out of nothing unto existence. He has thought and spoken, and it was. —The doctrine of matter is the philosophy of nature. —Everything which is matter is light, and without light there is nothing. —Without light the universe is not only dark, but it is even not. —Light is the universe, and every finite is only a different position of light. —The universe is a thoroughly illuminating globe, a rotating globe of light. —Light and heat were the first phenomena of the world. —Heat with light, however, are fire. —Fire is the totality of æther, is God manifested in his totality—God, previous to his determination to create a world, was darkness; in the first act of creation, however, he appeared as fire. —There is no higher, more perfect symbol of divinity than fire. —God's whole consciousness, apart from individual thoughts, is fire. The Holy Scriptures therefore usually admit of God appearing under the form of a fire, as a fiery bush, a flame. —The universe is none other than a rotating globe of fire."

Having now, we consider, in the above extracts and observations, in addition to what had been valent que croître avec l'âge. Aussi disait-il qu'entré dans sa soixantaine, en 1803, il avançait grâce à Dieu, vers les grandes jouissances qui lui étaient annoncées depuis long-temps. Il se félicitait d'avoir connu, quoique tard, l'auteur du Génie du Christianisme; ce qui consolait sa religion de la perte récente de Laharpe. Il avait eu des avertissements d'un ennemi physique, le même que celui qui avait enlevé son père : mais il était loin de s'en affliger; et la Providence, disait-il, l'avait toujours trop bien soigné pour qu'il eût autre chose que des grâces à lui rendre. La vue d'Aunay, près Sceaux, où il possédait un ami, lui avait toujours offert des beautés naturelles qui élevaient son esprit vers leur modèle, et le faisaient soupirer, comme les vieillards d'Israël, qui, en voyant le nouveau temple, regrettaient les charmes de l'ancien. Une semblable idée l'avait suivi dans tous le cours de ses années; et son vœu était de la conserver jusqu'au bout.

Il semblait pressentir sa fin. Un entretien qu'il avait désiré avoir avec un mathématicien profond sur la science des nombres dont le sens caché l'occupait toujours, eut lieu en effet avec M. de Rossel, par l'entremise de l'auteur de cette notice. Il dit, en finissant : "Je sens que je m'en vais : la Providence peut m'appeler; je suis prêt. Les germes que j'ai tâché de semer fructifieront; je pars demain pour la campagne d'un de mes amis : je rends grâce au Ciel de m'avoir accordé la dernière faveur que je demandais." Il dit alors adieu à M. de Rossel, et nous serra la main. * * * Il expira sans agonie et sans douleur, le 13 Octobre, 1803. * * *

Quoique Saint-Martin fût encore alors assez répandu, ce philosophe était généralement si peu connu dans le monde, que les feuilles publiques, annonçant son décès, le confondirent avec Martin-Pasqualis, son maître, mort en 1779, à Saint-Domingue. Bien que le disciple ait passé pour le chef d'une doctrine religieuse, ses sentiments, comme on l'a dit, étaient bien loin d'être dictés par des vues particulières ou exclusives. * * * Non que Saint-Martin, comme l'a avancé l'auteur des "Soirées de Saint-Petersbourg," ne crût pas à la légitimité du sacerdoce chrétien : mais il pensait que partout l'institution du Christ pouvait s'opérer par la foi sincère aux pouvoirs et aux mérites du Rédempteur.

Comment un écrivain professant un christianisme aussi indulgent, avait-il pu encourir, d'un autre côté, l'animadversion des prétendus apôtres de la tolérance et de la philanthropie ? C'est que sa religion n'était, ni politique, ni feinte; c'est que les clartés qui paraient de sa conviction, malgré les nuages dont il semble s'envelopper, offusquaient les lumières du philosophisme. Saint-Martin a beaucoup écrit; et ses livres développent toujours par degrés, avec plus de force et de netteté, le caractère religieux dont ils portent l'empreinte. Ils ont été de plus commentés, et traduits en partie, mais principalement dans les langues du nord de l'Europe.

On va voir, par un coup-d'œil général sur la doctrine de l'auteur, dont chacun de ses écrits offrira un point de vue particulier, qu'il n'est pas étonnant que des esprits égarés par la passion, ou livrés aux erreurs des sens, n'aient pu l'entendre ni le goûter. Mais il est permis de croire qu'à mesure que les idées morales, et les sentiments religieux renaissent, se simplifient en s'épurant par l'influence d'une culture de l'esprit plus étendue, on sentira le besoin d'opposer un spiritualisme éclairé et raisonnable à cette tendance des sciences naturelles vers un matérialisme qui attribue aux organes physiques, des facultés et des fonctions, et qui fait, d'agents passifs et aveugles, le principe de l'activité et de l'intelligence.

Les ouvrages de Saint-Martin ont pour but, non-seulement d'expliquer la nature par l'homme, mais de ramener toutes nos connaissances au Principe dont l'esprit humain peut devenir le centre.

before remarked, and to what shall be contained in our next Section, afforded to the candidate—TO THE CHRISTIANITY, THE PHILOSOPHY, THE ERUDITION, SCIENCE AND CLASSIC PERFECTION OF THE AGE—a key to the opening of the entire book of nature and grace, of the history and mystery of the world and of man, whereby to work out demonstratively (in the proposed philosophic and religious biography of Behmen-Freher-LAW, or in a special separate treatise,) the problem of the true and practical means for the conversion of the intellectual Heathen (so called), Mahomedan and Jewish nations—to enlightened evangelical Christianity; thus paving the way for the introduction of that blessed seventh age, pointed at in the discourses of our Lord, and other places of the New Testament, we cannot perhaps close this ANNOTATION more appropriately, than by presenting the following mystical exposition of Genesis, Chapter v. 22, (by Behmen, M. S. T. MAG. xxx. 47, et seq.) declaring what shall precede and usher in that long looked for, hitherto obscure, but inevitable event, when the kingdoms of this world shall acknowledge "Jesus Christ to be Lord, to the glory of God, the Father." And it will be borne in mind, that (with the book of Job) the historical and philosophical portion of the Old Testament, for the first eleven chapters of it, if not the whole of Genesis, belong to all the nations of mankind; and that the original, of which that is merely a summary, or a condensation of a summary, whether by Moses, or some other writer, may, to a very copious extent, though mystically travestied, be yet in existence in eastern depositaries of learning and devotion.

[By the Christianity last mentioned, understand the solid English theological erudition and the pure Gospel principles of the national church, carried out into the earnest simple practice and experimental verification thereof, of orthodox methodism—comparable to the principles of common arithmetic, as systematically taught in schools and universally understood, and then as practically applied by men of business; superinduced upon these, the results of the French, Italian, and Spanish cultivation of the science of evangelical perfection, of entire devotedness to God, death to self (even to its inmost spiritual roots), and sublimated Christlike wisdom, of the Jesu-ites and Contemplative mystics—comparable to the higher branches of mathematics, and their essential necessity in the constitution and development of polite life and knowledge; the whole being crowned with the Teutonic Theosophy, being researches into and discoveries of recondite truth, of the great "mystery of Christ," for whom, by whom, and to whom are all things—comparable to the highest philosophical science, of the laws, habitudes, and relations of spirit and body, mind and matter, universal and particular; as viewed by an intellectual eye which had descended to the limits, and risen again through the whole scale of being (Ephes. iv. 9, 10; Col. i. 16—20), from, indeed, the centre of eternity and time, the pinnacle of nature, the throne of the man-prince and heir of God, Jesus Christ.] The extract thus proceeds:

"Enoch begat Methuselah, who was the man of the longest age; and was translated three hundred years after. This (writes Behmen) intimateth and declareth, that the Spirit, which in Enoch did bring forth a twig, viz., Methuselah, who attained the highest age, shall rule in the last and highest age, and in the meanwhile hide itself before that time, and remain as it were translated: as

La nature actuelle, déchue et divisée d'avec elle-même et d'avec l'homme, conserve néanmoins dans ses lois, comme l'homme dans plusieurs de ses facultés, une disposition à rentrer dans l'unité originelle. Par ce double rapport, la nature se met en harmonie avec l'homme, de même que l'homme se coordonne à son Principe. Il suit de là que le Nosce te ipsum doit embrasser dans l'idée du moi, la notion du moi rationnel et celle du moi spirituel. Cette connaissance n'est donc pas la simple théorie d'un type ou sujet de nos idées, que Platon conclut de la notion d'un archétype, tirée elle-même des idées d'unité et d'objet. Descartes et Leibnitz descendent aussi, par une idée commune, de l'abstrait au sensible, mais après s'être élevés du sujet à l'objet, le premier par voie de conception, le second par la voie de l'apperception. Kant, ne dépassant pas la limite du sensible, sépare l'objet abstrait d'avec le sujet, et le laisse dans le rang des notions générales dont sa raison intuitive ne peut rendre compte. Suivant Saint-Martin, l'homme, pris pour sujet, ne conçoit ni n'aperçoit pas simplement l'objet abstrait de sa pensée : il le reçoit, mais d'une autre source que celle des impressions sensibles (v. ci-après, n° II.) De plus, l'homme, qui se recueille, et qui fait abnégation, par sa volonté, de toutes les choses extérieures, opère et obtient la connaissance intime du Principe même de la pensée ou de la parole, c'est-à-dire de son Prototype, ou du Verbe, dont il est originairement l'image et le type. L'Etre divin se révèle ainsi à l'esprit de l'homme ; et, en même temps, se manifestent les connaissances qui sont en rapport avec nous-mêmes, et avec la nature des choses. C'est à cette nature originelle, ou l'homme se trouvait en harmonie avec son Principe, qu'il doit tendre, par son œuvre et son désir, en réunissant sa volonté à celle du Réparateur. Alors, l'image divine se reforme ; l'âme humaine se régénère ; les beautés de l'ordre se découvrent, et la communication entre Dieu et l'homme est rétablie.

On voit, d'après cet aperçu de la doctrine de Saint-Martin, que le spiritualisme, dont la voie lui avait été d'abord ouverte par Pasqualis, et ensuite aplanie par JACOB BÖHM, n'était plus simplement la science des Esprits, mais celle de Dieu. Les mystiques du moyen âge et ceux de l'école de Fénelon, en s'unissant par la contemplation à leur Principe, suivant la doctrine de leur maître Rusbrock, étaient absorbés en Dieu par l'affection. Ici, c'est une porte plus élevée ; ce n'est pas seulement la faculté affective, c'est la faculté intellectuelle, qui connaît en elle son Principe divin, et par lui, le modèle de cette nature que Malebranche voyait non activement en lui-même, mais spéculativement en Dieu, et dont Saint-Martin découvre le type dans son être intérieur par une opération active et spirituelle, qui est le germe de la connaissance. C'est vers ce but que les ouvrages de l'auteur, dans l'ordre de leur composition, paraissent se diriger, en marquant progressivement, par la route qu'il a suivie, celle que l'on peut suivre dans la même carrière.

Enoch was translated, and was no more seen.

Whose translation was not a dying, or a putting off nature and creature, but he went into the mystery betwixt the spiritual and outward world, viz., into paradise : and it is the prophetic root out of the stem of Adam, in the line of the covenant, out of which spirit afterwards the prophetic mouth spake.

This spirit was translated in Christ's living voice, when it spake in the flesh ; and must be silent till the voice of Jared be finished, when he proceedeth forth again from his first root, through all voices, viz., through the voice of Noah, who denounceth the deluge of anger to come upon Babel, and through the stock of Noah and the whole forth-spreading propagation of his tree through all the lines, viz., through the heathenish [Ham] Japhethical and Shem lines, and through Abraham's, and Nimrod's the builders of Babel, through Moses, and the Prophets, and lastly, through the voice of the manifested word in the spirit of Christ, and manifesteth the whole mystery of the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

For through his voice, all the fore-mentioned voices of the wonder-lines (whence the kingdoms of this world have had their rise) shall be changed into one voice and knowledge, and transplanted into one kingdom, viz., into the first of Adam, which is no longer called Adam, but Christ-in-Adam. All nations, tongues, and speeches, hear this voice, for it is that first Word, whence the life of mankind proceeded ; for all wonders do join again together in the word into one body, and that body is the formed Divine word, which at first with Adam did introduce itself into one only stem and through him into a tree of manifold boughs, branches, and fruits, to the contemplation of the Divine Wisdom, in the wonders of the powers, colours, and virtues, according to evil and good.

This high tree doth blossom, and clearly open itself, what it hath been in time, and what it shall be eternally ; and in its manifestation, Moses puts away his veil, and Christ his parables in his doctrine, and then the prophetic mouth of this wonder-tree doth express in divine power, all the voices of the powers of the tree, whereby Babel taketh her end, and this is a wonder : and in this same wonder all numbers and names are made manifest, and this no man can hinder.

For that which is lost in the spirits of the letters shall be again found, and the spirits of the letters shall be found again in the formed word of the creation ; and in the creation shall be found and known the Being of all beings ; and in the being of all beings the eternal Understanding of the holy Trinity, whereupon the contentions about the knowledge of God, his being and will do cease. When the branches shall know that they stand in the tree, they will never say that they are peculiar and singular trees ; but they will rejoice in their stem, and they will see that they are all-together boughs and branches of one tree, and that they all receive power and life from one only stem.

And here Moses shall keep sheep, and every sheep eateth his own pasture : therefore observe it, when this approacheth near to be fulfilled, then Noah denounceth the deluge, and Elias brings the flaming sword upon the false Israel, and the turba in the fire of the wrath devours the wild tree with its fruits and branches ; let this be told thee, Babel.

As regards the divine time of Enoch, our speech is taken from us, seeing Babel is not worthy of it, and also shall not see it ; and likewise we must be silent concerning the discovery of the times of the Ancient, whose number shall stand open in the rose of the lily." End of the ANNOTATION commencing at page 450.]]

We now return to the subject of Mr. Law, and his companions, and the manner in which they spent their time. As there is every reason to conclude that not only the general design of the charities before related, but also the very prudential regulations for their maintenance according to their

I. Des Erreurs et de la Vérité, ou Les hommes rappelés au Principe universel de la science. Par un Ph... inc... Edimbourg (Lyon) 1775, in 8°. L'auteur, qui suivait rarement sa propre volonté en écrivant, mais bien plutôt le conseil de ses amis, indigné de lire, dans Boulanger, que les religions étaient nées de la frayeur causée par les catastrophes de la nature, fit ce livre pour montrer, comme on l'a dit, dans la nature, même de l'homme, la connaissance sensible d'une cause active et intelligente, véritable source des allégories, des mystères des institutions, et des lois. Tandis que l'école holbachique, par l'organe de Voltaire, traitait ce même livre parfois énigmatique, d'incensé et d'absurde, et que néanmoins elle se piquait d'y donner une suite, le philosophe de Berne frappé des vérités qu'il lui paraissait renfermer sous le voile, provoquait une correspondance avec son auteur, dont il regardait l'ouvrage comme celui de l'écrivain le plus profonde de ce siècle. La prétendue Suite des Erreurs, et de la Vérité, etc. (Salmonopolis (Paris), 1784, in 8°.), a été signalée, par Saint-Martin, comme frauduleuse, et entachée du vice des faux systèmes qu'il combattait. [It is a most admirable burlesque on the original.] En effet, le Philosophe inconnu avait dit que la volonté constituait la faculté essentielle et fondamentale de l'homme; et c'est en le démentant qu'on ose l'interpréter, lorsqu'on dit (page 7) que la volonté n'est qu'une modification du cerveau par laquelle l'homme est disposé à mettre en jeu ses organes. Ne croit-on pas déjà entendre la doctrine matérielle de Cabanis et de l'école de Gall? [Pooh!]

II. Tableau naturel des rapports qui existent entre Dieu, l'homme et l'univers, avec l'épigraphie (tirée de l'ouvrage précédent, suivant l'usage de l'auteur) : Expliquer les choses par l'homme, et non l'homme par les choses, 2 parties Edimbourg (Lyon), 1782, in 8°. Dans cet ouvrage, composé à Paris d'après le conseil de quelque amis, l'auteur infère, de la supériorité des facultés de l'homme et de ses actes sur les organes des sens et sur ses productions, que l'existence de la nature, soit générale, soit particulière, est également le produit de puissances créatrices supérieures à ce résultat. Cependant l'homme est dans la dépendance des choses physiques, dont il n'acquiert l'idée que par l'impression qu'elles font sur ses organes. Mais il a, en même temps, des notions d'une autre classe, des idées de loi et de puissance, d'ordre et d'unité, de sagesse et de justice. Il est ainsi dépendant de ses idées intellectuelles et morales, de même que des idées tirées des sens. Or celles-là n'en viennent pas : elles partent donc d'une autre source; de facultés extérieures, qui produisent en lui les pensées. Mais d'où est née cette dépendance? Du désordre produit par une cause inférieure, qui s'est opposée à la cause supérieure, et qui a cessé d'être dans sa loi. L'homme original institution were the results of Mr. Law's own foresight, judgment, and experience, we may infer that this subject occupied much of his attention during the first three years of his residence with the ladies at King's-Cliffe, and more or less, indeed, until the foundations were finally completed.

Unfortunately no regular documents are in existence containing an account of the precise economy of the family at the Hall Yard. In the absence of such, however, we insert the following traditions which have been handed down as the testimony of cotemporary witnesses, collected near half a century ago. Which memorials will necessarily embrace as well the period now under review, up to the year 1749, when the "First Part" of the "Spirit of Prayer" was published, as the subsequent portion of Mr. Law's life.

Mr. Law rose early each morning, probably about five o'clock, spending some time in devotion; after which he breakfasted, generally on a cup of chocolate, in his bed-room, and then commenced study. Early rising for prayer (with a strict abstemiousness, and occasional fasting) he deemed important auxiliaries in the cultivation of the regenerate or divine life in the soul, which in every step of its progress must be founded upon mortification and self-denial. In common with the faithful children of God of all ages, he steadily kept his eye on the process and example of the crucified Jesus, who St. Mark informs us "rising up a great while before day, he went out, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed:" an intimation by the way, which is received without murmuring or disputing, by all those who, desiring to follow Christ in the regeneration, and a sure path to eternal glory, carefully examine into the rule and practice of his daily life. But for Mr. Law's own sentiments on the evangelical duty and advantages of early rising, we refer the reader to the "Serious Call," chap. xiv.; as also to the following chapter, for the ground and reasons of another most important help to devotion, namely, that of chanting a psalm, singing a hymn, reading aloud the apostolic exhortations, and vocal earnest supplication, to be persevered in for a sufficient time, until the mind become flexible, resigned, and enabled to stay itself upon God; with, moreover, other little arts and discoveries calculated to enkindle and maintain the spirit of devotion.

An act of charity very appropriately commenced the outward employments of each day, which had been thus early consecrated to God. As we learn from the notices referred to, Mr. Law kept four cows, the produce of which, beyond what was required for his household, he gave to the poor, distributing the milk every morning with his own hands; and doubtless accompanying the gift with a few words of friendly discourse or spiritual counsel, according to the circumstances of the recipients of his bounty. The order and wisdom of a religious house would appear to have regulated all the movements of this family. At nine o'clock a bell was rung for family devotion, of which the Collects and Psalms for the day formed a portion. From the very impressive and edifying performance of this duty, Mr. Law retired in silence to his chamber, where he passed the morning in study; not infrequently, indeed, interrupted by the message of some poor mendicant, for aid, which never failed to secure his immediate attention. Advancing to a window of his sleeping apartment (which at that time overlooked the court-yard of the house, though it is now blocked up), he inquired into the particular needs of his suppliants, and caused relief to be administered, in the shape either of money, apparel or food. Ever sensitively alive to the tender impulses of a spiritually enlightened charity, he manifested proportionate displeasure if room was not found on the kitchen fire for a vessel for the poor: and sometimes he has been known to quit his studies in order to taste the broth which had been made for them, and be satisfied that it was sufficiently nutritious. In the winter season he occasionally added ale and wine to these charitable provisions.

In the article of charity, as in every other characteristic of an elevated christian philanthropy, the common life of Mr. Law was strictly conformable to the principles he has so admirably inculcated, and graphically illustrated in his early fundamental treatises. Indeed, it had been a matter of surprise if the case had been otherwise; it being an irreconcilable paradox to suppose a christian moralist with a well balanced intellect, an enlightened understanding, and honest heart, to write justly and nobly in praise of benevolence, without practising its dictates; and that with a freedom and universality of spirit, rather than under the constraint of an unwelcome reflection or monition of conscience.

The principles of wisdom and piety set forth in Mr. Law's elementary writings, and the characters under which they are delineated, may therefore be regarded as so many diversified phases or features of the ground of his own mind, and uniformly discovered as occasions afforded. But in none perhaps, of those characters do we find his sublime spirit as a gospel sage more admirably displayed, than in that of Ouranios, in his "Serious Call," chap. xxi. In this simple, yet finely-conceived portraiture, and the accompanying reflections, is set forth the true spirit of a christian pastor—such an one as we may well presume Mr. Law would have been, if the Divine providence had not called him out from among his brethren, and prepared him, by a course of suitable discipline, to perform those more exalted evangelical functions which it is our particular calling in this treatise to indicate. As few readers of these pages may have been so happy as to have seen a fine specimen of the genuine Anglican christian pastor—at once the gentleman by birth and training, and by education, having carried off the highest honours which the pure mathematical and classical training of the university of Cambridge awards to her faithful and favoured sons; and as being apposite to the scope and design of this treatise, which is that of pointing out the way to the highest perfection in all solid and edifying erudition, we would here especially direct the attention of the reader to the character in question. Only incidentally observing, that it was the intended, zealous, laborious, conformity to this exemplary model, joined with the general study of the practical writings of Mr. Law, and other spiritual interpreters of the gospel, that the celebrated Flechère of Madeley attained to such an eminent degree of personal sanctity, and whose character has been so justly held up to admiration as an illustrious instance of a faithful teacher and pastor of souls. And yet, truth requires us to say also, that the ideal portrait in question is only what is commonly to be met with as real life, in the conversation of hundreds of the devoted labourers of the Society of Jesus, as well as in the more ancient devotees and bishops of the trunk branches of christianity. But in no modern work, or rather republication, is the true pastoral spirit, burning with seraphic devotion, with the cultivation of high personal holiness, and zeal for the salvation of souls, more forcibly exhibited than in De Rancé's Treatise "On the Monastic State;" which, therefore (with other works to be hereafter mentioned) is strongly recommended to the study of the young English ecclesiastic, who desires adequately and worthily to fulfil the high and holy function of the pastoral office—that is, after the mastership and acquisition of the principles of Mr. Law's two practical treatises, his "Three Letters to a Lady," and his "Answers to Trapp." And it was, doubtless, owing to the study of such accomplished examples of the true devotional and pastoral spirit, as is contained in the writings here referred to, that the pious bishop Jeremy Taylor, the ideal personification and standard of Anglican church practical divinity, attained to such a sublime spirit of devotion, whose popular writings have had such a happy influence on this nation.

With respect to the exercise of charity, we may incidentally observe, that every man has his own proper call, and of necessity, the sphere of action appertaining to it; and provided he is faithful thereto, is not to be judged for not pursuing a path which the irrational understanding of a zealot might assign to him, after his own particular way. Some have ordinarily, no other means presented to them of practising the duty of charity than by alms-giving; others, than by contributions towards the maintenance of hospitals, dispensaries, and public institutions for the cleanliness and comfort, or the visitation and relief, of the sick and distressed of the lower orders of society; and others, according to their circumstances in life and religious associations, but by collecting money for the promotion of the evangelization of the heathen: and this, so far as it is applied to the regeneration of savage nations, or in preparing the way for the approaching induction of the intellectual heathen into the christian faith, by translations of the original Scriptures into their respective tongues, is undoubtedly a most admirable charity. Among other means of exercising a noble-minded charity, may be mentioned the erection of christian oratories, for the preaching of the gospel, as well as for devotion, in populous neighbourhoods, where there exists a deficiency of the ordinary means of moral and spiritual edification; and if the resources dedicated to such purposes were even to be extended to the adorning of the interior of the christian sanctuary with such scientific embellishments as are calculated to impress the mind of the worshippers with noble and exalted ideas of the Divine nature, and to induce a solemnity of spirit, in the place where the honour and presence of the Most High more immediately resides, such expenditure would be anything but a mistaken charity. But of all institutions of the present day, commanding the sympathy and generosity of the philanthropists, there are none which possess a more evangelical character, or are more deserving of universal support, than City Missions and Ragged School Institutes; which may be considered the great moral discovery of the present age, as the form and aggressive spirit of simple Bible christianity (and the call and qualification of all the lay members of the mystical body of Christ to activity in the evangelical work, as local preachers, as missionaries, or as auxiliaries to that office, as exhorters, as leaders of bands and classes, &c., all without exception being employed in doing good, and promoting the success of the gospel) was that of a century ago—which was originated by Mr. Law's practical treatises providentially falling upon rightly-prepared minds, to put their purified principles into working effect. Now, these are a few of the various modes in which, in our own day, persons professing christianity may be considered to be called to the exercise of charity. But in Mr. Law's case (which is now under review) his peculiar calling, as regards the subordinate personal exercise of this duty, arose from his relative position as an inhabitant of a remote inland town; which was in the establishment of the foundations already noticed, and in the regular distribution of all he possessed, after satisfying his own moderate necessities, to those who were in want. Indeed, his whole life was a course of most diffusive charity, exerting itself in every kind of good, without distinction or respect of persons, both to the souls and bodies of all who could receive good at his hands.

Amongst the articles of clothing which he provided for the indigent, were shirts, made of strong coarse linen; and that he might not give away what he himself could not thankfully receive, he always wore them himself first, in order to ascertain that point by experience, after which they were washed and distributed. It can hardly be a matter of wonder, that a hand so open, and a heart so liberal and humane, should be subject to occasional imposition; accordingly, instances of hypocrisy are narrated, of mendicants, who have been known to change their better clothing, sheltered by the projecting buttresses of the neighbouring church, for rags, and thus disguised, repair again for relief to the well-known window. Though suspicions at times crossed his mind, Mr. Law, would give his supplicants the benefit of a doubt; the result of all which (says the relator), was that King's-Cliffe became the resort of the idle and worthless, and obtained a character for pauperism, which the place did not deserve: and so much annoyance did it cause to the inhabitants, that the rector, Mr. Piemont, endeavoured to put an end to the alleged mistaken benevolence of Mr. Law and his companions, by openly preaching against them from the pulpit.

The following curious document, found amongst Miss Gibbon's papers, in the handwriting of Mr. Law, throws some light on this affair. The writer is in possession of a duplicate copy, fairly written out by Miss Gibbon, to which are affixed the respective autograph signatures of the parties from whom it professed to emanate:—

"King's-Cliffe, Feb. 21st, 1753.—A Letter to the writer, and subscribers of a certain paper presented to George Lynn, Esq., and the neighbouring justices of the peace, praying for justice and judgment against us, in behalf of this parish, as being, amongst other things, the occasion of the miserable poverty of the said parish.

"We observe that great part of this paper contains an idle narration of such matters as the justices can administer no relief to. And therefore we must believe that they are related only as an occasion of preferring a complaint against us, and to prevent that gratitude which is due to us from the parish.

"Ever since we came to this place, full of good will to do all the good in it that we could, we have been railed at from the pulpit in the most outrageous manner; and scarce a Sunday has passed without edifying the people with some or other the most reproachful reflections cast upon us. Nobody can be a stranger to this, but he who is a stranger to the church.

"But this treatment from the pulpit we were determined to bear with, for the sake of that good which we so much wished to the parish: looking upon it as unreasonable, that the town should suffer for the unchristian behaviour of its rector. But since so many considerable inhabitants of the town have thought it proper, in conjunction with their minister, to set their names to the truth and justice of this complaint against us, as helping to increase the poverty of the town, we have also thought it proper to make known to all the parish, that we will no longer do them this injury, but grant them all that relief ourselves, for which they have applied to the justices. We will immediately put a stop to everything that we have set on foot, and stay no longer here, than till we can conveniently remove. And though it is our intention, by the grace of God, never to make any other use of our fortunes than as we have done here, yet as to this place, all is at an end, unless such reasons for our staying here should arise, as do not yet appear to us. And we make no doubt but that every gentleman in the neighbourhood, whether he a justice of the peace or not, and every person of sense and goodness, will approve of this our resolution.—Your hearty friends and well wishers—ELIZ. HUTCHESON, HESTER GIBBON, WILLIAM LAW.

"The parish officers are desired to call a meeting of all the parish, and let this letter be read to them. If they refuse this, we shall ourselves send it from house to house.

"P.S.—When this is done, we shall draw up a memorial at large, of the state of our case, of the great expence we have been at since we came here, or the nature and manner of Mr. Law's school for girls for near thirty years past, of the manner of Mrs. Hutcheson's school, and hospital for widows, also the nature and manner of our daily charity to all the poor in general, and to particular families in distress, that must otherwise have fallen to the parish, with the reasons for our departing from all these methods, and leaving the town. This memorial to be presented to the bishop, and all the gentry in the neighbourhood."

After this representation of the case, probably to a few of the principal malcontents, the matter seems to have died away, as the rector, we have seen, was named one of the trustees of the above-mentioned foundations, in the year following; and so the worthy trio were left to pursue their charitable avocations under the more favourable judgment, if not with the entire concurrence, of those who had complained against them.

At twelve o'clock at noon, in winter, and at one in summer, dinner was laid on the table, of which Mr. Law partook very moderately, allowing himself one glass of wine. Report states that he ate his food from a trencher, or wooden platter, in the ancient college fashion; not by reason of any dislike to the luxury of earthenware, but either because he considered that plates injured the knives, or (which is more probable) on account of his desire to encourage the manufacture of wooden ware, turnery being a trade peculiar to the town of King's-Cliffe.

We have seen that the family were called together for devotional exercises at nine in the morning: immediately after dinner they re-assembled for the same purpose. That duty performed, Mr. Law once more retired to his study and remained there a few hours, again rejoining the ladies at the tea-table. Of this refreshment he did not ordinarily partake, but supplied its place with a raisin or two from his pocket, generally standing, and indulging in cheerful conversation. After tea, exercises of piety were resumed, and varied, by the servants in turn reading a chapter from the bible. How edifying and devotional these exercises were rendered, in elucidations of the scope and mind of the Holy Spirit, by this sublimated sage, may be well conceived by the regenerate child of God, from the following brief extracts from Mr. Law's practical writings, being short paraphrases upon St. Paul's exhortation to a life of holiness and consecration to God. As in the following examples:—

"Forasmuch as ye know (says the apostle) that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as dont il a été séparé. Mais sa régénération ne peut s'opérer qu'en vertu de l'acte du Réparateur, dont le sacrifice a remplacé les expiations qui avaient lieu avant la loi de l'esprit. Tel est le plan silver and gold, from your vain conversation,—but with the precious blood of Christ, &c.

"As if the apostle had said, Forasmuch as ye know ye were made capable of this state of holiness, entered into a society with Christ, and made heirs of his glory, not by any human means, but by such a mysterious instance of love as infinitely exceeds everything that can be thought of in this world; since God has redeemed you to himself, and your own happiness, at so great a price, how base and shameful must it be, if you do not henceforth devote yourselves wholly to the glory of God, and become holy, as he who hath called you is holy?

"Again, (the apostle saith) You know how we exhorted, comforted, and charged every one of you; that you would walk worthy of God, who hath called you to his kingdom and glory.

"You, perhaps, have often heard these words, without ever thinking how much they required of you. And yet you cannot consider them, without perceiving to what an eminent state of holiness they call you.

"For how can the holiness of the christian life be set before you in higher terms, than when it is represented to you, as walking worthy of God? Can you think of any abatements of virtue, any neglects of devotion, that are well consistent with a life that is to be made worthy of God? Can you suppose that any man walks in this manner, but he that watches over all his steps, and considers how everything he does, may be done in the spirit of holiness? And yet, as high as these expressions carry this holiness, it is here plainly made the necessary holiness of all Christians. For the apostle does not here exhort his fellow apostles and saints to this holiness, but he commands all christians to endeavour after it. We charged says he, every one of you, that you would walk worthy of God, who hath called you to his kingdom and glory.

"Again, (St. Peter saith) If any man speak, let him speak as the oracles of God; if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability that God giveth; that God in all things may be glorified in Jesus Christ.

"Do you not here plainly perceive your high calling? are christians to live in such purity of heart, such union with Christ, and holiness of life, that when they speak they shall speak as the very oracles and mouthpiece of God? Are they so to act and minister, that all who know them may see and feel that they act not of their own will, but of the sole power and inspiration of the Holy Ghost? And all for this very just and eternal reason, That God alone may be glorified in Jesus Christ—" Thus, without the help of prosy and insipid commentaries, did Mr. Law open the minds of his little audience to understand the scriptures, introducing them into the very heart and spirit of the gospel, at this season. Thus did this wise and devout man stir up himself, his friends, servants, and all the members of his little household, to be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; continually looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of God. The effects of his heavenly instructions and example were the inducing in them a serene and devout mind, full of gratitude and love to God, and of heavenly peace and benevolence to all mankind.

This latter devotional exercise being ended, Mr. Law mostly took a sharp walk in the fields, for physical exercise, and for meditation, returning early to an evening repast. At half past eight the family were re-assembled for the last religious service of the day, after which, the subject of our memoir withdrew to his chamber, where, before lying down to sleep, it is reported, he smoked a pipe, and drank a glass of water. The hearthstone of this room, which is now just as when he left it, is worn away in two places, caused by the rubbing of his feet, which in consequence of his studious habits, were subject to cold. At nine o'clock the whole family retired to rest.

In defence and support of the wisdom of this strict and regular daily devotion, and of its universal practicability, in a modified degree, we give insertion to the following extract, as also consonant with the tenor of this treatise:—

"It will perhaps be thought by some people, that these times of devotion come too thick; that they can only be observed by people of great leisure, and ought not to be pressed upon the generality of men, who have the cares of families, trades, and employments; nor upon the gentry, whose state and figure in the world cannot admit of this frequency of devotion. And that it is only fit for monasteries and nunneries, or such people as have no more to do in the world than they have.

"To this it is answered,

'First, That this method of devotion is not pressed upon any sort of people, as absolutely necessary, but recommended to all people, as the best, the happiest, and the most perfect way of life.

'And if a great and exemplary devotion is as much the greatest happiness and perfection of a merchant, a soldier, or a man of quality, as it is the greatest happiness and perfection of the most retired contemplative life, then it is as proper to recommend it without any abatements to one order of men, as to another. Because happiness and perfection are of the same worth and value to all people.

'The gentleman and tradesman may, and must, spend much of their time differently from the pious monk in the cloister, or the contemplative hermit in the desert: but then, as the monk and hermit lose the ends of retirement, unless they make it all serviceable to devotion; so the gentleman and merchant fall of the greatest ends of a social life, and live to their loss in the world, unless devotion be their chief and governing temper.

'It is certainly very honest and creditable for people to engage in trades and employments; it is reasonable for gentlemen to manage well their estates and families, and take such recreations as are proper to their state. But then every gentleman and tradesman loses the greatest happiness of his creation, is robbed of something that is greater than all employments, distinctions, and pleasures of the world, if he does not live more to piety and devotion, than to anything else in the world.

'Here are therefore no excuses made for men of business and figure in the world. First, Because it would be to excuse them from that which is the greatest end of living; and be only finding so many reasons for making them less beneficial to themselves, and less serviceable to God and the world.

'Secondly, Because most men of business and figure engage too far in worldly matters; much farther than the reasons of human life, or the necessities of the world require.

'Merchants and tradesmen, for instance, are generally ten times farther engaged in business than de cet ouvrage capital, dont la marche logique est serrée, et plus méthodique ou plus suivie que dans le premier. Plusieurs endroits, distingués par des guillemets, semblent étrangers ou moins they need; which is so far from being a reasonable excuse for their want of time for devotion, that it is their crime, and must be censured as a blameable instance of covetousness and ambition.

'The gentry, and people of figure, either give themselves up to state employments, or to the gratifications of their passions, in a life of gaiety and debauchery; and if these things might be admitted as allowable avocations from devotion, devotion must be reckoned a poor circumstance of life.

'Unless gentlemen can show that they have another God than the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; another nature than that which is derived from Adam; another religion than the christian, it is in vain to plead their state, and dignity, and pleasures, as reasons for not preparing their souls for God, by a strict and regular devotion.

'For since piety and devotion are the common unchangeable means of saving all the souls in the world that shall be saved, there is nothing left for the gentleman, the soldier, and the tradesman, but to take care that their several states be, by care and watchfulness, by meditation and prayer, made states of an exact and solid piety.

'If a merchant, having forborne from too great business, that he might quietly attend on the service of God, should therefore die worth twenty instead of fifty thousand pounds, could any one say that he had mistaken his calling, or gone a loser out of the world?

'If a gentleman cannot have killed fewer foxes, been less frequent at balls, gaming, and merry-meetings, because stated parts of his time had been given to retirement, and meditation, and devotion, could it be thought, that when he left the world, he would regret the loss of those hours that he had given to the care and improvement of his soul?

'If a tradesman by aspiring after christian perfection, and retiring himself often from his business, should, instead of leaving his children fortunes to spend in luxury and idleness, leave them to live by their own honest labour; could it be said that he had made a wrong use of the world, because he had shown his children that he had more regard to that which is eternal, than to this which is so soon to be at an end?

'Since, therefore, devotion is not only the best and most desirable practice in a cloister, but the best and most desirable practice of men, as men, and in every state of life, they that desire to be excused from it, because they are men of figure, and estates, and business, are no wiser than those, that should desire to be excused from health and happiness, because they were men of figure and estates.

'I cannot see why every gentleman, merchant, or soldier, should not put these questions seriously to himself:—What is the best thing for me to intend and drive at in all my actions? How shall I do to make the most of human life? What ways shall I wish that I had taken, when I am leaving the world?

'Now to be thus wise, and to make thus much use of our reason, seems to be but a small and necessary piece of wisdom. For how can we pretend to sense and judgment, if we dare not seriously consider, and govern our lives by that which such questions require of us? To return.

Mr. Law and his companions, Mrs. Hutcheson and Miss Gibbon, were constant in their attendance at church, whenever divine service was performed. After the morning service on Wednesdays and Fridays, it was their custom to ride out for an airing, Mr. Law and Miss Gibbon being on horseback, and Mrs. Hutcheson, with the Honourables the Misses Hatton, their neighbours, (who usually dined with them every alternate Friday) or any other visiter that might be residing with them, in the carriage. [Query, who the niece of Mrs. Hutcheson, with her at King's-Cliffe, in 1746?] Their course on these occasions was round the fields about King's-Cliffe, or rather through certain roads which crossed the fields, the lordship then not being enclosed by hedges, as at present.

As regards the regular occupations of the ladies, apart from the time dedicated to outward offices of charity among their neighbours, or spent in private devotion, it would appear that they consisted in storing their minds with the instructions of wisdom, and the impressions of eternity, by transcribing, daily, portions out of the writings of the ancient ascetic and spiritual divines, as in the way of school exercises or themes. Many of these manuscripts are yet in existence in Miss Gibbon's handwriting, comprising selections from Thaulerus, and other deeply experimental writers of the same class, including copies of some of Lee's MSS., which had probably been given out to them for that purpose, by Mr. Law. The writer has also a MS. of Mrs. Hutcheson's, which is a translation from a tract in the second volume of Madame Guyon's "Opusculs," a volume but little known to English christians, but full of suggestive and profitable instruction; more especially the pieces in it by Père La Combe, for the eradication of self-love, and the establishment of perfect charity in the soul. This is also from Lee.

Music was of course, a favourite recreation with a philosopher so conversant with the ground and powers of nature, as was Mr. Law. On the day of the annual audit of the charities founded by Mrs. Hutcheson and herself, it was their custom to entertain the trustees at dinner, after which Miss Gibbon played on the organ. It was at the Easter audit of 1761, that Mr. Law caught a cold, which terminated in his death about ten days afterwards, striking to the seat of that nephritic affection to which he was subject.—The reader who is acquainted with his practical writings, may remember how, in recommending singing and chanting at private devotion, 'he endeavours to show that every one can sing sufficiently well for the purposes of devotion; and though the art or science of running through a compass of notes in mathematical precision, may not be possessed by all in such a degree as to qualify them for affording delight to others, yet that the psalms ought certainly to be chanted, both in private and public worship. Hence may have arisen a custom at the church of King's-Cliffe, where several parts of the office are performed in that manner, the rector of the time, it may be, conceding the point to his suggestions.'

The collector of some of the particulars here related also remarks, that some notion may be formed of Mr. Law's knowledge of languages, and style of reading, from the collection of books bequeathed by him for the use of his townsmen, and now in the school-house at King's-Cliffe. Part of his private library however we have good reason to know, has been dispersed; 'indeed,' said a member of the family to the writer of these lines, 'about the year 1800 or 1801, boxes upon boxes, full of volumes, were disposed of by the extravagant inheritors of Miss Gibbon's property, Mr. William Law and his parents Mr. and Mrs. Law (who resided with him), to a Mr. Lowe, bookseller, of Holborn, the brother of the last-mentioned lady. This library consisted of the works of French and other continental divines, of many of the writings of the fathers, and of authors in the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, German, and Dutch languages, almost all relating to theology. But we shall presently see how Mr. Law was chiefly occupied in his study.

As no authentic portrait of Mr. Law is in existence, (for it may just be mentioned that the one inserted in the spurious edition of the "Serious Call," referred to in the note of p. 105, is but imaginary, and, in all probability, as stupid and inconsistent in its pretensions, as the literary preface to that treatise,) we avail ourselves of a place in this account of his domestic life, to give a sketch of his personal appearance, as nearly as can be gathered from the testimony left upon record, assisted by our knowledge of his character. [If our endeavours to obtain possession of his skull should be crowned with success, we shall then, perhaps, be enabled to offer a more just and complete delineation of his exterior; his hardy, economic, physical training, and classically tutored mind, rendering it probable that nature in him was regular and true, and that his intellectual and sensual organs, with their qualities, were a manifestation of his natural spirit.] In stature, Mr. Law was rather over than under the middle size; his frame not corpulent, but stoutly built, and kept in healthy action by the unflinching discipline and regularity of his habits. The general form of his countenance was round; and he possessed a blunt felicitous readiness of utterance. He had well proportioned features, which were recommended by a cheerful open expression, and probably became more decided as he advanced in years, the natural effect of his strong judgment, and of the studious gravity of his youth. His face was ruddy; his eyes, grey, clear, vivacious, sparkling with noble benignity, and with the keen wit which as his writings testify, was always ruled like a well broken but generous steed, by his superior wisdom. His general manner was lively and unaffected, and though his walk and conversation among his friends was that of a sage, we have the testimony of Mr. Hartley, the then rector of Winwick, in a note to his Defence of the Mystic Writers, at the end of his "Paradise Restored," that he was accustomed to see company, and was a man of a free conversation. A sister of the celebrated Wesleys, who once saw him, but whose opinion may have been somewhat biased by her study of the strict and holy principles of his practical treatises, as well as by what her brothers might have reported concerning his oracular diction, and seeming moroseness and unfeelingness when they personally consulted him, describes him as the very picture of the Law itself, for severity and gravity. But as a proof that the conception of this extreme rigour as characteristic of Mr. Law's habitual appearance and manner could not be altogether correct, the writer has in his possession a letter written by Mr. Thomas Langcake, in which he recalls to mind, that he had often seen Mr. Law sporting with his nephew's children after dinner; with great sweetness and simplicity tossing them up and down on his foot. But his noble, affectionate disposition may be observed in his correspondence with his private friends. The report is current, that so amiable and benevolent was his mind, that he could never look with pleasure on a bird in a cage, but he longed to set the captive free; and, when he could do it inoffensively, he would open the latch of the cage door, to give the little inmate a chance of escaping. Perhaps the gravity of his looks and demeanour was a little heightened by the soberness of his dress, which was usually a clerical hat, with the loops let down, black coat, and grey wig. And, as respects his behaviour whilst he was open and free to the humble and sincere, he may have purposely assumed a rigid bearing toward the fawning Moravian and sectarian leaders, who, we find by his letters, occasionally, with great affectation of respect and humility, made attempts upon him; he might have thought, to spy out the nakedness of the land were they come.

best

The presence of Mr. Law, doubtless, contributed to make the establishment of the Hall Yard a blessed place of retreat for the two ladies, whose income was devoted to acts of benevolence, and all their time to pious, rational, and useful pursuits. This religious retirement, under the direction of a wise and spiritual adviser, and this use of their fortunes and time, so opposed to the empty customs of the world of fashion, was only according to the common principles of christianity, as elucidated in the earlier chapters of the 'Serious Call,'—not to mention the special overruling providence of God in calling Mr. Law, like another Baptist, into the silence of a wilderness, where he might, without distraction, prosecute the remaining portion of his peculiar mission to the world; through the aid of the two rich and honourable women, his companions, whose regard he abundantly repaid by the offices of kindness and religion which he rendered to them.

For Mr. Law's relationship to these ladies was not alone that of a spiritual director; he was also their superintending guardian, and consulting friend, in matters which demanded the exercise of business habits, prudence, and judgment. Among the illustrations we hold of his services in this respect may be mentioned the following, in which the historian Gibbon again comes under notice.

The elder Gibbon, the grandfather of the historian, was a staunch orthodox old gentleman, in christianity as well as politics (as may be supposed from his having selected the author of the "Unlawfulness of the Stage Entertainment Demonstrated," the "Christian Perfection," and "Three Letters to Hoadley," for the tutor of his only son), who had probably sufficient reason for that dissatisfaction with the connections into which his son had entered by marriage after a tour on the Continent; which is alleged by the historian, in his egotistical autobiography, to have been the cause of his grandfather having enriched his two daughters, Catherine and Hester, at the expense of his only son. There is no direct evidence that the mother of the historian belonged to an irreligious family; but it comes out (by the evidence of original letters now before the writer) that his father was intimately acquainted with certain reputed freethinkers or infidels at, or soon after her decease, which took place in 1747, when the historian was about ten years of age; and it is by no means an unnatural inference that that connection had been brought by his marriage, and both perhaps by his tour on the Continent, without an adviser or companion, save his 'cousin, Ned Acton.' For Gibbon significantly remarks in relation to his father and Mr. Law, "the mind of a saint is either above or below the present world; and while the pupil proceeded on his travels, the tutor remained at Putney, the much honored friend and spiritual director to the whole family." Be this c'est-à-dire de l'esprit à la matière. Mais ce n'est point par ses figures purement allégoriques qu'on doit juger le fond de la doctrine. Au reste, les deux ouvrages précédents ont paru en allemand as it may, we find the historian's father married again in 1755 to a relative of the Mallets, who were certainly freethinkers or infidels: and to their acquaintance he had introduced his niece, Miss Elliston, the only child of his sister Catherine, who had married about the year 1733—4. [Mr. Mallet edited the posthumous works of Bolingbroke, in 1756, and was doubtless well known before then as interested in that philosophy.]

This young lady was heiress of a very considerable estate, and an orphan; her father and only surviving parent having died in 1747, the same year as the mother of the historian. It would seem that she had resided, first with a relative at Dew's-Hall, and afterwards with her uncle, Mr. Gibbon, at Putney, through whom she became acquainted with Mr. and Mrs. Mallet, who were people of fashion, and apparently well connected with the ranks of the aristocracy. It was sometime before Mr. Gibbon's second marriage, about the year 1754, that Miss Elliston, without advising with her uncle, left his home under the influence of the parties alluded to, and went to reside with them, to the great concern of her piously-disposed aunt, Miss Hester Gibbon, when she heard of it at King's-Cliffe. Shortly afterwards, the latter being in town on a visit, took the opportunity of remonstrating with her niece on the impropriety of the connexion she had formed; fearing, perhaps, that its influence would be rendered permanent by what really took place the following year, when Miss Elliston was married to Edward Eliot, Esq., sometime afterwards created Lord Eliot, of Port Eliot. It would appear from the letters we are about to quote (and from others) that the altercation on this subject was carried on with considerable harshness of language and dictatorialness of manner, on the part of Miss Gibbon, who had also come to an open rupture with her brother on the same subject. The result was, Miss Gibbon was allowed to leave town without her niece, or any of the family, calling to offer her the usual courtesy of a farewell. The following letter, however (the original itself being before us) immediately followed Miss Gibbon to King's-Cliffe:—

"Putney, June the 12th, 1755.—Madam—As I suffered you to go out of town without wishing you a good journey, I think myself bound to give you some reason for such behaviour. No respect from me to you should have been wanting, had not you yourself first given cause for it, by what you thought proper to say of my friends; for such I have always found them, at all times, and upon all occasions. My ingratitude would therefore be of the blackest dye, should I hesitate a moment, in all places, and before all people, to confess the obligations I owed them, and to vindicate their character wherever it was calumniated.

"The injurious expressions you made use of towards them, especially to Mrs. Mallet, I could not to your face have answered as I ought, but now the contradiction will be much stronger, as you will have it under my hand; and if it was the last sentence I should speak, these would be my words, That the aspersion was as false as heaven is true.

"As this may be the last request I may ever make to you, I beg you to keep this letter, that if ever the time should come, which you foretell it will, you may confront me with my own handwriting; but till then it will be my justification.

"I have been so busy preparing for a long journey that I am going to take, that I have not had time to write to you before.

"As the nature of the things said were too shocking to be repeated to any body concerned, so 'tis almost needless to assure you that the contents of this letter were alone dictated by the real sentiments of—Madam, your obedient humble servant,—CATHERINE ELLISTON."

On the perusal of this very spirited epistle of the young lady, her aunt was doubtless no little chagrined, and immediately sketched out the following reply, which is certainly not of the first order of classic composition. Our motive for perpetuating it is simply to illustrate the services of Mr. Law, by its contrast with the reply which was actually sent.

"If Miss Elliston had not lost all sense of duty both to God and man, she would not treat in such a saucy and contemptible a manner her who is the nearest female relation she has, and the only surviving sponsor at her baptism; and for no other reason than for acting as suitable as I could to these relations I bear to her, and this she may (if she pleases) remember I told her, when we conversed last together; and if ever her heart comes to be softened with prayer, and turned to God in true humility, she will then be shocked at this epistle which she has earnestly desired me to treasure up, though it must be deemed a monument of shame to all sincere sober minded Christians that reads it.—That you may begin the preparation for a happy eternity, and be speedily loosed from the bands of blasphemy, hypocrisy, and infidelity, is the right hearty prayer of—Your real affectionate Aunt."

Before dispatching this elegant effusion, Miss Gibbon submitted it to Mr. Law, who of course saw that its style and contents would neither be creditable to the writer nor accomplish the object for which it was sent. He therefore took up his pen, and reproduced it for her (off-hand, as the MS. now before us evinces), in the following terms. And the reader will observe that there is a remarkable felicity of expression and weight of reason infused into this transformed document, which must have come with electric effect upon the fair, and as the event proved, innocent Catherine. This happy and powerful style of writing was a great feature in Mr. Law's genius: habits of thinking and speaking justly, and in musical cadence, with a fund of most pungent and refreshing wit and irony ever ready at his hand, were thoroughly formed in his mind; but it may be a question whether he would have pointed the retort so sharply, were it not for his wish to please his friend Miss Gibbon. The improved edition of the letter thus proceeds:—

"My dear Niece,—For so I must call you, and think of you, notwithstanding all the means you have taken, or shall hereafter take, to alienate my mind from you.

"For neither religion, nor nature will suffer me to forget or disregard that two-fold relation I bear to you, as standing with the nearest to you in blood, and the only surviving relation that stood sponsor to you when you were consecrated to God at your baptism. Nor will I ever, by God's grace, say or do anything to you but in conformity to these relations, and as suitable to all that goodness which I wish both to myself and you.

"You had no occasion to write to me but as I was your aunt, and therefore to write in a style so rude and haughty, as your own conscience shewed you, was inconsistent with your owning me to be such, is too full a proof that I did not cry out before you were hurt, or give you too high a view of the evil you were to expect from the way that you were in.

"You complain of being shocked at my expressions, but had your poor mother or her good father lived to see you shut up among infidels, rejoicing in their friendship, and thankful for having a seat where dead Bolingbroke yet speaketh, you would have met with a treatment from them much more shocking than you had from me.

"And if I spoke what I have spoken, as standing as well as I can in their place, full of the same love and care for you as they bore to their offspring, you ought, instead of disowning me as an aunt, to have regarded me as a parent.

"You desire it as your last dear request to me, to preserve your letter, which blots out the idea of niece and aunt between us, and seem fearful that I should think you not good enough to have written it without any help, solely from the sentiments of your own heart.

"But, if you had one remaining spark of grace not yet extinguished by your infidel friends, you could not think of my reading it without tears in your eyes.

"It would be a great comfort to me if I knew how to touch your heart, or to break that detestable union you have entered into with the most open, barefaced, blasphemous scorners of Him who alone can preserve you from being as miserable as Judas Iscariot.

"Talk not of gratitude to infidel friends; their friendship is of no better a nature than that which kindly gave thirty pieces of silver to Judas, and both you and your unhappy uncle sooner or later must find, that falseness, baseness, and hypocrisy, make the whole heart and spirit of every blasphemer of Jesus Christ.

"It would be less pain to me, or your deceased friends whom I have mentioned, to see you attending a dung-cart for the sake of bread, than riding in a coach of your own crowded with beloved infidels.

"Though I despair of any power to do you good myself, yet I have trust in God that he will not give you up to your own strong delusion, and in this trust I shall be constant in prayer to God for you, however unwilling you may be to own me under the character of—Your Christian aunt, HESTER GIBBON."

Thus far, in illustration of the point in question, with respect to the affairs of Miss Gibbon. But we cannot allow the opportunity to pass without throwing a little further light on the sentiments of her nephew, the Historian, as we are enabled to do by some other of the documents from which the above are taken.

We have early intimated (p. 371-2) our conviction of the change which took place in his opinions after reading the just and noble representations of the nature and design of christianity, contained in the writings of Mr. Law, when the leisure afforded by the interval between the completion of his great work and the commencement of his autobiography, permitted him to review calmly and reflectively his own position. He was then able to judge more dispassionately both of philosophy and religion than he had been able to do while hotly engaged in historical researches, and gazing vacantly at the strange contradiction which everywhere met his eye between the faith and practice of the professed christian world. That conjecture is completely confirmed by the following two letters to Miss Gibbon, the first of which is from the historian's friend, Lord Sheffield:—

"Sheffield-house, 27 Oct. 1786.—Madam—I have delayed the pleasure of writing to you (and it has been with much concern) because I could say nothing satisfactory to you relative to the wreck of last winter. I mentioned in a former letter that the Custom-house officers had put a padlock on the store where the wrecked wine was placed, and insist that it must remain one year and a day before you can consider it as your property. I was disposed to break the padlock, but I was apprehensive of involving you in a law suit with the commissioners of the Customs. I have tried other means to no purpose, but as the year and day will now soon finish, we cannot be delayed much longer. * * *

"I had the pleasure of hearing of Mr. Gibbon this morning, by a letter from Sir Henry Clinton, which mentions that he had seen him in good health, about a fortnight ago, at Lausanne. You say you wish he would let alone publishing more. He finds his works a very necessary pecuniary resource; but you may be assured that he will publish nothing in future in the least disrespectful to the christian religion. The continuation of his history may lead him to mention the establishment of the Mahometan religion, which he may do without offence. Lady Sheffield begs leave to join her best compliments with mine.—I am, Madam, Your most faithful, humble servant—SHEFFIELD."

If any doubt should still linger in the mind of the reader as to the real meaning and reason of the assurance given at the end of the above epistle, it will doubtless be removed by the following, written by the historian himself, about three years later, to the same lady, his aunt, and which, penned for her private satisfaction, is perfectly explicit, and far removed from suspicion as speaking the real sentiments of his heart. Its contents are as follows:—

"Sheffield-place, June 30, 1788.—Dear Madam—I was truly disappointed that you could not admit my visit this spring, and still more concerned at the motive of your refusal, yet I was glad to hear of your indisposition from your own pen: the firmness of the hand and style gave the most pleasing assurance of your strength; and I most sincerely hope that your recovery will be completed and established by the return of summer. I am now preparing, by a last visit to Lord and Lady Sheffield, for my departure to the continent, and I purpose being at Lausanne before the end of next month. I feel as I ought your kind anxiety at my leaving England, but you will not disapprove my choosing the place most agreeable to my circumstances and temper, and I need not remind you that all countries are under the care of the same providence. Your good wishes and advice will not, I trust, be thrown away on a barren soil, and whatever you may have been told of my opinions, I can assure you with truth that I consider religion as the best guide of youth and the best support of old age, that I firmly believe there is less real happiness in the business and pleasures of the world than in the life which you have chosen of devotion and retirement. Lord and Lady Eliot have passed the winter in Cornwall, but I have seen their sons in town. Poor Sir

Stanier Porter is still alive, that is all I can say, but his strength decays, and his understanding is quite gone. As Lord Sheffield proposes to enclose his letter in the same frank with mine, I shall say nothing of him or his family, and only hope you may be satisfied with the state of your affairs in Sussex.—I am, dear Madam, most affectionately yours,—E. To return from this digression. A further illustration of Mr. Law's homme d'affaires talent, and services, might be given from the concerns of Mrs. Hutcheson, but this may be reserved for the proposed larger biography. Other examples from Mr. Law's extensive correspondence, not only during the period under review, but after the publication of the "Spirit of Prayer," and subsequent works, may be noticed in due time in the following pages. What has been above related will suffice to acquaint the reader with the intellectual and religious light which Mr. Law threw around him in domestic life, and the genius, so to speak, with which its ordinary common-place business was managed under his direction, as well as the amiability, the dignity, and the piety which governed all his intercourse with his friends. We now propose to take a view of him in his more retired and contemplative life; and for that purpose shall go back to the years 1747 and 1748, when being freed from all outward anxieties, he became permanently settled at King's-Cliffe.

His study was a recess or little cell, about four feet square, parted off from his bedchamber by a wainscoting. Looking through the ancient mullion window which lighted this apartment, the eye of its occupant would rest on the cheerful garden belonging to the house, and thence out to a distance on a composing rural landscape. The only furniture this recess contained was a chair, a writing-table, the sacred Scriptures, the complete works of Behmen in the original, with the translations of several in English, the MSS. writings of Freher, the papers of Francis Lee, and sundry other select authors, in print and manuscript, who had minutely examined, one this and another that particular of the ground of divine and natural truth, which both in its general and relative character, was familiar to his comprehensive and exact understanding. In the quiet of this retired closet (where he is just entered), behold now the christian philosopher: selecting from his little collection, and perusing for a sufficient period of time some enfaming devotional fragment, and then solemnly committing himself to God in faithful prayer. Now winged up in the ardours of vocal adoration and importunate entreaty, and, having received the infusion or baptism of the full composition, then prostrating himself, body and soul, in abyssal silence before the interior central throne of the divine revelation; and, according to his high supersensual science — (as philosophically set forth in the third part of the Grammar of Wisdom, and diversely illustrated in the experimental writings of Thaulerus, Evangelista, Canfield, and other eminent orthodox mystical divines, not omitting mention of Francis Lee;) behold him, we say — presenting the now passive, desireless, resigned mirror-eye of his purified will and intellect, to the free, active, gladsome, supercogitative researches of the Spirit of Wisdom and openings of the Divine Life. From which theosophic contemplations he in due time arose, to note down his apprehensions, which so far as was needful he afterwards translated into that Babel form of thought and language common to the present state of mankind. As Mr. Law knew God to be both all truth, and the knowledge of it, so he sought for wisdom where and how only it could be found; hence the exercises above intimated, and hence he so emphatically insists upon christian regeneration, and the several advanced stages and growths of it, as the sole gate to true divine science, both of intellectual and physical nature. [See B's. 3f. Life, iii. 29-33; iv. 23, 24.]

We have stated, p. 225-7, that Mr. Law obtained the loan of Lee's MSS., which remained with him until his death, and not being returned, came into the possession of Miss Gibbon and her successors in the property at King's-Cliffe. Since the note referred to was penned, these MSS. have passed into the possession of the writer of these lines, but he regrets to say that the "Life" of Dr. Francis Lee, as mentioned by his daughter (Mrs. Deborah Jemima De La Fontaine) in the preface to the "Dissertations," is not amongst them, nor does it appear on inquiry to have been so for the last half century past; which leaves reason to fear that it has been either abstracted by someone who formerly had access to the documents, or that it had been borrowed and not returned. It is to be hoped that this most interesting and most valuable document, drawn up by Dr. Thomas Haywood, will yet be discovered, for the interests of enlightened evangelical piety, and the benefit and delectation of the lovers and seekers of accomplished christian science. It is no little praise of Lee that he was esteemed by such a perfected, unidoeatic, original theologian as Mr. Law; considering how very few could be admired by him for pure, simple, experimental gospel theology, and original researches in divine philosophy; the mass of religious authors (especially of the protestant school) with few exceptions, being but as it were feeble boggling schoolboys, in comparison of his sublime master understanding of the scheme, the nature and design of "the mystery" of christianity: which indeed comprehends "all things," God, nature, creature, and all the possibilities and actualities of the working of truth and error.

The reader has already had an opportunity of perusing some of the effusions of this highly gifted soul, and brilliant devout genius, Lee. Commencing with the faithful practice of the pure Anglican church piety, as exhibited in her Order of Common Prayer, which he carried to its highest proficiency; and thence ascending, through the gate of a sensible regeneration, the mystic ladder of the progressive births and growths of the divine life — (by the use of true and assured means, discovered by him in the mystical spiritual writers, and consisting equally in a daily dying to self, and an actual rising on the wings of importunate faith and prayer, watchfulness and recollection,) — Lee presents a fine example of an ingenious high cultivation of the spiritual life, having a constant reference to, and virtual experience of, the process of Christ: though the unmortified propounders of a merely elementary christianity vainly imagine, that in the more advanced or mystical stages of christian experience, (where the crucifixion of all self is to be carried on by the inceneration of the spirit of humility,) the patient (yet active) subjects of this state, lose sight of Christ as their mediator and high priest before God. This point was particularly referred to by Lee, in his letter on "Passive Contemplation," inserted p. 91; the conclusion of which, on account of its relation to the subject of our present observations, we purpose now to present to the reader, and should an opportunity occur to insert also some further additional illustrations of the author's pious erudition, mental power, and poetic talent. From which (awaiting the publication of his MSS.) the reader will doubtless feel still further induced to agree with the learned Ockley respecting the genius of Lee, as being the grand eagle spirit in evangelical matters of his age (immediately preceding and introductory to that of Law); philosophically searching into and proving all pretenders to Divine illumination, and allowing none, however seemingly recondite, a place in the category of theological savans, unless his principles and daily practice were characterised by the ancient spirit of devotion, and that holy mortification, humility, and self-denial, which are implied in it. Being a first-rate Arabic scholar, he made great researches into the religious christian literature existing in that ancient language, and wrote translations of several very interesting pieces, which are now in the possession of the writer, some of them being copied in the handwriting of Mr. Law: (when convenient, a list of his MSS. will be herein inserted.) The continuation from p. 173 of the piece on "PASSIVE CONTEMPLATION" then runs thus:—

"—on his throne. He hereby becomes our everlasting priest and king as well as a prophet, to reveal unto us the whole will of God, and the length and depth and breadth of his love to usward. He offers up in us pure incense, in which there is nothing of man's composition: and he commands in us both as the King of Righteousness and also as the Prince of Peace, with an absolute sceptre, and without dividing his dominion to any. All this is nothing but the natural result of that Passive Contemplation which I am contending for, as you will easily find by a little application; because that Christ himself, as he is the union of God and man, is both the way and the truth of it.

Moreover, as he is the way and truth, so also the life of pure Contemplation, and the soul that shall arrive to it, may then truly indeed cry out, It is no longer I that live, but Christ that liveth in me. For the soul being in it doth not properly live its own life: it doth not reason; but he who is the eternal reason reasoneth in the soul, or giveth himself, and in himself all things to be seen. It doth not will; but he who came into the world to do the will of the Father, is come into the soul to do his will, and he alone willeth there, in such a manner as the will of the Father, of Christ, and of the soul are all three but one will: it doth not remember, for all old things are passed away, and is as redeemed (for that season) out of the earth and temporal nature; only the spirit of Christ bringeth to remembrance whatever pleaseth him: it imagineth not, being lifted out of and above all images, by being brought into the possession of the truth itself; but the truth imagineth itself upon the soul, in which all the ideas of the archetypal and angelical worlds are contained, and will spring forth; and so this divine imagination of the truth maketh all things new in the soul, as likewise in all nature internal and external, and is the proper medium or instrument of the new creation, and of the new Jerusalem descending out of heaven: it doth not perceive, being out of the bodily senses, ravished into a state that is altogether supersensual, which no eye hath seen, neither can tongue express; but the body of Christ being the body of his whole church, and no less of every particular member, the soul, after its purification, is taken into the body of Christ, [N.B.] and in that it seeth, heareth &c. the heavenly objects, sounds &c. by a free and passive reception of the same into the mind, which is become the mind of Christ. But till souls be purified from the mortal body by the [advanced] prayer of simple abstraction, there can be no such free and pure reception of the divine objects, lights, voices, tastes &c.; but there must be some impurity and mixture still adhering to them, which will remain so long as any activity of their own remains, or so long as they are not perfectly separated from the body of sin, in the exercise of Contemplation, and so united to the body of righteousness, which is Christ. So that herein is the greatest security; and the life of Contemplation is a most strong fortress, against which none of the gates of hell shall be able to prevail, forasmuch as it is the very life of Christ in the soul. He who is arrived to the blessed state [as Mr. Law, in the profound devotional absorption in which he was lately regarded, for he had these very papers before his eyes, with the demonstrative instructions of Behmen, a synopsis by Freher, of the P. Evangelista's "Kingdom of God in the soul," &c. &c.] puts forth no acts of his own life, but is led and acted wholly (yet freely) by the divine life in him: he has no ratiocination, volition, memory, imagination, or sensation which he can call his own; but all is surrendered up, and all proceeds again from a new spring of life; which is not his but Christ's. And in this new life, which can never perfectly be attained without Contemplation, is the will of our God to be done by us upon earth, as it is done by the angels in heaven, who though they are continually contemplating his face, yet are also always ready to be sent forth as ministering spirits from him, to execute all his commands. Hereby likewise we feed upon the hidden manna, we sup with Christ and Christ with us; the door being opened to Him by naked faith, in a total abstraction from the flesh, and the senses thereof. So that there is an end of iniquity and transgression, and we are cleansed from all sin by the blood of the Lamb, to walk with him in white. And then following him in white we are made priests with him, and intercessors for others, that they likewise may obtain mercy and be purified from every evil that so easily besets them, being brought into the same state of holy contemplation, and called up again into their primitive inheritance of the divine light. Thus we come to live as translated out of the wilderness of this wicked world, and are secured against all temptations, having our conversation in heaven, where the malice of the evil one (τὸ πονηρὸν) cannot reach us: and the kingdom of God is made manifest in our souls, and his power is revealed, and his glory is spread forth to the utter confusion of the creature; and then is that new name given upon the whitestone, whereby the name of our Heavenly Father is no less hallowed in the earth than in the heavens. For it is the very name of this our Heavenly Father (whom we can now most truly call so) written, and sealed, upon us invisibly and visibly. And having once obtained this name [N.B. the true scope of the mind of Jesus; he looked no lower than at the high perfection and glory of an original and redeemed birthright], there is nothing which we shall ask in it either for ourselves or for others, but it shall be perfectly and fully answered: and we shall not pray afterwards in vain, any one petition of that prayer which Christ has taught us, but shall see the complete fulfilling of the same both in ourselves, and in all them that we pray for and with. Thus it appears that the life of Contemplation is the life of Christ in the soul, the life of God in man, and the wonderful gate of the Holy Ghost, and the powers thereof: and that it is not only warrantable, but laudable to wrestle against the senses, and even against all the imaginations and thoughts of our own hearts, by means of the highest and most perfect abstraction; and to press after the mark of this life, to believe and pray for it, to retire and wait much in the presence of God, and so by ceasing from all operations of our own, and all self-willings, though never so apparently good, to stand still and see what Christ, our life, will do for us, and in us, so soon as we shall hereby have given up ourselves to his sole and immediate conduct. And if this be unchristian, I know not what is christian; it is the way that I desire to be found in, and the truth which I court, and the life which will not make me ashamed before the face of my righteous Judge. [And if this is the highest truth, what is Swedenborgian theology, but pure antichristian phantasy and delusion, or "madness," as expressed below?]

If now I have cleared this point to you, or am made rather an instrument to direct you to Him who alone is able to clear it, and to clear it fully, I shall heartily rejoice in Him; and you will have cause to say that, Great is the truth: but I have made use only of one topic, whereas I could have made use of many others. However it is that which I take to be the most considerable, as it was also the first which came to my mind; there being nothing more strongly imprinted in it than this axiom of my blessed Lord, I am the way, the truth, and the life; or than this dear salutation from his adorable mouth, 'I will be thy way, thy truth, and thy life;' and this is so far from being exhausted by what I have said upon it, as I doubt not but you will be able to say much more, and to draw thence beside many corollaries both delightful and profitable in the christian race. As for other arguments it would be quite unnecessary to heap them together, if this one be able to bear the shock: and if this will not, a multitude will not help, or help but little. I find arguments not a few both in the Gospels and in the Epistles, that do establish the doctrine I have been pleading for, and serve to remove that grand objection of our friend (and with it all other objections too), and such as do it unanswerably, if I understand them: which you also of yourself will easily find out by the key that has here been given. But not only the New Testament, but also the Law, the Psalms, and the Prophets will be found after a just inquiry to patronise and recommend to us the state of Silent Abstraction, and to lead us in the noble path of Contemplation, after Enoch, Moses, Elias, David, and other great worthies. What is contained under the institution of sacrifices, and the whole Levitical Law, hath all a reference to this matter, either near or more remote: the tabernacle and the temple are never to be understood without it; the office of the high priest will be still little better than a riddle, even after all the history which we have of his antitype; and the establishment of the Colleges of the Prophets will be most absurd and unaccountable. The truth of all is within the veil: and there is no passing there but by the contemplative soul; and none can assist the soul in breaking through the veil, by the deepest abnegation of her own power and the most profound exercise of Contemplation and silent watchfulness, but Christ alone. Therefore as Christ is the fulfilling of the Law and of the Prophets, so also is Contemplation the key which leads us into their inward cabinets, and the mirror in which we may behold all their wonders.

But notwithstanding all this it must be confessed, [N.B.] that the too early affecting and endeavouring after this state may be highly dangerous to many souls: for that not a few would be glad to be at the end of the journey, before they have gone perhaps two or three fair steps in it. And [N.B.] souls that come to it unprepared do very often overset themselves, and make shipwreck of the death of Christ, and of the resurrection from the dead; putting themselves out of his protection, as not being led by his Spirit, but by their own. Wherefore if we have a longing to enter into this most excellent path, we must not fail to pray the Father assiduously and confidently that he would give us his Holy Spirit that may purify us in spirit, soul and body, that so we may be fit to walk therein. And especially ought we never to let go out of our mind the word of our Lord, that it is the pure in heart that shall contemplate God; and therefore no other can contemplate him. For the blessing has a regard both to this life and to the next; as also the rest of the blessings. We are taught from the mount that purity of heart is necessary to the attainment of the vision of God, in this blessed state of the kingdom of heaven upon earth, this silent path of peace and joy inexpressible: and without this purity all Contemplation [or visionism] that can be pretended to, how glittering soever it may appear to some, is nothing but mere rantism and madness. Wherefore, Dear Sir, I do not fear but you will seek after holiness, and wait at wisdom's gates, and be obedient to her discipline, that after a due term of days [i.e. by unceasing diligence in prayer, watchfulness, mortification, and dying to all self,] you may be admitted into her palace, and advanced to this state; which is so very lovely and desirable, as every hour (if your heart be struck, as I believe it is) will appear a year until you can attain. So it did to the ancient hermits, and to the holy fathers (whose names they that are most against us have so due a reverence for), who never thought that they could do or suffer enough, that they might be made partakers of this heavenly gift, which was very far from being a relief of Paganism in them, as is pretended; unless the belief of a Deity may be called so too. And supposing that it were so, it must have introduced of necessity whole Paganism again; forasmuch as they did still represent this state as a state of communion betwixt the Divine Word and the soul, which must have been (upon that supposition) nothing else but a state of communion with impure demons and the malicious spirit of darkness, presenting themselves to them in the name of Christ, the heavenly Word. The consequences whereof I leave you to consider, being too many for me to mention. So that these holy men did not retain this as it was part of the Ethnic religion, but only as it was a true (and precious) relict of the patriarchal religion which the Ethnic had transferred and corrupted; and they therefore did restore and bring back with them according to the primitive design, and according also to the clearer Light which was now revealed to them in the face of Jesus Christ, manifested in the truth.

There is a book of Benedictus Anglus which for the settling you fully as to this matter deserves to be recommended to your perusal, if you can procure it in either Latin or English, which bears for title De Triplici Voluntate Dei; whose two first parts do make in English The Rule of Perfection, and the third The Bright Star. [Canfield's "Rule of Perfection," already recommended by the writer hereof, the third part only after the acquisition of the two previous parts.] I have found much benefit by it; but the last part in the English wants of that union which is found in that of the two former. The sum of all is contained in the exercise of the Divine Will.

Now the activity of a soul that is arrived to this state, will not be less, but greater than it was before; it will be more central and deeper but not so sensible and outward. For by being made

Mais Kirchberger, familiarisé davantage avec les principes de ce livre, le regarde, au contraire, comme le plus riche en pensées lumineuses; et l'auteur même convient qu'en effet il s'y trouve passive to the divine energy, it loses nothing of those forces which it had in its first creation, or constitution, but being renewed it becomes by many degrees, more quick, powerful, and penetrating than it was before. Of which I have several special observations to make; but am prevented by the female Quietist of France [Madame Guyon], who has said enough upon this matter: I think better cannot be said.

As for the author of the Parrhasiana your remarks I find to be very solid, and his treatment of Mr. Poiret very disingenuous and à la cavalière. If the Divine Economy of this learned man be but one piece of enthusiasm from one end to the other, they that know Mr. Clerc will be apt to say, from the specimens that he has hitherto given of his skill, that he is not able with all his reason to do anything upon the subjects there treated of that shall agree better with good sense, or with itself. And some will conclude, who have taken the pains to examine but a little, that notwithstanding all his self confidence, he will find it a hard matter to write a book upon any subject whatever but a tenth part so large, that shall not have quite as many enthusiasms, and ten times the inconsistencies.

Sir, what I have written to you, you may communicate as you please, but with all due caution; and in what else I can further serve you, you may assuredly command.—Your most affectionate servant in Christ.—F. LEE. Hogsden (Hoxton), August 9th. 1700.—I have desired Mr. Blundell to do me justice to my friends, and the friends of truth."

Since the notes of p. 221-3, and of 226-7, were inserted in this work, the writer has discovered among the remainder of Lee's papers, (recently come into his possession) the adjoining portions of their interesting contents. It now appears, they originally consisted of three documents, which were drawn up by Lee to accompany a letter (which we also possess) written by him in September 1702, to his "very worthy friend, The Reverend Mr. Stevens, of Cane Wood," (Edward Stevens, the author of "Ancient Ascetics" and "Theologia Mystica") whose opinions of the Philadelphians, and of Lee's connection with them, may be gathered from his letter inserted in the note of p. 221, and to whom Lee was desirous to justify his principles and proceedings in that relation. The paper headed "Some Questions," p. 221, was marked C when it accompanied the letter, and that containing "the Case" of his connection with Mrs. Lead and the Philadelphians, was marked B. We have not yet discovered the A paper, therefore cannot present it. Considering the great interest which is attached to the case of Lee and Mrs. Lead, and the Philadelphia Society, we feel it not inconsistent to make a further digression from the direct course of our narrative, to present to the reader the commencement of the document which is given in the note of p. 226, there beginning with the words "of seventy years old," and ending in the following page: which is as follows:—

"(B.) The Case [of scandal]."—A, an ancient devoted matron [Mrs. Jane Lead] having left the world, and retired to end her days in a private cell, finds herself of a sudden much taken notice of without her own country; by the means of a book or two written and printed more than ten years before, but now first sent over into a neighbouring land, as by a seeming chance, from a merchant to his correspondent and friend there. Hereupon first one book, then another, is translated without delay into the languages of two considerable nations, and are greedily devoured by abundance of pious souls, moreover testimonials being given continually of the good effects which were produced by the reading hereof. Great inquiry is made after the author, B [Mr. Tischer, of Rotterdam] the person who translated these into the language of the greatest extent, takes occasion to write to her, and presses A very hard to communicate to him a copy of those MSS. which she had by her, having heard that she had written much. A is prevailed on to grant his request, and so hereby a correspondence was established betwixt A and B. Many others profess eagerly to desire it; and among the rest some men of learning. At the same time C, [Lee himself] a young man of good education, then travelling homewards, meets with some of these (and the first of them for certain, not without a very extraordinary hand of Providence, being made to return back to the place where he was,) at different stages; two being Doctors of Physic [Dr. Scot at Zol and Dr. B. at the Hague], and the third a Merchant [Mr. Finley at Rotterdam], that was considerable both for learning and prudence. This was at the very last stage, when C was just about to pass the sea into his own country; and he (the latter) being more particularly acquainted with C than the others (who were both perfect strangers) recommends to him at his return to pay a visit to A, gives him directions how to find her, and is solicitous for a transcript of her writings. C returns, and remembers his commission. He meets also with two other persons travelling into his country, being young students of divinity, and unacquainted with the language; part of whose design was to see and discourse with A. These three meeting together at a friend's house, soon after the return of C, make an appointment all to visit A at her place of retirement: who received them every one to satisfaction, C performing the office of an interpreter for the two strangers. This was followed by other visits, by which C obtained to have the sight of all her writings, which consisted for the most part but of loose papers, like the Sibylline leaves, occasionally penned for her own private memory and recollection, unless what had been thence transcribed by an ancient friend of hers. Out of these [N.B.] C collects and publishes a little book (query, the "Laws of Paradise;") which was presently translated here for the benefit of foreigners by another visitant of A [Mr. Freher] from a far country, and was published by B. Whereby many professed themselves much to be edified; but some who had been well enough satisfied with A before, began now to show their dissatisfaction; as judging that this tended mainly to the promoting a monastical or eremetical faith, which might be of very bad consequence, and destructive to society and commerce. And hereupon other suspicions were raised by some antipapists, and several arguments pretended to be found for a proof that the books of A were contrary to the spirit of the Reformation, and did proceed from a mere popish enthusiasm. Which jealousy might be somewhat augmented by her conversation with C, who was not unsuspected, for having refused to qualify himself according to the example of others in the same true condition and character with him. Thus A getting many friends and enemies together, C came also to be involved with A by the publication of this book. And C knew not how to desert A, thinking himself bound in generosity to stand by A to the utmost, as well as in des germes épars çà et là, dont il ignorait les propriétés en les semant, et qui se développaient chaque jour pour lui, depuis qu'il avait connu Jacob Bœhm.

Christianity; without some pregnant and evident reasons appearing to the contrary. Which not appearing to him, and this publication having been undertaken not only by him, but also upon his own motion, there was no going back. At the same time letters from beyond the seas, by the mediation of B, came thick to A; and A still communicated the same to C. Some of these were upon very great emergent affairs, and from persons of eminence in the world: to all which A answered and gave satisfaction in the resolution of several most difficult and weighty cases. But whatever came, or was returned, always passed through the hands of C, nothing of any kind being concealed from him. Thus by degrees there was a spiritual relation insensibly contracted betwixt A and C: A looks upon C as a spiritual son, given her in her old age; and C upon A as a spiritual mother. Further, A grows dark in her sight very fast, by a cataract falling into her eyes; which renders her unable to carry on the foreign correspondence which was now begun, and was daily also increasing: it was no longer possible by the help of her own eyes and hands alone to despatch the weight that had been laid upon her, without her seeking or thought. While this darkness in A grows, C transcribes the letters of A, so long as A had the use of so much light as to write a line legibly, and when this could be no longer, then A dictates to the pen of C all that she had a mind to write, either for herself, or for others: in which C was very exact.

At the same time C was wholly disengaged from the world, and lost to it. ["January 1682 Lee was admitted Fellow of St. John's, Oxford (entered 1679); he continued there about seven years afterward; but upon the Revolution which happened both in Church and State, he was obliged to quit an university life, and took an occasion thence of travelling into foreign parts, returning into England about the latter end of the year 1694. But not returning to the college to reside there and qualify himself, being summoned to it, his fellowship was declared void at the next following election. He was, June 25, 1708, admitted into the Royal College of Physicians, among the Licentiates, by Dr. Edward Brown, the president thereof, son of the famous Sir Thomas Brown." This from another of Lee's own MSS.] He had had some late surprising alarms to a spiritual retreat, and certain strong impulses and inclinations driving him to it in a manner almost irresistible. It had pleased God to remove from him by death not long before certain great friends, who had a very intimate affection for him, whereby he was released that he might depend solely upon the Divine Majesty. He had met with some very hard measures from the spirit of this world, and was condemned to lose a pretty handsome estate, for not being able to prove the sealing of a deed within less than four and twenty hours, when he was at above a thousand miles distance; and this too by the greatest court of the nation. He was also at this very time ejected the college whereof he was a member, and had been so for many years; wherein he could have lived with much content and pleasure, had there not been some certain propositions, which he could in no wise submit to without violating his conscience: by which means he was not only deprived of a pretty subsistence that was for life, but also of all those advantages that he might reap from an academical retirement, on several accounts most dear to him: and there was nothing but a small annuity now left him, which likewise had never yet been paid, though several years were due of it, and whereof payment had been denied upon repeated applications. So that C being in effect divested of all he had, was exposed naked to the more immediate care and tuition of that providence which had always provided for him in many signal extremities, and had strangely watched over him even from his infancy. Being in this state he desired to fulfil wholly the will of God, in whatever might relate to him: and casts himself entirely and blindfold upon God's most wise direction in all things, and especially in whatever might be of the greatest concern in his future life; frequently repeating these verses to himself:—

Behold great God me in the desert cast!—Behold me on the ocean rudely tost!

Do thou constrain:—I'll kiss thy chain.

Where'er thou wilt, my Lord, Thy steps I'll trace:—And unreining follow Thee apace.

In the meanwhile C carefully observes all that passes, compares one emergent with another; and examines the pretensions of A as well as he can, that he may know what is the true and acceptable will of God. And while C labours to procure an actual and particular knowledge of the determination of Divine providence, so far as it was lawful or possible for him; he finds in the life of A, after a strict examination, many things to supersede the guidance of human prudence, and to determine him to the entering upon a life of faith. In this naked faith, and implicit surrender of himself to God, he meets a great deal of ease; and God sometimes wonderfully answers him. Yet C is made to encounter with manifold temptations and trials; the God of this world puts on various shapes both to affright and allure him; doubts are frequently injected into him concerning this state of life, with much subtlety; and at the very same time a most singular offer was laid before him, beyond all that he durst presume to think of [from a certain lord's daughter], to take him off wholly from the thoughts of such a life of dependence. This continued for no small while, and it had been impossible for C not to accept it, had not the grace of God strongly pleaded with him in this manner, Wilt thou do that which though lawful in itself may be the occasion of any evil report against religion? So that C could find no inward ease but in quitting all foreign expectations, and in cleaving to God alone in the nakedness of faith, both as to temporals and spirituals. Now whereas there was trouble in the world, the peace which A had out of the world was so pleasing to C, that everything did much distress him which did tend in the least to the keeping of him still in the world. The light of God's countenance did seem to C to shine peculiarly upon A, her enemies were made to be at peace with her, her friends were multiplied on all sides, her low estate was turned as in a dream, and an invisible hand brought in supplies continually, yea abundance, to the great astonishment of C, who could only remember somewhat like it in antiquity. There was nothing but the decay of her sight to afflict her: and this made it inconvenient for her to be alone. A being now upwards [resumed at p. 226.]

"Upon the review of this Letter I find a mistake by me committed, in reference to the origin of evil, as from two co-eternal principles; by trusting to my own words as to what was written upon it in the Discourse to the Enochian walks. Which, though the author thereof doth not pretend indeed to have received by express voice; or by any visional manifestation, yet doth affect to have been revealed to her, being out of the reach of all human knowledge and wisdom: which is most certainly true. Yet however the substance may be matter of divine revelation, it must not hence be determined that the deductions and reasonings harmonizing in the delivery of it must be purely so also. It is to be noted likewise that there is an illumination of reason, which cannot be well distinguished from reason itself."

We propose, for the gratification no less than the edification of the reader, as well as with reference to our subject in hand, (and also as reflecting upon what was inserted in the note of pp. 234-7, as to the way in which Behmen's profound verities should be explicated and illustrated,) to present one more extract from the MSS. of the recondite and pious Lee, and then to proceed with our narrative. The reader will bear in mind what has been remarked concerning Mrs. Lead, and her visions, as being merely her own idiocratic conceptions from Behmen's ground, and how Lee became her learned apologist and defender with Dodwell and others; and also how he made her acquaintance, and became enamoured of her as an original transcendental spiritualist. The writer conceives that the first of her books, in the publication of which Lee interested himself, was "The Laws of Paradise," a small 18mo. published 1795. Upon this treatise many ingenious and critical remarks and inquiries were sent to him by his friends (some of the originals being now before the writer), to which he penned answers. The same also with respect to her subsequent works. In reference to these the writer finds an interesting MS. by Lee, headed "CONCERNING WISDOM," being an answer to two queries of deep interest. It is this piece (forming, indeed, an ANNOTATION, in the "GRAMMAR OF WISDOM,") which is now proposed to be given, as follows:—

Q. I.—What conception or idea is to be had of Divine Wisdom, to conciliate with it that personal apparition of her in the figure of an human Virgin, that performs several personal transactions, as instructing, leading, giving laws, &c.?

ANSWER.—How strange soever this may appear, yet is it no more than what may be well defended from the best and most authentic authors, if a due examination be made of them. And, in short, it cannot be unknown how this figurative idea of the Divine Wisdom is warrantable from the sacred writers, as that also of human wisdom is in like manner from profane writers. Not only Solomon in his Proverbs and Mystic Song, with the Sapiential book by us called Apocryphal, but certainly held by the Hellenistical school and primitive Christians in the highest veneration: and the Visions of Esdras (who seems to be cited, even in the gospel itself, for a true prophet).

But Christ himself represents to us Wisdom under the very same conception, attributing to her a personal act, and giving us an idea of her answerable to that of a mother, by making mention of her children. The disciple who lay in his bosom and best understood his mind, is perfectly agreeable hereto, being confirmed by what was shewn to him in heaven of this nature; and has left the church an account of two such personal apparitions, the one of the heavenly woman impregnated by the Divine seed, Rev. xii., and the other of the Divine bride and mother of Jerusalem, descending from God to pitch her tabernacle on the earth. Rev. xxi. And what need is there after this to mention the apparition of such a female to St. Hermas, an immediate successor of the apostles, at the beginning of his prophetic visitations; and the Laws of Admonitions, with the parables and visions which were afterwards given him? Or what need is there to shew how in succeeding ages some holy and separated souls have been visited by God much after the same manner; though they themselves may not perhaps have apprehended, or may even have mistaken, such Divine communications and appearances, which are pourtrayed forth according to certain eternal schemes in the heavens? Such a disquisition as this might be very curious, but there is no necessity for it; there being an higher and greater, and more uncontroverted authority, to vindicate this manner of writing concerning Wisdom; if we have but an ear to hear her voice, as speaking in the Scriptures. The authority of which being allowed of, what occasion is there for any other subordinate reasons? or what necessity to declare the (deepest) ground, either of the whole Church (Jewish and Gentile) being always represented under the figure as of a single female person, and thence called Our holy Mother the Church, or of the great abuses and superstitions which have sprung up with respect to the mother of our Lord, the blessed Virgin Mary; the titles, both in the Greek and Latin churches (at first) truly given to her, but misunderstood afterward and misapplied, and the veneration which is due to her from all generations, as distinguished from that false one which the ignorant zeal of many have prompted them to give? For without entering into such particular inquiries, it is I suppose, sufficiently evident both from what has been here and elsewhere delivered as to this point, that the personal apparition of Wisdom in such a figure, and her performing several personal transactions, is in no wise inconsistent with the sacred writers, but very conformable to their sentiments and modes of expression.

And as for the same representation of Wisdom by profane authors, much also might be said. But there is one instance of this so full, so particular, and so significative, as to add any others after it would be quite superfluous: it is that Platonical piece of Boethius, which may deservedly be called his philosophical masterpiece, wherein, as a perfect Deist, he handles, in Five Books, the matter of Consolation, without any regard to the principles of Christianity. Human wisdom, or philosophy, is here represented as a grave and majestic matron; is made to perform the part of a mother, or tutoress; and is introduced not only in a personal figure, but many personal actions are attributed to her, as giving forth counsels and monitions, instructing, confuting, reproving, and the like: the whole being nothing else but a continual intercourse and communion betwixt her and her disciple. And whether he be considered as expressing herein the sentiments either of the Ethnic or of the Christian theology, the matter will be much one: for if the former, then have we the sense of the Gentiles, as according to the light of nature; with universal tradition delivering down this figurative idea of the inward teacher as of a female principle, or as a passive form of supersensual light irradiating the mind, and a soft gentle affluence from the Divine Being, transforming, and even deifying, the soul, so as the wise man becomes a god by participation (see prop. X. of the third book. But if the latter, then is there no doubt to be made whether this be a new upstart conception of the heavenly Wisdom, or whether it be an old one, entertained by the Christian church from time immemorial. To say that this is an emblematical representation will avail but little; for if that be even supposed, we must grant at least that what is represented under it must answer to that which represents. And herein does lie the key which reveals the true origin of the Gentile divinity, and gives us to see whence sprang the great and horrible abuse of their secret mysteries. For what more ridiculous absurdity can there be, than to make Wisdom a Goddess, generated from Jupiter alone, and leaping out of his skull, so soon as cleaved asunder for that purpose; if we understand this grossly, as the words at first do sound? But if we shall look upon the Pallas, or the Minerva, of the Pagans, barely as an emblem of the Divine generation of Wisdom in human souls, and of its original pre-existence in the Divine intellect, before the descent thereof and manifestation in nature; then all will be very instructive. But this cannot be easily explicated as it ought in a few words; and therefore, here passing it over, I shall only hint in general that the idea of a Divine Virgin subsisting in God, and proceeding from God by outward manifestation, to teach and enlighten souls, by the assistance of the separator of nature, (or of a spiritual and vital flame which may break asunder the thick saturnine compaction which is in every fallen birth, thereby to make a passage for the Light, as a pure virgin and Divine essence to burst forth, and to be clothed in a personal figure of glory.)—whence soever this was derived, was really known to the wise Heathens, and must needs have somewhat more in it than is vulgarly apprehended. Human wisdom indeed may be mistaken for the Divine, but this alters not the case at all; though the consequent of such a mistake be in itself most fatal. So this is sufficient to show, that such a figurative idea of wisdom is no strange thing, but warrantable from sacred and profane writers. Which being premised, let us then consider what is the true conception of Divine wisdom, which answers to this figurative idea of a Virgin, and to her personal appearance, not only to this illuminated author, but to sundry others also [faithful practisers of the GRAMMAR of WISDOM, see p. 42]. The conceptions hereof being exceeding various, whereby the greatest confusion does arise, for want of attention, I shall endeavour to enumerate the more principal, that so a just and adequate conception may be formed from them all.

1.—By Divine Wisdom we may understand the unmanifested Divine intellect, the unoriginated and ungenerated light, the abyssal mind of the divine Unity. Thus Wisdom is not distinct from the Father, but is both in him, and one with him.

2.—By it we may understand the manifested Divine intellect, the originated and generated light, or light of light, and the abyssal mind of the Divine fecundity, whereby all things are made. Thus the name of Wisdom is attributed to the eternal Word, or Son, and is both in the Son, and one with the Son.

3.—By it we may understand the manifestation itself of the intellect, light, and mind of the Deity; or the revelation of both Father and Son to the Spirit (or most central ground) of the soul. And thus it most properly belongs to the Holy Ghost, who is thence rightly called a Spirit of wisdom and revelation.

4.—By it we may understand the abstract Idea of the whole Divine Being, as manifesting itself through a tri-unity of principle in Father, Son, and Spirit; or as the intellectual conception of the Deity in itself, according to all its essential relations, whether this conception, or idea, be original and uncommunicated, as in the fountain, or originated and communicated, as in the streams.

5.—By it we may understand this very idea, as passing through, and invested by pure and incorruptible Nature: or the total Divine idea corporified; which is by a more outward substantialising thereof in the creation. Thus it is the same with what some do call the one element, and lièrement en vue la duchesse de Bourbon, son amie de cœur, modèle de vertu et de piété, mais livrée à ce même entraînement pour le merveilleux.

others the universal body of the λόγος. It is called also the heavenly humanity of Christ, the tabernacle of God, and by many other names.

6.—By it we may understand the Image of this corporified idea; or the individuation thereof as in a personal form, or figure, being clothed upon with the angelical nature.

7.—By it we may understand this individual image, as descending in its own personal form, and representing itself even in a true human Virgin. Which virgin is thereby properly made the representative of Wisdom. And this representation may be either in one or more.

Besides which, there are two general conceptions of the Divine Wisdom, either as before, or as in Nature; answering to the twofold conception of the Deity, or to the Divine tri-unity before nature, and the Divine trinity in nature. According to the first of which this holy Principle is fitly represented by an eye; and according to the second by a mirror; of both which abundance of instances might be brought, that are nowise inconsiderable, from the Revelation of Revelations, and from most of the other books set forth by the same author.

Now if we do not distinguish so many different conceptions, it is not at all to be wondered at if we fall into very great confusion, and either take offence or run into some gross abuses hereby, through the mistake of that which is in itself most true, and most honourable likewise to the Divine Being; by the misapplication of this or that idea, which we may have taken up, and which, though never so true in itself, may not yet contain in it the whole truth, or be perfectly true according to such certain relations whereto it is applied. The first conception of Wisdom, for instance, is most clearly and undoubtedly true in itself. But nothing would be more absurd or of more dangerous consequence, if I should therefore deny the second to be true, and oppose myself to the Nicene Fathers calling Christ, as God of God, so also Light of Light, or Wisdom of Wisdom. And should I grant the second, and not allow the third also, what do I but contradict the Holy Ghost himself, as speaking in the scriptures? If Wisdom be a spirit, and be called the Spirit of wisdom, both in the Old and New Testament, then is he one with wisdom, as the Son and Father are one therewith. Or if I should allow all three, but oppose the fourth, what do I else in effect but deny the Creation, or the first manifestation of the Deity in nature; which cannot be, without the Divine Idea of it be supposed to pre-exist?

This one, universal, all-comprehensive Idea is called the Εἰς ὅσα ἔκλειον ἀνυπόστατον, or the immaculate virgin mirror of the Divine energy, by the Book of Wisdom, and the Εἰκόων or the portraiture of the omnipotent goodness, ch. viii. 26. It is this idea which the Lord possessed, as within himself, in the beginning of his way, which is his process into Nature, before his works of old; and which was manifested by the eternal Word, going forth triumphantly in the same. It is this which was set up both from everlasting, that is, before any manifestation of nature, or in the silent eternity; and from the beginning of all time, as preparatory to the said manifestation. It was before ever the earth was, and when there were no depths &c., for according to it was the earth made; as likewise the depths &c. It was the matrix of all lives, seeds and forms, in the three kingdoms of nature; and that great Exemplar of the world, co-extended infinitely with the Divine Being, according to which therefore, both the heavens were prepared, and the abyss encompassed at once. Whence it is described as God's most familiar friend, or intimate consort; and as the Divine delight and sport. For all which see Prov. viii. 22 to 32.

This conception then of Wisdom is no less real than any of the former three; and is only to be deduced at large from the words of Wisdom's greatest favourite, and from the wise Siracides also, if it were thought requisite.

But if we go to confound this conception of Divine Wisdom with either of those, we must not expect otherwise but to be lost quickly in a maze of our own imaginations. And should we also stop here, and cast away the three remaining ones, the danger will not be found much less upon an important consideration of the whole. For if there be no corporification of the Divine idea, then must the creation have necessarily stopped in the very beginning; and there must nothing have been brought forth creaturely, out of the supreme Fountain of Being, besides simple and naked spirits; the existence of anything else in rerum natura being an utter impossibility, if that supposition be allowed of.

If also there be no individuation of the prolific Divine idea, when corporified, manifold absurdities cannot but thence follow, and consequences most highly derogatory to the unity and simplicity of God, as also to the order of beings; and even destructive of the principles of individuation in every creature. Lastly, if this individual Idea of the Divine glory, being thus invested with a Divine corporeity, or an ἀπόρροια of the one heavenly and omniform substance, may not personally represent itself, wheresoever it shall choose, in such vessels of the Divine light and grace as are made fit to receive, and able to bear the same; then must the hope of Christ's kingdom be at an end, and we shall never be made virgins to follow the Lamb.

Were this not so, the marriage of him and his bride could never be celebrated; as will appear more evidently, when we come to consider the next question. So long now as we keep these conceptions of the Divine Wisdom according to the gradual manifestations thereof, and descent into nature, distinct from each other; there is little or no difficulty that is considerable. But if we blend these together, there is nothing in the world so preposterous and absurd which would not hence follow. A thousand instances might be easily given in the three or four first; and hardly less perhaps than ten times as many in the last.

To form now a general conception of Wisdom out of all these, I consider it as an eternal Divine principle (or most holy energy) of fecundity in the Godhead, which is before, in and after Nature; whereby the Godhead having first beheld and comprehended all within itself, does afterward image forth itself in all whatever it thus beheld and comprehended; bringing forth by it from eternity its first begotten image, and out of that innumerable subalternate images, from the beginning of time, and so forward; for an eternal spirit of Divine joy and harmony in the creature. Which principle, or energy, originally subsists in the Father, and is one spirit with the Father, being as the Eye or intellect to the Spirit of Eternity; by which there is eternally generated the Word, as the only begotten Son of the Father, in whom the fullness of his wisdom substantially dwells; and by whom the triumphing light of his intellect is eternally manifested, through the virtual powers of the Holy Spirit, as proceeding from the Father by the Son, into every created image, addressed according to the capacity of each. Thus is Wisdom truly to be considered as the Idea and Glass of the blessed Trinity, as also of all creatures which are thence originated; and as such it may descend and clothe itself, both with an universal and particular body, and personate its glory in a proper subject. Whereupon it may well deserve to be heeded that the original of Wisdom, or her pre-existent state in God, is expressly distinguished from her nativity, or manifestation in a glorious female figure, by those very Writings which have been censured so much, on the account of introducing a female personality into the nature of the Divine Being: for in the Manifestation concerning the Eight Worlds, Wisdom's eternal originality is there clearly declared to be from the tri-une Deity, being a Virgin hid in God from all eternity; but her nativity, or manifestative glory in the form of a female virgin, not to be so; for that as to this, she was brought forth in time (§ 16, p. 31). And this is afterward explained by an example taken from Adam, who for certain was created after God's image; and therefore as Eve must have pre-existed in him originally, before she could be taken out of him (if the image do answer to the archetype, or life); thus also it must have been in the very case concerning the origination and manifestation of this virgin of Divine Wisdom—the one being necessarily before nature, and the other as necessarily in nature. Now concerning her personal apparition in the figure as of a human Virgin, there can be no manner of question made according to which of these this was; for out of nature certainly there can be no figurative manifestation, nor appearance of any distinct personality. And if it were in nature (as most certainly it was), there can no real difficulty remain why God might not, if he pleased, thus presentiate himself; and through such a living embodied idea transact all what is recorded, and reveal in the human nature the mystery of the three-sealed book, as it was shewn in the vision.

Q. II.—Whether this Divine Wisdom is another thing than that Spirit of God which dwelleth in sanctified souls, and communicated to them the gifts of the Spirit, Isa. xi. 2; and produceth in them the fruits of the Spirit? Gal. v. 22.

ANSWER.—Divine Wisdom and the Spirit of God are inseparably united together: Wisdom cannot be without the Spirit, neither can the Spirit be without the Wisdom. Yet are they not one altogether, in whatever sense of those which have been mentioned this be taken; but there is a real distinction betwixt them, notwithstanding the union of essences: and therefore we ought not to confound their substance for the sake of this unity; which is also betwixt God and his angels. For this union of essences is very well consistent with the truest distinction: even as the angels of God are united with God in their essence, who are thereby commissioned to go forth in his name, and are yet nevertheless most truly distinguished from him. And so also there is an union of essences and natures betwixt God and man, as in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ; and by consequence hereof likewise in the persons of all his saints, as members of him. But as this union is without confusion of substance both in Christ, and in the saints; so also is it in the present case of Wisdom and the Holy Spirit: who are indeed undivided, but not the same in the ground of their being. For the Holy Ghost as essentially united with the Wisdom of God enters into holy souls; making them friends of God, by a communication of his gifts to them, and a production of his fruits in them. The Divine Wisdom doth not properly and of itself communicate these gifts, or produce these fruits; but does only infuse her nature into man, as by irradiation: to which nature of wisdom infused, the gifts of the Spirit are solely communicable, and in which alone the fruits thereof are producible. And as to every generation there is required (1.) the seed, and (2.) the nature: so likewise must there be in the regeneration of the human soul a concurrence of these two; by the Holy Spirit's producing therein the birth of Love (that is, Christ within) through the nature of Wisdom, as the principle of Divine fecundity in everything, and that without which the seed of God would be as dead, and quite shut up. To this Divine generation of souls, or their new-birth, the seed is properly conferred by the Spirit; and the nature into which the seed is received, and by which it is made to fructify, proceeds from Wisdom: and thus we are to understand that Christ, according to the flesh, was conceived by the Holy Ghost of the virgin Mary (blessed for all generations); not as she was an earthly virgin only, but as the heavenly Virgin of God's wisdom had chosen in her to represent herself outwardly (according to the seventh and lowest acceptance of this name made mention of in answer to the first Quære), for the bringing forth again, after the eternal pattern in the heavens, the highest birth of God, in the lowest manifestation thereof, under the covering of vile and corruptible nature. Therefore was that Holy One who was born of her, most truly (according to the words of the angel) called the Son of God; inasmuch as in this his temporal generation he was conceived both from a Divine seed and a Divine nature: even as he was in that which was called eternal; whether by it we understand his generation in the bosom of the Father from all eternities of eternities, as manifested to the Father alone; or else his generation from the said bosom of his father in eternity indeed, but yet in the beginning of time, whereby he was brought forth into a figurative image and personality, as the first born of all creatures, for the creation as well of the angelical, as of this world. Now this bosom of God is no other than the virgin spirit of Wisdom, the holy and eternal principle of Divine fruitfulness, and that Womb of Wisdom, which is alluded to in Psalm cx. 3, where the Hebrew word RECHEM, translated the womb, which the Jewish writers do also call Belh-ha-Rechem, i.e. the house of mercy, is very emphatical and proper; and doth most lively set forth the Divine compassionateness, as manifesting itself in Christ. And hereupon it is observable what the most learned of the Jews do write upon those words of the Law, Sanctify unto me all the first-born, whatsoever openeth the womb, Exod. xiii. 2. That all the first-born do appertain to Cochmah, that is, the Wisdom of God; as being the first emanation from the Divine Being, through which the Supreme Unity (which they call the Crown) descends down into nature and creature, for manifesting the heavenly kingdom of the Messias throughout, by and in all the archetypal numbers and modes of being: and moreover that to the kingdom itself (which is the archetypal number), is given the name of the first-born. The reason of which is that the primogeniture of the kingdom, according to the mystic scale of the Divine forms, proceeds out of the opening of the virgin fountain, or womb, of the Divine Wisdom; by which the Paternal Unity is manifested in glorious variety, and so exhibited in all the descending forms, as the only immortal King. And again, upon that place of the Prophet which says, The first of all the first-fruits of all things...shall be the priests, Ezek. xlv. 30, they tell us that the ground of birthright belongs to God's Wisdom, or to this opened and unsealed fountain of the Divine goodness; and that the first-born, or the first-fruits of all things are the peculium of God, and of his wisdom. Which Wisdom, having the right of primogeniture, confers thereby a kingdom; and with it the Priesthood also: according to which they interpret the name of Melchisedech; making it to be the same both with Malcuth, the kingdom, and Dobar, the Divine oracle, or the word of the Lord, Psalm cx. 4. Accordingly also they interpret what is written in another Psalm of a joyful mother of children; after which it is immediately added Hallelu-IAH, or Praise ye the Lord. Psalm cxiii. 9. R. Isaac said, "It is written in the Psalms, the joyful mother of children, Hallelujah: what is to be understood by the mother is known. But who are the children?" "Come, observe! (said R. Simeon) we have been taught that there is a twofold issue, the one male, the other female &c.," and so proceeds to prove that by the male is meant the Divine Word, which he calls Tiphereth, or the fulness of all the Divine emanations, and the beautiful image; and that by the female is meant the bride of this Divine Word, which is the Church, that is, the body of this fulness, and the bright mirror of all the perfections of this image, whence she is called the kingdom; also the queen, and the king's daughter; the sister-spouse of the great Solomon, the princess, the heavenly Sarah, Jerusalem, the Virgin of Sion; and by sundry other names corresponding with these! Furthermore they tell us, that the opening of the womb signifies the kingdom of God and the Messiah, and specially the manifestation of this Divine kingdom in the new formation, disposition, and configuration of the vessels (that is, the creatures), or in the redintegration, restitution, and regeneration of all things under corruption.

Which opening, say they, is made by the Law, in the obedience to all its affirmative precepts; the number whereof they calculate to be exactly the same with the number of the Hebrew word which is used for the womb, that is 248: thereby expressing how that it is by the opening of the heavenly matrix in the fallen nature, that there is an influx received from the Father of Lights; whereby we are enabled both to fulfil his commandments, walking before him in all holiness and righteousness unblameable, as the undefiled ones of Sion; and also to bear that exceeding great reward which is prepared for the children of the kingdom, or of the Sarah who is above. Hence then it appears that, according to their parabolical manner of writing, the right of primogeniture to a priestly kingdom, or a royal priesthood, doth consist in the opening of a virgin womb; and that there is also a womb of eternal or incorruptible virginity in the heavens, from which proceeds a twofold birth, male and female, in the perfect image of God, which are re-united together in one eternally, by the highest nuptial tie, the Spirit of God. And thus the bridegroom and bride, or Christ and his Church, are both made to be truly the offspring of God, and to image forth in like manner his glory by means of heavenly generation; with this only difference, that as Christ is the living portraiture of the Divine Essence, which is the more inward and radical notion of the Deity; so is the Church the similitude, and representative of the Divine Nature, which is somewhat more outward, and as the byss, or ground, of the Spirit of eternity, or Supreme Unity.

For the better comprehending of which mutual relation, it may not be perhaps amiss to set down here a short Scheme thereof, according to the more principal names which the Hebrew Mystics do generally attribute to each of these, viz. the Messiah and his church or kingdom, or do at least reduce to one or other class: since also it will serve to form some conception by, of that original distinction which is in the Divine Being itself, whence this is derived; and by consequence hereof to discern likewise the Spirit of God, which is an active and masculine power, from the holy Virgin of Divine Wisdom, which is a passive and feminine power, which therefore by some is called the Divine Corporeity, and also the vestment of the Deity.

Besides these several others might be brought, and observations raised from each of these in particular, which would afford perhaps no contemptible light to the matter in hand, and wonderfully set out some things little heeded, or understood, concerning the marriage of the Messiah and his Church, as represented both in the old Prophets, and in the Revelations of St. John most fully. But we shall content ourselves with one only observation which seems to us most material; that ment, parce que l'ame de l'homme, dit-il, est primitivement une Pensée de Dieu : de là il résulte que le moyen de nous renouveler en rentrant dans notre vraie nature, c'est de penser par notre we may not be carried out here into a more accurate or particular disquisition about the sense of the Jews, and the Sages of the Eastern nations concerning the Divine matrimony of heaven and earth, God and Man, than is at present needful. And which is this, "That the marriage of Christ and his Church, in the descent of the New Jerusalem on earth, can never be consummated without there be such an essential relation pre-existing in Heaven, and flowing from the very Divine Nature itself; and that the souls which are made his bride, cannot otherwise be called virgins, but as the heavenly Virgin, and corporified idea of the Divine Being in the superior Jerusalem, doth impersonate itself in them, and so becomes to them the true tabernacle of God, Rev. xxi. 3." For Christ and the Church are but one complete image of GOD : he is indeed the head ; but as the head is not completed without the members, so neither is Christ without the incorporation of the Church, which is truly his body ; being flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bone, in a sense that is no less real than that wherein it was first spoken concerning the terrestrial Eve the bride of the terrestrial Adam : wherefore they are not to be accounted twain but one. This is the highest ground of the unity of the Church, and why it is even called Christ. Acts ix. 4, 5. And great is the mystery of this marriage : which is no more in truth than a re-union of what was antecedently one, even as Adam was one before the formation of Eve, being ἀρρکیόθηλος (as some of the Ancients did call him) or a complete Angelical Virgin, both male and female within himself ; as possessing both the principles of self-multiplication in him individually concentrated, after a spiritual and heavenly manner. Now this most essential relation of two such principles in Adam (and these also in themselves distinct from, however united with the inspiration of the Almighty, that breath of lives mentioned, Gen. ii. 7), while he stood in the original (and most perfect) constitution of nature, as created after the likeness of GOD, doth not only suppose (1.) a pre-existent harmony thereof in the creation according to the highest degree of Unity, which may be termed individual ; (2.) a separation or division thereof after the creation, or a procession of the Unity into a Duality, which duality is proportionable to and concordant with it ; and (3.) a re-union of the duality, in and through the harmony of the principles thus separated, by the mystical knot which reconstitutes them one, as they were at first, though not perfectly in the same manner and degree : but it doth also suppose somewhat analogous to each of these three to have had a previous subsistence in the Divine Archetypes ; and likewise that the eternal marriage eternally celebrated in heaven betwixt GOD and his immaculate consort of WISDOM, cannot make the latter to be fully one with the Holy Spirit, however inseparably hereby united therewith. And therefore this essential and most intimate relation both of the first Adam to his Eve, and of the second Adam to the second Eve, his heavenly bride, must needs flow from the very Divine nature itself : and without there had been brought forth from God a corporified Idea of his being in the virgin mirror and matrix of the celestial Jerusalem, there must have been no production either of a first, or of a second Eve ; and consequently the marriage of the Lamb and his bride must never be celebrated : yea what is still more, there could have been no such thing even as human generation upon the earth. But let even one and the other be granted, yet this possibility supposed, the actual celebration will not follow of this blessed marriage, without all that are to make up the bride be first made virgins, and then made one virgin. For he who is himself a Virgin will not admit any but virgins into his nearest conversation ; hence are they all virgins who follow him in his kingdom of Mount Zion ; thence do the virgins love him because of his name poured forth upon them, whereby they are assimilated to him by the oil of consecration wherewith they are in like manner anointed, and so are impelled to run after him by the savour of his good ointments, typified by that sacred and most mysterious composition under the Law, which was not to touch man's flesh, Exodus xxx. 32 ; and thence was it that the High Priest was obliged to marry a virgin, and that too without the least manner of blemish. And then secondly, as the bride of Christ can be but one, wherefore he says, My undefiled (that is, my virgin) is one, Canticles, vi. 9 ; so unless all these virgins, who are the daughters of the heavenly Jerusalem, do become one, as their mother is one, they cannot be made the bride prepared for her husband ; or be one with him who is one with himself, and one with the Father. [See B.'s Incar. I. xi. xii.] Now it is impossible that they should ever be made virgins, in the highest and truest sense of the word, without that virginity which was originally in Adam before the formation of Eve, be restored again : but (according to what has been before laid down) this can never be restored, without there was an heavenly pre-existent Virginity, according to which that was imaged forth in him. And much more impossible would it still be to have all these numberless virgins to be re-incorporated, ἀνακεφαλαι ούσθαι, Eph. i. 10, recapitulated, or gathered together in one, without they had all proceeded out of one. If they be not born of the one undefiled womb of the everlasting morning, the pure corporified Idea and bright mirror of the Divine Tri-une Being : if they be not generated from above, or regenerated, as well of the living virgin water of God's Wisdom, as of the fire of the Spirit, which is the masculine and active power that is comprehended by the other in all angelical generations ; this holy virginity of the saints, and their consequent re-union and re-incorporation both with one another, and with Christ, in that express and full sense which the Scripture gives, would be in vain expected by us : and our hopes of the kingdom of Christ, with all the patriarchs, prophets and apostles, would be no better than a pleasant amusement. Wherefore it follows, That a virgin spirit must necessarily descend from God out of heaven, as the blessed womb of all heavenly and angelical births ; and that this may so presentiate and impersonate itself in man, as man thereby may truly become the tabernacle of God, for the solemnization of the nuptials of Christ and his bride. Also it hence evidently appears that this, however united indissolubly with the Holy Ghost, is yet really distinct from him. The one is more active, the other more passive : the one gives the angelical fire in the new heavenly generation, the other gives the angelical water. So there need no more to be added to this observation that was intended upon the descent of the new Jerusalem in the kingdom of Christ, among many others that might be made from the precedent Table ; which to some may possibly afford no despicable light. And the twofold birth, male and female, from Divine Wisdom, or the generation of the Messiah and his Church (or kingdom) being thus in some measure explicated, according to principles acknowledged by the most learned among the Jews, this might be sufficient alone to take away all scandal and offence from among the Christians on this head, if the matter be but duly weighed by them. Notwithstanding which, for the fuller elucidation of what David has spoken in spirit concerning the everlasting womb of the heavenly day-break, or the Aurora of the angelical kingdom, when beholding the generation of the Messias from the same, he called him Lord, who yet was to be his son; and also because I do not know that this matter has been yet by any fundamentally handled, I shall offer some further thoughts to the consideration of the wise in heart, about this great and holy secret of a Virgin nature, both as subsisting in God, and flowing from God: that so every one that will but incline his ear, may easily come to the understanding of it, and see how and wherein it is distinguished as from the essential Word, so likewise from the Holy Spirit, as properly taken.* Nevertheless it ought still to be remembered, that by reason of their inseparable union, the operations, affections and offices of the one may be attributed to the other; so that that which properly belongs to Wisdom may very well be predicated of the Spirit of God, as may also what belongs to the Spirit more properly be predicated in like manner of Wisdom, which is as the Divine vehicle and chariot wherein he rides triumphantly into Nature. The same thing also may be said as to Christ, with respect as well to one, as to the other of these: which is a caution well to be heeded, for the sake of greater distinctness, in the reading of most spiritual writers. The considerations follow:—

[* See B.'s Three Tables, the First Table.]

Consideration I. The Hebrew word Rechem wheresoever it is found in Scripture, whether it be interpreted for the womb, or for mercy, when it is applied to God, may be said to express not only a principle of paternity, but also of maternity existing in the Deity, with respect to the superior orders of created beings. And wherever the same is used plurally, as most frequently it is in relation to the Divine Being, it may fitly signify the super-excellence of this most holy principle, as not possible to be expressed by any singular; whence also the most common name of God in this language is of a plural termination, as is well known: which primarily denotes the super-excellent Majesty of the omnipotent Creator of all things, without detracting at all from the Unity of the Godhead thereby; as this in like manner, the super-excelling glory of the Divine benignity towards his creatures, that would comprehend them in the unity of life. And by both we are to understand the communicativeness and fecundity of the Divine nature, without which no creation or generation could be in any of the worlds, visible or invisible. Now there cannot be a more refreshing and delightful consideration than this, [which is the capital index to the last series of Mr. Law's writings,] That the very principle of Divine fecundity, by which, and out of which, all things whatever are produced, is no other than the fountain and womb of LOVE; yea the womb of all tender loves in the creature, and of all mercy both in God and in it; the beginning of the creation of God, whence heaven and earth first sprang forth, the male and female offspring whence numberless births were to proceed; the universal and original womb, the womb of wombs! It was from this holy womb, eternal fountain, and most essential principle of Divine Mercifulness, that judgment was swallowed up by mercy, as but from one bright sudden glance thereof, even when the terrors of the Law were thundered forth in such astonishing majesty. For it was from this the promise was at first made to the woman's seed, that it should destroy the curse in nature; and from hence not some, but all generations were to be blessed: whence the curse of the Law for idolatry was to terminate in four only, but the covenant of mercy was to be extended even to a thousand generations. Now in a thousand there are all comprehended. Therefore also does the Scripture so very much inculcate the eternity of the Divine mercy: and God is not only pleased to attribute to himself the bowels and affections of a mother, but even to declare the most eminent perfection of this principle in him, both as to the intensiveness and extensiveness thereof, above all that can be found in a natural mother; and the impossibility for him to forget, or cast away utterly and eternally that which is his offspring: Wherefore the Prophet Habakkuk in his most lofty psalm calls on God, in the midst of wrath to remember RECHEM, or the womb of mercy (ch. iii. 2).

With which, many places both in the Law and in the Prophets do sweetly harmonize; but specially in the Psalms, as particularly xc., cvi. and cvii.; Lam. iii. Hence is he said to repent him of the evil, according to the multitude of his mercies. And hence also, as Christ according to his terrestrial nativity is said to have been born of the mercy of God, as of the most tender and maternal principle of Divine life: so are we according to our celestial paternity said to be regenerated thence in like manner; that is, out of the same abyssal womb of Divine Compassions, and through the visitation of that heavenly dayspring, or blessed Aurora, which opens the light of the world on those that live in these shades of mortality, brings forth the everlasting day, and ushers in amongst us who sat in darkness the firstbegotten image of the Father of lights, called therefore most properly the Sun of righteousness.

And here also we may observe that as the MERCY of GOD, both in the generation of his Son (whether eternal, or temporal) and in the regeneration of all that bear his image and name, doth chiefly express to us the illustrious prototype of all maternity; so doth the WILL of GOD in both these, express to us the most illustrious prototype of all paternity. Hence we cannot receive power to become sons of God in the new birth, but by the united manifestation of both as one; by being born of the will of God, whereby he becomes our father in heaven; and according to his abundant mercy, whereby he shows towards us the tender bowels of a mother: and his love to the church is compared to that of a mother to her firstborn. All this may be implied in the word RECHEM, according to the true interpretation thereof, as the same is referred to God; which by a diligent comparison of Scripture could easily be further elucidated. But I must forbear: and shall only, to conclude this First Consideration, mention one passage, which is not the least considerable; as wherein is declared how the fountain and womb of the Divine mercy comes to be opened in the covenant of blessing, by a separation from the curst thing, and how there must be in God a great prototype and exemplar of all maternity and fecundity. There shall cleave naught of the curst thing to thine hand [whatsoever doth tend in anywise to separate thee from the LORD as thy God, and the author and fountain of thy being; and to make thee idolize the creature, by an adhesion of thy mind to it, must be utterly renounced and forsaken by thee, as the accursed thing which by cleaving to thee, will for certain deprive thee of the blessing of the covenant made to the seed of the woman, and sacramentally ratified to Abraham, before the miraculous impregnation of Sarah's dead womb], that the LORD may turn from the fierceness of his anger [that is, that he who is a consuming fire to all iniquity, and who having made man for himself will bear no competitors, may, by a total separation of the will and power of man from whatever is devoted under the curse, and alienates him from the true original of his being, be reconciled to what is so separated, so as to assuage the heat of his wrath enkindled in Nature, and thereupon to pronounce forth the blessing as in the cool of the day through the covenant of an incorruptible virgin seed], and shew thee mercy [the tender bowels and womb of a mother, full of compassions and sympathising affections], and have compassion upon thee [RICHMOND—CA, the very same word doubled again, to express thereby the strong vehemence of maternal affection], and multiply thee [not so much after an earthly as after an heavenly manner, from the heavenly womb of the everlasting Day-spring, that thou mayest be as the hops of heaven, both for number and for glory], as he hath sworn unto thy fathers [to Abraham, showing him the stars of heaven, Gen. xv. 4—18; xvii. 1—22; to him and Isaac, ch. xxiii. 16—19; and to Jacob, ch. xxviii. 13, 14]. When thou shalt hearken to the voice of the LORD thy God [which is otherwise called the voice of wisdom, Prov. i. 20, who is said to pour out her spirit, v. 23, and who cries in the chief place, My son, forget not my law, ch. iii. 1], to keep all his commandments, which I command thee this day, to do that which is right in the eyes of the LORD thy God [by a full obedience to Wisdom's call, entering into thine heart; and by greedily inclining thine ear unto her mouth, to walk in her paths, and not to let the two tables of her law, mercy and truth forsake thee, but to bind them about thy neck, and inscribe them upon thy soul, ch. ii. 2, 10; iii. 3]. Ye are the children of the LORD your God, &c. [Hereby will it be known whose offspring ye are; for if ye shall seek in all things to be doing the will of God, this is a certain sign that the seed of God is in you, and that ye are born not of the will of man, but of God: and if it shall be your constant study to do that which is right in his eyes, then are ye the children of Wisdom indeed, and an holy virgin people unto the LORD, a peculiar heritage, a blessed generation, whose ways are pleasantness, and paths peace. Thence being, and approving yourselves the children of God your father; and so also the children of light, and sons of the morning, the womb of eternity and undefiled purity; ye are to be as virgins redeemed from the earth, not polluting yourselves with anything unclean or dead, nor conforming to the customs of the world, which are chiefly founded upon carnal generation, and the corruption which is in nature by the introduction of the curse.] Deut. xiii. 17, 18; xiv. 1, 2.

Consideration II. The most common name of God, and which in the very history of the creation alone is used no less than two and thirty times, is even asserted by the Jewish writers who have written most learnedly upon it, to be of a feminine nature; and that the repetition thereof so many times in the first chapter of Genesis, doth answer just to the xxxii Paths of Wisdom. Whence the ancient book of Jetrivah, attributed to the Patriarch Abraham, thus begins, By the two and thirty wonderful paths of wisdom hath the Lord of Hosts framed and imaged forth his world. Also in another cabalistical treatise, called the Gate of Light, the name of God whereby the world was created, is thus interpreted; and the feminine signification of it declared expressly. And as the womb of eternity out of which all things are by God produced, is most hid, therefore are these paths called by a name which signifies hidden; and Wisdom herself is called the most high path of all, which comprehends the rest within it, and to which ought to be referred that place in Job, There is a path which no fowl knoweth, and which the vulture's eye hath not seen, ch. xxviii. 7; from which the other one and thirty draw all their influence, in the various modes of the corporification of the Divine idea, by the omnipotence of the eternal Word. Therefore are all the works of God's creation made accordingly to proceed from this secret womb, and pure ideal fountain, called the door of the world; and to be outwardly manifested and wrought out from their invisible forms (agreeably to the doctrine which some deduce from Heb. xi. 3), by the opening of this wonderful matrix in nature, according to all those secret channels and ducts of Divine wisdom, which they call PELIOTH, that is concealed. * * *

Consideration III. The morning which is mentioned in the generation of Christ by David, is properly that redness which is betwixt the darkness and the light, or the night and the day: which is well to be heeded, if we would understand the ground whence not only the creation, but judgment also is attributed by the mystical doctors of the Jews to that Divine Name, which is both the first and most frequent in the whole Bible. For though it may seem harsh in them to ascribe judgment and severity to the female nature, rather than to the male: yet herein they have respect to the gradual manifestation in nature of the firstborn of the creatures; to his triumphant exit against the fallen princes and angels at the creation; and to the restitution of lapsed souls from darkness into light, through the red fire of Divine judgment, whence the glorious light doth break forth, as out of a hidden womb, and with exulting joy spring out visibly to run the course of the wonders of God in love. This morning redness is called the bride chamber, or the secret CHUPPAH in which the bridegroom was to prepare himself, which is mentioned Ps. xix. 5: it is that out of which the Divine Word, as a glorious sun, arises, coming as a bridegroom out of his chamber, and rejoicing as a giant to run his race, through the whole circuit of nature. For this answers exactly [to] the meaning of the word SHAIHAR, which is not the light itself, but the triumphant breaking forth of the light from and out of the darkness: whence among all the Divine goings forth, which are many, that of victory is peculiarly ascribed to it; as the opposition of the powers of darkness is thereby conquered, and subdued. And forasmuch as this conquest of the day, in outward nature, always begins in the East, therefore is the east held sacred to the eternal day-spring of Wisdom; and the Magi, who are the children of wisdom, are said to come out of the East. And agreeably to this are all the kingdoms of the earth commanded to sing praises to Him who rides upon the heaven of heavens towards the east, Ps. lxxviii. 33; not only according to the Septuagint and St. Hierom, but other ancient versions: whereby is described the victorious outgoing of the Divine Word from the paradisaical East; as might clearly be made to appear from the whole drift of the psalm, as also from that particular name of God here used, which is universally accounted by the Jewish nation the manifestatrix of the ineffable Name; even as the light of the Son manifests the light of the Father, which is otherwise inaccessible, appearing to the creature as thick darkness. This most high East is called in another psalm the beginning of heaven, and in the Mosaic Genesis of the world seems to be supposed as the BEGINNING not only of heaven, but of earth also, that is, of the universal system of things. And therefore not unfitly by the prophet Zacharias may the name of the EAST be applied to the Messiah, as this very WORD incarnating itself by a power from the Divine East; whence also his star was seen to appear in the East. And perhaps this may have been understood by the Syriac interpreter, in whom there is found, From the east hath he sent forth his voice: which is for certain applicable to the eternal Word, that by the most ancient Chaldee paraphrast on the Pentateuch is significantly expressed both the Word of God, and the Word which is God. But this Beginning, or East from on high (ἀνατολή ἐξ ὕψους, in the prophetic song of Zacharias), must be distinct both from the Word, which went forth saying, Let there be, and it was so; and from the Spirit of Elohim which moved upon the chaotic matter. Nor is it perfectly one either with the Light, which arose in the east, being clouded under the veil of mortal flesh; or with the Holy Ghost, who overshadowed the Virgin for the bringing forth of this Light of Life in such a form, in order to the manifestation of the wonders of God's wisdom and grace. As the Word and Spirit are not the same with one another, but distinct: so neither is the Beginning, or Divine day-spring, the same with either; notwithstanding that the former is in it, and the latter with it eternally and inseparably.

In visible nature there is no difficulty at all to discern the redness of the morning from the full day: and if we cannot make this discernment in invisible nature also, may we not rather suspect a defect in ourselves, than peremptorily proceed to conclude that not to be at all, which we cannot so presently understand? The Hebrew word which has been mentioned, and which is chosen by God's Spirit to express the generation of Christ from the womb of eternity, as an eternal Priest and King, is no less distinguished in sense from another word, which without the least distinction is translated the morning also; but imports the perfect light of the day, whence, as the victory of the Divine name is attributed to that, so the glory of it, or the triumphant pomp of Christ's kingdom, is allotted to this, according to the scale of Divine numbers. This word is found in the account of the creation throughout; and may have more perhaps of a mystery in it, than is ordinarily heeded. Now as in redness there is a mixture of darkness and light, or of the light hidden and the light manifest, so is it to be supposed also in some sense in the womb of the Divine Aurora, the eternal seminary of light. And from this commixture it is called the measure of judgment: and, according to it, this world is observed to have been created, in the going forth of that Divine Name which is communicable to all the administrators of justice, both angels and men, both supreme and subordinate.

Consideration IV. This Morning-redness, which the wise men have watched for in all ages, and sought to understand and behold, that they might know thereby the mystery not only of the creation and generation of all things from a Divine Beginning, and out of an holy Virgin Materiality and celestial womb, but also their regeneration from and out of the same: and which is to be considered both as the fountain of mercy, and as the measure of justice in the Deity introducing itself into nature, and is the true heavenly Day-spring and East from which all the Divine measures do descend; is further represented to us under the name of PLACE. And hence it is that some of the Ancients may have been grossly misunderstood, as if they did really assert the co-eternity of place and matter with God, according to the vulgar conception of those terms. It is true that some philosophers of no mean consideration, and nowise atheistical, have maintained the pre-existence both of place and matter from all eternity: but their meaning herein was altogether different from what many of their dull followers have thought it to be. It is manifest that the philosophy of the Ancients was extremely corrupted from that purity wherein it was originally delivered by the founders of schools, (several of whom were persons of a Divine genius, and highly enlightened with the Spirit of Wisdom from above,) through their successors and disciples; sometimes for want of attention or penetration, and perhaps at other times even through maliciousness itself: as the history of the Atomical Philosophy alone may serve abundantly to make out, together with the origination of the sect of the Sadducees among the Jews, and most of the ancient heresies among the Christians. Nor is it less certain that in this most ancient philosophy, after the fullest and freest inquiry made into it, there must be understood by their eternal place, which includes the eternal matter filling it, the very same thing which the Hebrew school means by that Divine Name, whereby they used to express the omnipresence of the Deity, even the name HA-MAKOM, i. e. the Place. By which holy Name of God they would teach that the world is not properly the place of God, but that God rather is the place of the world; and that all place is in God, and from God alone, all creatures being circumscribed by the Divine essence and nature; so that He may super-eminently be called the place, or universal receptacle of all beings, wherein they exist, live, and act. Now this Divine title, or name, is attributed by them to the wisdom of God, which is also called for the same reason BETH HA-OLAM, or the House of the world. And it is favoured likewise by the very original of the word, which is from a radix that imports to rise, ascend, stand up, or awake; and from that particular mode of it wherein the Hebrew language is so elegant in expressing that which makes or effects a thing to be, with but one word. Whereby is insinuated that the Divine Beginning, Day-spring, and East of the heavenly Wisdom, as in God before Nature, is the true awakening principle of all generated and created beings; out of which as their eternal matrix they have proceeded, in which they do actually subsist, and by which they are continually comprehended: and that all intellectual and material creatures do first rise and ascend from this beginning, which is in God and with God from all eternity; and do stand up out of their ideas, being brought forth into real existence. And this may not be very distant from what some, greatly illuminated in the mysteries of God and Nature, within the last generation, have called (as I remember) the field of the great potter, into which the Holy Ghost, for the creation of all things is said to descend, going forth from the Father (who is the potter) by and through the eternal Word or Son; according to the Father's will, manifesting itself in the voice of the Word, which is the outflow FIAT of the Son. It is not perhaps quite the same, but it is at least included in and depending on it: it is a different consideration of it from the former; and may comprehend not the whole, but a part of it, that is, with respect to this or that relation. This it truly called the Field of wisdom, which being filled and impregnated with the Divine magical breath, or Spirit, brings forth thereby the wonders in Nature; and so must needs be distinct from the Spirit which fills and impregnates it, whether this be in the fire, or in the light. Therefore this eternal Place, or field, is in its originality to be distinguished from the Spirit itself, which flows upon it; and consequently also in its operations. It is the highest and most secret Garden of God, according to the cabalistic theory, which the four winds of the heaven of heavens do continually breathe upon, from the cherubim angels of the throne of the Divine Majesty; and hence there is nothing could have sprung forth without its fruitfulness. It is also called to the same effect Beth Ha-Jotzer, the house of the potter; wherein the furnace is generally attributed to Wisdom alone, but the wheel both to eternal Wisdom and eternal Nature. In this house of the great potter, by means of its holy magical furnace, which is eternally burning, the Spirit of God manifests its omnipotence; but the Spirit is not one with the furnace, but feeds it incessantly. Let him that has wisdom here study to become still more wise, and by descending into this abyssal House, or place, where the immortal fire is kept, to consider the origination of all the vessels of nature, according to the various circumnotations thereof; and to behold the restitution of the broken vessels, by the light of the everlasting morning arising still brighter and brighter! And further, some have thought this notion aforesaid absolutely necessary to defend and explain the Unity of the blessed Trinity in the Divine Nature, as in one mutual common Schecina or dwelling; so that the Divine Wisdom, as the heaven of the glorious Trinity, is the everlasting Hammakom, place, or ubi, both of Father, Son and Spirit, the house and temple of God in the supernatural East: it is Domus Sacro-Sancto Trinitatis, the residence of the most holy Number Three. Which may be set forth under several emblems; but the most ordinary seems to be that which is the manner of writing of the great name of God, everywhere found in the Jewish writings. Which is this*; and *) it may deserve well to be heeded. For whoever might be the first inventor of this manner of expressing the ineffable nature of the Divine Being, it appears more than probable that he) must have been acquainted with something above the ordinary apprehensions, not only of Jews, but even of Christians. [probably through Moses, from the Egyptian Colleges.] But the explication hereof may lead too far."

From, these and similar papers, extracts and notices, interspersed throughout this treatise, (with equally lucid representations that might be offered of the pure cabalistic and other forms of divine science), the reader will now be enabled to obtain a conception of the gems of theosophical literature which Mr. Law possessed and contemplated in his retirement. Having by his side the sublimest discoveries, and (according to the elucidation of the spiritual scope of the patriarchal histories, in Behmen's "MYSTERIUM MAGNUM,") the most standard and scriptural forms of divine knowledge: all clustering instinctively around the one grand central object of the gospel, the earnest pursuit of regeneration, and perfection of the divine life in the soul.

And herein may be recognized the especial providence of God with respect to Mr. Law, as the future regenerator of Christianity and philosophy. That as this is the practical end of all knowledge and all ministrations, so it was the one simple end and design of all his pursuits, and instructions to others. And whatever diversity of view of Christian truth, or deep experimental research into heavenly mysteries he met with in the course of his studies, they only entered into his mind to be restored to their primitive ground and unity of conception, as originally contained in the Holy Scriptures, and to be reproduced accordingly, as occasion required, in the most correct and classic diction. Hence his writings must ever remain standard guides to gospel erudition and divine wisdom.

In our notices of Lee and elsewhere, we have occasionally alluded to the necessity of discriminating between those writers who belong to the category of true mystical divines, from mere visionary pretenders to a knowledge of spiritual and heavenly things. We may now incidentally, make a few reflections upon the proofs of which all true mystical religion and philosophy are susceptible, or the pure standard principles by which all pretensions of this kind must be tried; which may be said to be these (with such others as the enlightened future editor of the proposed larger Biography may see fit to give):—

First. If the sole aim of the individual laying claim to spirituality, from the commencement to the end of his course, be purity, holiness, and perfect Christlikeness of spirit, temper, and practise.

Secondly. If this aim be continually taken from, and directed by, the gospel dictates.

Thirdly. If it be founded in a clear conviction of the necessity of an absolute crossing of all the natural inclinations, habits, reasonings, pride, ease and gratifications of the old Adam, and an entire death to all the most inward spiritual workings of self, self-love and self-seeking. And Fourthly. In an equally clear apprehension of the relations of Christ, in and to the engrafted word, abiding in the ground of the soul, as an all-sufficient, all-present, all-ready, and all-powerful Saviour, regenerator and sanctifier. (1 Cor. i. 30.)

Fifthly. If the practice be simply and really in accordance with such apprehensions, viz. that of constant and earnest supplication (for the most part a genibus,) with the exercise of unflinching patience, as the one direct royal way to true relief, and advancement in spirituality: all according to the plain, undeniable teachings of Christ, in the parable of the importunate widow, and similar examples. In which may be implied the being in communion with some lively, zealous, devout section or society of experimental christians, so as to partake of their various gifts; and all hearty, well-directed endeavours to promote the universal happiness and salvation of our neighbour and of the world.

Sixthly. If, in this process, the individual have attained to the life and walk of pure faith, where every thought and operation of inferior nature is brought into captivity, to the obedience of Christ; and the body as well as the spirit is continually surrendered up to God, to his sole driving, guidance and support: where the soul is firmly grounded in the element of perfect peace and love, and the whole man walks by the secret principles of the "strange," "mystical," "unearthly" life of the holy Jesus. In order to the entrance upon which state, closely perusing all that the most enlightened holy devotees and orthodox contemplatives have left upon record of their apprehensions and experience of the spirit of Christ, and opened powers of the divine world and life.

miroir vivant, que lui réfléchit tous les objets, et qui le porte à tout voir et à tout connaître : mais ce miroir vivant étant lui-même un reflet de la Divinité, c'est par cette lumière que l'homme acquiert

Lastly. If the soul, having pursued onwards faithfully, without intermission, by these simple means of mortification and self-denial, of prayer and patience, and through the probatory exercises, and inevitable experiences of the life of pure faith, of doing and suffering,—have attained to full salvation and restoration to the perfect image of God; in a word to perfect purity of heart, and Divine illumination (Vision or Contemplation). In the course of which, the mind having explored and possessed itself of all the various treasures of mystical wisdom and knowledge, gathered and bequeathed by highly gifted and illuminated souls of all ages and parts of the world, finally shuts itself up to two only books, viz. the holy Scriptures and Behmen: which latter writings are a standard interpretation and key to the will and wisdom of the Holy Spirit as contained in the Bible. We say finally shut itself up to two books, for herein lies its peculiar danger, the rock upon which we may say so many have split. For by reason of the present exigency and state of human nature, however sublimated by christianity, orthodox experience has shewn that tables of stone or outward signatures or indices of the life of truth, are necessary to preserve the imagination, will, and desire, or the life of the soul, in a divine classic order of motion and operation.

Such then are the general principles by which may be tried the validity of all pretensions to divine illumination, and especially to an extraordinary mission from God. That is, whether the individual's piety be of the ancient cast and character, of burning devotion and holiness; whether he be a man entirely of God's workmanship, without crooked, partial, selfish idiosyncrasies, but of an original universal divine spirit and understanding; in whom the highest erudition and gifts of wisdom are manifestly concentrated, yet all crowned with the most solid judgment and pure gospel simplicity: suited indeed to the real vital wants and necessities of mankind and the age of the world.

Now how these characteristics are summed up in the person and genius of Mr. Law, the reader will be enabled to form his own conclusion, from what has been related concerning his early principles and the subsequent progress of his understanding. Writing to a friend (as already quoted), Mr. Law says, "I have had all that I can have from books; the rest I leave to God." And, on another occasion:—"Next to the Scriptures, my only book is the illuminated Behmen. And him I only follow so far as he helps to open in me that which God hath opened in him, concerning the death and the life of the fallen and redeemed man. The whole kingdom of grace and nature was opened in him. And the whole kingdom of grace and nature lies hid in myself. And therefore in reading of him, I am always at home, and kept close to the kingdom of God that is within me."

The subject of regeneration is indeed the pith and drift of all Behmen's writings, however fundamentally he opens out the mysteries of nature and truth. And the student of divine wisdom may here be directed to begin his course by mastering the first eight chapters of "The Book of the Three-fold Life," which appear to have been in great favour with Mr. Law. But it is in the "MYSTERIUM MAGNUM," in the history of the patriarchs, that Behmen more particularly portrays, as it were, the holy melodising of the Spirit of God on its organism or instrument, the regenerate soul; in the very natural and just, yet wonderful descriptions of the kingdom of Christ, as couched in the exact narratives of the Book of Genesis. [Query, Any particular history of the Antediluvians in the Egyptian Colleges; which had been preserved in the ark?]

And this consideration by the way, may serve to shew to us how wonderful a man Moses must have been, to write such a book; how full of God, how light his mind, and how pure his heart! Upon which point we find a MS. fragment by Lee, wherein he alludes to Moses, in the following terms:—

"The Holy Scripture is a wellspring of life and light. And what St. Paul has said of the essential Word of God may be said also of his written word, viz., that all the treasures of the wisdom and knowledge of God are therein included. The first of the books of Scripture is Genesis; and the author who has written it is Moses.

If we consider the person of this holy man of God, we shall find nothing in him but what is great and extraordinary. He was educated as the adopted son of a princess, who had a design of rendering him worthy to be king; and he was instructed in all the [deep divine and natural wisdom, and] sciences of the sages of Egypt, whose reputation was then famous among the learned.]

If we have regard to antiquity, he was without comparison more ancient than all those authors so illustrious in the world, who have acquired Greece the name of the mother of science and arts. For he was near five hundred years before Homer, eight hundred years before the philosopher Thales, who was the first that treated of Nature; nine hundred years before Pythagoras, and more than eleven hundred years before Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle, who were as the chiefs and masters of all the wisdom of the Greeks.

If we consider what appears of greatness in his writings, and in the whole course of his life, we shall find that without having been able to borrow any light from all profane antiquity, or reap any assistance from it, as having flourished before it in the world with great lustre, he was at the same time an orator, a poet, a historian, a philosopher, a lawgiver, a divine, a prophet; more than a prophet; more than sovereign pontiff; for as much as he consecrated the high priest; the minister of God, with whom he treated as one friend treats with another; the leader of his people; lastly, to say all in a word, the master and arbiter of nature, the interpreter of heaven, the vanquisher of kings, the God of Pharaoh.

All these qualifications, both human and divine, were collected and united in Moses, to the end he might possess an authority to which none should be obliged to pay the same deference, as to that of God himself.

The Scripture says of him, that he was mighty in deed and in word. His deeds were his miracles, by which * * *

Here we may likewise remark, what holy sanctuaries of reconдите wisdom, solid learning and patriarchal holiness were undoubtedly the colleges of Egypt where Moses was educated; notwithstanding such a description of them may be as liable to exceptions as if applied to the most eminent sanctuaries of Christian piety and erudition, even the Society of Jesus, or yet more recent, institutes. The writings of Moses, one of their initiates, are perhaps the only documents extant which may afford to us any direct intimations of the intellectual and moral grandeur of the priests of the Most High (I-AM), and sons of heavenly wisdom, in those times.

[ANNOTATION.—Speaking of the walk of pure faith, the life of Jesus and the regeneration, the high road to purity of heart, and Divine vision or Contemplation, we may here take occasion, (for the encouragement and assurance of those who are prepared to enter upon that path, as well as for the benefit of the ordinary reader,) to define the nature of the two guides and lights of human nature, faith and reason, and to set forth their relative distinctions and merits as such. Whereby may at once be perceived the transcendent superiority in regard to understanding and judgment, the disciple of faith possesses over the mere rationalist, however well furnished his brain with the dead notions and images of worldly erudition. Which may be thus represented:— X

"Faith signifies (1.) the principle of receiving and apprehending whatever is communicated to the soul by another being whatsoever; (2.) the act of receiving and apprehending what is communicated to the soul by God, which is properly called faith in God; (3.) the act of receiving and apprehending all what is through Christ more immediately communicated to the soul, purely upon the testimony of his word, which is properly called faith in Christ; (4.) the act of receiving and apprehending what is communicated to the passive intellect from God, through Christ, by the Holy Ghost, upon the inward sense and experience of his operation.

In it may be distinguished (1.) the principle of faith which receiveth the Divine impression of ideas, both simple and compound; (2.) the threefold act of this principle, according to the different manners and degrees of this divine impression on the soul; (3.) the threefold product of this threefold act, as from the Father, Word, and Spirit, bearing witness in the soul.

Reason signifies (1.) the principle of cogitation in general, both direct and reflex; (2.) the gift of understanding, or speculative wisdom, which is otherwise called common sense; (3.) prudence, or practical wisdom, which properly respects human life; (4.) justice and equity; (5.) the cause or ground of a thing; (6.) the Divine Word or Wisdom (λόγος), the second number in the holy Trinity, and the universal light of minds; (7.) the active intellect, or the principle of reflex cogitation in man.

In it may be distinguished (1.) the reasoning principle or rationality; (2.) the act of this principle or ratiocination; (3.) the product of this act, or the argument; (4.) the matter of the argument or ideas.

Hence we deduce the following Propositions:—(I.) Human reason is not the image of God. (II.) Not an essential part of the soul. (III.) The soul may subsist without it. (IV.) The soul may be happy without it. (V.) The soul may be happy eternally without it. (VI.) It may be doubted whether in the intermediate state the soul doth not actually subsist without it. (VII.) It may even be doubted whether reason have any portion at all in the kingdom of heaven. (VIII.) Reason is a superficial faculty. (IX.) All the knowledge acquired by reason is merely superficial. (X.) Reason is in itself a dry and sterile power. (XI.) All the knowledge acquired by it is likewise dry and sterile. (XII.) The origination of reason is no higher than nature. (XIII.) It is derived from the secondary intellect, or soul of the world, through the operation of the seven lords and spirits of nature. (XIV.) The judicature of reason cannot extend beyond its original. (XV.) The certainty of reason is not the highest certainty. (XVI.) There is a certainty even in natural things higher than that of reason, and of which reason can in no wise judge. (XVII.) The evidence of faith is not inferior to that of reason. (XVIII.) The evidence of faith is not only equal, but even superior to that of reason. (XIX.) The method of faith is subject to no delusion. (XX.) The method of reason is subject to an infinity of delusions and errors. (XXI.) The physical certainty from reason is subject to error. (XXII.) The metaphysical certainty from reason is subject to error. (XXIII.) The mathematical certainty itself is not exempt from a possibility of mistake in several cases. (XXIV.) Moral certainty from reason is but very imperfect; and is daily mistaken in almost an infinity of cases, even by the acutest reasoners. (XXV.) Divine certainty greatly transcends all reason. (XXVI.) This divine certainty is only attainable by divine faith. (XXVII.) Human reason can be no adequate cause of divine faith. (XXVIII.) Human reason cannot be so much as a partial cause of divine faith. (XXIX.) The more any one has of divine faith, the more sound is his reason. (XXX.) Reason is capable of being illuminated by faith. (XXXI.) Without faith reason is dark. (XXXII.) It is a less absurdity to contradict reason than faith." All which indeed, will be still further apparent, if we otherwise reflect that faith is to the truly regenerated man of the kingdom of Christ, what reason is to the natural man of this world. Hence when the order of things are inverted, when, by a faithful following of the Gospel counsels, the old man is essentially subdued and fading away, and the new man rising up in his stead, then to that man, in whom this redemption is in actual process, the rule and walk of pure faith is of the utmost certainty of evidence; and just as he is dead to himself and the astral influences of time, and is alive to God and the powers of the divine world, in that measure does the evidence of faith transcend that of reason. The question, as of all others of mystical divinity, however transcendently treated according to the respective idiosyncracies of the writers upon it and their theology, simply resolves itself into the original Gospel distinctions of the old and new man, the fallen rational Adam and the new divine principle or quickenings Spirit of Christ, as to which of these is the true light and guide of the life, and will of the soul. (See also note, p. 69.)

Mr. Law, in his "Letter on Warburton," has, in his usual consummate perfection of thought and diction, so clearly and comprehensively elucidated this subject, that we may be excused for inserting the sum of his argumentation on the present occasion, which is as follows:—

"For faith is nothing else, but so much of the nature and spirit of Christ, born and living in us. I came, says Christ, not to do my own will, but the will of him that sent me. My meat and drink is to do the will of him that sent me. This is the whole nature and perfection of faith. And as no one but Christ had the power to say this of himself, so no one can have or live in this faith, but because the divine nature of Christ is truly born, and formed in him, and is become the life of his life, and the spirit of his spirit. * * *

à Kirchberger, et au sujet duquel celui-ci conseillait à Saint-Martin de supprimer tout ce qui pouvait sentir le mystère. Mais ce que J. Böhm avait pu, d'après ses notions à priori, esquisser en grand,

In short, these two, faith and reasoning, have, and always will divide all mankind, from the beginning to the end of the world, into two sorts of men fully distinct from each other.

The faithful, through every age, are of the seed of the woman, the children of God, and the heirs of his redemption through Jesus Christ.

The reasoners are of the seed of the serpent, they are the heathens through every age, and real heirs of that confusion, which happened to the first builders of the tower of Babel.

To live by faith, is to be truly and fully in covenant with God; to live by reasoning, is to be merely and solely in compact with ourselves, with our own vanity and blindness.

To live by faith, is to live with God in the spirit and power of prayer, in self-denial, in contempt of the world, in divine love, in heavenly foretastes of the world to come, in humility, in patience, long-suffering, obedience, resignation, absolute trust and dependence upon God, with all that is temporal and earthly under their feet.

To live by reasoning, is to be a prey of the old serpent, eating dust with him, grovelling in the mire of all earthly passions, devoured with pride, embittered with envy, tools and dupes to ourselves, tossed up with false hopes, cast down with vain fears, slaves to all the good and evil things of this world, to day elated with learned praise, to-morrow dejected at the unlucky loss of it; yet jogging on year after year, defining words and ideas, dissecting doctrines and opinions, setting all arguments and all objections upon their best legs, sifting and refining all notions, conjectures, and criticisms, till death puts the same full end to all the wonders of the ideal fabric, that the cleansing broom does to the wonders of the spider's web, so artfully spun at the expense of its own vitals.

This is the unalterable difference between a life of faith, and a life of reasoning in the things of God; the former is from God, works with God, and therefore it saveth, it maketh whole, and all things are possible to it; the latter is from the serpent, works with the serpent, and therefore vain opinions, false judgments, errors and delusions, are inseparable from it, and can only belong to it.

Every scholar, every disputer of this world, nay, every man, has been where Eve was, and has done what she did, when she sought for wisdom that did not come from God. All libraries of the world are a full proof of the remaining power of the first sinful thirst after it: they are full of a knowledge that comes not from God, and therefore proceeds from that first fountain of subtlety that opened her eyes. For as there cannot possibly be any goodness in man, but so far as the divine goodness in living and working good in him, so there cannot be any divine truth or knowledge in man, but so far as God's truth and knowledge is opened, living and working in him, because God alone is all truth, and the knowledge of it."

We now close this ANNOTATION on the life of pure faith, the outward characteristics of which are as various as the spiritual complexions and circumstances of life of the subjects of it, though "peculiarity," "strangeness," "singularity," must in some good measure be predicated of the walk and conversation of all who are travellers in that narrow way.]

The profound knowledge the Egyptian savans possessed of the powers of nature, and ability to control and direct the same, are clearly evidenced to us by the accounts of Scripture. As this subject is essentially related to the tenor of our present work, we shall here present to the reader, what Behmen has written upon this point, in treating of the dreams of Pharaoh, being unable to be interpreted by the magicians whom he called to him for that purpose.

"These dreams of Pharaoh (he writes) were represented to him from God, therefore no magus and naturalist could interpret them. For the natural magus hath power only in nature, only in that which nature frameth in its working; he cannot comprehend that, nor advise in that, which the Word of God modeleth and frameth. But a prophet hath power to interpret that; for he is a divine magus, as here Joseph.

With the Egyptians the magic art and skill was common; but when it was misused to witchcraft, it was extirpate, although it remained among the heathen till the kingdom of Christ, till the Divine Magia sprung up. Then the natural magia was suppressed among the Christians, which in the beginning was well that it was suppressed, for the heathenish faith was thereby allayed and quenched; and the magic images of nature, which they honoured for gods, were rooted out of men's hearts.

But when the christian faith was common, then came other magi up, viz. the sects in christendom, which they set up for gods instead of the images of heathen idols, and drove on greater delusions, than the heathen with their magic idols.

For the heathen looked upon the ground of the possibility and working of nature; but these set themselves above the ground of nature, merely in an historical faith, saying that men ought to believe that which they contrive.

As at this very day titulary christendom is full of such magi, as have no natural understanding, either of God or of nature more among them, but only an empty babbling of a supernatural magic ground; wherein they have set up themselves for idol gods, and understanding neither the divine nor natural magia, so that the world is made stock-blind by them. Whence the contention and strife in faith and religion is arisen, that men talk much of faith, one drawing this way, another that way, and make a multitude of opinions which are altogether worse than the heathenish images, which indeed had their ground and foundation in nature; but these images have no ground either in nature or in the supernatural divine faith, but are dumb idols, and their ministers are Baal's ministers.

And as it was highly necessary and good, that the natural magia should be discontinued amongst the christians, where the faith of Christ was manifest; so (N.B.) now at present, it is much more necessary that the natural magia were again manifest. That indeed titulary christendom's idols, which it maketh to itself, might through nature be made manifest and known; that man might know in nature the outspoken or expressed formed Word of God, as also the new regeneration, and also the fall and perdition, that thereby the contrived supernatural idols might be suppressed; that men might at length in nature learn to understand the Scriptures. Seeing men will not confide in the Spirit of God in the divine magia of true faith, but lay their foundation upon the tower of Babel, in the contention and contrived idol opinions, viz. in the edicts and traditions of men.

I do not say that men should seek and preach the heathenish magia again, and take up heathen idols again, but that [N.B.] it is needful to learn to search the ground of nature, viz. the formed Word of God in love and anger, with its re-expression; that man might not be so blind concerning the Essence of all essences. [Especially needful for the induction of India, &c., into the Christian faith; and will be manifested. See Note, p. 496.]

For [N.B.] the fathers of the first faith were not so blind concerning the kingdom and dominion of nature; but did know in and by nature, that there was a hidden God, who made himself visible by the word of his exhalation and information, of the created world, and have known God's word by the creation. Which is now at present much the more necessary, that the opinion idols might come to light and be known; that man might at length see what faith is, that it is not an opinion and conceit, but a divine substance or essence (Heb. xi. 1): which substance or essence in the visible man, is hidden to outward eyes, as the invisible God is hidden in the visible substance of this world.

But that the magi naturales could not expound Pharaoh's dreams, this was the cause: Pharaoh's dreams sprang from the centre of nature, which the heathenish magicians understood not; for their magic ground in their understanding was only in the working and figure of the constellation or asterism, and in the elements. They understood not the ground of the eternal nature, out of which the nature of this world had its original, and wherein it standeth. But the dreams of Pharaoh had their original out of the eternal nature, and were represented in a visible image in the outward nature of time, and in the outward figure of man." * * *

"And we see further, that Joseph said to the king, that it stood not in his own natural power and might, to know such hidden things, but that God alone gave him to know it; so that he needed neither art nor magic images about it, but God would interpret good to Pharaoh through him.

Therefore should a magus give up his will to God, and fix his magic faith, (wherewith he will search the figure of nature in its forms and conditions) in God, that he may apprehend the Word of God, and introduce it into the figure of nature. And then he is a right true divine magus [or alchemist], and may master the inward ground with divine power and virtue, and bring nature into a figure: he that practiseth otherwise herein, he is a false and wicked magus, as the devil and his wizards are.

And it is no way to be thought, as if a Christian ought not to dare to meddle with the ground of nature, but that he must be a clod and dumb image, in the knowledge and skill of the secret mysteries of nature; as Babel saith, Man ought not to dare to search and know it, it were sin; which (all of them one and other) doth understand as much of the ground of sin, as the pot doth of the potter ———."

Recurring back to the former-mentioned proofs or standard principles of graduation in evangelical spirituality and divine illumination, we may remark as the sequence thereof, that this actual "entrance into life," and "enjoyment of the true light," is founded in the simple laws of nature, and has been more or less realized by truly devout mystics in every age of the world, and among every description of Theists, Oriental, Jewish, and Christian (especially of the Romish section); though never philosophically apprehended, (since the loss of the original ancient Adamic tradition and antediluvian philosophy of the Egyptian Colleges,) until the ground of nature and the gospel covenant was afresh opened, distinctively and universally (as a final reflexion of the mirror of divine wisdom), in Behmen.

Nor could it be experienced in its high and hallowed perfection, until the opening and diffusion over all flesh of the heavenly powers on the day of Pentecost. Nor yet by any individual until this process and Pentecostal baptism has had an actual verification in his own spirit.

We might mention Lead as a true member of this kingdom, though, through the distorted, parabolical style of religious conception peculiar to the unlearned and devout of those days, and the taking Behmen by the wrong handle, she, as evident from her diary, was mainly on the look out for extraordinary dispensations (in which she was to act a leading part), visions and revelations, (to which she might also have been encouraged by her similarly complexioned "fellow-labourer," Portage), and so became the subject of abnormal manifestations of the spiritual life, or what Mr. Law terms, distemper.

Which indeed is the great temptation and delusion to which certain complexions and characters of mind, on entering upon the perusal of mystical divinity, will always be exposed. Having however, in the present work thrown around this subject every defence, and laid down a beaten path for progress in high christianity, we may hope that the readers hereof will be preserved amid all dangers and unhappy besetments, be enabled to prosecute a straightforward classic course, and to bring forth orthodox results,—in advance and application of those of Behmen, Freher, and Law, correspondent indeed with the laws of progress—honouring to God, and a blessing to the world.——[Note. We have accidentally omitted to recommend to the devout reader, for his refreshment, and alternate perusal with Sigston's "Bramwell," (likewise as elucidative of certain supposed peculiarities of doctrine in Mr. Law's treatise "Of Regeneration,") the "Life and Death of Thomas Walsh. London, Mason."]

In the enumeration of distinguished original searchers in theosophical erudition, Freher (as Lee has poetically expressed it) ranks next to Behmen, as the profoundly instructed philosopher, remarkable at once for the acuteness and breadth of his apprehension; and is himself followed by Mr. Law as the grand practical expositor of its evangelical relations, and medium through which it must be viewed.

Gichtel, the accomplished editor of the original uniform and illustrated edition of Behmen, seems to have been a most scientific and powerful experimentalist in the philosophy or mystery of the essential working powers of God in nature, as evidenced particularly in the "Historical Relation of N. S." p. 489, which, being given for the illustration of a peculiar point, is there somewhat differently related to the account presented by the editor of his "Life." [His Life, with a copious Index to his Letters, constitutes an Appendix to his "Theosophia Practica," the correct title-page

The knowledge and experience of the mystery in a certain measure and degree, not only formerly existed among the ancient peoples of the East (doubtless derived to them from Egypt), but may be justly concluded to be yet in being, and constituting the essence of their present philosophy and theology; for truth, not error, must be the speculation of devout minds and enlightened understandings, though the grounds of it may not be understood by the majority of the learned, but only by the devout and highly-gifted Contemplatives among them. Its chief seat, we have said, in the earliest ages was in ancient Egypt, where it became abused*, and gradually merged in a false or profane 'magic,' consequent on human reason trying to penetrate with an earthly will into divine things.

Nay, a spark of it may be perceived glimmering in what we must call the empty rationality and juggling of the phenomena of modern 'mesmerism and clairvoyance,' though we also add, valuable results may be anticipated, when the power is exercised and the manipulation performed by regenerate intellects and physiciens, in whom the light world's tincture has regained its native rule. From this ancient well-spring may also have been derived, at first as a pure stream, the modern pretended "science," of freemasonry, and other secret doctrines (and ideal moralities that stupid reason would put in the place of the Gospel), which have finally discharged themselves in the various sinks of tradition and speculative philosophy. [* As several high Christian mysteries since in the west, e.g. the virgin Mary for Virgin Sophia, transubstantiation for the universal heavenly humanity, or one element 'spirit and life' of Christ, purgatory for &c. Also as the worship of fire with the Persians and other Orientals, and the Mexicans, and ancient Britons, &c. (Brahminical Druids), for that Divine fire or 'Father of lights' of the Holy Trinity, before the incarnation, and wrought-out redemption of Jesus Christ. Also, as the doctrine of the Metempsychosis, from rational speculation upon certain secret natural truths—not to be stated openly, though known to the early Brahmins, and that body is in all worlds, the manifestation of spirit with its qualities, as stated in note of p. 70; with many others, apprehensible to the theosophical critic. Who will easily detect the ground of the initiatory rites and ceremonies, penances, sacrifices, and religious practices of the Hindoos, (Maurice, vol. v.) and of the ancient Eleusinian or Theurgic mysteries, no less than of the occult scope and process of the enlightened alchemist.

And here we would again intimate to our modern evangelical propagandists to consider what they are about in attempting to, so to speak, convert India, Persia, and China to Christianity. The secret of their success must be in the manifestation of the truth, not from popular conventional principles, but from its deep eternal ground, as comprised in the expression of St. Paul, "the mystery of God and the Father, and Christ," and nature, and all things. And in demonstration of their principles, they must also, if needs be, be able to do the works which those principles will enable them to perform, if carried out to their proper theosophical development: even to indicate from an intellectual perception, the good and the evil in all natural things, and the several relations and proportions thereof, with the qualifications needful to harmonise the wrathful, disordered properties in bodies; yea, to heal the sick by a touch, to take up any deadly thing, and nothing of all the powers of darkness to be able in anywise to show forth its nature upon them, but to be instantly transmuted into heavenly pomp and sanity.

After the above digression and observations relating to Mr. Law's private or mental biography we now resume our narrative, having thereby prepared the way for the next subject, which is the further elucidation of his character as the evangelist and prophet of the last dispensation. Before proceeding however, we must be excused expressing our hope, that we shall not have, as the result of our intimations, a new sect of Mugglestonians, Philadelphians, French prophets, and other fanatics, or Swedenborgian visionaries, rising up, and, as so many "thieves and robbers," climbing into the sheep-fold "some other way," instead of entering by the one door of earnest enlightened devotion (based upon a self-evident knowledge of the principles and working powers of spiritual nature), and continued for years. This will probably be the case, if mere reasoning and imaginative transcendentalists get hold of this book before they are acquainted with Gospel regeneration, according to the practical scale of graduation, and precautionary annotations of the "Grammar of Wisdom."

However, we ourselves will be no party to such abuse, as we shall endeavour to prevent this work being disposed of indiscriminately, and shall also keep our eye upon any new religious, or magical, magical, alchemical pretenders that may hereafter arise, so as to discern if they really spring from it.

We have shewn by the foregoing remarks how Mr. Law's understanding became matured for his later works. Outwardly by his masterly apprehension of Behmen, aided by the demonstrations of Freher, and collateral elucidations of Lee, and based upon his previous acquaintance with the highest French, Spanish, and Italian masters of experimental mystical science. And inwardly, by his own cultivation of the divine life, and demersions of his spirit in the internal abyss of the divine power and life. The clear views which his understanding (thus enlightened and perfected) had now obtained of the grand practical and scientific scope of christianity, yet remain to be noticed, in order that the reader may duly appreciate the eminence on which he stood, and indeed yet stands, distinguished not merely from the common order, but even the most eminent of Christian divines and philosophers. And from which (having now maintained a silence of eight years, after laying the groundwork of the "Appeal"), he indited all his future works, beginning with the "Spirit of Prayer."

With regard, then, to his comprehensive evangelical views at this period, as well as the general plan into which all his latter works may be said to fall, we shall endeavour to make it quite clear by a SERIES OF QUOTATIONS. As to the effects of what we shall thus open out, upon the theology and practice not only of christendom, but of the whole world, we must leave the reader to make his own reflections after he has read the entire statement. His astonishment will perhaps be indescribable (after a due meditation on the subject), that christendom should have remained for this last century, so ignorant in effect of the important knowledge of such distinctions as are here represented, and indeed evidently appear to be the truth. The following are the Six Heads slique, moral et intellectuel, c'est alors qu'on aurait en effet un véritable Esprit des choses. [Is this most important scheme accomplished? and up to the present time?]

under which we shall endeavour to represent our meaning, or as the key to Mr. Law's latter baptist ministrations:—

I.—(a.) In a conversation which Mr. Law once had with a friend, he remarked that every man has four states of experience to pass through in the course of his christian process, viz. (1.) that of nature in which he is born; (2.) that under the law; (3.) that under Christ come in the flesh; and (4.) that of the Spirit.

(b.) From Mr. Law's "Treatise on Christian Regeneration."—"It may freely be granted that conversion to God is often very sudden and instantaneous, unexpectedly raised from variety of occasions. Thus, one by seeing only a withered tree, another by reading the lives and deaths of the antediluvian fathers, one by hearing of heaven, another of hell, one by reading of the love, or wrath of God, another of the sufferings of Christ, may find himself, as it were, melled into penitence all on a sudden. It may be granted also, that the greatest sinner may in a moment be converted to God, and feel himself wounded in such a degree, as perhaps those never were who have been turning to God all their lives.

But then it is to be observed, that this suddenness of change, or flash of conviction, ■ by no means of the essence of true conversion, and is no more to be demanded in ourselves or others, than such a light from heaven as shone round St. Paul, and cast him to the ground. Secondly, that no one is to expect, or require that another should receive his conversion or awakening from the same cause, or in the same manner as he has done, that is, that heaven, or hell, or the justice, or love of God, or faith in Christ, either as our light, or our atonement, must needs be the first awakening of the soul, because it has been so with him. Thirdly, that this stroke of conversion is not to be considered as signifying our high state of a new birth in Christ, or a proof that we are on a sudden made new creatures, but that we are thus suddenly called, and stirred up to look after a newness of nature. Fourthly, that this sensibility, or manifest feeling of the operations of God upon our souls, which we have experienced in these first awakenings, is not to be expected, or desired to go along with us through the course of our purification. Fifthly, that REGENERATION, or the renewal of our first birth and state, is something entirely distinct from this first sudden conversion, or call to repentance; that it is not a thing done in an instant, but is a certain process, a gradual release from our captivity and disorder, consisting of several stages and degrees, both of death and life, which the soul must go through before it can have thoroughly put off the old man.—I will not say that this must needs be in the same degree in all, or that there cannot be any exception to this. But thus much is true and certain, that Jesus Christ is our pattern, that what he did for us that we are also to do for ourselves, or, in other words, we must follow him in the regeneration.—For what he did, he did, both as our atonement and example, his process, or course of life, temptations, sufferings, denying his own will, death, and resurrection, all done, and gone through on our account, because the human soul wanted such ■ process of regeneration and redemption; because only in such a gradual process all that was lost in Adam could be restored to us again. And therefore it is beyond all doubt that this process is to be looked upon as the stated method of our purification."

(c.) From his "Collection of Letters."—"Jesus Christ is the only peace, and satisfaction of human life. This is absolute, and admits of no exception. St. John the baptist was the true preparer of the way to Christ; if you think of any other way, it is labour lost. This point is absolutely determined where Christ saith, 'They have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them. If they believe not Moses nor the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one arose from the dead.'

Miracles and demonstrations, you see, are in vain, till Moses and the prophets are believed. And Now Moses is sin, made known by the law, and the prophets are faith and hope in God. And these two things must have their state and work in the soul, before it can have any benefit from Christ and his miracles. If you would therefore give some check to the growth of suicide and madness, it cannot be by attacking them in themselves, or speaking to the unreasonableness of their particular nature, this is as useless as a miracle to him that heareth neither Moses nor the prophets.

Now as Moses and the prophets were of necessity before the coming of Christ, so ■ must be in every human soul." [Reflect here, how the entire Bible is a mystical emblem of Man; as created perfect, as fallen, and as redeemed and glorified, with the process thereof, in its respective steps.]

(d.) From the same.—"From this unchangeable love of God towards man, which could no more cease than God could cease, came forth that wonderful scene of providence, of such a variety of means and dispensations; of visions, voices, and messages from heaven; of law, of prophecies, of promises, and threatenings, all adapted to the different states, conditions, and ages of the fallen world [and it is to be understood with respect to every individual soul], for no other end, but by every art of divine wisdom, and contrivance of love, to break off man from his earthly delusion, and beget in him a sense of his lost glory, and so make him capable of finding again that blessed essential operation of Father, Son, and holy Spirit in his soul, which was the essential glory of his first creation.

Now as in this scene of a divine and redeeming providence, God had to do with a poor, blind, earthly creature, that had lost all sense of heavenly things as they are in themselves, so the wisdom of God must often, as it were, humanise itself, and condescend to speak of himself after the manner of men. Because the earthly creature, the mere natural man, could not otherwise be brought into any sense of that which God was to him.

But now all this process of Divine Providence was only for the sake of something higher: the mystery of God in man and man in God still lay hid, and was no more opened, than the mystery of a redeeming Christ was opened in the type of a paschal lamb.

Pentecost alone was [or is, and so applying it individually throughout,] that which took away all veils, and showed the kingdom of God as it was in itself, and set man again under the [same] immediate essential operation of God, which first gave birth to a holy Adam in paradise. Types and shadows ended because the substance of them was found. The cloven tongues of fire had put an end to them by opening the divine eyes which Adam had closed up, unstopping the spiritual ears that he had filled with clay, and making his dumb sons to speak with new tongues.

And what did they say? They said all old things were gone; that a new heaven and a new earth were coming forth; that God himself was manifested in the flesh of men, who were now all taught of God. And what were they taught? That same which Adam was taught by his first created life in God, namely, that the immediate essential operation of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, was henceforth the birthright of all that become true disciples of Christ.—Thus ended the old creation, and the fall of man, in a God manifested in the flesh, dying in and for the world, and coming again in spirit to be the life and light of all the sons of Adam.

Look now at all God's dispensations to the day of Pentecost, in this true point of view, as so many schools of different discipline and education of the natural man, till by a birth from above he could bear the language of heaven, and be taught of God..... That is, till the threatenings of the law, and the work of prophecy have done their work, and that 'day star ariseth in the heart,' which knoweth and teacheth that CREATOR, REDEEMER, and LOVE, are the one true unchangeable triune God, that Father, that Son, and Holy Spirit, which from everlasting to everlasting have only one will and one work of heavenly life, light and love in and towards the creature."

(e.) From his "Dialogue on Justification."—The passage here referred to has been already presented to the reader on p. 107 of this work, commencing with "The Christian religion," &c., and ending with "beginning to the end;" to which, therefore, the reader may now turn.

II.—From Mr. Law's "Spirit of Love,"—Being an express dissertation on legal and evangelical Christianity; wherein is seen the difference between a servant of God and a child of God; between what is called a good Christian and a regenerate believer; between that goodness which arises from a rational conviction of the mind and a sincere effort to keep the Divine commands, in a regular and virtuous life, and that which is the effect of the power and presence of Christ, or the life of God born again and fully revealed in the soul—the true classic, or proper name of which is the Spirit of love. In short, between the way and the end of religion.

"Eusebius. Pray, Theophilus, proceed as you please to lay open my defects in the Spirit of love, for I am earnestly desirous of being set right in so important a matter.

Theogenes. Let me first observe to Eusebius, that I am afraid the matter is much worse with me, than it is with him. For though this doctrine seems to have got all my heart, as it is a doctrine, yet I am continually thrown out of it in practice, and find myself as daily under the power of my old tempers and passions, as I was before I was so full of this doctrine.

Theophilus. You are to know, my friends, that every kind of virtue and goodness may be brought into us by two different ways. They may be taught us outwardly by men, by rules and precepts; and they may be inwardly born in us, as the genuine birth of our own renewed spirit. In the former way, as we learn them only from men, by rules and documents of instruction, they, at best, only change our outward behaviour, and leave our heart in its natural state, and only put our passions under a forced restraint, which will occasionally break forth, in spite of the dead letter of precept and doctrine. Now this way of learning, and attaining goodness, though thus imperfect, is yet absolutely necessary, in the nature of the thing, and must first have its time, and place, and work in us, yet it is only for a time, as the law was a schoolmaster to the gospel. We must first be babes in doctrine, as well as in strength, before we can be men. But of all this outward instruction, whether from good men or the letter of scripture, it must be said, as the apostle saith of the law, that 'it maketh nothing perfect'; and yet is highly necessary, in order to perfection.

The true perfection and profitableness of the holy written word of God, is fully set forth by St. Paul to Timothy. 'From a child (saith he) though hast known the scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, which is by faith in Christ Jesus.' Now these scriptures were the law and the prophets, for Timothy had known no other from his youth. And as they, so all other scriptures since, have no other good, or benefit in them, but as they lead and direct us to a salvation, that is not to be had in themselves, but from faith in Christ Jesus. Their teaching is only to teach us, where to seek and to find the fountain and source of all light and knowledge.

Of the law, saith the apostle, 'it was a schoolmaster to Christ;' of the prophets, he saith the same.

'Ye have (says he) a more sure word of prophecy, whereunto you do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star ariseth in your hearts.' The same thing is to be affirmed of the letter of the New Testament; it is but our schoolmaster unto Christ, a light like that of prophecy, to which we are to take great heed, until Christ, as the dawning of the day, or the day-star, ariseth in our hearts. Nor can the thing possibly be otherwise; no instruction that comes under the form of words can do more for us than sounds and words can do; they can only direct us to something, that is better than themselves, that can be the true light, life, spirit, and power of holiness in us.

Eusebius. I cannot deny what you say, and yet it seems to me to derogate from scripture.

Theophilus. Would you then have me to say, that the written word of God is that Word of God which liveth and abideth for ever; that Word which is the wisdom and power of God; that Word, which was with God, which was God, by whom all things were made; that Word of God, which was made flesh for the redemption of the world; that Word of God, of which we must be born again; that Word, which 'lighteth every man that cometh into the world,' that Word, which in Christ Jesus 'is become wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification,' in us; would you have me say, that all this is to be understood of the written word of God? But if this cannot possibly be, then all that I have said is granted, namely, that Jesus is alone that Word of God, that can be the light, life, and salvation of fallen man. Or how is it possible more to exalt the letter of scripture, than by owning it to be a true, outward verbal direction to the one only true light and salvation of man.

Suppose you had been a true disciple of John the Baptist, whose only office was, to prepare the way to Christ, how could you have more magnified his office, or declared your fidelity to him, than by going from his teaching, to be taught by that Christ, to whom he directed you? The baptist was, indeed, a 'burning and a shining light,' and so are the holy scriptures; but 'he was not that light, but was sent to bear witness of that light. That was the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world.'

What a folly would it be, to say that you had undervalued the office and character of John the Baptist, because he was not allowed to be the light itself, but only a true witness of it, and guide to it? Now, if you can show that the written word in the Bible can have any other, or higher office, or power, than such a ministerial one, as the baptist had, I am ready to hear you.

Eusebius. There is no possibility of doing that.

Theophilus. But if that is not possible to be done, then you are come to the full proof of this point, viz., that there are two ways of attaining knowledge, goodness, virtue, &c., the one by the ministry of outward, verbal instruction, either by men or books, and the other by an inward birth of divine light, goodness, and virtue, in our own renewed spirit; and that the former is only in order to the latter, and of no benefit to us, but as it carries us farther than itself, to be united in heart and spirit, with the light, and word, and Spirit of God. Just as the baptist had been of no benefit to his disciples, unless he had been their guide from himself to Christ.

But to come now closer to our subject in hand.

From this twofold light or teaching, there necessarily arises a twofold state of virtue and goodness. For such as the teacher or teaching is, such is the state and manner of the goodness that can be had from it. Every effect must be according to the cause that produces it. If you learn virtue and goodness only from outward means, from men or books, you may be virtuous and good according to time, and place, and outward forms; you may do works of humility, works of love and benevolence, use times and forms of prayer; all this virtue and goodness is suitable to this kind of teaching, and may very well be had from it. But the spirit of prayer, the spirit of love, and the spirit of humility, or of any other virtue, are only to be attained by the operation of the light and spirit of God, not outwardly teaching, but inwardly bringing forth a new-born spirit within us.

And now, let me tell you both, that it is much to be feared, that you as yet stand only under this outward teaching; your good works are only done under obedience to such rules, precepts, and doctrines, as your reason assents to, but are not the fruits of a new-born spirit within you. But till you are thus renewed in the spirit of your minds, your virtues are only taught practices, and grafted upon a corrupt bottom. Every thing you do will be a mixture of good and bad; your humility will help you to pride, your charity to others will give nourishment to your own self-love, and as your prayers increase, so will the opinion of your own sanctity. Because till the heart is purified to the bottom, and has felt the axe at the root of its evil (which cannot be done by outward instruction), every thing that proceeds from it partakes of its impurity and corruption. [Here consider the distinction between lecture-teaching and preaching, Unitarianism, Swedenborgianism, and all the other imperfect and heterodox religious schemes, and ancient orthodox gospel Christianity.]

Now that Theogenes is only under the law, or outward instruction, is too plain from the complaint that he made of himself. For notwithstanding his progress in the [mystical] doctrine of love, he finds all the passions of his corrupt nature still alive in him, and himself only altered in doctrine and opinion.

The same may be well suspected of you, Eusebius, who are so mistaken in the spirit of love that you fancy yourself to be wholly possessed of it, from no other ground but because you embrace it, as it were, with open arms, and think of nothing but living under the power of it. Whereas, if the spirit of love was really born in you from its own seed, you would account for its birth and power in you in quite another manner than you have here done; you would have known the price that you had paid for it, and how many deaths you had suffered, before the spirit of love came to life in you.

Eusebius. But surely, sir, imperfect as our virtues are, we may yet, I hope, be truly said to be in a state of grace; and if so, we are under something more than mere outward instruction. Besides, you very well know, that it is a principle with both of us [as with our spiritual friends, the Quakers,] to expect all our goodness from the spirit of God dwelling and working in us. We live in faith and hope of the divine operation; and therefore I must needs say, that your censure upon us seems to be more severe than just.

Theophilus. Dear sir, I censure neither of you, nor have I said one word by way of accusation. So far from it, that I love and approve the state you are both in. It is good and happy for Theogenes, that he feels and confesses that his natural tempers are not yet subdued by doctrine and precept. It is good and happy for you also, that you are so highly delighted with the doctrine of love, for by this means each of you have your true preparation for further advancement. And though your state has this difference, yet the same error was common to both of you. You both of you fancied you had as much of the Spirit of love, as you could or ought to have; and therefore Theogenes wondered he had no more benefit from it; and you wondered that I should desire to lead you farther into it. And therefore, to deliver you from this error, I have desired this conference upon the practical ground of the Spirit of love, that you may neither of you [nor, if you please, your spiritual friends, the Quakers] lose the benefit of that good state in which you stand.

Eusebius. Pray, therefore, proceed as you please. For we have nothing so much at heart, as to have the truth and purity of this divine love* brought forth in us. For as it is the highest perfection, that I adore in God, so I can neither wish nor desire anything for myself, but to be totally governed by it. I could as willingly consent to lose all my being, as to find the power of love lost in my soul. Neither doctrine, nor mystery, nor precept, has any delight for me, but as it calls forth the birth, and growth, and exercise of that spirit, which doth all that it doth, towards God and man, under the one law of LOVE. Whatever, therefore, you can say to me, either to increase the power, manifest the defects, or remove the impediments of divine love in my soul, will be heartily welcome to me. [* See it described p. 64.]

Theophilus. I apprehend that you do not yet know, what Divine love is in itself, nor what is its nature and power in the soul of man. For Divine love is perfect peace and joy, it is a freedom from all disquiet, it is all content, and mere happiness; and makes every thing to rejoice in itself. Love is the Christ of God; wherever it comes, it comes as the blessing and happiness of every natural life, as the restorer of every lost perfection, a redeemer from all evil, a fulfiller of all righteousness, and a peace of God, which passeth all understanding. Through all the universe of things, nothing is uneasy, unsatisfied or restless, but because it is not governed by love, or because its nature has not reached or attained the full birth of the spirit of love. For when that is done, every hunger is satisfied, and all complaining, murmuring, accusing, resenting, revenging, and striving, are as totally suppressed, and overcome, as the coldness, thickness, and horror of darkness, are suppressed and overcome by the breaking forth of the light. If you ask why the spirit of love cannot be displeased, cannot be disappointed, cannot complain, accuse, resent, or murmur, it is because Divine love desires nothing but itself; it is its own good, it has all, when it has itself, because nothing is good but itself, and its own working; for love is God; 'and he that dwelleth in God, dwelleth in love:' tell me now Eusebius, are you thus blessed in the spirit of love? [Have you attained to this degree of regeneration and renewal in the divine light? Is this the Christianity you enjoy?]

Eusebius. Would you have me tell you that I am angel, and without the infirmities of human flesh and blood?

Theophilus. No; but I would have you judge of your state of love, by these angelical tempers, and not by any fervor or heat, that you find in yourself. For just so much, and so far as you are freed from the folly of all earthly affections, from all disquiet, trouble, and complaint about this, or that, just so much, and so far is the spirit of love come to life in you. For Divine love is a new life, and new nature, and introduces you into a new world; it puts an end to all your former opinions, notions, and tempers; it opens new senses in you, and makes you see high to be low, and low to be high; wisdom to be foolishness, and foolishness wisdom; it makes prosperity and adversity, praise and dispraise to be equally nothing. 'When I was a child (saith the apostle), I thought as a child, I spake as a child, but when I became a man, I put away childish things.' Whilst man is under the power of nature, governed only by worldly wisdom, his life, (however old he may be) is quite childish; every thing about him only awakens childish thoughts and pursuits in him; all that he sees and hears, all that he desires or fears, likes, or dislikes; that which he gets, and that which he loses; that which he hath, and that which he hath not, serve only to carry him from this fiction of evil, to that fiction of good, from one vanity of peace, to another vanity of trouble! But when Divine love is born in the soul, all childish images of good and evil are done away, and all the sensibility of them is lost, as the stars lose their visibility, when the sun is risen.

Theogenes. That this is the true power of the Spirit of Divine love, I am fully convinced from my own uneasiness at finding that my natural tempers are not overcome by it. For whence could I have this trouble, but because that little dawning that I have of the Spirit of love in me, maketh just demands to be the one light, breath, and power of my life, and to have all that is within me overcome and governed by it. And therefore I find, I must either silence this small voice of new risen love within me, or have no rest from complaints, and self-condemnation, till my whole nature is brought into subjection to it.

Theophilus. Most rightly judged, Theogenes; and now we are fairly brought to the one great practical point, on which all our proficiency in the spirit of love entirely depends. Namely, that all that we are, and all that we have from Adam, as fallen, must be given up, absolutely denied and resisted [that is, by a faithful conformity to the Gospel counsels], if the birth of divine love [the full birth of the Holy Spirit] is to be brought forth in us. For all that we are by nature, is in full contrariety to this Divine love, nor can it be otherwise; a death to itself is its only cure, or rather only can make it subservient to good. * * * "Neither notions, nor speculations, nor heat, nor fervor, nor rules, nor methods, can bring it forth. It is the child of light, and cannot possibly have any birth in you, but only and solely from the light of God rising in your own soul, as it rises in heavenly beings. But the light of God cannot arise, or be found in you, by any art or contrivance of your own, but only and solely in the way of that faith, prayer, meekness, humility, and patience, which waits, trusts, resigns to, and expects all from the inward, living, life-giving operation of the triune God within you; creating, quickening, and reviving in your fallen soul, that birth, and image, and likeness of the holy Trinity, in which the first father of mankind was created.

Theogenes. You need say no more, Theophilus; you have not only removed that difficulty, which brought us hither, but have, by a variety of things, fixed and confirmed us in a full belief of that great truth elsewhere asserted, namely, 'That there is but one salvation for all mankind, and that is the life of God in the soul. And also, that there is but one possible way for man to attain this life of God, not one for a Jew, another for a Christian, and a third for an oriental Heathen. No: God is one, human nature is one, salvation is one, and the way to it is one, and that is the faith or desire of the soul turned wholly to God.'

Therefore, dear Theophilus, adieu. If we see you no more in this life, you have sufficiently taught us how to seek and find every kind of goodness, blessing, and happiness, in God alone."

[The candidate will not fail to observe, how in this long quotation is set forth the ground and reason of the states of those devoted souls, who, in the lively expression of one of them (see note, p. 92), had "no faith, unless it were the faith of a devil;" and of others who have "found liberty," pardon, justification, salvation, the witness of the Spirit, entire sanctification, perfect love, &c.]

III.—(a.) From the "Collection of Letters."—"Let us beware also, to 'angels in heaven.'" The reader is directed for the passage in question to pp. 96-8 of this treatise.

(b.) From the same.—"No man (saith the apostle) can call Christ Lord, but by the Holy Ghost." Therefore nothing is, or can be a divine service in that church which has Christ for its Lord, but what has the Holy Spirit for its beginner, doer, and finisher. For if it be certain that no one can own Christ as his Lord, but by the Holy Spirit, then it must be equally certain that no one can serve or worship God through Christ his Lord in any other way, help, power, or means, but so far as it is all done in and by the power of the same Holy Spirit. 'Whatsoever is born of the flesh is flesh;' that is, whatsoever proceeds from, or is done by the natural powers of man, from his birth of flesh and blood, is merely human, earthly, and corrupt, and can no more do any thing that is heavenly, or perform a service or worship that is divine, than our present flesh and blood can enter into the kingdom of heaven. Thus saith the apostle, 'Ye are not in the flesh, but in the spirit, if so be the Spirit of God dwelleth within you. Now if man hath not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his.' And consequently if not his, he can perform no divine service to him. Nor can any worship cease to be carnal, or become divine, but by its being all that it is, and doing all that it doth, by the power, and presence of Christ dwelling in our souls, and helping us by his Holy Spirit to cry in truth and reality, Abba, Father.

The New Testament never calls us to do, or offer, or allows anything to be done or offered to God, as a divine service or worship, but what is done in the truth and reality of faith, of hope, of love, and obedience to God.

But through all the New Testament, no faith, no hope, no love is allowed to be true and godly, but only that faith, that hope, &c., which solely proceeds from, and is the fruit of the Holy Spirit living, dwelling, and working in our whole heart, and soul, and spirit.

This spirituality of the Christian religion, is the reason why it was first preached to the world under the name of the kingdom of God, because under this new dispensation, freed from veils, shadows and figures of good things absent or to come, God himself is manifested, ruling in us and over us, as an essential light of our lives, as an indwelling word of power, as a life-giving spirit within us, forming us by a new creation, to become a 'chosen generation, a royal priesthood,' to 'offer spiritual sacrifices to God, through a new and living way, which Christ hath consecrated for us.' The truth and perfection of which state is plainly set forth by the following prayer of Christ, viz., 'That they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us, I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one, and that the love wherewith thou hast loved me, may be in them, and I in them.' Now for the truth and certainty of this spiritual kingdom, in which are only spiritual worshippers baptized from above into an union and communion with Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, through the mysterious union of God and man in the one mediator Jesus Christ; for the truth, I say, of this spiritual state of Christianity, we have the plainest words of Christ, expressly declaring that the Jerusalem service, and consequently everything or service that has the nature of it, was to have its end in the establishment of his church.

'Believe me (saith he), the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father: but the hour cometh and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him.'

Therefore it must be certain in the highest degree that Christ cannot, nor could set up any other kind of worship, or worshippers, but such as the Father seeketh; because he and his Father were one, both in will and work. And the reason and necessity of this kind of worship is added by Christ, in the following words, 'God is a spirit, and they that worship him, must worship him in spirit and in truth.'

Therefore if Christ had not only and solely set up this truth of spiritual worship, he had been but another Moses, and though a better teacher, yet still but as a schoolmaster to some higher state of religion, that was yet wanted, and must be revealed, if so be that man was to be restored to his true state of life, union and happiness in and with the Divine nature. For as God is a spirit, and our life is spiritual, so no religious worship can be in its true perfection, or bring us into the possession of our highest good, till it raises all that is spirit and life in us, into union and communion with spirit and life in God."

[These QUOTATIONS will have afforded the reader a further glimpse into what we mean by the above-mentioned 'distinctions;' and how the universal teaching of the churches and the duties enjoined in them, in which the preachers and hearers rest as the end, are but the way to the end; which is one degree further, and consisteth in the new birth of gospel Christianity, as explained above. However excellent and sublime, therefore, may be such general discourses, the people are but imperfectly taught Christianity, if they are not directed to its ultimate stage, viz. that of Christ come in the Spirit, which consists in an entire death to the spirit of the world and to self, and an entire living and respiring in the elements of Christ's new kingdom upon earth. But we continue.]

IV.—From the Gospel of St. John, the great head mystical disciple of a mystical-speaking Master. Throughout the whole of our Lord's discourses as herein related, it is manifest that to "believe" in him implies simply and universally, the total following of him, the treading in the steps of his process, perfect obedience to his counsels and precepts; the result of which should be the enjoyment of "the light of life," "no condemnation," "freedom or liberty indeed," in short, the new birth and new creation. In accordance with which view, understand the implications of Romans x. 4-17.—But what we especially refer to here, is John vii. 37, 39.—"If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water. [N.B.] But this spake he of the Spirit, which they [throughout all ages] that believe on him [i.e. should actually take him for their Lord, King, Priest, Prophet, and all] should receive; for the Holy Ghost was not yet given, because that Jesus was not yet glorified."

V.—(a.) From the "Address to the Clergy."—"That the Jewish and Christian Church stand at this day in the same kind of apostacy, or fallen state, must be manifest to every one that will not shut his eyes against it. Why are the Jews in a fallen state? It is because they have refused Him who, in his whole process, was the truth, the substance, the life, and fulfilling of all that which was outwardly taught, and prescribed in their law and prophets.

But is it not as easy to see that the whole Christian church are in a fallen state, and for the same reason, because they are fallen or turned away from that Holy Spirit who was promised, and given to be the one only power, life, and fulfilling of all that which was outwardly taught, and prescribed by the gospel. For the Holy Spirit to come was just the same all, and fulfilling of the whole gospel, as a Christ to come was the all, and the fulfilling of the law. The Jew, therefore, with his Old Testament, not owning Christ in all his process to be the truth and life, and fulfiller of their law, is just in the same apostacy as the Christian with his New Testament, not owning the Holy Spirit in all his operations to be his only light, guide, and governor. For as all types and figures in the law were but empty shadows, without Christ's being the life and power of them, so all that is written in the gospel is but dead letter, unless the Holy Spirit in man be the living reader, the living rememberer, and the living doer of them. Therefore, where the Holy Spirit is not thus owned and received as the whole power and life of the gospel state, it is no marvel that Christians have no more of gospel virtues than the Jews have of patriarchal holiness, or that the same lusts and vices which prosper among the Jews should break forth with as much strength in fallen Christendom. For the New Testament not ending in the coming of the Holy Spirit, with fullness of power over sin and hell and the devil, is but the same and no better a help to heaven than the Old Testament without the coming of a Messiah.—Need I now say any more to demonstrate the truth of that which I first said was the one thing absolutely essential, and only available to man's salvation, namely, the Spirit of God brought again to his first power of life in us. This was the glory of man's creation, and this alone can be the glory of his redemption. All besides this that passes for a time betwixt God and man, be it what it will, shows only our fall and distance from God, and in its best state has only the nature of a good road, which is only good because that which we want is at the end of it. Whilst God calls us by various outward dispensations, by creaturely things, figurative institutions, &c., it is a full proof that we are not yet in our true state, or that union with God which is intended by our redemption.

God said to Moses, Put off thy shoes, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground. Now this which God said to Moses is only that very same thing which circumcision, the law, sacrifices, and sacraments say to man. They are in themselves nothing else but outward significations of inward impurity, and lost holiness; and can do no more in themselves, but intimate, point, and direct to an inward life and new birth from above, that is to be sought after.

But here lies the great mistake, or rather idolatrous abuse of all God's outward dispensations. They are taken for the thing itself, for the truth and essence of religion. That which the learned Jews did with the outward letter of their law, that same do learned Christians with the outward letter of the gospel.—Why did the Jewish church so furiously and obstinately cry out against Christ, Let him be crucified? It was because their letter-learned ears, their worldly spirit, and temple-orthodoxy would not bear to hear of an inward Saviour, not bear to hear of being born again of his Spirit, of eating his flesh and drinking his blood, of his dwelling in them and they in him. To have their law of ordinances, their temple-pomp sunk into such a fulfilling Saviour as this, was such enthusiastic jargon to their ears, as forced their sober, rational theology, to call Christ, Beelzebub, his doctrine, blasphemy, and all for the sake of Moses and rabbinic orthodoxy.

Need it now be asked, Whether the true Christ of the gospel be less blasphemed, less crucified by that Christian theology which rejects an inward Christ, a Saviour living and working in the soul, as its inward light and life, generating his own nature and spirit in it as its only redemption: whether that which rejects all this as mystic madness, be not that very same old Jewish wisdom sprung up in Christian theology, which said of Christ when teaching these very things, He is mad, why hear ye him? * * *

If it now be asked, Whence, or from what, comes all this spiritual blindness, which from age to age thus mistakes and defeats all the gracious designs of God towards fallen mankind? Look at the origin of the first sin and you see it all. Had Eve desired no knowledge but what came from God, Paradise had been the habitation of her and all her offspring. If, after Paradise lost, Jews and Christians had desired no knowledge but what came from God, the law and prophets had kept the Jew close to the first tree of life, and the Christian church had been a kingdom of God and communion of saints to this day.

Look where you will, through all the whole nature of things, no divine wisdom, knowledge, goodness, and deliverance from sin are anywhere to be found for fallen man but in these two points: (1.) A total entire entrance into the whole process of Christ; (2.) A total resignation to, and sole dependence upon the continual operation of the Holy Ghost, or Christ come again in the spirit, to be our never ceasing light, teacher, and guide into all those ways of virtue in which he himself walked in the flesh. All besides this, call it by what name you will, is but dead work, a vain labour of the old man to new create himself.—And here let it be well observed that in these two points consists the whole of that mystic divinity, to which a Jewish orthodoxy at this day is so great an enemy. For nothing else is meant or taught by it, but a total dying to self (called the process or cross of Christ) that a new creature (called Christ in us, or Christ come in the Spirit) may be begotten, in the purity and perfection of the first man's union with God. Now, let the Christian world forget, or depart from this one mystic way of salvation, let anything else be thought of or trusted to but the cross of Christ and the Spirit of Christ; and then, though churches, and preachers, and prayers, and sacraments are everywhere in plenty, yet nothing better can come of it than a Christian kingdom of Pagan vices, along with a mouth-belief of an holy catholic church and communion of saints!

(b.) From the same.—The passage here referred to will be found in p. 109, commencing with these words, "God's mark;" to which the reader is requested to turn.

VI.—From the "Way to Divine Knowledge."—The passage here denoted, has been already inserted in this book, pp. 120-1; to which place the reader is therefore referred for its perusal. It will be found to sum up all the preceding QUOTATIONS, in a luminous view of the distinction between universal piety or Christianity, and that which is declared by the gospel, viz., a divine life that had been lost by the humanity, restored to it again, as the effect and fruit of the glorification of the second Adam, Jesus Christ. Also, how the powers of this Divine life are opened upon all human nature, as to its engrafted divine principle, and ever ready and instant to act and be productive of a new creation. Insomuch that (to quote the words of Mr. Law) "a root set in the finest soil, in the best climate, and blessed with all that sun, and air, and rain can do for it, is not in so sure a way of its growth to perfection as every man may be, whose well instructed mind and spirit aspires after all that, which God is ready and infinitely desirous to give him." With that passage, therefore, we conclude these QUOTATIONS, having adduced even more than enough to elucidate the tenor of our remarks at the commencement, and to open the eyes of Christians generally on a subject of such infinite moment to their welfare. [End of the SERIES OF QUOTATIONS.]

And now, standing on this high ground of apprehension, the reader may calmly consider the difference between the ministration of Mr. Law, and that of the wisest and best divines and public in-

We once more, before proceeding further, request the reader to bear in mind these ‘distinctions’ between the law of Christianity and its true spiritual character. Many indeed will pretend to understand these distinctions even in their vast practical comprehensiveness, and will perhaps designate the contents of this statement, a simple elementary knowledge. Be it so; but who, we ask, has described them philosophically, from their ground? Even the truly spiritual of the Methodists—for want of this exact apprehension could never describe in a rational, demonstrative manner, the ground of their own experience, and the true original difference between the evangelical and the Quakers—though by the way, true Methodism judiciously and efficiently worked out, and as to the Quakers—personal development, will enhance the soul in spirituality and to its proper limit of social and personal development, will enhance the doctrine and discipline of the “Friends” divine communion much beyond any means which the doctrine and discipline of the “Friends” can afford, (and the pure practical and mystical theology of the ‘Romish church’ even yet higher still,)—as to this body of religionists, we say, through laying so much stress upon the Holy Spirit’s influences, they will be found to be practically and almost universally subject to two grand errors; first, in considering the ordinary conscience as the true evangelical light, and secondly, in fixing the minds of their people almost isolatedly upon this abstract truism, that all spiritual life must come from the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. Whereby a deadly indolence of soul, we say, is introduced; the individuals naturally concluding, that it is of no use attempting to do anything towards l'homme;—De la nature;—De la parole. L'objet de ce livre est de montrer comment l'Homme-esprit (ou exerçant un ministère spirituel) peut s'améliorer, et régénérer lui-même et les autres, en salvation, but they must quietly wait till they are moved to it by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. Thus overlooking the whole tenor and analogy of the teachings of Christ; which are grounded upon a perfect knowledge of man's constitution as to soul, spirit, and body, and their mutual influences, their relations to the Holy Trinity of the divine life, and their essential necessities. Whence he exhorts all men that see and understand their spiritual privity and destitution, to seek and ask for the renewing influences of the Holy Spirit, and to ask in faith, being assured they shall accordingly receive them—that is, earnestly, continuously, perseveringly, as represented in the parable of the man borrowing the loaves of his neighbour; yea, to keep on seeking, asking, and knocking with unwearied diligence, until the desired blessings be sensibly obtained. This is what our Lord invariably teaches to be the procedure of man, in order to come under the full influences of the Holy Spirit, that it may work in him to will and to do for his salvation. Having however, alluded to the benefits of vocal and earnest prayer as the proved orthodox means of introducing the soul into the interior and spiritual worship, (which in effect embraces the distinctions between the devotional worship of the universal church of Christ in all ages, and that modern, half-thinking spiritual branch of it just referred to,) we need not dwell upon this point further, until this latter can show the disadvantage of acting up to Christ's doctrine in this particular; and that vocal devotions are not sure means of awakening in the soul the true spirit of prayer. To do this, however, it must first be shown that sound is not one of the seven spirits of God in nature, and that it has no communion with or influence upon any of the other Divine spirits.

But to sum up these observations: the Quakers in their popular theology, we say, so rest upon the necessity and sufficiency of the Holy Spirit, that an enquirer would never suppose there to be a process in redemption; not any successive ministrations in Christian salvation, no degrees of descent out of the fallen, and of ascent into the redeemed humanity. That Christ's work in redeeming his own humanity was not the representation and model, according to which every other human nature must be redeemed, so as to attain to that state of glory he now enjoys in heaven; though the Scripture distinctly teaches, that the same powerful Spirit by which Christ redeemed his own soul and body, is given to every individual man to do the same great work for him. (Heb. ix. 14.) The consequence then of all these imperfect views is, we infer, that nineteen-twentieths of the members of the 'spiritual' sect referred to, must rest content with merely spiritual doctrines, and without any experimental verification of Christianity; at all events, according to the orthodox gospel dictates and implications, as attested by all ages to be the mode and effects of the Comforter's operations. [Which commence and proceed with conviction of sin, deep penitence, faith in God, the conscientious performance of duty under great and manifold falls, continuous and earnest, yea agonising prayer, the surprising breaking into the kingdom of light and love by a new birth, and the dwelling and growing up therein under the immediate influences of the Holy Spirit, even to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ].—In short, from these and a number of other cases we might adduce, it appears that some churches merely look at one part, and others at another part of Christian doctrine, according to their particular natural or spiritual constitution. But where, we again ask, except in Mr. Law's writings, is the entire Gospel, uniformly exhibited, both on the part of the Redeemer and the redeemed? where the whole philosophy and theology of Christianity so distinctly set forth, as that the Christian may see his exact position in the regeneration, his relation to God and to eternity, to heaven and hell, and be able to give a true, rational account for the hope that is in him, (without begging the question, boggling and hotch-potch quotations of Scripture,) whether to a Jew, a Mahomedan, or a learned and honourable oriental "Heathen?"

To proceed. We have observed that Mr. Law maintained a wise silence for eight years,—which, as he was to be the personification of a standard educated mind, passing through Christianity, was doubtless so regulated by the Divine wisdom. We have also remarked that his works were severally and collectively the transcripts of his own experience: which is said to have been the substance of Miss Gibbon's reply to a request made to her, to write Mr. Law's life. Up to the year 1732, he had preached the gospel of the law, or the duties and obligations of wisdom and devotion; but now it had become his high privilege and duty, after the intervening growth of his mind, (as exhibited by his Sacrament Book, Regeneration Tract, and his Replies to Trap) to preach the gospel of the Spirit, in all its nakedness and fulness. He does indeed speak of the new birth and influences of the Holy Spirit in exalted terms in the above works; and in the express treatise of Regeneration, as quoted in the Note of p. 375, clearly exhibits the orthodox mode of our becoming the subjects of the New-birth, or means we are to employ in order to pass through that gate of entrance into the spiritual life; yet, he must be said therein to have more particularly reflected upon the truth of the doctrine of the old and new man, and of that sublime holiness which the Gospel sets before us, than upon the means and power, by which alone the practice of this latter could be freely and universally fulfilled. Which contemplation indeed, necessarily precedes the high Johannic experience of the Spirit of love,—the especial subject of these his last writings.

As regards the particular occasion which called him forth from this silence to write the "Spirit of Prayer," we consider it to have been the perusal of certain passages in the MSS. of Freher, while copying the productions of that elevated genius, wherein the discovery of the philosophy that God is mere LOVE, and that his wisdom and power are only operative in overcoming all evil with good, suddenly broke forth as a full blaze of noonday sunshine, upon his ravished understanding. In order to apprehend in some measure the light in which this discovery appeared, the candidate should turn back as far as the text of p. 418, and read on to p. 430; he will then begin to perceive the gradual ascent of his mind until, at p. 432, he feels himself posed at that ethereal height from which St. John (as we have before stated in allusion to Mr. Law, p. 369) wrote his Epistles; where truly faith is lost in sight. So that we owe the existence of Mr. Law's Spirit of Prayer and subsequent works (as we have said of his grand work the "Appeal") under Divine Providence, to his readings in Freher: as confirmable even by the experience of the candidate himself, who, after a very close perusal and copying out of the passages referred to, will, if in a proper state of advancement, feel himself propelled to write in a similar strain. And such is the irresistible effect of Law's reasoning, and of the heavenly melody which runs current with the doctrine of LOVE through this and all his later treatises—we mean upon impartial and unbiased minds, endowed with sufficient logical capacity of apprehension; that it will be no vain imagination to conceive his readers rising up in their study, in the midst of a discourse, and exclaiming, "These are the first books in the world!" In accordance with what has been observed—that pure, original truth, when rightly represented, is much more captivating and agreeable to the mind than error; and that there is an intellectual sense latent in the soul which, having been present at the very creation of all things, even at the very birth and Aurora of eternity, or nature, immediately recognises the objects of its native landscape, and its kindred relations of pure, original truth.

The "First Part" of the "Spirit of Prayer" which may be called the practical deduction of the "Appeal," that every logical mind ought, after adequate reflection, to make for itself, (in which case the former work alone would have been sufficient for the meditation and practice of a whole lifetime,) was, we have stated, published in 1749; being thus described on its title-page, "The Spirit of Prayer; or the Soul rising out of the Vanity of Time, into the Riches of Eternity." It consists of two chapters, which treat of the following subjects:—

CHAPTER I.—The indifference and insensibility of men in general to their eternal interests. The original state of man as the son of God, and therefore a living image of the Triune Deity. His trial and fall. The commencement of his redemption. His real nature and state by reason of sin. How it differs from that of the fallen angels. The means of his salvation, or recovery of the life, or light and Holy Spirit of God. The new-birth not a figurative expression, but a real, living process. The whole chapter being a familiar discourse of matters preparatory to the Spirit of Prayer. CHAPTER II.—In what salvation or the regenerate life consists. The manifestation of the nature, life, and spirit of Jesus Christ in the new inward man. The means of attaining such a state lie in faith, or the right direction and earnest action of the desire. How the ground or principle, which is the engrafted word or incorruptible seed of Christ, lies latent in every soul. Its opening or manifestation, the only way of salvation. The tokens by which the regenerate spirit discovers itself. All depends on obedience or adherence to it. The infallible truths by which we may be assured that our dependence is well grounded. The abandonment of self, and the true nature and worth of self-denial and mortification. No activity of our own of any avail to salvation. The only way is the desire of the soul turned to God.

All sectarianism is of course extinguished in this work, which makes the whole universe of nature and grace apprehensible, under one governing idea and plan, as an edifice of pure love; which in itself is an argument for the truth of the philosophy that it opens out, because truth itself is unsectarian, unlimited and universal in its embrace—not confined to Christendom, but comprehending all the human race "in the outstretched arms of its catholic love." As the actual application of such a philosophy to the highest interests of man, the "First Part" of the "Spirit of Prayer" may be considered an universal practical grammar, or introduction to gospel Christianity. Which was necessary to be presented as a text, or preliminary to what was to follow:—Mr. Law's call being now to preach the gospel to the educated, who, not having fathomed the philosophy of the Nosce te ipsum, and being indeed entirely ignorant of their own nature and condition, are unbelievers in the truth of that redemption into which they are born, and which only requires the assent of their own wills, to become their salvation. Accordingly, it does not argue on the presumed corruption of human nature, as is common with all books of a popular religious tendency, but shows the actual ground of its existence, in the fall of a whole hierarchy of angels, and the creation of this world.——For which reason by the way, it may be considered as especially addressed to such as deny the existence of pure malignity, and consequently the necessity of any such redemption and salvation as that of the Christian religion. To this class, not to mention

~~of course, not to mention~~ imaginative, deep-searching reasoners, and speculative propounders of social theories, belongs a small number of self-confident and deluded, though otherwise intelligent and educated individuals, (who, the writer has been informed, consider themselves a body of some importance, as the representatives of what they call the modern philosophy, that is,) who hold deistical opinions on the assumption, that pretended revelations have been exactly parallel and equal in all ages to the growth of the mind. To all such it is but necessary to say, that the light of pure truth now shines, with noon-day radiance—through the fundamental philosophy of Behmen, and the demonstrations of it by Freher and Law, displaying the entire constitution and relations of the moral universe; whereby they may discover the world of phantasy (and therefore of error) in which they dwell, and obtain every information for the resolution of those points which they have been vainly endeavouring to determine by their own helpless, groping reason. After this intimation therefore, they will have no title to be listened to by any enlightened philosopher, until they have examined these authors (commencing with the latter portion of Mr. Law's "Demonstration, &c. relating to the Sacrament," 8vo., 1737,) but their writings must only be regarded as another form of the ruff-raff, ephemeral literature of the age.

As an example of the profound compunction and humility flowing from the right and natural use of this treatise—such as a reflecting and sober mind, formed in that proper logical mould peculiar to legal training, desirous to find the truth, would draw from it; we might refer the reader to the Second Prayer inserted in the note of pp. 348-51, which, the writer would again take the opportunity of remarking, he has misplaced in printing that sheet, as it could not have been written before 1736, after Mr. Law had become acquainted with Behmen. Indeed, it may have been composed as late as the year 1746, as a most searching spiritual exercise, or lesson for Miss Gibbon, to instruct her in seeking that humility, which can alone render the mind capable of the pure, central light and influence of the Holy Spirit. A humility, which the popular representations of Christian truth seldom if ever touch, and of which as to its depth, their authors would seem not to have any conception. By which, in fact, the human spirit is stirred and affected to its profoundest root and depth—as the deep subsoil in husbandry when turned up and exposed to the vivifying influence of the sun and elements; and in the contemplation of which, Mr. Law once made this just yet simple observation, "that the highest state of a mystic is the lowest state of a penitent." The centre, the depth or ground of humility indeed, is the heart of God himself, ici ses raisonnemens et son style. Cependant cet ouvrage, quoique plus clair en général que les précédents, est encore, dans plusieurs endroits, trop éloigné des idées humaines pour être pleine-

(Philippians, ii. 5-11), love and humility being one individed thing in the kingdom of heaven.

Before dismissing the "First Part" of the "Spirit of Prayer," we may mention that it was carried to America, and published there by Franklin, as proved by a copy which was in the hands of the writer in 1846, being one of the standard old English tracts that his common-sense mind immediately recognised as immortal. This we before mentioned, in showing the immediate connection of the "Appeal" with the modern science of electricity.

The pure simplicity and celestial brightness of Mr. Law's mind and understanding in Divine things at this particular juncture, may be inferred from the following spiritual Letters, addressed to one who had sought his advice and direction; the first having been written about the time the First Part of the "Spirit of Prayer" was published, and the second shortly afterwards.

The first of these Letters, with some modifications, has been already inserted in this treatise, p. 104-5, ending with the words, "thy Holy Spirit;" to which place, therefore, the reader is referred. The writer now regrets the originals were not always exactly copied.

The second Letter commenced thus:—"My dear, worthy Friend—Whom I heartily love, in the unity of the spirit of Christ. Your long letter I received some time the last month, and read with much pleasure. For long as it was, I did not wish it to be shorter. I bless God for that good and right spirit which breathed in every part of it. As it required no immediate answer and you left me to my own time, so I did not intend to write till last week, but by accidental affairs have been hindered from complying with my intention till now.

Your judgment has failed you in nothing but in thinking your letter could be disagreeable to me, or that my answer was deferred on that account. Every creature has my love, but persons of your spirit kindle in me every holy affection of honour and esteem towards them. Love, with its fruits of meekness, patience, and humility, is all that I wish for myself, and every human creature. For this is to live in God, united to him both for time and eternity.

Would you have done with error, scruple, and delusion? Consider the Deity (as I have said) to be the greatest love, the greatest meekness, the greatest sweetness, the eternal unchangeable Will to be a good and blessing to every creature; and that all the misery, darkness and death of fallen angels and fallen men, consists in their having lost this Divine nature. Consider yourself, and all the fallen world, as having nothing to seek or wish for, but by the spirit of prayer to draw into the life of your soul, rays and sparks of this divine, meek, loving, tender nature of God. Consider the holy Jesus as the gift of God to your soul, to begin and finish the birth of God and heaven within you, in spite of every inward or outward enemy. These three infallible truths heartily embraced, and made the nourishment of your soul, shorten and secure the way to heaven, and leave no room for error, scruple, or delusion.—The poverty of our fallen nature, the depraved workings of flesh and blood, the corrupt tempers of our polluted birth in this world, do us no hurt so long as the spirit of prayer works contrary to them, and longs for the first birth of the light and spirit of heaven.

All our natural evil ceases to be our own evil, as soon as our will-spirit turns from it. It then changes its nature, loses all its poison and death, and only becomes our holy cross, on which we happily die from self and this world, into the kingdom of heaven.

I much congratulate you on your manner of prayer. So practised, it becomes the life of the soul, and the true food of eternity. Keep in this state of application to God, and then you will infallibly find it to be the way of rising out of the vanity of time, into the riches of eternity.

Do not expect or look for the same degrees of sensible fervor. The matter lies not there. Nature will have its share, but the ups and downs of that are to be overlooked. Whilst your will-spirit is good, and set right, the changes of creaturely fervor lessen not your union with God. It is the abyss of the heart, an unfathomable depth of eternity within us, as much above sensible fervor as heaven is above earth; it is this that works our way to God, and unites us with heaven. This abyss of the heart, is the divine nature and power within us, which never calls upon God in vain, but whether helped or deserted by bodily fervor, penetrates through all outward nature, as easily and effectually as our thoughts can leave our bodies, and reach into the regions of eternity. I am, with hearty prayers to God for you, your truly affectionate friend and servant,—W. LAW."

Amongst the number of the correspondents at this period who sought his spiritual counsels, was also a Mr. George Ward, who afterwards (with the Mr. Langcake to whom the above letters were addressed,) became his confidential and friendly agent in London, in the correction and supervision of the printing of some of his publications; and who was the editor of the incomplete edition of Behmen, published in four quarto volumes after Mr. Law's decease, at the sole expense of Mrs. Hutcheson, and with Mr. Law's name inserted in the title-page. The edition of Behmen intended to be published by Mr. Law, would have been an original translation, while this was only the old (and, upon the whole very excellent) one, reprinted, with alterations according to the fancy of Mr. Ward, who also appended to each volume a few plates, copied from the designs of Freher, found amongst Mr. Law's papers.

A standard edition of Behmen (as of Freher and Law) is yet required; to be edited, not by a speculative bookseller's employé, but, as heretofore intimated, by a rightly-trained and illuminated theosopher, such as this treatise seeks to create. Which indeed we hope to be the instrument of giving to the world, or it may be a very appropriate emanation of a Theosophic College or Society. But to return.

Mr. Law we find had resolved to publish the "Spirit of Prayer" in two parts, with a certain interval between them; in which he might observe the reception of the First Part, and be in some measure guided by it as to the construction and contents of the remainder, or of those portions thereof, which may be considered as only accessory to its main design.

In glancing over the vast field of the subject before him, how he should again commence operations, he perceived, with his usual sagacity, that one of the evils and vanities which would attend the opening out of the philosophy of religion, with some of the individuals to whom he was immediately addressing himself, would be the exciting of a spirit of curiosity rather than of compunction and amendment. As he observed to a friend, he had met with very few persons whose awakened zeal was not turned into curiosity ; that is, who, instead of devoting themselves with all the more earnestness, constancy, and diligence, to the attainment of the Divine life, by the superior light and instruction they had acquired, content themselves with their imaginary conceptions of the mysteries of salvation, or in procuring a fine collection of books on mystical subjects ! The exposure and correction of this absurd but common frailty, Mr. Law therefore resolved to make the introductory subject of the Second Part, and which is so much to the point, that we may be excused here referring the reader to it ; being given in the note of pp. 166-8.

This "Second Part" of the "Spirit of Prayer," was published in the year 1750, and was composed by Mr. Law, in the form of Three Dialogues, that mode of display being calculated, he considered, to set forth his subject to the best advantage. The dramatis personæ therein introduced, including the author himself, are four in number. The first, Academicus, is represented as a man of learning and parts, thoroughly versed in scholastic metaphysics and theology, but like our modern divines (with few exceptions,) wholly unsuspicious of the real nature, depth and necessity of the new birth, which he regards as a figurative expression, and priding himself upon his choice collection of the works of the fathers, and other spiritual authors. Rusticus, another speaker, is a simple, unlettered English yeoman of the old school, possessed of a vigorous understanding and strong natural sense, who having been deeply affected by the solemn and awakening truths set forth in such unprecedented clearness in the "First Part," had turned all into immediate practice, and reaped the benefits of such a common-sense mode of procedure. Of the possibility of which experimental knowledge of the gospel, he had not had even the remotest conception before meeting with Mr. Law's book, though a regular attendant in his parish church ; because Christianity had never been presented to him in its true natural light, but only as seen through the spectacles of the ordinary university, or self-styled evangelical theology. Humanus, a third assistant, who is introduced as a silent listener to the conversations, and agrees to remain so to the end, may be regarded as a personification of that large class of sober-thinking, honest unbelievers, who are best known in this country as deists, but in which may be included every class of well-educated free-thinkers. In short, he is a fair representation of humanity as it stands in the best state possible to it without the gospel ; not altogether unfavourable to the claims of Revelation, but in consequence of having no knowledge of its real grounds and implications, destitute of that rational conviction of its divine origin, and apprehension of its true nature, which it may be almost said is the indispensable condition to a man of judgment and sincerity who is an unbeliever, for an entrance on the evangelical life. The candidate will bear in mind the comprehension of his character. Lastly, Theophilus may be regarded as the representative of Mr. Law in the character of a true theosopher, or heaven-illuminated sage, whose business it is to open out to view, the universal scheme of the revelations of the Deity, in all its scope and implications ; and to place the gospel in its true light, by demonstrating that the procedure of God in nature and grace is the same, and that the highest conformity to the Christian verities, is strictly accordant with the unchangeable laws of the physical and intellectual universe.

The contents of the SECOND PART, or, more strictly, the subjects demonstrated by Theophilus, in the course of these conversations, are as follow :—

FIRST DIALOGUE.—Introduction, on the vanity of knowledge where there is no religion. Spiritual books only useful as calls to the absolute renunciation of self, and the commencement of the new life. The nature of self described, and the necessity of its complete oblation or death demonstrated. The actual grounds of this necessity in the nature of things, and not in the arbitrary provisions of God's providence. How the will of the creature stands between God and nature, as the only opener of all good and evil. Its turning to God in absolute faith and earnestness of desire, the means of bringing heaven into the soul. The accordance of these doctrines with the Scripture. One only death and one only life in all nature. Vindication of the "Appeal." SECOND DIALOGUE.—The philosophy of the Gospel doctrine of redemption and salvation, continued. How Adam stood in his state of perfection. The gradual fall, and division of Adam into male and female. The means of human recovery, by the covenant of 'the seed of the woman.' The argument for the renunciation of self and the world resumed, on the rational ground of this philosophy. In what consists the great apostacy, the sin of all sins and the heresy of all heresies. Hours and forms of prayer considered. THIRD DIALOGUE.—The difficulty attending the total conversion of the heart to God. The whole nature to be parted with, and yet no possibility in man of doing it. The omnipotence of the love of God, and how it overcomes all evil and opposition when the heart turns wholly to him. How it has followed man from the beginning as the 'Immanuel' or seed of Christ treasured in every soul. The beginning of salvation by the germination of this seed. The new creature formed, or the Spirit of God dwelling and working in man. How this Spirit is procured and known, so as to avoid delusion. The prayer of this Spirit, the only genuine devotion. No other spirit in man works to salvation. The consistency of this doctrine with free will. Prayer the continual and habitual state of the will ; according as it works with the Spirit of God, or the spirit of fallen nature. All its goodness dependent on the continuity and earnestness of the will-state or desire. The outward expression of prayer justly discriminated. How far manuals of devotions are profitable. The degrees of prayer, or steps of the spiritual life. Why the motion of the Holy Spirit is the source of every aspiration to unite with the goodness and holiness of God. How this Spirit is known by the pure, free, universal goodness, meekness and love which it breathes. These emperers in man, the certain effect of its presence and influence.

These subjects are not only treated in the strictly argumentative manner, and captivating diction peculiar to the author, but they are all along elucidated from Scripture, so as to demonstrate the exact conformity of their philosophical development with the gospel, and with the simple experimental matter of fact as regards personal regeneration, and conversion of the soul to God. Their range is of course much more extensive than that of evangelical truth as commonly taught. Each of these foregoing states has its time, its variety of workings, its trials, temptations, and purifications, which can only be known by experience and the passage through them. The monly taught and expressed, and (as we have before remarked,) worthy of that universal procedure which must have been the true origin of things; and indeed collaterally demonstrated by its application in the Newtonian philosophy, and, as the basis of all modern enlightened science, lastly of medicine, as we propose presently to elucidate.

[ANNOTATION.—As a suggestion to the candidate, we would incidentally remark respecting the inefficient mental training of theologians in the present age, and since the severe logic and metaphysics of the schools have ceased to form a part of a theological education. The lawyers are the only well-trained rationalists in this country at the present day. At the close of the seventeenth and commencement of the eighteenth century, theologians were the men of genius—the first spirits of the age as to mental science and power; but now, it has been remarked, they are the most inadequately educated of any profession, being unpracticed in close and just philosophic argumentation. A better representation of the relative character of their abilities cannot perhaps be afforded than in the critical remarks which appeared in The Times journal upon the mental flaccidity of the poet Southey, in the early part of the month of March of the present year (1851), in the last two columns of the review in question. Southey, as to intellectual power, may there represent Theologians of the present day, while Law, in his “Case of Reason,” may stand for that of the Divines of the age we have referred to.—The lawyers we repeat, now occupy the place in the field of well disciplined reasoning power and judgment, which was possessed by the divines of a former age, and are therefore much more fitted for christian philosophers, and to defend, support, and propagate the Christian mystery, than those whose education professes to constitute them for such office. Surely such a state of things is not to the honour of Christianity, and ought to be at once remedied. See the proposed Appendix to SECTION III., on ‘Christian Education,’ how to effect this.]

It will be borne in mind, that the contents of the “Spirit of Prayer” and succeeding works were not offered by the author as an essential study for the simple, evangelical christian; but are adapted for those whose minds are so constituted as to make them capable of apprehending and indeed of demanding the philosophy or fundamental ground of the religion they are called to practise; that class, in short, whether of nominal christians, or of those who have not as yet professed christianity, which as we have said, is represented by the characters of Academicus and Humanus.

Our reason for calling attention to this fact so repeatedly, is the frequent misapprehension of Law’s mind by those who look into the “Spirit of Prayer,” and expect to find exactly what the title would suggest according to their own rote-understanding of theology. It is common among such persons to condemn the author for a style of writing which they regard as far-fetched and unprofitable; for introducing, as they say, a philosophy into the gospel, which it has no need of, and which serves only to mystify it. And it is true enough such will not find in it what it was never intended they should find in it, especially on a first or second cursory perusal, and without any previous acquaintance with the circumstances of the case, and the universal evangelical scheme of which it forms a part. For examples of this class of objectors we might point to Horne, Venn, Jones, the devout Adams, Wesley, and other names famous in the annals of modern popular English christianity.

To shew the groundlessness of these objections, it might be sufficient to refer the reader to the contents of the “Spirit of Prayer” as we have given them above, the logical unity of which, and the single purpose which connects the various subjects together being sufficiently apparent. By way however of further illustrating that purpose, we will here insert an extract from the last Dialogue of the Second Part, and after that three interesting Letters. In giving the latter, we shall only be carrying on the thread of our narrative. The extract in question thus proceeds:—

“Theoph. Your earnest desire, Academicus, to live in the spirit of prayer, and be truly governed by it, is a most excellent desire; for to be a man of prayer is that which the apostle means by ‘living in the spirit, and having our conversation in heaven.’ It is to have done, not only with the confessed vices, but with the allowed follies and vanities of this world. To tell such a soul of the innocency of levity, that it need not run away from idle discourse, vain gaiety, and trifling mirth as being the harmless relief of our heavy natures! is like telling the flame that it need not always be ascending upwards.—But here you are to observe, that this spirit of prayer is not to be taught you by a book, or brought into you by an art from without; but must be an inward birth, that must arise from your own fire and light within you, as the air arises from the fire and light of this world. For the spirit of every being, be it what or where it will, is only the breath or spirit that proceeds from its own fire and light. In vegetative, sensitive, and intellectual creatures, it is all in the same manner; spirit is the third form of its life, and is the birth that proceeds from the other two, and is the manifestation of their nature and qualities. For such as the fire and light are, such and no other, neither higher nor lower, neither better nor worse, is the spirit that proceeds from them.—Now the reason why all, and every life does, and must stand in this form, is wholly and solely from hence, because the Deity, the one source and fountain of all life, is a triune God, whose third form is, and is called, the Spirit of God, proceeding from the Father and the Son.

The painful sense and feeling of what you are, kindled into a working state of sensibility by the light of God within you, is the fire and light from whence your spirit of prayer proceeds. In its first kindling nothing is found or felt, but pain, wrath and darkness, as is to be seen in the first kindling of every heat or fire. And therefore its first prayer is nothing else but a sense of penitence, self-condemnation, confession, and humility. It feels nothing but its own misery, and so is all humility.—This prayer of humility is met by the Divine love, the mercifulness of God embraces it; and then its prayer is changed into hymns, and songs, and thanksgivings.—When this state of fervor has done its work, has melted away all earthly passions and affections, and left no inclination in the soul, but to delight in God alone, then its prayer changes again. It is now come so near to God, has found such union with him, that it does not so much pray as live in God. Its prayer is not any particular action, is not the work of any particular faculty, not confined to times, or words, or place, but is the work of his whole being; which continually stands in fulness of faith, in purity of love, in absolute resignation to do, and be, what and how his Beloved pleaseth. This is the last state of the spirit of prayer, and is its highest union with God in this one only and infallible way to go safely through all the difficulties, trials, temptations, dryness, or opposition of our own evil tempers, is this: it is to expect nothing from ourselves, to trust to nothing in ourselves, but in every thing expect, and depend upon GOD for relief. KEEP FAST HOLD of this thread, and then let your way be what it will, darkness, temptation, or the rebellion of nature, you will be led through all, to an union with God: for nothing hurts us in any state, but an expectation of something in it, and from it, which we should only expect from God. We are looking for our own virtue, our own piety, our own goodness, and so live on in our own poverty and weakness; to-day pleased and comforted with the seeming strength and firmness of our own pious tempers, and fancying ourselves to be somewhat; to-morrow, fallen into our own mire, we are dejected, but not humbled; we grieve, but it is only the grief of pride, at the seeing our perfection not to be such as we vainly imagined. And thus it will be, till the whole turn of our minds is so changed, that we as fully see and know our inability to have any goodness of our own, as to have a life of our own.

For since nothing is, or can be, good in us, but the life of God manifested in us, how can this be had but from God alone? When we are happily brought to this conviction, then we have done with all thought of being our own builders; the whole spirit of our mind is become a mere faith, and hope, and trust in the sole operation of God's holy Spirit; looking no more to any other power to be formed in Christ new creatures, than we look to any other power for the resurrection of our bodies at the last day. Hence may be seen, that the trials of every state are its greatest blessings; they do that for us, which we most of all want to have done, they force us to know our nothingness, and the all of God. * * *

The best instruction that I can give you, as helpful, or preparatory to the spirit of prayer, is already fully given, where we have set forth the original perfection, the miserable fall, and the glorious redemption of man. It is the true knowledge of these great things that can do all for you, which human instruction can do. These things must fill you with a dislike of your present state, drive all earthly desires out of your soul, and create an earnest longing after your first perfection.

For prayer cannot be taught you, by giving you a book of prayers, but by awakening in you a true sense and knowledge of what you are, and what you should be; that so you may see, and know, and feel what things you want, and are to pray for. For a man does not, cannot pray for any thing, because a fine petition is put into his hands, but because his own condition is a reason and motive for his asking for it. [N.B.] And therefore it is, that the "SPIRIT OF PRAYER" in the "First Part," began with a full discovery and proof of these high and important matters! at the sight of which the world, and all that is in it, shrinks into nothing; and every thing, past, present, and to come, awakens in our hearts a continual prayer, and longing desire, after God, Christ, and eternity."

The first of the three letters we proposed to give, after this Extract, was written by Mr. Law to the same friend as the two epistles inserted a few pages back, (a Mr. Thomas Langcake, at that time one of the writing clerks employed in the business of the Bank of England, Threadneedle Street;) and is so much to the purpose of our remarks in vindication of Mr. Law from the charges brought against him in regard to the philosophy, which it was his business to develop in this second ministration, as the ground of all nature and grace, (as being "speculative, vain and precarious," rather than practical, devout and edifying,) that it may well be allowed to speak for itself. It is scarcely needful to remark, that the practice of this letter is the sum and end of all true, orthodox philosophy, and what Solomon meant by his "conclusion of the whole matter," after having had experience of all the delights of wisdom, genius, sense, and all that this world can afford.

"My dear Langcake,—I am greatly rejoiced at your expressing so feeling a sense of the benefit of prayer; and hope you will every day be more and more raised to, and united with God by it.

I love no mysterious depths or heights of speculation, covet no knowledge, want to see no ground of nature, grace, and creature, but so far as it brings me nearer to God, forces me to forget and renounce everything for him, to do everything in him, and for him; and to give every breathing, moving, stirring, intention and desire of my heart, soul, spirit, and life to him.

It is for the sake of this spirit of prayer, that I have endeavoured to set so many points of religion in such a view, as must dispose the reader willingly to give up all he inherits from his fallen father, to be all hunger and thirst after God, and have no thought or care, but how to be wholly his devoted instrument; every where, and in every thing, his adoring, joyful and thankful servant.

When it is the one ruling, never-ceasing desire of our hearts, that God may be the beginning and end, the reason and motive, of our doing or not doing, from morning to night; then everywhere, whether speaking or silent, whether inwardly or outwardly employed, we are equally offered up to the Eternal Spirit, have our life in him and from him, and are united to him by that spirit of prayer, which is the comfort, the support, the strength, and security of the soul, travelling, by the help of God, through the vanity of time, into the riches of eternity.

My dear friend, have eyes shut and ears stopped, to everything that is not a step in that ladder which reaches from earth to heaven.

Reading is good, hearing is good, conversation and meditation are good; but then they are only good at times and occasions, in a certain degree; and must be used and governed with such caution, as we eat and drink and refresh ourselves, or they will bring forth in us the fruits of intemperance. But the spirit of prayer is for all times and all occasions; it is a lamp that is to be ever burning, a light ever shining. Everything calls for it, everything is to be done in it, and governed by it. Because it is, and means, and wills nothing else, but the totality of the soul not doing this or that, but wholly, incessantly given up to God, to be where, and what, and how He pleases.

This state of absolute resignation, naked faith, and pure love of God, is the highest perfection, and most purified life of those who are 'born again from above,' and through the Divine power become 'sons of God.' And is neither more nor less, than what our blessed Redeemer has called and qualified us to long and aspire after, in these words, 'Thy kingdom come; thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven.'

Near the conclusion of yours, you say, you have of late, &c.," as already given p. 110, to the words, "Dear soul Adieu."

If the reader will call to mind the state of what is termed the religious world at the period under review, it will not surprise him that Mr. Law's publications brought many letters to Kings-cliffe, about points of doctrine and practice, in matters of a spiritual nature, from persons indeed who were personally unknown to the author, and that his uniform kindness in replying to such must have made serious encroachments upon his time; for, it can hardly be necessary to say such a spirit of benevolence as there is every evidence he possessed, could no more fail him in this respect, than in the other benefactions of charity which he habitually practised. Sometimes indeed, when he was sensible that such inquiries proceeded from idle curiosity rather than any sincere desire of instruction, he would purposely forbear replying to them; as may be gathered from the following epistle, which is yet a good example of the pains he took in advising those who were disposed to seek his counsel, or were prevented from reaping the full benefit of his works, through their want of proper training in the principles of Christian wisdom, and the difficulty they experienced in casting away the imaginary conceptions of an unscriptural theology. [The Christian student might find it a not unprofitable exercise to write out a fair copy of Mr. Law's letters; as a means of fathoming the depth of his thoughts and judgment.]

The gentleman thus addressed was a "Mr. William Briggs," a subordinate officer of the customs in London. But what Mr. Law says will apply equally well to the whole tribe of self-elected critics of his theology.

Kings-cliffe, March 18th. 1751.—My dear Friend—I thank God it is neither through age nor infirmities, nor any indisposition to serve you, that I have not answered your letters, but from a just sense of the unreasonableness of employing both you and myself in such a manner. Be patient, and receive in the spirit of meekness what follows; and remember that love is my God and wrath my Devil, and then you may reap the fruits of Love from the following letter, though written in a way and manner so contrary to your expectation.

There is hardly anything more hurtful to true spirituality (the life of God in the soul), than a talkative, inquisitive, active, busy, reasonings spirit, that is always at work with its own ideas, and never so content as when talking, hearing, or writing upon points, distinctions, and definitions of religious doctrines. This may as truly be called an earthly, worldly spirit, and as great an enemy to conversion from darkness to light, from flesh to spirit, as that of the old Athenians, who spent all their time, as St. Paul tells us, in telling or hearing some new thing.

To be trained up in the school of reason, and to have learnt from Locke or Le Clerc, and such likemasters, how to be reasonable Christians, is to be taught how to be content with eating dust and serpent's food, instead of the tree of life. Our reason is an earth-born offspring, it is the Judas of our own nature; the serpent that began, effected, continues, and keeps up our fall and separation from God. And the deceitful cultivation of it, under the specious sounds of clear and distinct ideas, &c., has done more hurt to the gospel in these latter ages, than any of its declared enemies.

Hence is the Church divided into numerous parts; hence are Deists, Arians, and Socinians. Hence is the zeal of modern reformers divided into a number of little subdivisions, each under the light of clear ideas and verbal distinctions, contending for little terms of regulation and inventions of their own, while the life of Christ, the one church of God, is not lived, but learnedly given up, for a life of reason.

Ho! every one that thirsteth, saith our Lord, let him come and drink. It is only hunger and thirst that takes the smallest degree of the heavenly life. If we are not as weary and as afraid of the spirit of reason as of any other earthly lust, we cannot become such children as can alone enter into the kingdom of God.

To apply this to the matter in hand. In the year '46, I had your first letter, telling me you had read my Appeal, and that by a pure light from heaven, you understood what you there read, that it contained the depth of sound mysteries, &c. Sufficient reason for contentment; but behold, at page 205, your reasoning enemy came to life in you, and helped you to a long detail of queries about the holy sacrament.

I answered that letter immediately, because it was your first, and because I believed a good spark of the Divine life was kindled in you. I showed you, that every query was needless, groundless, and conjured up by the sole activity of blind reason, in direct opposition to the plainest doctrine of The Appeal. You owned the truth of all this, and confessed yourself a dull scholar in the school of Christ.

The benefit that you ought to have received from this, should have been to know that inward enemy to divine light that is so active within you, and that your reasoning activity was your own serpent within you; and that all your safety consisted in turning a deaf ear to all his suggestions, knowing that they could help you only to such illumination as the serpent procured to our sinful parents.

In the year '49, when The Spirit of Prayer was published, you sent me a letter of objections to that. You owned the book to be most excellent; but behold the serpent again came to your assistance, and showed you how strange a doctrine there was in it, viz., That the holy Trinity was free from, and incapable of wrath, though the Scriptures abounded with declarations of the wrath, fury, &c., of God.

This letter I laid aside amongst such as were to have no answer from me, because fully answered in The Appeal, and in that book; and you were here again committing the same fault, which I had before made you sensible of. Your importunity extorted an answer from me. You seemed to support yourself by saying, "that a sincere minister of Christ had preached several sermons against that doctrine."

You should have said that prejudice, supported by human reason and the sound of words, had been so many times declaiming against a most heavenly truth. To say that there was no wrath, fury, vengeance, and damnation belonging to sin and sinners would be to fly in the face of plain Scripture: but to say that none of these things are inherent qualities in the holy Trinity of God, but as separate from him, as impossible to be in him and of him, as sin, hell, and the devil; is a truth, infinitely sound, infinitely amiable, and the most solid, comfortable foundation of all religious faith, love, and resignation to God.

L'homme par cette voie [évangélique] où Jacob Boehm est entré si profondément selon Saint-Martin, étant bien préférable aux voies qu'ouvrent les visions contemplatives des Mystiques ; ou les manifes-

To observe now some other instances of the delusion of your reasoning activity. "Vulgar ideas" you say, (I suppose you meant vulgar minds) "can hardly receive anything that is not almost apparent to their senses. All metaphysical reasonings are to them unprofitable." I quote these words only for what follows, where you say, "for this reason, I apprehend, the divine writings were penned with the utmost freedom from anything above the comprehension of the unlearned reader."

Now, Sir, let this show you the vanity of indulging a talkative spirit; for were you not too much under its power, you could not have brought forth such words as these, or think them fit matter for our correspondence. For is not all Scripture from the first chapter of Genesis to the last chapter of the Revelation to St. John, a direct and full contradiction to this assertion, viz.: "penned with the utmost freedom from anything above the comprehension of the unlearned reader?" Might you not as justly have said, 'penned with the utmost freedom from letters, syllables, and words?'

Are not all the libraries in the Christian world a demonstration, that the Scriptures are not open and plain to our reason and senses? Does the Scripture anywhere give this character of itself, which you have given; or is the plainness of the letter to vulgar minds ever appealed to, as the key to Scripture truths? Hear our blessed Lord, He that is of God heareth God's word. And every prophet and apostle direct only to this key.

The natural man, saith the apostle, neither can he know them. But why not? It is because they only can be discerned by the spirit of God. We have also, saith another apostle, a sure word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light shining in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts. See here, again, the key that openeth the Scriptures; not the plainness of the letter, but the day-star, the spirit of God arising in the heart.

All Scripture, whether plain or obscure, is not understood till the unction from above teacheth all things to the reader.

See another instance of the vain activity of this talkative spirit. You go on and say, "The more, spiritual men make the Scripture their rule in speaking, writing, &c., the more good they will do to all those round about them." For how unreasonable is it for you, or any one else, to tell a spiritual man how he should speak or write? For no one is a spiritual man but so far as he is led by the Spirit; and to tell him how he should speak, is directing the Spirit of God. And when any speaker or writer affects any kind or manner of language, it is a certain proof that he is under his own direction, and not following or governed by the true Spirit of God, opening itself in him.

Again, through the same talkative spirit you tell me, "It is objected by some that I never make any distinction between repentance, justification, and sanctification." And you have more than once called upon me to speak to this matter. You add, "Here (that is, in this distinction of these three words, thus understood) "is the beginning, the middle, and the end of the work of the triune God upon the soul. Happy are they who experience these good and important things."

Now, Sir, if you and the objectors are in possession of this happiness, feeling the benefit of these three words, thus distinguished, I have said nothing to rob you of that happiness. And you might call to mind, that a much greater teacher than I am; who justly calls himself the light of the world—the way, the truth, and the life, never makes any more mention of this distinction than is to be found in my books. If therefore they are defective, or blameable for want of this distinction, how will you excuse the four gospels?

Bear with patience, my dear friend, this great and useful truth, viz., That all your letters to me are, from the beginning to the end, of the same kind with the passages I have here remarked; mere hasty, needless, fruitless words, brought forth by a talkative spirit, which is the spirit you want to have cast out of you. You must have seen in common life, that when a man has this turn, he is neither wise nor useful in his discourse; he becomes tiresome to everybody, and never talks to the purpose because always talking.

I take you to have good parts, and an awakened sense of piety; but neither sense nor piety can bring forth their proper fruits, when under the power of a talkative spirit. You tell me that "the greatest part of my Second Part of The Spirit of Prayer gave you great consolation; that it contains that pure and Christian philosophy, which leads the fallen man to find eternity in himself, and Jesus Christ the source of all true happiness." Oh, Sir! is it possible for you to see and know this, and yet make no better use of it? What has the heart to wish or seek from men and books after such a philosophy as this is found? But now, instead of saying to yourself, as you should have done, 'It is enough! the mystery of salvation is here opened; in this light will I thankfully give up myself to God for the remainder of my life;' (instead of thus thinking,) my book had not been published a week before you sent me word of a great fright you were in, lest a certain notion there advanced should "give occasion to the enemy not only to cavil, but to blaspheme."

But, my dear friend, this is again mere talk, you have no such fear; for if you had this fear in the smallest degree, how could you possibly ask my leave to publish this very notion in a newspaper? In my book, grounded, guarded, and supported as it is, there is no room to be afraid of any one's seeing it; but for a serious person to remove it out of its place, where it stands supported by a pure Christian philosophy, to place it amongst the trash and babble of a newspaper, is as wise a contrivance to preserve it from the ill use of the enemy, as if it were to be placed at the end of a play-book.

You say "On the sixth day Adam was formed; the same day put into Eden; the same day God said, It is not good; the same day caused a deep sleep; the same day took a rib from his side, and made the woman." And then you add these wonderfully strange words, viz., "All this being without force gathered from the holy Scriptures, I cannot find the least room to suppose that Adam had lost much of his perfection before his Eve was taken out of him."

*tations sensibles produites, soit par l'exaltation de l'ame, chez * * , soit par l'assoupissement des sens corporels, dans le Magnétisme somnambulique. [See also "La Philosophie Divine," where-

Suppose any one should say, 'Three days after the creation of Adam, God put him into Paradise; three days after that he said, It was not good that man should be alone; three days after that he caused a deep sleep, &c.; three days after that he took a rib from him, and made it a woman;' and should then add, 'All this being without force gathered from Scripture,' you could not help seeing the grossness of such an assertion; and yet gross as it would be, it is to a tittle your own. For the Scripture is just as far from telling you that all these things were done in one and the same day, as it is from telling of these three days. And, therefore, to pretend Scripture for this one day, is the same gross abuse of it, as for the three days.

Try your own assertion thus. Say, Moses informs us that an hour or two after man was created, God said, It is not good, &c.; an hour or two after that, God caused a deep sleep to fall upon him; an hour or two after that, He took a rib from him, &c. Here you may see not only force, but forgery and fiction put into the Scriptures. Now your assertion does in reality all this violence to Scripture; it supposes all this which is here charged upon Moses. For to say that you gather all this without force from Moses, is the same as saying, that Moses has freely and of his own accord told you all this. Again, your believing all these great things to be done in a few hours of one and the same day, is, you say, the reason why you cannot admit my doctrine, that Adam was in a declining way before Eve was taken out of him.

But to show you that this also is mere talk, you need only remember your own words, where you say "Who can tell that each day was not a thousand of our years?"

Now the supposition is the highest absurdity; but since you suppose it to be possible, according to yourself it may be said, 'Who can tell but that Adam might have been nine hundred and ninety years old before his Eve was taken out of him?' Now, my friend, what has robbed you of the peace and comfort you should have found in this pure and Christian philosophy? Not any whim of mine, not Moses, but a fiction of your own, that all these great things were done in a few hours.

Now had Moses expressly said, that all these things were done in one short day betwixt morning and night, how difficult had it been to believe it? For the very nature of all these things calls for some distance of time between them. And every one of them must be supposed to have some preceding great cause and occasion that brought it about.

Thus, Adam created with the eyes of eternity, and but just awakened into an angelic life and light, will you suppose him immediately in a dead sleep, without some great matter that had been the occasion of it? Again, created like the angels, neither male nor female, but both natures united in him, will you suppose that this angelic dignity was taken from him before he had done anything to give occasion for being thus altered, and brought into likeness to earthly animals? [Query, if this verity be not specially represented in the antithesis of Gen. i. 24-27. See the French rendering].

You may easily observe that the great things which I say of Adam, are not deduced from the letter of Moses, but only shown to be consistent with it. Just as the doctrine of an eternity and Christ within us, is not declared from what Moses speaks of Christ, but only shown to be conformable to it, and to have had its first dark beginning in his "seed of the woman." But all, as to both these matters, is stated and proved from the divine philosophy of our redemption opened in the gospel. It is the knowledge of Christ and his redemption that gives the true knowledge of Adam the first. This I have shown in all my books, from the Answer to the Plain Account, &c., to this day. Thus, in the Second Part of The Spirit of Prayer, p. 86, "It may be affirmed, so sure as it is from Scripture, that Christ became our second Adam, to help us to such a birth; so sure as it is from Scripture, that we should have had the same birth from our first parent." All my proof is of this kind, taken from the nature of our Redeemer, and his redemption; and that variously expressed and asserted throughout all my books.

But it is time to have done; let me only add this parting word. Consider how much true light God has vouchsafed to afford you; and what is best of all, has awakened in you a sincere love of it. Let not the activity of your reason meddle with it, or turn it into a speculative entertainment; but give up your heart to it, in true simplicity to live in it.

For truth is to be lived; nothing finds it, nothing enjoys it, but life: and nothing lives in us but our heart; and the heart has but one life, and that is love with all its fruitful workings. Expect no light therefore, but from the love of God; for the light and the love of God are inseparable, and they have no communion but with one another. And just so great and true as your love is, just so great and true is your light. Reason may for a while have its fancied treasures, but they are only the treasures of earthly light. Christ and God and heaven are only found, felt and known, by an ardent love of them. [N.B.]

Go on in Love, and then you go on in light. When all that is within you is only so much humility, meekness, and flames of love to God, then are you truly risen from the death that Adam died. Your conversation is justly said to be in heaven; Christ is revealed in you; and you are one of those of whom he says, The glory which thou gavest me, I have given them; I in them, and thou in me, that they may be made perfect in one.

These three virtues, which are only three in human sounds, are one and the same undivided and indivisible thing, viz., the tendency of the soul from SELF to GOD. No virtue has the least degree of salvation in it, but so far as this tendency is found in it. This is the one thing on our part.

On the other hand, God is one, and grace is one. Ask not for distinctions and definitions in the work of grace; for grace has but one work, just as the sun has but one work, from its first enlivening the dead seed, to the full, ripe harvest.

The true church of God is the Spirit of God and Christ, and they that are united in obedience to this Spirit, are all of the one true church of God. Love nothing in books or doctrines but that which directs you wholly and solely to the spirit of God. Everything else is but loss of time, and only putting empty cups to our mouths. If you once come to know, what a blessing it is to stand always humbly devoted to, and waiting solely for, the light and spirit of God; expecting no kind or degree of good from anything else, you will then not only know, but feel, what a folly and hurt it in the learned and devout author states, that he, "après avoir eu toutes les expériences et du mag-nétisme et du somnambulisme, en a connu les abus et les dangers, et a quitté toutes ces prais, to let reason and query have any power in your mind, or pretend to give you any light. For nothing can do you any good, but a continual longing [and earnest, yea, agonising supplication] to have the heavenly, divine life of Christ opened and brought forth in you.

But I have done; and shall only desire you not to be offended at any freedom used in this letter. For it is a letter of true love to you, written in the same style I should have spoke to you had you been with me. I embrace you in the ardour of Christian love; I esteem you much, and should be heartily glad to cherish the good spark of divine life that I know is in you.

The activity of your nature will perhaps be still for making replies, and giving way to farther doubts. But choose silence, the handmaid to divine wisdom, and give up yourself to the spirit of prayer, and then the perfection both of the first and second Adam will be opened in you, and become your song of praise, to-day, to-morrow, and to all eternity.—Dear friend, Adieu. W. LAW."

With the next epistle our present observations on the "Spirit of Prayer," and the correspondence more immediately connected with it, will naturally close. But we cannot dismiss the subject without remarking, how impossible it is to delineate the contents of such a book in a manner at all adequate to its merits, or comparable with the picture which itself daguerreotypes on the mind.

It will be received differently, indeed, as we have already intimated, by two classes of persons, but it cannot be thoughtfully perused, without making a decided impression on all. Those reflecting and sincere-minded readers who have been inexperienced in methodical practises and arts of devotion, but whose imagination and judgment have been well cultivated, form the class who are most likely to be affected by the heavenly light which streams through its pages, and the melodious intonation of its periods; the rather, perhaps, from the freshness of a subject which is not usually found in philosophical works, and which presents itself before them in the light of a discovery. Whilst on the other hand, those who have been in some measure addicted to exercises of devotion, according to the simple prescription of the gospel, may have less admiration for this particular work than for the early productions of the same hand,—deeming its fundamental elucidations of practical Christian truth as known to them already; though in effect, it may be, no more known than a simple proposition in Euclid may be said to be known by them, before the demonstration of it has been made their own. Each class however, will be captivated by what is comparatively original and extraordinary in the writer, and by the sudden awakening of unsuspected verities and trains of thought in the mind.

The third letter is as follows, addressed to Mr. Langcake. The Objections to which it alludes, were afterwards sent to Mr. Law, and elicited some further remarks from him in a letter which we shall hereafter quote, as belonging to the early part of 1752:—

"Kings-cliffe, September 7th. 1751.—My dear worthy friend—Yours of the 27th instant gave me great pleasure, as it informed me of the recovery of your health. But most of all am I pleased with finding the heavenly effects of the Divine operation on your soul; and have only to beseech you, to give up yourself entirely to the good Spirit of God, which has opened in your soul so deep a sensibility and conviction of divine truths.

Expect no life, light, strength, or comfort, but from the Spirit of God dwelling, and manifesting his own goodness in your soul.—The best of men and the best of books can only do you good, so far as they turn you from themselves and every human thing, to seek, have and receive every kind of good from God alone; not a distant or an absent God, but a God living, moving, and always working in the spirit and heart of your soul.

They never find God, who seek for him by reasoning and speculation. For, since God is the highest Spirit and the highest life, nothing but a like spirit and a like life can unite with him, find or feel or know anything of him.

Hence it is that faith, and hope, and love turned towards God, are the only possible, and also infallible means of obtaining a true and living knowledge of him. And the reason is plain; it is because by these holy tempers, which are the workings of spirit and life within us, we seek the God of life where he is, we call upon him with his own voice, we draw near to him by his own spirit. For nothing can breathe forth faith, and love, and hope to God, but that spirit and life which is of God, and therefore through flesh and blood thus presses towards him, and readily unites with him.

Keep firmly to this assertion in your own letter, that "neither reasoning nor learning can ever introduce a spark of heaven into our souls." There is not a more infallible truth in the world than this. But if this be so, then you have nothing to seek, nor anything to fear from reason.

Life and death are the things in question. They are neither of them the growth of reasoning and learning, but each of them a state of the soul, and thus differ: death is the want, and life is the enjoyment, of its highest good. Reason therefore, and learning have no power here, but only by their vain activity, to keep the soul insensible of that life and death, one of which is almost always growing up in it, according as the will and desire of the heart worketh.—Add reason to a vegetable, and you add nothing to its life or death. Its life and fruitfulness lieth in the soundness of its root, the goodness of the soil, and the riches it derives from air and light. Heaven and hell grow thus in the soul of every man; his heart is his root, if that is turned from all evil, it is then like the plant in a good soil. When it hungers and thirsts after the divine life, it then infallibly draws the light and spirit of God into it; which are infinitely more ready and willing to live and fructify in the soul, than light and air to enter into the plant that hungers after them. For the soul hath its breath, and being, and life, for no other end, but that the triune God may manifest the riches and powers of his own life in it.

Thus hunger is all, and in all worlds everything lives in it, and by it. Nothing else eats, or partakes of life, and every thing eats according to its own hunger; and every thing hungers after its own mother, that is, everything has a natural magnetic tendency to partake of that from which it had its being, and can only find its rest in that from whence it came. Dead as well as living things, bear witness to this truth. The stones fall to the earth, the sparks fly upwards, for this only reason, because everything must tend towards that from whence it came.

Were not angels, and the souls of men, breathed forth from God, as so many real offsprings tiques;" as he likewise expresses himself with respect to the "Illuminés tels que Swedenborg:" which exactly corresponds with the experience and procedure of others in this country, as related of the divine nature, it would be as impossible for them to have any desire of God, as for the stones to go upwards, and the flame downwards. Thus you may see and feel that the spirit of prayer not only proves that you came from God, but is your certain way of returning to him.—Dear friend, Adieu. W. Law."

The following, it would appear from the MS. copy of it, formed part of the present letter:—"I am very willing to receive the Objections to The Appeal, though incapable of disputing with any one in the defence of it. I wrote it only for those who want such light as is there discovered.

Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you, saith our blessed Lord. He called none else, because no one else hath ears to hear, or a heart to receive the truths of redemption.—Every man is a vain disputer, till such time as something has disturbed his state, and awakened a sensibility of his own evil and miserable nature. We are all of us afraid both of inward and outward distress; and yet till distress comes, our life is but a dream, and we have no awakened sensibility of our true state.

We are apt to consider parts and abilities as the proper qualifications for the reception of divine truths; and wonder that a man of a fine understanding should not immediately embrace just and solid doctrines. But the matter is quite otherwise. Had man kept possession of his first rich and glorious state, there had been no foundation for the gospel-redemption, and the doctrine of the cross must have appeared quite unreasonable to be pressed upon him. And, therefore, says our Lord, To the poor the gospel is preached. It is solely to them, and none else; that is, to poor fallen man, that has lost all the true natural riches and greatness of his first divine life, to him is the gospel preached.

But if a man knows and feels nothing of this poverty of his nature, he is not that person to whom the gospel belongs. [It is to such an one, that Mr. Law's latter part of 'The Sacrament Book' is especially addressed.] It has no more suitableness to his state, than it had to man unfallen; and then, the greater his parts and abilities are, the better is he qualified to show the folly of every doctrine of that salvation, of which he feels no want. I mention this only to show you, that you are not to be surprised at the use your friend has made of The Appeal, notwithstanding his good parts and natural abilities. The Appeal may be hated and laughed at, but that is all the hurt that learned reason can do to it.

I am much pleased with your saying, you could be perfectly satisfied though you never had another letter from me. If you seal up the Objections directed for me, and send them under a cover (if they are not above post weight), directed to the Right Honourable, The Lord Viscount Hatton, at Kirby, in Northamptonshire, you will have no occasion for a frank, and I shall receive them without expense."

For other letters illustrative of Mr. Law's settled spirit of understanding, pure, evangelical simplicity, and union with the divine light, at the time he wrote the Spirit of Prayer and supplementary pieces, we must refer the reader to the published "Collection of Letters," according to their respective dates, and to such as may hereafter be given.

The intimation conveyed in the close of the following passage, which we cite from the Second Part of the "Spirit of Prayer," will show with what Mr. Law was now occupied in his study:—

"For without the reality of a new birth, founded on the certainty of a real death in the fall of Adam, the Christian scheme is but a skeleton of empty words, a detail of strange mysteries between God and man, that do nothing, and have nothing to do.

On the other hand, look now at the things set forth in The Appeal, concerning the fall of angels, the nature and effects of their revolt, and the creation of this world, as deduced therefrom. They neither leave, nor oppose any letter, or doctrine of Scripture. They add nothing to religion, but the full proof of all its articles; they intend nothing, but to open the original ground and true reason of the Christian redemption, and the absolute necessity of its being such, as the gospel declares. Now the letter of Scripture does not do this in open words; it sets not forth the why and how things are, either in nature or grace; it teaches not the ground or philosophy of the Christian faith; it contents itself with bare facts and doctrines, and calls for simple faith and obedience. No wonder, therefore, that when the natural and necessary ground of the Christian redemption is opened, that the letter of Scripture is not step by step appealed to for everything that is said. And yet many things may be sufficiently grounded on scripture, that are not so expressed in the letter. The Sadducees denied that there was any resurrection at all; and this they did, because they could not find it in the express letter of the five books of Moses; and yet it seems, that the resurrection was plainly and strongly taught there: for thus saith our Lord, 'That the dead shall rise again, Moses shewed at the bush, when he said, The Lord is the God of Abraham, Isaac, &c. For he is not the God of the dead, but of the living.' Luke xx. 37, 38. This shows us that a thing may be fully and sufficiently proved from scripture, which is not plainly expressed in the letter. And thus stands the matter with regard to those great and edifying truths set forth in The Appeal. They are truly scriptural, they have their ground and authority from Scripture, though not so open and express in the letter, as matters of faith and necessary doctrine are. For is not the fall of angels a scripture truth? Is not the desolation, which their fall brought into nature, and the very place of this world, a scripture truth? What else can be meant by "darkness upon the face of the deep?" What darkness, or what deep, but in the place of this world? What darkness, or state of the deep, but that which God was about to raise out of its disordered state? And does not the letter of scripture show, that out of this darkness and waters, and state of the deep, the Spirit and light of God entering into them, brought forth the earth, the stars, the sun, and all the elements into a form of a new world.

To ask for a particular text of Scripture, saying in so many express words, That the place of this world is the very place and extent of the kingdom of the fallen angels, is quite ridiculous, and without the least ground in reason, as is enough shown in The Appeal. For does not our Lord expressly call the devil, a prince of this world? But how could this name belong to him, but because he is here in his own first region and territories; and has still some power, till all the evil by themselves personally to the writer. There is nothing of the holiness, the heavenly parity, solemnity, devotion, and mind of Christ, about such Mahommedan science and philosophy.]

that he has raised in it shall be entirely separated from it? For, was not this world raised out of the materials of the fallen angels' kingdom, and was not the wrath, and fire, and darkness of their fall, still in some degree remaining in every part of this world, they could have no more power in it than they have in heaven; they must be as entirely incapable of seeing or entering into it, as they are of seeing or entering into the kingdom of heaven: for they have nothing but evil in their nature; they can touch nothing, move nothing, see nothing, feel nothing, taste nothing, act in nothing, but that very evil, darkness, fire, and wrath, and disorder, which they first awakened and kindled both in themselves and their kingdom. And therefore it is a truth of the utmost certainty, that they can be no where but where there is something of that evil still subsisting, which they brought forth. And this may pass for demonstration, (if there be any such thing) that the Scriptures themselves demonstrate the place of this world, to be the very place and region, in which the angels fell. And they still are here, because their kingdom is not wholly delivered from all the evil they have raised in it, but is to stand for a time, only in a state of recovery; where they themselves must see, in spite of all the rage and malice of their fiery darts, that the mystery of a Lamb of God born upon earth, will raise creatures of flesh and blood, amidst the ruins of their spoiled kingdom, to be an host of angels in heaven restored; and themselves plunged into an hell, that is cut off from every thing, but their own wrath, fire, and darkness. And all this, Academicus, to make it known through all the regions of eternity, that pride can degrade the highest angels into devils, and humility raise fallen flesh and blood to the thrones of angels. This, this is the great end of God's raising a new creation out of the fallen kingdom of angels; for this end it stands in its state of war, a war betwixt the fire and pride of fallen angels, and the meekness and humility of the Lamb of God: it stands its thousands of years in this strife, that the last trumpet may sound this great truth, through all heights and depths of eternity, 'That evil can have no beginning, but from pride; nor any end, but from humility.'

O Academicus, what a blindness there is in the world! What a stir is there amongst mankind about religion, and yet almost all seem to be afraid of that, in which alone is salvation!

Poor mortals! What is the one wish and desire of your hearts? What is it that you call happiness, and matter of rejoicing? Is it not when everything about you helps you to stand upon higher ground, gives full nourishment to self-esteem, and gratifies every pride of life? And yet life itself is the loss of every thing, unless pride be overcome. O stop awhile in contemplation of this great truth! It is a truth as unchangeable as God; it is written and spoken through all nature; heaven and earth, fallen angels, and redeemed men, all bear witness to it. The truth is this, Pride must die in you, or nothing of heaven can live in you. Under the banner of this truth, give up yourselves to the meek and humble spirit of the holy Jesus, the overcomer of all fire, and pride, and wrath. This is the one way, the one truth, and the one life: there is no other open door into the sheepfold of God: every thing else is the working of the devil in the fallen nature of man. Humility must sow the seed, or there can be no reaping in heaven. Look not at pride only as an unbecoming temper, nor at humility only as a decent virtue; for the one is death, and the other is life; the one is all hell, and the other is all heaven.

So much as you have of pride, so much you have of the fallen angel alive in you; so much as you have of true humility, so much you have of the Lamb of God within you. Could you see with your eyes what every stirring of pride does to your soul, you would beg of everything you meet to tear the viper from you, though with the loss of a hand or an eye. Could you see what a sweet, divine, transforming power there is in humility, what a heavenly water of life it gives to the fiery breath of your soul, how it expels the poison of your fallen nature, and makes room for the Spirit of God to live in you, you would rather wish to be the footstool of all the world, than to want the smallest degree of it. Excuse, Academicus, this little digression, if it be such; for the subject we were upon forced me into it.

Acad. Indeed, Sir, the lesson you have here given, is the same that the whole nature of the fall of angels, and the whole nature of the redemption of man, daily reads to every creature; and he, who alone can redeem the world, has plainly shown us wherein the life and spirit of our redemption must consist, when he saith, 'Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart.' Now if this lesson is unlearned, we must be said to have left our Master, as those disciples did, 'who went back, and walked no more with him.' But if you please, Theophilus, we will now break off till the afternoon.—

Theoph. Give me leave first, Academicus, but just to mention one point more, to show to you still farther how unreasonably your friends object to The Appeal the want of the plain letter of Scripture. Now let it be supposed, that the account of the fall of angels, the creation, &c., given in The Appeal, has not scripture enough. Take then the contrary opinion, which is that of your friends, viz., That all worlds, and all things, are created out of nothing.

Show me now, Academicus, I do not say a text, but the least hint of Scripture, that, by all the art of commenting, can so much as be drawn to look that way. It is a fiction, big with the grossest absurdities, and contrary to every thing that we know, either from nature or Scripture, concerning the rise, and birth, and nature of things, that have begun to be. Adam was not created out of nothing; for the letter of Moses tells us in the plainest words, out of what he was created or formed, both as to his inward and his outward nature. He tells us also as expressly out of what Eve, the next creature, was created. But from the time of Adam and Eve, the creation of every human creature is a birth out of its parents' body and soul, or whole nature. And to show us how all things, or worlds, as well as all living creatures, are not created out of nothing, St. Paul appeals to this very account that Moses gives of the woman's being formed 'out of the man;' but 'all things (says he) are out of God,' (1 Cor. xi. 12). Here this fiction of a creation out of nothing is by the plain and open letter of Scripture absolutely removed from the whole system of created things, or things which begin to be; for St. Paul's doctrine is, That all things come into being, out of God, in the same reality as the woman was formed or created out of man. So again, 'There is to us but one God, out of whom are all things,' (1 Cor. viii. 6); for so you know the Greek should be translated, not of, but out of God; not of, but out of the man. The fiction, therefore, which I speak of, is not only without, but expressly contrary to, the plain letter of scripture. For everything that we see, every creature that has life, is, by the scripture account, a birth from something else. And here, Sir, you are to take notice of a maxim that is not deniable, That the reason why any thing proceeds from a birth is the reason why every thing must do so. For a birth would not be in nature, but because birth is the only procedure of nature. Nature itself is a birth from God, the first manifestation of the hidden inconceivable God ; and is so far from being out of nothing, that it is the manifestation of all that in God which was before unmanifest. As nature is the first birth, or manifestation of God, or discovery of the Divine powers ; so all creatures are the manifestation of the powers of nature, brought into a variety of births, by the will of God, out of nature. The first creatures that are the nearest to the Deity, are out of the highest powers of nature, by the will of God ; willing that nature should be manifested in the rise and birth of creatures out of it. Nature, directed and governed by the wisdom of God, goes on in the birth of one thing out of another. The spiritual materiality of heaven brings forth the bodies, or heavenly flesh and blood of angels, as the materiality of this world brings forth the birth of gross flesh and blood. The spiritual materiality of heaven, so far as the extent of the kingdom of fallen angels reached, has, by various changes occasioned by their fall, gone through a variety of births, or creations, till some of it came down to the thickness of air and water, and the hardness of earth and stones. But when things have stood in this state their appointed time, the last purifying fire, kindled by God, will take away all thickness, hardness, and darkness, and bring all the divided things and elements of this world back again, to be that first glassy sea, or heavenly materiality, in which the throne of God is set, as was seen by St. John, in the revelation made to him.

But the fiction of the creation out of nothing, is not only contrary to the letter and spirit of the Scripture account of the rise and birth of things, but is in itself full of the grossest absurdities and horrid consequences. It separates everything from God, it leaves no relation between God and the creature, nor any possibility for any power, virtue, quality or perfection of God, to be in the creature : for if it is created out of nothing, it cannot have something of God in it. But I here stop FOR, AS YOU KNOW, WE HAVE AGREED, IF GOD PERMIT, TO HAVE HEREAFTER ONE DAY'S ENTIRE CONVERSATION ON THE NATURE AND END OF THE WRITINGS OF JACOB BEHMEN, AND THE RIGHT USE AND MANNER OF READING THEM ; AND ALL THAT, AS PREPARATORY TO A MORE CORRECT ENGLISH EDITION OF HIS WORKS, FROM THE ORIGINAL GERMAN LANGUAGE ; SO THIS AND SOME OTHER POINTS SHALL BE ADJOURNED TO THAT TIME. In the afternoon, we will proceed only on such matters as may farther set the Christian redemption in its true and proper light, before your friend Humanus.

Acad. I am very glad, Theophilus, that I have mentioned these objections to you, though they were of no weight with me, since you have thereby had an occasion of giving so full an answer to them. The matter stands now in this plain and easy point of light—

In The Appeal we have a system of uniform truths, concerning the fall of angels, their spoiled and darkened kingdom, and the creation of this world as raised out of it. We have the creation and fall of man, his regeneration, and the manner of it, all opened and explained according to the letter and tenor of Scripture, from their deepest ground, in such a manner as to give light and clearness into all the articles of the Christian faith : to expel all difficulties and absurdities that had crept into it ; and the whole scheme of our redemption proved to be absolutely necessary, both from Scripture, and all that is seen and known in nature and creature.

On the other hand, the opinion which is, and must be received, if the account in The Appeal is rejected, appears to be a fiction, that has no sense, no reason, no fact, no appearance in nature, nor one single letter of Scripture, to support it ; but stands in the utmost contrariety to all the Scripture saith of the creation of everything ; and is in itself full of the grossest absurdities, raising darkness and difficulties in all parts of religion, that can never be removed from it. For a creation that has nothing of God in it, can explain nothing that relates to God : for a creation out of nothing, has no better sense in it than a creation into nothing."

Here we observe that Mr. Law was casually drawn aside from his main purpose to comment on the source of all the arbitrary theology which had characterised the church, and to support the fundamental refutation of that system of doctrine in the "Appeal." But in order not to encumber this particular and practical work with irrelevant matter, he intimates his intention of devoting an entire day to conversation on the subject, that is, of publishing another work, which should serve at the same time as an introduction to the Works of Jacob Behmen, and to the right, evangelical use of them, as designed in their gift to these last ages, of which they have been termed, the gospel. This purpose he had long before conceived, as expressed in his letter to one Mr. Stephen Penny, an extract from which was inserted in the note of p. 45.

The work thus promised is the "Way to Divine Knowledge," more especially that portion of it commencing with the "Second Dialogue,"—the First Dialogue being an elision and sequence of the "Spirit of Prayer," as a means of knitting the two works together, and giving continuity to the conversations ; and appropriately summing up with the observations on "Gospel Christianity," cited p. 120, showing its true nature, as the end of all the salvation dispensations of God to man.

[We have designated the "Spirit of Prayer," the practical application of the divine philosophy opened in the "Appeal ;" but ~~it may be~~ considered an Appendix to the "Demonstration of the Fundamental Errors of the Plain Account of the Sacrament" where, in the latter portion of it, was set forth a brief and popular elucidation of the fallen state of man, whereby to preach the gospel to Christian sceptics. And he would be no ill-instructed scribe, or ill-qualified preacher of the gospel, who (in addition to his own experience of Christianity) should have made himself thoroughly master of the contents of this last-mentioned treatise.]

Thus was this Christian sage, in his retirement, laying the foundation for carrying out the designs of the gospel revelation, that is, as the Divine Author of it wished "truth," or the pure, universal philosophy he taught, to be understood ; whereby to renew the face of moral nature, even to the ends of the earth, and so to usher in the great day.

At some future time, when the reader comes to see the effects of Law's Elias ministrations, as tion allemande de Gichtel, par le Philosophe inconnu, avec une Notice sur Jacob Bœhm, Paris, an ix (1800), in-8°. Cette nature originelle, que Bœhm appelle l'éternelle nature, et dont la we are elucidating it, he will doubtless raise up his mind in astonishment that, from the apostolic ages down to this very day, so few, if indeed any individuals, or churches, have apprehended the exact views of Christ, touching the Gospel scope and efficacy, before the square-minded, Christian philosopher, Law. For had Christianity, as taught by its author, and summed up in Saint Paul's Epistles, continued to be rightly understood, and transmitted purely down by the apostolic successors, the host of conflicting religious schemes which the last seventeen hundred years have brought forth, could never have been conceived, or at all events would have been strangled at the birth. But, blessed be God, the world is approaching daylight, and will soon have the means of understanding the mind and spirit of Christ, in his recorded declarations, and those of his apostles.

We have remarked that the "First Dialogue" of the work under review is the natural conclusion of the "Spirit of Prayer." In like manner the last two Dialogues may be considered as supplementary to the "Appeal," which the reader will understand as follows. Seeing that the world was distracted by the errors, absurdities of doctrine, and interminable sectarian divisions, which had arisen in the once simple and united church of God, and convinced by every-day experience, of the incapacity of Christianity in this state for pursuing her natural mission, Mr. Law was led to consider the real source of all this Babel confusion and uncertainty. And, from the elevation at which he now stood, he was enabled clearly to detect the capital mistake, from which almost every other illusion had proceeded; which was, in short, the absurd notion that "all things were originally created out of nothing." Strange to say, this fiction had prevailed as a matter of ordinary belief in every age, since the loss of the tradition of St. Paul, concerning "the great mystery of Christ," about the second or third generation after the apostles, and had occasioned the Gospel revelation to be represented as the offspring of an arbitrary Deity; the learned in each age delineating its outlines according to their blind concepts, and attempting to reconcile them to the repugnant natural sense of mankind, by imaginary superstructures, opinions and conjectures of their own upon the abstract letter of Scripture. In this way it appeared, had originated every error of doctrine, by which the well-springs of religion and philosophy had been poisoned in Christian schools and centres of learning; and which had at length arrived at such a pitch of extravagance and irrationality, as to be not unworthy of Bedlam itself. Thousands of learned and often devout persons in the Protestant church, held with implicit faith, the Calvin-invented doctrines of unconditional election and reprobation, the imputation of Christ's righteousness, justification by, i.e. as the reward of faith, and non-freedom of the will; also reason the judge of revelation and of the divine requirements, with other enormities embraced by Arianism, Deism, Socinianism, and the ever varying schools of free-thinkers. Still greater numbers in the Latin church might be found imbued with equal faith in papal infallibility, indulgences, purgatory according to the gross sense, and the deliverance of souls out of it by lucre, in virtue of the priest's office, intercession of the virgin Mary, &c.; not to mention the corresponding absurdities of the Greek church, which were doubtless quite as numerous. [We say nothing here with respect to the ancient Oriental or Jewish, &c. religions, save that the mystery of iniquity has ever worked in one uniform way; and "there is no difference," says the Apostle Paul.]

Thus, the various doctrines of Christianity had been driven from their true centre and basis, and the most devoted persons were subject to illusion in points of understanding; albeit the essential knowledge of religious truth was always within reach of every honest soul that desired God, and had been realised by a mystical "seven thousand" amongst every sect and denomination, in all ages. At the period Mr. Law wrote the "Appeal" therefore, it was obvious to him that the purification of Gospel truth, and indeed of philosophy generally, was the work especially demanded by the exigencies of the times; and that the first step towards effecting it, would be the refutation, once for all, of the fundamental error to which we have alluded. This being done by the "Appeal," and the "Spirit of Prayer" thrown in as a practical episode to point the application of the whole ~~was suggested by his own mind in theology~~ it remained simply to show that the philosophy of the "Appeal" was fully capable of opening out the ground and reason of redemption, as well as of the creation. The elucidation of this point therefore, (which in effect involved a notice of the writings of Behmen,) is the particular characteristic of the "Way to Divine Knowledge," though it is also glanced at in the "Appeal," wherein the fall of angels, and afterwards of man, with all the natural effects and consequences of each, in connection with the true reason and origin of this temporal system; and the exact parallel between the operation of the laws of eternal nature in the world at large, and the operations of the same laws in man, are all explained, and delineated—as in a working plan, designed by a wise master-builder, for the guidance of mechanical operatives in erecting a superstructure of a new and eternal Temple, for all nations wherein to unitedly worship. Thus the great object of the whole, ~~nam~~ not to open, but to close the field of controversy between unbelievers and Christians, by establishing the great fact, (1.) that there is one only life and one only death throughout all nature; and (2.) that the proposal of that life, and the call from that certain death, is the sum and purpose of the entire Gospel. To quote Mr. Law's own words:—

"To embrace the gospel, is to enter with all our hearts into its terms of dying to all that is earthly, both within us and without us; and on the other hand, to place our faith, and trust, and satisfaction in the things of this world, is to reject the Gospel with our whole heart, spirit, and strength, as much as any infidel can do, notwithstanding we made ever so many verbal assents and consents to everything that is recorded in the New Testament.

This therefore, is the one true, essential distinction between the Christian and the unbeliever. The unbeliever is a man of this world, wholly devoted to it, his hope and faith are set upon it; for where our heart is, there, and there only, is our hope and faith. He has only such virtue, such goodness, and such a religion, as entirely suits with the interests of flesh and blood, and keeps the soul happy in the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life: this, and this alone, is infidelity, a total separation from God, and a removal of all faith and hope from him into the life of this world. It matters not whether this unbeliever be a professor of the Gospel, a disciple of Zoroaster, a follower of Plato, a Jew, a Turk, or an opposer of the Gospel history.

nôte serait une altération, n'est point une nature sans engendrement, puisqu'elle est l'émanation d'un Principe un et indivisible, que Bœhm, pourse faire entendre, considère comme trinaire dans

This difference of opinions or professions alters not the matter, it is the love of the world instead of God, that constitutes the whole nature of the unbeliever.

On the other hand, the Christian renounces the world as his horrid prison; he dies to the will of flesh and blood, because it is darkness, corruption, and separation from God; he turns from all that is earthly, animal, and temporal; and stands in a continual tendency of faith, and hope, and prayer to God to have a better nature, a better life and spirit, born again into him from above.

Where this faith is, there is the Christian, the new creature in Christ, born of the Word and Spirit of God [whether called Pagan, Heathen, Papist, Turk, or Jew]; neither time nor place, nor any outward condition of birth and life, can hinder his entrance into the kingdom of God.

But where this faith [and practise] is not, there is the true, complete unbeliever, [however he may talk, or even preach about Christianity and salvation,] the man of the earth, the unredeemed, the rejecter of the Gospel—the son of perdition, that is dead in trespasses and sins, with out Christ, an alien from the commonwealth of Israel, a stranger from the covenants of promise, having no hope and without God in the world.

Here therefore, (adds Mr. Law emphatically,) I fix my true ground of converting men to Christianity, [i. e. Christian-born sceptics; for to convert an intellectual alien to the faith of Christianity, it is needful first of all, to let him understand the ground of nature and grace, the expressed word of God, in love and anger, with its re-expression, both in the creation and the human life.] And how miserably do they err, (he continues) who place Christianity and infidelity in anything else, but in the heart either devoted to this world or devoted to God."

In accordance with our plan hitherto, we shall here give the general contents of the "Way to Divine Knowledge." Like the Second Part of the "Spirit of Prayer," it consists of Three Dialogues, which are carried on by the same characters, only that Humanus is now no longer a silent listener. This change is in accordance with an intimation given at the end of the "Spirit of Prayer;" and it discovers a brilliant trait of the author's genius, in the accomplished adoption of the method of the ancient philosophers, before whom, to educe reflection, to elicit the birth of philosophic truth in the mind, and to impart the understanding of their deep discourses of wisdom, the initiates were compelled to observe perfect silence for a given period, and afterwards were allowed to ask such questions as they then were unable of themselves to resolve. Owing to the wisdom of this method, and the self-evident nature of the truths propounded by our theosopher, Humanus, at the end of the "Spirit of Prayer," had evidently no other alternative, as an honest seeker of truth, than to become ■ thorough convert to Christianity. Which interesting fact, and the precise state of his mind in consequence of it, Mr. Law thus conveys to his reader in the opening passage of the "Way to Divine Knowledge":—

"Oh! Theophilus, I must yield; and it is with great pleasure that I now enter into conversation with you. You have taken from me all power of cavilling and disputing. I have no opinions that I choose to maintain, but have the utmost desire of entering further into this field of light, which you have so clearly opened to my view. I shall not trouble you with the relation of what has passed in my soul, nor what struggles I have had with that variety of heathenish notions which have had their turn in my mind. It is better to tell you that they are dead and buried, or rather consumed to nothing by that new light, which you have opened in so many great points that I was quite a stranger to before. To reject all that you have said, concerning the fall of angels, the original of this world, the creation and fall of man, and the necessity of a redemption, as great as that of the gospel, is impossible; nothing can do it, or stand out against it, but the most wilful and blind obstinacy. [N.B.]

But these great points cannot be received in any true degree, without seeing the vain contention of all those, who either defend or oppose the gospel, without any true and real knowledge of them. The one contend for, and the other oppose, not the Gospel, but a system of empty words and historical facts branched into forms and modes of dividing one church from another: whereas the Gospel is no history of any absent, distant, or foreign thing, but is a manifestation of an essential, inherent, real life and death in every son of Adam; grounded on the certainty of his real fall from that, into an animal, earthly life, of impure, bestial flesh and blood, and on the certainty of an inward redemption from it, by the divine nature given again into him. These three great points, with all the doctrines, duties, and consequences that are essentially contained in, or flow from them, are the Gospel of Jesus Christ, to which, by your means, I am become a convert.—I am now, dear Theophilus, strongly drawn two different ways. First, I am all hunger and thirst after this new light, a glimpse of which has already raised me, as it were from the dead; and I am in the utmost impatience to hear more and more of this divine philosophy, which, I so plainly see, opens all the mysteries both of Nature and Grace, from the beginning to the end of time. What I have heard from you, when I was obliged to be silent, and what I have since found and felt by much reading the Appeal, and that Dialogue, obliges me to speak in this ardent manner. They have awakened something in me which I never felt before, something much deeper than my reason, and over which I have no power; it glows in my soul, like a fire, or hunger, which nothing can satisfy, but a further view of those great truths which I this day expect, from your opening to us the mysteries of heaven revealed to that wonderful man, Jacob Behmen.

On the other hand, I find in myself a vehement impulse to turn preacher amongst my former infidel brethren which impulse I know not how to resist. For being just converted myself, I seem to know, and feel the true place from whence conversion is to arise in others; and by the reluctance which I have felt in my passage from one side to the other, I seem also to know the true ground on which infidelity supports itself. And he only is able to declare with spirit and power any truths, or bear a faithful testimony of the reality of them, who preaches nothing but what he has first seen, and felt, and found to be true, by a living sensibility and true experience of their reality and power in his own soul. All other preaching, whether from art, hearsay, books, or education, is, at best, but playing with words, and mere trifling with sacred things. Being thus divided in myself, I hope to have your direction."

son essence, et septénaire dans ses formes ou modes. C'est donc à tort qu'elle a été confondue ainsi que sa cause, avec la Substance-Principe de Spinosas.

Hereupon Mr. Law proceeds with the plan of his work; and the heads under which his instructions may be classed, are as follow :—

FIRST DIALOGUE.—The whole foundation of the Gospel, in the certainty of man's original perfection, and of his fall and redemption. The primeval fire and light, still lodged in the human soul. Salvation consists in the consciousness or re-opening of this hidden divine life. How it differs from any natural goodness, and yet must become a habit of the life. This doctrine of the fall, the best and only safe means of converting unbelievers. Its proofs are not historical, but are lodged in human nature itself. The possibility, occasion and manner of the fall, briefly sketched. The difference between the fall of mankind and that of the fallen angels. The certain redemption of the former. Gospel Christianity only its actual commencement, as involved in the glorification of Christ's humanity. SECOND DIALOGUE, (which, according to what we have said above, may be considered as a resumption of the Appeal.)—Learned expositions of Scripture, like religious opinions, utterly useless. The only purpose to be regarded in scripture, is its use in advancing the new birth, of the divine life. Behmen, the only original guide to the philosophy of this new life. The nature of Behmen's disclosures. For whom his works are intended, and by whom alone they can safely be consulted. The impossibility of searching into these things by mere human reason. True apprehension derived from the Spirit of God working in man, as he works in nature. Hence the only way to Divine knowledge is the way of the gospel, which proposes the new birth, as the means of attaining to light and love. How the way to this birth lies wholly in the will. How the will of man rules his own nature, as that of God rules eternal nature. The nature of this will, as proceeding from the latent divine life, or power of redemption. Faith, nothing else than the working of this new will. THIRD DIALOGUE.—Nature and God both known by their manifestation in the mind. In what the whole ground of religion consists. Nature and God both defined. The birth and generation of the properties of nature, as set forth by Behmen. First form or principle of nature, and its three properties. Their beatification, by the light and love of God. How they constitute the substantiality in which the all-present, all-working, super-natural deity moves and shines, or becomes perceptible. The degrees by which they become materialised. In what state the original substantiality (or nature) was brought forth. Its fundamental constitution never intended to be known. The reason of its discovery, and the creation of temporal nature as a consequence of the fall. Into what elements the wrathful properties finally passed. The birth of fire. The comprehension of nature in seven properties. The place of the sun in their midst, or the Copernican philosophy opened from transcendental grounds. The end of temporal nature, and general review of the providential design connected with its origin, existence and termination. The philosophy of regeneration. The birth of fire, or fourth form of nature in the regeneration. Admonition concerning the right use of the Mystery revealed in Behmen. Practical religious value of this philosophy.

[Note.—The reader will bear in mind, amid all these openings of the ground and origin of things, and seemingly non-essential knowledge, that the design of the whole, as we have repeated to satiety, is all bearing towards the author's end, namely, the everlasting establishment of Christianity, on its true basis of philosophy and theology, and showing how it may be experimentally tested by every true, seeking, rational spirit, without a possibility of delusion; providentially embracing also its ultimatum, as implied in the Extract in Note of p. 496.]

The "Way to Divine Knowledge" was published during the first half of the year 1752, and before June in the same year, it was followed by a Tract (which is now the "First Part" of "The Spirit of Love"), entitled the "Spirit of Love; being an Appendix to The Spirit of Prayer. In a Letter to a friend." The very short interval which elapsed between the publication of the "Way to Divine Knowledge" and this little Treatise, leaves nothing to be added to the narrative portion of our remarks until after its appearance. Accordingly, we shall at once proceed to a notice of its contents as in the case of the other books.

The doctrine that God is love, and that Christianity is the religion of love, and all its gifts and graces the gifts and graces of love, with the ravishing elucidations thereof in the foregoing works, was exposed to two objections on the part of those who had even entered seriously upon the practice of a Christian life, though without any acquaintance with the science of mystical divinity, and who had been so captivated by Mr. Law's discourses, as to imagine that it was henceforth impossible they could be, or do anything but love. In the first place, they would find, when the occasion for exercising this divine principle arose, as it necessarily would in the course of things, under the various trials of life; amid the contention, opposition, and injuries of the world, and worse than all, under the stinging passions, tempers, and sinfulness of their own evil hearts; they would find, we say, that they had only got a fresh system of religious notions, which afforded them no practical relief in the hour of trial. Under which disappointed feelings, they would also recal to mind the numerous expressions in the Bible concerning the righteousness, justice, and wrath of God; and, judging according to their own standard of theology, would find it impossible to reconcile such representations of the Deity with those of Mr. Law. Thus, do what they would, they would find themselves unable, on the one hand, to practice that perfection of Divine goodness, which the doctrine of love seemed to require of them, in order to be consistent with their convictions; (in other words would feel experimentally what Mr. Law had been all the while demonstrating, viz., that it was impossible for nature to overcome herself.) And on the other hand, that the Gospel, in this new light, appeared mysterious and contradictory. Whence they would rashly conclude that there was no reality in this evangelical doctrine, and that Mr. Law's interpretations of it, though they could not tell how, were only ingenious mystical fictions. And, if of a hasty temperament, and too much under the control of self-will, they might, perhaps, angrily denounce mystical divinity altogether, as an infatuating and dangerous delusion; and so proceed on in their own unscientific, chance mode of studying the analogy of faith, without any knowledge of its ground, or aid from experienced tutors and guides.

It therefore remained for Mr. Law's foreseeing prescience to meet these last objections, and therewith to complete his series of elucidations of Christianity, by a formal and complete demonstration, (1.) that the Spirit of Love is not a dead notion, but a spirit of life, which only can arise in its own time and place, and from its own natural cause. And (2.) that those expressions of Scripture which attribute the manifestation of wrath to God, are absolutely true, though there is no wrath in the Deity himself.

Un Précis de l'origine et des suites de l'altération de cette nature, suivant Jacob Boehm, donné dans le Ministère de l'homme-esprit (pag. 28-31), montre comment, en voulant dominer par le feu,

This then, was what he accomplished by the "Spirit of Love," which is very properly denominated an "Appendix to the Spirit of Prayer," and as such is certainly the very cope-stone of the author's scientific Christian writings; leaving nothing to be desired, nor a single question to be asked by the attentive reader, as to the way to God and salvation, and means of overcoming all obstacles that may intercept his path. That which the "Spirit of Prayer" had shown to be an essential part of the Christian process, namely, the absolute and voluntary death to self, is herein supported, nay, strictly demonstrated, from the universal ground or reason of things. Thus seeing the intrinsic nature of self, and of the powers of this world, and seeing with the same open eye, the nature, the relations, the transactions, and efficacy of Christ as a Redeemer, everything speaks as with a trumpet voice, and calls to prayer; in other words, there is nothing, whether it be good or evil, but conspires to turn the soul wholly to God. Such is unquestionably, the essential instruction which every Christian believer requires (though, perhaps, not so philosophically demonstrated as is done by Mr. Law), in order to work out his salvation, without becoming the subject, from time to time, of various delusions. And such an opening of nature, it is equally manifest, is the one thing needful for the conversion of unbelievers to the faith of Christianity.

Mr. Law's own statement of the case as regards the occasion for writing the "Spirit of Love" is as follows; and the reader may consider the words of the author as addressed especially to him:—

"You say, There is nothing in all my writings that has more affected you than that spirit of love that breathes in them; and that you wish for nothing so much as to have a living sensibility of the power, life, and religion, of love. But you have these two objections often rising in your mind: First, that this doctrine of pure and universal love may be too refined and imaginary; because you find, that however you like it, yet you cannot attain to it, or overcome all that in your nature which is contrary to it, do what you can; and so, are only able to be an admirer of that love which you cannot lay hold of. Secondly, because you find so much said in Scripture of a righteousness and justice, a wrath and vengeance of God, that must be atoned and satisfied &c., that though you are in love with that description of the Deity, which I have given, as a being that is all love, yet you have some doubt whether the Scripture will allow of it." It is the first of these objections only, which is answered in the portion of the work now under consideration; and though we have inserted it at full length in the first section of this treatise (see p. 64—77), we here present a brief specification of its contents, which may be summed up under the following heads of discourse:—

("Spirit of Love"—"First Part.")—The nature and perfection of the spirit of love. No man can participate in this spirit until he lives freely, willingly, and universally according to it. Its indispensable necessity as the means of union between God and man. The state of nature and of man as deprived of the spirit of love, by reason of the fall. The process of its recovery by purification. The fundamental reason of this process opened out in a description of nature and its seven properties. The similitude of these properties in the nature and being of man. All evil the consequence of nature working in self, or in a state of separation from God. All good the power and presence of the super-natural Deity, dwelling and working in the properties of nature. How his presence and the birth of the spirit of love, are the same thing. Being a spirit of life, it can rise in one only way and from one only cause. Its birth, by the kindling of eternal fire, and consequent transmutation of the life. Hence the truth and necessity of the Christian redemption, and the doctrine of the Cross.

A letter which belongs to this place, according to the chronology of our biographical sketch, was inserted as a note in pp. 69—72. It is of great merit in many respects, amongst others as involving the philosophy of Homœopathy, and likewise the process of the sublimation of the soul for the stbylline, and the philosophic work; as the forty days proba. But reference is here made to it, as affording a further illustration of the circumstances which we have before alluded to, as usually operative in calling forth the various works of Mr. Law, and the "Spirit of Love" in particular; we mean, the continual necessity of correcting the illogical conclusions of persons even of education and piety, on the presentation of pure original truth to their minds; and of preventing that relapse into their ancient fond conceptions and fantastic ground, which was found to be an almost inevitable consequence of their confused apprehensions and disappointment. This latter was no doubt the case in the instances referred to, at the foot of the note of p. 94, and occasioned the correspondence there alluded to.

The following letter, which was addressed by the author to his friend Mr. Langcake, about this time, evinces the patient assurance with which Mr. Law left the progress of his writings to the over-ruling Divine wisdom; and his cautiousness in admitting any controversy upon the truths which he might consider himself the especial instrument of reducing into a settled, classic form, for all future generations:—

"My dear friend, — Upon reading the papers you sent me, I could not forbear giving you the trouble of this, to caution you against a danger which your pious zeal may bring you into. To desire to communicate good to every creature in the degree we can, and it is capable of receiving from us, is a Divine temper; for thus God stands unchangeably disposed towards the whole creation. And therefore it was an instinct of true goodness, that prompted you to put The Appeal &c. into the hands of your friend. But when this does, you are to stop there. Your ministry, and mine also, is then at an end.

The next thing that belongs to us, and which is also God-like, is a true, unfeigned patience and meekness, showing every kind of good-will and tender affection towards those that turn a deaf ear to us. Looking upon it to be full as contrary to God's method, and the good state of our own heart, to dispute with any one in contentious words, as to fight with him, for the truths of salvation.

As to your friend, the Remarker, I fully believe him to be of an humane, ingenuous, generous dans le premier Principe, au lieu de régner par l'amour dans le second, l'esprit prévaricateur entraîne dans sa chute l'homme, qui lui avait été opposé; comment, l'homme ayant été absorbé dans sa forme and frank nature, of lively parts, and much candour; but entirely ignorant of the depth of the heart of man, and the necessities of human nature.

As yet, though he knows it not, he is only at play and pastime; pleasing himself with supposed "deep enquiries after strict truth," whilst he is only sporting himself with lively wandering images of this or that, just as it happens to start up in his mind. All his remarks, from the beginning to the end, are proofs of this.

Could he see himself in the state of the poor distressed prodigal son, and find that himself is the very person there recorded, he would then, but not till then, see the fitness of that redemption which you have laid before him. But alas! he is rich, he is sound, light is in his own power, goodness is in his own possession. He feels no distress or darkness, but has a "crucible of reason and judgment," as he calls it, that on every occasion separates gold from dross. And therefore, he must be left to himself, in his own elysium, till something awakens him from these golden dreams.

He expressed himself rightly when he said, "Truth was his game;" but the truth in question will not be caught whilst so pursued. He frequently ascribes the highest virtue to himself; and ventures to aver, that he has every goodness that any Christian can have, faith excepted. I mention not this, to charge him with arrogance and presumption, that is not the matter. He only speaks what he thinks. But the reason of his thus thinking and speaking of himself is to be found in these words of his: "Excuse," says he, "the hurry I have wrote this in, whilst I chose to spread my ideas before you, just as my head was warmed with them." And yet this heated brain, spreading out its ideas in a hurry, is before called hunting after truth as his game; and, what is still worse, is considered as a crucible of reason that separates gold from earth!

Judge now, my friend, whether I mistook the matter, when I said that he was only at play and pastime, or whether a man of the lowest understanding, talking about the search after truth, and the crucible of reason, could more mistake the nature of them and himself, than this gentleman with his lively parts, has done.

I thought it necessary to say thus much of this matter. I shall now only add my request, that as you value the peace which God has brought forth by his Holy Spirit in you, as you desire to be continually taught by an unction from above, you would on no account enter into any dispute with any one. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear, may be enough for you, as well as it was for our blessed Lord.

You need not check your inclination to help others in every way you can. Only do what you do as a work for God, and then you will have reason to be content with the success God gives to it.

As to what you mention concerning Dr. Middleton, I leave all to your own discretion.—Dear soul, be humble; dwell in love, in meekness, and the spirit of prayer, and you are Christ's, and Christ is yours.—Adieu. W. Law."

It has been supposed by some modern ingenious, and much to be respected inquirers into the truth of the ancient natural and Divine magic, (but whose researches, by the way, appear to have been directed by the obscure traditions, and assumptions of the fond mediæval speculators about the mystery, and the supposed vestiges of its once existence, in the allusions of the Greek and Roman poets, rather than by the supremelight of the gospel, with its classic developments of theosophic science, and orthodox, mystical experience and power, deposited, for the faithful regenerate children of God, who are qualified to use them aright;—it has been supposed by them that Mr. Law was unacquainted with the high magian philosophy. But we have his assurance that he never wrote upon any subject till he had made it his own; and he certainly treats this topic as a familiar one in a letter of the published "Collection" dated Oct. 16th. 1752, which in the original had the following as a part of it, but which was rejected by the editors at the time they made up some of his letters for publication. Add to which, the consideration of what Freher has written upon this point, pp. 467, 8, and further, that the Extract at pp. 319—28, was printed from Mr. Law's own MS. copy:—

"Your worthy friend and namesake (writes Mr. Law) said no wiser thing to you, when he told you of quicksilver, than if he had told you of a cobweb.—A mere chemist, however perfect in his art, knows not the A B C of the heavenly work.

But to come now to * *. The man himself seems to be a rash talker, as is plain from what he has said of J. B. What Pollman says of him is true enough, and is what I have sufficiently, years ago, published to the world. But for him to pretend to know J. B. from this passage in Pollman, and to join him with Helmont, is quite extravagant, and shows that he minds very little what he affirms."

These observations, coupled with the published letter, and other remarks interspersed in his "Way to Divine Knowledge," and elsewhere, would lead an unprejudiced reader to infer, that he well understood the subject of the philosophical work in its ground, and the boundaries of all that was practical and true in alchemy. Hence he could afford to smile, as he now and then does, at the blindness and vain efforts of pretended artists and philosophers, as knowing from a perusal of their writings, their relative ability or position in the regeneration. And when we reflect further, upon his clear, theosophical apprehension of the powers of nature, and the manner of the creation, as sparkling through his observations and arguments in his "Letter on Warburton's Legation," the matter seems to acquire the utmost certainty. For nature and her laws, eternal and temporal, must of course be mutually regarded in every operation of the Divine magus.—As respects the subject of the popular clairvoyance, its nature and limits, we may, perhaps, recur to it again. Suffice it to remark for the present, that the sacred mystery of the Divine philosophy and powers is not to be pierced by the spasmodic efforts of the ignorant mountebank or the expert ecstasist; for except a man be born again, and that according to the gospel comprehension, he cannot see the kingdom of God, nor enjoy the true light of the spirit of wisdom.

In the First Part of the "Spirit of Love" here in question, in treating of the three properties of desire as being the fundamental ground of all nature, (see p. 71, 2), mention is made of Sir Isaac Newton having "ploughed with Behmen's heifer" when he brought forth his new system grossière, l'amour divin voulut lui présenter son modèle, pour lui faire recouvrer sa ressemblance, par son union avec son type. Ces points, en général, n'ont rien sans doute que de biblique: mais, of philosophy. Reference is also made to the same fact, in the note of p. 46, where is presented an extract from a letter of Mr. Law to the celebrated Dr. Cheyne. And in the last work, also the "Way to Divine Knowledge," the philosophy of temporal nature was particularly described. The candidate may now perhaps remember, how, in a Prospectus attached to the Essay, entitled "The Present, Past, and Future, with regard to the Creation," it was proposed to describe the process by which Sir Isaac was enabled to declare the system of the universe.—Now, all that would be sufficient for that purpose, would be merely to enlarge upon what Mr. Law has said in the above references; as in effect done in the following quotation, from a modern treatise, entitled a "Suggestive Inquiry into the Hermetic Mystery," the author of which, does not appear to make any pretensions to a knowledge of the ground or reason of what he writes, nor has he any true acquaintance with Mr. Law's writings, but simply states the facts as familiar to science.

"Attraction (says he), is the first principle of motion in nature: this is generally admitted, but the origin of this universal attraction is occult and incomprehensible to the ordinary human understanding. Repulsion is the second principle, and a necessary consequence of the first by reaction. Circulation is the third principle, proceeding from the conflict of the former two.

All motion is derived from this threefold source in its reciprocal relations, which are diversified according to its qualifications with the matter. The attraction, repulsion, and circulation in the sun and stars move the planets in their orbits; the same principle in each globe performs the rotation on its axis, and the satellites partake the same motion from their primaries. Every quantity of matter, solid, fluid, or gaseous, when separated from the rest by its quality or distance, natural or artificial, great or small: vegetable and animal forms and motions are no less evidences of these three principles, than the heavenly and earthly bodies. Hence chemical affinity, called Elective Attraction, is ruled by the same laws; and it is found that when two matters unite, one is attractive and the other repulsive; when either attraction or repulsion predominates in a matter, the circulation is an ellipse; but when they are in equilibrium, a circle is produced. Repulsion, being produced in its origin by attraction, equals it, as reaction equals action: but in nature one principle is everywhere more latent or inert, or weaker, than another; and there are degrees accordingly, in which either predominates in external manifestation; hence the different degrees of natural affinity for union. There are also degrees of strength, from harshness to mildness, and (in the operation of these three principles) from the compaction of a hard rock to the close adherence of the particles of a globe of mercury or dew; from explosion to expansion, and from a violent whirling motion to a gentle evolution. But the medium is always, in the circulation, produced from the action and reaction of centrifugal and centripetal forces; and the equality of this forms a circle, as was before observed, and which labours to harmonise the conflict of these two, and will succeed if the matter be duly qualified for it." And so the author proceeds applying the vertices to his own transcendental subject.

These are the principles, which, with their philosophy are opened out in Mr. Law's work now under consideration, and first revealed by Behmen. Now, herein we say, may be perceived the whole matter in question; for, apply these principles by the aid of Geometry and Algebra, to the problem of physical nature, working with data, facts and experiments bequeathed by antecedent philosophers, as referred to in Maclaurin; exerting therein a noble power of imagination and range of thought, and we arrive at the Newtonian discoveries. Methodise these principles, elaborate and experiment, with true ingenuity, and the needful materials, and we produce the Newtonian Principia and Optics; leaving such points as are not discoverable, as queries. (We need not follow Sir Isaac into his alchemic torture-house, endeavouring to make earth generate heaven.)

Thus much may suffice in reference to the subject for the present work; to be duly enlarged upon in the proposed standard biography of Mr. Law.—

The following extract from a letter belonging to this period, contains one or two pithy sentences which exhibit Mr. Law's knowledge of character, and his inestimable value among his familiar friends as an adviser. About this time, we should remark, he was affected by an indisposition of the eyes, which no doubt delayed the appearance of the Second Part of the "Spirit of Love."

"Jan. 31st. 1753.—My dear Friend—Your last letter gave me great pleasure excepting that part of it, which related to your female acquaintance. Her person I know not, but her history very well. Such person, when become religious, will talk of religion, just as they used to carry you about from one person to another. You will do yourself great hurt, if you let Dr. M. this fable, of turning all their awakened zeal into curiosity."

We also add the following, for the sake of the closing observations, which admirably expose the character of the so much lauded modern evangelical divinity, and express the judgment of sensible, well-informed minds upon the discourses alluded to. We refer the reader upon this point to the note of p. 94; remarking, that it was the captivating enthusiasm of this mental idol, which occasioned the correspondence there referred to.

"King's-cliffe. Feb. 12th. 1753.—My dear Langecake—I heartily thank you for your last, and the medicine. Talk no more of obtruding upon me with your letters: everything that comes from you is welcome. My eyes, I bless God, are much amended, but I find I must spare them for a time.

I have no need to write anything to you, for you know all I have to say. You stand upon the same ground that I do: and you have nothing to do, but to be steadfast and immovable in that light, which God has vouchsafed unto you.

But my friend, take notice of this: no truths, however solid and well grounded, help you to any divine life, but so far as they are taught, nourished and strengthened, by an unction from above; and that nothing more dries and extinguishes this heavenly unction, than a talkative, reasoning temper, that is always catching at every opportunity of hearing or telling some religious matters. You have found enough to prove to you, that all must be found in God manifested in the life of your soul.

I had a volume of the great Count Zinzendorf's Sermons before I left the town. I was to find dans l'énoncé des formes des trois Principes, les expressions des diverses propriétés de l'Etre qui tendent à comprimer, attirer, émouvoir (formes essentielles du premier Principe); celles de même such things in them, as would surprise me; but I could hardly persuade myself to read them through.—The Moravians may, for aught I know, have many good people amongst them, as every denomination hath. But their form is quite sectarian, full of inventions, placing much in particularities, and wholly attached to a particular opinion, or rather to a particularity of expression, concerning the blood and sufferings of Christ. Mr. Gambold, when the methodists first set out, was one of them, and often came to see me.—I should say more, but that I must spare my eyes; and yet I must say again, shut your eyes and stop your ears to all religious tales.—My dear soul, Adieu."

It was about this period that the three letters (the first to Mr. Langcake) inserted as a note in p. 216-17 were written. And perhaps about a year or so previous, the first of the letters, given in the note of p. 123.

The following letter contains a remark that connects us again with the immediate subject of our narrative: "Kings-cliffe. Aug. 22nd. 1753.—My dearly beloved Langcake—I had the favour of yours by my nephew. Upon reading your observations on Suicide, I had the pleasure to think that you and I might well be in great friendship, since we are both of one heart and one spirit.—I am writing the Second Part of the Spirit of Love. My dear friend, Adieu. W. LAW."

We have selected yet another letter for insertion in this place: which it will be seen, is remarkable for its affectionate expression of interest in Mr. Langcake:—

"Nov. 26th. 1753.—Much pleasure always comes with every letter that has your name to it. You have given me a great specimen of your patience, in being able to transcribe "The Way that Human Nature attains &c." I need say no more upon it. More labour to bring forth nothing, I never saw. The man may be well disposed, but his conversation seems not to be useful to you. I have formerly had from you some of his opinions, greatly to be condemned, and quite shocking. But a man in such clouds as this paper shows him to be in, can neither see his own error, nor the truths of any one else. There is nothing to be done with such people in the way of argument. It is hurting both one's self and them, to debate with them. They will come out of their state, when they are tired with it, and not before. Every temper of ~~weakness~~ ^{meek}, condescension, love and goodwill towards them, is to be strictly observed, both inwardly and outwardly, as occasions offer; but every way of avoiding their conversation, that is consistent with these indispensable tempers ought to be chosen.

Your letter upon Suicide shall be considered by me, as you desire. If it is to be made public, some better way of doing it must be thought of. But, all this I say, not as a dictator, or as one that has any ground for complaint, if you should act contrary to all that I have said. [See the printed "Collection of Letters," for the promised Remarks, only that the date of the letter is there put as August 4th, 1753, instead of subsequently to the date of this letter. The letter it would seem, was given to Dr. Middleton for perusal.]

I have this week sent the Second Part of the Spirit of Love to the town, for the press. It is left to the care of the printer, and therefore I suppose, I must have an Errata come out with it.

I have always been required by the ladies here, to send their most friendly respects to you in all my letters, but you know how little I have done it.—Mon cher ami, Adieu."

This letter naturally brings the Second Part of the "Spirit of Love" under our notice, which was published in January 1754, as a full and satisfactory answer to the second objection alluded to p. 548 which the author had reserved for another letter. In the interim, however, he had allowed the circumstances of the case, as in the instance of the "Spirit of Prayer," to influence his choice of the manner and style of the work, and again resorted to the form of Dialogues, on this occasion between three characters, namely, Theogenes, Eusebius, and Theophilus; of which the first two were new conceptions, expressly adapted to bring out the design and instruction of the present work, and to point the application of its arguments. (Theogenes and Eusebius might well represent Wesley and his brother Charles, supposing him to have continued a little longer under his tutor, Theophilus, instead of breaking with him, and setting up on his own account in 1738.)

This answer is contained in the two first dialogues, whilst the third consist of a practical evangelical application of the whole philosophy of God and nature opened in the preceding treatises.

[Apropos of the Hermetic philosophy, we observed in our remarks above, that "in Christ are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge," and that they are all the prerogatives of those who have the requisite "faith on the earth;"—"all are yours." "Greater works than these shall ye do," said Christ, (after my glorification.) All Divine magical arts and power must therefore, be comprehended in these assurances and promises.—Again, Christ the manifestation in flesh of the universal Deity, the wisdom and power of God, is One; "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever." Therefore all that ever was true in the ancient natural magical, oracular, sibylline powers and revelations, must have been only so, as they were faint corruptions of the glorious powers that belong to our day and seculum, and which only await the summons of the true children of the mystery, according to the graduation and faith-directing instructions of the "Grammar of Wisdom."—Again Christ says "I am the way, the truth, and the life. No man cometh unto the Father but by me." "The pure in heart shall see God." Now the way or process of Christ, according to its true and comprehensive scope, is taking up the Cross, total denial and death to all self, and prayer without ceasing, or close adherence to God. Therefore all that was efficient in all the arts and ceremonies of the ancient Theurgic and ~~Elipsean~~ ^{Elipsonian} mysteries, &c., &c., for the purification of the spirit from the contagion, opacity and darkness of matter, and its gradual restoration, through the phantasmic centres of reason, to its primary, intellectual ground, could only be so, as they were imitations of that purifying process of Christ, and regeneration of the virgin humanity implied in the above declaration of our Lord; but which latter could only have taken place since the glorification of the human nature.

Thus, in these and all other instances of efficient arts and practices for the divinization of the human spirit, so much regarded in the ancient mysteries, might it be shown, how all derived their virtue and effect from Christ, and were more or less powerful as they more or less approached that qui en sont la manifestation, et qui consistent à échauffer, éclatrer, produire et opérer (formes appartenant au second et au troisième Principe), peuvent sembler, en partie, extraites des qualités standard "way," implied by our Lord, when he said, He that followeth me shall not walk in darkness (the light of reason), but shall have the light of life. "Unless a man deny himself and take up his cross and follow me, he cannot be my disciple. And unless a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God."

Why then seek for the arts and practices of attaining to the true super-sensual ground of life among the rudimentary ancients, when all is so completely set forth in the most perfect form in the standard principles of the Gospel, in the genuine working out of the same by the mystics, and in the full noon daylight of the theosophy of Behmen? Here, is the pure virgin shrine or wisdom's altar, at which the devotee of physical purification, or natural magus must worship, and forsake all other medii of divine approach. But to return.]

The subjects of the "Second Part" of the "Spirit of Love" are these following:—The Deity an infinite ocean of pure overflowing love and joy. All nature and creature brought forth to manifest and rejoice in this love and happiness. Nothing can be in God which is not infinite and eternal. What wrath is in itself. It can be no where but in nature, and that in a state of disorder. The origin of wrath and evil, the same. In man at the disunion of his twofold life, of God and nature. All man's salvation and good from the manifestation of the life of God in the soul. Perpetual inspiration essential to a life of goodness. The ground of salvation, the unspoken word or seed of the divine nature. This, the subject of all revealed dispensations. The earthly self to be resisted and renounced. Wrath ascribed to God, because the creature has changed its state in nature, therefore must experience God as manifest in nature. How wrath originates in nature though this a manifestation of the Deity. God and nature distinguished. Wrath kindled by the will of the creature, when it breaks or loses the union of the seven heavenly properties. The Deity a governing love and wisdom always seeking the restoration of lapsed nature and creature. The texts of Scripture confine the working of wrath to the powers of nature. Vengeance not allowed to man because that a working with fallen nature. Only to God who is supernatural; that is to the love of God, (to overcome it.)

SECOND DIALOGUE.—The atonement of the Divine wrath or justice, and the extinguishing of sin in the creature, only different expressions for one and the same thing. The analogy of Scripture teaches this. The atonement, the one work of regeneration, rightly understood. The sufferings and death of Christ, the gracious effects of Divine love and goodness. In what sense the justice or righteousness of God is satisfied thereby. Man's original righteousness, his law. No peace, till this be perfectly restored. God's being all love does not abate the force of the Scripture denunciations of eternal torments and punishments to those who live and die in sin. The popular doctrine of the vicarious suffering of Christ, erroneous; and opens a door either to superstition or to infidelity. "Christ's suffering and dying, nothing else but Christ conquering and overcoming all the false good and hellish evil of the fallen state of man. His resurrection and ascension into heaven, though great in themselves, and necessary parts of our deliverance, but the consequences and effects of his suffering and death—his entering into possession of what he had obtained by them." "No wrath in God, no fictitious atonement, no folly of debtor and creditor, no suffering for suffering sake; but a Christ suffering and dying, as the same victory over death and hell, as when he rose from the dead, and ascended into heaven." The necessity and efficacy of the sufferings and death of Christ, as that which gave him power to become a common father of life to all that died in Adam.

Only acceptable to the love of God on that account. How we, by virtue of Christ's complete process, have victory over all the evils of our fallen state, and shall rise to the glory of Christ—the heirs of God. The Bible to be studied in this simple, adorable light. The "THIRD PART."—The practical ground of the spirit of Love. The good and amiable of this natural life easily mistaken (by mere reasoners and transcendentalists) for the spirit of divine love in the soul. The danger of this delusion. The doctrine, and the spirit of Love itself, two very different things. How we are to acquire the spirit of love. The Scripture doctrine of election and reprobation, in its ground. The figures under which it is represented. Nothing elected but the seed of the New Man, or heavenly birth within us; all else reprobated to death. Two ways of induction into virtue and goodness. One by rules and precepts, the other by the spirit itself, born in the soul; the former must precede the latter. What Divine love is, and its effects within us. All that we are and have from Adam as fallen, must be given up, if the birth of divine love is to be brought forth in us. All our natural contrariety to divine love must be lost and swallowed up in it, as darkness in the light. This, the state of the first man, previous to the fall. Concerning darkness and light. The priority and glory of light. In itself invisible, and only known by possessing darkness or substantiality. Light immaterial, though materiality always with visible light. All light whether in heaven or earth only so much darkness illuminated. All nature and creature as such, darkness, and therefore can only work according to the powers of darkness. Nothing evil or tormenting but that which nature or self does. Self or nature, the three properties of desire thrown into a fourth of wrath, through the loss of their only (supernatural) good. No possible deliverance from self, but by the new birth of God in the soul. Desire, the ground of life, and all sensibility of life. How this manifest in outward nature, by attraction with its essential properties. The relations of the visible world and all its productions to the invisible, and hellish world. The way of abolishing all evil, or the art of dying to self. God must be and do all; the state of heart the perfect conviction of this truth induces. The results of a true practical conformity to this conviction, or the spirit of prayer. The 'marriage of the Lamb,' or birth of the spirit of love. The one simple way to attain it, as here shown, the one infallible way, because the will is the leader of the creaturely life. Christ having obtained an infinite power over the human nature, must sooner or later see all enemies under his feet—all subdued to LOVE.

In the completion of this work, behold at length, the comprehensive design of this illustrious sage; which was began after it had been discovered to his understanding how the doctrine of love is the fundamental tenet and ground of the whole process of Christ, and only ended by the complete demonstration of it, and the removal of every objection which could be made against it. This had not little

been made known in its philosophical ground, so, as to show that the eternal manifestation of God through nature, as a consuming fire, (which is the 'infinite wrath' or 'divine justice' of the theologians,) is not contradictory to it. This however was accomplished by the instrumentality of Mr. Law, who has the honour of having first reduced into a popular form, the elucidations of Behmen in Freher—as regards this particular subject; which consist in showing (1.) how the 'eternal opposition,' or rising of the inferior properties, which form the body or ground of the eternal (septenary) manifestation of God through nature, (and without which there could be no manifestation at all, inasmuch as there could be nothing, in which a reflection of the supernatural abyss could have place,) is 'eternally overcome,' by the influx and immixture of the light and love of the Deity; converting that, which might otherwise well be called a dark and fiery chaos, into a resplendent crystal ocean or "glassy sea" of divine powers, the fruitful mother of wonders, and perpetual source of ever-springing new forms and figures of life, to the praise of the riches of the divine wisdom and glory. And (2.) how these (three) lower fundamental properties, when severed, (N.B.) in the creature, from their original union with the fountain of all peace and gladness, and therefore of necessity experienced as mere wrath and anguish, are again subdued by the omnipotence of the love of God, when resistance ceases in the creaturely self-will, according to the free-agency of man, that is, by the full hearty practise of the Gospel requirements. This we say had never been done hitherto; much less had it been seen how that love was the overruling principle of the whole material and intellectual universe, and therefore the one bond of union between all philosophy and religion, which it manifestly is, in the above outline. Inasmuch that, we venture to say, taking the works of Behmen and Freher in conjunction with the popular application of them by Law, we have now a perfect system and framework of theology and philosophy, in which every one may learn how to find his true place, and move freely in the will of God, and thus work, according to his particular signature, towards the full manifestation of the wisdom and wonders of the Deity: whose spirit would then freely act through man, as his peculiar instrument and organism; and so would be attained the practical fulfilment of our Lord's prayer, 'Thy kingdom come; thy will be done, on earth as in heaven.' [All which, it is to be observed, is couched in, and would proceed according to, the divine declaration of Christ, given as a sure rule for all ages, 'Seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness (in its truth and fullness), and all other things shall be superadded.' And in which particular, to set nature right, and in a right order of working, it was, that Behmen composed his practical treatise of "The Way to Christ; of Repentance and Resignation." And in his tract of 'Divine Vision or Contemplation,' which we purpose shortly to present to the reader when we come to consider the philosophical regeneration of the medical art, we have a brief illustration of this divine, classic order of procedure, as respects the study of philosophy.]

The effects of this opening of the centre of nature, which it was the peculiar design of Mr. Law's 'Way to Divine Knowledge' as of Behmen's entire writings, (Resig. ii. 1—22. Four Compl. v. 136, 137.) to render of universal experience, (and as a beginning of the system, to put it into working order, we have proposed the establishment of a Theosophic College.) would be seen, for instance, were it general and duly appreciated, in a pure philosophy of medicine, whereby sickness would be gradually extirpated. In theology, the errors and delusions of which would appear in their native deformity, and "the truth" become alike apprehensible to all nations. In the magical or alchemical science of the occult forces, universal magnetism, &c., (a conversing even face to face with the spirit of nature, she being ever accessible and responsive to the graceful approach and summons of the true vestal); and thus throughout the whole range of natural philosophy, where nothing indeed might remain a secret, further than to exercise the human ingenium in its respective tastes and characteristics.

A partial glimpse of which is contained in the following extract, from a recent publication already mentioned:—(See "Suggestive Inquiry into the Hermetic Mystery," p. 262, 263, commencing "For the natural inbred chemist," &c., to "in effect and power.")

It is admitted that Behmen's philosophy, as it stands in his own writings, is apparently opposed to certain 'facts' which are generally assumed to have been established by "science." In geology, for example, it takes no cognizance of the submarine stratification of the earth, and the formation of gravel and sand from the detrition of rocks, but accounts for the existence of those vast deposits by the operation of other laws which form a part of his system. Thus it has no need of the vast cycles of time which are alleged to have elapsed since the first creation of this globe. And accordingly it is again at issue on this point, with alleged discoveries in ancient chronology by certain modern savans of Germany. In astronomy also, it admits of only one inhabitable earth, and apparently disallows the motion of the sun with its attendant planets through the starry heavens, (round a central sun, and that system again round another central sun, and so on, ad infin. et ad absurd.;) leaving it incumbent on 'scientific men' either to disprove its first principles, or regulate their own conjectures and discoveries by its pure, à priori light. Some other particulars might be mentioned in which the philosophy of Behmen will be found to differ from the current opinions of individuals, whose "science" is solely confined to the motions of body or matter, and the theories that have been founded upon such observations.—

We now resume our narrative. And first in consequence of its close affinity with the above, though we hereby anticipate the actual date of the letter, we shall insert an epistle from a student at Oxford, which was the occasion of the letter in the published collection, headed, "In Answer to a Scruple." The original is without a date, but as the reply of Mr. Law is under July 18th. 1757, we may presume it was written some short time previously:—

"Reverend Sir—I flatter myself you will be induced to give this short address a candid and impartial reading, when you are informed it comes, not only from one who is no enemy to you, but from one who thinks himself highly obliged to you; who confesses, that second to the grace of God, he owes his conversion from serving vanities to serve the living God, to your many excellent and christian writings.

"As I know to whom I write, I shall not offer any apologies for this trouble; nor shall I waste much paper in mentioning the many modern topics I might insist on, (such as want of genius, want of abilities, youth, for I am a youth of 19, of Oxford University), in excuse of the inelegant and even rustic simplicity, which will not, cannot, escape one of your exquisite taste and judgment in composition. The motive which first prevailed with me to write, will, this notwithstanding, prevail.

"In some late pieces of yours (I need not tell you which), you have among some other singular positions, asserted, that the idea of debtor and creditor, which divines had sometimes employed to illustrate the christian scheme, is not only unscriptural, but even chargeable with folly, saying 'in this view, there is no folly of debtor and creditor.' This sentence has, I confess, shocked me much; unbiassed as I am by system makers, it has made me tremble.

"What I suggest, is, that you would, at least for your own good if not for mine, peruse diligently the last part of St. Matthew's eighteenth chapter, and if you think this worthy your notice answer it, by showing that your assertion is, I do not say, consistent with, but not utterly contrary to that whole similitude or parable; in a letter, directed to A. B., at Harper's Coffee House, near Queen's College, Oxon.

"After assuring you that what I intend by this, is instruction in a point of all others the most material and important, I can boldly subscribe myself—Your obliged servant, and well-wisher in Christ.—A. B.

"P.S. As you are well acquainted with mankind in general, and our University in particular, you will not wonder I conceal my name. However should you think proper to answer this, I should in a subsequent letter, have no objections to writing it at length."

The answer as printed, contains an interpolation of three or four pages, which were certainly never in the original as sent to Mr. Law's correspondent. The fact is, Mr. Ward and Mr. Langcake, both resident in London, manufactured (so to speak) a few of these letters, from originals or copies which they had by them, cutting off certain portions from one letter and appending them to another, according to their own taste and judgment; finally, perhaps, procuring Mr. Law himself to touch up the parts which did not well dove-tail in each other; who also was willing to please them, and saw a little providential use in it, with regard to himself, to which we shall hereafter allude. The passages thus inserted in The Scruple letter extend from the paragraph commencing "Do not my Friend," to the one ending "supernatural God of love:" which interpolation, as we shall hereafter notice, was in refutation of objections made concerning his books, also the writings of Behmen, in the empty, silly letter of "Mr. Horne, of Oxford," afterwards the bishop, a MS. copy of which had been sent to him for perusal, from Ireland, shortly after its appearance; wherein the writer affirms that "God is justice and truth as well as love; and his offended justice cannot pardon sinners, till it has received an atonement, &c.," to which the interpolated remarks are especially directed; and thus also as respects Warburton.

To perceive the consistency of the letter as it originally stood, and the spirit of Mr. Law's mind at this period, as well as the elucidation of the point in this work just described, we would recommend to the candidate, here, to peruse the entire epistle, as if restored to its original state; and, indeed, it ought to form a note to the "Spirit of Love" in case of a republication of that treatise, instead of being placed among his Letters.—

We have more than once alluded to the extensive correspondence of Mr. Law, chiefly with such as sought his advice on account of his reputation as a casuistical Divine, possessed of extraordinary light, and solidity of judgment. Though, we may here remark, he was far from encouraging the recourse which his admirers thus had to him, as a sort of confessor; rather, enjoining them to have done with him as soon as they were convinced of the truths set forth in his writings, and to resign themselves wholly to God, in the spirit of prayer. Letters of this kind, from individuals, both learned and unlearned, and of various ranks of life, had accumulated while he was engaged in writing the preceding work, so that at last when his hands were at liberty, as he informs Mr. Langcake, 'he hardly knew what to begin first.' Amongst others which had laid over unanswered during this period, was one from the Countess of Huntingdon, a devoutly-disposed woman, who had given herself up to the zealous propagation of certain peculiar, or what she considered, "evangelical" views of the Gospel; and who, being a person of wealth and rank, had necessarily become a kind of general or tutelar patroness of that class, whose doctrines had captivated her taste, and awakened her zeal for the promulgation of them. We allude to the so termed doctrines of 'Calvinism,' which, by using the words "free grace," "predestination," "divine sovereignty," "the elect," "Jacob have I loved, but Esau have I hated," and other corresponding terms and ideas made up from isolated passages of St. Paul's Epistles (according to our English rendering), and so chiming in with the sound of scripture truth, had a very taking effect, particularly as they appeared to be highly honouring of "sovereign grace," and correspondingly abusive of "vile, wretched, sinful man." And such is the mystery of the divine benignity, and overruling wisdom, in respect to the ignorance and perverseness of human nature, that many souls have been turned seriously and lastingly to religion, by hearing such doctrines preached, and receiving a lively impression from them.

This little circle was only one among the numerous bands of enthusiastic, pious souls, at the head of whom were several devout clergymen, who spread themselves over the country with all the earnestness and zeal, in God's service, of recruiting parties; and amongst whom the mystical writings of Mr. Law made a great commotion, (not indeed, unlike that of a blue pill in the bowels of a very disordered constipated.) Of course they were unable to understand Mr. Law's philosophy, but obtained a glimpse here and there of what seemed contrary to the popular views, or their interpretations of Scripture, and which, thereupon, according to the common practice, assuming the office and capacity of judges, they solemnly condemned. It was not so easy however, to overthrow Mr. Law's theology by argument; and accordingly, when Lady Huntingdon inquired of some of them, their opinions about his writings, especially of his exhibition of the real scripture doctrine of the atonement, their only refutation of it was by a dogmatic affirmative of their own crude conceptions of it, with scripture quotations to support them; and when pressed by her more closely, they retreated into the not uncommon shelter, of the subject being 'too awful for investigation.' As an illustration of this peculiar art of fence, and the ease with which Mr. Law baffled it, the reader may consult the letter of the published collection, commencing "The passage in the letter from a pious and very excellent clergyman," and ending with "trinity of love." We may just remark, that the correspondence, sought by Lady Huntingdon, as stated above, was continued by her at various intervals over several years.

We have not denied that sincere piety and true devotion to God might exist under the pitiable views (called the "first reformer's refreshing views of Christ" by the author of the "Christian Student," and "blessed soul-saving doctrines" by others—) of those who, like Lady Huntingdon herself, were taken with christianity, and had entered zealously into it from the captivating and plausible representations alluded to, of "unconditional election," "free grace," and the "imputation of Christ's righteousness to the sinner." It is quite natural for piously disposed, but un-erudite, untutored persons to fall suddenly under the delusion of such doctrines, when they are earnestly preached up before them, since enthusiasm in its very nature, is epidemic. But such would do well to consider the remarks, commencing with "You tell me, my friend," to "these doctors" in the letter of Mr. Law's published "Collection," addressed "To a Clergyman of Bucks," as well as various other portions of these letters relating to the same subject.

We may be permitted to express our hope that the foregoing letters and observations, and the researches to which they are calculated to lead the reader, will at length abolish the fallacy concerning an outward atonement or sacrifice as commonly understood, and lead to a view of the divine procedure and atonement of Christ in that infinitely more ravishing light which springs from the central and cardinal doctrine of all, that God is Love. This view preserves all that is really touching and affecting in the former, and adds to it the overwhelming evidence and truth of a self-evident proposition. For, if God is love, then he can have no purpose towards man—his original son and heir—but what is essentially love-full; and all that he has done can be with no other object in view than that of enabling man to avoid the wrath of nature, and capacitating him to receive that indwelling of himself, for which he created him, and from which alone can be derived any degree of felicity, wisdom, and perfection.—

A special subject which occupied Mr. Law's attention this year (1754), after completing the "Spirit of Love," was the final settlement of the foundation of the schools and almshouses at King's-Cliffe, before referred to. At this juncture, it would appear, the Master of the Boys' School was taken ill, with no hope of recovery, in consequence of which some inquiry had been instituted for a proper successor, and an application received from a candidate in London. These circumstances were the occasion of the following two letters to Mr. Langcake:—

Feb. 9th. 1754.—My dear Langcake—I thank you heartily for your twin letters. Had they been as many more, they had been very welcome to me. For I love to hear you talk.

The reason of the inclosed letter is this. We have two Charity Schools in this town, one for the full cloathing and education of girls, and the other of boys. There is likely to be wanted in a short time a Master for the Boys'.

The writer of the inclosed letter I know no more of than his letter tells me; nor have I answered it. If you would be so good as to go to the school in Westminster, where, he says, he was, and form some sort of discourse with him, as asking if he did not write to me, or receive an answer to it, or whatever you please, only to see his manner, &c., I should be much obliged to you. He may, for aught I yet know of him, be very proper or improper, to be the master of the school.—I want to have a young man that is an awakened Christian. I need describe him no farther to you.

There is a library of books of piety given to the school, which are to be lent out by the master to all the neighbouring parishes. There is a very handsome house for the master, free from all charges of every kind. A salary of twenty pounds for the master, and thirty shillings yearly to buy firewood. It is a pretty situation for any one, who is the awakened Christian that I want.

If this person should have left that place, pray enquire after him, and if in London, find him out. If he should not appear to be the man we want, I desire you would see amongst your acquaintance, if you can find one. * * * I kiss you with the lips of my heart. W. LAW."

"King's-Cliffe, March 2nd. 1754.—My dear friend—I am sorry to put you to the expense of this letter, which is only to inform you that I have received your last, giving a farther account of Mr. Holyday, over a dish of tea.

The master of the school is dead and buried. And upon consideration of your true, and just, and well-meaning character of Mr. Holyday, I have made choice of a young man in the neighbourhood for the school. I heartily thank you for the trouble you have taken in this matter, which I gave you on the supposition that you or your friends might know of some young sprout of piety who would have rejoiced at the offer of it.

May the God of love and mercy and goodness in Christ Jesus, bring forth the everlasting birth of heaven in your soul. W. LAW."

To this year of Mr. Law's life properly belongs a notice of the improvement of medicine in the present day, through the discoveries of Hahnemann, originally suggested and worked out, like the Newtonian philosophy, from the principles of Jacob Behmen. That Mr. Law foresaw this refinement of the healing art at no distant period, in fact its elevation to the standard of the universal philosophy, and its future practice, with all the certainty of the exact sciences, is only a fair inference from certain expressions in the letters we are about to quote, as likewise from what he states concerning the nature of wrath (and body), in the Second Part of the "Spirit of Love;" and especially when we consider the ground he had for making such observations, in the actual philosophy of medicine formally opened by Behmen (in his "Signatura Rerum," "Divine Vision or Contemplation," "Mysterium Magnum," and other of his writings, with the elucidations thereof by Freher (see p. 322, §. xxiv., and elsewhere in his works). The passage in the first letter, to which we are about to call attention, is indeed of much wider application than any one science or art would allow it to have; pointing to the gradual perfection, not of the moral and spiritual nature alone, but also of human society, and of all branches whatsoever of the arts and sciences of life, as a consequence of the renovating and remedial influence of the "last dispensation," and its irresistible procedure. In the case of medicine in particular, its action and wonderful efficacy will eventually arise from a twofold ground: first, as we shall very briefly show after inserting the letters, from an opening out of the true philosophy of the sickness and cure of the mortal life, according to the exact order of nature: and secondly, by promoting such a renovation of soul, and educing such a regenerate power in the subject, that, like St. Paul, who shook the viper from his hand, he shall be able to repel and keep at a sufficient distance from the seat of life, the whole power of Satan and the dark world, by the divine virtue of the all predominant light principle in him. This is the true ground and meaning of our Saviour's words, concerning the 'supernatural' power which should be exercised by his illuminated followers. It is the true alchemical science, into which the modern seekers have neither found an entrance, nor rightly conceived the standard form in which it is to be found. And it suggests the remark that unless our modern magnetic operators ascend out of the phantasmic rational astrum of the third principle, into the second principle of divine intellectual light, they can never excel their present juggling and charlatan play to surprise the crowd. But not to open untimely the rule and process of the magia, we pass on, merely again remarking, that the exalted practice of medicine to which we now allude, ought to accompany our theosophic missionaries to the East, enabling them as godly searchers of the art, to perform 'miraculous' cures of truly vouched apostles of Jesus Christ.

The first of the letters to which we have now to direct attention is that of the published "Collection,"—dated Feb. 9th. 1754; and the passage in question is the following:—

"God's last dispensation to the world is the opening the ground and mystery of all things, to which every blindness, and vanity, and strife of human life must, sooner or later, be forced to give up itself.—The children of this dispensation have no occasion to look backwards. It is like learning your A B C when you are called, and qualified to read. * * *

The second letter to the first paragraph of which we call the reader's particular attention in connection with the subject under notice, is dated Oct. 10th, 1756, and is consequently presented out of time; but for this, its connection with the subject must be a sufficient excuse:—

"My dear friend,—I was much concerned at the account you sent me of the state of your health, and think it very advisable to seek out for help. But there is the difficulty, where to find it. All is so very superficial in the art of physic, and from so poor a ground, that one has little to like in one physician more than in another, but his personal tempers and behaviour. Air and gentle exercise much pursued must be greatly beneficial to you. If your physician be for your purpose, he will not load you with shop-medicines, nor ought you to submit to any one that does. Nothing can assist you but some simple regimen, that gradually lessens the hectic in your blood.

My dear brother-pilgrim, be of good comfort; our road of life is such, that weakness can help us on as fast as strength. Use outward medicines as if you used them not. The universal is within you, and whether you find it in a sickly or a healthy body, is but a small matter.

Daily, hourly [earnest prayer, and] thankful resignation to God in everything, is the best regimen you can enter into, both for soul and body. Every good wish attends my dear fellow-traveller out of time into eternity."

Doubtless, if Mr. Law had had time and opportunity, he would have followed the example of Behmen, and suggested to the practising physicians of his day, the mode of searching into the philosophy of disease and its remedies, in order that an art of such immediate and unremitting importance might no longer stand on "so poor a ground;" depending exclusively on à posteriori data, only ascertainable at the expense of much suffering and danger to the subjects, and withal so blindfold and uncertain. Not, indeed, that we would undervalue experimental science in any department whatever, but it must always have a tendency to lower the understanding, and shut up the eye in its own narrow tenement, in proportion as it is separated from à priori philosophy. Hence, Liebig's "Animal Chemistry," Oken's "Magnetism," &c., are only so many advertisements and aids of materialism, and some of the most confirmed sceptics are men eminent in "science." As a general illustration, however, of what we mean by a pure philosophy of medicine we give the following outline:—

Premises. (1.) There is a double virtue or two-fold power of good and evil, in all earthly things, (as indicated, Gen. ii. 17). (2.) All disease or sickness is the hunger, irritation, or fierce undue action of some one of the seven properties of nature.—Hence we conclude

Of man in health, that the powers of nature are in due proportion or equilibrio, in the human body. There is no excess, no morbid excitement; no organ is too much stimulated, or too active or too inactive, but heat and cold, or centripetal and centrifugal action balance each other, and the circulation is equable.

Of man in sickness, that there is excessive action of one of the seven properties, the ailment being an over eager stimulus, or hunger or desire. This abnormal action may be centripetal or centrifugal.

Of medicine (whether vegetable or metalline), that it contains both the two actions, and the seven powers, but unequally.

Of the cure, that it arises from the hunger (or the life in the blood) taking the power (or powers) in the administered medicine which will allay or strengthen, and satisfy it, so that it finds in that property what it wants. [Hence the greatest science and experience is not only required in the medicus, but in the artist in the preparation of the medicine, to purify it from its wrathful properties and body of death, so as to leave pure quint-essential tincture and vitality, and then to incorporate this in a pure vessel, so, as to cause the respective properties to predominate each in the exact degree and order, that is needful.

Of the influence of medicine on health, that the very property which cures or harmonises, would disturb the equilibrium, and so inversely create a disease of that kind.

Thus the good and the evil combined in nature, constitute medicines; and where there is disease which is evil, the good will be taken to satisfy it. But if nature is in equilibrium, or good, composé sept ans après l'Aurore naissante, est bien moins informé; et l'on peut le regarder comme un tableau complet de la doctrine et de l'auteur, sauf les éclaircissements et les nouvelles explica-

the evil will be taken, and constitute a temporary disease. For the seventh property or body of nature, of the circulation of the life, is in a placid state as long as the six properties work harmoniously together in it, but it becomes disordered in proportion as that harmony is disturbed, and thus perishes; as we see on a small scale in many diseases which form scab, and in the nature of evils and sores.—And this by the way, is the ground of vaccination, of the septenary body, with the virulent affection of certain properties from another body. Which being such an original and prima-facie irrational theory and discovery, we should very much like to see the list of the library of Dr. Jenner, the reputed discoverer of this wonderful means of protection from that predominant mortiferous affection. We should like to see whether there were any little square volumes in it published between 1640 and 1665.—We would also just submit, en-passant, concerning any radical and universal morbid action, that there is a corresponding inoculation, which is medicine to it in fact, though it may produce another disease that would require to be cured by the proper effectual transmutation. [The present operation of medicine is necessarily according to these principles, but there is so much extraneous and gross impurity along with the living tincturous properties in it, and so little enlightened understanding of the ground, and working of the degrees of nature, in the practitioners, not excepting the homœopaths, that the practise of it is little better than chance-work; not carried on with a sublime apprehension of the nature of the disease, and the remedies it requires, and at once adjusting the same in number weight and measure, to the needs of the case, but as we say, proceeding by blindfold, partial experience.] The above hints as to Jenner's discovery apply also to the circulation of the blood (or the life in the blood,) alleged to have been discovered by Harvey. Also to the pretensions of physiognomy, phrenology, &c., &c. [Annot.—Hydropathy, when scientifically practised, is perhaps the most efficacious popular art of physical purification, yet discovered. It is founded on the basis of the heat and cold of the life, or centripetal and centrifugal action; and its operation consists in promoting a free efflux of the vital fire through all the tissues of the human body, from the centre to the circumference, or exiti of the pores of the skin. But long continued regular, physical exercise, as walking, has a sublimating effect, the vital fire (of course duly supplied with fuel, of a pure nature,) being thereby rendered so brisk and free, as to consume all impurity of grossness in the blood, and generating pure fleshly materiality; rendering indeed the body almost a transparent organism: as manifest in the individual who, it was reported, walked last year (1850) a thousand miles in a thousand consecutive hours.]

If we had to dwell on particulars of this nature, we might show by a number of instances the philosophy of the generation of living materiality, by the various workings of the seven properties, both in the subject, and in outward nature, and thus describe the boundaries of the à posteriori as well as the à priori philosophy. In this case we might draw an illustration from a theosophical correction and orderly enlargement of Swedenborg's theory of the manner in which he says the "soul generates the body."

For Swedenborg is entitled to high and every respect as a philosophical genius and a scholar, up to the year 1744, or the period alluded to in the following extract, from a publication "on the writings of Swedenborg" dated Wakefield, 1782, by Wesley. (See also Pike's "Swedenborgianism depicted" Derby, 1820, and "Inquiry respecting Swedenborg," Manchester, 1794:—)

"Many years ago the Baron came over to England, and lodged at one Mr. Brockmer's; who informed me, and the same information was given me by Mr. Mathesius, a very serious clergyman, (both of whom were alive when I left London, and I suppose, are so still,) that while he was at his house he had a violent fever; in the height of which, being delirious, he broke from Mr. Brockmer, ran into the street naked, proclaimed himself the Messiah, and rolled himself in the mire * * * From this time we are undoubtedly, to date that peculiar species of insanity which attended him with scarce any intermission, to the day of his death."

In this latter opinion the writer hereof quite concurs, and this after reading and hearing all that his recent and most complete, and ingenious biographer could advance, in daily private conferences, during several months; who admitted that, since he had become acquainted with the ground and philosophy of Behmen, Freher, and Law (through the writer), that he, Behmen, was the great original light which he had for years past been looking out for, and which he had [in his invented scheme, or "Biographical Sketch, Rich, London, 1849,"] rendered Swedenborg the personification of. But on this point we propose to enlarge when we come to consider Mr. Law's allusion to the "Arcana Celestia." The reader who has perused the "Biographical Sketch" will, doubtless, by this time be prepared to smile at the relative position which Mr. Law is made to occupy in that work, by the at-the-time uninformed conception of the author, as well as at the gross absurdity of the assertion, that Law was supposed to be the author of the Arcana Celestia!! with numerous other equally romantic statements. To come to the point, Swedenborg in his researches up to the period we have named, as an ingenious and learned philosopher, had explored, as it were, backwards to the very borders of physical nature; and wanting to understand what was beyond, on the à priori side, and thence the dwelling-place of God, but having no acquaintance with the ground and truth of gospel regeneration, which is the only gate of entrance to it, he was brought to a dead stand still. What did he now in this dilemma? (supposing his recovery from his affliction.) Why, by a bound of pure imagination, he leaped over the wall (his biographer described his procedure to the writer, "like a man in a balloon descending in the midst of China and forthwith commencing noting a description of the country and inhabitants, wherefore he had no need to give his ground, and produce his divine credentials"!!) and so solemnly resumed his 'researches'; writing concerning the spiritual world according to his knowledge of the material, with which he makes it perfectly analogous, as he could do no otherwise. But, knowing nothing concerning the true origin and history of the latter, and its present degraded state, so his accounts of the spiritual world are more revolting to sober natural sense and Christian understandings, and withal more sinking, than even the descriptions of it by Mahomet.

His writings therefore, from the above period (embracing in part his work "On the Worship and Love of God") are to be considered the effusions of pure imagination and a distempered brain, tions que présentent les ouvrages suivants, quoiqu'ils ne forment encore qu'une portion de ses Œuvres; mais elle est suffisante pour en donner idée; et l'œuvre entière ne satisferait pas ceux having no affinity or rapport whatsoever with the divine life of spiritual nature. Hence it is when devout and enlightened persons take up his writings expecting some divine chord in their souls to be touched by its fellow harmony in the speaker, they are compelled to lay his books down in disappointment, as experiencing not the least spark or sound of spiritual vitality and response, but all to be cold, moonlike death; just as might be naturally expected from the ratiocinations of an amiable and accomplished Hanwell lunatic—every where indeed indications of “a fine genius, majestic, though in ruins,” but no holy spirit or divine life. The writer has not only told his admiring, imaginative biographer, but proved it to him in every instance which he adduced to the contrary, that as respects theology, the Baron's writings were no more wanted, and of no more use to the world, than “a fifth wheel to a waggon,” being entirely superfluous, even in those portions where he runs upon a vein of truth; and that after the publication of this present work, they with the delusions they had occasioned, would only form one of a century's wonder-bubbles. And, whilst laughing honestly and heartily with the company present, at the absurdities of some of the Baron's theological works, (e.g. of that most evangelical treatise above-named, yet suggesting, in excuse, that it might be of the nature of a poem,”) he, his biographer candidly admitted that, seeing the mystery of nature as he now did, under the light of Behmen and Law, if he were to write the “Sketch” over again, he should do it very differently. Nay further, that if Behmen's ground and account of the origin of things were true, then the whole of the Baron's theology, as a system, was one mass of delusion. Let those of the Baron's disciples, therefore, who love truth, desire truth, see to themselves: if Behmen's ground and principles, and manifestation of the birth and order of things, in eternity and time, be true (and is not every kindled, burning piece of coal in this world a demonstration of the fall of angels and eternal nature?) then the Baron's theological writings are a mass of delusion and falsehood. There is no doubt that his writings have been the instrument of good to some inexperienced and well-disposed minds, but they would have received much greater benefit from the study of established orthodox writers on mystical and practical christianity, and supersensual truth. But to return to the main subject.

Suffice it to repeat that the radical regeneration of medicine, comes under the same laws of nature, as every other science, and results as naturally from the universal philosophy of Behmen, as the discoveries in planetary motion, and electricity, to which we have before alluded. It was always present to the mind of Mr. Law therefore, as one of those great developments, or rather settled legal regulations of science and art, which would as certainly take place as the rising of the morrow's sun, and only awaited the coming of the practical man to accomplish it. This event partially occurred in the course of some half-century, as we have already intimated, the instrument being Hahnemann, whose grand formula Similia Similibus Curantur is the exact reflection and translation of the expressions used by Behmen, when speaking of medicine in his “Signatura Rerum,” and so well understood in their ground and philosophical application by Mr. Law.

We take the opportunity of again remarking upon the ignoble spirit which has distinguished certain men, in their discoveries; who having derived the actual ground and elements and principles of their (so called) discoveries from Behmen and Law &c., have always studiously concealed the source—some, we will charitably suppose from the ‘fear of man,’ but we are almost compelled to think for the most part, from a desire of self-aggrandisement, in money and honors. We have before mentioned how Behmen is the entire origin and basis of all Sir Isaac Newton's honor as an original philosopher, for his mechanical or mathematical talents form not the ground of the repute he has acquired in the world. And we may add, that the very ambiguous manner in which he has treated the vortical theory, so as to be equally claimed as an authority by both parties, is fully accounted for by his obligations to Behmen, as he could scarcely have delivered a definite doctrine on the subject, without the origin of the whole matter becoming quite apparent. As to Hahnemann and others mentioned above, we have said sufficient without reverting to the honors and the property which poor Behmen has been the means of bestowing upon them. Nor shall we at present mention some whom we have in our eye, hoping that they will see it becoming the noble philosophy they study, to do all they can to make the original and universal panacea, known.

It was our intention in this place to introduce to the reader for his edification, the tract “Of Divine Vision or Contemplation,” and afterwards selections from the “Signatura Rerum,” but we find we must content ourselves with merely a reference to those works, in order not to extend the present sketch to an undue length. For the same reason we must defer to the proposed larger, philosophic Biography, the specification of the theosophic, physiognomic and peculiar chemic or medico-botanic science requisite, in addition to the ordinary scholastic, medical and chemical knowledge and experience, for the noble and natural practise of the art of medicine. The life and the human constitution (as nature) is but as a great problem of spherical or circulating geometry, which requires a clever mathematician theosopher to understand, to detect its fallacies, and to rectify its errors.—The passages we had offered for special consideration from the “Signatura Rerum,” are these: chaps. vii. 68, 72—75; viii. entire; ix. 1—10, 28—30, 45—49, 63—72; x. 8—11, 20, 50—52, 73, 78—80; xii. 9—18, 26, 29—31, 36, 37; xiii. 1—7, 29—53; xiv. 1—16, 65—74.—We also purposed giving herewith diagrams showing the primary, essential properties and forms of the revelation of the point, in nature, or septenary, circulating efflux of life, not only in regard to their absolute reality, but as vitally, spiritually, quality-nessly considered; first in their entirety, secondly in their mode of union and birth, and thirdly in their respective individualness; but this we also defer.

[P.S. Since the above remarks were penned, we have seen for the first time, (being lent to us) Hahnemann's “Organon,” and we would here, recommend the perusal of that treatise, as an elucidation, and somewhat copious development of our philosophy, pp. 556, 7. Indeed, what we have there offered, is, we consider, essential to a just apprehension of the practical theory he therein largely, but not completely, nor yet logically lays down. Nor has he a right to hope to make converts of the allopathist practitioners, nor to complain of failure, by such an unsatisfying mode of attempting to prove his case—by mere references to presumed or asserted sources of the cure, when the true power of demonstration and conviction is at his command. Let him give the ground and reasons that influenced himself, and if they are undeniable, then the same results may be expected in others. But—may we not reflect upon him, as we remarked above concerning Newton, that, if he really understood the ground of Behmen, and the science of the working powers of nature, (of which the writer is somewhat doubtful, more especially, according to the pure, standard developments of Freher and Law,) that then, to have laid open the prime principles of the philosophy of medicine, would have been at once to expose the source of his pretensions. Nay, from the hesitating character of his diction in the “Organon,” and the purely artificial phraseology and terms he therein employs, &c., the writer is inclined to conclude, that he was not profoundly versed in the philosophy of Behmen, but had only obtained a kind of abstract knowledge of his great fundamental truths, as propounded in the “Signatura Rerum,” and with which he worked-out the extent of his piece-meal scheme. Had he had the advantages of the English mind and researches, as exhibited in the present treatise, it is possible that his “Organon” might have partook more of the character of Newton’s “Principia”—with respect to the microcosmos. However, we are approaching the grand consummation. Let the reader of this work here stand a moment, and reflect, whether we be not on the point of this glorious, full and orderly, revelation!—even of the sublime practice of the art, from the centre, by the magical key, one of the powers of which Hahnemann just, as it were, unconsciously glances at in his treatise. For it is a question, whether Christianity had been experimented, and the necessary facts been accumulated in his day as since, at least to his knowledge; so that he was probably as unconscious of the actual nature of the high powers of faith, though named in almost every page of Behmen, as he complains the sceptic Allopathists are, of the theory and results of homœopathic remedies.

We have Euclid and Newton’s “Principia” of mathematics and mechanical philosophy. Hahnemann’s work, regulated by high practical experience in the several various prevailing modes of cure, should have formed a “Principia” of medicine, or of the qualities of nature, whether in harmony or disorder in the body. And this work may serve (for the present), as a “Principia” of the spiritual nature, of theology experimental and theoretic, embracing a “Principia” of electricity, natural as well as divine,—awaiting the grand “Principia” of the Universal Scale of Wisdom and Life, illustrated with the needful diagrams and symbols, descending from the central throne of nature, down to the lowest scales of her forms. The editor of this book merely proposes by it, to give a general design or working drawing thereof, which must exist before the work be effected; though in the present instance, the design is not to be considered a mere artificial invention of the imagination, but as a glance at, or index of, natural wisdom and forthcoming events, even inductive of the second coming of the Lord, who, when the work be complete, “will descend and crown his bride,” just, indeed, as Adam the first crowned the previous six day’s creation.

If we can, by the Divine aid, succeed in our project of the establishment of a Theosophic College, to our mind, which at first may contain not more than six or seven students, who, in addition to obtaining a thorough knowledge of the science glanced at throughout this book, by study of the proper authors, and the actual cultivation of the Divine life, wisdom and powers, (latent in man, as redeemed,) even to their highest perfection of development; then, may we hope to have, not only the restoration of the true original philosophy of the Ancients, as couched in their writings, and referred to by the classic composer Lord Monboddo, in the Preface to the Third Volume of his “Ancient Metaphysics,” (which entire work by the way, should only be read by the candidate, if he will be able to judge soundly respecting its contents, after having perused “Law’s Letter on Warburton,” 1757;—) but, we say, a much more sublime system of Philosophy, (even than that of the Egyptian colleges where Moses received his wisdom,) because an universal one, connecting by one unbroken chain, the supernatural abyssal UNITY with Nature, and down to the most outward degree of the scale of being, moral and physical,—in a word, the orderly manifestation of the whole “mystery of Christ,” of “God and the Father, and Christ”—the image, form, and house of the ineffable, triune life and wisdom of Deity—the heir, and prince, and root, and key of all things—for whom and by whom, all the outward platform of nature and creature was made. May the Lord infuse into the heart of some ‘rich’ reader of this treatise, so great a power of his love, and kindle therein so intense and affecting a desire to proclaim the Divine glory, by the promotion of the reign of heavenly Wisdom, as shall lead to the cheerful tendering of the needful pecuniary means for the establishment of such a Scheme—in the purchase of an ancient house and grounds, surrounded by walls, contiguous and convenient to the metropolis, and endowing the foundation with the needful support; amongst other provisions, for the maintenance of two clerk-reporters, to minute down exactly the stated daily conversations of the brethren, for periodical publication, &c. For surely a more glorious, philanthropic and sublime christian work—one more conducive to the happiness of the world, and the elevation of the human intellect, might not be accomplished. We have herein indicated the sources of a far more perfect Philosophy than was ever enjoyed by the Ancients or Schoolmen.]

We now return to the course of our narrative, by inserting the following letter from Mr. Law’s correspondence at the close of this year. It was addressed to Mr. George Ward, Hackney-road, the friend to whom we have already alluded:—

“Nov. 25th. 1754.—My dear and much esteemed friend—Whom I heartily love and embrace as a living member of the body of Christ. Your kind and obliging letter was very acceptable to me; and your concern about parting with my letter to Mr. Langcake, &c., was quite needless. I like everything that my Langcake does, and have no corner of my heart that I would conceal from him.

The charge of Spinozism begun by Mr. Warburton, has all the folly and weakness (to say no worse), that can be imagined. For though many learned men have sufficiently shown the grossness and Atheism of it, yet it never has had, nor can have, a fundamental overthrow, or shown to be impossible to have any truth in it, but upon the principles on which I proceed. God and Nature were never distinguished, or the true ground of such distinction known, till the mystery was opened in J. Behmen. But of this I have sufficiently spoken elsewhere.

I wonder at nothing that I hear of Mr. W. with regard to the principles of my books. The pope and he have the same reasons for not admitting or espousing the mystery revealed by God in J. B. But all pretences and endeavours to hinder the opening of this mystery revealed, and its bearing down all before it, will be as vain, as so many attempts to prevent or retard the coming of the last day.—I am, your most affectionate friend and servant, W. LAW."

The reader will have noticed remarks similar to these on Spinozism in the published "Collection of Letters." In fact they are in that portion of the Scruple Letter, which we rejected for the reasons there stated. However judicious or useful such alterations may have been considered at the time, the reader will probably agree with us that the originals fresh from Mr. Law's mind are preferable for many reasons, and certainly they are never unworthy of his high character and genius. [From the high estimation in which Mr. Law was held as a spiritual director, it may be presumed that his correspondence was extensive, though but little of it appears to be now in existence. Should the reader be in possession of any of his epistolary remains, or know where any may be preserved, an intimation thereof to the address mentioned at the foot of p. 51, will be esteemed a favour.]

About this time, and before the publication of the letter was thought of, we find the same Mr. Ward interesting himself for the re-publication of Mr. Law's "Case of Reason:" which originally appeared in 1732, in reply to Tindal. This we learn from the last of the two following Letters; which we insert without further remark. For though Mr. Wesley is alluded to in the first, the letter which that gentleman shortly afterwards addressed to Mr. Law will bring him fairly under review in our notices of the year 1756:—

"May 14th. 1755.—My dear Langcake—I have two letters to thank you for.—Your strictures upon Messrs. W. are very just. These gentlemen have no bottom to stand upon, but zeal. I say no more about them.

I would advise you not to enter into dispute with Dr. Middleton, or any one else, in defence of our principles. No one begins to object against them, but on the account of something that is personal, either with regard to himself or the author of them.

Hethat could look at these things as they are in themselves, without the least respect either to himself or me, would want no one to persuade him of the truth of them.—It is not a want of argument or demonstration, but the want of this purity of heart, that keeps up all religious disputes.

Mrs. Hutcheson and Mrs. Gibbon are in town for a few days. They are almost as well acquainted with you as I am. You often make a fourth person in our company, and they will be very glad to see you. Mrs. Hutcheson is at Mr. Campbell's, in King-street, by Grosvenor-square. You may be assured I should not put you upon this errand, but that I know you will have thanks of them both for it. And it will add to the pleasure of seeing them again, if they bring me news of—my affectionately esteemed, dear Langcake. Adieu. W. LAW."

We may remark here that Mr. Law was now well advanced in years, and that his occupation during the intervals which occurs between our notices of his active and more public life, must have settled down accordingly into the more meditative routine so befitting old age, though the earnestness and vivacity of his spirit ~~was~~ never quenched. It was with him, indeed, as with the autumnal season of the year, when the noblest fruits of our temperate clime become fully ripe. Or as with the oak, when it towers in majestic strength after a growth of ages, and only becomes more firmly rooted by the lapse of time. The masculine vigour of his classical understanding and high wisdom, as we have already remarked, not only remained unimpaired even to the last hour of his life, but increased in strength and brightness; and we can hardly conceive a more suitable illustration of this and a more befitting termination of such a life, than his "Address to the Clergy," of which we shall shortly have to speak.

The second letter is as follows:—"Sept 10th. 1755.—My dear Langcake—You have this only because it will cost you nothing. But I have a pleasure in writing it because it is to you; and you can have no pleasure in reading it, unless because it comes from me.

Mr. Ward has prevailed upon me to reprint The Case of Reason. I have revised and corrected it, and have sent it by my nephew to Mr. Ward to be printed, provided he will take the trouble of correcting the press; as it comes out upon his desire.

Mrs. Hutcheson thanks you for the little book of Behmen. She joins with Mrs. Gibbon in their hearty respects to you. I am, with much truth, your most affectionate friend and servant, W. LAW."

Accordingly, we find that the "Case of Reason" was published in a "second edition, revised and corrected," in 1755. In which a few of the references to the leading publications and authorities that were in note twenty years before were omitted. The work was now put forth also as a complete and independent treatise, whereas the former edition had on the title page Part the First, the author having manifestly intended to enter upon the subject more universally. But either the altered complexion of the times or the circumstances of his own life delayed the completion of that intention, and it was never again publicly resumed; though the writer of these lines, on looking over Mr. Law's MSS. finds some hundred pages of what appears to be a continuation of the work. This pamphlet, it should be remembered, was only an argumentation written in the most perfect manner, according to the purest scholastic science of all ages; but—as Mr. Law himself observes (in the letter of Sept. 8th. 1754), "nothing of this kind touches the Deist." Whatever it was therefore which at first delayed the appearance of the Second Part, it was ultimately put aside, in consequence of the author's acquaintance with Behmen, (as we may indeed infer from the second paragraph of the letter we have just given under date of Nov. 25th. 1754) which enabled him to do effectually, and on the philosophical principles of revealed nature, what he had formerly proposed by the "Case of Reason." This work, however, as we have before said, has its own intrinsic and peculiar merits. The class of unbelievers to whom it more particularly applies, may be seen by a reference to Tindal's book, which it professed to answer; and it is equally applicable to the attenuated and feeble modern forms of the ancient classic infidelity. Indeed, unbelief has the same vie propre et interne, et la vie divine, où l'âme entre par une nouvelle naissance, et pénètre dans l'esprit du Christ.—4°. Quarante questions sur l'âme, etc., suivies des Six points et des Neuf textes, origin now, as it had a few generations ago, or in the days of our Lord, springing from the opposition of the rational, natural man to the dictates of pure truth, which require a blind, implicit faith and obedience, yea the total sacrifice of self, to realize the power of the Gospel. The Unitarians, for example, who worship reason as their God and guide, are sustained by it in their reliance on simple abstract morality, and have no regard for the earnest devotion and self-denial enjoined by the Gospel, (that is, for the true, natural mode of actually attaining to moral purity and perfection;) and some of them on the same principle, only admitting the divinity of Jesus Christ so far as man himself is of a divine nature. This heretical notion is of course confuted, with every other phantasy of the mere rationalist, in its very principle and beginning, by Mr. Law's work: to which we would add the Sacrament Book, as having the same direct tendency. And though we have spoken well of the latter on former occasions, we would take this opportunity of again recommending it to the sober, simple Christian, as well as the scholastic theologian, as a most edifying theological treat.

One of the passages left out in this Second Edition of the "Case of Reason," contained a respectful allusion to Bishop P. Browne, which induced the writer (as it had probably done Wesley, who became an admirer of his genius,) to make inquiry about his works. And the high gratification that he—a reader of orthodox devotional writings, and of the biographies of the mystical and spiritual devotees of former ages, no less than of the highest spiritual experimentalists of recent times—derived from the perusal of this prelate's Sermons, induces him to make special allusion here to him as a highly-accomplished, evangelical theologian. [Dr. J. Ellis, it would appear, was a close student of this learned metaphysician and divine.]—

At the beginning of the year 1756, "A Letter to the Reverend Mr. Law, occasioned by some of his late Writings," was published (as alluded to in the note, p. 91), by the celebrated John Wesley. [About this time Mr. Law was preparing for the press the Tract, shortly afterwards published under the title of "Christian Piety freed from the Delusions of Modern Enthusiasts of all denominations, by Philelathes."] The reception of a copy of Mr. Wesley's rash and puerile effusion is acknowledged by Mr. Law in these words, which we extract from a letter addressed to his friend, Mr. Langcake, on the 24th of January:—"I have much to thank you for, in the zeal and diligence you have shown in sending me Mr. Wesley's letter. But am sorry you and Mr. Richardson [the publisher] should have wasted so many franks, for I was in no eagerness of seeing it soon, nor under any expectation of being obliged to take any notice of it." In fact, no one knew the philosophical and mental calibre of Wesley better than Mr. Law, or could be less disposed to avail himself of his own superiority.

The truth of this, and the nobleness of his spirit, are proved by his allusion to the subject in a letter to Lady Huntingdon, which he might well commence as he did, remembering what he himself knew and had experienced of Mr. W.'s disposition, as well as what he had seen and read of its effects as displayed by the author of the "Enthusiasm of the Methodists and Papists compared," some five years previously. We ought to observe in referring to this Letter, that the lady to whom it was addressed had written to Mr. Law upon the subject, and very justly remarked on the great good accomplished by the Methodists, amid all their apparent disorder. [See the letter in the "Collection," dated Feb. 16th, 1756. Also one under date of Sept. 1756, to Mr. Langcake, and an unpublished one to Dr. Byrom, of 30th April, 1757.]

We have noticed how Lady Huntingdon sought the acquaintance of Mr. Law, and corresponded with him, (though, by the way, we very much doubt the authenticity or seeming authorship of the letter attributed to Miss Gibbon, in the compilation of "the Life and Times of Lady Huntingdon.") The origin of that acquaintance may perchance be traced back to the Lady Elizabeth Hastings, of pious memory, who had sought Mr. Law's spiritual directions, but without giving her name. Her opinion of Mr. Law, apart from a knowledge of his books, might have been strengthened by what the devout Bishop Wilson had said to her, as we have presented, p. 356.

The following letters, written on the occasion of her sickness and death, to either the Lady Anne or Lady Frances Hastings, the half-sisters of the deceased lady, though out of the order of time, may not be unacceptable in this place. We may also just remind the reader how Mr. Law cleverly took occasion to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of that blessed lady in his "Animadversions upon Trap," published in the same year as the date of the last of these Letters:—

"[1739.] Madam,—I pray God to direct me to say that which is proper for your state and condition. I agree with your ladyship that your situation has been very advantageous to your piety: for that good lady your sister, with whom I suppose you have spent most of your time, must have been very beneficial to you. And I have some fear upon me, that she is your suffering friend, for whom you are so concerned.—Pious persons may depend upon this as an infallible truth, that when their trials and sufferings increase, or attack them in a new manner, or with unusual violence, it is because God has fitted them for them, and intends them some new degree of perfection thereby. When the time came that our blessed Saviour sweat drops of blood, it seems as if he had then had no merciful Father in heaven; and yet this greatness of distress came presently upon him after he had made this prayer to God, viz., 'Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son,' etc.,—A plain proof to us, that when we fall into the greatest distress, then is the time that we are most of all under the tender mercies of God, and only drinking our share of that bitter cup, which God mixes for those, whose prayers for their sanctification have been most accepted by him.

Your apprehension of your want of true faith, resignation, and pure love to God, is what I much like. It is good for you to know and believe this of yourself. And these virtues are then in their most beneficial state to you, when you can discover the least of them, and are, as to your own thinking, the farthest driven from them. This is one benefit that we receive from our present disordered and corrupt state, That the confusion of our passions, and the evil workings of flesh and blood, conceal our virtues from us, till we are in such a state as to be able to possess them without vanity. These storms and tempests help to make us sail with safety, and our greatest danger is in a calm, where all seems to be well.

There is nothing we so much wish, as to see the progress and growth and stability of what we call our own virtues; and we are apt to think that we are then best advancing, when we feel no contrariety to such virtues stirring in our natures. But this is a delusion of self-love. For though piety be a work of light, yet, in a true and good sense, it grows best in darkness, and must receive its purity from the fire of opposition, which seems to blacken and destroy it. This is most certain, that we never deeply feel the littleness and imperfections of our own virtues, till we are so far advanced as to be all hunger and thirst after righteousness. Whilst we have only a natural superficial love for any virtue, a little of it contents us, and we are seldom disappointed of it. But so soon as any virtue is become divinely stirring in us, we are sure thereby to stir up all that is contrary to it in our natures. For, as every virtue may be said only to intend the death of such a contrary vice as is born in us, and hath had for some time its growth in our natures; so every vice of our nature will fight for its own life, and then most of all exert its strength in strange motions, when it is most in danger of being destroyed. Hence it is, that persons far advanced in humility, shall sometimes feel such struggles and motions of pride, as when they were less humble, they knew nothing of. And thus it is with every virtue: as it grows it provokes and stirs up its enemy, and the stronger it is, the more violent it makes its enemy. For the greater every virtue is, the more contrary it is to our corrupt nature, and consequently is more opposed by it. And this is that darkness and fire through which every virtue must by the grace of God, attain its proper purity.

We have all of us a twofold nature, which the Scripture calls the outward and the inward man: the one is from above, the other is that mass of corruption, which is derived from our fallen parents. All the mystery and perplexity of a pious life arises from the struggle and contention of these two natures and because we do not enough distinguish our sins from our miseries.

Some people because their temper and natural constitution is always easy, and delighted in all outward parts of religion, and as content with their piety, as they are with every thing else of their own, look upon this serenity of their mind, as a mark of their progress in piety, and think themselves possessed of all the blessings of a religious life. But these people are, for the greatest part of them, very little of that which they take themselves to be: and those that are the best of this kind, are only like gold that has never been in the fire. On the other hand, there are others whose piety is deep, and continually springing up in the inward man, who yet learn they cannot command the motions of their outward nature. * * *

The second letter is as follows:—"Jan. 19th, 1740.—Madam,—As I seldom see the newspapers, so I did not hear of the death of Lady Elizabeth Hastings, of blessed memory, till some time after the public had been informed of it. For two or three post days after this, I had a strong impression upon my mind to write to your Ladyship, which I continually resisted; and the next post I had the honour of your kind and obliging letter. This made me look upon it as something very providential.

My intention in writing to your Ladyship was, to desire you to draw up an Historical Account of that blessed Lady's spirit, life, and virtues, from the first knowledge you had of them, that a memorial of her virtues might be communicated to the world.

I have very lately, by accident discovered that that good Lady had wrote several letters to me without a name; and I can't help thinking with some trouble, that I did not then know I had such a correspondent.

The use that your Ladyship is to make of this great event of your life, is to exercise the highest acts of love and gratitude to God for having blessed you with such a near relation, whose virtues have been so eminent, and highly edifying to this part of Christendom. This peculiar circumstance of your happiness ought to fill you with the greatest comfort, and inflame your heart with the sincerest ardours of love to God. Looking at the high character of a piety so endeared to you, raised up out of your own flesh and blood, you are thereby called to make an absolute donation of yourself to the glory and praise of God; to desire nothing but that His will may be done in you, that all you are, all that you have, and are able to do, may be a sacrifice and service of love and devotion to Him that has thus called you. God has called you to stand in the place of your blessed sister, to keep up her spirit, life and virtues in the world.

The way to be all and do all that God expects from you, is the way of love. Let love be your religion, and then all the law and the gospel is fulfilled. God is love, and he that dwelleth most in love dwelleth most in God.

Consecrate therefore your heart to this Divine love [as shown in the Life of the good Armelle]. Let it begin, carry on, and finish every thing that you do; and then every thing will equally do you good, and unite you to God.

To look at all things as proceeding from the love of God, to do all things from a motive of love to God, to be in all things absolutely and gratefully resigned to Him, in such a state of heart as consecrates every thing about us, and makes every inward and outward change equally a blessing to us. An unlimited faith and resignation to God, that with shut eyes says always, God be praised; a pure disinterested love, that seeks nothing but to do, or suffer, every thing in and for the love of God, is the only piety that is infallible, that is subject to no delusion, and that must carry the soul to its highest perfection. Every state of piety, though good and sincere, yet so far as it wants this unlimited faith and pure love, so far it is subject to hurtful scruples; to be perplexed with itself, to be always in want of new light and new methods, to continual researches into its own inward progress, and anxious doubts about the number and magnitude of its virtues. [These remarks clear up the ground of Mr. Law's strictures upon the Methodists, in his Regeneration treatise.] The way to have this faith and love, is to expect it and seek it wholly and solely from Jesus Christ; from his nature, spirit and life derived into us, by a faith which is always hungering and thirsting after his flesh and blood.

Your Ladyship is, I hope, directed by God to choose the retirement which you mention. The visits you speak of I can by no means advise you wholly to forbear; for since you make them, not as self-gratifications, but as prudential condescensions to the order of human life, they will do your piety no hurt, and may have better effects than generally happens. At least it will be time enough to forbear them, when they appear to have ill effects. Good and edifying conversation is not always to be had, and yet your Ladyship may edify where you are obliged to say nothing.

le docteur Balthazar Walter. Les réponses sont annoncées comme n'étant point selon la raison extérieure, mais selon l'esprit de la connoissance, d'après les principes dont l'auteur a donué les

I have lately published a little piece upon "Christian Regeneration," which if your Ladyship has not seen, I should be glad to send, along with another small one that is now in the press, [the Answer to Trap's Sermon?] I shall be always exceeding glad to hear from your Ladyship, as often as it is not troublesome to yourself; and when your Ladyship does me that honour again, that the letter may be sent by the Post. I am, with hearty prayers to God to make you a true successor to the piety of your blessed sister, Your Ladyship's most dutiful, obliged, and obedient servant, W. LAW." To resume our notice of the published "Letter."

Mr. Wesley seems to have been well aware, (as the observations attributed to him at the end of the fourth volume of his Journals, in treating of the ability of controversial writers, sufficiently testify,) that no one had the power to inflict a more effectual and lasting injury upon his claim to erudition and philosophy, (yet giving him full credit for his ingenuity, sincerity, devotion, and zeal,) than Mr. Law. And did we not well understand his mental constitution (shown indeed in his "inability to keep a secret,") it would have surprised us that he should have been so deficient of prudence and judgment, as to presume on his right intentions being sufficient to shield him from the punishment, usually inflicted with military exactness, by able and severe casuists and enlightened theologians, upon such offenders as himself. Still more surprising were the rashness of this attack upon Mr. Law, after having recently suffered so much at the hands of Bishop Lavington, as we shall presently notice; assured, as he must have been, that if the former should condescend to take up the lash, the strokes would fall with a tenfold severity upon him. Though possibly, his knowledge of Mr. Law's principles might have led him to presume that he should be spared, remembering his observation in the "Answer to Trap," that "by the grace of God he would never engage in personal contention with any man." Besides, there can be no doubt that his publication was the offspring of a sincere regard to what he conceived to be the interests of truth and Christianity, and, as we hinted in the second paragraph of the note of p. 361, (in common with other so called evangelical writers since, who have not been trained in the strictly mathematical, and classic discipline of thought and judgment, who entertain crotchets and strong views on particular theological points,) thinking that Mr. Law was really unacquainted with the true and simple nature of the Gospel, and therefore that he was in duty bound to try to set him right; and this notwithstanding what the latter had recently written at the conclusion of the first dialogue of the "Way to Divine Knowledge." Indeed it is evident from this publication, that he felt a 'great concern' and even 'pity' for Mr. Law's "ignorance of the way of simple faith" and of "justification" and for his "fall into the mysticism of Jacob Behmen."

But to return to the Letter to Lady Huntingdon, in answer to her remarks on Wesley, we observe by it, that Mr. Law was evidently now obtaining a glimpse of the peculiar character of his own Gospel call and mission, which was not only that of making the whole world to see as with open eyes, the philosophy and nature of gospel christianity (see pp. 524—530), as their birthright and atmospheric element; but of endeavouring to unite all the struggling, contending divisions and sections of Babylonian christianity (as he expressed himself most justly on another occasion, "Babel is not a city, it is the whole christian world") into the unity of the spirit of the one simple original gospel church. "As to myself (he writes, see the entire letter in the "Collection" dated Feb. 16th, 1756), I seem to myself to have no other part to act, nor any call to anything else, in this hurry and struggle of zeal against zeal in such a variety of forms, but only and fully to assert the true ground, and largely open all the reasons, of that one inward regeneration, which is equally the one thing needful to every sect, and the one thing alone that can make any sect, or method, or outward form, not hurtful to those that adhere to it."

We find from the same letter, as Mr. Wesley has himself admitted, that Mr. Law was once a "kind of oracle" with him; and, indeed, (as we have already stated, and are prepared to show by a series of extracts from the sermons and other publications of Mr. Wesley,) Methodism itself is nothing more than a superstructure, of which the chief foundation is Mr. Law's "Serious Call," and "Christian Perfection," as the true spirit and interpretation of the fundamental obligations and duties of the gospel; which are to precede, give birth to, and then to be the fruits of, and strengthen the regenerate life. What Mr. Law adds concerning Mr. Wesley's "subjection to his own spirit," is verified by all the acts of his life; which, notwithstanding his sincerity, devotion, and zealous, practical application of the Gospel, testify that he did not experimentally apprehend, much less love that great mystical, evangelical truth, of the all-workingness of the Divine nature, and consequent necessity of death to self.

In further proof of this want of philosophic apprehension, and at the same time of the good reason which he thought he had to sit in judgment on the subject of our memoir, we might quote the remarks on Law, inserted purposely in his "Journals," as the passage for example where he designates Mr. Law's treatise of Regeneration, as "philosophical, speculative, precarious, Behmenish, void and vain," and adds, "O what a fall is there!" In explanation of which we ought to state, that the objectionable points among the peculiarities of Mr. Whitefield's Calvinism, and Mr. Wesley's doctrine of "faith and its tests," which he had imported from the "Germans," had been fundamentally examined in Mr. Law's book, and their trivialities exposed in our author's usual incontrovertible and lucid manner. Mr. Wesley finding thereby, a few of his fond, novel constructions and theories of doctrine to be grounded on mere complexion, and supposing these peculiar notions to stand at the heart of his evangelical system, felt very angry, and as a matter of conscience we presume, but with the weakness peculiar to him, endeavoured to cast obloquy on that book in his published selections and concoctions from his Journals; and his judgment of the matter has necessarily been the rule of his implicit followers up to the present time. Now however, the tendency of the age, and the liberal education which the respectable members of the community receive, enable them to see things in their true natural and historical light; and even permit them in some instances to venture to look at Mr. Wesley's proceedings in religion, in the same light as they would view a schism and rebellion, under pretence of greater spirituality, in their own body.

One of the ministers of that community, and one who occupies a very respectable position in the esteem of his brethren, made the following candid admission to the writer of these lines, af-bases, et dont elles sont une récapitulation.

Ces diverses traductions forment à peu près le tiers des Œuvres de Boehm, dont il n'y avait ter having had Behmen's philosophy presented and opened out to him, though but in a general way:—"I have (said he) formerly read through all systems of philosophy, and am now convinced that Behmen's is the only true philosophy. They are as it were but parts of the circumference, while this comprises the centre and the whole of truth." Such an admission in Wesley's day might, if known, have subjected the speaker to a Galilean condemnation.

An equally characteristic example of Mr. Wesley's understanding in the passage is his "Journals," where he alludes to Mr. Law's Spirit of Prayer, "There are many masterly strokes therein" (see vol. ii. p. 14,) to the word "Christianity." As also, of his ability as a controversialist, and strength of mind, (notwithstanding his recently referred-to adventurous flippancy towards Mr. Law,) his Letter to the London newspaper, inserted in his Journals, vol. iii. p. 18, 8vo. ed., under date of Sept. 17, 1760. This letter professes to be an answer, and of course a refutation of the charges against him, in Mr. Law's published "Collection of Letters;" but, it will be seen, by reference to them, that Wesley as usual has not given the original words, but his own version thereof, which he has put in inverted commas, to mystify the reader, as if they were genuine extracts from Mr. Law; and he has taken care to omit altogether those passages which constitute the gravest reflexions on his character!! Yet this letter, placed purposely in his "Journals" for posterity, constitutes his sole defence against the accusations in Mr. Law's "Letters."

On all of which we remark, that those who are disposed to maintain that Mr. Wesley was a logician, must mean a logician of the flabby emaculate modern system of mental training, and not of the ancient, classic, stringent, intellectual discipline. Doubtless the views we have ascribed to him, as respects Mr. Law, were the settled conviction of his mind, though a most egregious mistake. We have before alluded (p. 94, 5,) to the letters which he sent on breaking with his quondam tutor and spiritual parent in 1738, (which correspondence and procedure on Mr. Wesley's part, by the way, the judicious and pious editor of the Periodical of 1797, candidly laments :) when, after leaving Mr. Law for a season, and becoming acquainted with the "United Brethren," whose manner of life, communal and devotional practices, &c., were necessarily highly taking to a young sanguine spirit, full of an earnest desire and intention to be active in religion,—he gave himself up to the propagation of these views and idiosyncracies, as the true understanding of evangelical Christianity. This is not an uncommon case, for you shall find a young man who has served but half an apprenticeship to a business, enter into a speculation on his own account, and, obtaining some sort of success in his own way, give himself up with impetuous ardour to a new course of life, at the same time ridiculing the regular and respectable business habits of the old merchant or trader; and shall go on prosperously, by reason chiefly of his extraordinary energy and perseverance. Thus Mr. W. when he found the effects of his newly adopted doctrines and preaching, attributed such results to these new opinions, or rather particularities of conception and expression concerning the atonement, faith, imputed righteousness, justification, &c. &c.; forgetting all the time, the sober, self-denying, humiliating, gospel preparations for the new birth, in which he had been so classically initiated, by Mr. Law's early writings and conversation. Whereupon, full of the ardour peculiar to his character,—a quality by the way, most invaluable and essential in itself for great purposes, especially when coupled with discipline of self-government, and strict, orderly business habits,—and of those new and enthusiastic interpretations of St. Paul's words about 'faith' and 'justification,' he turned round upon Mr. Law in the manner related in the correspondence formerly alluded to. And so far from profiting by what he then suffered, he, like a man wilfully bent on stripes and martyrdom, rashly returns to the charge in the manner exhibited in the publication now in question.

The following is the commencement of this published "Letter," which, as it has been omitted to be inserted with the remainder of it, in Wesley's collected Works, we here supply; it also justifying certain statements by ourselves as to the respect and veneration in which Mr. Law's abilities were held by the writer of the letter. It is further to be observed, that the printer did not affix his name to this publication:—

"REV. SIR,—It will be easily allowed by impartial judges, that there are few writers in the present age, who stand in any competition with Mr. Law, as to beauty and strength of language; readiness, liveliness, and copiousness of thought; and (in many points) accuracy of sentiment. And these uncommon abilities you have long employed, not to gain either honour or preferment, but with a steady view to promote the glory of God, and peace and good will among men. To this end you have published several treatises, which must remain as long as England stands, almost unequalled standards of the strength and purity of our language, as well as of sound practical divinity. Of how great service these have been in reviving and establishing true, rational, scriptural religion, cannot fully be known, till the Author of that religion shall descend in the clouds of heaven.

I cannot but earnestly desire, that the fruit of these your labours may increase a thousand fold! I would fain contribute my mite, to make your writings still more useful; particularly, the "Treatise on Christian Perfection," and the "Serious Call to an Holy Life." Will you pardon me, Sir, if in order to this I take upon me to mention something in your late writings which seem not altogether consistent with them, nor equally conducive to the great end you pursue? Can you bear, Sir, that I should do this, (I hope with modesty and respect, but yet with great plainness of speech?) especially where I apprehend the revealed truths of God, nay the very essence of the gospel, to lie at stake.

It may indeed seem strange not only to you, but to many, that such an one as I, should presume thus to speak to You, a person superior to me in so many respects, beyond all degrees of comparison. But in some respects it is not impossible, the advantage may lie on my side. For (1.) a dwarf standing on the shoulders of a giant, may see farther than he does himself. (2.) Being conscious of my own weakness and liability to err, I am open to instruction from others, whereas it is a doubt, whether you think any man in Great Britain capable of instructing you. (3.) I am a man of one book. In matters of religion, I regard no writings but the inspired. Thauler, Behmen, and a whole army of mystic authors are with me nothing to St. Paul. In every point I appeal to the law and the testimony, and value no authority but this."

Thus the preface. But while Mr. W. thus flattered himself, that he, "though but a dwarf in intellectual stature, was capable of seeing much farther than his quondam director, by standing upon a giant's shoulders" (if he could but find such a personage), what was his astonishment when Mr. Law's "Letter to the Bishop of London, upon Warburton," appeared as it did in the year following? Warburton, we have intimated, had fiercely attacked Wesley and the Methodists, and Mr. Wesley might have been on the look out for some person of adequate evangelical knowledge and scholastic ability, to favour his antagonist with the quid pro quo, when he at length heard of this publication; which he doubtless immediately procured, and perused with the delightful expectation of seeing the great antagonist of gospel evangelism severely flagellated, by one whom he knew had the power to do it, most unexceptionably, nay to universal admiration. What was his astonishment we say, not merely to find his expectations in this respect fully realized, but to discover in almost every page of that tract, what he had hitherto regarded as the high experimental christian science peculiar to himself and the Methodists, treated throughout as mere elemental gospel knowledge; the author from time to time in his discourse, as it were, seizing the reader, carrying him up as on the wings of an eagle, and exhibiting to his astonished vision, glimpses of the entire field of gospel truth, of the relative extent of which he hitherto had not had the least conception. As Mr. Wesley subsequently extracted almost the whole of this work in his published Two Volumes of "Selections from Mr. Law's Writings," we may conclude (for he did not afterwards venture at any more public judgments on Mr. Law's later writings,) that he not only looked upon Mr. Law with that confiding reverence which characterized his mind until he met with the "United Brethren," but that this feeling toward him became heightened into a kind of awe, not only on account of his abilities, but for his vast and sublime gospel erudition. Correspondently with this indeed, he, in his maturer years, though he did not actually make a confession of his early rash judgments and proceedings, except to confidential friends (see foot of p. 91), acted like one who was really sorry for them, and settled down into a solid regard for many whom he had violently opposed, in the first ardours and inexperience of his itinerancy. [Not feeling, however, quite satisfied as to the judgment an impartial posterity would pass upon him, after reading Mr. Law's remarks and observations in the "Collection of Letters," we find the following appeal ad misericordiam, introduced into the preface of his "Sermons," which were specially revised by him for publication, toward the close of his life:—"Are you persuaded (he writes) that you see more clearly than me? It is not unlikely that you may. [no longer any "standing upon a giant's shoulders!"] Then treat me as you would desire to be treated yourself upon a change of circumstances. Point me out a better way than I have yet known: shew me it is so, by plain proof of Scripture. And if I linger in the path I have been accustomed to tread, and am therefore unwilling to leave it, labour with me a little: [this, after what transpired, as related pp. 94, 51!] take me by the hand and lead me as I am able to bear: I can go but feebly and slowly at best; then I should not be able to go at all [!:] May I not request of you further, not to give me hard names [referring to Law's designation of Wesley's "Address to the Clergy, &c."], in order to bring me into the right way. Suppose I were ever so much in the wrong, I doubt this would not set me right. Rather, it would make me run so much the farther from you, and so get more and more out of the way." [!:] And this manly and elegant style of thought and composition by the bold censor of Mr. Law!—The actual unsettledness of his judgment as to the nature of certain favourite terms or topics of gospel doctrine (through not understanding the philosophy of christianity,) will be readily discoverable by a perusal of the doctrinal discussions related in Garret's "Digest, 1827, pp. 240—258; which certainly are more worthy of a synod of schoolboys than of persons professing to instruct the world in the true theory of revelation. It was doubtless the reflection upon this intellectual blindness, and the exposure of his continual saying and unsaying then existing in print against him, that rendered Mr. W. (once all confidence,) so very tame, at this period of his life.]

Continuing our notices of the published "Letter," we cannot but conclude of its author, that he had shown much greater wisdom had he simply pursued his own peculiar business, of preaching the Gospel, converting souls, and forming them into little societies and bands, all over the country,—thus we say, laying the groundwork for the civil and political amelioration and aggrandizement of this nation, (and progressing regeneration of the world,) which has since followed, as the result of the moral cultivation and regeneration of the root of society—and have left philosophy and learning to the able and the skilled in recondite truth; for that he was wholly unfit for handling such subjects is proved by his own journals, which abound with evidence of his ignorance and misunderstanding of such authors. His "Letter" to Mr. Law is characterized by that gentleman in the following words, in a supposed Letter to Mr. Langcake:—"Mr. J. W. is an ingenious man, and the reason why his letter to me is such a juvenile composition of emptiness and pertness, as is below the character of any man who had been serious in religion but half a month, is, because it was not ability but necessity that put his pen into his hand."—This judgment we were desirous of testing, by placing the Letter in question in the hands of a lady for perusal, who is a member of the Wesleyan body, and a great admirer of the benefits and superior advantages of such communion with respect to the popular dissemination and cultivation of the blessings of practical piety and holiness; but who at the same time is not uninformed in the grounds and reasons of the Christian faith. The remark of this lady then, after perusing the pamphlet, and being asked her opinion upon it, was in these words,—"It is not worth reading: there is no argument in it. It is like an ignorant person quoting an author's words he does not understand, and saying, 'Isn't that absurd? Whoever thought of that? Where do we find that or that in the bible?' Poor man! he meant well; he was a good man, but he couldn't reason. Mr. Wesley was not made for philosophy: his talent was only practical."

The "Letter" indeed, is nothing but an incongruous selection of sentences or parts of ideas out of Mr. Law's works, without the slightest apprehension or conception of the ground or principles of the author. Indeed we are sorry to say that Mr. Wesley has descended in this letter, whether wilfully or not is for the reader to consider, to actual misrepresentation of Mr. Law's words. The passage to which we more particularly allude, is referred to by Mr. Law, in the following extract from a letter—as being quoted, we presume, in some book of sermons, probably one of Mr. Wesley's own publications of the time; at all events, it was originally in this published "Letter," p. 87; (yet at p. 8 he distinctly avers that Mr. Law's words are inclosed all along in commas!!):—

"March 20th. 1756.—My dear Languake,—I have sent you by the carrier of this week, in a parcel that comes to my nephew in Cornhill, a packet, in which is a letter to Mr. Freelove, and the Letter you desired, that was wrote to a Clergyman, upon the point of going into the Romish Communion. It is a small dialogue. You can keep it as long as you please, [Query, Where now this Dialogue?]

The Lecturer's Sermons that you sent me, contain a most flagrant piece of forgery. He quotes these words as mine, viz., "If your heart cannot give itself up in this manner to prayer, be fully assured you are an infidel." And then he adds,—"Sad assurance, indeed."

The above words from whence this charge against me is drawn, are inclosed between inverted commas as mine, and the page referred to, where they are. And yet they are no more in my book, than in the gospel of St. John, nor were ever any more in my thoughts than the most foolish fantastic thing in the world.

I had drawn up a line or two to set forth his bold injustice, but have altered my mind. Though I think both he and his friends ought to be made ashamed of it. But perhaps patience is my best defence, and of the truth. —These men of zeal, whether of the Foundry, the Tabernacle, or elsewhere seem to have a fire that has as much of nature as of grace in it. But all this en passant.

The inclosed letter, which I have just received, I need say nothing about. It speaks for itself all that I can say to you. The man seems to be honest and well-meaning. I should be glad if you would see him, and from what you see of him, give him any of my books, which you think will be most useful to him. Buy them, and take money of my nephew for them. * * *

We have already observed that of the same empty, perverse, stupid character as this published "Letter," are the "Strictures upon Law and Behmen by (the then) Mr. Horne," in Jones's account of his life. This latter (a clergyman), it may be mentioned, edited a work called "The Scholar Armed," in which he awarded high praise to Mr. Law's defence of high church principles in the Bangorian controversy: distinguishing our author's "Three Letters" as "incomparable for truth of argument, brightness of wit, and purity of English," (as did the "British Critic" only still more laudatorially, in reviewing the "Scholar Armed," (but adding in a note,—"We know and lament that the excellent Mr. Law afterwards adulterated his christian doctrines with many novel and unsound speculations; but when he composed these Letters his mind was in its purest state; and they have no tincture of the errors he afterwards fell into, during a life of too much abstraction and solitude." The reader will here refer perhaps to our note on this subject at p. 92. The truth of the matter is, Mr. Law, when his mind was more mature and independent could not fail to observe how little the cause he had championed in his early days, had to do with the real interests of gospel christianity; and it is possible that, in an impartial mood, he might even have given in to the representations of the nature of ecclesiastical authority (viz., the distinguishing mere papistical, artificial, "apostolic succession" assumptions of authority, from the true spiritual inherent authority of holiness in pastors, and order in the assemblies and worship of christians, all over the world,) by his opponent and reviewer, Gilbert Burnet, M.A. 1718, whose work we would again recommend to be perused along with Law's "Three Letters" as stated in the note of p. 52.

The "Letter" (under review), Mr. Law then treated with that disregard which it merited; "for there was not anything properly argumentative in it." Indeed, for him to have attempted a reply, would have been merely to write his series of books over again. There might also have been other reasons for his silence: he knew, for example, that when he came to deal with Warburton, as he probably felt he should soon be called to do,—after his usual manner, of not only knocking down the unsound supports of his antagonist's superstructure, but of rebuilding the edifice, with all the materials in their right order of construction,—he knew, we say, that such a procedure would include in its embrace, all that could be necessary to subdue Wesley. He was also well aware, from private letters which came to him, and some of which are now extant, that much good was done by Wesley among the lower orders, and on this account might forbear to reply, being unwilling to throw the least obstacle in the way of any good he might be able to promote, by diminishing his title to respect. Besides all this, Mr. Law as we have before remarked, deemed it improper to take notice of any aspersions cast upon himself or his writings, until a providential opportunity of so doing fairly presented itself; which he was aware would assuredly be the case, through the harmonious working of nature, if he were not too hasty in anticipating the divine regulation of events. Accordingly, in the case before us, about four years after this period, (Mr. Law being then about seventy-four years of age,) his friends were solicitous for his permission to publish such letters of his as they could collect together, that might prove of public edification. Here then was the opportunity presented to him, to do justice to himself and bestow correction on his inconsiderate adversaries, which he skillfully availed himself of, by inserting merely a few additional paragraphs, refutatory, and ironical remarks and reflexions, in certain of his letters, which, as the results evinced, were quite sufficient for the purpose; though his correspondence was by no means improved by similar alterations attempted by his friends.

We have observed that Mr. W. was completely in Law's power had the latter been capable of making "a mock of him;" and we may add that a weapon had been ready formed to his hand, had he required such auxiliary assistance, by the witty and learned Bishop Lavington, whose work, "The Enthusiasm of Methodists and Papists compared," had reached a third edition in 1752. In this book, (and it is distinguished by a surprising amount of wit, genius and labour,) the proceedings of the Methodists, as disclosed in their own publications, are handled with the strict severity and unsparing criticism of one, who is equally a master of strong sense as of sound learning, and fully capable of administering the judicial chastisement which his knowledge of human nature, and the evidence before him dictated. The work consists of Three Parts, the first two of which were printed previously to the third, and were aimed chiefly at Whitefield, though Wesley is also noticed therein. While the author is much mistaken as to the real designs of those individuals, which he attributes to some jesuitical or adventurous motives, the impartial reader should bear in mind that it was a work written in self-defence, and is only to be condemned so far as it actually misrepresents their intentions; and as it is itself imperfect for want of greater seriousness and spirituality in the "right reverend father in God" the author. For in the first place, Messrs. Whitefield and Wesley were in open rebellion against the author and his coadjutors, their lawful heads, and this against their ordination oath of obedience; and secondly, they had preached, and were still preaching vehemently against their brethren of the clergy, (both deceased and living.) In a word, they were actual revolutionists, against the established order of their profession and society. Lavington therefore, was only maintaining the legal right; which he considered might be done most effectually, by exposing to the test of reason and sound judgment the ignorance and the delusions which were so largely mixed up with the rantish proceedings of the "Methodists;" and showing how that certain transactions or events which they attributed to the Spirit of God as a divine attestation to their preachings, were in fact, mere fanaticism. Thus we say, he was acting like a true bishop, in attacking what he considered the enemies of ecclesiastical order, and the ravishers of his flock, and with such weapons of ridicule and defiance, as were best adapted to the nature of the assailants; which otherwise had been unjustifiable in a Christian watchman and overseer, however valuable his work as a labour of the critic and historian.

The Two Parts first printed, drew forth an answer from both the persons it attacked, (Whitefield forming the most conspicuous object in it, he being the originator of Methodist itinerancy;) but our business is solely with Mr. Wesley. [A perusal of "God's dealings with George Whitefield, by himself," and of the "List of Books sent out to him to Georgia by Mr. Charles Wesley," will afford a glimpse of the influence of Mr. Law's writings on his life, as well as on the evangelicism of the Continent of America, no less than of England, &c.] The personal charges implied and expressed in Lavington's work, were, as we have intimated, harsh and far from merited; for weak as Mr. Wesley may be considered in regard to his judgment of recondite topics, yet his motives in religion were indisputably fervent and sincere, and his intention to do good pure and simple. His reply to Lavington only brought before the public a Third Part of the work, in which it was now his turn to make the most considerable figure, and pass completely through the fiery ordeal. In referring the reader to the preface of this part of the work, which is in the form of an Epistle to Mr. Wesley, it may be well to observe that the author's felicitous illustration of the peculiarities which are found to distinguish every wide and ardent attempt to evangelize the ignorant, vulgar, and brutal populace, would have appeared under somewhat different colours, had he reflected on them, as the accidental circumstances which must always accompany such a promotion and cultivation of the good. Indeed the very justice of his comparisons of the Montanists, the Papists, Pietists, Jesuits, &c., and the Methodists, ought to have suggested this to his mind. The truth of the matter is, he has written an admirable text book and index, without intending it, to the instructive parallels to be found in different ages, which illustrate the inseparable working of the Spirit of God, and the spirit of fallen nature in the humanity; or the intermingling therein of good and evil in such intimacy, that the one is seldom stirred up to great activity without exciting the other.

The argument in the latter part of the letter (forming as we say the Preface to the Third Part of "the enthusiasm of the M. and P. compared") is all very just and good, but then it is far short of the subject, which is finely set forth in Mr. Law's "Answer to Trap's Sermon." How we would ask, are the masses of the lower orders, (or indeed of their superiors,) who are swallowed up in sensuality and worldliness, and totally unacquainted with this "sedate, composed piety" and "steady course of sincere, habitual unaffected religion" herein reflected upon, to be roused out of their insensibility to divine things and spiritual death, except by men of faith, anointed by the Holy Spirit, with true christian zeal and love for their souls, rushing in amongst them, and, as at the risk of their own lives, amid buffetings, scourgings, &c., snatching such 'wild heifers of the devil' from destruction. It was this spirit that truly distinguished the first three generations of devoted, self-denying christian men and women of the Methodists, who, themselves having been the slaves of sin and vice, and rescued therefrom by the proclamation of the gospel, could not resist the holy impulse to go and preach the same divine love and humility to their poor infatuated brethren, steeped in brutality and sin, and hastening to everlasting misery. As to the objections of the irregularity of such proceedings, and the ignorance and even abstract sinfulness mixed up with their movements and preachings, it is as we have before said, no argument at all against the divine inspiration of their endeavours, but solely attributable to indiscriminating ignorance, and to the fact of the people being subjects of what may be called a new and magical action;—the measure of the good they receive, being greater than the attendant evil, provided that the excitement which is manifested, be only the accompaniment of honest and sincere endeavours to draw near to God. It would be easy to explain further the reason of this twofold working of good and evil, when the sincere zeal of religion begins to operate: but it must suffice to point out, that the spirit of God has in all ages moved souls with such a holy zeal against sin, and evangelical love to the souls of sinners; and that in the present case, whatever extravagances might have occurred, amidst such a mass of heterogeneous materials,—the good that was brought to life was like a little seed sown, which, springing up under the benign aspect of protestant principles of civil and religious liberty, became, as we have observed, a chief source of the present transcendent exaltation of the Methodists from all previous revivals of the world.—The distinguishing characteristic of this nation, and progressing amelioration in the church of Christ, is, that they have always kept to the simple words of scripture, and the prima-facie sense thereof, (leaving the implications of its scope and spirit to the "poor, dark bewildered mystics:)" and although their doctrine is distinguished by no more science and knowledge of the ground of truth and of nature than appears upon the simple surface of scripture, as apprehensible by a rustic: yet their plan of action and mode of evangelization, and discoveries of improved means of reaching and regenerating the root of society in the lower classes, (as witness the City Mission and Ragged School principles and the American evangelical activities,) in the introduction of the Gospel into new localities, disregarding all presumed opposition, and, pursuing the end of their society, actually establishing themselves and forming a nucleus and afterwards a large body of a church, in which are presented continually the advantages and blessings of enlightened spiritual christian communion and efficient evangelical instrumentalities—all this, into which Methodism may be said to have resolved itself, though setting out with more general and indistinct views, we say, is not only strictly accordant with apostolic practice, but the most experienced judgment of the state of the people, and adaptation of the Gospel to their moral necessities, and their social and political amelioration and perfectionment. And, Methodism rightly carried out, (more especially if considered as a pioneer and adjunct to the Established Church,) is perhaps the best constituted system of Gospel agency for the "poor," and the unsophisticated populace (whether of the ignorant and reprobate or the educated and devoutly disposed,) that has ever been discovered. For though not producing such a thorough total conversion and illumination of the soul as the spiritual training of the Society of Jesus, or La Trappe, yet it has this great advantage over the former system, that it is not liable to such satanic abuse and depravity, when its professors lose the spirit of their order, and slide back under the dominion of self and the spirit of subtlety.

As to that which constitutes the individuality of Methodism, there are many points, but nothing original, save the talent which directed and applied them. All the sober ground work of ascetic and devotional piety is that of the Church of England, as illustrated by Law, Jeremy Taylor, and other of her divines. All its outgoing spirit and operation, and all that is domestic as regards pastoral expedients and inventions, producing action and reaction upon the religious life and capacity of man, were drawn from the "United Brethren,"—who probably, had their real origin in the assembling together of a few pious souls, of a mystic turn, about a century previously, to practise Behmen's "Way to Christ," in the experimental pursuit of which they discovered and invented new instruments for the cultivation of piety; spiritual, devotional hymns and tunes, prayer and band meetings, love-feasts, local and foreign missionary efforts, and in like manner the rest. But though these latter evangelical expedients could be transferred by Wesley, this had not been sufficient to promote the spirituality and unanimity of a large society, without a corresponding and equally experimental Psalmody. For, the psalms and hymns that existed at the beginning of the last century, were with few exceptions, not heaven-born poetry, not the effusion of souls under the experience of all kinds of states, introductory to, or participatory of the divine nature regenerate in the soul. For the true doctrines of regeneration had not been preached, and experimentally known to the great body of Christians; how then should hymns have been composed, (and their corresponding vehicles of expressions, natural tonations of sound, or tunes be discovered,) expressive in a greatly diversified manner, of the experiences of the new regenerate life of Jesus in the humanity? But gospel salvation which had hitherto been chiefly confined to the mystic few, was now to be rendered of popular knowledge, by Methodism. What then did Wesley do, when he came to apprehend the nature of the spiritual life? Why he converted his brother Charles, who almost breathed and thought in poetical rhythm; and they together selected the choicest spiritual hymns, expressions and sentiments, of the practical and mystical divinity of France, Holland, Germany, Italy, Spain, of the ancients, and of our own country and talent—the choicest blossoms and flowers of indeed every Christian clime and garden they knew of, and with an admirable ingenuity or genius transformed them into a volume of hymns and sacred poems, of such a natural expression and simple diction, as must surprise every reader in looking over them and reflecting upon the circumstances; adding thereto a considerable number of their own originals. We have now before us the fourth edition of these "Hymns and Sacred Poems" of 1743, which by degrees of successive additions and purifications, has grown into the Hymn book now of established use among the Methodists.

It is the preface to this book which Mr. Law refers to in the Letter to Lady Huntingdon (inserted at p. 91). And the enlightened reader of the present work, on perusing it will doubtless at once acquiesce in the justness of that accusation of indifference to strict truth, implied in the remark of Mr. Law, and which Mr. Wesley was hurried into, by the impetuosity of his own will and the propagation of his favourite crotchets. The first and competent defender of the mystics, however, may take this preface and all that Wesley has ever said in his journals or elsewhere, against mystical divinity (though he was surprisingly blinded by his idiosyncrasy), as the most worthy, well-meant, and really Christian statement of objections ever penned. For though there have been many authors in the field in furtherance of the same crusade, we do not find that they were such devoted, experimental Christian men, or that they had so much commerce with the evangelical world, and acquaintance with practice in evangelical things as Mr. Wesley. Notwithstanding all which, we say, if the apologist we allude to should possess only the proper spirit of understanding and discernment, he will easily meet and overturn these objections, by placing each in its proper relation to the centre of truth.

It is time, however, to close these remarks; and we cannot more appropriately do so, than in a proper tribute to the character of Mr. Wesley. In writing a work like this, we have of course felt bound to speak of things as they occurred, and not according to the ordinary lights of a fifty years' beatification, or the views of partial and biassed sectarians. Thus, while holding in as high esteem as any one, Mr. Wesley's character of sincerity, devotedness to God, and usefulness to the church, it has been our business immediately to point out the distinguishing characteristics of Mr. Law, as a mystic prophet of God, a theologian, and man of erudition and genius—indeed as one of the first spirits of the age; we do not say for extensive cultivation of particular branches of knowledge, but for a sufficient and well-proportioned universal erudition, together with high accomplishments in the most noble intellectual developments; and this more especially when the course of our narrative rendered it necessary to remark on the irrational attacks made upon the general tenor of his later writings. Having said thus much then of an uncomplimentary character, in justice to the subject of our memoir, and to the general object of edification which we have in view, it will now afford us equal pleasure to take the other hand of justice and truth, and to glance at the inner spirit of Mr. Wesley as he doubtless stood before God.

Voies de la Sagesse, et les Lois de la Justice divine;—4^e. des Poésies où, comme on le pense bien, l'auteur s'attache plus au fond qu'à la forme: cependant on trouve, dans le Cimetière d'Am-

We have already noticed the genius and piety which he displayed in procuring the translations of spiritual hymns of foreign and domestic authors into simple and popular English poetry—the true, natural, unforced breathings of the abundance of the soul; and arranging them (in the course of years and experience) under so many various heads, adapted to the diversified experience of souls in the process of the Gospel. [Though by the way, justice requires us to add, that he appropriated to himself both poetry and prose whenever he found them to his mind, without the smallest acknowledgment or reference to the authors! so that in his modern published, collected “Works,” as in his “Hymns,” pieces are attributed to him, to which he has not the slightest claim of authorship.] A second remarkable trait in his character was the tenacity with which he adhered to his determination, of taking the Bible and its idiosyncrasy of language as the only and universal standard, henceforth, for the conception and expression of spiritual things. For, if religion was ever to be universalised, a catholic form or signature of ideas was plainly necessary, however varied the ideas themselves might be, according to the diversified conceptions of the human mind, and the sectional instruction which believers—both learned and unlearned—might be expected to receive. This was embodied again, in what may be called a third distinguished character of his spirit, or rather his procedure and habit in the great work to which he was called; we mean the tenor of all his preaching and exhortation, which made no distinction or exception either among the rich or poor, learned or unlearned, but the same doctrine was addressed to all alike, “He that believeth shall be saved, he that believeth not shall be damned. Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. We must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ. Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God. He that is born of God sinneth not. To them that believe gave he power to become sons of God. The Spirit of God beareth witness with our spirit, that [if] we are the children of God. Without holiness no man shall see the Lord. Seek first the kingdom of God and its righteousness, and all things needful [as to this life] shall be added unto you.” The effect of which, especially amongst “the poor,” was to free religion from all uncertainty, opinion and conjecture, and place its highest benefits within the immediate reach of every man, by promoting that disposition of soul, to which alone prayer, or true seeking after God, is possible. With what simplicity of imagery and expression, yet vividness of fancy and ardour of spirit, he was accustomed to plead with the ungodly, and endeavour to awaken in them a concern for their souls, may be conceived in some measure from a perusal of his publications, especially his “Sermons,” and “Collection of Hymns” under the heads of “Death” and “Judgment.”

Driving the truth home as he was wont, personally to “the sinner,” and then placing before the eye of his mind, “Christ dying on the cross a sacrifice in his stead,” “to atone the wrath of God,” and “now waiting to pardon all who believe,” and that “we are saved by faith, not by works,” &c., &c.,—we leave to the reflecting reader to consider, what effect all this, supported by abundant quotations from Scripture, must have had upon the uneducated and barbarous, who had never before heard such earnest, homely preaching; and how thereupon thousands became turned from their ungodly ways, to follow after righteousness. Thus he proceeded through the length and breadth of the land, and, according to his systematic habits, forming those who were awakened under his discourses, into little circles or classes to build up each other in the good way, until he or his preachers should again come round, to impart some further spiritual gift. And it must be borne in mind, that Wesley himself was the first to practise all the duties he so zealously (“after the model of your two practical treatises,” as he wrote to Mr. Law,) enjoined upon others; the first in mortification and self-denial, (to instance in his early rising, he rose at four o’clock for devotion, had preaching at five, a prayer meeting at six, &c., thus indeed testing the fidelity of his converts in “forsaking all” and “taking up the cross;”) the first in abstemiousness and fasting, in charity and almsgiving, in labour and living strictly by rule, and the universal practice of “whatsoever things were pure, Christian, lovely, and of good report;” such was his undisputed, acknowledged reputation before his societies, and which course he maintained to the close of his life.

We do not mean to say that this spirit was altogether manifest to the exterior world, for in the contentions into which he was brought, and into which he brought himself, by the impetuosity of his spirit and dominant self will, he showed that he was “but a man.” But we say, that this was the sincere aim and intent of his soul; in confirmation whereof we may refer the reader to the authenticated histories of his life, his journals and other publications, especially his “Sermons” wherein he will find only one breath of experimental holiness and cultivation of the life of God, of hunger and thirst after righteousness, and strife to realize all the salvation that Christianity professes to impart to its faithful disciple. In short, as we have said, his one desire was to be himself fully devoted to God, to be acquainted with true Gospel holy people, to blow up the divine fire into a flame of heavenly love in others, and to spread the experimental knowledge of Christ and redemption through every neglected corner of this nation, and to the ends of the earth. And what this kingdom and the world itself is indebted to his instrumentality under the providence of God, (to instance, the serious tone of mind abroad at the present day, and practices of Christian philanthropy now going on, with their results, &c.) may some day come to be known and acknowledged. We might just remark, ere we close, that the salient points of Methodist religious action, are, the driving the people toward God, “compelling them to come in,” and the doctrine of “sanctification,” or full restoration of the life and image of God in the soul. Many eminent writers, ascetics and mystics, of the Romish Church have treated of this latter state, and that very sublimely, but in no body of Christians is the experience of it so clear and full and scriptural, as among the Methodists, and the pathway to it rendered so beaten, and direct of attainment—for the multitude. And would the reader see a classic illustration of Mr. Law’s grand doctrine of “regeneration” and “spirit of love,” (as of his ‘ideal of a Minister of the Gospel,’ pp. 380-5,) he may for that purpose, refer to “Sigston’s Memoir of Bramwell” and peruse the Letters therein. Bramwell’s letters indeed, ought to constitute an inseparable appendix to Mr. Law’s evangelical doctrinal works: whilst in these would be found displayed the pure philosophy of the Gospel, in those would be presented the pure, unidocratic practice, experience and elucidation of it. Oh, let him who desires to experience the blessing of full sanctification of soul, full regeneration, full spiritual transmutation into love, as treated of throughout Mr. Law's later writings,—having mastered the scope of his philosophy and the teachings of the standard foreign mystics and jesuits, let him, we say, take Bramwell's Letters, with the Gospel, as his inseparable vade mecum, and guide to the attainment of it.

We would here be permitted for a moment to recur to our remarks on p. 177, and to observe, in reference to our venerable mother, the established church of England, and to certain of her Academic sons in particular who evidently see the necessity of a movement of some kind in religion, that the adoption of all the discovered, efficient and judicious instruments of communal and individual piety, is the only means by which she can be raised to her true power and influence, and so as to swallow up all sectarianism in this country. The diversified researches and experience of the last two centuries have laid open to popular view, the simple nature, design and practice of the Gospel. What we would say then is, superinduce these well tested practices, arts expedients and auxiliaries, upon your "sober principles of sedate composed piety," if you would not be left behind in this age of experiment, and march of improvement. What merchant, trader or mechanician for instance—and the procedure of men of business is only the right use of natural means; what enterprizer we say raises himself in the world, from his ancient position, or above his competitors, by a "sedate, composed" manner of conducting his affairs? On the contrary he adopts the best helps, the latest discoveries and improved methods, and applies himself with an indomitable energy and perseverance to his ends. So in like manner should the ministers and pastors of the national church proceed, if they would develop the transcendent power it possesses in the large body of learned, devout and accomplished members and writers of its communion; and in a few years the sects and divisions of this nation would resemble the leafless, lifeless bushes of a barren heath, in comparison with the rich and majestic oak towering aloft in a fertile and luxuriant country. And as to themselves personally, soon would they thereby rub off the corners, the stiffness and awkwardness, of their unexercised pastoral talents, and rise into, yea highly rejoice in the liberty of the spirit of Christ, of workmen that feel themselves thorough adepts at their business, and that 'need not be ashamed'—such as was the vérai athlète (11 Tim. ii. 3) and accomplished minister of Jesus Christ, just mentioned, Bramwell.

We return now to our remaining notices of Mr. Law's life for the year 1756, which was the period we had arrived at, when we were led into the preceding digression by the publication of Mr. Wesley's "Letter." We observed that Mr. Law had an anonymous tract in the press at this time, and we find in a P.S. to one of the manuscript letters already cited, dated Jan. 24th. 1756, the following remark: "You have done the office of a very accurate corrector of the press, and the translation of the Latin is as well as it can be done." [The commencement of the letter ran thus: "I do not know how many letters I should here thank you for. The Psychologia Vera is the book that I wanted, but it falls much short of my expectation. It is a very neat translation of the Forty Questions; but the Figure of the Philosophic Eye is wanting. But as it is I am very glad to have it, which would never have happened to me but through your hands. * * *] This was addressed to Mr. Langeake, we presume on the actual publication of the tract, as we find the following letter written about a month previously, to the same gentleman:—

"Dec. 20th. 1755.—My dear friend—I like the translation of the Latin passages very much. I suppose you desire me to send the verses, though I believe there is no occasion for it:—
In vain thou hopest for bliss on this poor clod, Mysterious passage, hid from mortal eyes!
Return, and seek thy father and thy God.— Soaring you 'll sink, and sinking you will rise;
Yet think not to regain thy native sky, Let humble thoughts thy wary footsteps guide;
Borne on the wings of vain philosophy. Regain by meekness, what you lost by pride.

The advertisement to the Behmenists is a very strange one. I would not have any of the books you have mentioned.—I can only add, that you have as much of me as anything creaturely ought to have. W. LAW."

The verses recited in the above letter, were written by a Dr. Arbuthnot, but being inscribed by Mr. Langeake on the blank leaf of a book sent by him to Mr. Law, he, Mr. Law, supposed them to have been of his composition, and directed them to be printed at the close of the anonymous Tract above mentioned, then in the press, entitled "Christian Piety freed from the Delusions of Modern Enthusiasts of all denominations."

Not having been able to procure a copy of this tract, we can only say we suppose it to be a practical, general application of the principles elucidated in the Author's treatise "on Christian Regeneration" or "Answers to Trap;" and wherein might be found an exposure of the enthusiasm of religious ignorance and blind zeal, as the enthusiasm of literary learning and learned ignorance in the things of God had been made the subject of rebuke on a former occasion, as inserted in note, pp. 62, 3; at the same time, the true and proper nature of evangelical religion, duly stated.

The original correspondence of this year supplies us with a fine illustration of Mr. Law's transcendent abilities as a spiritual physician and director of souls. While perusing the following letters, the reader will remember the objections of a certain set of popular theologians—men, indeed, very sincere and devout in their way—to what they term the vain philosophy contained in Mr. Law's later writings, regarded in a purely practical point of view. He will also remember what we have said, and the instances we have given of their natural effects upon unsophisticated minds, when not counteracted by the bias of some secret prejudice and imaginary theological knowledge. An instance of such effects in the case of a thoughtful and learned man is inserted in the note from p. 423 to 426, and the letter we are about to give will instance the effects resulting from a right perusal of his writings in the case of one who may be termed an intelligent clerk or warehouseman:—

"London. Nov. 18th. 1756.—Rev. Dear Sir—Having read most of your writings, I find the utmost contrariety to all anger, ill-will or resentment breathe through the whole: and as I have no reason to doubt their being a copy of your heart, so I am persuaded no liberty one so altogether unworthy as I, shall herein take, will meet with anything but your pity and your prayers, and your good advice which is all I ask. I doubt not but you compassionate whole miserable mankind, and I make no question but your compassion is redoubled for those who are of all men most miserable because they are so by their own fault, I mean poor, backsliding, self-destroyed sinners, among ten thousand of whom I am Chief. Before I was well past my childhood, the holy Immanuel, the blessed Seed of life began to be awakened in me, and I remember that by reading the works of Bishop Beveridge it was so called forth, that though I never had any gift of what is called prayer, or conversation, yet in my private meditations, and more especially at church I have been whether in the body or out of the body God only knows. Being sent out into the world to get my living in the prime of giddy youth; the heat of blood and spirits, evil example, the lust of the flesh, and sinful opportunities soon choked to death, and buried again the good seed, and I think almost utterly silenced the speaking Word of God in my heart. About my eighteenth year I came up to London, and there worldly disappointment and hearing one Mr. Wesley preach once, such conviction was wrought in my heart that I went in such bondage and misery, that I only wished for no hereafter, that it were but lawful to let out my life. For six or seven years I continued in this poor miserable way, praying in books till midnight and more, fasting until I hurt my health, vowing and resolving to serve God, but the first strong temptation overthrewed all the fabric of own works, and level'd it with the ground. During this my reading used to be volumes about original sin and the sin against the Holy Ghost, Bishop Taylor's writings, and I used to hear the preaching on Sundays from morning to night, but to no purpose, all tended to stiffen me in that particular folly of labouring to establish my own righteousness. And the Scriptures though I greatly venerated them and durst not speak it, yet they always seemed to me like a fine written poem upon a lock of hair or a lady's lap-dog, like the labouring mountain that brought forth a mouse, they seemed as you better express it, to have more of height and mystery in the expression than the thing itself. And I must and do lament, that for all my misery by convictions, the stings and lashes of God's vicegerent my conscience, I was not restrained from outward sin; lust and anger were the mutual pest and plague of my life, and made me bitterly wish I had never been born. Oh what temptations did I undergo, it were endless to tell; blasphemous thoughts, despairing and reprobation thoughts not only amazed my spirit, but even depressed and bowed down my body, and made me go stooping, hardly able to do my business. Amid all this, lust would beset me in the day-time, and uncleanness and perhaps fornication at night, and in the morning anger at myself for my folly made me peevish, and disagreeable to everybody about me, and so miserable in myself, that though the fear of hereafter did restrain me from choosing hanging before such a life, yet I heartily wished it lawful. And this is what I sadly lament, my being so accustomed to fall into sin, that to this day, it is the bane and destruction of the life of God in my soul; I have so again and again fallen into it, that it robs me of my peace, hardens my heart, and I doubt has well nigh quenched the good Spirit of God, for now I feel no such horror, remorse and bitterness of heart for sinning, as I used to do then.

One night I committed two great evils, drunkenness and fornication; the next day sick with intemperance and wounded with conviction I was unable to do my business and obliged to keep my room, it so happened the [your] book of Regeneration was at that juncture put into my hands; with solemnity I observed the preface, I prayed God to give me understanding, seriousness I already had, my gripping conscience had wrought that in me, I read, and sure the Spirit of God applied; how did I see my miserable, helpless, sinful self? But when I came to that "most glorious and edifying truth that ever possessed the heart of man," namely, that God is all love, and in him is no anger at all, how was I amazed? I prayed to God and read it again, and the second time I read that blessed truth, it did truly possess and edify my heart. How was my peevish angry soul melted into love! my misery fled away in a moment, the very memory of it perished. All the slavish fear of God likewise and of hell and reprobation, and all that anger and lust that had harassed me to death, were instantly gone, and such a peace possessed my heart as surpasseth man's understanding; human words cannot express it, for it was indeed the peace of God. It was not more than a month, before sin robbed me of that blessing again. Then I met with the Spirit of Prayer, and every word wrought conviction as I read; and a twelve month after that I got the Appeal, and how joyful was I to find truth so plain and intelligible; every word elated my heart above itself, but when I came to that pathetic description of the sufferings of our blessed Saviour's soul, my heart was broken afresh, and I did like Peter weep bitterly and repent; and this by the goodness of God, introduced into my heart all those sweet and heavenly dispositions as at the first. And this same description in the Appeal has several times wrought in me the same effect, but sooner or later sin has always as often robbed me of my peace. I have lately given way to folly, and am at present in unspeakable misery, the greater because I do not sufficiently feel it, I neither feel happiness nor misery enough. A cold indifference and lukewarmness about the concerns of my soul, at this time seems to possess me. And what shall I do? And yet I find great compassion in my heart for the miseries of other people, and more patience to bear affronts and injuries; I am afraid to give way to anger or resentment in any degree, and if it burns in my heart my mouth is shut and it is smothered; but not so with lust, it gets the dominion over me, and as it always was, so it continues to be, the very pest and perplexity of my life. Being but a servant I cannot marry without entailing beggary and misery upon myself, and I see with open eyes the work of God destroyed in my soul, and I think I cannot help it; the Spirit strives but faintly, and my heart is so treacherous and desperately wicked, and I have been so accustomed to folly that I am continually betrayed into sin and misery and folly. I am at my wits' end, and yet all calm and quiet within; my understanding and former experience shews me my intolerable danger and misery, but my heart, and affections seem to have no share in the matter, or insensibly given up to something else. O dear Sir, consider my case, excuse the long broken account, and if your wisdom can suggest to you the reason of my miserable situation, I hope your compassion will prompt you to favor me with good council in a line directed for me—Your most unworthy servant—THOMAS YATES.—(at Mr. Hooke's in the Globe Court, Fish Street Hill, London.)

Here was a case of conscience indeed, set forth with all its symptoms, in the clearest manner, but one which, we may well suppose, if presented to some of our self-constituted evangelical doctors and critics, would have either totally nonplussed them, or have elicited a volume of vain Babylonish prescriptions and advices, as proceeding not from actual science of the constitution of grace and nature, but from mere rote divinity knowledge. And as nature would not be regarded therein, so the root of the disorder would not be directly touched, nor the cure be effected in the true homœopathic manner. Let us see how Mr. Law treats the case according to his principles, as elucidated in the closing Dialogue of the "Spirit of Love." His reply we had not, but it has been accidentally discovered, having been sent for publication to the "Monthly Ledger, or Literary Repository" for May, 1787, by the very person to whom it was addressed; and it is in the following terms:—

"Poor honest man——Whom I much love and esteem, your letter has been lost amongst a multiplicity of papers, and is but just found by me. I am not without hopes but God and time may have done that for you in a better way, than it would have been done by me. To be left in distress is oftentimes the only way to be delivered from it; and when help seems to be the farthest off, then are we nearest to the place where it can only be had. Happy is that desolation wheresoever it comes, that forces us to see no glimpse of relief, but in giving up ourselves blindly, implicitly, and wholly to the redeeming power and goodness of God, without the least thought or conceit of having any other or more goodness, than what his holy Nature and Spirit bring forth in us. This is the one great point with you, and all your remedy lies in it. Your way is short; no variety of rules and practices, no methods of finding help from yourself or any creaturely thing, no length or variety of fine composed prayers, will do that for you which you want to have done. All these things in your present case, stand between you and God. They will only help you, as that infirm woman in the Gospel was helped, by spending all that she had on physicians and medicines. She was nothing bettered, but rather grew worse, till the time came that all that was within her said, 'If I may but touch the hem of his garment, I shall be whole.' A blind, unreasoning, absolute faith in God, offering up all your sins, without any reflections on their nature, quality or degree, to the mere mercy of God, to be consumed in that blessed furnace of love, which made God become a suffering, dying Redeemer, is your only infallible and full relief. Any other way but this, however full of religious contrivances, will only keep up both your weakness and perplexity under it. But to this faith, everything must yield. All things are possible to it: it draws Divine virtue from the hem of a garment; it can remove mountains, pluck up whole trees of sin by the roots, make lepers clean, and raise the dead to life.

If I end here, perhaps you will think my advice too short, but if I add nothing else to it, it is because I would have you only attentive to the one thing needful, and the one thing only available to your salvation. Only, have a strict eye upon your outward life, be temperate in everything, and, as much as you can, avoid temptations. But in this and everything else, place nothing in your own care and resolutions, but do all that you do, not as contrivances to help yourself, but as acts of faith and dependence upon the power of God, living and working in your soul all that is or can be holy or good in it. Prayer of the heart is the most principal work or fruit of faith. And as our faith is, such will our prayers be, always. But neither faith nor prayer is ours, but as they both come out of our own hearts.

The soul therefore, that lives by faith, will have no need of being outwardly taught the following spirit of prayer, it will be as constant as the beating of the pulse of the heart, always living in it, and being unseparable from it: it will, with and without words, be continually crying to God——

'O infinite, fathomless depth of never ceasing love! save me from myself, from the disorderly workings of my own evil nature. Kindle, with the fire of thy Divine love, the dead [latent] powers of that first holy life, which thou breathedst into the first created man.

'O quicken and revive the heavenly seed, which thy redeeming mercy in Christ Jesus hath planted in my soul, that it may come to the full birth, that thy holy Jesus may be truly formed and fully revealed in my soul; that I may be born again of him, be in him a new creature, led and governed by his holy Spirit, ever living, dwelling, and working all that is within me and proceeds from me.

'O holy and adorable God of light and love, of mercy and goodness, of glory and majesty, everywhere present! manifest the power of thy holy nature within me. Help me to such a true and living faith in thee, such earnest hunger and thirst, and longing desire of thy holy nature, that all that is within me may seek and find, worship and adore, the life-giving power of thy holy presence in my soul. That all that is within me may be humbly, earnestly, and obediently resigned, devoted, and attentive to thy holy Will, ever-speaking Word, ever-sanctifying Spirit, within me;—turned from every thing or thought, that is not of thee, thy holy will and heavenly working in my soul.'

That every blessing of God may be continually with you, is the hearty prayer of—Your most affectionate friend and servant—W. LAW.

P.S.—Never think of God but as an infinity of overflowing love, who wills nothing by the creation, but to be the comfort, the blessing, and joy of every life according to its capacity. And let this idea, which is the truth of truths, animate and govern all that you think, or say, or do, either towards God, or man."

Thus Mr. Law's reply. The state of spiritual or legal bondage in which this honest and sincere Thomas Yeates was held, when he wrote to Mr. Law, has reminded the writer of the case of Dr. Johnson, who was certainly better acquainted with Law than may be generally supposed. As we wish to make no assertion which is not borne out by facts, we must remind the reader that John Payne, as we have already mentioned, was so imbued with the spirit of Law, that he merely reproduced and published his thoughts and expressions almost to the letter; and we need not add, that a man so inoculated with extreme admiration of a writer, is sure to make him a common subject of his intimate private conversations. Now we find from published historical notices, that Payne supplied Johnson with money, and aided him in bringing out The Rambler, in fact,

"Son système (writes Tourlet, the author of another Notice historique of Saint Martin) a pour but d'expliquer tout par l'homme; l'homme, selon lui, est la clef de toute énigme, et l'image de was a great support to him in variety of ways. It is certain that with such opportunities as this connection must have afforded him, he would not fail to make some impression on Johnson, and if we could only get at the fact, we should doubtless find that the latter knew Law thoroughly; as may indeed be inferred not only from his imitations of Law's style of drawing characters, in the before mentioned periodical, but from other circumstances. We learn for example, from Croker's edition of Boswell, that a lady and Johnson were discussing Law's writings, when the former expressed to him her opinion that the Appeal was the clearest of all his later works; and we are directly informed how familiar was Johnson with his early writings. For our own part we conceive there to have been some misapprehension in Boswell, (who, himself, most probably had not read Law's works, nor was his taste that way, if even he were at all conversant with the ideas and language of theology,) when, in the "Life," (it will be remembered,) he relates a conversation between Johnson and others, as to who were the most perfect logicians of the day, and that, when Law's name was submitted the second or third in the series, Johnson replied, 'Oh, Law does not know how to argue.' Now Johnson's whole life was a proof to the contrary—that he could not have thought so; for Law's writings were, so to speak, a constant mirror before his mind, of the true becomingness, rule and perfection of human nature, of, in short, the law; wherein he saw himself, when he durst reflect upon himself, as a swinish, self-condemned, sinful spirit—and his was not an intellect to be affected by the crude declamations of popular theology, nor by anything less than strict demonstration. Not apprehending the precise nature of Gospel Christianity, whereby he might become renewed, according to his innate consciousness, in moral purity; and enslaved as he felt himself to be, to his rational, hogish tavern and table delights and sensualities, hence we see at once the secret of his constant mental depression and bondage; for the spirit of his life was like that of a guilty criminal, ever expecting the moment of his trial and execution.

In this connexion, we shall give a letter, though a little out of date, wrote by Mr. Law to a Mr. John Lewsley of Bristol, merchant, in answer to one from him—as illustrating the edifying purport and invariable tenor of his spiritual advices. His whole remedy for those who applied to him, in every case, (from the date of his "Three Letters to a Lady inclined to enter into the Church of Rome," in 1732,) consisting in an implicit faith, and total abandonment to the sole operation of the all-working, redeeming spirit of Christ in the soul. This letter is invaluable in regard to its instruction:—

"Kings Cliffe. July 9th. 1755.—My dear Friend—For so I must call you, though unknown to me, yours of the 27th. of May came safe to hand.

Your true conduct under your present light is to turn inwards, and endeavour to find and feel the truth and reality of those doctrines there, which you begin to have a sight of.

For all that I have written is only to help mankind, in this age of darkness, controversy, and delusion, to find the full truth and fundamental ground of all the doctrines of salvation, as plainly written and demonstrated in the essence, state and condition of their own souls, as they are in scripture. [This sentence might serve, amongst others, as a motto to Mr. Law's later writings.]

Under such a conviction as this, you come to this knowledge, that all is to be transacted between God and yourself; and that as you are, so is God towards you: and therefore you are to look for no good, but from such a state of heart, or kind of prayer, as keeps you continually uniting yourself to God, in steadily believing, and fully expecting to be delivered from all your evil, through the merits, mediation, and heavenly birth of the holy Jesus in your own soul.

Form no idea of the progress you make, nor stand upon the watch how it advances in you. Give God your heart, desire only to die to yourself, and every thing that hinders your living unto Him, and then your road is safe and good, whatever you meet in it.

All my books will at present be of use to you, provided you read them as your instruction how to find and know the misery and corruption of your fallen nature, and the absolute impossibility of ever being delivered from it, but by turning to God through Jesus Christ. For they mean nothing else but to lead you from me, and from yourself, from all trust in created things, to expect and find all that you want, in God alone, in the immediate operation of his living Word and Spirit in your soul.

In all your readings, 'read more with your heart, than with your head: and never exercise your mind in apprehending any difficult matters, or stay upon them, whenever you meet them.

Your heart given up to God will have its sufficient daily illumination, and, in its proper time, its true fitness for the understanding of every matter, than can be a blessing to you. And be assured of this, that no knowledge but that which is born within you, from a heart in union with the eternal Word and Spirit of God, is worth a moment's thought.—My dear friend, Adieu.—W. LAW."

In the early part of this year, it would appear, Mr. Langcake had introduced one Mr. Richard Clarke, a numerical mystic and prophetic writer, to the notice of Mr. Law, and to solicit a subscription on his behalf, towards the publication of a spiritual work, he being in indigent circumstances. The following letter will show with what genuine kindness of heart the desired pecuniary aid was afforded:—

"Jany. 24th. 1756.—My dear friend—I had just sent mine to you by the post of this day, before yours came to hand, and so you have the trouble of a second letter. I am much pleased with your having acquainted me with Clarke's affair; and it is a pleasure to me to do anything through your hands, who are quite dear to me. You may go directly to my Nephew in Cornhill for the five pounds. Your demand of it in my name will be sufficient, and with my service, you may tell him that he will hear from me in a post or two. I have no time to say any more.—Dear soul, Adieu.—W. LAW."

The following letter written some months afterwards evidently relates to the same subject; the book, with which Mr. Law proposed to kindle his chamber fire, being the very work to the publication of which, he had himself subscribed, according to the foregoing epistle:—

"Aug. 29th. 1756.—My dear Langcake—As it is usual with you to receive letters from me toute vérité; prenant ainsi à la lettre ce fameux oracle de Delphes, nosce te ipsum, il soutient que, pour ne pas se méprendre sur l'existence et sur l'harmonie de tous les êtres composant l'unithat may be said to have nothing in them, but the good will of the writer, so I shall make no apology for this, which has no more to say for itself.

I could not let my Nephew come empty handed to you from me, and if you will call this something, you will do it a great honor.

Your friend Clarke's piece will have its place amongst those books that at certain times, help to kindle my fire. This is not through contempt or disregard of him or his pen, but because I know of no better use of such materials. It is all the good that I can have from them. If the public should have as bad a taste as I have, he must, as he says, lay aside his pen.

But though I am thus hard to be pleased, yet every line that comes from you is laid amongst my choicest papers. Take a loving adieu from—WM. LAW.

In the due order of our narrative we shall find occasion to notice this writer again, where Mr. Law refers to his prophetic calculations and the doctrine of final restitution. We may observe here that he professed to have discovered the key to the secret numbers and symbols of scripture, and ventured to determinately foretell and publish the year (if not the exact day and hour) of the second coming of Christ which was to be at the latter part of the last century. And his writings are composed, in a great measure, of such unprofitable speculations concerning the councils of the divine wisdom. He followed in the train of the old fanatics, though Swedenborg beats them all hollow, as he said the last judgment really happened in the year 1756, and that the disciples were then sent through the regions of spiritual nature to preach the Gospel!! (The gospel of the redemption of man from the fall by Jesus Christ, so that true believers at the hour of death follow Christ into paradise, and the unregenerate abide in the root of nature, having no light of him in them.) Such were the Baron's conceptions of the scheme and constitution of Christianity.

We have mentioned the friendship which existed between the celebrated John Byrom of Manchester, M.D., poet and short hand writer, and Mr. Law. Byrom, it would seem, had turned some part of Law's writings into poetry, and on proposing to continue the transformation, had at the first blush, been encouraged by the latter to do so. This intimacy in all probability began in a similar way to other instances of friendship with an author, who was sought as we have said, by all classes of persons, learned and unlearned, not only as a spiritual adviser and sage, but as one of the first spirits of the age, whose friendship was highly honorable and beneficial to those who could secure it. This surmise is confirmed by Byrom's application to Law in 1736, on account of a lady who was about to join the Quakers; on which occasion Law wrote the five letters mentioned in the note, p. 363-4. The attachment of Dr. Byrom was of that chivalrous character that his whole arsenal of wit and learning was always ready in the defence of Mr. Law, in whose service he volunteered as a sort of champion. In illustration of this, we purpose to insert from the documents in our possession three letters of his correspondence with Warburton. They belong indeed to an earlier date than that at which we have arrived, but as it was in the year 1757 that Law himself took up the lash to scourge his rampant flippant antagonist, we could not give them in a more appropriate place than the present.

Warburton, we have observed, following in the wake of Trap, but in his own brutal style, had attacked Law (through Wesley and others), more particularly in a volume of sermons, which, after Mr. Law's death, were distended into the "Doctrine of Grace," and made the occasion of a reply to Mr. Law's strictures in his "Address to the Clergy," and "Letters." It was against attacks of this nature, which Law himself could not stoop to notice, that Dr. Byrom had opposed himself in the correspondence we are about to cite; which, as we possess it, commences with the reply of Byrom to Warburton's first letter. It should be stated that the copy of this correspondence we hold, is in Byrom's handwriting, being made out and sent to Mr. Law, accompanied by the following note:—

"Tuesday Morning. April 21st. 1752.—There has been no opportunity of obeying your direction in sending the Answer to Mr. W.'s first [letter], which you have a copy of, and the short notice of one at present but just affords a leisure for an hasty transcribing of it, together with his Second and its Answer, for your perusal, and opinion of this new and unexpected correspondence; and how to manage in returning civilities, and preserving freedom properly, in case of a continuance. With which you will favor—his Excellency—Your Poet."

The copy of the letter from Warburton above alluded to, we have not been able to discover; and the answer to it of the date of February 2nd. 1752 by Byrom, as well as Warburton's mild and well written reply, dated Prior Park, near Bath, April 3d. 1752, and Byrom's rejoinder of April 10th. same year, on account of their great length, we (now) perceive we must defer to the proposed larger biography, as other interesting letters and correspondence with Law, of the years 1736-7, and of Law with Byrom up to the year 1760.

This correspondence will elucidate how Law was kept au fait of the treatment of him by Warburton, and others; whose judgment slumbered not, as we are about specially to notice.

Byrom as we have seen, subscribes himself "Your Poet" in writing to Law, and the second volume of his "Poems," by the copious versifications it contains of Law's writings, almost in the original words, testifies how he, like Payne, must have been captivated with Law's style of thought and diction. Wesley in his Journals, of 1773, notices these Poems in the following words:—

"Read Dr. Byrom's Poems. He has all the wit and humour of Dr. Swift, together with much more learning, a deep and strong understanding, and above all, a serious vein of piety. A few things in the second volume are taken from Jacob Behmen; to whom I object, &c. &c."; see the quotation, and remarks upon it, in Note of p. 93.—He continues, "But setting these things aside, we have some of the finest sentiments that ever appeared in the English tongue; some of the noblest truths expressed with the utmost energy of language, and the strongest colors of poetry. So that, upon the whole, I trust this publication will much advance the cause of God, and of true religion."

Now these very fine sentiments and noble truths were chiefly Mr. Law's, put into verse by his admiring friend and poet. But what must be said of Wesley's pertinacious judging of Behmen, vers, il suffit à l'homme de se bien connaître lui-même, parce que le corps de l'homme a un rapport-nécessaire avec tout ce qui est visible, et que son esprit est le type de tout ce qui est invisible, whom he admits he does not understand, and notwithstanding the demonstrations under which he had smarted, and hard knocks on the head he had received for his previous perverseness and stupidity, but that a spirit of malevolence, surpassing any sudden surprise of fabulous fox and grapes wrathfulness, would seem to have possessed him towards the blessed man. That such was the opinion of some in his day, appears from a pamphlet now before us, printed in the year 1783, thus entitled: "A Word to the Rev. Mr. John Wesley, on account of his great Enmity to Behmen, and calling him, Demonosopher. To which is added, Behmen's Refutation of the shameful and disgraceful Libel of the Primate of Görlits, against his Book of True Repentance &c.; because, it is a full Answer to all the Objections and Malevolent Speeches, that ever have been, or ever shall be uttered and published against him." It was, doubtless, the perusal of this pamphlet, that induced Henry Brooke, as recited at the foot of p. 91, to rebuke Mr. Wesley for his rash, ungovernable spirit and sinfulness, and which gave occasion for the letter there quoted, written by Wesley, in reply. Though unhappily, Wesley too often sinned and repented in instances affecting the prominent features of his peculiar idiosyncrasy and complexion. The following are extracts from this publication:—

"Sir—Your attack on J. B. in your 'Arminian Magazine' of April, 1782, discovers too great a degree of malevolence to be suffered to pass unnoticed. Many pious and learned men both in the past and present century, thought him deserving the title of theosopher; but you, full of hatred to the man—the reason is obvious, after searching his writings for matter of accusation, most unmercifully and unfairly drag him before the public, and pass upon him the severest sentence a malevolent heart could utter.

But did you, Sir, never feel a spark of love arise in your heart for an author you thought you had reaped benefit from? And can you think that there are not some now existing, who have received benefit from Behmen's writings? How astonished must such then be, to see a man of your character standing forth in the decline of life, abusing, reviling, and calling Behmen a demonosopher!

The late Dr. Newton, Bishop of Bristol, in his prophecies, vol. iii. 194, speaking of Savonarola, who in the fifteenth century preached against the luxury, vices, and debauchery of the Roman clergy, and was burned by them for so doing, says, "all persons of any note and eminence bear a double character in the world, and so doth Savonarola—his admirers extolling him as the best of men and the prophet of God, his enemies reviling him as the worst of impostors and hypocrites; but if his works may speak for him, they are in the opinion of Dupin, full of grace and maxims of piety." Dr. Newton lived to see the above observation exactly verified. He himself thought well of Savonarola; but Dr. Warburton, late Bishop of Gloucester, and Dr. Newton's contemporary, in his Doctrine of Grace falls most outrageously on Savonarola, giving him the worst and blackest character, and then (Horresco referens) compares Mr. Law to the deformed picture he had drawn, because Mr. Law had written an Answer to him which he could not confute.

And is there no enmity in the heart of Mr. Wesley against Mr. Law, for correcting him in his "Letters," on account of his illiberal and unchristian treatment of Mr. Law, in his Preservative? Hinc ille Lachrymæ!

O Sir! what could provoke you to call Behmen a demonosopher? Did you conceive that by rendering him detestable, you might make Mr. Law odious?—But if you do not understand the "language of nature," (which Behmen did, as may be seen in his Life, lately published by Mr. Okely of Northampton), you certainly understand English, I shall therefore here present you with Behmen's Defence of himself against a Libel of the Primate of Görlits, being a most abusive invective against his little book of the Way to Christ. You will there see an angry malicious zealot, attributing as well as yourself, his writings to the devil; and others will have the satisfaction to see as complete an overthrow of all his adversaries as ever was written. * * * [Hereupon is given the "Defence." After which the Expostulator proceeds thus:—]

"From the date of this curious libel it appears to have been published March 27th. 1624. Behmen's answer was written and dated April 10th. a fortnight after; and the 18th. of November following, he died. His friends finding it in MS. printed it in vindication of his innocence; and a better proof could not be adduced either to acquit or condemn him than his own words. If Mr. Wesley therefore can convict him out of this Answer to the Primate of Görlits, or out of the Way to Christ, of being taught by the devil, and that he drew what he wrote from the bottomless pit, I will acknowledge my ignorance and error. * * *

Did Mr. Wesley ever read with attention Behmen's "Way to Christ?" I speak of this book, because this was the only one he ever printed. As to the rest printed after his death, some I am apt to think, had he lived, would never have been published; for he was continually receiving questions to answer, requests to write on various subjects, and answering letters. But you, Sir, are still living, and are the author of abundance of Tracts, and doubtless have been careful to expunge all inaccuracies, and to send them forth to the press correct. But notwithstanding, have you not published downright contradictions? And were not many of these contradictions lately collected out of your writings by Mr. —, and published, that you might see your inconsistencies? But have you ever made the least excuse or apology for yourself? "If the trumpet (saith St. Paul) gives an uncertain sound, who can make himself ready for the battle?" Before you attempted therefore to take the "mote out of your brother's eye," should you not "first have pulled the beam out of your own?" "Who art thou (saith St. James) that judgest another?"

But before we part, Sir, I would ask why Behmen in so many of your Magazines, should be made the object of your resentment? Even his death I perceive could not escape you. What (say you) was there remarkable in Behmen's death? To the jaundiced eye every thing appears discolored. Had not malevolence taken deep root in your heart you never could have asked such a question. His last words were some of the most remarkable that ever were uttered. * * * But to return.

At the period of his close intimacy with Mr. Law, Byrom was instrumental in the publication of a new edition of Behmen's "Way to Christ," as stated in the following quotations from the pre-

Que l'homme étudie donc, et ses facultés physiques dépendantes de l'organisation de son corps, et ses facultés intellectuelles dont l'exercice est souvent influencé par les sens ou par les objets face to the last edition of that work, in 12mo., by the aforesaid Mr. Edward Fisher and others, and printed at Bath, A.D. 1775, by Hazard, for Thos. Mills, Bristol:—

"The English translation (it is there stated) of the 'Way to Christ,' was first printed in 24mo., for Humphrey Blunden, a lover of the Teutonic theosophy, in the year 1654. And again, near a hundred years afterwards, in 1752, at Manchester, in 12mo. under the auspices of the late pious and ingenious Dr. Byrom, who was likewise an admirer of this divine writer." But the French translation of this work, published at Berlin, in the year 1722, is, as we have already intimated, more to our mind, both as to arrangement of the several contents, and to its rendering, the phraseology and style being of a more popular and regular character.

We must not omit one particular in reference to Byrom, which, however trifling, is worthy of observation, on account of the individual concerned. We allude to the marriage of a relation of his of the same name, with the holy Bramwell; whom we have so often referred to, as a classic model of a gospel Christian or regenerate believer, and of a pastor and priest of Jesus Christ. Especially as exhibiting, in his spiritual walk, the pursuit of the proper object of a religious life, namely the attainment of "the full birth of the spirit of love," "entire sanctification," "the marriage of the lamb," by the proper means of growth in grace and arrival at that state, namely the due order and proportions of physical with psychical devotion. So that, in his practice, may be traced, a direct, beaten path of ascent, without deviations in it either to the right or to the left, from the natural fallen state of man, to the highest degree of spiritual, Christian renovation.—Many have been the eminent examples of renewed, regenerate souls amongst the truly devoted to God in this country (and some the writer is acquainted with), and also among the foreign spiritualists, Romish and Protestant; (and it perhaps would be difficult to conceive purer sanctity and greater devotion than what distinguished Gregory Lopez and others that might be named, of Spain and France;) but, we remark, never probably, has the church produced a more accomplished example of a practical, solid, Gospel christian and ecclesiastic. His spiritual state being the pure growth and fruit not of religious notions or book knowledge, but of a simple reception of Gospel doctrine, according to its prima-facie sense, and a laborious, conformity of practice accordingly; especially in the instance of importunate and unceasing prayer, and that total self-denial which is essential to the true and actual exercise of it. The precepts and counsels, and example, and spirit of humility and meekness of Jesus Christ, and the elucidations of Apostolic sentiment and action, were his constant study, and so he became what may be termed, a standard regenerate man; the gravity and seriousness of his character being doubtless much aided by his natural complexion which was of that turn. No fiction of the popular, lazy "justification by faith" doctrine, could mystify and delude him; no jumping into all the privileges and enjoyments of religion, simply on believing; but the good old common sense mode of diligent, laborious dying to self, of striving, watching, praying, agonizing, was the way he pursued, and this as the preparation of the heart, for God to raise up therein the perfect image of his well-beloved Son;—this we say, was Bramwell's orthodox salvation-doctrine and process, as it was that of his master and redeemer, Jesus Christ. It is labour—exercise—practice, that makes perfect in salvation as in other arts.

And had Bramwell been called to it, and favored accordingly with the "Word of wisdom," through the theosophic elucidations of Behmen, the world might have viewed in him the true Christian worker of miracles, described Mark xvi. 17, 18, and divine magus or alchemist. Which latter (N.B.) can only arise out of Bramwell's ground of experience and regenerate manhood: his process and attainments being the way, and subordinate qualifications of the philosophical artist. Verbum sat.

Bidding adieu to the amiable, quaint old English poet, Byrom, we now resume our narrative, which left us at the commencement of the year 1757. We have already noticed the Babylonish confusion into which the Protestant scholastic theology had sunk. We have also mentioned one or two strange doctrines which the enthusiastic sectarians, and so called "first Reformers" had adopted; though alas! ignorance of theological truth and its constituent relations, was not confined to these, or to the field preachers which overran this country, and in a less measure, Holland and Germany. The learned themselves, though many of them very devout, were groping about in equal mental and spiritual darkness; just as in the case of Newman and other examples of the mongrel divinity science and would-be spiritualism of our own times. The objects of their rational contentions, and wrangling amongst each other, were not however, the flagrant blasphemous and preposterous doctrines of election, reprobation &c., &c., but were so to speak of a more sober cast, as befitting erudite minds. For instance, one of the subjects of learned discussion at the early part of the last century, was concerning the immortality of the soul, the celebrated Mr. Henry Dodwell maintaining that immortality was not natural to it, but conferred by Christian baptism! It will be needless to recount the varieties of monstrous abortions brought forth by university learning severed from a knowledge of the natural grounds of Christianity, or the plain letter, analogy, and sure guide of scripture. But we relate another instance, which will bring us into the train of our present narrative. Namely that Warburton, who was celebrated as a Leviathan of scholastic learning, and for his intimate familiarity with the ribaldry (and filth) of classic poets of all ages down to the "Dunciad," being in holy orders, as a true son of the church, must needs (thus equipped), write a learned book in defence of Christianity. One of the novel hypotheses he therein advanced and most learnedly maintained, "dragging (as it is said) the Scripture by the hair of the head" to support his position, was, that the ancient Jews were not instructed in the knowledge of a future state, by the writings of their great lawgiver Moses, at the same time he ventured to handle rather cavalierly Dr. Sherlock, the then Bishop of London, who incidentally, in some of his published discourses, had affirmed the direct contrary. The work we here refer to, the "Divine Legation of Moses" the reader will doubtless be acquainted with, as a mass of great learning, and not improbably, destined by its author to form an eternal monument to his presumed unparalleled genius and erudition, if not a stepping stone (in the absence of a political pamphlet) to a high seat in the school of Christ, if thereby be understood the Anglican church establishment.

Now, it appeared to Mr. Law, was the time arrived to take his sippant antagonist in hand; t extérieurs, et ses facultés morales ou sa conscience qui suppose en lui une volonté libre; c'est dans cette étude qu'il doit rechercher la vérité, et il trouvera en lui-même tous les moyens nécesrebuke his pride and coarseness, and to vindicate the interests of Christian truth, without himself entering into a personal contention.

Now also, was the opportunity providentially presented, (as in the case of Trap,) for him to exhibit, to the edification and incitement of the theological world, a new and further display of the lofty and enlightened science of mystical divinity and theosophy—such indeed as we would propose systematically to cultivate, amongst other evangelical prerogatives and divine attainments, in our projected theosophic college; where indeed, the highest popular scholastic erudition and intellectual ability might form mere rudimentary qualifications of the student, who would thence ascend through all the degrees of divine science, up to the sublimated light and wisdom of pure truth, which only is the proper centre, where to obtain a just judgment of matters not only of theology but of all philosophy.

To attempt any particular description of the manner in which Mr. Law performs his proposed task in the work we are now to notice, beyond what has been hitherto stated thereupon, would only tend to sink rather than elucidate its merits, we shall therefore content ourselves with remitting the reader to the perusal of the work, not doubting of his subsequent full acquiescence in the sobriety and justness of our representations of its character. But, such an exposure of incapacity as Warburton is therein made to undergo, it may be said, few if any men of his pretensions have had to suffer. The title page reads thus:—"A short but sufficient Confutation of the Rev. Dr. Warburton's Projected Defence (as he called it) of Christianity, in his 'Divine Legation of Moses.' In a Letter to The Right Rev. The Lord Bishop of London. A.D. 1757."

We have remarked how Wesley in the "Selections" he published, from Mr. Law's Writings, —of what he considered evangelical and edifying in them, reprinted almost the entire of this work, which yet, though of popular apprehension, seems every page of it, with such mystic implications, science and developments, as he on a different occasion, would have rejected as "Behmenish, void, and vain." But here the truth and the application of it to Warburton, were so racy and admirable, as to be irresistible even to Mr. Wesley.

We cannot however conclude our notice of this work without specifying one of its peculiar practical features, namely, that it may be regarded as a model theological review, written according to the highest science; and, whilst confuting the unfounded pretensions of the author under examination, and replacing the same by the proper sense and understanding, throwing out right and left wherever an opening in the argumentation will allow, and as fast as the mind of the reader can receive the knowledge without being dazzled and confounded by it, flashes of sublime instruction in the deepest and most concerning mysteries of nature and the Gospel—such vertices indeed as could only be discoverable in their vastitude and harmonious unity, and be directly demonstrated, by such a mystic eagle-eye, and powerful logical intellect as distinguished Mr. Law. In fine we have in this letter, the conclusion of the philosophy of the "Appeal" the "Way to Divine Knowledge" and "Spirit of Love," with an example of its applicability in the resolution of theological problems. And in such respect, (coupling with it the "Case of Reason" as will be well understood why, on due reflection upon the capacity of that work,) it may not be unapily regarded, as the topstone of the great bulwark of Christianity, contained in the author's writings.

For, whilst mere unilluminated reason in the speculating minds of Hume, Bolingbroke, Gibbon, Voltaire, and other free-thinkers, gazing up at nature, at the stars of heaven, those innumerable worlds of the universe, amongst which, the globe we inhabit is scarcely comparable for magnitude to a grain of sand on the sea shore, and, considering the Great Spirit of life, power, and wisdom, which must be everywhere present to sustain and move all; and then turning mentally to the professed revelation of the Jewish and Christian scriptures,—can feel no secret, intrinsic affinity between them, as might reasonably be expected if revelation were true; especially how this vast universe of worlds was made chiefly in respect to this little grain of sand, our globe, and altogether solely with reference to that little atom of intellectual vitality upon it, man. Further, considering, if man were what he is represented by revelation, the formal son of this Great Spirit, he would not be left by him in such darkness with respect to his nature and will, but that he would make himself known, sensible and evident to man; would interpose for oppressed virtue and goodness, and openly threaten and punish the wickedness, injustice and diabolical cruelty everywhere prevalent on the earth. Then again, arguing, How can any man, enjoying his rational powers, believe that this Great Spirit, who is always present beyond the remotest fixed star as here and everywhere, opened himself in a central point and became a man, in whom according to the Christian gospel, dwelt all the fulness of the God-head bodily, and yet not a hundred thousandth part of the inhabitants of the earth, the workmanship of his hands, have the least just conception, if any belief of this alleged verity; and that this mysterious incarnation in the so termed fallen humanity, died to atone for the sins of the world, as if the Great Universal, were it needful, could not have forgiven and reharmonised man of his own accord. And then again, sagaciously remarking, How artfully has Moses put together the Old Testament scriptures, and what a tale he tells to his own people, over whom he was more than emperor, and who durst not disbelieve or oppose him on pain of instant death; of the creation of this universe only about six thousand years ago, and all in the period of six days or one hundred and forty-four hours, of the making of man, then some time afterwards of woman, then how a serpent talked with her (as an ass did afterwards to a man) and deceived her and so brought death into the world. How the Great Universal Spirit of impartial goodness, chose the Israelitish nation to be his special favorites, notwithstanding the fraud, lies and deceit which formed the basis of their particular establishment, in Rebecca and Jacob, and the subsequent wickedness of their children, yea he chose this little branch of the great human tree, above all the stem and other chief branches, with their learning science and religion, though undeniably sprung from the great Shem, inheriting his knowledge and being his imitators in the devout worship of this Great Spirit; from whom, indeed, Moses himself and themselves had derived all the knowledge they possessed. How, further, (Moses relates) the Great Spirit appeared to him and talked with him, and enabled him to lead the people out; how the Great Spirit at his bidding, destroyed thousands upon thousands of (his other children) the poor unoffending inhabitants of saïres pour y arriver. Voilà ce que l'auteur appelle la révélation naturelle. Par exemple, la plus

Egypt with their innocent little ones, pitiable cattle and their pastures, with such horrible plagues as would rack invention to conceive, and then drowned king Pharaoh and all his hosts in the Red sea. And afterwards sanctioned (in these his alleged favorites) such butchering murders and horrible villainies as put all the murders of a Mahomet, an Alexander, or a Napoleon, completely in the shade for significance—all these horrors being inflicted by the Great Spirit of life and love upon such myriads of his children, purely for the sake of his favorite little number of Israelites: so Moses seems to represent, though no documents or monuments have ever been found in Egypt bearing the most remote allusion to such incredible, apochryphal great events. How, further, he, Moses brought the people into the sandy desert and kept them there forty years, and fed them not by ordinary food but by bread daily actually sent down from the sky, (though what is sky?) with the food indeed of angels! (Representations of the Israelites as stationed in the desert, with their tents, and in the midst the strange Mormon or pin-fold looking tabernacle about town)—and this handful of illiterate ignorants, worse than Mormonists, forsooth! the only favorites of that Being, who at that very moment thus represented, was blessing and rendering fertile ten thousand lands, and imparting his spirit light and life to millions of rational and devout souls in all nations!! Then, again, how cleverly Moses provides against gainsayers and counter evidence, for he distinctly kills in less than forty years every soul but two, that he had brought out of Egypt, and that knew how things were going on in the world—as to the Chartists and Radicals he swallowed them up on the first tokens of rebellion; and these two, though he for a special purpose allowed them a little intercourse without, but not to come within “the wholesome influence of the external world,” yet when they had served his purpose they die also—and so forth, through all the other seeming irrationalities. (For objections against the Jewish and Christian history, see the Deistical writings of the early part of the last century, and others)——

Now we say, whilst unenlightened ‘reason’ thus gazes at the alleged facts and surface of the biblical revelation, as it has been observed “like a heifer at a new door to its stall,” wondering and unable to reconcile them with nature, sense and experience, yet at the same time feeling itself in a worse dilemma than the simple believer, as being totally submerged in an abyss of darkness and uncertainty as to its origin and destination, and relations to the Great Spirit of the Deity which yet it fully acknowledges—this treatise, or “Confutation of Warburton’s projected Defence,” (with the “Case of Reason” added, as we have observed,) summarily clears up (to the satisfaction of the qualified reader,) the seeming paradoxes and per se unaccountable events which characterize the Christian scheme: shewing the mystery and golden thread which runs through all its parts, and exhibiting the parallels (impossible to have been invented by art,) between the first and second Adam, and the circumstances that are related as having transpired at the creation and the fall of the former, and at the birth and in the process of redemption of the latter. Demonstrating then, as Mr. Law does therein, succinctly, the truth of the divine economy of the Jews, and the ground of the extraordinary facts appertaining to the history of Christianity, narrated by Moses, so as to place all beyond dispute—we consider, we may fairly regard such a work as the topstone of the impregnable bulwark of Christianity contained in his own (and his espoused) writings, and the close of his philosophical elucidations. For although he wrote afterwards, (besides one or two trifling pieces,) the “Address to the Clergy,” this was not so much a book of divine philosophy, as a trumpet-blast, or powerful diapason and application of the graduated harmony, sum and object of his latter, or rather of his entire two-fold Elias ministration.

The following letter written by Mr. Law at this period to Mr. Langcake, will shew that the Bishop of London, Dr. Sherlock, fully appreciated the merits of Mr. Law’s work, and the honor he had done him in its publication:—

“June 9th. 1757.—My dear friend—I have I believe near half a dozen letters to thank you for; and am as much behind hand in the same acknowledgments to our good friend Mr. Ward. You must help one another to bear with me.

Mr. Gurney is here with us, but his hearing is so bad at this time, that the speaking is all on his side, and the hearing only on ours. And what makes us hear him with more pleasure, is his speaking so much about you.

Near a fortnight ago I received a very good and friendly letter from the Bishop of London and fancying you may be desirous of knowing what he says with regard to my book, I send you as follows in his own words, ‘Permit me to make my acknowledgments to you, for the honor you have done me in your Letter inscribed to me, in which I find many things that give me great satisfaction, and which must have great weight with all those, who seek only for the truth.’

I would have half a dozen of them covered with marble or blue paper, sent me by the first parcel that comes hither. I would also desire you to send forty of the ‘Christian Piety.’ Both these buy and pay for as yourself, and then take all expenses of my nephew. Ask Mr. Richardson if he knows whether any of them have been sent to the Universities. I would not have the advertising of it dropped yet.—Adieu.—W. LAW.”

We have already stated,—that this “Letter” or “Confutation” was never publicly noticed by Warburton. After the death of Mr. Law, when his “Address to the Clergy” was published, it was found to contain some further strictures upon Warburton’s writings, and a note, wherein he facetiously remarks, that though Warburton had recently been made a prelate, yet that he should continue to remark upon him as a plain “Mr. or Dr.,” being unwilling to charge such glaring errors and inconsistencies as he had pointed out upon a ‘Right Reverend Bishop’ as upon an ordinary man. Some short period afterwards, Warburton published his “Doctrine of Grace;” wherein he pretended to answer these latter criticisms. But of the poignant anguish of mind he suffered from Mr. Law’s magisterial corrections in the former publication, and in his “Collection of Letters,” we cannot perhaps have a better proof than the following raging and brutal remark, to which he gave utterance after the man—perhaps the only man whom he stood in terror of—was no more:—

“When I reflect (he writes, alluding to Mr. Law) on his wonderful insatiation, who has spent légère attention suffit, dit-il, pour nous apprendre que nous ne communiquons, et que nous ne a long life in hunting after, and with an incredible appetite devouring, the trash dropt from every species of Mysticism, it puts me in mind of what travellers tell us of a horrid fanaticism in the East, where the devotee makes a solemn vow never to taste of other food than what has passed through the entrails of some impure or savage animal. Hence their whole lives are passed (like Mr. Law's among his Ascetics) in woods and forests, far removed from the converse of mankind."

But as Payne in the "Letter" annexed to his "Evangelical Discourses, 1763," and Hartley in his "Defence of the Mystic Writers" appended to his "Paradise Restored," have both sufficiently commented upon the relations of Law and Warburton, we say no more, but refer the reader to those publications. Accidentally taking up a volume of Warburton's Works one day, we observed that, in writing to a friend upon his state of health and spirits, he calls to mind that Law once said (in his "Animadversions on Trap's Reply"), that his brain was "painted all over with hieroglyphics," but adding, "Law was wrong."

Among the number of authors to which the "Appeal" immediately gave rise, we are here reminded of having omitted to name (in addition to Freke) one Dr. Nichs. Robinson of the Royal College of Physicians, London, who we conceive, had been originally attracted to the recreative study of theological philosophy, by Mr. Law's Writings. In the year 1741, after the appearance of the "Appeal," he published a book with the following title:—"The Christian Philosopher, or a Divine Essay on the Doctrines of Man's universal Redemption. Proving from the Principles of Nature, the Maxims of Philosophy, and the Sacred Records of the Old and New Testaments, that the various Revolutions of the Human Nature, as they relate to the Creation, Fall and Redemption of Man, are grounded upon eternal Reason, and the Moral Fitness of Things." With an Appendix (published in the year following), being "A Physico-Theological Discourse on the Nature, Attributes, and Properties of the Serpent, that tempted Eve in Paradise. Demonstrating, from the common Reasons of Nature, that Moses, left to himself, and unassisted with the Spirit of God, never could have sketched out such a Plan of Things as he has left us, upon the Creation and Fall of Man." Prefaced by "A Supplemental Discourse on the Image of God, as it distinguished Adam from all other Creatures in Nature, and set him at the Head of the Creation."

This work appears to be the production of a mind that had been deeply impressed with the sentiments and style of Mr. Law's writings, more particularly of the "Case of Reason," and "Remarks on the Fable of the Bees," but which had been suddenly captivated by the novel manner of treating theological subjects of the "Appeal," and then, conceiving superior advantages to arise from uniting the scholastic metaphysical style of argumentation from "the nature and fitness of things" with the modes of reasoning suggested by a knowledge of the deep truths of nature revealed by Behmen, had accordingly composed this book, which is directed against deism and atheism, the objects of the two works above mentioned. But a student and imitator of Mr. Law is ever found to confound rather than render more luminous the subjects he has handled. This author proceeded no further with his avowed scheme, but remained passive until some twelve months after the publication of Mr. Law's "Confutation of Warburton," the perusal of which had evidently excited him afresh, and set him upon patching and enlarging his work. In this interval he would appear to have read Pike's "Philosophia Sacra," and other writers of the Hutchinsonian school. He, however, in the year 1758, published a new edition of the "Christian Philosopher," in two volumes, which, though interesting in its subjects, large in its scope of comprehension, and written in a style somewhat partaking of the ease, spirit, and simplicity of Mr. Law's diction, is a most imperfect work. The author has evidently ransacked Law and Behmen for truths relating to his scheme, but not understanding the actual grounds of their philosophy, neither the mind of Newton and other illustrators of philosophical truth, nor yet stepping cautiously in all his movements from certainty to certainty, but seeking chiefly, we say, to support his own conjectures, his work, so much of it as is his own, is a tissue of facts and unsound speculations. And, whilst affecting to be surprised at certain positions of his original authors (as if indeed he had had no intimacy with them), and of other orthodox writers concerning nature, he immediately afterwards reiterates their sense in his own form of expression. Still his work may suggest a popular mode of representing the truths of Behmen, with their illustrations, of modern discoveries of science and experimental philosophy.

The next Letter we notice in the unpublished correspondence of Mr. Law in our possession, is the following: "September 27th, 1757.—My dear friend—I thank you for yours of yesterday, but have not time to speak to the particulars of it as I would,—only take care of doctors. Griffith has no title to be regarded in anything he says.

I have returned Menozza, and have taken a surfeit of the little I have read of him. I am very willing to make an acknowledgment to the bookseller, and would have you give as you think proper, and to his own satisfaction.

The friendly salutation of this house waits upon my best beloved friend.—Je vous porte dans mon cœur.—W. LAW.

P.S.—Mr. Gambold was with me both before and after he was a Moravian. At first he came with six or seven of his fellow Methodists from Oxford, he only then hung down his head, spoke now or then a word or two, with much show of humility, meekness, &c. I said to one of them, whom I had been more acquainted with, that I could not tell what to make of Mr. Gambold, or why he should come to me. He said it was his great modesty that made him act in the manner.

When I afterwards saw him by himself, and he was more open, I could see nothing in him but that same kind of soft, humble, and meek language, that had nothing else in it. He afterwards consulted me by a letter from Oxford, in which he desired me to consider him as one that had been deeply experienced in all that the mystics had written in every age. And yet his letter was a full demonstration of quite the contrary.

Two or three of the chief Moravians made attempts upon me in the same show of meek, humble, and mighty deliberate language. This may perhaps have much helped forwards Mr. Gambold's uniting with them, for what they say has nothing to recommend it but their manner of saying it.

What a folly for a man to say he has read Behmen and the mystics, who can talk no better formons même aucune idée qu'elle ne soit précédée d'un tableau ou d'une image engendrée par about them than Mr. G. has done to you. The first thing to be done with any Moravian, is to shew him the necessity of confuting what has been laid to their charge and taken from their own books, by Rimius, the German; he has no title to be talked with till this is done."

As regards the systematic devotional practices of the "United Brethren,"—a Society, by the way, for the implicit obedience of its chief members to the head, Count Zinzendorf, not uncomparable to the Jesuits with their general, and their peculiar exciting doctrines, which captivated Wesley so much on his visit to Herrnhuth in the year 1738, as mentioned in his journals; and then his superinduction of parts both upon his own solid Church of England principles of piety, imbibed at the fountain of Law;—upon all these points we have afforded sufficient direction to the candidate, in the previous pages of this work. What Wesley afterwards thought and wrote of them, may be gathered from his publications, and from allusions in the "Enthusiasm of the M. and P. compared." There is evidently implied in these denunciations, something of a scandalous and grossly immoral nature, with respect to their more secret and sanctum sanctorum practices; and this is doubtless, what Rimius in his "Candid Narrative of the Herrnhuters," 8vo. 1751, published at length. All which indeed, is easily receivable by those readers, who have had any acquaintance with the uncontrolled popular workings of ignorant religious enthusiasm and antinomian principles, in this country and America;—though with the Herrnhuters, the simple outer-court members were not initiated into, nor had any suspicion of, the infamous mysteries and discourses of the inner love circle. But Lavington's tract of "The Moravians Detected," will leave nothing more to be desired concerning these matters; wherein also, Mr. Wesley's celebrated "man of God," Peter Böhler (p. 95. supra), will be found to figure very respectably. Such doings however, can only last in a Society where the head that promotes them, is possessed of almost unlimited power, and during his life; the succeeding members of which and the former novitiates, shall find it impossible to believe them ever to have taken place. The active efforts of the Count's disciples, in propagating their doctrines throughout this country, (many of whom though weak-headed, were sincerely pious and amiable men,) were known to Mr. Law, as may be inferred from his letter of February 12th, 1753, (before inserted) to Mr. Langcake, who it would appear was personally acquainted with some of these leaders, who had been telling him that he was only in a legal state, which induced him to seek Mr. Law's counsels, and so gave occasion to parts of Letter xiv (third edition) of his printed "Collection of Letters." Though by the way, we have not been able to satisfy ourselves exactly, as to the individuals therein alluded to, as a Mr. G. and a Mr. S.; unless it be Stonhouse the Universalist, and Gambold, of the soi-disant Moravians.

Respecting their peculiar Gospel doctrines, (see Letter, p. 551,) we may here remark, though we shall have to recur to the subject again in the course of our narrative, that it was this incessant talk and preaching about the "heart-truth," the "blood," and "the Lamb," and of themselves as "little lambs lying in the Saviour's bosom, in whom he saw no sin," that "his lambs might do as they would, for they were not under the law but under grace," and that it was "all glory and alleluia, whatever they did," (—à l'Agapemone, "the day of judgment is past, and we, the elect may lead a jolly life!!") It was this incessant rant we say, about the "blood," the "five wounds," the "lamb," "justification," "faith," "final perseverance," "election," "salvation," that these "Germans" as they were familiarly termed, went preaching about the country, and by which they were so successful in making converts of the simple and ignorant.

One of their eminent proselytes and preachers was a young Mr. Ingram, who, by his "lamb" and "liberty" and "blessed soul-saving" preaching, had drawn into the number of his privileged flock, Lady Huntingdon's two unmarried passé sisters, who, it would appear, followed the shepherd up and down whithersoever he went; the end of which was—as in the modern parallel case of Prince of the Agapemone (N.B. probably an offshoot, through the same, from the same original root or stem), that one of these ancient matrons actually became Ingram's own bosom lamb! The simple editor of the "Life of Lady H." speaks of these parties with great gravity and respect, but if the reader desires to obtain a true insight into their character, doctrine, and proceedings, with the judgment of a man of sense and piety upon them, he may consult for that purpose the artless autobiography or "Memorial of John Nelson," 18mo., Mason, London.

Mr. Law, in his writings (alluding to the abuse that is made of spiritual science by strivingless, prayerless, ideal transcendentalists), speaks upon the folly of attempting to understand divine mysteries (which only mean the manifestations of the divine nature in the soul), before the proper time. This he does in the "Spirit of Prayer," but more emphatically in the "Way to Divine Knowledge," and lastly in the third dialogue of the "Spirit of Love." In reference to this practical point, and by way of relief to our narrative, we here insert the following "Confession" made by the theosophical avant, Preher, who, occasionally (1715,) frequenting a society (a revival of the early Philadelphian Society, see Roach), which met together for the plausible purpose of spiritual edification and conversation upon the mysteries of Behmen, in whose theory and language they were well versed, commonly there held his peace. Being reproached for his general taciturnity, as "hiding his talents under a bushel," and told that it was his duty to edify the church by his high wisdom and understanding, and to make converts to the truth, he in reply, promised to give his reasons for the conduct he had pursued, which are contained in this confession. The opportunity which he most judiciously avails himself of for so doing, is at that stage of his theosophical discourse, upon the First of his "THREE TABLES," where, treating "of man in his primeval state," he is showing his original relations to the abyssal Deity, and consequently the steps that he must take in the regeneration to regain his native place. He has brought the demonstration to that point which is denominated fire, in strict and proper spiritual language, and so termed by Mr. Law, p. 75, supra; which means that particular state in the spiral, introcircumvolutions of the life of nature, through which the soul has to travel, in its journey of regeneration or purification; in other words, the gate of the full birth of the spirit of love;—the further and more sublimated degrees or interior stages of which, described by one who intellectually had had experience of the same in himself, namely Behmen, are justly and philosophically designated, Tincture, Majesty, Ternary, and lastly, "in the deepest depth, the ineffable Holy Name," JEHOVAH; (though not all living souls are philosophers, or have their senses exercised to understand the terms of philosophy.)—The following quotation, then, is Freher's 'Confession,' which we urgently recommend for perusal in this place, for its practical value, and for the suggestions it offers to the wise in heart. Though writing all his voluminous, and indeed invaluable (in their way) interpretations, justifications and demonstrations of Behmen, as the original truths of God, at the earnest request and instigation of others, he, Freher, though thus purposely performing a duty to society, and to the praise and glory of God, yet finds, that the application of his thoughts and mind to the subject, and to the labour of writing, is detrimental to that robust and lively growth in grace, purity and perfection, which is and should be the sole end of all knowledge, by withdrawing the efforts of his body, spirit, soul, from devotion. For though many things may keep the soul alive in God, prayer—Bramwell-like prayer is the most powerful stimulant and nourishment, or means to educe the divine life in the soul, in the proper Christ-like freedom and purity of development.—We most heartily recommend this long quotation to the meditation of the reader and to the notice of the candidate, as the substance of it must be made to preface, and to close all that shall be ever set forth in any book or books, in recommendation of the study of theosophical verities. We would only add one remark, if needful after what we have given, p. 527, concerning the two ways of learning goodness and virtue, which is this, that we are justified in recommending the study of Behmen, Law, &c., theoretically, to those who are called to education in divine knowledge, until they apprehend their ground; for it is by such apprehension and knowledge that they can become true, divine workmen themselves, as to their own souls, and with regard to the world at large. Without further observation, then, we present the extract:—

"Having now done with the Fire, in the first circumvolution of our spiral line, on the fore side of the figure of man, looking into eternity; I should, according to my first intent and promise, go further on to the second, third, and fourth, where Tincture, Majesty, and Ternary, where their different characters, and lastly in the deepest depth, the ineffable name JEHOVAH, do appear. But I must needs declare, that I cannot go further; for, being weary within and without, I must here stop, and apply from henceforth my mind wholly to another more necessary business, which will be of much greater importance to my own soul.—Accordingly, I here part with the prosecution of my first intent, and ask pardon for having inconsiderately promised something which, because of some deeper emergent occasion, I cannot perform; observing daily more and more, that an inward progress in the only necessary work, is hindered and retarded in my own soul, by applying so continually all my faculties to write with pen and ink. Yet will I not part with it so hastily, as not to lay down first, more explicitly, a solid substantial ground and reason for my doing so, even such a one as cannot but be acknowledged good and firm, and standing upon a solid bottom, both with respect to all of us in general, and also with respect to myself in particular.

With respect to all of us in general it is undeniably true, that we know already much more than we need to know, of things requisite and necessary to that end, which all our knowledge is to lead us to; and that we are also convinced in ourselves of the truth thereof. For we do all know and own, that the Fire (and the fundamental doctrine of conformity to Jesus Christ, so eminently implied therein,) is the only gate through which we can be let in deeper; and before or without which none can see, much less possess and enjoy, what is behind or within that veil. And that it is that great point, wherein all our duties from this side, and all our happiness from the other side, do meet and centre themselves; and which, as long as not attained and passed through, must needs hinder and retard the attainment of all really great and solid matters, in every soul—seeing that on this side of this great point, there is nothing really great, solid and weighty. If we then strive in sincerity, earnestness, and constancy, [taking as our model and guide, Bramwell,] to enter through this gate, and to reach this great central point, we shall find, every one in himself, according to his measure and degree, what Tincture is, what Majesty is, &c.; whereas without so finding it in ourselves, no angel from heaven can make us understand it from without. Why then should words be multiplied any further, about such things as are not relating at all to what we shall do, but only to what we may expect in mercy, when we have done, or rather in doing that which we know we are to do. And

With respect to myself in particular, I must needs declare openly, that all that I could say or write further concerning Tincture, Majesty, &c., would be said and written only as on this side of that great gate and point. But pray, what can be said thereof on this side? To what end, intent, and purpose, can any thing be said thereof; and what benefit could be expected either to myself or to any other, from such sayings and writings? Should not I swerve about in empty notions, and fill my own brain as well as the brain of others with shadows, having no life, reality and substance? How can I declare to any other what I have not seen myself, but only heard and read thereof? If I did say, I have seen these things, and know them in the ground of my own soul, I should be an impudent liar before God and men. If I did say that I have read in J. B., and have heard of these things (of the Light of Majesty especially,) both here and beyond sea, and never without perplexity and amazement, I should say the truth. And if I did say, I can repeat the words or at least the substance thereof, written or spoken by others, I should say the truth likewise. But if I did undertake to bring forth words of my own concerning the Tincture, Majesty, &c., though they were never so true, pertinent and consistent with the ground of my friend J. B., I might justly be called presumptuous. And though I might not be called so by others, yet mine own conscience would tell me that I am so, and that I intend to set up a fine shew, and to make myself a name and reputation &c., but no manner of benefit could arise from it, neither to myself nor to any other; but hurt rather, and detriment might be expected both on my side, and on the side of them that might think my words are what they are not.—But from this my plain declaration, and from the instance of my breaking off, whereby I declare both to myself and others, That there is the highest necessity for us to do what we know we ought to do, [that is to pursue the Bramwell-process of devotion, in order to attain "perfection,"] but none at all to speculate, and search curiously after things not to be found out in any reality, but only as in a shadow, before we have done what our own heart tells us we are obliged to do; from this declaration and instance, I say, more benefit may reasonably be expected.

Notre faculté créatrice est vaste, active, inépuisable, mais en l'examinant de près, nous voyons

True it is, that I have formerly written something of these matters also, though very shortly, because I knew then as well as I know now, that I could do it but historically, not experimentally: but at this time, the case is quite altered by many other circumstances, and therefore I cannot do that same now again, which I could do then, but must break off before I come to the end of this "First Table." And of the other two Tables I must say, that not only there are many things in them which are already touched upon, and at least implicitly declared in this "First Table;" but also, that there is nothing in them which will not open and declare itself in reality and substance, when this gate is opened, and this point attained. If this be not a fully convincing argument, I will be willingly informed better; and if it be, this consequence is plain and evident, That it is much better both for myself and others to go forward within, [in the true Methodist way of seeking God, and "entire sanctification,") than to run any further without, although perhaps I may be blamed by the one or other for so doing; which I may expect the rather, because such a thing was done already several times of late. For,

One friend found fault with my living so much retired or in secret, and advised me to make myself known, to seek more of conversation, to go abroad, and to do with my talent some good in the present generation, by instructing others, and making proselytes to the truth: for, said he, I should find myself obliged to do so, if I had that knowledge that you have, &c. This friend I answered but very shortly then; and now think it not worth my while to take any further notice thereof, for reasons best known to myself. But,

Another good friend of mine, soon after this, found fault with my keeping, even among friends, so close to myself that they could hardly get anything from me, and told me, that others with whom we more conversed formerly had found the same fault, and the conclusion of all was this, that I was not fit for conversation. And to this friend I then made a serious promise that I would answer him, and lay open before him my inward ground and whole heart, without equivocations and mental reservations. This promise therefore I will now perform, according to my best ability, without regard to this or that which might arise in my own mind to dissuade me from such a freedom, and without fear of his taking anything amiss, or putting a wrong construction upon my words; and I will do it (1.), with a more general respect to those other friends whose testimony he brought in, and then also (2.), with a more particular respect to the conversation between himself and me.

IN THE FIRST PLACE, this is undeniably true, that this fault you find with me in outward conversation, hath its deep ground in an internal secret constitution, or essential signature of my own mind. Further, this is true also, that if this signature be entirely of my own making, a much worse name than that of a fault may be justly given unto it. But again it is no less true, that no man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him. Seeing then my friend, that according to this general rule, you can as little know the things of mine, as I can the things of yours, you can judge no further than as this or that doth outwardly appear to you, and you can understand it. Therefore to settle your judgment upon a deeper bottom, I will open to you the things of mine, as much as words of this world can be able to open secret spiritual depths. If you find a self-justifying spirit therein, you may justly reject it and condemn it, as much as I have formerly condemned and rejected such a spirit, in another friend. But if you meet with a spirit of sincerity, that speaks the naked truth, and speaks it for good ends, and speaks it as in the presence of God, without self-justification, then have a care to judge, and do not trust to your own deep-piercing and penetrating spirit, but say rather, I understand it not.

This internal signature of my own mind, and so consequently this fault you find with me, is indeed, in some great sense, of my own making, and was made by myself before I could well discern my own right hand from my left, or when I was most terribly blind and ignorant. So far therefore it is evil, and falls under the indication of the Almighty. But he who brings forth good out of evil, hath made use of this mine own evil for my own good, and for the preservation of my own soul. For by this disposition and signature of my mind, changed and improved by Him, I avoided many nets and snares, was kept from self-exaltation, restrained from rashly judging others, and was led through many strange things and dangerous passages, without receiving hurt. Even by your self, my friend, I should have been led away and involved in one labyrinth after another, if it had not been for this internal disposition of my mind. So far therefore it is not of my own making, but God, in his infinite love, free grace and mercy, shall be praised and glorified by it for ever and ever.

Now to give you a short verbal delineation of that inward invisible figure of my mind, considered as changed and improved by free grace, I tell you, that after my dreadful sudden [spiritual] shock, (though indeed long before it also, I had something much like it, but it never came up to that pitch,) I could never acquiesce in, or be much pleased with anything inferior to what, I then perceived, was attainable only, by attaining that great point and entering through that gate. And besides this, I had from that time a deeper sense in my mind, than the astral spirit can give to any living in this world, and a stronger impression of that sense in my soul, than any words in this world can declare, concerning a vast, or rather an immense difference or distance between knowledge and understanding. And therefore when I was afterwards quite unexpectedly called, entreated, and mightily desired to write about J. B., I was often strangely amazed, how it could come to pass that I could be so pressed to write of things, which my own heart told me I did not yet understand. This now was the true ground and reason, why I never could nor did put any real value upon my own writings, squeezed as it were out of me; and why (I dare say) I could have seen them all burnt without any inward concern. And when I perceived afterwards, that they were read, valued, and enquired after, I was thereby put into such a state of mind that I knew not what to think, or say thereof. I own freely that I thought within myself, not once and not superficially, Surely all those that make so much of what I make so little of, must needs be altogether blind and deplorably ignorant? Yet at the same time, as I had always before mine eyes, against me, that commandment, Judge not; so I had always also for me, this plain reason, viz., If they could see with their own eyes, and if they had a spirit able to discern between knowqu'elle n'est que secondaire, temporelle, dépendante, c'est-à-dire, qu'elle doit son origine à une ledge and understanding, and between things really valuable and things of no great value, they would presently perceive, that all these books of mine were written before that gate was opened in me, and that great point attained; and would therefore not value them any more, than I can and do value them, myself.

Every one that could speak of great things consistently with J.B., I thought must needs know something of this gate and point, [the birth of Love, vide p. 76,] and must have such a discerning spirit; and thoughts to the contrary I durst not freely entertain of any one, being restrained by a superior power, which I cannot account for. And yet such their doings and proceedings I could never reconcile with what I bore in my own mind. And this, if I had run into it too far with mine imagination, might have made me distracted. My words I know are much confused, yet I cannot help it, the invisible figure of my mind was much more so; and the internal sensation thereof which I had, as also that deep impression which these things made in my soul, I cannot give you. But,

To come nearer to the matter, let me tell you that, upon this ground, at that time when you were eager and busy to bring me over, (not knowing then yourself, what you were about to do, nor what you were to do next year quite to the contrary,) to that assembly which I came into afterwards by some other means; that at that time, I say, I had a greater opinion of those friends than of myself, and thought myself not fit for their conversation, long before you heard them say so. Yet when I was come among them, this great opinion of them was soon mixed with a great confusion in myself. For something in me would secretly suggest to my mind, that this gate was still shut up in them, and this great point not yet attained. And some other thing in me would reprove me for thinking so, and would not let such thoughts settle in my mind, as a certain truth.

Reasons for that former were these: (1.) because I never heard any mention made thereof; (2.) because they valued so much, what I could value so little; and (3.) because I could never see any real good effects, which I was sure could not have failed to follow the opening of that gate, and the attainment of that point.

And a reason for the latter was, that I heard so many excellent words, fluent discourses, and confident declarations of great, high, and glorious things. [It was doubtless to these matters that Mr. Law refers, in his Letter of April 8th. 1747, to Mr. Stephen Penny, Bristol, a quotation from which was given at the head of the note on p. 46; and not as there supposed, to the original Philadelphian Society, which was broken up on Mrs. Lead's decease, in the year 1703 or 4.]

Between these two I sat in great doubtfulness, and hesitation, for of them I durst not say positively, they are under delusions; and of myself I durst not utter any such glorious things. And so I came so far and so deep into confusion, that I knew not at all what to think or to say, either of them or of myself. Of its effects, which it had in me, I say now only this, that it made me on one side more and more sensible of my being not fit for their conversation, and on the other side more and more weary of every thing, and almost of every body too; because I never knew what to say to the one, nor what to take in from the other. But a while after, these private disputes, frequent fallings out, continual discords, heats and animosities always agitated in that assembly, gave me some relief, and extricated me more and more out of my confusion; for they shewed me, and convinced me of the truth of what I before was so slow, backward and cautious to let settle in my mind. What was done on my side to compose all those differences, and to keep up peace and union, you know; and what the effects and consequences of my so doing were, you know as well as I. Could you find at that time, that I kept so close to myself amongst those known friends, whose testimonies you now allege that they could hardly get out anything from me? If you then did find me so, tell me now though you did not tell me then. And if you did not find me so then, but must rather own that they got from me ten times more than ever they would or could digest, then give me leave to tell you, that in all those matters I was not understood, neither by yourself nor by others. For if you had understood me you would have taken other measures, according to your own free and voluntary promise, yea you would take such as I should shew you; which yet you never did, for want of understanding me.

You must needs allow, that there is a vast difference between understanding the words of another grammatically, and understanding him essentially. Grammatically, though my words were not ordered according to the rules of an English grammar, I was always understood well enough; for what I said or wrote was approved of, the truth thereof was owned, and whenever I said, I am not understood, I was always answered, We understand you very well.

Who shall here be judge, whether I was understood or not understood? I say mine own internal essences (and so also the essences of every one that proposes any spiritual matter) can be the best, and ought to be the only judges. For they only can be sensible in themselves, whether or no they have really reached and stirred the internal essences of the hearer, and whether or no they have raised in his essences a full harmony with themselves, and an equal disposition of mind towards that, which the speaker verbally owneth to be truth. If they have, the good effects intended must of necessity follow. And if they have not, those internal essences in the speaker want no other testimony from without, but are clearly convinced in themselves of this plain truth, That they are not understood essentially, but only outwardly, grammatically, and superficially; neither can they be blinded nor made senseless by any of those confident replies, saying, We understand you very well; for their feeling cannot be beaten down by words.

If then (1.) in the state of that confusion I spoke of in the foregoing paragraph, the internal invisible figure of my mind was such as I declared, it is no wonder that I could with more pleasure and readiness, 'take a pipe' with those friends, and talk of the Sultan and the great Mogul, rather than of things which I had no great relish in; which I could not perceive to flow forth out of a solid ground, and out of which I had no prospect of any real good effects that could be produced,—having experienced how I had fared with my first declaration made to them, concerning matters of practice. If now this was a fault in me, let it be one without my contradicting it, and let it be as great or as little as they please to make it, I for my part shall neither be the better nor the worse for it. (2.) In that following state, when I was come out of the inward confusion, and had occasion afforded to utter many things, all for good ends, and allowed to be good and true; if this was my condition, that I could not be understood essentially, that we continued strangers in our inward ground, that discord and division increased so much amongst them, as much as I endeavoured to promote peace and union—and that I durst not say, I am not understood, without being contradicted immediately, what should I have done then? Be you judge. Of my grand secret, which I may call my philosopher's stone, which the preservation of my temporal life without being burdensome to any, depends upon, I durst not utter one word, for twenty good substantial reasons. To you my friend, I gave several hints thereof, but found you in the ground, bottom, practice, and serious endeavour after practice, as much a stranger to it as I am a stranger to your stone.

Of mysteries and high speculations I durst not speak, because I did not value those things half so much, as I valued things on the other side of the great gate and point. Of this gate and point I durst not make any mention, except I would have wilfully raised a new dispute. Of matters relating to the practice of Godliness, to the doctrine of conformity with Jesus Christ—to the reading of our own book, to the judging of none but ourselves first, to the looking first into our own dark root and ground before we look into that of another, to our being all but one both with respect to the one side and to the other, &c., you know that I have uttered much more than could be taken in by them, for it was neglected (though not contradicted) for want of practice and of understanding it.

Nothing therefore was left for me, which I might have employed my tongue or rather my pen about, but such things as the greater part of them, delighted to be entertained with, viz. enjoyments, triumphing joys and exultations, openings of the second principle, &c. If I had but praised, exalted, and admired these things, and had shewed a desire to get the same in their way and manner, I should have been an excellent fellow in their opinion. But of these things I had nothing to say at all, because, as they themselves rightly and truly said, (and I thank them for having said this truth,) I was not acquainted with such and the like things. If then I was not only unacquainted with those things, but did also declare openly that I did not desire them, and could nevertheless lay before them many good and necessary things which they truly wanted, and were not acquainted with, it is plain, that my essences had embraced something which theirs had no acquaintance with, that their essences valued something which mine made not much of, that therefore we were strangers to each other in our internal essences, and consequently, that they were as little fit for my conversation, as I was for theirs.

BUT NOW MY FRIEND, with a more particular respect to yourself and me, give me leave to ask you this lawful question, What was our conversation? You know that some of our acquaintances, whose testimonies you alleged, knew nothing of this gate and great point; and that some others did not deny nor contradict what they heard thereof, but owned the truth, some of them more and others less coldly, indifferently and superficially. But this my question shall not be extended to any one of them; but only between you and me, I ask, What was our conversation all the time of our acquaintance? I will not answer it by a definition or description thereof, made by myself, because such an one of my own might be liable to various different exceptions; but Moses, the mediator of the old covenant shall answer it both to you and me. We spend our years, (says he,) as a tale that is told. These words, I own on my side, are a plain, full, and true description of our conversation, which you are as well to take good notice of as I am, and I as you. For I lay no more from these words to your charge, than I lay to my own; yet not one grain less. Pray remember, in a serious recollection and introversion of your mind and in the fear of God, how many fine tales were told between us, concerning this gate and this great point; and do not misapprehend me, as if I did now condemn and reject all what was spoken about this matter. No, No, God forbid! But I say only these three things, and you may know that I say the truth. (1.) All these tales wherein we spent these years, came never yet to any solid fixation, much less to any true internal reality; and that spark of an omnipotent will which lieth in our souls, was never yet so essentially touched by those tales, as to produce any good, great or considerable effect without. What good you may have got by them within, I can as little judge of you, as you can of me. (2.) I say, that like as it is much better and more profitable to go on slowly and moderately, but steadily and constantly, in our own way we are in—maintaining that ground we stand upon, although there be but little or nothing known and said of this gate and point—provided our way be right and straight, not wrong and crooked; so it is much worse and more hurtful, to tell tales thereof, and to shew, in those tales, great earnestness and fervency one day, and be cool again and remiss the next. (3.) I say to you my friend, do you judge and decide yourself, whose mind of the two is more harmless, and whose years are more innocently spent? His, that tells more tales, and is on that account more fit for conversation? Or his that tells less tales, and is less or not at all fit for it? I for my part, do hereby freely and openly declare, that I am in my mind and spirit, as weary of telling and of hearing tales concerning this point and gate, as I am weary of anything in this world.

On your side my good friend, and of your person, you have shown and proved more than sufficiently, that you are fit for conversation even with the greatest princes and courtiers in the world. But give me leave to tell you, that you are more fit for conversation with such, than with simple, mean and despicable people; although I own that you can condescend, and in a manner force yourself to it sometimes. To prove this, besides my own observation, I could allege against you such testimonies of my familiar friends, as you have alleged against me. But it would be great folly in me to do so, and would give you a just occasion to think, that I was angry with you, that I took your words as an affront and would be revenged of you. No such thing. How could I take them so in anger when you said no more than what I said many times of myself; not from affectation of a proudish humility, but from a deep sense and feeling of my own constitution. And if I never took any notice without, and was not moved within, when you once before called me a fool—distinguishing that fool without, from my ground within; how should I now take this so ill, which is not so harsh and rough as that? Besides I know, and own before God, that your words, declaring me not fit for conversation, have no such extensive, injurious and malignant sense, which might be resented so much, as I may seem, but only seem, to do. For I take them with a better distinction than you are aware of, and my intent in writing these things, looks quite another way. I thank you sincerely for this expression of yours, because it hath taken off from me a greater burden, and hath made me more light and easy than I ever was before. And hath moreover afforded opportunity to discover something, which else might have lain hid to the end of my life. Evil will not come out of it, at least not on my side; but good may be produced on both sides, if we make ourselves, assisted by the grace of God, capable of his blessing. Therefore my friend, do you take nothing amiss of me, but remember that I told you before, I would be plain and open; and consider, that sincerity as much as justice is no respecter of persons.

L'homme est donc un type qui doit avoir son prototype, c'est une effigie, une monnaie qui suppose

On my side, and of my own person, I acknowledge again and again, that I am not fit for conversation, and that I was made unfit for it, partly by the spirit of this world, and partly by that dreadful sudden shock I hinted at before. For this gave me such a strong sense, and made such a lively deep impression in my soul, of my own being nothing and having nothing, that I never shall be able in this world, to make any other soul by any words of mine, as sensible thereof as I was made; or to make myself to be understood as essentially, as I was made to understand myself essentially within. Neither can I always represent it to myself so deeply, as to have the same sensation and impression thereof which I had then; but I must acquiesce with this, that the same good effects thereof and the same wholesome disposition of mind, do continue and remain with me; and through the grace of God they shall remain, as long as I live in this world. That you also yourself have a deep sense and impression in your soul, of your being nothing and having nothing, I do not question, but say only, that your sensation and impression thereof, is not mine, and mine is not yours, for if it were, you would have been as little fit for conversation as I am; and it would have been an eternal impossibility for you (I know what I say,) to have done those things you did.

Therefore my kind request of you is this, that you would be pleased hereafter to find no more fault with my unfitness; for though you would do no hurt to me, yet you might perhaps hurt yourself, which I would not have you do. What we call in this world, conversation, is rightly called with respect to another world, communion of saints. Conversation includeth a two-legged beast, which will be devoured by worms, and be turned into dust and ashes; but this communion excludeth that beast, although during this mortal life, it cannot be entirely in every sense excluded. This communion must be the inward ground and bottom of conversation, if conversation shall not perish together with the beast and with this world. If conversation stands upon this ground and bottom and is animated by this communion, it is then blessed and sanctified and able to bring forth good fruits: but if not, it is a certain truth, that the more one is fit for conversation in this world, and the more he cultivates and keeps it up, though in the best way, sense and manner thereof, the greater damage, and loss he must expect to meet with, in the world to come; because this conversation and all his fitness for it, having no eternal root, and being not animated by this communion, cannot go with him through death, but must sink down in the grave together with his beast. I for my part, have reason to thank my God and Father in heaven, that I am not fit for it. Neither can I pray to him to be made fit for it in this world and in this sense. But my prayer is rather to this purpose, that I may be made unfit for it more and more, and that all the world, and all its conversation (not standing upon this bottom, and not being influenced and animated by this communion,) may be crucified to me, and I to the same. May God our Father in his infinite love and mercy make us altogether fit (as he is willing and ready to do, if we do not hinder him, and do not think we are fit already) for a conversation, not made up by telling and hearing tales, but by finding, feeling, touching, embracing, and keeping each other, in our inward renewed or renewing ground; for thereby and thereby only, our conversation may be in heaven within, even in this time already, whilst it is and must be still in flesh without.

HAVING THUS BY THIS ANSWER, discharged myself of that obligation I was under, by reason of a promise to a friend, and having said before, that I cannot go any further in the explanation of these TABLES, but that I would henceforth employ my mind wholly in another necessary business; I shall here for a conclusion of all, declare explicitly what business I mean. Not only that the truth of my words may appear the plainer to my friends (it is of much greater importance to my soul) but also and even chiefly, that this my declaration written by my own hand, may stand as a testimony against myself. If I should not perform or not continue in the performance of what I intend and promise through his grace, to do in secret before my Father in heaven, which seeth in secret.

My whole intent and purpose is to seek by earnest unceasing application to God my Saviour, for his perfect manifestation in my soul, and in respect to my studies to read and meditate only upon the scripture, and my worthy friend J. B., to be, by these two, always excited and stirred up to recollect and introvert my mind, whether I be at home or abroad—to let it not wander out in things unnecessary; to remember always that saying of my Lord to Martha, One thing is needful; to keep my heart with all diligence because out of it are the issues of life; to seek for no conversation with children of this world; to refrain my tongue from telling tales; to keep mine ears open, that I may be ready to hear what God will speak in my own conscience; and to have mine eye always intent and fixed upon Him, and him alone, as if no creature were in the world besides myself—yet so, as never to exclude from my mind that inward ground in any of my fellow members, in whom but so much as the smallest grain of grace is sowed by his Spirit; but whatever I may desire for my own soul, I will desire for them also, and nothing for myself alone. For although these two things may seem, as to some of my outward expressions, to be more or less inconsistent with each other; yet do I know sufficiently, that they are in substance and internal reality so coherent, and so firmly linked together, that they are inseparable; and that the one relating to my own soul in particular, cannot be pursued with any good success without the other, relating to all my fellow members in general. And this through the grace of God and by his assistance, I intend to do without any outward hypocritical shew, peculiar affectation, or ostentation, as if I were not as other men are; and in one word, without alteration from what I have appeared outwardly hitherto. Because, I do not intend to make my outward, two-legged beast holy and fit for heaven; but only to have a bridle put into his mouth and a hook into his nostrils, that it may not kick and trample me under its feet, and turn again and rend me. My ultimate end in doing so, shall not be the salvation and happiness of my own soul: no. For if I should make this my ultimate end, and reach no deeper in the spirit of my mind, I know that I should act from a very subtle, secret and almost imperceptible root of selfishness. Mine ultimate end therefore shall be this, (beyond which I know not any further nor deeper, and which is not invented by the subtlety of reason,) that my whole created being in body soul and spirit, with all the essences and faculties thereof without any exception, may be possessed by Him who is the right and sole proprietor and purchaser thereof; and that He may receive the reward due to his bloody labours, according to the promise made unto him by the Father, saying, Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, &c.: which as it is said in general with respect to all the nations upon earth, so it is applicable also in particular to every individual person, and therefore to myself also. And this only I shall constantly desire to be fulfilled and performed in me. "For the labourer is worthy of his reward;" and for my soul he hath laboured and travailed, and ought not therefore to be served so by me as to have occasion to complain, and to say, I have laboured in vain, I have spent my strength for nought.

But seeing that I know, the Father cannot give, and he cannot receive any soul, but what is made conformable unto him by his Spirit, therefore his fundamental doctrine of conformity to Him, according to that sense he hath given me thereof, shall be my principal rule; which if I follow, taking his yoke upon me, which is easy, and his burden which is light, and learning of him, I shall have no need of casuists and commentators: because he hath promised, that he who followeth him, "shall not walk in darkness, but have the light of life;" and have for a guide his Spirit, that leads into all truth, necessary to salvation. But I shall have need only of simplicity, sincerity, humility and love. These four I take peculiar notice of, and enumerate them particularly for my own sake, and for reasons best known to my self. Although I know very well, that in each of them all the other three are implied; so that if I have one of them, I have them all in that one, because they are all inseparable companions, and none of them can really be had without having all the rest. And these four, I am sure enough, will be the best and fittest casuists and commentators—sufficient also for my necessary instruction in all cases and matters whatever.

And to this fundamental doctrine of conformity with Him I shall apply my mind and spirit, neither out of fear of hell nor out of hope for heaven; but only because it is imprinted on my soul and spirit, and I can read it therein as plainly as I can read what I do now write thereof, That so it ought to be, without asking or answering any Why; without a foregoing examination of any arguments pro or con; without deliberation and consultation with flesh and blood; without sour looking, murmuring or repining, but with gladness of heart, willingness of spirit and cheerfulness of mind. Knowing and always remembering, not only that my Lord and master says of himself, "Lo I come, in the volume of the book, it is written of me, I delight to do thy will, O my God;" but also that in the same volume of the book it is written of me likewise, if I will be in the number of that people of whom it is said, "Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power," or, according to the German translation, "After thy conquest, thy people shall serve thee willingly"—not with uneasiness and reluctance, as being compelled by force; nor in a mercenary manner, as hired by wages; but freely, willingly and with delight, having received from his own free grace, this spirit of willingness.

This Spirit of willingness in the soul, not only implieth and strongly confirmeth what I said before, that my ultimate end in the spirit of my mind ought not to be the salvation of my own soul; and not only resolveth this question, Whether a man can love God and do willingly his will, without fixing his eye upon the reward promised to them that love him: but it answers also sufficiently an objection made from the words of the apostle, saying of our Lord and Saviour, that "he for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross." Which silly question cannot be asked, and which senseless objection—senseless in the internal ground, though specious enough in the superficiality or the sight of reason,—cannot be made, by any but such as know nothing in their own ground, of the life and motions of this spirit of willingness, and very little of what our future salvation and happiness will be.

I for my part, and to my own full satisfaction know, that my Lord and Saviour having said, "Lo I come, I delight to do thy will, O my God," declareth immediately the deepest ground and the only foundation of this delight, in the next following words, "Yea thy law is within my heart." I know that here no other why is to be asked, and no deeper ground or reason to be enquired for. I know nevertheless that in an inferior and exterior sense and respect, more accommodate to my own weak capacity, and to excite in me the spirit of willingness, or to raise it when clouded or suppressed, it is rightly said of him, that "for the joy that was set before him he endured the cross." But I know also, that it is a false conclusion to say, He made this joy his ultimate end in the spirit of his mind, or that he would not have delighted to do the will of his God, if it had not been for this joy, or for this necessary consequence of his delight. This I say, is injurious to him, and to that spirit of willingness, which he had in the highest perfection; because he had also the law of his God in the highest perfection within his heart.

And of mine own future happiness I know, that it will be a necessary consequence, or an appendix inseparable from that ultimate end, which I named above, and which, relating to my Saviour, is greater and more dignified than anything relating to myself can be; and that therefore it would be perverse doings, if I should make that which is less and inferior, to be my ultimate end. And further I know also, that this salvation and happiness will consist in two things, united into one, viz. on one side, in the greatest riches, fulness, life and glory, that I can be capable of; and on the other side in the utmost poverty, emptiness, death and nothingness of my self, and of all that is my own. Or rather, that it will consist in an everlasting harmonious union of these two—in this world contrary things. Even such an union as will bind and cement them so together, that they shall be for ever and ever inseparable from each other. Such an union, that they shall make up one perfect circle wherein the beginning shall not be discerned from the end nor the end from the beginning; nay, such an union, that I may freely and truly say of each of these two things, This is that, and that is this. For dying to myself perpetually, is living unto my Saviour eternally, in happiness and glory,—and this living is that dying; emptying myself continually of all mine own being, is my being filled with his riches for ever,—and this my being filled is that emptying myself; losing my soul for ever and ever, is finding my soul to all eternity,—and this my finding is my losing it, world without end.

If then my merciful God and Father in heaven giveth me a simple, sincere, humble and loving heart; not according to my notions which I can have of these words, but according to the sense in which his Spirit taketh these words in the Scripture, which sense I cannot yet have a right, true and adequate idea of. If he giveth me, I say———(though indeed this is a very silly expression, fit only for this world and for earthly senses, but altogether nonsensical in the internal ground; and a very signal instance, shewing what all our words are in this world, when we will express thereby spiritual matters, belonging to another world. For it implieth something of an uncertainty, hesitation or doubtfulness, whether our merciful God and Father in heaven be willing to give it; whereas I know, not only that he on his side is always ready and willing to give it, nay giving it continually, but also, that in those earnest desires and longings for it, which were his gifts, he hath given us also the thing desired and longed for. Notwithstanding, at the same time I must own to my own shame, that I have it not; that so “he may be justified when he speaketh and be clear when he judgeth.” But let me go on with my nonsensical expression, because it is so common in this world, and I can have no better; and let it suffice me, that his Spirit understandeth the internal sense of my mind.)———if, I say, he giveth me such a heart, I shall be (according to my friend Jacob’s words) one of the richest and noblest men on earth; because they are such riches and such a nobility, as will continue and be perpetuated, and go along with me through death into life. Yet, so as I know I shall do in another world to all eternity, (N.B.) so I must begin to do in this world; I must lay them down entirely and continually at the feet of that merciful Giver, denying them to be my own, and owing myself to be one of the basest, vilest and poorest creatures among mankind.—And this, (N.B.) I must not do in affectation, and imitation of such words as I may have heard from another, and may own to be good and true; for this would be very superficial if not quite hypocritical. Neither must I do it only in a sincere assent and consent of my refined reason, for although this be good and necessary, yet must I not rest therein, nor think to have attained thereby the highest pitch. But I am to know, that there is still something much deeper or higher and more solid, viz. a profound, substantial, unutterable sense or sensation of the truth thereof. Which sensation, my refined reason can give as little as it can give me a spirit of willingness; although it can apprehend, and convince me both of the truth and of the necessity thereof. But this sensation can be given only by that Spirit from above, which can give also a spirit of willingness; and without His giving it, no living soul can ever have it, let her reason be ever so much refined. Yet this refined reason may safely go on in this practice; for her sincere going on therein will not be in vain, but have a good and blessed success.—And this my laying them down and denying them perpetually, I know will be my constant keeping, preserving and securing them. Poverty therefore and riches, baseness and nobility, are in this harmonious union, not two, but only one thing—one everlasting life, happiness and glory.”

After the above Quotation—for the length and redundancy of expression of which (the writer being a foreigner) no apology need be offered, much less for the insertion of it, speaking as it does, a language of inestimable instruction and wisdom, to the devout reader and incipient theologian, if he be not already experimentally conversant with the truths inculcated in it—after this quotation, we say, and as being in strict accordance with the design of the present treatise, we now, offer for perusal, (which we could not have ventured to do before), the following Extracts from some unpublished Letters in our possession, as illustrative of the state of experience of a soul, which had actually come into the end (we have so often mentioned, by way of suggestion) of a spiritual life. That the writer had attained to that great point, and passed through that gate, so much spoken of in the above quotation, even to a high degree of divine union, (and this also by the classic Bramwell-process), there is undoubted evidence in these letters, if therein “out of the abundance of the heart the mouth doth (truly) speak.” The singular conformity of the writer’s judgment with the views and sentiments contained in the above quotations from Freher’s MS. works, and also pervading Mr. Law’s latter publications, will doubtless strike with surprise the reader conversant therewith; for what those illuminated authors declare, as the result of their perfected science, this writer evidently utters from a natural ground of experience, from an original sensibility of life. And though some readers might expect a more solemn tone to pervade the expressions of a sanctified soul than herein appears on a first perusal, (for instance, such as is found in the “Biography and Diary of H. A. Rogers, Mason, London,”) yet the Apostle’s declaration must be ever kept in mind, namely, that there are “diversities of operations but the same Spirit.” There are diversities of complexions and signatures of the humanity, yea varied as the flowers of the field, but it is “one spirit” governing the soul, where pure truth, light and wisdom are the actual births and natural corruscations of it. The writer of these letters was a woman, one immersed in the common occupations of life, the mother of a family: and this gives occasion to remark, that the simplicity of purpose, sincerity of affection, and directness of action which is found to distinguish the feminine tincture, appears better to qualify that sex to receive divine impressions and energies, and to rise up into high spirituality and purity, than the naturally posing, encumbered, divided mind and will of the male character. She it appears, did not fail of the standard credentials of those that “will live godly in Christ Jesus,” namely, persecution, by reason. We however commit the extracts to the reader’s own judgment, and, if of the nature of paradisaical blossoms, to his instinct, to draw from them what spiritual honey and refreshment he may. Perhaps they may prove, as the authoress herself proposed by them, = staff for the Christian pilgrim to lean upon, and an incitement to renewed diligence, in climbing the steep and high hill of perfection. They are these:—

“Christmas Eve. 1791.—Dear Sir—I found you had a desire after the hidden manna, which has been through the rich mercy of God, given to me—less than the least of all his dear people; yea, grace has taken to itself a body, and has counted me worthy of that superlative distinguished honor. This is the real cause of my giving you the trouble of a line—to encourage you to pursue the "narrow way that leadeth unto eternal life," which few, very few find; and why, because the way to the crown is the way of the cross. Deep sorrows and heavy afflictions are the portion of the Lord's favorites here below; this is the reason why so few attain this inestimable prize, in my humble opinion. I long to find souls who are thirsting after the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, and so hungry that they cannot be satisfied with the husks of outward preaching. No, they are starving for celestial food, and cannot be at rest without it. To those choice souls the Lord gives out of his hidden storehouse; for "there is a path which the vulture's eye hath not seen"—a holy state, when the soul communes with the Lord without words. Drops of water assimilate, but acid and alkali cause an effervescence. Oh how pleasant it is when the soul feels itself "filled with God," when the will, like sugar in hot water, melts and dissolves itself into union with Jehovah, and tastes paradisaical pleasures! Go on, dear Sir, and press into the deep abyss of sovereign love. Paradise is to be entered into in this life, the tree of life is here on earth, and those who have passed through the first resurrection eat the fruit of it, every day. Pardon me obtruding my experimental joys on you, I only mean it as a staff for you to lean on while pursuing your pilgrimage to the heavenly city. I delight in the experience of real Christians, and I wish you, Sir, the dew of the heavenly grace to comfort you, and more of the Divine unction to instruct you, till you taste celestial enjoyments. I am, with cordial love, in gospel bonds, your friend and servant, MART PRATT.

Malgré le rapport ou la tendance que nous conservons vers ce centre commun, nous avons pu

"January 16th. 1792.—I was cautious when I wrote lest any misconstruction might be put on my letter, but the spirit of your writing breathes a different language.

My husband is a strenuous follower of the visionary Swedenborg, and as the writings of the Baron militate against the pure doctrine and experience of God manifested in the flesh, I have no fellowship with my partner, in religion; nay I have been most cruelly treated by him, for my progress in the supercelestial life.

I love and esteem Mr. ; indeed he is the only person I have any fellowship with; and although our experience differs, yet he is pressing after the prize in earnest, through many difficulties both inward and outward. "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force."

You say, dear Sir, that you have read many mystic authors, and have been a sojourner thirty years. Blessed probation! do not faint but hold out to the end, for I have eaten, yea I daily feast on "the grape brought from the land of Eschol," one taste of which will overbalance all your tedious waiting.—But perhaps, you are amongst the number of those who look for perfection in the flesh! Alas, alas, the body is bestial, sensual, devilish; it is "the son of the bond woman that must be cast out, that the son of the free woman may reign." I am confident from experience, that one of Satan's deepest schemes is to show the soul its deformity, as much as to say, Look here, how filthy you are! see how ugly sin has made you! worse than a dog, or a hog &c. These things have often bowed down my poor soul, and made my chariot wheels to drag heavily: but this was in the earth, I am delivered from it, and experience the joys of the "new heaven and the new earth, and the former things are passed away," neither come they into my mind at all.—I truly live in paradise, having passed by the angel that stands at the gate to guard the tree of life. His flaming sword has cut off all that is not God, and naked I entered from any garment. The undefiled righteousness of Jesus the anointed, Jah-Jehovah has clothed me, and I see and rejoice in my own beauty;—not by attainments, not by my sufferings though grievous and most terrible, not by watchings for twenty years, nor by fasting, abstraction or prayer. No, it was the Lord's free gift. He made me to see my own darkness, impotency, insufficiency, and extreme poverty and nakedness; and then (glory for ever to his adorable love) he took me into his bosom, I became his bride,—the object in which his soul delighteth. He espoused vile me! I am his beloved and he mine, and death or hell cannot part us; for those who are made "partakers of the first resurrection over them the second death has no power." Come then, my very dear brother, beloved in the Lord, come, lift up your dejected head, "for he that shall come will come and will not tarry." "The Spirit and the bride say, come, and let him that heareth say, come; all things are ready."—Perhaps you may be looking for some outward testimony, as I was a very long time; that is, I fear, delusion, for the Lord is in the still small voice. Do you relish my writing? have you a taste? can you find sweetness in the heavenly manna? have you been enlightened from the Holy Ghost? do you know the precious tincture of the water of life? are you hungry—starving—ready to tear your flesh in pieces (speaking in a figure)? These are delightful signs. "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after Truth; they may—no, they shall be filled." Dear Sir, do look more inward, abandon yourself to the Lord; say, 'Lord, if I perish I perish.' Take all your short comings, your very deformities, and lay them at his blessed feet. Say, 'Lord, my pollution needs thy purity, my vileness thy loveliness, my uncleanness thy holiness; and believe me, the Lord will smile, and "wash you whiter than snow." I was one of the ugliest, dirtiest, raggedest objects, I ever knew, and yet love took me in, and set me upon a throne, ordered my goings, "put a new song in my mouth" and I live only to praise him!

"July 17th. 1792.—There is a very choice author which I delight in, could I purchase any of his works. I have a sermon of his which is clear as the sun to a spiritual eye.—P. Sterry is quite in the love principle, he also wrote with all the love and sweetness of Mr. Law. But books are dry and insipid, unless illuminated by the Spirit of God, while we read them. When the seventh seal is opened in the soul, then every line of the Word of God appears in a new light, and that Scripture is verified which says, "Eye hath not seen, neither hath ear heard, the things that God hath prepared for them that love him." This great mystery, it has been the good will of Jehovah to bestow upon me—mere dust and ashes! and my tongue longs to exalt him, and my pen to show forth his praise. Then let me exhort my beloved brother not to faint, nor be weary in his passage to the new Jerusalem—the city of the living God, where Jehovah condescends not only to visit but to dwell; and the inhabitants of that glorious city "shall hunger no more, nor thirst any more. The sun shall not light upon them nor any heat. For the Lord God shall lead them to fountains of living waters, and all tears shall be eternally wiped away from their eyes." Oh, my dear friend, this is my state—unutterable bliss, where there is no satiety. May my pen stimulate you to "count all things but dross and dung" compared with the "pearl of great price;" and may grace make you willing to be stript naked and bare, and to "suffer the loss of all things" that you may be counted worthy to enter into the holy of holies, in this life. No man can see the face of God and live, but the dead see him; those who have died the spiritual death—of self, they see him. This is the first resurrection; but not after the manner of the deluded Swedenborgians, they grasp at shadows. My partner in life is an adherent to these wild doctrines, who call themselves the New Jerusalem Church! and are building chapels to preach the Baron's doctrine in. Poor hoodwinked mortals! led blindfold by the seducer, down the broad and easy way, to their own destruction."

"August 25th. 1792.—I wish to know if you find any relish after the great mystery—"God manifest in the flesh?" If you do, you must be willing to die to sense and reason, which cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. All that sense and reason can apprehend, will not defend us from fear of eternal torment, but "perfect love casteth out fear." Love! omnipotent love! is the alpha and omega. My own experience, before I was in this glorified resurrection state, [a most just phrase.] was to believe contradictions, impossibilities; and by that means the Lord instructed me in revelation. There is no book I have yet found that speaks my experience. To have the seventh seal opened, surely the time was not come till it came to me? Be not staggered, dear Sir, at my saying so, nor look on the meanness of the instrument; for a soul that is parched with thirst drinks out of a mean vessel, and forgets "through extreme pain" the outward vehicle.—You ask my prayers. Perhaps the completion of six days' labour is at hand; for six days the curse lasteth. You must thereupon compose your spirits to a tranquil state, and like Esther the type, say, "though he slay me yet will I trust in him." In my humble opinion, to abandon one's self to the Lord, is the only way to find true peace. Books are idols—our graces are idols—our holy walking is idolatry—even the Bible is an idol, it is not God; from all idols God will cleanse you. Then throw yourself into the sea of his love, and abandon everything, but God. Suppose He suffer you to feel yourself ugly and polluted, as a toad, or an ape, a viper, or anything else that is horrid; your business is to be content with it. Eh, say you, to be content to be, and appear to others so very loathsome? Yes, this is the way, for all flesh stinks before him; and the great controversy is this, Ministers, and people, and books, and teachers want to make the flesh, the beast, holy. Alas, "can the Ethiopian change?" Therefore be content to wear the figure of a beast, as our Lord did; he had the bestial nature, he ate drank and slept like one of us: had he not, he could not have "felt for us in every temptation."—My words may perhaps displease you when I say, I have rejoiced at being counted worthy to be made "the filth and offscouring of all things." I have been in prison for the cause, and have been stript of all things for the Lord's sake. My relations put me in a mad-house privately, where I staid six weeks. From thence my beloved, the Lord Jehovah, set me free, and I adore him for it. He is yesterday and forever the same; infinite in love and mercy. I praise Him for my liberty, my health, my food, my all that I enjoy; and as the "new heaven and the new earth" are begun, I fear not the second death."

"September 11th. 1792.—Your state is a very safe state, being made very sensible of your wants. It is a great mercy to be emptied, not only so but to be filled—with an ardent burning desire after God, the spouse of the bride, the church. All natural love is descriptive of spiritual. How vehemently does the church described by Solomon, pant after the Lord! Language is too poor to paint what souls feel under the agonies of divine love. May your vessel be thoroughly emptied, and every desire be brought into subjection to the Divine will. The greatest cross I ever found, was to hear myself to be unholy, impure, impatient, disobedient and discontented—to feel all this unholiness, and to be content with it, is a miracle; yet so I found it. I know that the flesh is the son of perdition and my intolerable enemy, neither can it be made clean; it is filthy and will ever remain so. People think to bring a clean thing out of an unclean; alas! they are washing the Ethiopian white. Our pollution follows us to the mortal death. The dark spirits take much delight to worry the soul that is feeling for the Lord;—look, they say, at your deformity; can you imagine Jehovah will dwell with you? I answer, Yes; it is by the light of grace that we feel our short-coming and imperfection. Isaiah says, "Our holiness is a bed too short, and the curtains too narrow for a covering." Is it not so? Then be content to be whatever it shall please the Lord to make you. In dryness or aridity still be quiet, for it is our tempers move. The Lord is unchangeable, he is ever the same: Suppose it very painful, dreadful, horrible,—so it must be; it is from a Physician which is infallible, and a Sovereign which none can control! Pure gold is refined seven times, and then it becomes ductile, and will with ease take any form or any impression; then and then only is it "fit for the master's use." Oh, that a divine and irresistible hunger may be awakened in your soul—an insatiable tormenting thirst—a burning implacable fire, never to be quenched, but in the sublime enjoyment of Jehovah; for eye hath not seen, neither hath ear heard, neither can sense conceive the extatic rapture of a union with him—Jehovah, the Lord. You feel dissolved, annihilated, melted, liquefied, swallowed up in Him; and have that ease, that familiarity, that oneness, that all fear is banished for ever. You will have no more respectful awe, final awe, sovereign awe. No, no, all will be love. You will be in extacies that feel no satiety, you will be transported with unutterable delight, your tears will be tears of tumultuous joy—rapturous yet tranquil. [This J. B.'s "Marriage of Virgin Sophia with the Soul."] I write not from books, but from my own heartfelt experience; and I sincerely wish you may die daily, to rise into celestial pleasure. Every place to me and every state is heaven, because Jesus-Jehovah is my beloved, and he is ever with me as an omnipotent God: full, very full of all that can satisfy me.—The dark spirits feel God as a God omnipotent, as a God omnipresent; but as a God omnipotent or a God of love, they know him not. Did they know his omnipotence, light would immediately from his own refulgence dissipate their darkness, and they also would be compelled to love. Oh my dear friend, I cannot pray for your case, but I pray for your extreme fires to begin, that from those burning furnaces, the resplendent gold may be brought forth,—more precious than the gold of Ophir. Do not be deceived, but expect the ordeal—the proba, that you may be enabled to glorify God in the fire. Oh how divinely brilliant, how divinely lustrous and transcendent, will you then be! everlasting joy on your head, and then enter into a rest everlasting. This only is felicity and to be given to those "who are worthy." Who are they? those who loved not their lives unto death. Of that celestial number Jehovah in great love has made me, and I am uniformly thankful, for his love dwells in me, and is become my very essence. Farewell."

"October 14th. 1792.—I had the pleasure of seeing * * *, and among other spiritual conversation, I asked him if he knew any precious souls who were hungering and thirsting for the hidden manna? He said, he knew but very few, and sent a minister to me who professed mysterious things; but weighing him in the balance of the sanctuary, I found him very deficient, indeed. He shewed me your letters, in which I perceived the true savour of the hidden life, though in an imperfect state.

I greatly rejoiced in the prospect of communicating and receiving mutual benefits, if it was agreeable to Jehovah, who alone forms friendships upon celestial principles; and who is in my voice, my actions, my life, my all. Therefore as a mariner casts the lead to find soundings, so am I directed to act. I throw out the line, and if what Jehovah gives me to say finds acceptance, it yields me unspeakable pleasure, for thereby the Lord is glorified, and my soul is refreshed.

But if any doubts arise, or reason dare to dictate, my correspondence ends, and why? all that flesh can say, is but like "sounding brass and the tinkling cymbal." I then conclude first, that the time is not come for my friend to receive mysteries; or secondly, that perhaps cursed pride might creep in, and poison the water that I wish to communicate; or thirdly, perhaps Jehovah does not choose any instrument, but will teach my dear friend more immediately by himself. And as I am not my own, but belong to Him, my adorable spouse, I am content to be accounted simple, foolish, and void of understanding—yea, and to be laughed at, mocked and reviled. For "the natural man (the man of reason) does not understand the things of God, they are folly to him; "besides all that reason can teach or suggest is impure,—the radix of reason is in death. Our blessed Lord said to reason, "if I tell you of earthly things and you believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things?" But verily, the truly hungry and the truly thirsty will drink and eat to satisfy the raging passion of nature, out of a very filthy vessel. Yea, the torment of spiritual hunger which I felt was so intolerable, that I could have been taught by a dog, if it had pleased Jehovah to let him articulate, like Balaam's ass.—My dear Sir, I am not fearful that the cause of an omnipotent God can suffer by the pen of his dust and ashes; for the waters of eternal life are too pellucid, nothing that is created can soil them or cloud their incomparable beauty, let reason say what it may. [Her correspondent had replied, that the religious world would hardly receive her testimony.] And although your delicate tenderness for me feels very sensibly, and my soul loves and esteems you for it, yet I must write with Pilate, "what I have written I have written;" being under the influence of the Holy Ghost who writes by my pen. I am a cypher, all the numbers are from Jehovah, for the "kingdom is given up, in me, to the Father, that God may be all in all."—Madame Guion, Roach, Bourignon, Poiret, Behmen and Marsay, Francis de Sales, and every mystic author, Philadelphian and others, I have read, not one of them ever went into the garden to eat of the tree of life, which grows in the midst of the paradise of God. Pardon me, I do not deny but there may have been such souls,—but no mystic book I have met with, either French, English, German or Italian, even Latin, ever mention such experience; now the treasure is so immense that I am very confident the possessor would have published it. I have read manuscripts and many (almost all) Hermetic books; I have sought earth, sea and air, (speaking in a figure), yet never found a companion, that had been the path. [It must be here borne in mind, that the "Memorials of Hester Ann Rogers," "Bramwell," and others, Methodists, were not then published.] Paul himself counted himself not to have apprehended that which he was apprehended of in Christ Jesus; but he followed on, leaving those things which were behind to press on towards perfection.

Indeed I should publish this transcendent mystery, but I am grieved to say, I have a persecuting husband, and a dissolute son who is allowed plenty of money, while I am dealt with like Hagar the Ishmaelite, kept without a shilling; but I want neither food or clothing, and my high privileges bring me peace and content. My husband is a strict follower of Swedenborg; that deluded society is spreading contagion in London. But why do I say contagion? for it is no matter what persuasion people are of, till they feel the pangs of the new-birth. Then a child is born whose parent is God, and the child is immortal and will not be satisfied without proper nourishment from God its Father. Bromley's "Sabbath of Rest" speaks highly of the hidden life. All the mystic writers used to give me pleasure, but now they are to me like a horn-book. I once had great occasion for them, that day was under the sixth seal—under the seventh there needs no teacher, for the "new heaven and the new earth" speak a superior, a celestial language. They that live there are undefiled; neither can the truths they speak become contaminated, for they carry a dignity with them—a sovereignty, which cannot be copied, and though obscure—deep, profound, incomprehensible, yet true. Could reason comprehend them, where then is the "mystery hid from the foundation of the world"—the "seventh seal opened"—the "resurrection state"—the "new Jerusalem"—the "day of the Holy Ghost?" A blind man may as well attempt to paint the sun and stars, as a person endeavour or presume to say what is right or what is wrong to souls under the peculiar influence of the Holy Ghost. [Most excellent truth.] The works of God are in the dark abyss, and to be viewed with astonishment and awful fear; but when revelation comes, every mystery is open. Though before we saw through a glass darkly, now all is clear as the sun at noon-day, and so exceeding glorious that the possessor sinks into dust and ashes, considering the disparity of flesh and spirit—yet at the same time feels his own dignity, and is delighted in contemplating his own beauty; for in equality, as between man and wife, the conjugal endearments are in union, they taste reciprocal delights: for "my beloved is mine and I am his, he feedeth among the lilies"—or he feedeth with me in spotless purity. Emblems of innocence are lilies. "Come walk in the gardens of love," and taste pure delight and ineffable pleasure. "Eye hath not seen nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive," what Jehovah hath given me, and what he has been pleased to reveal to me. It is extatic—it is glorious—it is divine! Follow on, my dear brother, sink down, deep as death in self abasement, and you also shall dwell in paradise.

Looking over your letter I perceive you say, Some will doubt my testimony. Be it so, it is only the blind; besides what harm can arise to me? Suppose they say, that I am in pain. If I do not feel it, it cannot hurt me. Not only so, but all mysteries are inconsistencies, let Nicodemuses say what they will. What sense and reason can understand, is not worth having—it is polluted. [Excellent, sublime truth.]

My soul exults in the prospect of a separation from the polluted hell I live in, namely the body. No other hell to them who have passed the first death, over them the second death has no power. This foul body is like a beast—its appetites, its passions, its gratifications are vile, unbecoming the loveliness of a celestial inhabitant who is always attended by a host of blessed angels, "lest thou dash thy foot against a stone." Oh, that every soul who is seeking this inestimable pearl, may soon find it! [as they will, if they "seek," as a Bramwell or a Rogers, or as taught by Behmen's "Way to Christ," and the Gospel.] Oh, how they will dance for joy! My dearest Sir, I have danced for joy, yea and sung too, till my body was quite exhausted, and I could say, "Stay me with flag-gons, comfort me with apples, for I am sick of love." Dear Sir, pursue the direct road to death—give up your time, your powers of soul and body to annihilation, to putrefaction; then shall you arise "fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners." You will find my pen the "tongue of a ready writer," for in this new state there is such a redundancy of matter, it would be pleasure to fill a volume if time would permit." Thus much from Mrs. Pratt's letters. To resume the narrative.

We find on looking over Mr. Law's published "Collection of Letters," one, addressed to Mr. Ward, under date of April 10th. 1757. This letter (in accordance with what we have before stated) was not an original, but altered for publication, and, we think, partially by Mr. Law himself, at the suggestion of his friend and editor, Mr. Ward: who might have deemed this a favourable opportunity of finally disposing of the stupid calumny propagated by Warburton respecting the "Appeal." This calumny had formed one of the subjects of the expository correspondence of Byrom, noticed p. 574; and was possibly forged by Warburton out of revenge, on being stung by the ironical allusions at the close of the "Animadversions on Trap," appended to the "Appeal."—On referring to the original, given p. 559, and then to this published letter, and further to that, dated Sept. 1756, it will appear, that Mr. Law never honored Wesley by coupling him with the Pope, as "having the same reasons for condemning, and not espousing the mystery revealed by God in J. B.;" but that the remark originally applied to Warburton. And then it might only have been an adoption of Warburton's own term in his remarks, and correspondence with Byrom.

In this published Letter, with which may be associated the 'second interpolation' in the Scruple Letter (referred to. 554), commencing "Let me here, sir, observe" &c., to "both of us like minded,"—doubtless composed, though ingeniously inserted as an incidental remark, for the like purpose, we cannot but notice, the felicity with which Mr. Law turns the shafts of Warburton's calumnies against himself; and, taking in connection therewith the "Confutation" piece how he makes good his own comparison in the above reference, as to Warburton's "knocking his head against a post."—It will further be remarked, that Mr. Law tacks on a Postscript to this imaginary letter, in order to pay a final compliment to Mr. Wesley's qualifications and spirit exhibited in the publication he had addressed to him, the year previous.

The scope of this Letter, we need hardly observe, has proved too much for the ordinary class of readers; (it being moreover of a prophetic character, and so embraced within the purport of the next succeeding letter in the "Collection.") But the secret of the second paragraph is the existence of an eternal nature or ground of being, sometimes called by Mr. Law the 'glassy sea' or 'heavenly materiality,' in which every form of life is raised up originally, as a magic birth, by the wisdom, will and efflowing virtue of the abyssal Deity; and the fact, that the visible universe and every object in it, on the face of the earth, is so much of this unseen world (its severed ground) materialised, and brought to view in a lower degree of manifestation. The whole creation constituting one stupendous theatre or platform, on which divine things and characters are represented, not by the arbitrary will of an omnipotent fiat, but according to the necessary economy, so to speak, of the divine nature, which is triune in its essence and operation, and must therefore kindle and distinguish all natural life in a threefold manner. This philosophy, wherein only the distinctions of God and nature are scientifically and virtually made, Mr. Law very justly holds up as that, which Dr. Warburton, with his usual ill-luck when handling theological topics, represents as Pantheism or Spinozism; though it not only makes a distinction between God and nature, but shews how the Deity, opening and manifesting his own abyssal glory and perfection in the latter, is the fountain of its life and joy. The fire which penetrates and vivifies all material things, the light which makes them visible, and the spirit which preserves them in one bond and chain of being, being nothing else than the fire, the light, and the spirit of eternal nature, brought down through a variety of births into this temporal system; as couched in the first four verses of the book of Genesis. How important and essential is the acquisition of this science, for all who would be true savans in the understanding or manipulation of nature, according to the several trunk branches of her physical powers and developments, as well as with reference to the universal induction of "all nations" into christianity, and to the revelation of every secret that can concern man, is left for the intelligent reader to conceive. On this point Mr. Law thus speaks, to those who have ears to hear, for our Lord submitted his parables "of heavenly things," only to such:—"Not a book (says he) ancient or modern in all our libraries" (this does not embrace the ancient Egyptian and Chaldean learning, and its repositories,) "has so much as attempted to open the ground of nature, to show its birth and state, and its essential and unalterable distinction from the one abyssal supernatural God; and how all the glories, powers, and perfections of the hidden unapproachable God, have their wonderful manifestation in nature and creature. This is a blessing reserved by God for these last times, to be opened in his chosen instrument, the poor illiterate Behmen."

The Postscript of this Letter, which we have already referred to, touches on a subject of great concern to the Christian world. "We seem (remarks Mr. Law therein) to be farther from the Gospel in point of spirit than in distance of time;"—a truth, assuredly applicable to our own day (with all its supposed Gospel light,) as it was to the time when it was written; (though, considering the contents of this publication, must it not be said that "our salvation is nearer than interrompue, notre type ne se rapporte plus à son modèle; il n'en dépend plus; il se place sous when we believed?") For where are the happy souls who, comprehending the scope and mystery of the gospel as now revealed from heaven, realize every moment the prerogatives of their redeemed and restored birthright? who, turning from all inferior, human and subhuman helps, for any and every necessity, trial, weakness or distress of soul, spirit or body, live purely and totally by faith, seeking every good in and from God alone, manifested in Christ Jesus?

Which subject by the way, brings to mind the remarks of a respected friend, laying claim to the high alchemical science, on being informed of the following circumstance, namely, that in the recent biography of the holy Bramwell published by some of his own family, the editor has put forward among other evidences and argumentations, of the occasional weakness of his judgment, that, when he has been attacked by severe bodily indisposition, instead of availing himself of the advice and usual remedies of doctors, kindly and gratuitously offered to him, "he considered them a positive intrusion;" and would manifest (in the exercise of faith and prayer,) a profound reliance upon God alone, for relief. In short that he applied himself (like Gregory Lopez, and other sublime contemplatives,) immediately to the hyperphysical physician of human nature in its present relations under the gospel; by the touch of faith to draw from his all pervading divine corporeity, what "virtue" he required for his physical as well as spiritual necessities. When this was stated to our friend we say, he expressed much surprise and gratification, to find existing, among that body of operative religionists, the Methodists, such an example of divine science, and most heartily commended the sound judgment of Bramwell's procedure; at the same time remarking, that the editor of the book, though he might be fit to write a mawkish religious novel, was evidently incapacitated for the task he had undertaken, of depicting the mind and spirit of an illuminated christian philosopher.

The short of the matter is this, which Mr. Law well knew,—that men have not that faith (or degree of faith) which our Lord meant when he said, "when the Son of man cometh shall he find faith on the earth," or as already quoted, Mark xvi. 15—18, and elsewhere. Which faith, without a spark of fanaticism in it, would do everything for man (who can exercise it) by placing his total being in immediate rapport with the glorified Head and heart of human nature, and all-sufficient satisfaction and remedy for all its wants and distresses, whatsoever (v. p. 9); just as attaching the wires to the galvanic battery forms a medium whereby the elemental fluid may be diffused, at the will or faith of the operator. And the reason of this want of faith, this omnipotent gospel faith, is, that the science of it is lost to the church, though through the instrumentality of this treatise, it may come to be restored, and a new era dawn upon the philosophy of the natural and divine magic. Which faith be it withal observed, implies all the gradations of the regenerate life, down to that of the ignorant, incipient believer. [v. "Revelation of Revelations," p. 60—68.]

Leaving to the reader to refer at his pleasure to Mr. Law's published Letters, according to their respective dates, we shall now confine ourselves chiefly to the manuscript correspondence we hold, that passed between him and his friends, out of which we select the following two letters for insertion in this place:—

"December 12th. 1757.—My dear Langcake—I received both your Letters, and thank you for the little book of Mr. Norris. Who is he? he writes in the style of an ingenious quack. I am willing to have some small matter of his medicine with his directions, to make some trial of it.

I must desire you to take up the following books of Mr. Richardson, on my account, viz., the "Appeal," "Spirit of Prayer," "Way to Divine Knowledge" and the "Spirit of Love," and let them be made up into a well covered parcel, with this direction, 'To Mr. John Burnet, at Rotterdam.—To be sent by the first Holland Packet Boat.'

I would have a slip of paper inclosed, shewing the order in which these books were published, which is as they stand in this letter.

Perhaps my nephew's servant, may be the safest way of carrying them to the boat; but I leave that to you. We are all well, and full of all good wishes to my dear friend. Adieu.—W. LAW."

"April 9th. 1758.—My dear friend—I thank you for the all sorts of trouble you have taken on my account.

I liked the spirit of Pennington in that book that you have sent me, which made me write for his Works, as fit to be added to my Spiritual Library. If you send them I would have them bound, but leave it to you, either to send them or stay for a perfect book.

Pray tell Mr. Ward, that I desire him to buy me the eighth volume of the "Arcana Cœlestia": he bought the first seven volumes for me, and so knows the volume that I have not. I shall never go through them, but as I have gone so far in the expence, I shall take this last volume. My last volume ends with the 24th chapter of Exodus. Also, from the Quaker's shop, the "Godly Life of Luterman," if it be in High Dutch, i. e. German.—I need not repeat to you and Mr. Ward, to pay yourselves all charges in Sun Court.

As soon as the little pieces are out of the press, I could have the whole of what is printed for me, sent directly away; a hundred of each stitched in blue paper, and the rest in sheets. You and Mr. Ward may take what you please of both of them.—Yours affectionately—W. LAW."

The particulars of this last letter, offer to us a subject of remark. We have already from time to time expressed Mr. Law's opinion with respect to the character and value of mystic writers, of those who, he considered, had a right evangelical apprehension and experience, as distinguished from those, who did not apprehend the "one sole drift and design of all the dispensations of God to man," namely to teach man to know and feel his great natural misery, as fallen, and his great glory as redeemed, so, that he shall willingly die to every motion and working of his natural spirit, and with all the energies of his being, reach after the full birth of the divine nature, within him. That is, those mystical writers whose philosophy and instructions were centered in this latter practical business, and flowing from a pure ground of experience, he deemed orthodox mystics; whilst the writings of the former, he laid aside as beside the point, as books not of the nature of the Gospel, and therefore not worthy of a place in his library. But here we meet with a letter, written by Mr. Law's intimate friend Langcake, to Henry Brooke, Dublin, (Mr. Wesley's friend, and to whom Mrs. Pratt's recent correspondence was addressed,) immediately relating to this subject, which, for the interesting nature of its contents, we here present at length:—

L'influence des êtres corporels qui ne devaient servir qu'à exercer nos facultés créatrices, et par

"Bristol. Dec. 29th. 1776.—My dear Sir—I received your most friendly and obliging favor, and wish I was capable of fully gratifying you in every particular enquiry contained in your letter. Though I had the honor and happiness of being several years intimate with the divine and blessed man, Mr. Law, yet it was rather in a way of correspondence than by personal intercourse; and at those times I visited him, nothing passed in conversation but what might have occurred with any other of his disciples. It chiefly turned upon his own writings at my going down the first time, and I well remember that, walking together in his garden, and talking of objectors to them, he said, "the abler the adversary, the better he should be pleased; but that his principles could not be overthrown without tearing up the whole Christian religion by the roots."—The primitive Quakers and their writings Mr. Law had a regard for, but as to Isaac Pennington I do not recollect to have had any converse about him; though after Mr. Law's death, I was myself satisfied he had read him with great approbation. — I never heard him mention a word about Engelbrecht; but a friend [Mr. G. Ward probably, or Stephen Penny,] told me that he said Swedenborgh was "very voluminous, and that was not his worst fault."—As Mr. Law had read the mystic writers through every age of the church, so Madame Bourignon could not have escaped his notice. He considered her, nay said she was an illuminated woman, but petulant. [Mr. Law's very impartial opinion of Madame Bourignon is expressed at length in a letter to Dr. Byrom, of 1736, given in answer to the particular enquiry of the latter.] Mr. Marsay's pious pieces that are translated into English, (in the Scotch volume,) he spoke of with approbation; but as the ground of Nature, he said, was never opened in any man but Jacob Behmen, so he did not approve of Marsay and other spiritual writers running into philosophical conjectures and fancies of their own."

It may be proper just to mention, that the letters which passed between Mr. Langcake and Mr. Brooke, with numerous others of a relatively interesting and spiritual character, are in the possession of the writer of these lines. From the correspondence of Henry Brooke, we make the following extracts, the second of which being connected with our subject:—

"Dublin. Jan. 2nd. 1781.—Your letter came in due season as a sweet cordial to revive my wearied spirit. I feel myself grateful for your kindness, and kindled into emulation by that glow of love that animates your lines.

I had hopes that my last letter would have been delivered to you in person by Mr. R. T., a disciple of J. B. and Mr. Law, but it seems he sent it by post. He has given up friends, fortune and fame for God, abandoned a seat in Parliament, and scattered his patrimony. He enjoyed the love of God at first, but relaxing in closet duties and watchfulness, he lost his first-love, and is now in the anguish of the backslider's return. May God of his infinite mercy and love in Jesus Christ, speedily restore him like Job to all that he has lost, and tenfold more abundance. I can hardly tell you how deeply I have been interested in his prosperity, but he stood aloof and would none of my kindness. He saw I lived in the world, a plain and common outward life, and that, notwithstanding I professed my veneration for J. B. and the mystics, I had for many years been in connection with the methodists. These things gave him a certain repulsion of spirit to me, especially as he thought (perhaps too justly) that I lived in conformity to the world, and his leadings were all to austerity and retirement.

My dear friend, I am sorry to say that here, as well as among you, we all are engulfed in the vortex of self; indeed there are, blessed be God, some few exceptions. But there is none, no not one exception to that observation, that we all dwell upon the surface of things, the externals of religion. My soul longs and sighs after a brother—a fellow traveller, whose conversation might cheer, whose instructions might strengthen, and whose example might animate me. I have some few to converse with, who are truly pilgrims. The conversation of persons of the world is a most wearisome bondage to a spirit aspiring after heaven; but how to express the irksomeness and the various emotions which we feel in the company of those, who think themselves whole and sound, and yet know not that they are poor and miserable, and blind and naked . . .

"Oct. 1782.—Our friend gave me reason to hope that you would not esteem it troublesome, to send me a copy of Mr. Law's letter concerning the mystic writers, more especially the Philadelphia society and its members, among whom I esteem Bromley, Lead, Pordage, &c.

Their writings I confess, I have never ranked but in the third class. The sacred Scriptures standing first. Jacob Behmen first of the second class, among whom are Dionysius, Macarius, Bertot, Molinos, Jean de la Croix, Canfield, Thauler, the two Catharines, &c. And in the third class the number of those who, in all the divided churches, and even in Pagan and Mahomedan nations, taught their disciples to penetrate from the outward into the inward, and seek after the divine life—of a God in them, the hope of glory." [It must be borne in mind, when this was penned the Biographies of those eminent pure Methodist worthies, Bramwell, Longden, Rogers, &c., were not published.]

"Jan. 1783.—My heart is filled with gratitude for the kindness of your letter, which I should have answered sooner, but the multiplicity of inward exercises and conflicts which I have been passing through, and am still in a measure pressed with, has taken from me all desire of writing, even to those whose correspondence is prized above all human connection.

I believe Mr. T.'s pursuit as well as mine, has as yet been fruitless. No wholly renewed, no altogether regenerate and apostolic character, has yet appeared to reward the researches of either. [Here again, may be remarked as above.] But let God be true though every man a liar. That such souls were, that such may yet be, nay that such now actually are living, breathing men of like passions with us, I firmly believe, as I believe the word of God and my own existence. Yes I verily believe, it is the hope and high prize of our holy calling, and that he and I and you have fallen short of it, not through any failure on the side of God, not through any want of instruction, opportunity, grace or power, from the sweet love and willingness of JESUS, but through our own hard and rebellious hearts, which have been unfaithful to co-operate with his grace, and are bent to backslide.

Our dear friend is eagerly hungering and thirsting after the full salvation of God; and I believe makes unremitting war with all the lusts, passions and appetites of the carnal heart. Blessed hunger—blessed warfare. Oh, may he go forth from conquering to conquer, until the shout of the King of glory is heard in his heart. Yet I am jealous over him; I trust not with the eye of envy or uplifting, for I feel myself in deed and in truth, not only less than the least of all saints, but the very chief of sinners and unfaithful, backsliding rebels. He has a spirit of repulse and condemnation that seems to narrow and embitter his mind both against himself and others; rejecting all that oppose, or even are dubious about, the doctrine of perfect salvation and sinless obedience; and renouncing all the visitations and operations of God, that are not immediately followed by perfect victory over corrupt nature, and entire renovation into the divine life. Alleging that none are the "sons of God," but those who are in all things, inward and outward,—thoughts, words and actions,—“led by the Spirit of God”; all else, however sincerely striving, being children of wrath and under the sentence of condemnation.—I cannot so understand the Scripture. Surely if he is right I have all along mistaken J. B. in many places, as well as in his Book of Regeneration, from v. 100 to the end. He evidently considers not the gradations of the divine life, though in all the commandment still stands against us, “Strive to enter in to that rest,” “watch and pray.” I shall be thankful for a transcript of any of Mr. Law’s unpublished letters, indeed I think it is a real loss that they are not all made public. How many hungry and thirsty souls, that gasp after the water of life, might be directed by them to the true fountain, instead of being continually directed and led to the cracked and broken cisterns of some patched up sect, or pulpit orator.”

“June, 1783.—I hope this letter will be delivered to you by Mrs. B., the sister of our worthy friend Mr. R. T. She is taking her two children with her to England, principally animated with the desire and expectation of meeting some of those living characters, whose principles and practice have been so exquisitely drawn by the pen of him, who was wont to address you as “Dear son of my love.”—About seventeen or eighteen years since, she felt the kindlings of the divine fire in perusing the writings of Mr. Law; since when his most excellent female character, Eusebia, has been the object of her constant aspirings. She is now a widow with two children and an independency like her, which she wishes and endeavours to devote in the same manner. I have had the favor of knowing her these five or six years—a privilege like many others, which I have neither improved nor cultivated as I ought. Oh may my manifold infidelities and sins be blotted out for ever, by that cleansing blood that not only effaces the stains of the old Adam, but invigorates the new man; giving strength to the weak, and power to them that have no might.

And now my dear friend, may the sweet Spirit of our long-suffering and infinitely patient Lord JESUS, draw us more and more from the multiplicity into the UNITY; teaching and giving us power and wisdom to cut off, renounce and crucify to the very last gasp, the man of sin within us, that our lives may at length be hid with Christ in God.”

“Jan. 1785.—I am exceeding grateful for the copies of Mr. Law’s letters, and cannot but lament, that while the press swarms with puerile, crude, and undigested trash, such excellent gems should be locked up in a desk or drawer, and by and by be cast out among the rubbish of waste papers, and devoured in the common flame that consumes the refuse. Surely the excellency of those already published, is a very strong call upon you, to let those you have, and all you can contribute to collect, be multiplied abroad; and though they may be scattered as the Sybils’ leaves, yet the breath of the adorable providence of God, shall blow one and another here and there, to hearts disposed by his own Spirit, and prepared to receive them; and so good not only may, but must be done by them.

Remember the labours of honest Poirot, who was the laborious editor of an incredible number of the sacred mystics, [and of the “Bibliotheca Mysticorum,” given pp. 129—178.] And surely if a cup of cold water given in the name of a prophet, shall receive a prophet’s reward; how much more (if we cannot speak or write as Apostles ourselves) shall our extending and communicating the knowledge of the spiritual wisdom and grace—through a spiritual and gracious motive—receive a spiritual and most gracious acceptance and reward. I must own I have blessed Poirot in my closet many a time for his labours of love. As also Elliston and Sparrow, &c., for their labours in the word and doctrine.

As for myself I do feel a share in the general revival and outpouring of grace, which seems to descend and visibly influence all the spiritual worshippers of every denomination; and even to reach many of the National church, who remain shut up in the frozen form of an invariable repetition.”

“August, 1785.—I cannot tell you how peculiarly seasonable was your last precious transcript. Indeed Mr. L.’s christian writings have from my earliest infancy, had easiest and most convincing entrance to my heart, till they had performed their Baptist-like ministry; and led me on to the inestimable mines of Jacob Behmen, and opened the inexhaustible fountains of the sacred Scriptures; whereby we come finally to live in the Spirit, and draw water direct out of the wells of salvation, opened in our own souls.

I do not now read them as frequently as I have done; but I scarce ever open them, without blessing God for their light and guidance, and feeling a kind of personal gratitude and affection to their eminent author. Yet I do not feel the same profound veneration and unhesitating defence to his writings as to the blessed Behmen’s, but a kind of sweet attachment, as to a parental relation.

Adieu, my dear friend and fellow-traveller. We have been, I fear, both of us loiterers on the way, and very weak disciples of the great and glorious light given in these latter ages, through J. B.

P. S.—This letter will, I trust, be handed to you by a beloved friend, Mr. Dugdale, who, through the operations of the Spirit, was called among the methodists, and is still among them, with little leisure (from attention to a shop and family) to read the spiritual authors, but I believe daily enjoys that which they all point to, as the privilege and glory of our calling, viz. communion with the Father and the Son, through the Spirit.

Mr. T. is married and has a son. His wife, has all the sweetness of an elementary goodness, but is yet unawakened to the strife of the two principles. May the divine call, (Adam where art thou,) soon be heard, and the promise (of the seed of the woman or working Word of Life,) soon be felt within her, bruizing the serpent’s head.”

Such are the quotations from the ingenious H. Brooke’s own letters to Mr. Langcake. But it may not prove uninteresting, or irrelative to our design, to add some further extracts from the spiritual letters of acquaintances he had made, to himself. The first then we would propose to give, is from one R. Mather; concerning whom we accidentally met with, in Wesley's journals, the following notice :—" Jan. 29th. 1774.—This day, and several times in the following week, I had much conversation with Ralph Mather, a devoted young man, but almost driven out of his senses by mystic divinity. If he escapes out of this specious snare of the Devil, he will be an instrument of much good." Thus Wesley in his usual style, of self-distrust and righteous diction, when upon this topic, (notwithstanding we say, Matt. vii. 1, and what he had written in his diary, Nov. 30th, 1767.)—The extract we now propose to give, is from one of Mather's letters, dated November, 1775, containing "A List of some Names and the Places of Abode of Persons, in whose Minds the Light of God has arisen, or is graciously rising." He was, it appears, simply a working artisan. The account, headed "Sing Praises," thus proceeds :—

"Carrickfergus. E. Pendril, shoemaker, a married man, who under great persecution lives in continence, and abstinence from animal food; visited about five years' since. He is a tender mind; he was with the Quakers, but now fully believes in restitution, and the universality of God's power and love. Belfast. William Forde, Hercules lane, a poor man, he is not so solid as E. P. but teachable, and lives on roots and water; there is another in that debauched town, but I wait to see if it will prove as the seed sown in good ground.

England. Liverpool. Richd. Haughton, Wolstenholm Square; this is a mind just the soul of thy soul and spirit of thy spirit. My relation R. Seddon Jun., anchor-smith, Old Dock, belongs to the methodists. Give R. M.'s love, and he will shew thee any civilities, but he has no house but boards. My sister also married his relation, but she poor thing and her husband, a captain of a ship, are in the dark world. Warrington. It is not impossible to find some simple minds. James Worral and Wm. China, both well meaning methodists and my loving friends, can soon direct to them. Leigh. Near this town Wm. Crompton, farmer; and in it R. Darwell and young Geo. Darwell, and J. Marsh, poor people, love J. Behmen and W. Law. My father and mother, T. and M. Westrey live here; likewise two uncles, the one Joseph the other H. Mather. Bolton. E. Hughes, passed into God; M. Owen, greatly advanced; M. Winkbridge, fifteen years in purifications; several more coming on: these I think are in general but low in the world, but it is a school of female philosophers. Oh how gladly would they see a mind desirous to get out of the dark world; but these angelic souls are as the filth of the world and scouring of all things. Chester. (I forgot). Enquire for Eliz. Letsham at H. Rider's, she has a most tender mind. She was with the methodists, and though a pretty handsome annuity, sits alone and keeps silence., a poor woman, has a large experience. A servant maid, E. L.'s acquaintance, is very simple. J. Leadbetter a painter, and many others, have been visited; these are also held in derision as mystics, but though some do not come forward as one would wish, yet they are not gone from simplicity. Manchester. Sarah Lee in St. Ann's Square, one highly elated in the world, but of large experience. Thomas Clowes a rector of one of the churches, a pious solid young man., a curate of another, T. C.'s acquaintance, more in the fire yet would seem promising. Sam. Mann, Radcliff Street, has been about eighteen years in the way; this dear man and his wife will show the rest. A young woman in Salford, S. M., will conduct to some others in this place, who would feign the name of mystics but I fear are deceiving themselves. But E. Watson and M. Brierly among the methodists, simple but low in the world, are worthy to be seen. So are some others, simple; and if one could put books into their hands, as I have Lady G.'s "Short Method of Prayer," it would be merciful, for they know not the way, though the way is at hand. Here were near four hundred methodists, and there are a large number in Bolton. Near Manchester, there are three simple, tender minds, who have been seeking the true life many years, Sam. Mann will therefore point them out. But there is another also, Mary Robinson, who has the most exquisite talents, genius, intrepidity, and docility; of whom I am jealous lest the Quakers get her into their society. If she escapes, she bids fair for being a star of the first magnitude; she has been a sprightly, quick and gay frequenter of all the scenes of pleasure. Near Wellington, in Shropshire, lives one Hatton, a preacher of the Episcopal church. This man's companion writes to E. Letsham in a sweet, broken strain. Not far from hence, at Madely, lives J. Fletcher. But should not Leeds be too far from Manchester, there is C. Cayley; the widow Crosby and a young maiden Horrold, are preachers. And six miles from them lives M. Bosanquet, who appears in public also, I have been at her house. Among the numbers of methodists, of which there are two or three thousand just in the neighbourhood, some must be deeply touched. Macclesfield, there were some tender methodists. Birmingham (see Wolverhampton), there is one if not more of whom I hear a thirst is enkindled for spirit and life. J. Behmen and W. Law are favorite authors with one of them. Banbury. Rich. Cooper, the son of a timorous wealthy man, has given himself up to much solitude. Providence may make way for converse, I know him not in person. A young man here, a grocer, who lived in Bristol, professes a great veneration for the mystics, but I have found more brokenness in fewer words, yet is he not in the spirit of the world, but another turn over the wheel would lay the mind more deeply in the dust. Worcester. In this city there cannot but be some seekers, but Gloster is a dead place. I met a man at Gloster who calls himself a prophet, but on my querying closely, he used me with the greatest insolence and perversity, so I had no liberty to see him any more. Cheltenham. Enquire for, schoolmistress, she is brought down from her Calvinian notions, through some simplicity of a forlorn rector's wife, who lives from her husband. But though the sister of this schoolmistress, with whom I had much conversation, is called the Phoenix of the methodists in those parts, she cannot believe that as yet her sister knows aught of religion. Stroud (and enquire for those at Dursley, &c.) John King at Bowbridge, his wife, and Sarah Niblet are tender minds, and so are some three or four others, and two with the methodists, especially a schoolmistress there; but J. King, his wife, and the rest, live separate now from the methodists. Thou must have satisfaction in them. J. K. was a schoolmaster but now lives on his own estate, the rest are poor; and I have great hopes, notwithstanding all the reluctance which he (J. K.) feels, he will yet become a fine man. Bristol. J. Castleman, surgeon. His wife Letty is a sweet mind; she will lead thee to my (and her) spiritual mother. I am persuaded God will give thee admittance to her (if yet alive) though none but those to whom her God and thy God shall direct her to converse with, can she by any means admit. Oh the angelic pleasure it must give! What is five hundred miles to behold so pure, so sweet, so child-like a soul? she is swallowed up in the organiques, se transmettre par la voie de la génération. Ainsi nous hériterons des vices de nos philanthropy of God. Oh that souls would but die, or rather, oh that I may die daily, till death is swallowed up in victory. William Dyer, Radcliff-hill, yea and his wife also, are and have been these many years, of one mind. W. D. will carry thee to R. Tucker. Thomas Mills, bookseller, in Wine street, will be found a dear friend also. J. Hellier, surgeon, his wife is as dear. L. Cas here, is a capacity for the fulness of God. The widow Watkins has a mind in the same way, so has the widow Purnel. The widow Meller copies nearest to my dear mother, but I had no intimacy with her. Dear L. Cas and Hellier can bring thee to many more, the children of my mother. An acquaintance here of Mr. Dyer's, learned German to read J. B. Near Bristol lives a particular friend of T. Mills, who I rather believe, must be led much in the same way of R. Haughton of Liverpool, and if I mistake not, T. Mills told me, either he or another did intend to profess voluntary poverty, but since saw his leadings in another way; nevertheless this dear man must be simple and sweetly pitiful. Also near Bristol, there is a school of young girls, kept by three promising young women and sisters, their name is Owen; their brother is or was at the university. The youngest of these women, a most devoted soul, bids fair for a Teresa. The others are not yet prepared for such communications.

Amongst the methodists, of which sect there were in J. W.'s books, eight hundred in the city of Bristol, there is a handful travelling with another spirit (as L. Cas is one of them); of these J. Southest, S. Johnston (an elderly virgin), the widow Purnel &c., might be ranked in the number. But the Bristol society is mixed up of five or six sorts, viz., here and there an inward mind. Secondly, a few much used to the prayer of meditation. Thirdly, a division of these, less positive in their active state. Fourthly, those who are passed into some consolations, and the extatic state. Fifthly, some under the first convictions. Sixthly, a large body of prating, vain, worldly minds, who can talk about God and the world, like one who has to dictate to two writers, each writing on two opposite subjects. But the hardest to convince, or bring into any true union or nearness to God and his purity, are the second and the last; for the one has got the spiritual, and the other the temporal riches, neither of whom can in this worrisish perversion of soul, enter into the kingdom of heaven. But the first are sliding, though painfully yet surely into God; the third, it is possible to rouse from their sensuality; the fourth, this is the gate to death; fifth, is the ploughing and pruning season in order to bring forth fruit. But the second and sixth, alas! how hardly shall those who have riches (in sweetness, in images and the world) enter God's kingdom. With men it is impossible, but glory to God, all things are possible with him.—On enquiry, there may be found some hidden minds. Dr. Stonhouse, a learned man, is strong in restitution I hear, and in the large bodies of this professing city, (for few churches are without a smattering of Christ's salvation doctrine in their words,) one might find the hungry, the weary, and the heavy laden. Bath, enquiry of T. Mills for those. Bradford, near Bath, Joseph Yerbury: my dear brother and sister are both drawing into the pure nature of God. Oh Jesus, touch many such souls!

London. Mary Roberts, a methodist, in Union street, Oxford-market, see her husband's name over the door. She has some choice old matron with whom she converses. There are a few at the West-end of the town, to whom I would hope mercy has been offered. Barnstaple and Bideford. These towns may be too far, else there it was, or at Bishop's Townton, in which some were constrained to meet together, as Prudence Scott, Edwd. Sage, Wm. Harnet, John Nichols, &c. Northampton. At this town a Moravian preacher, Okely, professes great love to the mystics; but at Loughborough, not far from thence, near twenty are turned from Methodism to Quakerism. As this is the case, prejudice may have shut up their hearts, except to those who can speak 'thee' and 'thou' and wear a broad brimmed hat, and who have learned their phrases. So I am afraid it is with those at Barnstaple, as many of the Quakers have visited them; but all things are possible with God. Should providence lead through Salop, there are doubtless in that large town some serious minds. But about Manchester and Bristol,—the spring of Truth would seem to open most of anywhere that I know. In Bolton &c., they are universally hailed, derided and treated with evil reproaches; and in Bristol as whimsical, dreaming, enthusiastical visionaries. If therefore we are persecuted, and suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are we, it is then the Spirit of God and of glory rests upon us. Seeing therefore, on the one hand providence laying before these hearts as well as books, with which thou mayest freely converse; and on the other, that it is put in thy power to give them, if not oral, yet such consolation as the order of God may require; consider how the ties of divine love may be strengthened in that which perishes not, but liveth and abideth for ever. Amen."

This singular communication doubtless led the ingenious Mr. Brooke to seek the acquaintance of some of the devoted individuals indicated in it. Accordingly we find among his correspondence, letters from some of these parties, which on account of the true sentiment of spirituality pervading the same, we had modified and prepared for insertion in this place; but as with other previous matter from time to time, we find on account of their length, we must defer their publication to the proposed larger biography. We may just mention, that they consist of one or two from E. Pendlil; a further one from Mather, dated May, 1776, with some extracts from others; from Mrs. Blackford; from W. Smith, Manchester, 1783; and from one Sulger, a devout and enlightened Moravian minister, probably the individual who translated Marsay's life from the German MS. copy and original, at Mr. Brooke's request.—What we have now to call attention to, in order to return to our main subject, is the letter of Mr. Brooke of October, 1782, or rather the answer to it by Mr. Langcake, from which the following extract is made:—

"I believe (writes Mr. Langcake,) you have in your enumeration of the mystic writers been pretty just in weighing their respective merits. Mr. Law said to me [doubtless referring to the protestant mystics he had read] that Jacob Behmen was the first in excellency, Hiel the next, and in the third place the Quakers,—I believe he alluded in particular to Isaac Pennington. Though I should think the deep mystic writers of the Romish church surpassed them in their exceeding love of God and divine wisdom." On another occasion Mr. Langcake thus writes:—

"What you have said of the Quakers, and some other spiritual writers is much according to my own ideas and feelings of them. The former seem to have greatly lost the divine unction, the latter to have given themselves too much up to the workings of their own imaginations, and therefore neither a rectitude of sentiment, nor the fulness of the divine life is to be found in their

writings; though it must be confessed they possess many deep and awakening truths. There is much wrote about and much talked about the divine life, but to live it is the thing much wanted. —The whole christian world seems to be swallowed up in the vortex of self, whereas I want to see immortal spirits so refined as to go out of themselves, and really embrace the whole human race in the arms of exuberant love. Madam Guion whom you mention in yours, seems to be a standard in this particular elevation of spirit. To be filled with that fulness of divine love she was possessed of, is devoutly to be wished, which carried her everywhere in holy zeal to win over souls to God; wherein by a faith that could remove mountains, she seems to have risen superior to all the most direful events that could befall her during her mortal pilgrimage. Oh how many internal experiences and deaths must the soul pass through, before it is thus purified; and yet I was told by a friend who had a relation that corresponded with her, that toward the last she passed through some severe conflicts with the powers of darkness, but came out of them into a luminous state before she died: herein realizing what Mr. Law says in his book of "Regeneration," that "what the soul shall feel and undergo in its last purifications, when the deepest roots of all selfishness, as well spiritual as natural, are to be plucked up and consumed out of it, or how we shall be able to stand in that final trial, are both of them equally impossible to be known by us beforehand. It is enough for us to know, that we hunger and thirst, hourly and constantly, after the salvation which is in Christ Jesus; and that the deepest humility, and most absolute resignation of our whole selves, soul, spirit, body, unto God, from moment to moment, by the most unbounded acts of faith, is our greatest and highest qualification to receive our greatest and highest purification at his hands."

The next subject we have to notice, is the mention of the "Arcana Coelestia," in Mr. Law's letter of April 9th. 1758. Among the correspondents of Mr. Law was one Mr. Stephen Penny, already mentioned, whose address in the year 1747, was "at the Distillery by Castle Green, Bristol," and it was to him, that was written the letter which we have inserted in the note of p. 45, 6; which was found amongst his papers Dec. 4th. 1780, upon his decease. This individual removed to Dartmouth, whence he once more addressed Mr. Law, in the following manner. It appears that Mr. Langcake became acquainted with him toward the latter part of his life:—

"Dartmouth, 30th. Sept. 1755.—Rev. Sir—I had some years ago (then residing at Bristol) the pleasure of writing you a few lines about a new translation of the valuable works of Jacob Behmen; and of receiving your kind answer to it. And I have with great satisfaction, and I hope profit, read all the pieces you have published since that time. From some of them I conceived hopes of seeing the translation I so much long for, and though the Second Part of the "Spirit of Love" seemed in the conclusion somewhat to forbid that hope, yet I cannot entirely give it up without an order from your own hand; which I confess indeed would give me no small concern, as I do not know anything in the world I long for with so much ardency, as to see a work so inestimable in itself, ushered into the world by a hand, perhaps the only one in it, capable of the undertaking.

Amongst my little acquaintance, in this obscure corner of England, I have a few who relish these writings, that had never so much as heard of them before my coming here; but what is remarkable (and yet may be well enough accounted for too,) they are of the simple and illiterate sort. Others of school-learning despise us, and ridicule them. It was of the first sort the followers of the Saviour of the world consisted, when clothed with humanity. Happy ignorance that leads to so great wisdom!

Give me leave before I conclude, to express my hope, that you will not desist from the translation you seem to be so far advanced in, till you have finished the whole agreeable to the design, it is apparent in some of your late pieces you had, (nay I think promised) to do it. It is not for me to represent to such an enlarged mind, the immenseness of the benefit numbers may receive from an acquaintance with those valuable writings, not only in your own life time, but years of years after you are no more upon earth; and how great a happiness must flow in a good mind, from a consciousness of being so instrumental in it, as you are enabled by divine grace to become. Pardon my freedom, since it is the love of mankind only that prompts me thus boldly to invade your blest solitude, and if you could prevail upon yourself to indulge me in a line of answer, it would confer a very sensible obligation on—Rev. Sir, your affectionate though unknown friend and humble servant—STEPHEN PENNY.

P. S. What is your opinion of "Arcana Coelestia" a book publishing in Latin in London, the author a Swedish nobleman called Emanuel Swedenborg."

We notice this letter chiefly for the postscript, as it has been stated on the supposed authority of this Mr. Stephen Penny, in the recent "Biographical Sketch of Swedenborg" (1849), that the authorship of the "Arcana Coelestia," on its first appearance, was ascribed to Mr. Law. But apart from the above letter, such a preposterous idea could not have entered the mind of the writer, if he had had the least proper acquaintance with Mr. Law's sentiments or writings. Nor do we understand how such a supposition could have been adventured in print, (for it was from a printed document that the compiler of the "Sketch" took it,) unless to add a dignity and respectability to the inventor's favourite author's lucubrations. We cannot discover if Mr. Law wrote an answer to Mr. Penny, though there is every probability of it. [N.B. It was probably, this mention of the work, which led Mr. Law to direct Mr. Ward to procure it for him, seven volumes of it only being then published. What his feelings were on looking into it, and perusing the Baron's elucidations of the first chapters of Genesis, may be more easily conceived than described! His criticisms in his two letters, besides the gospel, Christ-like tenor of all his judgment, indicate them sufficiently. Being informed of the publication of the remaining eighth volume, he, as we have seen, directed it to be purchased, in order to complete the set.]

We should much like to have possessed a clear statement of Mr. Law's opinions of the "Arcana Coelestia," in answer to Mr. Penny's enquiry, to add to those illustrations of the character of his theology, which we have already presented, pp. 158—60, and which were elicited from Mr. Law, we have supposed, by his neighbour and friend the Rev. Mr. Hartley. [Mr. Hartley was the first that attempted the translations of the Baron's writings of 1758 into English, and might have sent portions of these in MS., for Mr. Law's opinion on them.] We have no doubt however, what they affections dépravées, et corriger en nous ces altérations faites à l'image vivante de la divinité; nous would have been, and that Mr. Law would, in his peculiar mode of forcible and natural demonstration, resulting from a perfect apprehension of his subject and its relations to truth, have put an entire extinguisher on Swedenborg's pretensions to the least regard from serious and enlightened Christians. For apart from his arrant, fundamental heterodoxy, all the truths that are handled in his ratiocinations, and put forth in his form of conception as discoveries, are mere feeble explicatives of what may be found expressed with vigour, terseness, and fullness, (to initiates,) in the Gospel and our excellent English church theologians.

And this is what the writer declared and evidenced on all occasions to his ingenious and admiring biographer, when purposely tested by portions of his writings selected and read to him by the latter, for that purpose, during the several months of intimate conversations he had with him, as before mentioned. Nor could he ever advance one seemingly original verity of the Baron's, which the writer did not immediately produce or repeat in the superior Gospel, and settled theological form of expression. And on turning to Mr. Law's two letters, and discussing the statement of the Baron's doctrines therein, this, with the exception of an alleged but only seeming inaccuracy in one trifling point, and the application of the term 'illiterate' (which however only meant 'ignorance of the doctrines and documents of theological truth'), was allowed by him to be substantially just; though it must be said, Mr. Law's conclusions and judgment appeared sadly distasteful to him.—On another occasion our candid friend informed us that, amongst the singular views held by some of the Baron's devoted followers, and publicly advanced by them in their more select reunions and church assemblies, (held at coffee shops about town,) one was that St. Paul as an inspired apostle, was not to be put in comparison with their Seer, nay that St. Paul must be thrown overboard entirely if Swedenborg is to be understood; for their principles were diametrically opposite! This, it may be observed, was in allusion to the Gospel doctrine of the cross. And again he stated, that at one of these meetings, when the question was proposed, as to the best, or most likely means to make converts to the New Church doctrine, (it being his turn to speak,) he had proposed sincere and devout prayer, when the company looked at him with astonishment, and burst into laughter! Indeed the writer himself once heard a very eminent member of that community state, that he regarded the Bible only as any other book, that the New Testament Scriptures were in fact "but a kind of spiritual police," and in proof appealed to their favorite illustration, of the passion of carnal lust! And further, that the doctrine of the trinity was a gross delusion, for God was simply a man.—On another occasion we may just remark, our ingenious literary friend, who had the most unbounded faith in the Baron's spiritual vision, (as indeed his "Biographical Sketch" amply testifies,) offered to us what he considered an absolute demonstration of it, by reading from his recently discovered "Diary" certain passages respecting the state of a celebrated deceased religionist, in the spiritual world, as the consequences of certain secret gross misconduct in this world, which (he added) no body could have known but himself at the time, but which, it had since been discovered, he had been actually guilty of. When to the astonishment of our friend, we produced a book, published about six years before the date of this Baron's "Diary," wherein these very alleged misdoings were openly charged against the individual, then living: which, doubtless Swedenborg had read, and in his after posing moments, had entered in his "Diary" as a vision!—From the Baron's "Diary" we made the following extract, the substance of which, our interlocutor admitted, was the foundation upon which all Swedenborg's theology stands, and that if untrue, "absolutely false, nay the very opposite of truth" (as the writer designated it), then, all the Baron had written of a theological character, was indeed, only the effusions of a distempered brain. The passage is this:—"All the angels in heaven, and all the wicked spirits in hell, were once human beings upon earth; and the common notion respecting the devil having been an angel in heaven, from which through rebellion he fell, is a mere fable, which has neither scripture nor reason to rest upon."

Thus then, may the much disputed question of the Baron's mental sanity be brought to a point, apart from the absurdity—unavoidable as error, of his peculiar doctrines, as shewn in part, in the two letters of Mr. Law, before presented.

Now our literary friend has obtained through our books and conversation, an admitted true apprehension of the ground of nature, or the primary outward manifestations of the abyssal deity. To him then and to all others who understand that fundamental point, and basis of all true knowledge, we offer for perusal, Behmen's "Aurora" and "Signatura Rerum," with the elucidations of Freher and Law, and we will let the issue of the case be with the result. The matter we say, may soon be decided, without exposing the absurdities of the Baron's doctrines, in the common conventional mode of theological argumentation. It simply rests here, in a clear, sensible apprehension of the true ground and principles of all things, and then in an examination of Behmen's "Aurora,"—whether the very opposite of the statement contained in the above quotation, be not satisfactorily demonstrated therein. But we conjecture, from certain past observation, that the present generation of the Baron's admirers do not examine his pretensions in the way we have indicated, nor discuss them with a true theosopher. The possibility of finding themselves to have been the deluded dupes of perhaps the most ingenious lunatic, and audacious visionary that the powers of earthly reason ever produced, would we think, be deemed a risk too great for such intellectualists to run.—Leaving then, finally, the amiable and indefatigable ratiocinator and his admirers, to their imaginary rambles in their elysian fields, (having offered our remarks from time to time, chiefly to direct the candidate's judgment and views,) and exhorting the general reader to keep to, and bless God for, the good old road of earnest devotion to God, in mortification and self-denial, watchfulness and prayer, and all holiness and good works, which is the one "narrow way," through which alone, the first to the last man must enter into life and be eternally happy, if a member of the "first resurrection," we proceed with our notes and observations.

The next of Mr. Law's epistles we have marked for insertion in our narrative, contains the author's thoughts on several important subjects, which is as follows:—

"Sept. 29th. 1759.—My dear Langcake—Mr. Cleland's debt to me is not to be paid by you. When he pays you I am to be paid, but not before. Therefore take immediately of my nephew the money that is due on the bill you sent me.

My love to the philosophic doctor; but you need not tell him that a good brown loaf and cheese pourrons en un mot nous régénérer, et seconder ainsi "les vues réparatrices de l'Homme-Dieu qui had been more useful to me than his cordial. If my executors receive no harm by it, it will be very well.

Many good things may be said of Dr. More as a pious Christian and of great abilities, but he was a Bablylonian philosopher and divine, a bigot to the Cartesian system. [See note of p. 162, where this paragraph is quoted at length, ending "character with you."]

As to outward ordinances, be no more concerned about who are right or wrong in their opinions and practices of them, than about the right or wrong of the external pale of the church. You are content with that in which you are enclosed, though others call it an exclusion from the church. It is not needful for you to determine anything about those that use, or disuse the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; it is possible for both to be in the right. It is enough for you, that you love the sign and the figure, till you find them to be an hindrance to that which is higher; and if that time never comes, your time of leaving them off will never come.

If it was not for the traditions and practice of the church, the washing of feet would appear from Scripture, to be a perpetual Gospel ordinance; it has every mark of it.

In the primitive church, the Supper of the Lord had always the feast of love along with it; after a few ages it was laid aside, because of the abuses arising from it. Hence (wrote Mr. Law in the margin,) I suppose came the Corinthian drunkenness, &c., 1 Cor. xi. [And, may we not add, of the same nature, according to their kind, were, probably, the abuses of the doctrine of love, by the Zinzendorians before referred to, as by other high spiritualists of devout sects in all ages. Who, having began in true consecration of themselves to God, have, through want of the self-knowledge taught in the second chapter of Behmen's tract of "True Resignation," and not keeping close to the written law and testimony of the Gospel, afterwards slid out of the spirit into the flesh, quieting their consciences amid all their sensualities, with the idea, that they "feel nothing contrary to love," and therefore cannot be wrong, nay, that "love sanctifies everything."]

The Quakers have no other objections to the Sacraments, but the bad use that is made of them, and the carnal trust that is put in them. And when this is the case with Gospel signs and figures, they have not the nature of those that were first instituted in the Gospel; they cannot answer the same end, or be justly called the same thing, but in such a sense as a dead man may be said to be the same that was alive. For this reason J. B. calls the two Sacraments, hidden seals.

But more than enough of this.—Your accurate corrections in the Regeneration, like everything I have from you, demand the thanks of yours for life.—W. LAW."

In this letter, as in the one on Church communion, addressed "to Mr. J. L.," in the published "Collection," we find Mr. Law will not give any encouragement to a spirit of disputation in public, but only states the principles which individually direct and guide his own conduct and judgment. We are now alluding to the duty of partaking of the Holy Supper, which he recommends to his friend not to cease regularly practising, according to the rule of the Established church, and the wisdom of enlightened christianity in all ages, until he shall find the observance of the ordinance, a hindrance to the realization of those benefits, for the most intimate communication of which it was instituted; and to leave to those happy individuals here referred to, who are in such a state of perfected sanctity and divine union, as not to need the gracious mediums and channels of grace, (of the humanity of our blessed Lord,) to their own exalted satisfactions.

There is however another observation which may well deserve the notice of the modern reformers of the establishment, and their officiating disciples and brethren throughout the country, namely that the washing of feet is a perpetual Gospel ordinance. If it be so, then we put it to them, whether they might not, very edifyingly, restore it into the formula of pure apostolic practices, and add the regular performance of it to their other ministrations and observances?

With respect to the feast of love, that will not fail to be regarded as an admirable auxiliary in the series of communal practices for the edification of the devoted. The methodists have long enjoyed the spiritual division of this institution; and it is assuredly not only a high and profitable means or expedient of grace, but the love of it, and the personal ministration in it, is perhaps even more beneficial to the humble, diffident, divinely-animated speaker, than to the hearers, which yet to them is incalculable. Thus publicly to declare before the whole assembly of believers, the circumstances of their early life, the means by which the grace of God operated on their minds to conversion, and their present state of growth and advancement in the divine life, with an account of their chief crosses and temptations, trials and persecutions, (for it is an unvarying truth, and witness to the entirely devoted, that "they that will live godly in Christ Jesus, shall suffer persecution,") with numerous other incidents, as the spirit of Christ may, in their abandonment to him, move them to relate: and then the effect of all this upon the hearers, of every Christian degree; upon incipient believers; upon the half-hearted for God and the world, who have not yet renounced all, and taken up the cross; upon those who are seeking the Lord fully, having cast aside every obstacle, of self-pleasing, of man-pleasing, or man-fearing, and conformity to the world, and who are using all diligence in the appointed means, especially by continual supplication, for the full birth of God in their souls; upon others who, it may be, have been long waiting at the borders of the pool; and again upon those who have attained to a settled, holy acquiescence in the light and love, and perfect will of God; as well as upon backsliders, and lukewarm unfaithful souls;—all this, we say, as a part of the benefits of this institution, is not unknown to those who are privileged to enjoy such a communion of saints.—And would that the many pious souls in the Established church, who are shut up to the elements and ground-work of holiness, but whose spirits are rightly prepared for a vegetation into the full life and liberty of the gospel, could become acquainted with, or find within their own pale, the required instrumentalities to that end. Would that the church of England became a progress-church, a salvation-church, adopting the best discovered agencies, means and expediences, by which to raise up in her children, the edifice of Christ, with all his practical holy life, tempers and carriage: which is the sole end of a church. Then would the pastors of each respective flock have various classes and bands of believers, and each member would find his own place or spiritual grade, and all with one aim (under the vigilance of experienced guides and tutors,) grow up into the perfection of the gospel.

The next letter of Mr. Law, in order of time, is as follows:—

s'est revêtu de notre chair etc., etc." Telle est à peu près la marche que le philosophe inconnu suit

"Dec. 3rd. 1759.—My dear friend—I must begin this as you began your last to me, in acknowledging the lateness of it. I am always glad when you have no need of such excuse, for your letters are both a pleasure and a good to me.

The name of the author of 'Faith and Reason,' is Mittenach, a German count. All his later works are in a book called "Fides et Ratio," they are chiefly translations from Madam Guion.

I thank friend Hinde for his offer of 'George Fox,' but have no leisure for folio reading; though the man that wrote it has enough of my esteem.

Perhaps the operation of Dr. James's medicines may have done you no hurt, but of this your own experience can only judge. But I think you ought to be very cautious in your dealing with doctors.

I wrote a letter to Mr. Clarke in answer to one of his. It went open to Mr. Ward, that he might see the contents, and shew them to you; as also two other Letters for the censure of you both. I know not how far he has proceeded in preparing some of my Letters for the press, or whether he and you are still in the opinion of publishing them.

Next week I intend to send you a little parcel by the carrier, directed for you in Sun Court, in which you will find another Letter on a particular subject, to be added to the other Letters, if you and Mr. Ward judge it to be worthy. For you and he are to do that for me, which I cannot do for myself. I have no need of spectacles, but find great benefit by looking at things through your eyes.

Present my love to the philosophic doctor. I have done what I never thought of doing, have tasted of his cordial, as the ladies have done. It is we believe as good as anything of that kind can be. You need not tell him this without you cannot help it.

I am commanded by two of us, to tell you that we all three love to think and talk of you. And so farewell.—W. LAW.—P.S. Mrs. Campbell died here the 23rd. of the last month." [Note. She was widow of the celebrated Rev. Archibald Campbell. Her two daughters inherited Mrs. Hutcheson's property on her decease in 1781; one of them was married to a Mr. Griffiths, whose descendant, or son-in-law, was one Mr. Bailey, upholsterer, of Mount-street, Grosvenor-square.]

In this Letter we find a reference to Mr. Clarke, the individual whom Mr. Law had formerly assisted in the publication of a work, at the instance of Mr. Langcake, but whose book Mr. Law had placed amongst the list of authors, whose publications that were sent to him, he made use of, to light his chamber fire with. [It was this individual, who wrote the Elogy which appeared in print some short time after Mr. Law's decease, which we propose to add to our other notices of Mr. Law, in its due place.] Mr. Clarke, as his writings shew, was an author of a peculiar idiosyncrasy, the subjects of his thoughts and talk being the transcendental mystical topics and prophecies of the old Jewish scriptures. One of his favorite topics was an artificial sudden millenium, (as the sun rising at mid-night, or autumn happening in spring,) and searching out by calculations upon the figures of Daniel, and the Revelation, the exact year of its commencement, also of the conversion of the Jews, which "at furthest (he declared) would be in 1811." The long and plausible rignmarole dissertations upon all these topics, which he, from time to time, ushered into the world in certain publications, found, and still find their admirers among individuals of a similar turn of mind, who look for extraordinary, according to the old system of things before Christ. Thus have there been in all ages, these positive prophetic determiners of the future christianity, and the day and hour of the blossoming of the tree of good and evil, of time; according to their childish conceptions of the mystery of the gospel, and calculations made by them from data of ancient obsolete, shadowy and temporary, Jewish matters. Such have been the employments of individuals, laying claim to the character of gospel christians, and to the office of guides and leaders of the people in religion; in short, driving at anything but the one business, of high personal purification and sanctity, and leading souls to God—the source of all wisdom and truth.

But Mr. Law was too wise a man to be dazzled by false glare, or to admit any one into his select category of spiritual authors, who could so mistake the design of the gospel, as to indulge the fancy and lead away the attention of his auditory, into such a wilderness of barren speculations, as these we have described; however captivating they may be for the curious in such matters. The business of religion, and therefore of all orthodox spiritual writers, was, he knew, simple and unvarying, under whatever form a new kaleidoscope writer might represent the truths relating to it. But he himself thus in a word, describes the sort of books, that only are deserving of his attention:—

"Books of divinity (says he, in his 'Way to Divine Knowledge') I have not done with, but will esteem none to be such, but those that make known to my heart the inward power, and redemption of Jesus Christ. Nor will I seek for anything even from such books, but that which I ask of God in prayer, viz. how better to know, more to abhor, and resist the evil that is in my own nature, and how to obtain a supernatural birth of the divine life, brought forth within me. All besides this is pushpin."

After these remarks the reader will be prepared for the letter, which Mr. Law in the above communication to Mr. Langcake, states, he had written to Mr. Clarke. It was as follows; which though inserted in the published "Collection" we here give at length:—

"Nov. 3rd. 1759.—Dear Sir—Mr. Ward will convey "Rusbrochius" to you.—Every one has his proper way from God, if he is so happy as to find and follow it, without seeking out one of his own. My mind has for many years turned from, or rather passed by, every religious matter that requires critical abilities, or that carries me to any help but that which is to be found within me.

I never could go through even the divine "Rusbrochius," in his spiritualizing the Mosaic tabernacle, and all that belonged to it. His illuminated eye saw Christ figured and typified in every part, and what he saw he told the world.

But as to myself, I cannot go back to search for the shadow of the mystery under its types and figures, because the substance itself is come. And I find more enjoyment of it, by simply giving myself up to that, which is to be had from a Christ, not as known under Jewish prophecies, but as come in the flesh, and made man in every one who receives him.

Next to the Scriptures, my only book is the illuminated Behmen. And him I only follow so dans le développement de son système. C'est l'homme qui se révèle à lui-même son état primitif, sa far as he helps to open in me that which God had opened in him, concerning the death and the life of the fallen and redeemed man.

The whole kingdom of grace and nature was opened in him; and the whole kingdom of grace and nature lies hid in myself. And therefore in reading of him I am always at home, and kept close to the kingdom of God that is within me.

Wishing you every blessing of divine light and direction, I subscribe myself—Your hearty friend and servant—W. LAW."

Such were the principles of Mr. Law, and such was his procedure with respect to the writings of spiritual authors, the direct tendency of which, was not to engage the heart in simple conversion to God, and by consequence in earnest devotion, and laborious conformity to the practical model of the life of Jesus Christ. Some persons may think differently, and may consider it quite consistent with the profession of the Gospel and the character of an evangelist, to search for a satisfaction and light in the workings of the imagination, and in the objects and wonders of inferior nature, but they will not be of the number of those who feel and know, what our blessed Lord felt and knew, when he said "but one thing is needful."

We may here notice another topic which, subsequently, occupied the mind of this Mr. Clarke, as it did, and had done that of others, who were not governed by the pure principles of this last mentioned, oracular verity. We mean the doctrine of universal restitution, which, as we before intimated, Mr. Clarke came to consider, was not only implied, but directly enforced in certain of the Jewish types and prophecies! Having in his meditative speculations, caught the idea of restitution, and followed up the train of thought which it induced within him, he finished, we say, by receiving it as a positive dogma, taught by the word of God, and (according to his letters in the possession of the writer) so binding upon him, as that his very salvation depended upon his preaching and publishing it openly to the world! designating it, as Mrs. Jane Lead had done before, the "everlasting Gospel." Thus are good men subject to be led away, (through not duly apprehending this simple counsel of our Lord,) and, instead of regarding such topics with indifference, and fit only for subjects of conversation in the occasional unbendings of the mind, they turn them into mental idols, and obstacles to the work of personal salvation, if not occasions of sin.—"A multiplicity of wills (says Mr. Law) is the great disease and misery of man. To have but one will and one love, is the grand remedy for all his evil."

These subjects were sometimes presented to Mr. Law's notice by Mr. Langcake, who was acquainted with parties that advocated them. Which was the occasion of drawing forth the expression of his views contained in the letter we inserted in the note of p. 216, which, at the time, was probably considered by Mr. Law, as only fit to be handed about for private perusal. Hence in the making up of his letters for publication, he would only allow so much of that communication to be published on the point, as is attached to the end of the letter to Mr. T. L. numbered XIV in the last edition of the "Collection." [We have reason to say, that the Mr. S. mentioned in this published Letter, may mean one Mr. Shirley, if it does not relate to Stonhouse.]

The subject of 'restitution' is one which could not fail to have occupied Mr. Law's private thoughts, (as manifest indeed by extracts we possess in his handwriting, from treatises relating to it, and to the "last judgment" &c., &c.,) though he always kept it in its proper bounds, as might be expected from one so fully imbued as he was with the classic mind and perception of Christ. The whole tenor of his writings, apart from his individual expressions, shews how averse he was to bestow on such mysterious points, any particular regard, or make them the subjects of conversation any further than as contained in a passing remark, at a suitable and well-timed juncture; as we may suppose our Lord himself would have done on such an occasion, according to what St. Clement relates of some of Christ's private colloquies. Guarded as the subject will necessarily be by our present observations, we have great pleasure in being able to present in this place, the definite conjectures of Mr. Law on the matter; uttered, it may seem to some, by a peculiar providence, (like the remarkable last words he penned,) at the very close of his peculiar evangelical, Elías ministration: which are contained in a letter written by Mr. Langcake to Henry Brooke, August 1st. 1790. As the accuracy of Mr. Langcake is not to be doubted, what he relates must ever be taken with what Mr. Law has written upon the subject in the letters above referred to, of p. 216, in his "Way to Divine Knowledge," and with what we shall presently offer in a letter of Miss Gibbon to Edward Fisher. Mr. Langcake thus writes:—

"With respect to this doctrine of universal redemption, I very well remember Mr. Law's speaking of it, upon my making him the last visit at Easter 1761, a few days before his death, for he died upon the 9th. of April, and Easter day was on the 22nd. of March that year. He said that [it would seem as if] not only the whole human race, but even the fallen angels, would all be delivered out of misery, but not until the last judgment day. He said there would be a chasm in the creation without their being taken into happiness. But that that could not be, until they saw the whole creation made happy before them. When they saw this, and felt the eternal fire fully operating upon them, it would produce the blessed effect of [quickening or] awakening that [original root of] goodness which laid dormant in them. For though that goodness might be shut up in a seven fold deeper or stronger compaction than fire is in a flint, yet as it was shut up, [possibly not extinct and its essence destroyed, for what can die in eternity?] and preserved in them, it would come forth, and so they also would be made happy, to the full display of God's [wonderful wisdom and enravishing] love and goodness to all his creatures. [Such a sight and experience would certainly melt every creature into humility, love and adoration, and make the entire creation ring with HALLELU-JAHS.]

This was really the substance of what Mr. Law said upon the occasion, and nearly in his own words, according to my best remembrance. I never in writing declared these sentiments of Mr. Law to any one but yourself now; nor do I desire to circulate them, but it may not be improper to lodge them safely in a dear friend's hands, and so I lodge them in yours, or rather repose them in your bosom, and in the bosom of your dear friends. Mr. Law spoke upon the subject of his own accord, after we had heard the afternoon Easter Sunday's sermon, and took a walk through the town of Kings-Cliffe. He then opened a gate into a field, it was a rising ground, and then he began the discourse, and spoke like an Angel upon this and other matters, as if he was ready and ripe for glory, just to be carried up into heaven [like another Elias] and in the bosom of divine love be blessed to all eternity."

But though Mr. Languet never in writing declared these sentiments before, it is evident he had spoken of them to Mr. Edward Fisher who wrote them down in a memorandum book (which is now lying before the writer,) Jan. 22nd. 1781, in the following more judicious terms:—

"Mr. Law said, that the idea of a God all love [wisdom and power] was not complete, without admitting and taking in the final restoration of the whole fallen creation. And it was his opinion, that when the fallen Angels shall, at the end of all things, behold every thing and being besides themselves, restored to its first state of perfection, the anguish and vexation resulting from such a sight shall so move and stir the central depth of their spiritual natures, as to awaken the good seed hidden and buried therein [see Myster. Magn. xxiv. 14, and elsewhere,] under a tenfold depth of darkness and depravity, to a beginning of redemption and inward regeneration, which will never cease its process, until all that was lost by their woful fall be again recovered. [And thus would be conspicuous to the whole intellectual creation, the love and wisdom of the Deity,—in the creation of angels, in the permission (yet so to speak inevitableness) of evil and the fall of Lucifer's hierarchy, in the imprisonment of the devil and his hideous hosts, in the temporal creation, in man, in every permitted act of the working of evil and good by man and all creatures, and in all that God himself shall have done by the MYSTERY OF CHRIST.]"

From another part of Mr. Fisher's memorandum book we extract the following note, without vouching for its accuracy. He might have heard Mr. Languet mention something to the purpose, if not the exact substance of it:—

"God saw the fall (Mr. Law said) from the beginning of the world, and therefore provided a remedy, by preserving a shut-up seed or treasure in the soul. And when man and the whole creation is restored, and the fallen angels see themselves left alone; then they will have their deliverance by the compacted goodness, if they have any shut up in them, being made to stir and awaken in them. If it is ten thousand times more shut up than fire is in a flint, that cannot hinder their deliverance. As yet it is evident they have not been capable of any help or relief. Their habitation is [spiritually] in this world, where they wander about, and enter into impure souls, and by their union with them assuage their own torment. Their peculiar abode is [spiritually] in the dark caverns of the earth, where the light cannot penetrate. If the light of this world were to be withdrawn, their power would be very great, and they would be even visible to us. When our Lord cast them out of the possessed, their request was, that they might not be cast out into their own deep. They reside where the sun does not reach, and the reason they are not here in this upper visible world, is, that the sun and water abate their power."

Let it then be distinctly understood, that, in the above reported observations, Mr. Law merely indulged in a speculative conjecture, nor could he go beyond. For, as he well knew, and had repeatedly stated, no revealed wisdom or philosophy offers any ground whereon to form a determinate judgment respecting the point; but rather, all that we do know of the constitution and working powers of eternal nature, and its relations to the Deity, forbids the hope of the restoration of the fallen Luciferian hierarchy. And Behmen's grand justificator, (and Mr. Law's closet tutor,) Freher, even wrote an express treatise (A.D. 1718) against this doctrine; which was adventurously and plausibly put forward in his day by some enthusiastic remains of the Philadelphian society, consisting of Roach and others. In this treatise, he examines the matter fundamentally and in all its comprehensiveness; showing, first, the great difference between Lucifer's and Adam's fall; then, the notion of the everlasting gossellers, with their eight chief arguments; further, he gives his own idea on the subject, accompanied with demonstrative explanations and symbols; and finishes by a methodical, thorough refutation of the aforesaid eight arguments.

The "mystery of Christ," we may remark, is always represented to us in Scripture, antithetically to that of Adam; and therefore does not comprehend the nature of the fallen angels, as indeed especially declared in Hebrews ii. 16. The question of their restoration may belong to the millennial kingdom of Christ, and form the subject of an express revelation to that golden age of love and wisdom, but certainly it has nothing in common with our present dispensation; nor perhaps have we capacities of a sufficiently extensive mathematical power and precision, to apprehend distinctly, the how and the why of the possibility or impossibility of their restoration. 'Tis the deepest, and most comprehensive geometrical problem of the intellectual universe, to our present conceptions. Nay, it is embraced in that dazzling, overwhelming contemplation of St. Paul, where he exclaims, Rom. xi. 33, "Oh the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable his judgments, and his ways how past finding out!"—Let therefore upstart religionists beware of dogmatising on this matter, and keep to the essentials of sound Christian knowledge, for they have no ground to go upon, but imagination: let them, we say, beware of temptation even in this matter, which they will find to be the high road to sin, if they do not flee out of it.

The chief passages of revelation which (it has appeared to us) may be supposed to refer to the subject, are those of St. Paul, Ephesians i. 10, Colossians i. 19, 20, and especially in his sublime fifteenth chapter of the first of Corinthians, from the twenty-second to the twenty-eighth verse, where he touches upon the order and intervals of redemption, thus,—Christ, risen and glorified, as the first-fruits; secondly, they who are Christ's, by gospel regeneration, at his coming; thirdly and lastly, the END, when, having reduced all opposing wills into subjection, and become Lord of all, of an entire willing people, he shall deliver up his redeeming government (it being finished) to God and the Father: thereby leaving to Satan and his angels, actually nothing, and so nothing to do. But (we say) the very commencement of the Apostle's declaration, as well as the whole tenor of his gospel, shows that his consideration regarded (if even it may be so liberally interpreted,) only the restoration of the Adamic humanity.

It will not here be necessary for us to dwell upon the fact of Mr. Law's belief in the purification of all human nature, as the ultimate effect of the mediation of Christ, inasmuch as he avowed it unhesitatingly, whenever called to do so, and in no place with greater authority than in the "Address to the Clergy," the close of which he wrote, as we have stated, a few days only before his devoulu Mallebranche; au contraire, Dieu voit tout en l'homme qui est son image, et l'homme ac-cease. He doubtless knew well the ground from which he wrote and spoke, and was the last man in the world to put forth a conclusion not perfectly logical, or not drawn from indisputable premises. But, we do not think the same doctrine ought to be publicly advanced by others, who do not themselves certainly apprehend the ground and philosophy of it. Not being an open revelation of the Gospel, it is not a fit subject of entertainment for the masses, either of the world or the church.—And wo be to him who shall add anything to, or take anything from, the doctrine implied in the admonition, "What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" The writer of these lines for his own part, will not entertain the question at all, either of human or universal restitution; but, according to the sound teaching of the church in all ages, and advices of her faithful, earnest, devoted, regenerate children without exception, would keep to the plain doctrine and example of Jesus Christ.

Still, if any serious reader should think that this doctrine has a tendency to weaken the force of the denunciations of Scripture against the impenitent, or to soften down the "terrors of the Lord," which will infallibly overtake a sinful life,—let such an one consider the actual state of a soul, devoid of the only light and refreshment of its spiritual, dark and fiery ground. Whose habitation is therefore in that root of nature, which, for its shut-up constringency, anguish and despair, may be compared to an element of cold and darkness, ten thousand degrees below zero, and ten thousand times more dense than any iron, and yet to a furnace, such as could only be produced by three omnipotent opposing, whirling, consuming, yet self-generating properties of fire, where, in a condition of gasping ever-dying, of thirst and aching sorrow, with ten thousand attendant horrors, it must abide, (being unable to relieve itself in the least degree, but rather by its very motion augmenting its direful misery,) until such revolutions shall take place in the whole order and system of nature, as that it shall be possible for the divine light to reach and act upon this shut-up spirit, so, that its imprisoned seed or principle of the divine life shall have an atmosphere and the needful external auxiliaries for a vegetation: which will occupy ages and ages of duration to effect, just as three hundred and sixty-five days are needful for the revolution of the earth round the sun, and the production of the autumnal matured fruit. Let all this we say, be duly considered—(though what heart can conceive the horrors of a soul that has lost its God? when a short sensibility thereof, which was permitted for a necessary end, caused the immaculate Jesus-Jehovah to break out into a bloody sweat,—) and further, that all this unspeakable misery will have been arrived at, through contempt of the blood of the covenant, and the patience, mercy and help of God in Christ Jesus, (which will be the reflection of such a soul:—) let all this be duly considered, and then let such reader say, whether this doctrine in any wise derogates from the authority of Scripture? or tends to enervate the force of its denunciations against sin, or its hortations to 'strive to enter in' in the strait gate,' and be a partaker of the 'first resurrection,' and to avoid the portion of the wicked 'in the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone, where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched.'

It were indeed horrid enough to be subject to such sensations in a dream or nightmare; and who has not in some measure felt them, and rejoiced at the morning light, which has, through the medium of the bodily organs of flesh and blood, dissipated the gloom of the mind? But oh! what must be the actual suffering itself, and that not to be relieved for ages? We may form some shadowy conception of the power of its exterior causes, by considering how in the arctic regions, where (the wrathful predominant action of the first property of nature being unmitigated by the fourth,) the cold is so intense, as, according to the accounts of polish adventurers, to burn-off the tongues of the little foxes (though in their native element,) when trying to bite the iron traps by which they were caught and held. But this vehement astringency of action, is only a qualified temporal manifestation of the omnipotent, severed powers of attraction or ground of nature, in the spiritual world. For, as the reader doubtless is aware, cold and heat, want and satisfaction, are the two extreme points of the same line of nature; one end of which may be termed hell and absolute despair, and the other the glory and fruition of heavenly joy, whilst the middle may be compared to this world, with its fears and hopes and gospel admonitions.

With respect to the truth of these representations, of the dreadful horrors and misery that will be the portion of the impure and unregenerate in the spiritual world,—[that is of those who have failed in this state of probation, to use all diligence, pains and labour to enter in at the strait gate, and make their calling and election sure: first by faith, or the desire of the heart turned in earnestness and importunity toward the universal Spirit of mercy and goodness; and secondly, by the practice of faith, or renunciation of the world, mortification and self-denial, slaying and sacrificing self, mentally and physically, even to the very last gasp,—] such we say, have been the traditions of all nations, which have therefore had their origin in a Divine revelation, and one perhaps as specific as our own New Testament gospel, as intimated in the Annotation, pp. 450—496.—And these are the grounds of the self immolations, the "penances, sacrifices, and other [so-termed] peculiar superstitious practices of the Hindoos," and other intellectual, as well as unlettered, nations of antiquity. These poor souls, (see the engraving of their penances, and the dissertation thereon, in Maurice's "Indian Antiquities," Vol. V.,) though laughed at, and pitied, by our modern, easy, burly, well-to-do, broad-way christians, and 'evangelical' converters of Jews and heathens, will assuredly never drop into that lake of perdition which they have so earnestly and continuously striven to avoid; whilst many a complacent, "fat and flourishing" talker about 'salvation by faith alone,' and rational christian (both being practically and equally despisers of the doctrine of the cross,) may find to their sorrow, the terrible meaning of that truth, "many that are last shall be first; and the first, last."

And this brings to our mind an observation which Mr. Law is reported once to have made to a friend, namely, that "thousands of simple, honest souls, who say humbly and sincerely, 'Lord have mercy upon me,' 'The Lord's will be done,' and know nothing further of their own spiritual state, may be in a great degree of advancement in the kingdom of heaven; whilst those that are elevated with their learning, parts and abilities, their theological knowledge and acquaintance with gospel doctrines, being full of sophistry and self, will have their whole spiritual process to go through in another life."

The following letter was written by Mr. Edward Fisher, to Miss Gibbon, on the occasion therein stated, of a letter he had received from her, and a visit he had, some months previously, made to King's Cliffe.—it might have been to enquire concerning any literary remains of Mr. Law, and the writings of Freher, which he had recently come to the knowledge of, and also discovered that Mr. Law had had copies of some of them by him:—

"Compton-Greenfield, March 26th. 1789.—I have not been in haste to acknowledge the favour of good Mrs. Gibbon's kind answer to my letter from Bristol, which came to my hands some months ago, though I was not the less sensible of my obligation to her for the pains, I conceive, she must have taken to write it, under the pressure of so much bodily disorder and infirmity. * * *

I desired my brother, not long since, to call upon Mr. Law in Sun Court, Cornhill, to enquire of him after your health, and had the satisfaction to be informed, that it was not worse upon the whole, (allowing only, it may be, for the farther advance of age and infirmity,) than when I had the pleasure of seeing you in the last summer. I congratulate you on having so well passed through the late severe winter; and heartily wish you may enjoy the use of your mental faculties, and as much freedom from bodily pain as your infirm condition will admit, while it shall please the Almighty to grant you a continuance in this state of mortality.

Mr. Langcake, who continues to live in Bristol, was as well, when I saw him last, as he has usually been of late; his bodily habit being but weakly at best, and his health subject to much interruption. He does not know of my writing to you at this time, or he would doubtless desire to be remembered to you. Nor did I know of his writing to you some months ago, till he told me of it, after he had dispatched his letter, and then nothing of the contents of it, till yours informed me of his having given you some account of Mr. Clarke's having been with him. It is true that the Reverend Mr. Clarke, (who is a regularly ordained clergyman and has been so for many years,) came to Bristol, as he had been at other places, to preach; and also, I believe, to try what he could get in the way of charitable donations, for the relief of his temporal necessities, which, I apprehend, were then very urgent upon him, as having a family of children, together with himself to maintain, and very scanty and insufficient means to do it. As he formerly well knew Mr. Langcake, who had at one time lodged with Mr. Clarke at his house in Hoxton Square, London, he was much in his company at Bristol, but did not lodge in the same house. Mr. Clarke afterwards went to Winchester, on notice that an elder brother of his, who lived there in good circumstances, was in a very ill state of health, and not likely to continue long in life. That brother is since dead, and has left Mr. Clarke such a provision, as with economy and prudent management, may serve to set him above the pecuniary difficulties and distresses he before had to struggle with. On which favourable turn in his circumstances, his friends rejoice with him.

It is true that Mr. Clarke held the opinion of the final restitution of all human souls, in which he had the concurrence of your truly valuable friend* Mr. Law, which I look upon as no small confirmation of the truth of it; and am glad to see a doctrine so redounding to the glory of a God of love, and so comfortable to the poor affrighted souls of sinful men, so well founded and supported. But what call he had to preach that doctrine so generally, or to carry it farther, (if he did so,) in his preaching, is a matter I say nothing to here, but with you leave to himself. [*From whose books he probably first drew it.]

The letters of Mr. Law which I mentioned to you at Cliffe, as printed since his decease, and which you did not then seem to know of, were published by Mr. John Payne of London, formerly belonging to the Bank, but now deceased. These letters are three in number, the first dated in 1731, and the last in 1732. They were published in the year 1779, and intitled "Letters to a Lady inclined to enter into the Communion of the Church of Rome. By William Law, M.A." This lady, it seems, was of the name of Dodwell, not a member of any sect, but of the church of England, and daughter to the pious and learned Mr. Henry Dodwell, well known by his writings in the last century. These letters of Mr. Law are excellently written for the purpose that gave occasion to them, and contain many things of general use and edification; as do the others that were published in the life-time of the blessed author." In a subsequent letter Mr. Fisher writes,

"Many excellent truths and directions are to be found in these letters, and a vein of piety running through the whole that is very exalted and edifying. They seem highly suitable to the occasion, and to the great author's sentiments at the time of their being written; though there are some things therein, which I conceive, he would not have inserted under the more enlarged and enlightened way of thinking which he entertained in his latter years, when he had made farther advances in divine knowledge."

The letter from Miss Gibbon to which Mr. Fisher refers in the above communication, is as follows:—"Worthy Sir—Your generous presents I with gratitude received, though indeed did not at all know I merited such acknowledgments from you, for the poor reception you received from me, when you were at Cliffe. If I had known your stay at Putney had been so long, I should have begged your acceptance of a piece of venison; but indeed could not have troubled you with such another as you were so kind as to convey to Mrs. Griffiths. Had I known you would have taken the trouble to deliver it yourself, I am sure it should not have gone with you.

I hope you are very well after your long journeys, and long may you continue so. As to myself, I am still the same poor helpless creature as when you saw me, and have no hopes of amendment while I continue an inhabitant of this world. I have often thought of the disannulling of that grand house at Putney [next the one we inhabited], which you told me of [being taken down, together with the out-buildings belonging to it, and the ground on which they were erected, with the large garden adjoining, converted to a grass field.] It must be a great detriment to the town, for in my recollection, it was inhabited by three families, each of which kept a coach.

By a letter from Mr. Langcake I am informed of Mr. Clarke being with him last winter, and he styles him the Reverend. I did not think Mr. L.'s circumstances would admit of entertainments, nor did I know Mr. Clarke had a title to the Reverend. Mr. L. says, "Mr. Clarke has been preaching the everlasting gospel of final restitution, that every creature will be at last saved, and that he had a divine call to do so." All that I must leave to himself, but my good friend Mr. Law went no further than to say, If there was a possibility of it he verily believed it. But Mr. Law did not approve much of Clarke's religious sentiments, nor I believe would he have approved of his being a preacher. But enough." [This copy is made from the rough draft of the letter in Miss Gibbon's own handwriting.]

We have now only to add, that as Mr. Clarke was acquainted with Mr. Ward, (as Mr. Langcake,) upon whom perhaps he was wont to urge his calculations and opinions, respecting the millenium, &c., and who, through the agitation of these topics then prevailing in the religious world, might have felt some interest in knowing Mr. Law's views thereupon; he, it would appear, addressed Mr. Law on the subject. This gave occasion most felicitously to the expression of Mr. Law's opinion, in the following letter, which, as the reader will perceive, is distinguished by that same piercing, divine, common sense and simplicity, which so pre-eminently illustrate everything that passed through his mind, and to which expression was given.—This letter was written about a year before his decease. And as he, in the course of his previous life and writings, not only indicated the course of a prophetic messenger, suited to the times in which he lived—wherein his own mystical portrait, unconsciously to himself but very manifestly to us, is clearly traced; so we find him, with the same unconsciousness yet extraordinary acuteness, justness and exactness, as an evangelical Malachi summing up the whole, by a finished general description of himself, and of the nature and effects of his scriptural ministrations. [And does not the present treatise follow in the train of these mystical messengers that are specially indicated in this letter, to fore-run, or be instrumental to, the introduction of that day? For herein is the key to the gospel, which all nations will receive, when rightly presented unto them.] The letter in question is the following:—

"April 2nd. 1760.—My dear friend—Concerning the approach of THE GREAT DAY, near it certainly is, though it may be not strictly according to the scripture arithmetic and calculations which have been presented to the public. That the seven thousandth year is but a little way off, is undeniable; and it may be affirmed upon sufficient ground, that the six days creation last no longer than till it comes. [N.B.]

And though the scripture prophecies, figures and numbers, are certainly intended to point out the time, yet I am apt to believe, that the messenger of God (whether one or more) who as a fore-runner is to proclaim this time, will not be left to take his proof from them, but be as much an original in his way, as any of the prophets of old were. And though he may no more work any outward miracles than John baptist did, yet he will come burning and shining in such a light of divine distinction from all others, as may answer in the Spirit to that which was formerly done in the flesh, when the blind saw, the deaf heard, the lame walked, and the dead were raised, and to the poor the gospel was preached.

End all your letters to me as I end this, with only adding my name.—Your name is compliment enough to me.—W. LAW."

(Mr. Law is said to have remarked that Mede was the best who had written upon the calculations, meaning those of a prophetic nature in the Scriptures.) We may add, that the sentiments in this Letter were totally at variance with the enthusiastic views of Clarke, no less than of those of the millennialists of our own day. And being published, they would necessarily be known abroad; wherefore we find Clarke in a letter to Mr. H. Brooke thus writing:—

"Chelsea. April 24th. 1772.—Dear Sir—I received yours dated April 4th., and find by it that I was mistaken in thinking you another Mr. Brooke, [that is, your Uncle, the author of the "Fool of Quality."] I am glad to find that he is in the way of true piety. I wished for the sake of others, that some men of letters (for the world loves its own things) would appear in favor of the spiritual sense of Scripture. Such have always been in the worst times given by providence, as the salt of the earth. But now the religionists, who began in the spirit have ended in the flesh—in the dead letter, which is only a record, a remembrance of a divine and new-born man, whose seed lies in the soul of all men, beginning with the first covenant, though manifesting gradually in the ages of the gospel.

Though you may want human learning, you have the best learning, that of the Scriptures and the Holy Spirit the teacher of all truth. I put no value on my own learning, such as it is, nor did I ever understand the gospel by means of it, nor indeed by any means whatever. [!] For though I have seen traces of the same truths in the mystical writers, they have been only in general, but their ground is true. I have read very few of late, for some years past read none. The law and gospel, Moses and Christ, the two witnesses prophesying in sackcloth for 1260 years near about, are my only study; and my light is to and from them alone. [!] The world was to be in the state it is now under, just before the era of the millenium or the seventh trumpet of Moses in the seventh month, answering to the seventh of St. John; and from the types and language, (which mostly answer each other if not always,) it will be sudden, without any notice or any that shall be regarded. Remember Egypt, the flood, the taking of the old Babylon; compare our Lord's words, "as it was in the days of Noah and Lot, so shall it be in the days of the son of man." The expectation therefore of such messengers as Mr. Law and the popish church expect, will prove groundless: no Elijah, no John Baptist will be sent, either in spirit or name. [!] He comes as a thief in the night without a precursor or herald.

How could the world be surprised if it were so? The spirit of prophecy is the only testimony of his advent, to take the nations who have not yet heard of him, and kingdoms of this world, into his theocracy, and into the vision and food of the cloud of glory. [!]

The spirit of prophecy will be despised, as it was always before, yet Daniel says, The wise and enlightened of God shall understand the times and seasons, and the signs of the times, both in nature and in revelation. The world is now in its fullest triumph over the spirit of the gospel, and as Dr. Oswald, in his "Appeal in Favor of Religion" says over and over, The world has in a manner renounced the gospel: he is a man who has seen much of high life, and knows the conversation and sentiments of the great. Expect not, my friend, the appearance of any other signs than Christ has given: my misconception in some respects was owing to yielding too much to common opinion, built on passages of scripture ill-understood. Mr. Law himself was not in the mystery of the kingdom, to have any knowledge of the figures of times and prophecies; he had other grounds to go upon, and I am not surprized at his falling into what I believe a mistake. Chevalier Ramsey and  bear testimony to the restoration, but  is more clear than both; but I did not derive my knowledge of that most glorious truth from any one, though I have since read many testimonies to this effect, and know it was ever held among Jews, and the first christians for four centuries without contradiction.

ils, devient Dieu lui-même. M. de Saint-Martin soutient seulement que l'homme vertueux rede-

But I do not write to make converts to opinions, I leave that to others. I am bound to preach the everlasting gospel to every creature under heaven, as St. John says, before the end of this age comes. Events are left to the Great Ruler of all. Was it not His will to have this mystery known, it would not have been in my power, or any man's, to have shewn it under the figures and in the prophecies. [Pooh!] Nor is it of any consequence that * and Behmen are against it: Peter and Paul thought different, and divided on circumcision. The truths I have delivered never were so delivered; but they will be delivered yet clearer by many others, who must come forth, and are now already proclaiming the one gospel. [!] As for such who may abuse this mercy of God, his Justice knows full well how to retaliate, and proportionate stripes few or many. I am not surprized at the account you gave of the nobleman whose study is full of mystics, and his heart full of the world; always in a market of food, or an exchange for trade and gain. This is the characteristic of the age; however he is as forward as others, for a study full of good books and a head full of mere religious opinions, are the same thing under two names. ***

As long as Calvinism in any shape exists, the gospel is trodden under foot, and regeneration and sanctification are only technical terms of artificial theology; they are only the bark and outside of a truth most exalted and real. The pharisees had the shadow and despised the substance. All false religion has one heart and one spirit. It will not part with self, even though it talks of nothing else. Mr. Shirley is in self, proud self, dogmatizing over weak minds, scattering clouds and darkness over Scripture, and yet he thinks it zeal; so did St. Paul while persecuting the church.

Let them boast and write saint on their foreheads, Calvin's doctrines are the dragon's mouth with a lamb's face, and an abomination that maketh desolate the whole human race!

I remember him (Shirley) well at Oxford, he is become rather a firebrand than a star in the church; and all their teachings serve only to puff up the vain, proud predestinarian, and turn the better disposed from such a gospel.—Swedenburgh is dead lately, he ridiculed all the mystics, nor do I know one of the readers of the mystical authors who can bear his extravagancies. Mr. Law thought him the greatest visionary he ever read.

I thank you for your prayers that I may grow in the knowledge of my Master. And I wish you all increase in the inner man, though perhaps you must walk as I do, in much inward darkness and dejection: but this Bacha valley of weeping leads the true road to the new Jerusalem, whose waters refresh the city of God and his new temples in Christ, among which I hope divine grace will place you.—I am, dear friend, your affectionate and obliged servant,—RD. CLARKE."

The following is an extract from a letter of Clarke to Mr. Brooke, written a short time previously:—"My 'Daily Service of the Temple,' I find, has been thought to open more the regeneration than any other tract. [!] The first-born &c., is intended to explain one particular truth of great consequence to the true knowledge of the extent of the gospel: but of this you will best judge for yourself. We are certainly near the seventh trumpet, when the mystery ends, as St. John telleth us. Seven trumpets blew from the month Abih, of first ripe fruits, to the seventh month; then comes the millennial kingdom, of which I can say little at present. The signs of times in Moses, by days, weeks, months and years, are clear enough in the general; the exact measure God only knows, and will reveal in his own manner. The second coming of Christ in clouds is a blessing, all the language of the gospel must be understood as good news; but this manifestation will be sudden and unexpected by the world in general, which it could not be, if signs in earthquakes, wars, famines, and pestilences were to abound in all kingdoms. These things could not make men be as in the days of Noah, for even luxury itself could not subsist under such a combination of calamities. The signs external are sufficient for the serious, the internal is the spirit of prophecy, opening the everlasting gospel, which the angel flies through heaven and preaches to every creature. The wicked must be punished and purged. If we extend wrath beyond the work of love, love is a servant and wrath the master, but this cannot be. " Such is a sample of the notional rignarole stuff put forth by this individual as the spiritual sense of Scripture: all vapid talk and groundless assumption, neither proceeding from the spirit of holiness nor from the spirit of wisdom, nor yet from sound christian knowledge.

Would the reader desire to see a truly common-sense as well as theosophic view concerning the millenium, and judgment respecting the opinions that have prevailed of late ages upon it,—as well as of the right way to attain to a true understanding of gospel mysteries, he is advised to consult the Fourth and Fifth of Behmen's published "Epistles," who, it may be remarked, never uttered anything from conjecture, but only what he fundamentally and certainly knew. These two epistles were written in answer to the inquiries of a certain millenarian author in his own day, and at his desire, who it may be just stated, resolved the question after the simple, scripture-number calculations of Clarke and the popular modern writers upon it, (instead of according to nature, or the autumnal maturity of the tree of good and evil.) Alluding to such view of the matter, Behmen writes,

"When we look upon the words of Christ and his apostles, they will not in the least manner agree thereto; and though there is mention made of a thousand years in the Revelation, yet the same is hidden from us; and we know not when they may begin, or whether they are begun. If the 'first resurrection' be paradisaical, then it may be done without our knowledge." And again, "It may please God to open the understanding of others [as to this matter], and I should be ready and willing to learn, if I could see the ground thereof in the light of nature. But it belongeth not to man to make conclusions about secret mysteries without the command and light of God, lest he be found a liar before God." Again, he observes, "Man doth hardly reach that which is before his eyes, much less that which is hidden and mystical, except God be his light." And thus again, "For this world is confined and determined in the beginning of the creation, and then into the end, vient l'image de Dieu ; ce qui rétablit la communication entre Dieu et l'homme, et ce qui suffit where the creation ceased ; all which was finished in six days. And in such a time the mystery of God's kingdom shall be finished, and a thousand years are before him as one day. [N.B.]

Concerning the seventh day of rest, whether or no the world shall yet be in rest a thousand years ? the same is hidden to mankind ; we cannot certainly determine, we must leave it unto his might. I have no knowledge of it, seeing the Scripture doth not give clear evidence, when the thousand years begin, or what years they be, or to what they have relation. Therefore I let it alone in its own worth, and will hinder none that hath a certain knowledge or command so to teach. This I give you to consider of, meaning it well unto you.

What I might further answer concerning this matter, you will find sufficiently in my writings. Although I could set down a large answer about it, yet I thought it not expedient, seeing this knowledge is not given to me."

Behmen concludes his long and admirable dissertations on the subject, (in the two Epistles in question,) in the following terms.—which quotation for its excellency, notwithstanding its length, we deem worthy of a special notice, as affording an important lesson of instruction and caution to future professed interpreters of Scripture times and seasons, which "God hath reserved in his own power." It thus proceeds :—

"And therefore I do entreat you wholly as a brother, and a Christian, that you would be pleased to have a care that you apprehend the sabbath in the rest of Christ ; and be not so moved by the fervent instigation of your mind, about a millenium according to the common notion of it, but search whether you be able to ground the same in the light of nature. If you be able to ground, and reach it in the light of the eternal nature, then indeed you may go on : but shew it us plainly that we may see it, else our mind will be unsatisfied, unless it finds the ground.

It is not to be proved with passages of Scripture, which might be seemingly alleged for it ; they give as well the contrary, and may well be otherwise applied. If my mind had not turned itself into the love and rest of Christ, I would then shew it you after the fashion of this present controversial world. [N.B.]

The book of the Revelation is spiritual, and coucheth or sticketh deep in the mystery ; it requires an high illuminate mind and understanding, which hath power to enter into the mystery of God. It speaketh magically, there belongeth likewise a magical understanding about it. But in what is published, I find not the magical apprehension but only an historical apprehension.

He that will set upon the heavenly magia, he must know the heavenly figures of the form of the internal heaven, viz., the centre or life's circle, whence all beings do arise, whence this world is produced. If he hath not the magical guide in him, then let him not meddle with the heavenly figures, or else turba magna hath power to spew him out of the divine magia.

John the Evangelist or whosoever wrote the Revelation, knew the figures of the Divine magia. And though he saith that he was 'ravished in the spirit' and it was shewn him, yet they are figures which remain in the Divine magia. And though they be revealed, yet thereto belongeth such a magist as understands thesaurinella !

He must understand all the three principles with their figures, and then he hath power to open and reveal them ; else his expositions fall unto the turba. I speak sincerely. If you please, read my Book "OF THE THREE-FOLD LIFE" aright, and there you shall find the root of the magia. Although there be other much deeper books of mine extant, yet I would you might but understand that, for it hath sufficient ground ; [N.B.] else you will not be able to apprehend the other. If it should then please you to search further, you may very well obtain them ; only there must be earnestness [wrestling, agonising prayer] withal, otherwise they will remain dumb.

For the ground of it is deeply magical, as the illuminate mind shall find indeed, if it will but dive into it. Therein the Revelation is very easily to be understood ; and in no other manner shall it at all be understood, save from the mystery of God. He that is able to dive or sink himself into that, he finds whatsoever he doth but search.

Accordingly I would fain have you to prove your inflammation, that you might know (1.) the guide of the internal world, and then also (2.) the guide of the external world, that so the magical school of both worlds might be known to you. Then the noble mind would be freed from opinion and conjecture, for in conjecture there is no perfection.

The spirit must be capable of, and acceptable to the mystery, that God's Spirit may be the guide in its seeing. Else, it only seeth in the outward mystery, viz., in the external heaven of the constellation, which oftentimes doth vehemently enkindle and drive the mind of man ; yet he hath not the Divine magical school, which consists barely in a plain childlike mind.

The external guide labours and speculates only in the outward mirror, but the internal in the essence, which yet that is not able to do, unless God's Spirit guide it. Therefore God makes choice.

Whomsoever the heavenly school taketh, he is made a magist without his hard running ; and albeit he must run hard, yet he is taken by God, and driven of the holy Spirit.

Therefore man must try of what guide he is taken. If he finds that he hath the Divine light shining in his seeing, that his Guide doth bring him into the heavenly school, upon the way of truth, to love and righteousness, and that he is thereby assured and confirmed in his mind with divine certainty, then he may proceed in his work.

But (N.B.) if it be in conjecture and doubt, and yet in a fiery driving, then the guide is from this world. Which ought to be tried by its will and purpose, whether he seek God's glory or his own honor and applause ; whether he willingly resigns himself to the cross, and only desire to labor in Christ's vineyard, and to seek the good of his neighbour ; whether he seeks God or bread. And accordingly must his understanding judge, and give it leave or reject, and tame it, as need requires.

This I would not, as a brother, conceal from you in a Christian exhortation. And I entreat you, that you would accept of it no otherwise than as meant well unto you, as my due obligation requir-eth. For upon your desire I am your debtor in Christ, to your anxious seeking mind, as one member is bound to assist another."

Thus thought and spake this man of sense and heavenly wisdom, BEHMEN, whose writings next to the Scriptures, became Mr. Law's theological or rather theosophical text book, (as we have seen,) at the close of his illuminated career. Which therefore, with their divine magical ground, Mr.

pour le bonheur de ce dernier.

Law had before the eye of his mind, when he wrote the Letter we have last given, touching the approach of the GREAT DAY.—

To return to the order of our narrative, it was in the early part of the year 1760, that the volume of Mr. Law's "Letters" which we have repeatedly alluded to, was published, at the request, as we have stated, of his attached and admiring friends, Mr. Ward and Mr. Langcake, both of whom were then resident in London. This latter fact is apparent from a remark in one of the unpublished letters we have presented, as well as from other documents, and to it may be mainly attributed the alterations, we have from time to time pointed out and alluded to, as having been made in the originals of the letters inserted in the published collection: though in some cases perhaps being altogether effected by the master hand of Mr. Law himself, where, as we have intimated, he deemed it proper to inflict a corrective lashing on his perverse detractors and antagonists, without compromising his dignity by a direct recognition of their childish folly or malignity.

The remarks we have made on particular Letters (the third or last edition of the "Collection" being the one we have consulted,) leaves little to be said on this volume, the entire contents of which we heartily recommend to the attentive perusal of the student of Mr. Law's antecedent writings. Letter IV is particularly instructive to one who desires worthily to fulfil the office of the ministry. Letter VIII is an admirable answer to a well educated man, whose mind having been completely mystified by the overbearing influence and seeming seriousness and piety of the popular 'evangelical' talk, preaching and phraseology, had lost its original balance of judgment, and become altogether unsettled. Wherein, the author demonstrates the folly of flying to methods, opinions, forms and ordinances of religion as the means of attaining to goodness; thus restoring his correspondent's mind to its original classic poise, at the same time pointing out the true and natural way of christian progress. Letters XII and XIII are filled with divine consolation and heavenly counsel, addressed to those who are justly dissatisfied with the natural state of their hearts, with which they are become sensibly acquainted. These, with many others which we might point out, are fine examples of the doctrines of the "Spirit of Love" and "Spirit of Prayer" applied in actual life, and enforced with the eloquence and zeal peculiar to the author. The last Letter in particular, addressed to a Clergyman of Westmoreland, is an excellent commentary on the universal principles of theology, contrasting them as they are in themselves, with the way in which they are generally understood. In short, we regard this book of "Letters" as a familiar exordium to the same life and practice as the "Spirit of Prayer," adapted to various characters and circumstances, and recommended by the personal interest which always attaches to correspondence. It would be impossible to pick a single Letter out of the "Collection," which would not bear to be submitted to a judge of logic and rhetoric. We mean not a modern evangelical preacher or scribe, no more than his Oratorian ultra-antagonist, but one who had been accustomed to strict argumentation, in the tracings of truth,—such a mind for example, as that of Lord Lyndhurst, after his well disciplined intellect should have applied itself to the examination of the theory and practice of christianity, even to its very ground. Such an one as would commence with self evidence, and make no step but according to strict self evidence. Such an one as would be able to pull christianity up by the very roots, if untrue, that is if the alleged true ground and whole philosophy of it were not established or demonstrated.

In the autumn of this year, the devout and amiable Francis Okely, an educated university man, and well known for his translation of German mystical writings &c., who was now a preacher among the "United Brethren," addressed a letter to Mr. Law for permission for himself and a friend, to pay him a visit, as he stated "for his instructive conversation on the spiritual life." From a copy of Mr. Law's reply to this letter, or the reply itself, being afterwards found amongst the papers of the celebrated John Ryland of Northampton, his friends presumed and gave it out that this letter was originally addressed to Mr. Ryland, but the evidence we are about to furnish, will doubtless convince others as it has done ourselves, that the reply was addressed to Mr. Okely, who might have given the original or copy to Mr. Ryland, who was the friend alluded to in the request.—Mr. Law having had experience of the common censorious distemper of the popular erratic spiritualists of his day, (as we have seen in the case of Wesley and some of the Moravians,) was unwilling to refuse the request which had been thus made to him, but at the same time, to protect himself, and also consistently with his uniform evangelical sentiment, he took care to impart such an instruction in his reply, as that his correspondent, if really out of the leading strings of divinity, should feel the visit altogether needless for the professed purposes of it. The reply he thus sent, is the first letter in the published "Collection."

The visit was paid in due course notwithstanding, Mr. Okely being accompanied by Mr. Ryland, and we may judge of its agreeable nature from the following letter of Mr. Okely, addressed to the Editor of "Lloyd's Evening Post," on the occasion therein stated:—

"Northampton. July 19th. 1772.—Sir—Having in your paper observed a couple of Letters from two clergymen, under the signature of Ouranios and Theophilus, wherein, with a pious and disinterested view, they recommend to the public the writings of the late truly reverend WILLIAM LAW, I am encouraged to hope you will not be averse to the addition of a third, to the two former testimonies. They are ministers of the establishment, and I belong to another protestant denomination. Happy should I esteem myself, if out of the mouth or pen of two or three witnesses, the good opinion of the general utility of Mr. Law's writings could be so far established, that ministers and people of every denomination might be inclined seriously to read, and truly to perform the sound practice of his works. Although we are to call no man Master on earth, because there is only one that is perfect and infallible, yet I can with truth aver, that I have reason to believe the Lord hath spoken, and doth yet speak to this age by him.—I have also in this respect, a happiness beyond that of Ouranios and Theophilus. They lament their having had no acquaintance with this worthy and faithful servant of Jesus. But though I had no long one, yet was I, a few months before his decease, indulged with an ample and intimate conversation with him, upon the present state of religion in our time and nation, and on many other the most interesting subjects. This I regard as a favour of God bestowed upon me, and which I would not have been without on any consideration. I only wish to make the very best use of it in all respects.

Nous remarquerons sans aller plus loin, que le philosophe inconnu rattache toutes les scien-

Mr. Law lived as he wrote, and died as he lived. I am pretty credibly informed, that amidst the most excruciating pains of the stone, and at the age of seventy-five years, immediately before his dissolution, rising up in his bed, he said, 'Take away these filthy garments: I feel a fire of love within, which has burnt up everything contrary to itself, and transformed everything into its own nature.' O might every minister, and each of his flocks (both of the establishment and every other denomination,) live the life and die the death of this truly righteous man!

To give a small specimen of the conversation which passed between us:—"Sir (said he), I am not fond of religious gossiping; my best thoughts are in my works, and to them I recommend you. If I should seem to you a positive old fellow, I cannot help it, well knowing the ground from which I write.—But, dear Sir, above all things be present with, and attend carefully to, your own heart. There you will be sure to meet with all evil, and there only can you meet with GOD and all real goodness." [A dictum worthy of a divine ORACLE.]

Having already (through God's mercy) reaped some benefit from this advice, I communicate it simply to the public for the same end. It is useful; and may it prove, together with all his writings, a standard lifted up against the inundation of infidel profanity and notional faith, against the numberless numbers of flagrant sinners and hypocritical false saints, which everywhere divide a fallen Christendom.

I have not hereby the least intention to reflect with unkindness on the Clergy, or the ministers and people of any other denomination; my heart feels nothing of this sort. But I most earnestly beg leave to recommend, first to myself and then to them all, a passage in his "Answer to Dr. Trap's Discourse on the Folly, Sin, and Danger of being righteous over-much," from page 58 to 69, fourth edition. Were it but read with godly sincerity, I am very positive that every reader would see reason to be thankful for having had it pointed out to him. This is one among ten thousand other pearls, to be met with in this ingenious and illuminated author's writings.—CHRISTOPHILUS."

This letter was subsequently published in an octavo pamphlet in the year 1774, entitled, "A Metrical Version of certain Select Passages taken from the Works of the late Rev. William Law A.M.," which was from the pen of Okely. In the preface to it, the author mentions a poetical friend, who had engaged his pen to the same purport, meaning Dr. Byrom of Manchester.

Amongst Mr. Law's MSS., we find a letter from Okely, written after he had made the desired visit to King's Cliffe; at which time, it appears, Mr. Law had the project of the "Address to the Clergy" in hand. The letter is as follows:—

"Bedford. Nov. 13th. 1760.—Rev. and dear Sir—I hope it will not be deemed an over-forwardness in me, if I write a few lines, to inform you, that the visit I lately made you proved so satisfactory to me, as to have been every day since fresh in remembrance. As you told me your books contained some of the choicest of your thoughts, I have made such use of them as to perpetuate my converse with you, and I am sure with more blessing for the heart than gratification of curiosity.

Should your heart and pen be led to consider the true nature of Justification according to truth and solid experience, as you have in effect already done in the latter part of the "Grounds and Reasons of Christian Regeneration;" I flatter myself that some good advantages might from thence accrue to the present state of awakened Christianity amongst us. As God has made you and your writings a principal instrument of beginning, you are the most likely person I know to help to carry on and perfect, it. You bear on that account, a certain character, which cannot but give your words some weight and influence upon the hearts of all truly religious people. Certain it is, I wish and pray that your pen may have all the advantages God can give it, to the removal of all practical error, and the propagation and establishment of living truth, in the hearts of all the children of God.

And because I know, that one of the most pointed and effectual objections against you and your writings, amongst some persons laying claim to the real heart's knowledge of the redemption of Jesus Christ, has been and is, That there is far more of abstract and abstruse reasoning, notion and speculation in your works, (how much soever they seem sometimes to decline it,) than individual, simple, heart-felt truth and enjoyment; it would be a singular satisfaction to me, to see you once, in the spirit and power of a living witness and confessor of Jesus, after the pattern of St. Paul, compelled as it were, to shew the fund of truth and infallibility out of which you think and write, and to boast a little not what you are, but what the grace of God is and does in you. [This was a rather close thrust at Mr. Law, but a very proper challenge to be made in its season, to all who assume the office of directors in spiritual matters. What is the present state of your Christian experience? Do you enjoy consciously, the light and love of God. Does the Spirit of God bear witness with your spirit and conscience, now, that you are his regenerate, beloved child; that your guilt and iniquities are all "washed away," and the power of sin is entirely subjugated within you; that in short, all within you and proceeding from you is the holy Jesus, with his divine wisdom and love, his heavenly meekness and humility, courage and zeal,—all old things being done away within you and all become new,—the world, the flesh, and the devil under your feet? If so, and you have therewith your rational understanding well exercised in mystical theology and erudition, then you are deserving of attention as a christian doctor. "Show the fund of truth and infallibility (says Mr. Okely to Mr. Law) out of which you write," in so convincing, irresistible a manner. But Mr. Law was gathered to his rest above, before an opportunity was afforded him to respond to this summons; whereby we may infer, that he was not called to it, nor had occasion to do it.]

Something of this nature might, methinks, by God's blessing, silence, if not gain this class of your opposers, as it would certainly crown all the other productions of your most excellent pen.

I must own, that whenever I hear or read the true interior life of any solid saint, of whatsoever time, or place, or persuasion, I feel something thereby inexpressibly captivating to my heart. And as much as I cannot help preferring the work of God to that of man; so much is one grain of such living truth more esteemed by me than a hundred weight of dead general truth, how well soever composed and delivered.

In this point of view, I have transcribed and inclosed for your perusal, something I take to be of this sort. If you have never met with it before, it may perhaps give you as much inward pleasure in the reading, as it has done me in the writing it.

I do not know whether it might not be premature, to indulge my inclination so far as to tell you, that if any knowledge of the German language God has given me, could be of the least use to you, in the prosecution of your new edition of JACOB BEHMEN'S WORKS, or otherwise; it would be a favour done me, were you to accept any assistance my situation and circumstances here would allow me to give you. Perhaps I speak as a fool. Accept then the good will. Poor and unworthy as I am, I think I love the Lord Jesus in sincerity, and you too, as one of the members of his mystical body, and a chosen servant of his, in this age.

I beg my sincere christian love to the two ladies, your companions in the Gospel, whom I thank for their civility shewn me and my friend. Let me have a place in their, and in your remembrance before the great high Priest of our religion.

I shall wait in expectation of your book in its season, which I will endeavour to make the best use of, both for myself and friends.—I am, Reverend and dear Sir, your truly affectionate friend and brother in the gospel.—FRANCIS ORELY.

P.S.—What you say in the "Appeal" page 272, that if G. F. has said any good and divine truths, you should be as well pleased in seeing them in his books, as in any of the Fathers of the primitive church, makes me persuade myself, that the inclosed will not be the less agreeable to you for coming from that quarter."

About three weeks previous to this time, as we find from the following letter, Mr. Law had sent up his tract of Justification by Faith and Works :—

"Oct. 20th. 1760.—My dear Langcake—If this begins with saying, 'I am glad to see you,' you may understand it without considering it as a strong figure of speech, for before I set your name on the top of this page, you did more than stand in my sight. If you take this to be a little frantic, you must grant me the benefit of the old saying, Amare et insanire idem est.

On Wednesday the 29th. inst., the Carrier will bring a little box to Sun Court for Mr. Ward. In it will be found your "Three-fold Life" and a MS. Dialogue to be censured by you and Mr. Ward.

If you grant it an imprimatur, (which I would not have unless you would grant it to an enemy,) pray let it come out both as to letter and paper, as good as is consistent with six pence, for it must not exceed that. Whether Theophilus or my own name shall appear in the title-page, is left to you and Co., as you shall judge either the one or the other will bring it into more hands. Adieu—W. Law."

It may be needful just to remind the reader that the Methodists at this period were divided into two classes, the "Calvinistic" and the "Arminian"; the latter representing the tenets of Wesley and his societies, (as of the sober, solid theologians of all ages,) whilst the former were the fondly cherished views of Lady Huntingdon and her party, of Whitfield and others, (as of many amiable religionists in our own day;) and that the term Methodist, was applied not only to the followers of these two chief promoters of the religious excitement then going on throughout the country, but to certain clergymen who adopted their peculiar notions of justification by faith, imputation of righteousness, atonement, election and reprobation, sovereign grace, final perseverance, &c., and also practised their style of preaching (especially Whitfield's) in their own parish churches, as well as more publicly. Of this latter number and character, were as we have mentioned, Berridge, Harvey, Venn, and others solemnly paraded in that modern newspaper performance the "Life of Lady Huntingdon." Such was the swing of their excitement, and elatedness at their imaginary discoveries of Gospel truth, that amongst other of their issues from the press, Berridge ventured to publish two Letters he had privately written to a brother clergyman, containing a view of these peculiar converting doctrines, with an account of the author's own experience previous to, and resulting from their adoption, under the title of "A Fragment of the True Religion, being the Substance of Two Letters from a Methodist Preacher in Cambridgeshire, to a Clergyman in Nottinghamshire, 1760;" which teemed with preposterous hotch-potch gospel terms, and Calvinistic, Zinzendorfian rant, which he held up as the soul-saving, evangelical truth, in contradistinction to the old 'dead, bedridden, legal' divinity and preaching of the Church of England. [To understand this subject justly, the reader should here consult Dr. Green's very calm and rational expostulation with Berridge and others, on the occasion of this publication, in a tract, entitled the "Principles and Practices of the Methodists Considered" 8vo. 1760, in addition to this "Dialogue" of Mr. Law, and Berridge's publication.]

What extravagancies of doctrine the zealous but injudicious Whitfield preached, and published, and afterwards confessed to, also the cant and babble of the Moravians, Mr. Law had hitherto taken no public notice of, neither of the renowned excitement attending the ministrations of the clergymen we have just referred to, who (like experimenters in mesmerism after witnessing instances) made trial of Whitfield's peculiar kind of preaching and doctrines, and found the results to be similar.—But on the appearance of the pamphlet in question, of the Rev. Mr. Berridge, (upon which, by the way the Rev. R. Whittingham, the Editor of the recent edition of the "Works of Berridge," 8vo. 1838, thus justly remarks, "In this letter there are some expressions which he himself when his knowledge and experience were more matured, would not have used.") Mr. Law now had the opportunity of exposing in a formal manner, (not as Lavington in open ridicule but with sobriety, and high evangetic instruction,) all these fantastic notions and doctrines, or rather false, enthusiastic interpretations of true scripture doctrine, not omitting allusion to a "late most elegant Gospel writer, (the author of "Theoron and Aspasio," so termed by Berridge; and at the same time, to the surprise of the dupes, who had not been convinced by the admissions and confessions of Whitfield (and Wesley,) the true secret of all these supposed supernatural excitements, and divine attestations, of shrieks, groans, &c., namely that these things are not the working of the Spirit of God, (for Mahomet had the same testimonies,) but of natural causes. And with his usual wisdom and completeness of demonstration, summing up the whole, by pointing out to all who desire to go and convict sinners in the open highways, streets, fields, &c., the true salvation doctrines which they were to preach; and the mode and manner of conduct of their zeal

doivent s'attendre à trouver dans ses ouvrages, la solution de toutes les différentes questions phy in delivering the same. Finally remarking, that he should only be too glad to hear that not only this kingdom but the whole world was overran with such preachers and missionaries.

This is what Mr. Law did in the little publication now before us, entitled "A Dialogue between a Churchman and a (Calvinistic) Methodist, upon Justification by Faith and Works." And when it is remembered who were the individuals, encouraging and abetting these delusions, Mr. Law had occasion enough, it will be admitted, to step forward and endeavour to rescue Gospel truth from such audacious run-riot distorters of it.

It will be borne in mind that this tract did not so much embrace Wesley, (except in one or two incidental points,) nor was it levelled at him so much as at the strange infatuation and high flown ignorant declarations and theories we have just described, of the Whitfield and Huntingdon, Calvinistic and Moravian, party of the Methodists: though we cannot admit that Wesley was unobnoxious to grave censure even in this latter particular. He had manufactured a system of arbitrary theoretic theology, out of certain expressions of St. Paul, without understanding his ground: (as if an individual, unacquainted with the principles of Arithmetic, had met with a separate treatise on one of its branches, such as barter, profit and loss &c., and being initiated into it practically, should thereupon frame a system of figures and calculations, all converging round this particular subject as a centre and rule of all arithmetical science!) His chief doctrines however (we do not allude to the practical divinity of the "Serious Call" &c., he maintained,) were as to their substance, sound, the fault being in the invented artificial mode of their representation. As for instance his doctrine of the imputation of Christ's righteousness, set forth in his sermons, which (as some others) is only an idiosyncratic peculiarity of conception and expression, borrowed from the Zinzendorffians; which he would not have used (but have adopted the classic, unsectarian terms of Mr. Law,) had he been duly, scholastically tutored in the true science of the mystical doctrines of Christianity, of the exact parallel and ground of St. Paul's expression, of the 'first and second Adam,' and of the 'man Christ Jesus.' The actual physico-spiritual birth and growth of whom (with the due antecedent process) is the all with which we have to do, and the centre round which all the Scriptures and revelations of God are built up. It is the bottom the middle and the peak of the pyramid of truth and life, human and divine.

What Mr. Law has presented upon the subject of "election and reprobation" in his published "Collection of Letters," and elsewhere, to say nothing of Behmen, is surely sufficient for ever settle the doctrine for all ministers of these kingdoms, and to show the relations of the idiosyncrasy of understanding of Lady Huntingdon and her party, and of our present "Christian Student" evangelicals, (who talk about the "blessed first Reformer's doctrines," and maintain that "a moderate Calvinism is the doctrine of the articles of the Church of England!") to show we say, the relations of Calvin's ignorant, detestable notions, to the 'truth as it is in Jesus.'

This little treatise of doctrinal "Justification" by Mr. Law, might very appropriately be appended to his "Regeneration" tract and "Answers to Trap," and so recommended to every sectarian and established preacher and minister in these kingdoms, as a sequel study to the "Serious Call" and "Christian Perfection."

We may also observe, that it is from the ground laid down in the last six pages of this tract, coupled with the scope and frame of Mr. Law's "Letter on Warburton's Legation," and the apprehension of the nature of the true, Gospel kingdom under whose influences we dwell, and mode of its realisation, that we always speak, when expressing our views as to the proper course of evangelical philanthropy of action, with respect to mankind, and our opinions of approval or disapproval of either religion or philosophy in any of their forms obtruded upon the world.

The next letter of the unpublished correspondence of Mr. Law, which offers to us a topic of remark, is the following:—

"Nov. 22nd. 1760.—My dear Langcake—I thank you much for your two last letters. I am afraid you overrate the Dialogue, wrote by a man grown very old, in much haste, and through various interruptions.

But if you are not so clear sighted with respect to any thing of mine as in other matters, it is owing to that which is both my honour and pleasure, your friendly regard for me.

I would have you take what copies you please for yourself and friends, and to present one in my name to your friend Mr. Payne, and another to your street neighbour, the Brazier. [Mr. Langcake's address was, "at the New House in Hosier Lane, West Smithfield, London."]

If you can find out how to send one to Mr. Hartley, I should be glad.—I do not make my usual presents to the Gentry, but have proposed a consultation to be held by you and Mr. Ward at Richardson's shop, whether it might not be proper to make presents to some of the Bishops, and especially such as have these new preachers in their dioceses.

Is your philosophic doctor alive and flourishing?—I have the rheumatism in both my arms. There was an oil of mustard seed much in request for this complaint about forty years ago; if you can find it out, I should be glad to have it as soon as you can.

I intend to put a bit of gold into your hands in a little time, for Mr. Griffiths, the philosopher. W. Law.—P.S. There must be one given to Mr. Clarke."

The Mr. Payne herein mentioned, has been already alluded to, on several occasions; amongst others as having been instrumental in the posthumous publication of Mr. Law's "Three Letters to a Lady &c.," 1779: which it appears, he also edited, and took upon himself to alter the form of the sentences as originally composed, comprising in one paragraph or volume of thought, what Mr. Law with his masterly taste and judgment, had put in distinct sentences or arguments, which is the true style of argumentative writing, as for instance in the symbolic Euclid. The editor of an edition of the "Serious Call," published about the same period as these "Three Letters," and who may well be presumed to be Payne also, has therein taken the same liberty with that work. So far from placing a long or connected volume of thought into one paragraph, in argumentative writing, it were well if individuals would think and write so logically and justly, that they would not be afraid to make every argument in their train of reasoning, into a brief, simple paragraph, whereby its strength or weakness, and its dependence, might be at once seen and tested by the reader. But this process would be the condemnation by the authors themselves, of five-sixths of the books con-posed at the present day, before they saw the light of publication, and may therefore not be expected to obtain, during the present system of mental training; though if what we propose with respect to Christian Education in the contemplated Appendix to the Third Section of this work, be adopted, such a result may not be un hoped for in an early subsequent age.

The following is the letter Mr. Payne addressed to Mr. Law, on receipt of the work, which Mr. Law in the above letter, desired Mr. Langcake to present to his friend:—

"London. Herald's College, near St. Paul's. December 25th. 1760.—Reverend and dear Sir—Though under these characters you have for some time lived in my heart, yet the freedom of such an address, from one who is an entire stranger to you may need some apology. It would be hard, that the favors you confer should produce you any trouble; but I cannot any longer forbear to thank you for the very acceptable present of your two last pieces, which I received in consequence of your direction to Mr. Langcake. I have, indeed, a much higher obligation to speak of; having from you learned all the good and evil that belongs to me, as a fallen and redeemed spirit that is to live for ever: and though this is the ground of that sincere esteem and affection I bear towards you, yet unless a particular and personal occasion had given me an opportunity of mentioning it, it had been acknowledged only in silent thankfulness to the God of all grace and mercy who hath blest you with the truth, and made you the instrument of communicating it to me in common with the Christian world.

To enter into a detail of my religious opinions, would be a task almost as trifling and vain as the subject. It is sufficient to say, that I received them as opinions are commonly received, from outward situation, subject to the same mutability and change with all that is outward in human life; and having no deeper ground, they could produce no better effect than the formalities of an outward behaviour, while the heart continued unchanged, a prisoner of darkness and a slave to all the evil of its fallen state.

I entered into the world upon a narrow foundation; which though afterwards enlarged by the unexpected favour of some who suddenly became my friends, was yet made more limited by their sudden and unexpected dislike; and with the loss of them losing all hope of future success, I resolved to disengage myself from business as well and as speedily as I could. In the mean time, it pleased the Almighty in one week to take from me three children, which were all I had left; one nine years old, another seven, and the third an infant. Under this visitation, by far the most awful as well as the most affecting I had known, the same merciful hand that had thus wounded me for my good, led me to your writings; and, through them, to the only remedy for all the disorders of the human heart, the only consolation for all its sorrows.

This coincidence of two such circumstances, I think, I may justly consider, as the most remarkable period of my life; nay, may I not humbly look upon it, as at once the call of God to a participation of His redeeming mercy and His direction how to obtain it? For what benefit could be derived from an outward profession of Judaism? what more salutary ends could be answered by reading the history of the life and precepts of Jesus Christ, than by reading the history of what was said and done by Pythagoras, Socrates or Epictetus?

Indeed, from the doctrines of the imputation of sin, partial revelation, vicarious righteousness, and absolute election and reprobation, my heart constantly recoiled and became the master of my sentiments with respect to those debated points; and not knowing the ground of the blessed Trinity—known only to the humble and repenting sinner, the pride of reason could easily reject that doctrine, as an inexplicable mystery, the invention of schoolmen, and wholly repugnant to its eternal and immutable ideas. And what was left, after this noble separation of truth from falsehood? what, but an idea of Christ as an outward teacher and example of virtue, raised in authority above the masters of the antient schools, only by a power of working miracles: while a Tully, a Hutcheson, and a Shaftesbury, were secretly more regarded, as explaining morality in a more connected series, and upon the deeper and more known principles of nature and life; and while the language or the Blessed Redeemer, when discoursing of His Father, Himself, and the Holy Spirit, His work and His disciples, and of the eternal and inseparable union that subsists between Him and them, was coldly passed over, and impiously apologized for, as a strong metaphorical manner of speaking peculiar to Eastern nations.

I thank my God, and esteem you as his instrument, that he hath brought me out of this tremendous darkness, super-induced upon the Gospel, into a marvellous light, that reveals His holy being, with His kingdoms of nature and grace and all their operations, as harmoniously united in one blessed work, that the will to all goodness may be the one universal will, throughout the whole extent of being and the endless ages of eternity. Of this new knowledge, however, as I can say but little of its influence on my heart and life, let me not too freely speak as if it was my own. True as I believe your doctrine to be, I desire not to receive it merely as changing one set of opinions for another: I would rather, in silence, humbly hope and patiently wait for its birth in the depth of my own soul; looking only unto Jesus, the author and finisher of faith, in whom alone is life, and whose life is the only light of men.

Your affectionate heart, I know, will not be displeased at my obtruding upon you this account of myself; and your candour, I dare say, will excuse the general and imperfect manner in which I have given it. If I should be asked, what was my motive for giving it at all; I must answer, that I might so far partake of your benevolent regard, as to receive that testimony which St. Paul has thrice spoken of as an evidence of his affection for repenting souls, the being mentioned in your prayers at the Throne of Grace.

But as it may happen, that I shall never, upon fair occasion and in point of merit, justly obtain that privilege of communicating my thoughts to you, which I have now in a manner usurped; permit me, before I lay down my pen, to say a few words, with all due deference, about the printing of your inestimable pieces.

I have often lamented, that, on account of your distance from town, so many inaccuracies should have escaped the press: not because I think the thing in itself deserves much solicitude; but because I fear, there are people in the world that wanting every other pretence, would endeavour to raise an odium against your writings upon so wretched a foundation; and because I know there are others weak enough to become the dupes of such mean artifice : a significant shrug, a forced smile, a monosyllable expressing contempt, is sufficient to put by the generality from examining into the ground of doctrines in which they have not been trained up, and without which they find themselves perfectly at ease. While I was in business, I undertook the correction of the press for almost every book I published; and by that means acquired a facility in detecting typographical errors, which are commonly overlooked by the eye that has not been accustomed to seek them out. That I have, therefore, been always ready to undertake the office of correcting the press for your service; will, I hope, no more be imputed to vanity, than the forwardness of a limner, who, when a portrait is to be painted, should offer to undertake it in preference to one that had never learnt to draw : for all that man can teach himself, or one man can teach another, is to be learnt only by the concurrence of time, attention, and repeated exercise; and it would have been no impeachment of the skill of Sir Christopher Wren, to have said that he could not build a ship. I would not, however, be thought to insinuate, that you should take this business out of the hands of any person, to whom you have thought proper to entrust it; or assign him an assistant, if an assistant would be disagreeable: it is a matter, even in my own opinion, of no greater importance than I have stated above; and was it of much greater, it would, surely, be no excuse, for giving a good mind a moment's real pain about it. What was not done in a first edition, may be done in a second; and upon that principle, I will, with your permission, send you a copy of the late dialogue, with a few proposed corrections in the pointing and other little matters marked in the margin; all which will be humbly submitted, as they ought always to be whether in the revision of a printed book or a manuscript, to your abler judgment; for I would no more alter another man's writing, without his leave and approbation, than I would alter his dress.

humain; et nous dirons franchement que la science peut beaucoup gagner à l'examen approfondi

But to come to a subject that may be more worthy of your attention. There are two sets of people that are, very deservedly, the objects of your earnest and affectionate concern, the Clergy and the Deists. It may be said, I have here coupled together two very opposite characters; but I fear there is more real union between them, in spirit life and work, than the world is apt to suppose. In the "Answer to Dr. Trap's discourse" and the "Animadversions on his Reply," there is such an awakening address to the Clergy, as no one in that important station can possibly read without being the better for it: but how few see it there! Dr. Trap and his Discourse are now almost forgotten; and most clergymen, I believe, are so far determined in their opinion with respect to the passage in Solomon, as not to read anything that is published about it: even Dr. Trap, with all his zeal, would not, I think, have ventured a discourse upon it, as the vehicle of his abuse of enthusiasm, if he had not overlooked the circumstances of the case. And yet, to rectify a mistaken sense of this text, is the only subject, that the world is encouraged to expect from the title page of your excellent "Answer." I have, therefore, earnestly wished, that the address [therein] to the Clergy was divested of that covering which conceals it from those for whose benefit it was written: and, if I could have afforded it, I would, with your leave, have printed it some time ago in a pamphlet by itself, and sent it to every one who calls himself a preacher of the Gospel, in the three kingdoms.

The case is nearly the same with respect to Deists. What strength of argument, what tenderness of expostulation, have you used in almost all your pieces, for the everlasting good of those self-deluded souls! How accurately have you stated and explained, particularly in the "Answer to the Plain Account" &c., the office and limits of human reason; how candidly allowed it all its own power, and how irrecoverably stript it of that which it has so long usurped! And yet, nothing of this is singly and separately addressed to the Deist; but is generally the underpart, in connexion with subjects which one christian debates upon with another. And will the Deist think himself at all interested in the different opinions of christians upon Prayer, Regeneration and the Lord's Supper? He knows there is such a difference of opinions, and that is sufficient for his purpose: but to awaken his own sensibility of his own wretched and deplorable state, (for Regeneration is the only possible way of his becoming good and happy, though he had never seen the Bible, or heard of the name of Jesus Christ) he must, I think, be called upon in his own name, and his own character; and if heaven had granted me the ability, I would have done the same for him that I wished to do for the Clergy.

One thing more. In the book of "Regeneration," you have given only the naked proposition, with respect to man's divine original as an image of the holy triune God; but the fine and forcible proof and illustration of this blessed truth, contained in the "Appeal," is only referred to. Now, there are many that do or may buy the book of "Regeneration," that cannot afford to buy the "Appeal;" and many more that receive the former from the hands of the benevolent, who could never read it unless it was given them. I wish, therefore, that when the book of "Regeneration" is printed again, all that is in the fourteen cited pages of the "Appeal," might be either incorporated with the text or inserted in a note. I am sure every reader of that inestimable piece whether rich or poor, would be the better for such an addition; and I think, even as a bookseller, that the sale of the "Appeal" would be rather increased than lessened by it.

After all: what can poor ignorant man do for others—I speak only of what has been here proposed, when he can do nothing for himself? We suffer our blind passions, and our blinder reason, to be alive and active and busy from morning until night; and, in our best moods, to put us upon a thousand trifling projects and contrivances for the good of others and ourselves: not considering, that nothing can do good in and to us and others, but the Spirit of God; that His Spirit is continually doing good to every soul, in its own blessed way; and that all the events and circumstances of outward life, whether great or little, national or personal, are by the same Holy Spirit overruled and made subservient to the final accomplishment of the immutable gracious purposes of infinite love. Was this the living sentiment of every heart, all might soon be well; and the sudden redemption of fallen nature would convince every man, that he contributed as little to its recovery, as to its first creation in its original glory.

If it was proper for me to begin with an apology, it is, surely, much more proper to conclude with one; having, I fear, said many impertinent things, and with a freedom that could only be warranted by a long and familiar correspondence. But whatever I have written, it has proceeded from sincere esteem and reverence of that Spirit which lives in you, from a concern for the honour and success of the truth as it is in Jesus, and from a brotherly sympathy of the good and evil of those souls which Jesus came to redeem; and in this light hoping you will receive it all, I remain, Reverend and dear Sir, your obliged and affectionate servant.—J. PAYNE.”

Such is Mr. Payne's letter, which is not distinguished by that smartness, point and brevity, that we might have expected on the occasion. Three years subsequently (1763), he edited an edition of ‘Kempis’ (which work will be found highly recommended by Mr. Law in the ‘Three Letters to a Lady,’ and his appreciation of our author's writings is discoverable, we might say, in every page of it, but in the preface most especially, where he distinctly alludes to him, though without mentioning his name. Indeed so thoroughly was he imbued with the spirit and style of Mr. Law (as we have before observed) that his ‘Evangelical Discourses’ and his ‘Letter to Warburton’ published about the same time, are for the chief part nothing more than reapplications of Mr. Law's very language.

We may add here that the Editor of the large edition of Kempis published by Pickering in 1828, notices the reproduction of the ‘Christian Pattern’ by Payne, in highly commendatory terms, though the book itself, (beautifully as it is got up, the subscription price being a guinea,) is a mere literary ornament, totally devoid of the most remote approximation to the true spirit and unction of the original. Indeed it is seldom we find such manifest unconsciousness of the mystery of the cross (and of the nature and spirit of divine love, the life of God enkindled in the soul,) as is displayed by the editor of this new work, in any educated theologian, attempting to write classic notes on, and republishing a spiritual book. Asevidence of which, we may just refer to a reprint, he has given in the preface, of one of Haften's plates, from a celebrated ancient treatise, ‘Regia Via Crucis,’ (illustrative of the various kinds of crosses that christians have endured,) with his own comments thereon, to expose (as he considers) the ‘mysticism and vague rapture’ of ‘perverted imaginations’ touching the doctrine of the cross, which, it would appear, he conceives simply to mean the cross on which our Lord was crucified. Had he been master of his subject, (like a classic disciple of the cross,) he might have known with the author of ‘Regia Via Crucis’ and of ‘Le Mystère de la Croix’ that the cross is the first, and deepest, and oldest, and most central, and most universal, of all the doctrines and verities of nature and grace; yea that it is the very basis of the outward glory and majesty of God, and of the beatification of all the angels of heaven: and that the ‘cross of Christ’ is not that wooden cross on which he died, but that cross on which he was crucified, ‘a living sacrifice’ all the days of his atoning, redeeming ministry on earth; that cross by which all the children of God are signed, internally and essentially as well as externally in holy baptism, who indeed are born on the cross, and live on the cross, and die on the cross, and shall, as flames of love, for ever rejoice upon and above the cross, in the kingdom of glory. To return.

The ‘Justification’ tract was not only written in much haste, as Mr. Law expresses it in the foregoing letter, but from the intimation in the letter we are about to give, it was evidently thrown out as a parenthesis, while the Address to the Clergy was in hand. Upon which work therefore, his last labour, we are to consider Mr. Law engaged in his contemplative intervals, at the close of this year:—

“Nov. 29th. 1760.—My dear friend—This comes by the first post after the receipt of yours. I entirely agree with you as to the presents being made to the whole bench, not one excepted, if they are in or about town. If they can be friends with this, they may be better prepared for that which is to follow. Mr. Richardson has a letter from me this day, in which I have mentioned my following your advice.

Your waking thoughts are such as deserve every one's attention and more especially mine; but as to your night dreams, they may perhaps be little better than my own.

You have been very good to me in your care about mustard oil. There was an oil chemically extracted from mustard seed, by one Dr. Rogers of Stamford; it was celebrated by persons of figure in the faculty. It is not to be found here, and I apprehend that Linden has changed it into his Etherial.

I am glad my philosophic doctor is well and cheerful; and will in a little time send you a mite to be put into his treasury. Mr. Richardson may publish as soon as he will, without any regard to those that are to be sent to me.—Do not forget Mr. Hartley. Adieu.—W. LAW.—P.S. I had no objection to presenting to all the bishops, but as it seemed to speak too much the importance of it.”

The Mr. Hartley who is marked out both in this and the former letter for a presentation copy of the ‘Justification’ tract, was the rector of Winwick in Northamptonshire; whom we have before referred to, as the author of ‘Paradise Restored,’ and other writings of a mystical character. He is perhaps now better known as an admirer and personal friend of Swedenborg, of whose works, as we observed, he was one of the earliest translators.

We have now arrived in the course of our narrative, at the last year of Mr. Law's sojourn on earth, and find two letters, which we propose inserting together:—

“Jan. 10th. 1761.—My dear Langcake—After Mr. Ward has seen the letter to Mr. Brotherson, I desire you to seal it and put it into the penny post, or any other way that you may like. I have no copy of it, nor do I think any need be taken. It took up too much of time to write it once.

I have something of my rheumatic pain daily, but make use of no medicines. The medicine you use may be useful, and I should think without any bad effect; which is a thing much to be regarded in the use of medicines.

Mr. Gurney has been here, but so deaf as to be hardly conversable.—God be with you.”

The second letter is dated ten days afterwards, thus:—“Jan. 20th. 1761.—My dear friend—I think you have taken a needless labor in transcribing the letter [above mentioned to Mr. Brotherson.]—I hope to hear in your next that your enemy has had no power to hurt you.

I desire you would see a copy of the ‘Dialogue’ sent in a handsome cover to Lord Westmoreland, Hanover Square. [We find amongst Mr. Law's papers a letter from Lady W., dated Bath. Feb. 8th. 1759.]—Yours most affectionately—W. LAW.”

The Mr. Brotherson herein mentioned, as one of Mr. Law's correspondents, was a member of the ‘United Brethren,’ who had addressed Mr. Law in consequence of his allusions in the tract of ‘Justification,’ and perhaps in previous writings, to Count Zinzendorf and the alleged doctrines est serrée; il est difficile de nier ses principes, et souvent plus difficile encore d'en éluder les consé-of the Moravians. It is a source of regret to us, (for the love of truth and justice,) that we cannot present this reply of Mr. Law, a copy of which, it is evident, was taken by Mr. Langcake, but we have been unable hitherto to discover it amongst the papers that are come into our possession. We hold, however, the original letter of Brotherson, which we now insert, only observing that Mr. Law doubtless believed in the purity and piety of this good man, as of many if not most of his simple sincere earnest and devout brethren (see p. 550, 1,) though he deemed it requisite that the leader and advocates of that society should meet the charges of Rimius, as to their doings and principles abroad, as well as to what had been publicly stated concerning certain of their proceedings in this country.

We feel it a duty to express our conviction, notwithstanding the evils that were alleged to be mixed up with their early conduct that they, the Moravians, were the first and most natural experimental gospel philosophers of their day, and of protestantism, and that with them began that system of progress and proselytism in gospel enlightenment, which became the spirit of Methodism, and whose developments as such are so wonderful and universal of good to mankind, morally, socially, and politically at the present day. The following is the letter of Mr. Brotherson alluded to, addressed by him to Mr. Law:—

"Rolls Buildings, London, Dec. 23rd. 1760.—Dear and honoured Sir—I have read your book of 'Justification by Faith and Works.' Permit me to tell you a few thoughts that occurred to my mind. I am one of the United Brethren. I know there are many of our people who had till now a sincere veneration for Mr. Law, nor should we lose it, if he did shew us anything in doctrinals and practice, whereby we may discover our faults and mend; for that is the use we make of what our most rancorous enemies write against us, we always examine ourselves by the best and most solid meaning of their animadversions.

But when Mr. Law, who must now be near the verge of his dying period, enters himself in the list of our adversaries, and lays to our fault the very reverse of what is taught publicly and in private among us, and insinuates in his way, a character of us, which if true, would be sufficient to render us odious in the eyes of all sober men; then love makes me weep at the bad use he makes of his credit.

Instead of an answer, which modern controvertists might torture to an heresy, I will make a Confession touching those points, which your book, Sir, chiefly treats of, and this Confession can at any time be attested by every true member of our church, whatever may be said to the contrary, or laid to our charge by any runaway, who from motives of a carnal or proud mind, or an unwillingness to see his own spirit broke and subdued by the spirit of Christ, has left us, and now seeks to palliate the conviction of his own conscience. Of this class are our antagonists almost to a man. [To wit,]

'We preach the love of our Saviour to poor distressed sinners, which he hath proved by becoming man, suffering and dying for us; this love of his we can never magnify enough. We have no notion, that a human heart can by faith receive his grace and be saved by his merits, without being at the same time sincerely desirous to be cleansed in soul and body from sin, which caused him so much pain; nay, we dare not call ourselves children of God, till we are truly made one spirit with him. And as for works, I will appeal to the conscience of every one, who hath made a trial of living among us, whether the true reason of his leaving us was not this, that we went therein farther than he found himself able to follow, for want of the true Spirit. And yet I own, that works are very little spoken of among us, for they, we think, must be done even cheerfully, and directly forgotten by him who does them, because there is more to be done.'

We are so entirely of your opinion, dear Mr. Law, with regard to the absurdity of separating works from faith, that though a man could speak ever so well of the experience of grace, yet his words and actions must prove it, that the Spirit of Jesus has taken possession of his heart; or we know no greater faithfulness to shew to such a man, than to believe of him, that he neither hath seen or known our Saviour.

This is the foundation of our daily practice, and upon that bottom does the Holy Ghost carry on the work of sanctification among us from within.

Dear Mr. Law, I never before wrote to any man, who thought proper to asperse the character of the Brethren; but the pleasure I have taken in reading several of your writings, and what I heard of you from several of my Brethren, made me believe, that you had never given yourself the trouble to be rightly informed concerning what you advance of us. If you will please coolly to weigh what I have said above, you may perhaps repent of your insinuations. I am grieved for your sake, to have lived to see Mr. Law joining that set of spirits, with whom it seems to be a rule, as soon as the question is about the Moravians, to use no measures, but in that case we may see men who hitherto bore the character of patriarchs, sin, and made thousands sin against the ten commandments without blushing.

I write to you thus plainly, because I am unwilling to think of you otherwise, than as of a lover of our Saviour, who would not knowingly do the work of Satan. Our dear Saviour will sooner let the whole existence of our community cease, than suffer us to decay so far as to attack any servant of his out of our pale, (among ourselves we are indeed sharp with one another,) yea there are many among us, who are sorry for every line that ever was wrote in answer to those who attacked us.

Shall I beg leave to be heard with patience, when I tell you, dear Mr. Law, that I have lived for several years in the family of that nobleman, whom you call a successful deceiver, and can witness before God, that he was, taught, and did, the very reverse of what every reader of this your book, will conclude from what you say of him. He is now in his Lord's joy; but you cannot take it amiss, that a friend of his, who is still left behind, reads your book with pain. Please for once to set all theological controversies aside, and consider what you have caused to be printed.

I should be glad of an answer, and if I am favoured with one, I shall rejoice to find that Mr. Law looks upon this all well meant; for I have neither myself or my brethren, but him in view. My heart has dictated what I write, it is no apology. I humbly hope, that no ill use will be made of it, for so I call the publishing of letters without the writer's intention or leave. I love dear Mr. Law, and am with much respect, his most obedient and humble servant,—C. BROTHESON."

About this period, or a little later, a portion of the "Address to the Clergy" was sent to the press, the correction of which is the subject of our next letter, which also contains a promise of the remainder of the copy. This, consisting only of a few pages, was duly written out by Mr. Law, but not sent by himself to the press, for immediately on finishing it, he was summoned to the court of his heavenly Lord and Master, having now, as all his writings manifest, fulfilled his mission, as an Elias messenger of the consummation of the gospel age to the world, (see note p. 2.) On this "Address" we shall remark in due course, after the notice of Mr. Law's decease, to which we shall be immediately brought by the letter in question:—

"March 27th. 1761.—My dear friend—We are all glad at your safe arrival.—I much approve of Mr. Ward's judgment, for putting the note about swearing into the text.

You have sent me two paragraphs. I would have it come immediately after the first, not with a (N.B.), but thus, But here let it be well observed, that nothing that has been &c. Afterwards where I say, I am so far from blaming this, add these words, as looking upon it, as the effect &c.—In the first line of your first paragraph, viz. instead of all this freedom from the evil of an imposed &c., let it be, all this supposed freedom &c.

Owen's book is a bundle of rant and calumny.—I intend to send you a parcel by the carrier next week, in which will be the remainder of the copy for Mr. Ward.—We all say, God be with you.—W. LAW." [Mr. Langcake has subscribed to this letter these words, 'The last letter I had from my most beloved friend.']

The allusion to Mr. Langcake's safe arrival at the beginning of this letter, is explained by a memorandum in Mr. L.'s handwriting on the fly-leaf of his copy of the "Address to the Clergy," now before us, which reads thus,—[The Gift of] The Rev. Mr. Law, my dear friend [who] died [Thursday] the 9th. April, 1761, whilst this his last book was printing off. T. Langcake.—I was with him, on a visit, upon Easter Sunday, 22nd. March, 1761, but eighteen days before his death." Some readers may perhaps here recur to the postscript of the letter inserted at p. 601, addressed to Henry Brooke, in which this visit is mentioned, and picture to their reverential minds, how appropriate to the contemplation and spirit of such a divine Sage, was that his last private conversation, (for he had not, as evident from the letter quoted at the foot of p. 604, stated what Mr. Langcake recites, even to his most intimate friend and sole legatee, Miss Gibbon,) and may also deem it a singular providence which so ordered it, that he did, on that occasion, express his conjecture, whereby it will now descend (with the considerations, by which the subject ever requires to be guarded,) to all generations. Though certainly a not more singular providence than that, which preserved Behmen's works, and likewise Freher's invaluable MSS.

As to the manner of Mr. Law's death, it is reported that, at the annual Easter audit of the Schools, he caught a cold, which produced inflammation, and ended in the fatal disorder which was to put an end to his days and his labours on earth. 'The disease under which he suffered was sharp and painful, being of the nephritic kind, the torment whereof wrung from the suffering and sensible flesh the cries and groans of nature.' This remark we find on a fragment of paper, and it probably applies to the commencement of the disorder, and gave rise to the report of the Doctor, on hearing Mr. Law's earnest cries and prayers in his agony, that he was afraid of death and of futurity. How different the case was in that respect, we have not only the evidence of his life and works, but the repeated evidence of an ear and eye witness, in the person of Miss Gibbon, among whose papers we have found various memoranda, made by herself concerning Mr. Law's death, as follows:—

"Wednesday. April 8th. 1761. He said he had such an opening of the divine life within him, that the fire of divine love quite consumed him [the last remains of self]."

And again, (as if uttered by Mr. Law, though we think, not correctly noted down,) "Oh what hast thou done? Thou hast awakened such a spark of divine love that quite devours me. Who would have thought that all my literature should end in my dying a martyr to love!" To which is added, "The fire of divine love was so awakened in him that he knew not what to do."

Elsewhere she wrote, "This death-bed, instead of being a state of affliction, was, providentially a state of divine transport. As to the truth, all his behaviour bore full testimony to it, and the gracious words that proceeded out of his mouth were all love, all joy, and all divine transport."—Again, "After taking leave of every body in the most affecting manner, and declaring the opening of the spirit of Love in the soul to be all in all, he expired in divine raptures."

On another fragment, we find, "Our departed friend ended his process with the words in which our divine Master and Saviour, Jesus Christ ended his [process—alluding to the closing words of the 'Address to the Clergy.']. And they may well be called his farewell speech to the world, calling all men to repent and believe the gospel, as he truly proclaimed it in his writings. For these words were written but a few days before his death, and the last time his blessed hand was capable of holding a pen." [The singular fitness, justness and propriety of these concluding words of Mr. Law's public ministrations will be especially manifest to the attentive reader of this work, which indicates the true and only means for the induction of all unbelievers into the Christian faith. For when the approaching event, which must infallibly take place, of the great mystery, revealed by God in Behmen, finding its children, and reducing all multiplicity of divine and natural knowledge back again into the fountain unity from whence it sprang, and ground on which it stands, then Mr. Law's writings will be the universal horn book, introductory to the diffusion and acquisition of the said knowledge. And thus will they be with us to the end of the world.]

To the foregoing Miss Gibbon added, "His eye was piercing, for it was the organ of his immortal soul, filled with divine light. His heart was filled with God, and therefore his voice was the sweet trumpeter of divine love."—And again, we find written by her, on another fragment, "Mr. Law lived to the age of seventy-five without the infirmities of age, for though the age of man is said to be threescore years and ten, and after that but labour and sorrow, yet it could not be said so of Mr. Law, who retained the strength and vivacity, both in body and mind of a man in the prime of life."

He died Thursday April 9th. 1761, between seven and eight o'clock in the morning. When near expiring, it is reported, he sang a hymn with a strong and very clear voice. This solemn act et sur les idées relativement à la question de l'Institut : déterminer l'influence des signes sur la was in perfect accordance with all the previous measured performances of his consecrated life; and the sentiments he therein gave utterance to, were worthy of that celestial simplicity which as a fountain was opened in his soul, and constituted his ordinary declarations, so many divine oracles of light and truth. The hymn he sang was a poetic rendering of that of the heavenly quires, on the annunciation to the shepherds at Bethlehem, of the birth of the redeemer of mankind, 'Glory to God in the highest, peace and love to mankind.' Which however we may consider was not only a natural devotion of his sublimated spirit, but a significant salutation to the world. As if intimating that the mystical dispensation of the "knowledge of Christ after the flesh" and in the contracted, distorted, imperfect manner of even the professed evangelic church, which was opened by the above heavenly proclamation, (though there ever remained a true piety in the established Jerusalem church,) was about to be closed up; and that a new or further dispensation of the Spirit in its large and universal development, of quickening power and holiness, even up to the sublimest theosophic wisdom, and magical faith potencies, was, through the instrumentality of his espoused and own writings, about to be unfolded, (though there should remain a true and deep evangelical piety in the settled churches of christendom,) which should, finally, as a torrent sweep away all obstacles to the universal spread of the Gospel, by the revelation of the ground of all nature, of mind and matter, eternal and temporal, universal and particular, and of the "mystery of Christ," apprehensively, to all mankind.

A short notice of Mr. Law's decease was inserted in the public prints of the day; which, as appears from the following letter, having been composed by Miss Gibbon and only corrected by Mr. Ward and Mr. Langcake, so as to preserve her diction, is not remarkable for literary excellence. This, varying the announcement in it, as to his decease, was the same that was afterwards inscribed on Mr. Law's tomb. The letter in question, from Mr. Ward, reads thus:—

"London. April 22nd. 1761.—Madam—Several newspapers are sent with this, in which ~~are~~ inserted the character of our dear and most invaluable friend. With respect to him, for my part, I seem to have lost the best, the noblest, and most valuable part of myself, but yet find God's gracious goodness, and presence with me. And I pray God, you may have His continual support and consolation.—I have again transcribed the Inscription that is to be on the Stone. As it will continue and remain, by that means to future time, so Mr. Langcake and I have consulted to render it as perfect as possible. By comparing it with the copy you have, you will find some variations, which are submitted to your judgment, and final decision. You may wonder, Madam, that the first letter I take the liberty to write to you, should be such a hasty scrawl. But I have but just time to write it, having waited for the copy which I have had taken of the part of the manuscript which is sent. When you return it by the carrier, you will please to direct it to be left at Mr. Crew's and to inform me of it by a line by the post. Mr. Fitzgerald said, when I was with him, that it was necessary you should prove Mr. Law's will, and with his compliments and respects to you, desires you will send the Will and Codicil to him for that purpose. With the most sincere desire of your health and felicity, and with respects to all with you,—I am, Madam, your most obliged servant—GEORGE WARD."

The following is the Inscription before referred to, engraved on the face of Mr. Law's tomb, erected in the Churchyard of Kings-Cliffe, not far distant from where he had in life resided: "HERE LYETH THE BODY OF THE REV. WILLIAM LAW, A.M. WHO DIED APRIL 9TH. 1761, AGED 75 YEARS. He was well known to the world by a number of truly christian, pious writings, exemplified by a life spent in a manner suitable to a worthy and true disciple of his heavenly, divine, crucified Master and Saviour, Jesus Christ, who lived and spoke in him, and by him.—In his younger days, he sufficiently distinguished himself by his parts, and progress in human literature. Afterwards, taking the advice of our Saviour to the rich young man, he totally renounced the world and followed Christ in meekness humility and self-denial. And in his last years, he was wholly absorbed in his love to God and mankind; so that Virtue in him was nothing but heavenly love and heavenly flame.

In parts and sense, inferior to none—
With wit most amiable, with learning stored,
His talents great and high, were quite sublimed
In loving God with all his mind and heart.

[This may do for the present, but we hope the time will soon come, when Mr. Law's remains will be transferred to Westminster Abbey, or some similar distinguished but more central spot; and have a suitable Epitaph over them.]

The annexed is a copy of Mr. Law's Will and Codicil; the latter, it appears, being made only three days prior to the testator's decease:—

"In the name of God Amen. I William Law of Kings-Cliffe in the County of Northampton, Clerk, being, I bless God, in good health of body and soundness of mind, do make this my LAST WILL and Testament, in manner and form following, that is to say, Imprimis, I humbly recommend my soul to the mercies of God in Christ Jesus, and my body I commit to the earth; to be interred in the Church-yard of Kings-Cliffe aforesaid, at the discretion of my executrix herein after named. Item, I give to my nephew John Law five shillings. And as to the rest and residue of my estate of what nature, quality or condition the same shall be, whether real, personal, or mixed, whereof I shall die seized or possessed, or whereunto I now am, or at the time of my death shall be intitled, either at law or in equity, or in possession, reversion, or remainder, or otherwise howsoever and wheresoever, I give and devise the same and every part and parcel thereof, and all my right, title, interest, property, claim and demand whatsoever therein and thereto, unto Hester Gibbon of Kings-Cliffe aforesaid, gentlewoman: to hold the same as well freehold as copyhold, to the said Hester Gibbon, her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns for ever. And I do hereby constitute, nominate and appoint the said Hester Gibbon, sole executrix of this my last Will and Testament, written with my own hand. The CODICIL thus reads: "I, William Law, of Kings-Cliffe, in the County of Northampton, Clerk, do make and ordain this my Codicil (in manner following) to my last will and testament, which bears date the thirteenth day of September, 1753. And whereas I have in my said Will given and devised all my estate whether real or personal or mixed, unto Hester Gibbon of Kings-Cliffe aforesaid, Gentlewoman, to hold to her, her heirs and assigns for ever, and nominated her sole executrix: Now I do hereby order and direct, and give and devise all my said estates unto the said Hester Gibbon her heirs and assigns, to be by her or them disposed and given to and amongst the descendants of my late brother George Law, of Kings-Cliffe aforesaid deceased, in such shares and proportions, and at such time and times, as the said Hester Gibbon shall direct, limit and appoint: And do make this my Codicil to be a part of my said Will and be annexed thereto. In witness whereof I have to this my first Codicil set my hand and seal this sixth day of April in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and sixty one.—WILLIAM LAW. Signed sealed and delivered in the presence of us who have subscribed our names as witnesses hereunto, in the presence of the said William Law.—Eliza Hutcheson. Tho. Jackson. Sarah Law."

The "Address to the Clergy" was published after Mr. Law's decease. Having already descriptively referred to this work, we need only remark, that whether intentionally by the author, or so ordained by the providence of God, or in both instances, it was a judicious and accomplished finishing stroke to his Elias-baptist office under the Gospel. We submit this view of it, to the judgment of the reader who has made himself master of Mr. Law's writings.

Among Miss Gibbon's correspondence we find the following letter from Richardson, Mr. Law's publisher, which gives an interesting statement of the arrangements between them, and the generous character of Mr. Law's dealings:—

"London. August 7th. 1761.—Madam—Mr. Ward mentioned to me the desire of your having the accounts between the late Mr. Law, Mr. Innys and myself: the papers that attend this, you will find contains them. One part of these papers concerns Mr. Law and Mr. Innys, the other Mr. Law and myself: from Mr. Innys there is due £26. 1. 2½, to me a balance is due of £6. 15. 6½, the difference of these is £19. 5. 8½, to be paid. Now Mr. Law in one or two letters told me, that whatever sums should appear due to him at any time, he should not think of taking money but the amount in books. This declaration I look upon regarded himself, to you I lay no stress upon it, only mention it: for what might be in the circle of his designs is no obligation upon you, nor shall I expect it, but leave you to take the balance the most convenient and agreeable to yourself; and as all accounts will be closed to this time, I wish you could think with yourself on a method that you could most like, that they may be no more opened. This may be done by paying money, or giving you books upon every impression, or should you choose to have me account as the books are printed: I shall be agreeable to any of the three ways. To the above I shall hope for your answer: in the mean time—I am, Madam, your most sincere obedient—Jo: RICHARDSON.

P.S.—On the other side, to make all as clear as possible have given a list of Mr. Law's works; against which have wrote how I stand in regard to the copyright of them." [It reads thus:—]

"Serious Call—Christian Perfection—Three Letters to Bishop Hoadley—Remarks on the Fable of the Bees 8vo.—On the Stage 8vo.—Case of Reason 8vo.—Answer to the plain Account 8vo. These seven copies sold to the late Mr. W. Innys; of his executors J. Richardson purchased them.

Answer to Dr. Trap 8vo.—Christian Regeneration 8vo. These two J. Richardson purchased, half of Mr. Innys and half of Mr. Manby, supposing them to be their property; but Mr. Law in one of his letters to me, said they had only right to the first impression, but since I had bought and paid the money, he should waive his claim.

Spirit of Love, Two Parts. Presented to W. Innys and J. Richardson.—Appeal—Spirit of Prayer, 2 parts—Way to Divine 8vo.—Confutation of Dr. Warburton—Justification—Letters—Address 8vo. These, half accounted for by the inclosed papers."

The following is a subsequent letter relating to the same subject: "London. March 31st. 1762.—Madam.—Having printed a new edition of Mr. Law's 'Justification by Faith,' you will with this receive fifty of them, being the proportion of one hundred in a thousand, which I was to send, when that number was printed, to Mr. Law; I have only printed now five hundred, as I have many of the small edition besides me. You will also receive four hundred of the little 'Extract.' I have now in the press a new edition of the 'Divine Knowledge,' and am also printing the 'Second and Third Letters to the Bishop of Bangor.' I do this to have all Mr. Law's works complete, and when ready you will I hope give me leave to present you with a set of the worthy author's works complete. Though I am a stranger to Mrs. Hutcheson, yet I beg my respects may be made acceptable, and with the same to yourself, I am, Madam, your most sincere obedient.—Jo: RICHARDSON."

The next letter we propose to insert as an interesting memorial of Mr. Law, is also addressed to Miss Gibbon, and reads thus:—

"Lancaster. July 6th. 1761.—Good Madam—It is my duty to return you my thanks for the late agreeable present you wereso kind as to make me by Mr. Richardson, of our late worthy friend Mr. Law's last work, an 'Address to the Clergy,' which came safe to my hands, with another copy for the Rev. Mr. Hunter. This I have forwarded to him, but as he lives at a distance from me, I have not yet heard of his having received it.

I was greatly affected when I read in the newspaper, an account of the death of my much esteemed and valuable friend, the pious Mr. Law, for whose character I had the highest regard and veneration. To comfort myself upon this melancholy occasion, I recollect what he said to me in his letter on the death of good Dr. Stratford, which I shall always remember. His words were, 'Your loss every one must see is very great, and yet I would fain have you think, that your happiness deserves all your attention, and that you ought every time you think of your great friend, to sing Te Deum, both on his and your own account. On his, that he lived to grow so old in piety 'and good works; and on yours, that you have been for so many years edified by them, and in a kind of fellowship and communion with them.'

I wrote to Mr. Richardson to enquire into the manner of my late friend's death, but he was able to give me little information. It must I apprehend have been sudden, as the advertisement prefixed to his last 'Address' mentions that some part of that work was written by Mr. Law not many days before his death. But to a person under such a continual state of preparation as he was, death could be no surprise.

So much a stranger as I am I cannot presume to trouble you with making any enquiries on this subject though I am greatly desirous of knowing every particular relating thereto.—Accept however, Madam, my grateful thanks for your kind remembrance of me by this present of my great friend's last performance from the press, of which favour I am truly sensible. And most sincerely wishing you and Mrs. Hutcheson (to whom I beg my compliments) a long enjoyment of health and every blessing.—I remain, Madam, your much obliged and most obedient servant.—J. COLLINSON.

The following (anterior) correspondence may prove of interest, as also showing the occasion upon which the writer had made Mr. Law's acquaintance. It was addressed to Mr. Law:—

"Lancaster, Sep. 23rd. 1753.—Honored Sir—Your kind and obliging letter by Mr. Graves to the late Dr. Stratford, came to my hands soon after the death of that most worthy man, of which I thought it my duty to take this notice. I was at that time (as I still am) under a very great concern upon account of his death; which is to me a loss irreparable, for he was to me as a father and my most generous friend and benefactor. The sight of your letter added to my affliction, as I well knew, it would to him have been the highest pleasure and satisfaction to have received such a letter; but we must submit to the will of heaven. He has for a long series of years been employed in exercising the greatest acts of charity and beneficence, and I doubt not but he is happy. He was seized with a paralytick disorder, which deprived him of speech and in a few days of life, though without much seeming pain or agony. We called in the best physicians in this country; but alas! it was not in the power of their art to restore him, though I sometimes flattered myself there were hopes of his recovery, and that providence would be pleased to continue for a while longer, so useful and valuable a life: but the ways of heaven are inscrutable by us. His loss is a public one. The poor in these and several other parts have lost their best patron and friend, and the world an eminent and shining example of christian piety.

I came to live with this good man when I was very young, and have continued upwards of eighteen years his amanuensis and reader; and as long as I live I shall ever esteem it my greatest happiness to have been early acquainted with so amiable an example. He was for many years a constant reader and great admirer of your pious and ingenious writings, and always spoke of them in the highest terms, especially 'Christian Perfection,' and the 'Serious Call,' out of which he has made large extracts.

By his Will (of which I am one of the executors) he has left to THE REV. MR. LAW, author of 'Christian Perfection' &c., One hundred pounds; and the bulk of his fortune which is very considerable, he has directed to be applied towards feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, and other charitable purposes.—I propose (God willing) to do myself the honour of waiting upon you at Kings-Cliffe sometime next spring, in order to pay this legacy and several others about Northampton, which by his Will he has expressly directed me to do.

If you are so obliging as to favour me with a line, a letter by the post directed to me a Proctor at Lancaster, will come safe.—I most heartily and sincerely wish you the continuance of health and every other blessing, and am, with the greatest respect and esteem, honored Sir, your most obedient but much afflicted, humble servant—JAS. COLLINSON."

In another letter, dated Jan. 15th. 1757, the same party thus writes, "I am greatly obliged to you for your last kind favor  You would no doubt be informed of the death of your old friend Mr. Innys, who died lately at Bristol. The business will now be carried on by his partner, Mr. Jos. Richardson, a person that I have long known and for whom (upon account of his fair dealings and honesty) I have a great respect.  I sincerely wish you (for my own sake and the good of mankind) many happy new years and the perfect enjoyment of your health and every comfort, and am, with a heart truly sensible of the many advantages received from you and your writings, your most obliged and most faithful humble servant." And again, under date of May 10th. 1760,

"I lately saw in the papers, an advertisement of 'Letters on the most Important and Interesting Subjects' shortly to be published, which gave me much satisfaction, as I from thence judged that my worthy friend was still in health and good spirits. I have ordered one of these to be immediately sent me on publication; but it will be an addition to my satisfaction, in case you will be kind enough yourself, by a single line to acquaint me that you are well.

A friend of mine, a worthy clergyman and late a Fellow of Trinity Coll. Camb., was mentioning that he had by him a curious MS. of some part of the Works of Jacob Behmen, and upon my expressing some desire (upon your account) to see it, he promised to send it. He has done so, and I find it to be a large quarto, above 600 pages, very fairly wrote in eighteen chapters, ruled with red lines and handsomely bound. The title is De Triplici Vita, auctore Jacobo Böhmen. It is marked on the outside "Behmen's State of Man," the language is quite unintelligible to me, but I take it to be High Dutch. It seems quite complete, and at the conclusion it is dated thus, Anno Christi, 1620. Great pains and care have been taken in the writing, which is very good, quite plain and legible, and the MS. has been remarkably well preserved. Though you may have seen this MS., or perhaps it may have been translated and printed, yet as it came thus accidentally into my hands, I thought I would acquaint you therewith, that in case it should happen to be worth your acceptance, I might send it you.

I shall esteem it as a great favour to hear how you do, which was my chief view in troubling you with this, and sincerely wishing you a long continuance of health and every comfort,—I am, with the greatest respect, honored Sir, your much obliged and most obedient servant—J. COLLINSON." To return.

Soon after Mr. Law's decease, the large quarto edition of BEHMEN'S WORKS was commenced, as le plus grand honneur à ce dernier, qui ne craignit pas de mettre au jour toute la puissance de son adversaire. Qu'en est-il résulté? un avantage réel; c'est que la question la plus abstraite qui fut we have before stated, at the sole expense of Mrs. Hutcheson, two volumes of which were printed in 1763, 4, and a third in 1772. The printing of the fourth, which did not appear until 1781, had been commenced, and was in progress at the close of 1774, when Mr. Ward died. On this event we find the following two letters addressed to Mrs. Gibbon:—

"Clerkenwell. No. 7, Spa-fields. Dec. 6th. 1774.—Madam—Last Sunday evening I buried that eminent christian, the great and good Mr. Ward, after waiting eleven days for the brother and sister coming to town, but to no effect. The Rev. Mr. Clarke, Mr. Langcake and myself, with his old servant, attended him to the grave in Bunhill-fields burying-ground, the spot he pitched on some little time before his death; his desire was strictly complied with, excepting a brick grave. I wrote to the brother the third day, informing him that as the Will could not be found, I had a demand of twenty pounds on Mr. Ward's effects, which if he pleased, I would most cheerfully give up for the erecting this grave; but received no answer to that, not so much as an order for his interment in any manner, but only a desire that I would take care of his most valuable effects. I have however purchased the ground, and ordered a Head and Foot Stone to be put up, that he might not be disturbed. I have no doubt but this covetous man will insist on my paying for it, but that I shall do with pleasure.

Permit me to inform you that I have taken into my keeping the whole of the copy of J. BEHMEN together with the rest of the plates, as your property. Mr. Taylor the engraver, demands eighty pounds; there is due to Mr. Baldwin on this fourth volume about thirty-pounds. Now Madam, I have some doubt whether these hundred guineas which I found were not your property, and to have been appropriated for the discharge of those debts. I shall be much obliged to you for information on this head, because it will enable me the better to settle the affairs with the brother.

This Madam, has been the most severe trial I ever experienced, but through the rich mercy of God to me, a poor unworthy creature, I am enabled to say 'O Lord, thy will be done!'—Be pleased to present my most dutiful respects to Mrs. Hutcheson, and let her know that in searching for the Will, I met with a letter of Mr. Law's and several others, which I have taken a proper care of. [We have discovered that the copies of the two letters on Swedenborg, inserted pp. 158—160, are in the handwriting of this Mr. Selfe.]—I am most respectfully yours—S. SELFE." The other letter reads thus:—

"Dec. 15th. 1774.—Madam—I have received yours, and think myself greatly obliged both to Mr. Hutcheson and yourself for the concern you express for my late worthy friend, whom I had for some years revered as my father, and obeyed him in all things as such.

Mr. Ward's Will is not found. The morning he was taken ill he told me he had not seen it since he removed, but that he had brought it to the house, and should find it when he put his things in order. There was a Will, because I have read it more than once, and a copy of it is now in the possession of Mr. Taylor, an attorney in Clifford's Inn.

How wonderful is the goodness of God to them that faithfully serve and love him! for in almost everything Mr. Ward's desire will be as truly executed, as if the Will had been found; for I have received an order from the brother empowering me to act as his agent, in consequence of which I have sold the goods and cleared the house, in hopes of finding the Will, but to no purpose. I found in the bosom pocket of his coat some shares of Lottery tickets: do you know anything of them? I had no doubt when I first found the hundred guineas but that it was Mrs. Hutcheson's or your property. I knew the money was not likely to be Mr. Ward's, but have you any acknowledgments under his hand? because if not, I think it most advisable to let Mr. Taylor make out his bill for the colouring of the plates of Behmen, which Mr. Ward made his own act. The engraving of the plates are paid for. I have put an entire stop to Behmen; there is about thirty pounds due to Mr. Baldwin for printing. The books, [N.B.] together with his papers, his philosophical and chemical utensils, are safely lodged at my house, and will there remain till I have your orders concerning them. I can witness to his bringing a very considerable sum with him from the country, because I disposed of the light gold and weighed the whole, and understood it was for finishing Behmen with all imaginable expedition.

Be pleased, Madam, to accept and likewise to present my most dutiful respects to Mrs. Hutcheson.—I am, your most faithful, humble servant—S. SELFE."

This letter mentions an entire stop having been put to the publication of Behmen. But it was resumed sometime afterwards, and the Fourth volume printed off before Mrs. Hutcheson's death in that year, though not immediately published on account of some dispute with the publisher, Robinson. We ought to state that after part of the impression of this Fourth volume had been issued, the party on whom it devolved, in consequence of Mr. Ward's death, to supervise the completion of it, found among Mr. Ward's papers a MS. in Mr. Law's handwriting, being a paraphrase or enlargement of the chief part of J. B.'s treatise of THE SUPERNATURAL LIFE. This it would appear, had been marked for insertion in Behmen's Works by Mr. Ward, who had probably received it amongst a number of papers and drawings formerly belonging to Mr. Law, from his friends at Kings-Cliffe, to enable him to further the publication of Behmen, and so concluded it to be Mr. Law's own composition; whereas it was merely a copy he had made of part of the MSS. of Lee, which had been lent to him by Mrs. De La Fontaine, (Lee's daughter,) as before mentioned. Both the copy and original are now in our possession.

The following portions of Mr. Langcake's correspondence may be appropriately presented in this place, as elucidating this and other matters that may require a final notice. It was addressed to Miss Gibbon:—

"Bristol. Feb. 20th. 1781.—Madam—I humbly beg leave to acquaint you, that I have just been informed of the departure of dear and honoured Mrs. Hutcheson out of this mortal life, so full of trials, temptations and misery, and the lot or portion in a greater or less degree, of all the sons and daughters of fallen man, in this vale of tears. It is nevertheless very sweet to my spirit, affecting as this account was to me, to contemplate her being called from us hence, conducted by the holy angels to heaven, full of years, full of good works, and ripe for glory. This is matter of strong consolation, and I unfeignedly rejoice with you on the blessed occasion. Dear departed saint, in whose countenance when living, child-like simplicity and divine love sat smiling, what a flood of glory and happiness is now opened upon your precious and immortal soul, as the happy consequence of your many years ardent love of God, and compassionate goodness to such numbers of your poor fellow creatures! * * *

I have now been for some time in this city, and lodge at one Mr. Field's in Hillgrove Street. Economy, Madam, chiefly brought me here, and I must be a great economist indeed, to live within the boundaries of my income, since the funds are so greatly fallen, in which I had my little all, excepting a trifle, part of which has been taken from me through a long concealed settlement. * * * In consequence of this representation to you, Madam, if good Mrs. Hutcheson out of christian benevolence, should have left any kind of donations to be distributed by you, I should deem it a great favour if you would admit me to a participation of her bounty.

[The following is an extract from Mrs. Hutcheson's Will of the 1st. August 1761, bequeathing a legacy of two thousand pounds to Miss Gibbon, which by a Codicil dated 22nd. Sept. 1777, is rectified, and the following words added,—“I hereby declare my mind to be, that the sum of Two thousand pounds which by my will I have given to Mrs. Hester Gibbon, shall be by her disposed of to and amongst such charitable uses and objects as she shall think proper, particularly recommending to her my God-daughter Elizabeth Law and the rest of that family, out of the respect and regard which I bear to the memory of my late worthy friend the Rev. William Law, and the said legacy is by me given and bequeathed to her in trust for such purpose only.” Mrs. H. was considered not to have acted becomingly in her Will to some of the family of Mr. Law's brother, Thomas, who had been her attendants.]

As I have understood there was some demur and difficulty in settling accounts between Mrs. Hutcheson and Mr. Robinson, concerning the publication of J. B.'s Works, which has retarded the publication of the Fourth volume, already printed off, I thought it fit to inclose to you the copy of a letter, sent to a gentleman of this city some years ago, by Mr. Ward, in answer to one written by that gentleman, wherein he had offered some pecuniary assistance towards going on with the work. This letter of Mr. Ward's serves to shew, that the expence of printing and engraving the Plates for the Third volume, was nearly defrayed above ten years ago. If this information should be of any use or avail, towards determining the matter in dispute with Mr. Robinson, I shall be glad of it, as my end in transmitting it to you will be then answered. Permit me to add, that I would hope this unfortunate difference with that bookseller does not put a stop to all further progress in the publication of J. B.'s Works, with so pious and benevolent a purpose commenced and hitherto carried on, at the liberal expence (as I suppose) of good Mrs. Hutcheson. For if she has not made a provision for the completing that undertaking, I doubt it may not soon if ever be brought to an end as designed; the gentleman above mentioned, who once seemed inclined to forward and go on with it, if necessary at his expence, appearing now to have dropped all such purpose.” [There yet requires a 5th volume, to render J. B.'s Works complete: but this is a disordered publication altogether. Mr. Ward was not fit for the task.]

“Oct. 3d. 1782.—I am more particularly led to write as I do, from having lately transcribed with great pleasure, some glorious MSS. of our dearly beloved Mr. Law, that have providentially fallen in my way, primarily through Mr. Selfe, into whose possession the books and papers of Mr. Ward came, he having purchased them of Mr. Ward's brother-in-law, who on his decease without any will that could be ever found, succeeded to the right and possession of his effects, and among them were found these Manuscripts of dear Mr. Law. On perusing of them I found they contained a great Treasure of natural and divine truths, which have a tendency to give the mind a sublime and noble turn of thought, and I would hope that, under your patronage the public in due season will be enriched with so great a blessing. For they will be found to contain in them, the height and depth of heavenly Wisdom, and to prove the illuminated author of them, to have been the first of philosophers as well as the best of men. The original MSS. will be delivered to you if you choose to have them, and will give me notice thereof.

I hope Madam, my humble ‘Address’ to the public [Bath. 1781,] as well as the ‘Heavenly Vision manifested to Miss Field,’ met with a gracious reception from your hands. * * * I was in London last January, and received of Mrs. Campbell the kind legacy bequeathed to me by dear Mrs. Hutcheson, which came very seasonable and acceptable to me. * * *

P.S.—The above mentioned very valuable MSS. contain an explanation of J. B.'s philosophy, and may make up a volume of 200 pages, which will be about half as big as one of his. That justice might be done it, I could wish it might be published during your life time. I cannot but think it would well defray the expences of publication, but if you should not choose to do it yourself, I doubt not but Mr. Robinson would undertake it, on its being proposed to him. Mr. Law about the year 1730 or 1731, wrote a long Letter to a gentleman upon the point of entering into the Roman Catholic communion; I fear that letter is lost, as it was not among the MS. volumes. * * * If you should immediately resolve upon the publication of the MSS., I should choose strictly to examine my Copy before it was given into the printer's hands. [The work here referred to, may be Freher's Microcosmos, Mr. Law's copy, which, as the copy by Leuchter with Mr. Langcake, are both now in the writer's possession. There may likewise have been several others of Freher's pieces, as of Lee's.] I shall take a sacred care of them, or send them to Mr. Law's, if you please to order it, immediately.”

The succeeding letters from Mr. Langcake are addressed to Mr. William Law, attorney, Stamford, the son of Mr. Law's nephew, and inheritor of Mr. Law's and Miss Gibbon's property at Kings-Cliffe. Miss G.'s Will (she being recently deceased) will show her disposition thereof:—

“Bristol. Dec. 11th. 1790.—Dear Sir—It gave me great pleasure to see the much beloved name of William Law subscribed to your letter, and what made it doubly agreeable was, its informing me that Mrs. Gibbon had kindly remembered me in her Will. * * * Pray dear Sir, are you and your sister the happy favorites, whom my dear and reverend friend used often to sport and play with, in great sweetness and simplicity after dinner? If you are, I remember you as well as your sister, and that he tossed you both up and down upon his foot. I recollect I said upon the occasion, that you were formed for to live eighty years: he replied, Yes, if you did not hurt your constitution. I condole with you and all dear friends upon the affecting occasion of losing Mrs. Gibbon and your uncle [William, formerly of Sun Court,] so soon one after another. * * * P.S.—Pray remember me in particular to your Aunt who lived in Sun Court. I suppose your great Aunt is dead? [query who she? widow of Hayne? or of a brother of Mr. Law?] I long to make one more visit to beloved Kings-Cliffe before I die." Again Mr. Langcake writes to Mr. W. Law,

"Dec. 26th. 1790.—Mr. F. whom you kindly enquire after, was with me a few days ago, and I expect to see him again shortly, when I shall not fail of presenting your best respects to him. I understood from him that your Aunt, who lived with your Uncle in Sun Court, was living with him at Kings-Cliffe, when he (Mr. F.) was upon his visit there; and therefore I am much surprised to hear of her death, as well as of your dear, sweet sister, whom I well remember, as well as yourself, in your sportive play with my dear friend, your good Uncle. I was equally surprised when I heard of the death of the Rev. Mr. Howard, whom I had the pleasure of hearing preach on Easter Sunday, 1761, the very last time I ever saw my beloved friend, who in a few days after departed this life, into the mystery, among the Saints triumphant."

Our concluding notices of the subject of the preservation of Freher's Writings, are contained in the following letter from Mr. E. Fisher to the said Mr. William Law:—

"Bath. Oct. 19th. 1795.—Worthy Sir—I have not forgotten the request I made to you when I had the agreeable opportunity of an interview with you in London in the summer, concerning the MS. original Letters of your truly venerable uncle the REV. WILLIAM LAW, now in your possession, and the hope you very kindly gave me, of your compliance with it. The request was, that you would bring with you when you should next come to London, (which you signified was likely to be in the now approaching month of November,) those Letters, that I might take a copy of such of them as I have not already copies of, or are not already inserted in the printed Collection. I am now here at Bath, where my brother [John Fisher, Esq., Sec., Excise Office, London,] is also at present resident, on account of his health.  If you will still be pleased to indulge me with the liberty of perusing those Letters, and copying out such of them as I have not already either in transcript or print, and will deposit them for that purpose with any trust-worthy friend in London, where they may be secure, I shall hold myself much obliged to you, for such a gratification of my high regard for the writings of so wise, so good, so great a man.

error, these referred to thought by him, from the MS. writings of this Freher, appeared to be a letter of Mr. Fisher to you before the letter, dated Kensington, May 21st 1793, and supposed to be addressed to Mr. Tho. Mills of Bristol,] and know that the Rev. W. Law held his performances in so great esteem, as to transcribe a part of them with his own hand, which leads me to think that he might have transcribed more. —EDW. FISHER."

We are now approaching to the close of the general sketch and intimations which we have deemed necessary to give, in respect to a complete and classic biography of Mr. Law. We might have presented a considerable number of letters written to him in his spiritual capacity, as well as intimate communications of his own with his immediate friends, (such as Miss Gibbon in the earlier part of his retirement from town, and previously,) and of his family and friends with himself, also of his MS. remains, papers, a sermon &c.: these however can be made use of if needful, (also a perfect analysis of all Mr. Law's writings, in the order of their appearance, be given,) in the proposed memorial. What we have attempted, has been merely a general outline of his life, and to show the spirit and views in which his future biography should be written: and we think by a due perusal of this entire work, the Candidate may not be at a loss in such respect, nor will it be difficult to fill up the interstices of Mr. Law's life we have left open, and to connect the whole in one unbroken, and truly edifying narrative.—For a general example of the spirit of seriousness and earnestness, of holy christian experience, judgment and heavenly wisdom, which ought to be infused into the composition of such a work, we might again just refer to the seventh, eighth, and ninth, and nineteenth and twentieth chapters of the "Serious Call," as well as the general tone of the "Christian Perfection," and other of Mr. Law's writings. In reviewing which, it may be said most truly of all of them without exception, (as was said of the works of his Great Master which he so closely studied, and whom he so much resembled in so to speak idiosyncrasy of mental apprehension,) "He hath done all things well."—The biography in question, it is desirable should be that of a CLASSIC MAN, who had attained to the highest solid and sober, learned, moral and intellectual perfection: and we think we have furnished in the foregoing pages (with what may follow,) a just conception of, and direct clue to, the peculiar proportions of literary, erudite, scientific, christian, theosophic knowledge and ability, requisite in the candidate, to execute such a design,—or rather to enable him to present a true portraiture of nature, in her respective developments, degrees and harmonies, as such a man—a BEHMEN-FREHER-LAW or a LAW-FREHER-BEHMEN. Let it be remembered that what we propose, is with a view to the amelioration of the world, and the blessing of future ages; that in the contemplated work all who may look into it, whether as regards learning, politeness, religion and divine philosophy, may there find, not only a beau-ideal of the highest perfections and accomplishments of human nature, but a practical exemplification thereof, and every step as it were, leading to such attainments laid down in an orderly manner. We doubt not of the reader's concurrence in the sobriety of our hopes in this respect, after a due comprehension of, and meditation upon, the present work when completed.

We have throughout the preceding pages, considered Christianity as the experimental philosophy of the divine life, of which no knowledge can be had but from the engrafted principle of the divine nature in the soul born into liberty, power and intellectuality. We have therefore spoken of it as a positive and progressive science; and have intimated how the settled regulations of the or-divisibilité de ses parties, sur le principe du mouvement, etc. On chercherait en vain ailleurs une profondeur égale à celle qu'il a montrée dans ces sujets aussi arides : ses résultats sont quelquefois thodox mystical divinity of the Romish church, (being the result of vast and varied experience, study and judgment in self knowledge and mental renovation,) will, if complied with, enhance the soul much higher in spirituality and divine purity, than the most perfect instructions of the protestant school, of theoretic or practical divinity : whose place or grade in the initiative scale of evangelical science we yet pointed out in the note of p. 495. Before closing our present Annotation, it may not be improper to present the following elucidation of this advanced Christian progress, (in addition to the paper we before gave on "Passive Contemplation,") as affording to the candidate a special and peculiar glimpse of the pure mystical erudition of Mr. Law, the experience detailed in which, he, from his own remarks in the "Animadversion on Trap," may be supposed to have made his own. The document itself we have found amongst Mr. Law's papers, being in the handwriting of Freher, and most probably accompanying the other MS. documents of that divine and inestimable writer, which he caused himself to be possessed of, for his contemplative retirement. With regard to Mr. Law's theosophic knowledge, or his converse with the profound metaphysics of the schools, or as a classic English theologian, &c., these topics will be found duly touched upon in other portions of the present work. The document in question (which, as exhibiting the sum and end of all mystical science, conducting the soul to the very threshold of wisdom's (theosophic) temple, will require close and oft-repeated perusal,) thus proceeds :—

"ABSTRACT OF THE SECOND PART, OR APPENDIX OF P. JOHN EVANGELIST'S 'KINGDOM OF GOD IN THE SOUL,' ENTITLED, THE DIVISION BETWEEN THE SOUL AND SPIRIT, OR, THE INWARD ASCENT OF THE BRIDE, THROUGH THE DEGREES OF PURE LOVE.

Chap. I.—The inward state of a [regenerate] soul, striving forwards to perfection [or purity of heart. Matt. v. 8], is in general, shortly and simply described. Where there is shown, that such a soul cannot be now as formerly, satisfied with her usual exercises of contemplation, meditation upon the passion of Christ, and prayers, etc., but findeth effectually, that by all these things she loseth her time, is scattered, and, instead of drawing near to God, cometh to be at a greater distance from him. When she perceiveth also on the other hand, that in her most inward ground a certain rest, tranquillity and serenity of her mind, and uniformity of spirit, is presented and offered to her, etc.

Chap. II.—Of the soul's gathering her to herself the author declareth, that the soul, in this beginning state, knowing not how to attain to that rest, learneth by good advice, and is confirmed by own experience, that by the operations of the Will only she can attain thereunto. Wherein therefore she exerciseth herself gradually, (the manner and means whereof are here described,) until she cometh to taste something of that internal rest and sweetness. But successively these operations also are found by the soul to be too gross, outward and imperfect, and hindering more than furthering; so that at length she can hardly use them in her practice any more.

Chap. III.—Of the soul's introversion. Here is at large described the soul's progress, made chiefly by a simple apprehension of, or laying hold on God, by faith. And after a comparison of the soul's new operations, with her former exercises, (where the different effects of both are excellently declared,) the author says, That after such a manner the soul begins to build or raise in herself a place of rest and peace, and an inward city of refuge, from the tumults and noises of this world. Wherein she is frequently visited by God's ineffable goodness, instructed by the Divine wisdom, formed and framed as to her spiritual life and the secret operations thereof like as a child in the womb, and taught also how to worship God henceforth in spirit and in truth.

Chap. IV.—*Of the soul's penetrating herself. Here the author declareth, that when the soul has attained to some degree of constancy and perfection, in the fore-mentioned state, she still findeth all these things too human, too natural and superficial, and can no more acquiesce therein. For she perceiveth herself to stand too much in herself, and wisheth that she might be able to unload, and to throw out herself from herself. And yet she knoweth not, what that same is which makes her such hinderances, much less how she may be freed therefrom. This causeth in her a great perplexity and anxiety, yet without disturbance of the mind, seeing it makes her full of longings and desires, to know thoroughly and to subject herself wholly to God.—Here the author excellently declareth (1.) the soul's fruitless and ineffectual endeavours, (2.) the great mercifulness of God, kindling as it were a beacon upon a high tower, whereby the present state of the soul, and that also which she is to advance unto, is shown her, and that she is still a great way distant from her desired haven, (3.) the soul's progress, and (4.) her several delusions, which she brings herself under, by taking up wings and intending to fly, before the wings are given her from above. Till at length she comes to see, that God hath dealt with her most graciously, leading her through various ambages, that she might overcome that great difficulty of ascending straight-ways to the top of a steep mountain. But still, says the author, there is a deceit behind, cleaving to the innermost marrow, and this is self-love: before this hath breathed out its last breath, the soul cannot enter into the sancum sanctorum.*

Chap. V.—Of the soul's raising her above herself. Here the author declareth, how the soul further cometh to the inward operations of a perfect abnegation and poverty of spirit, renouncing not only all her rest in, and delightful cleaving to her own exercisings, but also all her taste and comfort in the gifts of God, and intending to attend only the divine drawings in her; to be obedient unto them, to continue all her lifetime in such an abnegation, nay to all eternity also, if God would have it so, etc. In these after-the-highest-manner abstracted operations, the soul, says he, continueth for a time, but findeth afterwards, that she cannot attain to the perfection thereof by her own self, because this is surpassing the powers of nature. Wherefore then she comes into a total mistrusting and despairing of herself, and is still deeper swallowed up into that internal obscurity, (whereof he had treated above,) and enabled also, to continue therein longer than she could hitherto. Herein (viz. in this obscurity) she begins now to observe, that she hath in her a very secret power, which she knew not hitherto; and that in the knowledge and use thereof the extremest perfection consists. Here she begins also to know and discern, this same power is that which formerly she had looked upon as the image of God. But all this she seeth as yet only obscurely, and without true distinction.—The author represents these things most pleasantly and plainly, by the similitude bien singuliers, mais toujours puissamment motivés; c'est ainsi qu'il prétend qu'un principe matériel est nécessairement la base de toute corporisation, et par conséquent de la matière elle-of a strife or wrestling between a dark mist and the clear beams of the sun, where, now the former and quickly again the latter do prevail. And says, that the soul, with great admiration and delight, beholds these things in herself, and concludes surely, that this latter is that part of her, which she must first have in her power, that so, by the help thereof, she may raise up herself above herself, unto God.

[The qualified reader and candidate will not fail to mark the admirable scientific manner, order and exactness, in which is represented the experience herein contained; and its conformity with the philosophy thereof, as set forth by Mr. Law, in its standard, classic form, in the quotations given pp. 526—8; 78—80.]

Chap. VI.—How difficult it is for the soul, to raise herself above herself. The soul (says the author on this point,) having now discovered herself to the deepest bottom, is full of admiration and rejoicing; but her joy and admiration is soon mixed with pain, fear, and care or sorrow. With pain, because she seeth indeed a treasure, but hath not the same in her possession, nay findeth herself at a greater distance from it, than hitherto she had believed herself to be; seeing that same which she had conceived to be the end, was really but the middle, etc. With fear, because she seeth this is so high a state, that by reason of her weakness, and chiefly of her instability, she is apt to think, that she never shall attain to it, etc.; all what hitherto she had thought to be clear, light and pure, seeming now but obscure, dark and impure: which the author declared as to several particulars. With care or sorrow, because she seeth no way, how to raise in her that noble power, in consideration of her present state, which is thoroughly now detected. And after a distinct description thereof, represented by the author under the simile of two pieces of different wax, melted together into one lump, and so mingled and incorporated to each other, that they make up only one substance, when there is nevertheless a division and separation absolutely required, if each of them shall have its own subsistence by itself,—he saith, That when the soul perceiveth this, it makes her truly believe, that nothing under heaven can be more confuse, perplex and irregular, than this her inward state, etc. She wills indeed that this division and separation shall be done in her, and prepareth herself thereto, but perceiveth also, that this same self willing and preparing is but a hindrance, and an occasion of new darknesses, etc. But all these truly inexpressible difficulties, can really effect nothing else, but a total diffidence of herself and confidence to GOD, whom she perceiveth ready to her assistance, when all the difficulties arise but on her own side. At length the soul is convinced of the indispensable necessity for this separation; so that, though she had not to expect any future, either reward or punishment, yet she could not rest in this disordered state, without endeavouring against it all she can. A great compassion also ariseth now in the soul with all men, and a great admiration that they carry all of them such a noble treasure in them, and yet do nothing know thereof, etc. Upon all this, the soul's new resolution for a deeper and more universal resignation, is declared, etc.

Chap. VII.—Of the manner in which the soul is raised above herself. Here, the author says, Human instructions, precepts or rules can help very little, and are only so far profitable, as they may encourage the soul to perseverance. For a soul thus abstracted, denuded and simplified, cannot give ear unto, nor be directed by, what is prescribed to her from without, etc. That the soul still is in activity, and here also continueth so, he granteth, and saith, That the gathering of all the powers within is a sitting, which is indeed quiet but not idle, for it is incomparably more busy, operating and laborious, than what the soul was doing before. Which clearly seeth, that here she cannot be idle so much as for one moment, without being actually driven back, and that she is like a bird in the air, which never can cease to move its wings. And this he further declareth and confirmeth from the nature of love.—Of these operations he says, They are so secret and spiritual, that the soul, used to a gross activity, can hardly discern them from idleness, but discerneth them best by their effects. Concerning especially the manner, and by what operations the division and separation is done in the soul, he describeth it indeed largely and plainly enough, unto the end of the chapter; but the contents of this description cannot be given in short, a translation of the whole context would be required.

Chap. VIII.—Concerning the wise and manner of the operations of the soul, now raised up above herself. Though this, he says, is inexplicable, yet, that the efficacy, nature and property of this power which hath no name, may be made known but in any measure, he will declare thereof so much as God will give him, and this in the following points, (here represented but in short positions:—) [N.B. what now followeth, referring also to p. 9, 43, 44, 505, etc.; whereby will be seen the uniformity of truth, from whatever side, or by whatever eye, she may be approached unto and viewed.]

(1.) This secret inward power sheweth forth itself like a spark, or rather like a flame, which in the inmost deep of the soul ariseth suddenly, and is very quick and nimble for motion, as also capable of being expanded or dilated, and contracted.

It ariseth only in the highest abstraction, rest and inward silence, and ascendeth immediately into God its centre: but is in the very first moment swallowed up by the senses, if the soul answers not, by introverting herself immediately to God.

(2.) This introversion of the soul must be done with great simplicity and purity, so that nothing of her usual operations may concur; but all the senses and powers must be silenced, and must, as it were, not know that this introversion is done, which through the only operation of this power, is to be performed. When therefore is said, The soul must answer, this is to be understood negatively, and is so much as to say, The soul must not move herself: the introversion is done through the operation of this power only, and in the twinkling of an eye, and all what the soul will contribute, doth but annulate and spoil it.

(3.) This introversion is answered most internally by the Divine presence; God manifesting himself here, not indeed clearly and distinctly, but as the condition of this life can bear, that is obscurely and mixedly, yet so, that the soul finds herself to be with GOD immediately, (without any medium between them,) and translated out of time into eternity. Wherein she beholds and contemplates GOD, in a manner unknown to herself, and always after the same wise, except only that sometimes she can do it more clearly. [N.B.]

même. Son opinion, à cet égard, nous semble avoir quelque analogie avec celle de Descartes sur la matière subtile. Mais, par fois aussi, le philosophe inconnu, craignant de profaner ce qu'il ap-

Here the soul stands open, without hinderance to receive the Divine influences, and is in the nearest way fit and capable of being raised up higher, to a clearer and more distinct contemplation of God. [N.B.]

Here the soul dare not and cannot strive for, or desire any peculiar revelation, but commits all this to Him, whom she finds to be satisfied, and well pleased with her, if she be but industrious after such a manner, to exclude and keep out, according to her power, all impediments between Him and her.

Here the soul is made wholly God-like (dei-formis), so that she can desire nothing else, but that the Will of God both in herself and in all men, may be most perfectly performed, according to that end and aim which He had in the creation and redemption, etc.

(4.) This introversion of the soul is done, either by ascending above all things, and surpassing herself also, or by descending and sinking down under all things, and under herself also. The inward power is fit both for this and that. And by this so well as by that, (but not without them both,) this union and communion with God can be performed.

In the first case, the forementioned most inward power of the soul leaveth the nethermost place, (the lowest parts of the breast,) and riseth up to the highest, (to the crown of the head;) and in the second, contrariwise. Above this, this power cannot rise, and beyond that it cannot go deeper down. (To understand here the author's meaning, a translation of the whole context would be required, containing several things.)

(5.) When the soul stands thus exalted in God above herself, or when she is swallowed up in Him underwards, the use of outward senses is utterly stopped and hindered; yet not so, as that she could not hear or feel, etc., but only that she cannot turn unto, or take any notice of, what is done in and about her, without interrupting immediately her introversion.

Smell and taste, she cannot absolutely, or not at all; but she can hear, see, nay also speak. As to the feeling, this is peculiar, viz. that by feeling something grateful and taking notice thereof, her introversion is immediately dissolved; but if the sensual object be painful, that power of the soul can fully and immediately apply itself to the pain, receiving and embracing, nay beholding and contemplating it. Which is wonderful, but certain, from innumerable experiences. etc.

(6.) All the members of the body are deprived of their natural operations, so that all stretchings-out and drawings-in must cease, and no motion can be performed, even not so much as the opening or shutting of an eye, without a total breaking of the soul's introversion. When nevertheless, a man may bow, stand, nay also walk, if it be but without any notice taken thereof. [The soul must become again a will-less, imagination-less, desire-less, pure mirror-Eye, whose only self-hood is the seeing of the Divine wisdom.]

The breathing also ceaseth, and the defect thereof is inwardly after a secret manner, recompensed; so that the warmth of the heart is all this time in a better temperature, than when the breathing performeth its office. [N.B.]

It is the soul's last and most troublesome wrestling, which she must undergo with or about this breathing, etc. And it is the most certain outward sign, by which she can know, whether she hath been duly introverted.

(7.) This stopping of the breath can continue the space of two hours, more or less: etc.

No weariness ariseth from this long continuance of the introversion, but rather the soul and body are wonderfully thereby strengthened and refreshed. Though indeed the inward power loseth something through the long continuance, and is also sometimes quite exhausted and passeth away. (What the effects and dangers hereof are, and how to be remedied, the author declareth also.)

(8.) Concerning the use of this power, in time of outward affairs, it is much more difficult to declare this, than that which hitherto was treated of. For this manner of working is so spiritual and so high, that the soul can hardly reach it with her sight, and so come to the knowledge thereof. (What the author gives us thereof from No. 8 to 12, cannot be represented by pieces, but a translation of the whole would be required if his sense shall be understood. In the conclusion, he says what followeth.)

To this power belongeth and is to be referred, all what the Mystic Writers have delivered, though sometimes obscurely and confusedly, because of the most secret and very little known manner of operation, which they felt in them, and which hardly by words can be expressed. Now to the manifestation or knowledge, use and practice of this power, the soul cometh ordinarily and usually, after the manner that is (in this treatise) described. But nevertheless God is not confined to this method: for unto some he revealeth sometimes this most internal and most noble power, in the very beginning of their conversion; but to the constant use thereof, they cannot come otherwise than after many years, and by a faithful and industrious exercising. Amen.

THE ANNOTATIONS OF DR. LIE: FROMUNDUS, upon several places of this Treatise, contain nothing of extraordinary consideration or importance. He sheweth the conformity of this Author with several others of the Mystics, and quotes St. Bernhard, Card. Cajetanus, Joh. Rusbroch, Taulerius, Greg. Nazianzenus and Augustinus. The chiefest observation is concerning that flame, which according to J. Evangelist riseth up into the highest part of the head, and descendeth down into the lowest of the breast. And of this he says:—

That it is not a purely spiritual thing, but hath something of a corporeal property and formation mixed with it.

That such like men, as J. Evang. many times examined by him and by others, have confessed, this flame is capable of an alteration in time of a fever, or when the weather is altered; so that sometimes it can with greater ease and quickness rise out of the clouds and obscurity of the brutal part, and ascend to the top of the brain, than at other times.

That this miracle of nature cannot easily be declared; and that he lately in his Fourth Book of the Soul, chap. iv. A. 6, 7, 8, has endeavoured to declare something thereof.

That the region of our brain is twofold, a superior and an inferior. That in the inferior are the great and broad meatus ventriculorum, (the seat of affections and vehement passions, the cause of the paralysis, if filled with tough viscous humours, and of losing the senses and reason, if filled with pelle la vérité, devient énigmatique, ce qui ajoute encore à l'obscurité des questions qu'il veut résoudre. * * * Cependant nous sommes bien persuadés que, dans ses nombreux écrits, le philosophe inconnu a été plus d'une fois la dupe de son cœur et de son imagination, et qu'en cela, il a payé sa dette à l'humaine faiblesse."

Thus much concerning Saint-Martin, his writings, and the translations of Behmen's books into the French language; which, with what has been additionally herein stated in reference to the subject, will enable the reader to form a judgment as to the progress made by Behmen's philosophy in France, up to the time of the publication of the above mentioned historic notices. [End of the POSTSCRIPT commencing p. 491.]

Notwithstanding what we have heretofore stated as to our intention to conclude the Extracts from FREHER with what were thereupon presented, we cannot resist the impulse we feel, (considering, moreover, that Freher was probably Mr. Law's constant closet-tutor for Behmen from about the year 1736,) to add one or two more, previous to closing the present SECTION. Wherefore (without further apology) we offer the following edifying and practical Fragment, in elucidation of the nature, depth and universality of what is termed theologically, original sin; and which may serve as an appendix to the mystical "Abstract" inserted in the annotation pp. 623—28, wherein will be found especially referred to that "last remains of original sin," or secret root of selfishness in the soul, which, as a last grand obstacle, must be removed out of it ere it can attain to perfect union with God. (See "H. A. Rogers's Life and Experience," for a practical gospel illustration of this subject.) This particular point was also necessarily embraced in Mr. Law's philosophical treatise on "Regeneration," though perhaps without a systematic consideration of the subject such as we now offer, his scope and remarks may not be duly apprehended; as indeed they have not been for the most part hitherto, but, in some instances, e. g. § 46, have given great offence to many well-meaning religionists, not versed in the science of recondite gospel truth. Hereby then, we say, a reader may attain to a full and distinct contemplation of the entire tree of selfishness and sin, original and actual, in the human nature, and of the necessity of its destruction, down to its deepest spiritual roots, and how that God only is "sufficient for these things," to whom therefore "earnest cries and tears" must be offered up, (Luke xviii. 7) for that end. Which critical knowledge or apprehension, it will be admitted, is of the utmost moment to the advanced regenerate christian, no less than to incipient believers, of all ages and all times. The Fragment in question thus reads:—

"XCV.—That the corruption of human nature, reaching to the very bottom thereof, did indeed show forth itself mightily by the answer Adam and Eve gave to their Creator herein, that neither he nor she would find and own the cause of their fall in their own bosom;—Adam laying the same upon the woman, which God (as he said) had given him, and the woman upon the serpent; which, by not removing the fault from himself upon the devil, but silently as it were owning and bearing it, behaved himself better than both of them. But that notwithstanding this, into this hua mist or vapour, as it is done so in drunkenness,) but that in the superior are the spirits, the forms or images of things, and all in a greater tranquillity.

That the more subtle spirits are either drawn up into that superior part, or are therein made so thin and subtle, or as S. Thomas says, simplified. And that the most subtle images, which are the nearest to intellectual thoughts, are in that superior part, viz. in the superior corners or turnings of the brain, etc.

That this spark of the fantastic or imaginative light, which formeth the images, can be so kindled and ruled by God's natural providence and direction, that it must be subservient to the supernatural glimpse of the intellect, etc.

That this fantastic light is given to assist the superior part of the soul, in the warfare of the spirit against the soul, that so the spirit more easily may extricate and separate itself from the soul. And that therefore this fantastic light is, as it were a helping medium and instrument of the superior light, by which the spiritual part weakeneth the soulish part.

That herein lieth the ground, why to a soul used to introversion, it may be as easy to abide in Contemplation, as it is to live a natural life. As Rusbrochius, in his Book of The Perfection of the Children of God, witnesseth. Chap. xiii. [N.B.]

That J. Evangelist hath often confessed to him, that always early in the morning, as soon as he was awakened, this flame of light used to arise into the region of his brain, and did shine therein with its usual clarity, until the least imperfection or veniale peccatum, committed perhaps by him, did obscure like a mist, the glance thereof.

That the confession and declaration about this matter ought to be believed, and is not to be accounted as a dream or fancy; under pretence that but few* are come so far as to have experience thereof. St. Bernhard, Rusbroch, Taulerus, Harphius and other eminent men say many things to the same purpose. [* few indeed, in this country, that have even any conception of this advanced Christian progress, or purity of heart.]

That the sincerity and holy life of P. J. Evang. known unto many that are still alive, makes him free from all suspicion of hypocrisy, of own invention, and of all devilish delusion.

That the same hath spent already about twenty years, in such abstractions and Divine contemplations, and hath nevertheless esteemed this grace so little, that many times he said to him (Fromundo) in familiar discourse, I wish I could give and deliver up into thee all what I have, concerning this, received of God; for I know, [N.B.] that true holiness doth not consist in, nor depend upon, this or the like gifts of grace.

That though these illuminations, like a lightening appear suddenly, and suddenly also vanish away, (according to St. Bernhard and Franc. Suarez,) yet all dependeth principally on the Divine grace, to which nothing is impossible, etc.

That such persons, as continue whole days, months and years, in this exalting and cleaving unto heaven, seem to be of that sort, of which St. Gregorius Nazianzen speaks, Orat. xxix.

That it appears from St. Augustin and St. Bernhard, that the formation of those likenesses, by which we see divine things as in a glass, or in an obscure word (in enigmate), is sometimes performed by the ministry of holy angels.

That the best counsel and surest direction for such as are not yet so far advanced, and yet still man nature so thoroughly corrupted, grace was spoken again by the promise of the blessed woman's seed, or serpent treader.

[Note.—The antecedent A and B signatures of this piece, containing Positions "1" to "94" inclusive, in quarto MS., (the present signature being marked C, and consisting of forty-two pages of German and English face to face, in the author's own hand-writing,) with the subsequent signatures D &c., are no longer to be found; nor have they been with the remainder of the author's MSS. since the year 1782. If these MISSING SIGNATURES be in the possession of any reader, will he please to communicate to the address given at the foot of p. 51.]

XCVI.—And of this, we believe, that it was not only a bare promise of a thing that should come to pass after several thousands of years, but also a grace even then already beginning and actually showing forth itself. Whereinto Adam and Eve with all their posterity, were not only received again to be children of grace, but had also so much of power given unto them, as that they could rule over the sin dwelling in them, by the assistance of that grace, laid hold on by faith and taken in into their spirit; as this ruling over sin was soon after thus required of Cain.

XCVII.—Also that not only the eternal Word, the Father's only begotten Son, had here already set himself actually as a mediator, in the middle, between the fallen humanity and the anger of God enkindled therein, to withhold the same from devouring these two poor creatures; but also that the heavenly Virgin, [or Divine handmaid] which was departed from Adam in his sleep, did now again in union and communion with the eternal Word, approach to the fallen humanity; yet that she gave not herself into the soul, comprehensibly, much less into the soul's own will; but only that she stood in her own principle of light, over against the soul, or in the inmost deep of the human mind, showing forth herself therein, and opening as it were a door of possibility for all men, through which they can come again to their lost heavenly image. Because in this inspoken grace of the serpent treader, and in the promise of the blessed woman's seed, she hath espoused herself afresh to the human soul, and promised to walk with the soul through the dangerous valley of this world, to warn, to conduct and guide it safely, and at length in the perfect regeneration, to take the same into her arms, as her espoused bridegroom.

XCVIII.—But especially we believe that this holy woman's seed, which alone is the true serpent treader, was inspoken chiefly and directly into the woman, not into the man, that is, not into the masculine fire-ground, or Adam's fiery tincture separated from the light, but into that light and water tincture which in Eve was disappeared: and that so it was set in opposition against the fiery will of the soul in Adam, and against that sinful spring which first had taken its beginning in him. Nay, that in such a manner it could not have been spoken into the man; because this same fiery will and tincture of the soul in Adam, separated from the holy light and soft water, was and is still that serpent in the humanity, whose head was to be bruised by the soft tincture of holy light and water,—that is, whose power was to be broken thereby, and whose predominance was to be taken away. And that therefore in the regeneration, the man is not to apply unto himself any more that striving after that ænigmatical Contemplation, is that of St. Greg. Nazianz.,—Keep the commandments,—ἡπάξῃς ἐπὶ ἐπιβασὶς θεωρίας.

THAT which now followeth of another Author, entitled, ELUCIDATION OF THE DOCTRINE OF THIS TREATISE, OF THE REVEREND P. J. EVANG., contains nothing else but a particular enumeration of the chiefest parts thereof, which are these four, (1.) of the soul's gathering her into herself, (2.) of the soul's introversion, (3.) of her penetrating herself, and (4.) of her drawing near and exalting herself into God. Each of which, this author sheweth, is conformable to many others of the Mystical Writers, whose words he bringeth forth, viz. St. Bernh., August., Gregor., Ausbroch., Anon: de Spiritu et Anima, P. Florent: ab Hunsyck, Justus Origelitanus, Harph: Gerson, Hugo a S. Victore, Thom. de Kempis, St. Bonaventura, Richard a St. Victore, Benjamin major, Lib. Fromundus, Joh. Taulerus, B. Teresa, Seraph. Firmianus, Anon: de inter. Domo. One or other place also of J. Evang. he illustrates, for fear his words might be mistaken. Concerning especially the breathing and ceasing thereof, he observes, that the Apostle Paul says something to that purpose, Gal. ii., 'I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me;' that Job also says such a thing, chap. xxxiv. 14, 'If he set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath,' (which words sound more favourably for him in the German translation.) And that the same may be found also in the words of B. Teresa, saying, 'This is such a death of the soul, that myself know not, whether or no she can breathe. I have to this hour much thought upon it, and it seems to me that she can not, or at least she herself knoweth not that she can.'

Such is the further paper we have selected to convey to the reader, in brief, a conception of the nature and practical character of the orthodox, or standard mystical theology, (whose relative position on the scale of essential and accomplished Christianity, we especially referred to in the note of p. 495,) and of the exact and orderly attainments of Mr. Law in such spiritual science.

[↪ After what has been stated in the preceding portions of this Annotation, and what will likewise be found in the text above, concerning the point of view and ground from whence to regard and judge of all spiritual subjects and pretensions; whereby we have endeavoured to establish a standard in such respect, according to the Christ-like wisdom and apprehension of a Behmen-Freher-Law, and the experiences of the most profound and practical gospel believers down to the present day,—the Candidate. (having, we say, his mind classically tutored in this divine standard form of apprehension) may now, in this place and relation, (with regard to the mystic character of the subject of the present volume,) be directed to the perusal of Roach's two treatises, the "Great Crisis" of the "Imperial Standard." In these he will find an ingenious, and in some respects valuable collection of materials, which, with his now fixed judgment, he may turn to account in the proposed larger work; selecting therefrom, what may accord with the spirit and design of the undertaking, and necessarily rejecting the rest. We have not space or convenience here to indicate the advisable quotations from, or suggestions afforded in those works; but it may suffice, after preparing and forming the mind of the candidate, thus, to have directed his attention to them.]

Having then sufficiently indicated the two-fold mystic character of Mr. LAW, first in regard to the purification of Christianity both as to doctrine and practice, and secondly by demonstrating the truth and philosophy of it, (thus convincing the reason and understanding of all gainsayers, Heathens, Jews, Turks or Christians, and then affecting the heart and conscience,) thereby in short, which was said unto Eve, with relation to the outward natural life and order, viz., Thy will shall be subject to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee; but that contrariwise, the sentence against the man is now this, according to the true ground and substance, viz., Thy masculine fiery will shall be subject to the wife of thy youth, or to thy heavenly Virgin, and she shall rule over thee.

XCIX.—This inspoken grace or covenant of grace, we believe, was propagated from generation to generation, yet only in its own inward ground and not in flesh and blood, until the time was fulfilled and had run unto its end, (scope, limit, period,) in the blessed Virgin Mary. Though we cannot properly call it a propagation, because it was not done from the efficiency of men, nor by their concurrence (assistance), but from the efficiency of this covenant of grace which here was made, and by virtue of the promise made therein: according to (in performance of) which, this inspoken grace moved itself freely, and opened itself out of its centre, more or less and in different degrees, from generation to generation.

C.—We hold that herein, one of the strongest arguments lieth against a particular and partial election of some only unto life, and reprobation of others unto damnation. Because this grace was inspoken, and this promise made to the whole life of the humanity, which as yet was still but one, as one only stock of a tree, before the same could have spread forth itself in boughs and branches; nay before these two first parents (which with respect to propagation are to be looked upon as only one) were cast out from the garden of Eden. Which grace and promise therefore can press forward upon all their children, no less than death hath done so from one upon all.

CI.—After the sentence was passed upon Adam and Eve, and this promise was made unto them, they were, we believe, as Moses saith, cast out (driven out) from the garden of Eden, (for paradise they had lost already before,) by a cherub with a flaming sword, turning every way. And though we believe the relation of Moses, even in the literal sense thereof, to be fully true, yet we believe also and have it by experience, that this cherub with his sword, hath something in it much greater and deeper than what in that time was outwardly done; and are besides also well assured, that every man born of man and woman without exception, upon his way returning home to paradise, shall find this cherub and his sword in their own souls, yet every one according to his peculiar state and condition.

CII.—With St. Paul we believe, God would have it so, that all the generations (families) and nations upon earth should come forth from one only blood; and that therefore, this only stock of the human tree hath propagated and spread forth itself successively into innumerable boughs and branches. But especially, that not only from the beginning of the first world, with the children of Adam, but also and even more conspicuously in the beginning of the second world, with the three sons of Noah, it hath divided itself into three great, principal branches; so driving forth still unto this day, its growth in three lines or parties and sorts of people. And that these three lines or generations of men, have divided themselves, and still do so, according to the manner and property of the three principles, divided in the humanity.

CIII.—The first we call justly the line of the serpent's seed, which showed forth itself in Cain, the first born of Adam, and afterwards in Ham, who was accused by his father. The second, the line of the woman's seed, the line of grace or of the covenant of grace, which opened itself in Abel, further in Seth, and among the sons Noah in Shem. And the third we call the line of nature, or of the natural wonders, which in the first world, so much as we have an account thereof given us by Moses, had not yet so distinctly separated and manifested itself in sundry persons and families, but kept most to Cain's posterity; but in the second world, it distinctly opened itself in Japhet, and displayed itself in the heathen (gentiles) that were of his posterity.

rendering it of universal application and efficacy; and having also enabled the Candidate to apprehend the formation and order of Mr. Law's mind, so that he may attain to the same end in the same classic process, we conclude the present biographical and discursive "ANNOTATION," (extending from p. 324,) with the following "Lines," composed by the Rev. Mr. Clarke as already stated, and published by him in the year 1762.

Lines to the Memory of the Rev. William Law, A.M.,

FAREWELL, GOOD MAN!—whose great and heavenly mind,

In love embrac'd the whole of human kind;
From earth's dark scene, to realms of joy and light,

Thy soul, congenial, took her happy flight;
With kindred spirits mix'd, and bright as they,
Thou drink'st with them the streams of endless day!

While we below lament thy absence most,
Like all true worth, then dearest when 't is lost.—
Bound to no sect, to no one party tied,
To sons of God in every clime allied;

Like light's great orb, to no one realm confin'd,
Thy heaven-taught soul, capacious, grasp'd mankind!—

Of pains severe thou felt the torturing smart,
While grace pour'd comfort on thy better part,
Thy will resign'd, with breath unurm'ring, bore
The last sharp passage to the heavenly shore.—
Thy heart's best image, still, thy Writings shine,
One spirit breathe—the dove and lamb divine!
Thou'st thy tongue, thy soul's strong breathings charm;

Thou'st thy clay, thy ardent thoughts still warm:
Awak'd by thee, we feel the heavenly fire,
And, with seraphic flames, to God aspire.

Thy pious zeal, transfus'd to other hearts,
New springs of bliss and nobler life, imparts.—
No time, no numbers can exhaust thy mine,
Thy gifts are full—posterity is thine!
Thro' future ages shall thy labours go,
Like streams enriching nations, as they flow;
Who, while perusing, catch the sacred fire,
Fetch the deep sight, and pant with strong desire
For glory lost! HEAVEN lent thy pencil rays
To paint that glory and diffuse its blaze!
Thou' for these days, thy colours are too bright,
And hurt weak eyes, by their too radiant light,
Yet Wisdom's sons, tho' few, to good awake,
Drink thy sweet spring, and bread celestial break!
'Midst Babel's various tongues, tho' thousands stray,

In thee, the wand'rer finds his Master's way.—
In heaps let critics, commentators, lie,
Thy WORKS will make a Christian's LIBRARY!
In vain shall malice seek to wound thy name,
Or ignorance thy solid worth defame.—
To pride of science, wisdom's fount is seal'd;
To humble hearts, her treasures are reveal'd.
Yet this her child wants no man's pen to praise,
Nor slander dreads, in these degenerate days;—
Far nobler monuments will guard his fame,
Deep in their breasts, the good engrave his name.

CIV.—With the third line of nature or of natural wonders, we understand the honest, wise and prudent among the heathen, which, according to the letter knew nothing of the grace, and were not taken outwardly (like as the Jews) into the covenant of grace, but lived as rational men, according to the testimony of their consciences or to the light of nature; wherein many of them made a great progress in the knowledge of God, of outward nature and of themselves. And these we say have the promise, that 'they shall dwell with Japhet in the tabernacle of Shem.' Gen. ix. 27.

CV.—The second line, which is that of the woman's seed or of the covenant of grace, we take either in a narrower sense only, for the seventy-two generations that follow orderly the one upon the other in the genealogy of Christ, down from the first Adam unto the Virgin Mary; or also, in a larger and more extensive one, for all those collateral generations, tribes, or even single persons, that were contained (included) in the covenant of grace, and behaved themselves accordingly in their life and conversation.

CVI.—But with the first line of the serpent's seed, we understand the thoroughly wicked crew of them that despise, nay mock both the light of grace and that of nature, and live after their own lusts like brutes, if not worse; and these (we say) are excluded from the tabernacle of Shem, and accursed with Ham. Though we do not mean that Noah cursed his son Ham thoroughly in soul and body, but only the serpent's seed and spirit, dwelling in him and operating through him.

CVII.—These three lines we do not so distinguish, or separate so far, as that we should say on the one side, All the children of grace stand through and through, from within and without in the grace, and have nothing on them neither of the serpent's seed nor of the outward corrupt nature; or that we should say on the other side, All the children of nature and of the serpent's seed are totally in body, soul and spirit, excluded from the covenant of grace, and have no possibility for grace to be obtained in them. No, but we distinguish them only so far, that we say on the one side, The children of nature, but more especially the children of the serpent's seed, have not the covenant of grace in a moving (working) life in them; because the corrupt nature and the serpent's life in them, keepeth under and as much as it can, killeth the motion of the covenant of grace which liveth in itself or in its own internal principle in them: but they have still the possibility in them, to draw back their will and to sink it down into the grace which lieth in them, though in many of them deeply shut up, and which calleth upon them in their consciences, and will manifest itself in them; because no man was ever born out of a serpent's seed only and solely, but all are born out of the one only human seed, into which indeed the serpent's seed was crept in, but into which also the grace was inspooken, even before any man was generated out of it. And on the other side we say, that all the children of grace and of the covenant bear also on them from without, the serpent's seed and the corrupt nature; and that there is none to be found, even not the most sanctified, who dare boast himself to be wholly free therefrom; but that they do not suffer these to rule in them, because the grace is in them moveable, stands in a working life, keeping under continually and casting out all what is not in and from itself.

ing out all what is not in and from itself.

CVIII.—For we believe and confess, that herein as to the outward life, if the same be considered only as to itself, as abstracted from the grace living and operating therein, there is no other difference between men and men but only this, that one man sticks perhaps more and deeper than another in this or that peculiar kind of dirt and mire, when contrariwise the other may stick more and deeper in another sort thereof; whereby the one as well as the other is so polluted, that neither of them is able to come into that city, wherein nothing of pollution is admitted. And that therefore, [G] WE WOULD BESPEAK THE MOST SERIOUS AND CONSIDERATE ATTENTION OF EVERY READER, TO EVERY LINE AND WORD FOLLOWING, TO THE END OF THESE POSITIONS. none hath any reason to upbraid another with his defilement, and to boast of his own purity, though, in the sight of others as well as in his own eyes, he might be truly pure of this or that particular dirt (filth), wherewithal he seeth his neighbour is abominably defiled. Because the one as well as the other is out of the serpent's seed, and both together belong but to the corrupt nature; because also, the one as well as the other must of himself confess and say, Behold I am generated out of a sinful seed, and in iniquity hath my mother conceived me.

And considering in sin we believe, that it doth conclude all under

CIX.—Of this generating and conceiving in sin we believe, that it doth conclude all under sin, that is, not only them that generate, conceive and bear, but also them that generate, conceive and bear, and that it cannot work-out or bring forth anything else but what is alike unto itself; there must needs therefore be sin in them also that are generated and born, though it cannot presently from their birth, act and work in them after the same or the like manner. From whence then, that well known distinction ariseth between the so called original sin and actual sin, though in itself it be not a doing, acting and CX.—Concerning original sin we believe, that though in itself it be not a doing, acting and working, as actual sin is, it nevertheless bears the name of sin, justly and properly; because it is the inward root, ground and bottom, and the universal original of all those outward evil works that can be called sins.

CXI.—That in short, it consists in nothing else but in that disorder and corruption, which the first Adam, quite contrary to his creation and to the will of his creator, introduced into all the properties of human nature, and manifested in all his essences. Whereby he dislocated in himself the three principles from their due place and order; giving so much room and leave to the spirit of this world, that the same could exalt himself above the paradisaical life in him, and make out of the heavenly image of God, an earthly beast as to the outward life. Whereout then nothing else could arise, but darkness in the intellect, perversity in the will, a false love turned unto himself in the heart, and a great impotence in all the powers and faculties.

CXII.—That this disorder and corruption is in and for itself indeed, without activity with respect to children in their conception and birth, so that it cannot presently break forth in actual sins; but that nevertheless it is the true and only root, out of which necessarily and unavoidably, the actual sins must spring up and break out when the child comes to an age, though in one it may be more and in the other less: and that absolutely nothing else but sin and what followeth upon sin, but nevermore anything good and pleasing unto God, can be generated out of it. Nay that this is much less possible, than it is for a thistle to bring forth figs, or for a thorn-bush to bear grapes. It is enough brought upon, and communi-

CXIII.—That Adam must necessarily and unavoidably have brought upon, and communicated unto his children in their conception and natural birth, all this disorder and corruption, together with all that belongs to this fruitful root of sin; because he could not have generated out of himself any other image but what he was himself, and could not raise up another and better life in them than he had in himself. And that again, his children must necessarily have propagated upon their children and children's children from generation to generation, this root of sin; because none of them all could in this case, have given unto his children a better portion than what himself before had received of his father.

CXIV.—We hold that, if a proper name should be given unto this original sin, a fitter and more convenient one could hardly be found than selfhood or selfishness, provided only that something deeper be understood thereby that commonly is done. It is commonly apprehended that selfhood or selfishness is to say so much as own-will and self-love, and that all these three together are to be accounted as actual sins: which in a certain sense we grant, and do not censure it, but leave willingly unto every one the apprehension he hath thereof. But we do here understand by selfishness, [N.B.] the human nature as it is broken-off from its right and true inward centre, as it is entered into its own government of the divided and contrary (fighting) properties of life, as it stands upon a ground and bottom of its own making, and as it hath settled itself as it were to rest only in and upon itself. Which nature is such in every man, even from his conception and birth; and is in its own inward spiritual signature in the sight of God so qualified and conditioned even before any will or love can move or stir therein perceptibly, or can act and operate in the least.

CXV.—For we cannot but conclude rationally thus: all what the corrupt human nature, by means of its sinful activity in every man born of man and woman, operates and effects, that very same it hath received already in the mother's womb a natural inclination, disposition and ability to operate and effect; or else it could not work those sins which it worketh. Like as no tree in this world could bear such or such fruits, if the peculiar kind and property thereof, together with a natural disposition or tendency for bearing of such fruits, had not been before in the seed. Or like as no man in this outward macrocosm, could either inwardly contrive anything with his thoughts and senses, or outwardly make any works with his hands, if he had not received within his own microcosm, when the same was prepared in his mother's womb, such senses and hands, together with a natural genius, inclination and disposition for this or that, even before he was able to employ them, nay, before he knew anything either of the one or of the other.

CXVI.—This sinful inclination and disposition to actual sins, we know not how to express or represent by words better, than by saying, When the sinful seed is sown by the male and conceived by the female, then already all the disordered and corrupted properties, nay the whole fallen human nature doth lie therein: like as a whole tree with all its boughs, leaves, fruits and qualities doth lie in a kernel, though these things are then not yet unfolded in a distinguishability. And this human nature, as well in this sown sinful seed as in the parents from whom it comes, is even then already formed in itself, as it were in a circle like a serpent in a spire; for instead of stretching forth and tending directly to the Creator of the true paradisaical life it bends and turns itself crookedly or in a round, enters into itself, combines firmly its own end with its beginning, makes in this circle both its own circumference and its own centre, and settles itself therein exactly in the property of a serpent, which, out of the midst of his spire, lifts up his head and prepares himself to shoot forth like an arrow from a bow. Such a signature we say, the human nature hath even in the seed sown in the mother's womb, and before the rising of its natural life. And [N.B.] this we call selfishness, with respect to its own spiritual figure; and with respect to parents and children together, we call it original sin.

CXVII.—This selfishness, propagated upon us all from the first Adam, or this seed or character by our parents imprinted in us all when we still were but a seed, which seal hath not only engraven upon it, as it were from without, an image of the serpent, but is also in its own self being a true image of the old serpent; the impression of which makes us all to be the first corrupt Adam's natural children, nay children of wrath and guilty of death,—this selfishness, I say, we own to be the deepest ground of our corruption, and compare it justly to the root of a tree firmly fixed wide and broad, stretching forth itself, or rather comprising all in itself, and bringing forth all out of itself, but continuing itself always deeply hidden under ground: and this tree we call the tree of death.

CXVIII.—But own-will and self-love, which denote already and carry along with them a more outward and more perceptible activity of sin, sprung up out of that root, we compare to a gross, thick and twofold stock of the same tree; yet so, that these two are strongly grown together, firmly united (interwoven) and inseparable from each other. Which stock is indeed the next immediate ground of all the branches and fruits that stand above it; but hath itself nevertheless also still a deeper ground under it, standing between this and them in the midst, like as the stock of every natural tree.

CXIX.—But all the other activities, together with the outborn works, or actual sins, not only of the gross earthly flesh but also of the subtle senses and reason, nay of the whole natural life and of all the powers and faculties thereof,—we compare according to their differences and degrees, partly to the greater or lesser branches, partly also to the blossoms, leaves and fruits of this tree; saying, that death is the end of them all like as also death was their beginning.

CXX.—But here we do include also expressly, all those good works that were wrought out before the regeneration, and did thus not proceed from a renewed ground; where they might have had indeed a form of goodness, nay more also than a bare form thereof, and might have been called good in a sense of this outward world, and in comparison to those that were notoriously evil. For, because they came not out of faith, which faith belongeth to the regeneration, and to the inspoken (incorporated) grace; because also without faith no man can please God, they must needs be sins, as the Apostle witnesseth.

CXXI.—Yet we hold that, between these so-called good works before the regeneration, there is still a considerable difference to be observed, because the persons that wrought them out must needs be distinguished. For first, some abide in their unregenerate state, and so depart this life, and fall into death. Secondly, others return, enter into repentance, attain at least to the beginning of regeneration, and sink down through death into life. And thirdly, others again may backslide from their good beginning of regeneration, wherein they had wrought good works, turn with the dog to their own vomit again and with the sow that was washed to their wallowing in the mire, and continue to lie therein unto their end, and then fall into a deeper damnation. And the works of all these three follow after them, but with a great difference.—Of the first, we believe that all their good works falsely so called, which were not good before God but originated from the evil root of self-hood, and coloured over, as it were only from without, with a shining form of goodness out of the astral light,—such works we say, as well as those other of theirs that were notoriously evil, shall go together with themselves into perdition. Concerning the second, we believe that all their works, washed in the Lamb's blood, separated from all the evil, and made white as snow though before they might have been red as blood, shall stand before them for ever, to an eternal hymn of praises and thanksgivings for their redemption. And of the third, we believe that all their truly good works shall be remembered no more, but shall be taken from them and put up into that good principle whereout they were born, when they themselves shall go without them into their place; because every principle is to gather its own fruits into its barn, and neither of them can take in anything but what is grown out of, and according to its properties.

CXXII.—Of this tree of death, whose root is selfishness, whose stock is own-will and self-love, and whose whole superior part is all other actual sins,—we further believe and have it by sure experience, that many of these evil fruits may be plucked off and cast away, nay, that a man through assistance of the Spirit of God may resist powerfully, and prevent the coming forth of others the like instead thereof; and that nevertheless, that stock which beareth them all, may still abide in itself unaltered and unknown also to such a man. Further still, that even this stock also, which is much thicker and stronger than to be shaken by human strength, may be truly shaken by an Almighty arm and hand stretched out from on high, so that all what stands upon it in that man must tremble; and that nevertheless, the root of this tree may still stand fast and unmoveable in the ground, and may still also, as to its proper serpentine figure and properties, continue unknown unto such a man. And lastly, that this root in its own figure (signature), cannot be seen and known by any living, except a strong spiritual earthquake, out of the first principle, do violently shake his whole ground; and that then only, the very foundation pillars of all his natural being are moved and weakened, all what is in him to the very deep is denuded, and all must tremble, both what is above and what is beneath howsoever it might be called.

CXXIII.—And this same root we believe, was chiefly that which made in the second Adam, our only Saviour and Redeemer, the most difficult battle in his spirit, caused the greatest and most vehement anxiety in his soul, and forced out a bloody sweat from his holy body, when he was to lay hold on the human nature he had taken upon him, to pull it up by this root powerfully out of its own selfish ground, and to transplant it again into its right field, or into its first Divine original. For to this same end he was sent by his heavenly Father, that he might destroy the works of the devil, (which altogether, so far as they concerned the corrupt humanity, did centre in this root;) and that he might procure a perfect redemption to the whole human nature. Nay for this same end, God made him who knew no sin, to be not only a sacrifice for sin, as St. Paul says in one place, but also, as he says in another place, he was made sin for us, that we might become in him, not only righteous but also righteousness."

CXXIV. [We possess this position in the German, but the English translation of it in face, with the remainder of this invaluable piece in MS, as we have stated, is no longer to be found.]

Pursuing our object with regard to practical edification, we would next have given insertion to FOUR EPISTLES addressed by Freher, in the years 1712—15, to a religious assembly he frequented, (at the special request of one of its members,) which held its meetings in Bow Lane, having commenced its existence about the year 1706. It was, we find, to the conduct of certain members of this meeting, that Freher's remarks applied, in the quotation inserted pp. 582—5, and not as we have supposed and stated hitherto, to the 'Philadelphian Society,' with which this body had no connexion, though it would appear their objects were not dissimilar. And Mr. Law we have reason to conclude, was likewise mistaken in the statements of his letter to Mr. Penny, before given, the objects of his censures being undoubtedly the individuals referred to by Freher in these letters and the recent quotation; whom Mr. Law, when transcribing these writings, might have supposed to have been Philadelphians, but which was not the case, as is clearly evident from one of the original letters we hold, dated Nov. 24th. 1712, of a correspondent of that assembly, residing in Scotland, one James Inglis, and from Freher's reply to the said Mr. Inglis, dated Sep. 20th. 1715. Nor is this meeting of the number of those mentioned or referred to in Roach's treatises.—What we would call attention to in these EPISTLES, is their pure and illuminated evangelical character, in reference to personal holiness, the nature and blessedness of the communion of saints, and the duties of members of a Gospel Society, as likewise exposing the delusions and sinful proceedings of a certain individual, who is referred to in the above-mentioned extract. But we find we must defer the publication of these most edifying Epistles, until another opportunity; merely observing, that if convenience had allowed, we should have inserted them in this place, and that in this place and relation the Candidate should turn to, and carefully peruse them: which will introduce his spirit out of the coldness and insensibility of abstract mystical study, into the warm sunshine and refreshingness of heavenly light and life.

We now terminate the present POSTSCRIPT, which has run out to an extent of which we had not any conception* on its commencement, (at p. 188,) but which seemed to grow naturally as we proceeded, the contents appearing necessary in order to the accomplishment of our design by this work. And with it also, the SECTION.

END OF SECTION SECOND.

* The same remarks will apply also to the preceding Section, it being our supposition and intent, on commencing printing (for the getting up of the matter was almost simultaneous with the

SECTION III.

We now resume the immediate subject of the present work, (from which we broke away on page third into a large digression, which has continued we may say up to the close of the last Section,) relative to the literary and other qualifications needful for the editorship of the proposed biography.

The treatises numbered I, II, III, IV, V, VI, are then to be regarded as general models for the style of writing, and the earnest and serious spirit alluded to in the Advertisement, taking care withal (we would add) that the particular subject-word or words of each sentence or proposition, as well as those upon which the argument may rest or turn, be placed in italic letters, with special words or nouns according to their relative dignity or importance, in large or small capital letters: in the former respect, as in Mr. Law's early writings and "Case of Reason," and in the latter, somewhat after the manner (though improved and more determined) pursued in that ingenious and admirable little work, Dr. Fordyce's "Elements of Moral Philosophy." So that indeed, the reader, (as a talented musician with a piece of music before him properly marked,) may perceive at a glance, the relations of all the several divisions, sentences and words, thoughts, propositions and arguments, of the discourse, both to each other and to the conclusion: which may thus be an exact spoken 'word,' platform, mirror and embodiment of the entire just conception, ratiocination and judgment of the writer.

To those who are not already conversant with the writings which are thus offered as general models of style, it may be simply observed, that "great ease, purity, copiousness and correctness, place them among the purest and printing of it, having formed but a general scheme of our projected work,) to comprise what we might have to offer, in some five or six sheets; but as we proceeded we found it necessary, to do justice to the subject and in regard to the reader, to enter into elucidations, which also induced further notices, and hence the Section became enlarged to its present dimensions. But notwithstanding the imperfections of the entire work, as we consider it will tend to effect the purpose contemplated by it, we are content to let it remain, and so proceed with our task. Had we waited until we might have been able to produce a faultless work of the same purport, we feel assured we should never have done anything, but have left the world as unacquainted with the rich treasures of divine wisdom and knowledge that have been given to it by the counsel and grace of God, as we found it; or rather had we been able to compose in that perfection of logic and rhetoric, which we understand and see to be needful, the present preliminary treatise would have been needless; for we ourselves should have done what we seek to obtain by means of it. But our talent is confined to the architectural science for a work such as is desired, and deemed needful for the age, (embracing a systematic universal revelation of the mystery of Nature and her developments, as of "God and the Father, and Christ,") and to the searching-out and collecting together all the needful materials for its construction, from indeed the richest quarries and mines and the first workshops and schools; the mechanical or handicraft portion of the labour being not in our ability. And this our calling we have endeavoured to perform faithfully, having been singularly aided therein by the Divine providence, and our faith and hope is that our labour will not be in vain in the Lord, but that thereby, finally, Divine wisdom and Christian truth, revealed through Behmen, shall flourish to the ends of the earth, and all nations come to know the Lord, even Jesus Christ. We may just remind the reader, that the last Section, as to its contents, was originally purposed to form an Annotation to the following Section III, as a further elucidation and development of the holy spiritual life, which is especially referred to therein, as necessary to be experienced and understood by the Candidate, to do justice to his subject; as in fact all that we have stated from p. 3 is of the same character, to initiate him into the qualifications for that same end. Having therefore cleared the way by what has thus been presented, the remainder of our task will necessarily be very brief and simple, though we may deem it proper, as we proceed, again to enlarge, where the best interests of mankind may appear concerned in what could be appropriately offered and suggested.

most classic models of English composition; whilst for pregnancy of wit, poignancy of irony, power of ridicule without ever entrenching upon the dignity of the subject, dexterity of argument, and justness of conclusion, they stand unrivalled." A Whately, or some other modern professor of logic or the belles-lettres, may have a more oily smoothness of diction, or even a more refined individual characteristic of the aggregate of those which distinguish Mr. Law's compositions, but for the accomplished qualifications we have above and previously named, as combined in his talent, not to mention his masculine sense, and the musical cadency and natural aspiration of his periods, we do not remember to have met with any writer, that may be compared with him, or whose style may be so justly held up as a standard of pure English and general literary excellence. Nor can any be expected to write like him on moral and religious topics, philosophically or casuistically, unless they shall have been well-grounded in youth and early manhood, in the same solid and enlightened, ancient ascetic principles, and Spartan discipline of wisdom and piety.

We incidentally mentioned on page 4, a number of treatises as advisable to be studied by the Candidate, if not well versed in evangelical science, prior to entering upon the consideration of the Works of Behmen, a view of the contents of which was then about to be presented; and in our Second Section we inserted a large Catalogue of writers upon spiritual truth—each it is true according to his own peculiar mode of apprehension. We have now to say, in reference to the theological qualifications for the editorship of the Work contemplated by the present treatise, that it will be of absolute necessity for the Candidate to master the scope of understanding of these writings; so that the diversified spiritual erudition, the profound and accomplished Christian science and experience contained in them, may be blended with the exalted views and purified principles of holiness of the aforesaid models of style, (as so many additional beauties and odours in a refreshing nosegay,) and the concentrated spirit of the whole be ingeniously transfused through every page of the work in question.—But as the number of such authors and treatises is so great; and as what is sufficient for the Candidate to acquire in such respect, may be derived from the study of a well chosen few from amongst them, we shall here enumerate such a selection for his guidance, referring him for more extensive variety to the Catalogue itself. He may also consult for the like purpose, more recent treatises of spiritual piety in the French, German and English languages.

The particular objects of these selections will be found described annexed to each as with their predecessors in the series (pages 1 and 2,) and by the due perusal and study thereof, in the order in which they are set forth, the Candidate we say, may get his mind thoroughly imbued with the perfect principles of evangelical sanctity, free from partial, abusive, sectarian dogmas and opinions; for he is recommended to pass over all merely Romish, or indeed Protestant peculiarities of doctrine, crudities and idiosyncrasies, that he may meet with in his researches, and to simply extract from each work, the pure Christian honey and edifying instruction contained therein.—And such a ground of qualification we may remark is needful, not only to do justice to the personal subject or subjects of the memorial, but with regard to the world at large, inasmuch as the work is proposed to be rendered a kind of standard text book of divine science, elemental and recondite, in all its solid theoretic and practical diversities, with rules and directions for its attainment, all being set forth in the purest classic simplicity.

One very important result we may mention, to be expected from the proposed work, if duly executed, will be the refinement and exaltation of the genius of Methodism, which is undeniably the most advanced system of practical

[After an interval of fifteen months, this work resumed, July, 1858.]

evangelism that this country has ever witnessed; by which however, we would intimate, as well the spirit of religious philanthropy now so universally operative, (originated instrumentally by it,) as the religious principles more immediately designated by that name. This simple system of practical Gospel doctrine, and of preaching and applying the same, being crossed, so to speak, with the large and diversified erudition and experiences of the great masters of spiritual science of former ages, of the ascetic and mystic schools, and further sublimated with the maturing light of Theosophy, may no longer remain a mere elementary and dogmatic theology, adapted to the masses of our own country or heathen lands, who can receive and believe without rational demonstration, and who, indeed, for the most part, are incapable of logical and metaphysical research, (of tracing back all the issues of a conclusion into the premises, or the perfect development of the premises in the conclusion, so as to know assuredly the beginning and the end to be one; or again of discerning whether the tendered and received doctrines of faith, in all their parts and involutions, be in harmony or identical with natural and infallible abstract truth,—) but, we say, be exalted into a perfect philosophy, or complete logical science, commending and approving itself by the highest demonstration; not only of rational elucidation, from the ground of nature, and a clear interpretation of the signatures and forms of its science and qualities in its vegetations; but also by the display and evidence of a complete mastership over all the manifested powers of the dark principle, transmuting by a touch, (or by a mere act of the will upon a right subject,) all their predominant evil qualification, only into more sublime vitality. All which was continually referred to by our Lord, as being the natural prerogatives of his faithful, illuminate, perfect disciples, after the redemption and glorification of the humanity; and confirmed by him after his resurrection from the dead, as summarily related at the close of St. Mark's Gospel.—Then we say, shall the Gospel be rightly and fully preached, and no rational understanding (whether of the East or the West,) on hearing it, (Rom. x. 8—17.) shall be able to gain-say or resist the belief of it. Then, as we have observed, may Missionaries go forth, who shall be capable of meeting the honest objections and just demands of the most refined rationalist or inveterate sceptic, by demonstrating (as well to his senses, as to his understanding, soul and spirit,) the verities of the Christian faith, and the identity thereof with the universal voice of nature: (which is perhaps embraced in the scope of the prophetic declaration inserted in the Note of page 496.)

The following then is the selection of Works in question, the distinguishing edifying sentiments and spirit of which, the Candidate will make his own, so as to incorporate them (so far as they may be original) with those of the treatises, already presented as models of style.

DE RANCE'. SANCTITY of the MONASTIC STATE. 2 Vols. 12mo. Dublin, 1830 ;—regarding therein what is of the essence of Christianity, or of expedient Christian practise ; and imbibing its earnest and serious spirit.

To form a right foundation for the high superstructure of a perfect Christian, regenerate, divine life. In the first place, inducing in the mind a profound and piercing conviction of the vanity and emptiness of all worldly things, and of the degraded sinful state of the humanity by nature ; and therewith an earnest conversion of the soul to God. Secondly, to arm the mind with a stedfast immovable purpose, to follow Christ fully, in his process of the regeneration ; in the way of his precepts, counsels, and example,—the narrow way, the way of the cross, the way of faith ; as being the one only true and direct way, from defilement to purity, from sin to holiness, from darkness to light, from death to life. And thirdly, to furnish the soul with principles to walk manfully and surely in that way ;—that is, in the perfect spirit and power of prayer, of self-denial, of contempt of the world, of divine love and universal charity ; of humility, of patience, of meekness, long suffering, obedience, silence and resignation ; in heavenly foretastes of the world to come, in absolute trust and dependance upon God, with all that is earthly and temporal—all the goods and evils of the present life, under the feet.

In elucidation of the manner, more or less perfect, according to the light with which they were favoured, in which devoted souls have walked, in the process of regeneration or way of faith. And how according to their peculiar complexions and dispositions, (having first sought and found the kingdom of God and his righteousness,) they have been led out to serve their neighbour and the world. But especially may herein be studied the secret arts and instruments of entire sanctification, even to the utter destruction of self love and self-will in the spirit of the soul, and the attainment of that purity of heart which alone can see God. In fine, to lead the soul by a natural process, of a self-conscious, experimental growth of regeneration, up to the very vestibule of the temple of Wisdom—the supersensual, intellective or divine life.

The order of regeneration is divided by the mystic doctors, and that very justly, into the purgative, the illuminative, and the unitive states; but, as such must be the actual course of experience of all the truly and fully regenerate, we, in this serial order of study, have made provision for the soul to progress (surely) to that end according to its own natural complexion and constitution, rather than to confine it to a certain form of growth or advancement. And in support of our views, we refer the reader to the remarks in italics, at the head of the note of p. 166, supra.

Pure Foods. Here to read some standard treatises on the necessity of pure diets, or a pure fuel for the fire of life, and indeed of an universal cleanness, in order (in common with the spiritual exercises of earnest religion,) to the regeneration, or purification and sublimation of the humanity, according to the true scope of the gospel. Also, to examine some works treating of high Indian, Persian, &c. religious virtue and piety; and likewise, concerning the real purificative rites, and inductive physical and mental training* of the ancient vestal pythoneses, sibyls, &c.

Popular Experimental Transcendentalism, or, Animal Magnetism, with its subsequent inductions. To peruse, in this place, Dr. Haddock's PSYCHEISM and SOMNOLISM, 12mo. London, 1851.—Also, Dr. Gregory's LETTERS on ANIMAL MAGNETISM, 12mo. London, 1851, with other sober treatises, both home and foreign, elucidatory of modern developments and accidental discoveries of the Magic philosophy. And along therewith, to witness some really good cases of Magical sleep, trance, &c., with lucid clairvoyance.

After having gone quite through the present division of study, (referring likewise again to the Notes of pp. 522—24, 549, 550, 553, 556, 559, and of 467—9, 464, 449, 495, and to the text of pp. 320, supra, &c.) the Candidate will perceive its scope and object; as opening out to him a glimpse of the whole field of the natural and divine Magic, and of the accidental entrances therein made by the astral spirit and by faith, up to the present time; besides enabling him to advocate with superlative force of reason and earnestness of zeal, the necessity of the establishment of Theosophic Colleges, in regard to the perfect triumphs of the Gospel. Which should be, not mere ancient schools of the prophets, but brilliant evangelical seminaries, worthy of the age, for the training of children of God in high perfection of sanctity and wisdom, even to the matured apprehension and exercise of those angelical arts and powers, which are the prerogatives of the regenerate humanity.

The considerations that will ensue upon a review of this particular of study will also elucidate the original doctrines and mysteries of Christianity, of imposition of hands (by a regenerate and official medium,) of baptism,

* The antiquity of Mystical Theology (writes the Editor of the Theosophical Transactions, in commenting upon the above treatise, of ASCETICKS,) is here derived down from Noah; and the instances of Melchisedec, Abimelech, the two Pharaohs, Jethro the Midianite, Rebekah, Balaam, and Job, with his friends, are adduced to prove, that it was anciently believed in all nations, that there were means whereby men and women might come to have some acquaintance and communication with God. The tradition and succession hereof through the Colleges of the Prophets, among the Jews; through the Priestly colleges of the eastern Magi, among the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and Arabians; and through the Pythagorean and Platonic schools,—were it accurately and judiciously done, would be a considerable work; but this is not to be expected within a few sheets. And as for the media which the Gentiles did use, to attain the intimacies and communications of their peculiar Deities, or of the Soul of the world, or of the supreme Demi-urgus and Creator, a particular and distinct explication thereof, would necessarily lead us into a disquisition concerning the ancient Theurgic mysteries.

What was the spirit of Plotinus and Iamblicus, what also the spirit of Porphyry, cannot thoroughly be understood without a more than ordinary insight into these. The Porphyrian spirit is a very great mystery. But as it is in witchcraft, or in demoniacal obsessions, so also is it here. The evil dæmons are able to do nothing of themselves: it is Nature that works all, and produces those strange and wonderful operations. They also know how to apply actives to passives, and leave her to bring about what they design; to which the present corrupt state of nature is subservient, and wherewith they fail not to add somewhat of their own malice. (This Note is to be considered as appended or applicable to other references and remarks of this Ninth Division of study.)

Here, may be perused with advantage, Law, on the Sacrament.—(Query, who or what the stranger that accosted Behmen when a youth, in so impressive a manner, (as related in his Life,) after having purchased of him ■ pair of shoes? and what ensued therefrom? Also, respecting the silver platter, by the lustre of which, reflected upon him, it is stated, he became immediately entranced, with ‘double consciousness,’ into the deepest ground of nature; he however being manifestly prepared for such ■ revelation?)

To peruse carefully the judicious Notes of the first Volume, and a few of the second volume, concerning the astral magic, somnambulist, alchemic, and Swedenborgian delusionism, &c.—The Candidate may in this place, further conceive respecting the glorious manifestations that might be expected in and by the divinely illumined subjects of a right Theosophic College.

Also, his Abstract of the Mysterium Magnum.]

The object of this ninth division of study, in the series, has already been sufficiently intimated, viz. to afford to the so advanced student and candidate,

■ knowledge of all the science and art which has hitherto been revealed and discovered in regard to the high sublimation of the human life, and of the true and lawful mode whereby to advance steadily to the very central throne of the divine revelation, even to become a holy artist, a lord, a prince over nature, to the praise and glory of God.—For the humanity, as before observed, being now fully redeemed, man is therefore capable of a transcendently exalted spiritual renovation and illumination, (and if of a spiritual, then of an outward and physical,) even of an Enochian life on earth! And therefore it ought to be the aim of the enlightened Christian, to press on to this high perfection, —to prove the arts of paradisical horticulture, first in himself, with his own life and intellect, and then to raise up others to the same faith and inward glory: which again confers upon man de facto as well as de jure, his original prerogatives of dominion over all temporal creatures, and to open the latent powers of God and scientz of the Divine Wisdom in everything.—Our Lord spake to his wondering disciples to this purport, Ye seem surprised at what I now effect, deeming it a miracle: verily, far greater works than these shall ye (my faithful, theosophic disciples) do, after my ascension. St. Paul also, in the same scope of apprehension, observes, Henceforth know we no believer after the flesh . . . (but only as members of a God of glory in heaven.) And again, For ye are come &c. Hebrews xii. 22—24. And what St. John declares, respecting the paradisical glories of the New Jerusalem, i. e. of that Christianity, in which we are all set and growing up, if of the regeneration, needs not to be particularized in this place.

(Conclusion.)

Such, then, are the series of works which are deemed calculated to afford to the Candidate, a correct general apprehension of the profound and universal theological science of the chief subject of our proposed standard Biography. As likewise, a conception of his far-seeing fideal realizations of the effects that should flow from his own Elias-restoring, Baptist-purifying ministration: not only in the general diffusion of a simple practical gospel christianity among the unsophisticate of the earth, as we behold in progress in our day; but also with regard to the induction of the intellectual aliens and unbelievers of all nations into the Christian faith,—which is yet to be effected, as the final result of the revelation of the mystery in Behmen, and of the refinement of all natural knowledge, philosophy and theology, arts and sciences, which has ensued as a consequence or development of it.

These writings are then to be devoutly studied, until the mind be thoroughly imbued with the divine science and heavenly wisdom contained in them; whereby to expand and strengthen the purified principles and just and elevated views contained in the works prescribed as models of style.

As a suitable close to these remarks, and to the present Section, the following Fragment is offered to the Candidate's consideration:—

“It is for want of considering religion as a new nature, an inward life, a seed of God, a plant of paradise, and therefore as something that is to be nursed and cherished, to be cultivated and raised up to perfection; as something that is to be made part of our business, that is to be improved with care and contrivance, by art and method, and a diligent use of the best helps and most expedient means or instruments; it is for want of considering it in this light, that so many people are so little benefited by it, and live and die strangers to that interior renovation or new birth prescribed to them in their baptism, that spirit of holiness, purity and heavenly love, which, by a prudent use of proper means, they might have enjoyed in a supereminent degree.

For though the spirit of holiness is the gift of God, and not attainable by any mere power of our own, yet it is mostly given, and never withheld from those who, by a wise and diligent use of proper means, prepare themselves for the reception of it.

And it is amazing to see how eagerly men of science and business employ their parts, their sagacity, time, study, application, and exercise—how all helps are called to their assistance, when anything is intended and desired in worldly matters; and how dull, negligent, and unimproved they are—how little they use their parts, sagacity, and abilities, to quicken and cultivate the incorruptible seed of grace, of the Word and Spirit of God, (which is the source or root of all holiness, truth, heavenly life and divine knowledge), sown in the soul.

Mundanus is a man of excellent parts, and clear apprehension. He is well advanced in age, and has made a great figure in business. Every part of trade and business that has fallen in his way has had some improvement from him; and he is always contriving to carry every method of doing anything well to its greatest height. Mundanus aims at the greatest perfection in every thing. The soundness and strength of his mind, and his just way of thinking upon things, make him intent upon removing all imperfections.

He can tell you all the defects and errors in all the common methods whether of trade, building, or improving land or manufactures. The clearness and strength of his understanding, which he is constantly improving by continual exercise in these matters—by often digesting his thoughts in writing, and trying every thing every way—has rendered him a great master of most concerns in human life.

Thus has Mundanus gone on increasing his knowledge and judgment as fast as his years came upon him.

The only thing which has not fallen under his improvement, nor received any benefit from his judicious mind, is his devotion. This is just in the same poor state it was when he was only six years of age.

Thus Mundanus, who hardly ever saw the poorest utensil, or ever took the meanest trifle into his hand, without considering how it might be made or used to better advantage, has gone on all his life long, without ever considering how improvable the spirit of devotion is, how many helps a man may call to his assistance, and how necessary it is that our prayers should be enlarged, varied and suited to the particular state and condition of our souls.

Now how poor and pitiable is the conduct of this man of sense, who has so much judgment and understanding in everything, but that which is the whole wisdom of man!

And how miserably do many people, who pass for persons of genius, more or less imitate this conduct!

All which seems to be owing to a strange infatuated state of negligence, which keeps people from considering what religion is. For if they did but once proceed so far, as to reflect about it, or ask themselves any questions concerning it, they would soon see, that the spirit of religion, (i. e. the spirit of love, with its fruits of perfect humility, meekness, patience, and resignation to God.) that this was like any other sense or understanding, that is only to be improved by study, care, application, and the use of such means and helps, as are necessary to make a man a proficient in any art or science.—

Again, Classicus is a man of learning, and well versed in all the best authors of antiquity. He has read them so much, that he is entered into their spirit, and can very ingeniously imitate the manner of any of them. All their thoughts are his thoughts, and he can express himself in their language. He is so great a friend to this improvement of the mind, that if he lights of a young scholar he never fails to advise him concerning his studies.

Classicus tells his young man, he must not think that he has done enough, when he has only learnt languages; but that he must be daily conversant with the best authors read them again and again, catch their spirit by living with them, and that there is no other way of becoming like them, or of making himself a man of taste and judgment.

How wise might Classicus have been, and how much good might he have done in the world, if he had but thought as justly of devotion, as he does of learning?

He never, indeed, says anything shocking or offensive about devotion, because he never thinks or talks about it. It suffers nothing from him, but neglect and disregard.

The two testaments would not have had so much as a place amongst his books, but that they are both to be had in Greek.

Classicus thinks that he sufficiently shows his regard for the Holy Scriptures, when he tells you, that he has no other book of piety besides them.

It is very well, Classicus, that you prefer the bible to all other books of piety; he has no judgment that is not thus far of your opinion.

But if you will have no other book of piety besides the Bible, because it is the best, how comes it Classicus, that you do not content yourself with one of the best books among the Greeks and Romans? How comes it that you are so greedy after all of them? How comes it that you think the knowledge of one is a necessary help to the knowledge of the other? How comes it that you are so earnest, so laborious, so expensive of time and your money, to restore broken periods and scraps of the ancients?

How comes it that you read so many commentators upon Cicero, Horace, and Homer, and not anything upon the high, heavenly, Divine spirit of the gospel? How comes it that your love of Cicero and Ovid makes you love to read an author who writes like them; and yet your esteem for the gospel gives you no desire, nay prevents your reading such spiritual books as breathe the very spirit of the gospel?

How comes it that you tell your young scholar he must not content himself with barely understanding his authors, but must be continually reading them all, as the only means of entering into their spirit, and forming his own judgment according to them?

Why, then, must the Bible lie alone in your study? Is not the spirit of the saints, are not the holy contemplative exercises and practical piety of the devoted followers of Jesus Christ, as good and necessary means of entering into the spirit and taste of the gospel, as the reading of the ancients is of entering into the spirit of antiquity?

Is the spirit of poetry to be enkindled by much reading of poets and orators? And is not the spirit of devotion to be also assisted in the same way; by a frequent reading and meditation upon the holy thoughts and pious strains of devout and heavenly-minded men?

Is your young poet to search after every line that may give new wings to his fancy, or direct his imagination?

And is it not as reasonable for him who desires to advance in the divine life, to study all the certain means of sanctification and purity; to imitate Jesus Christ, in his spirit of entire self-denial, renunciation of the world, and devotion to God; to live by strict rule, to rise early, to watch, to fast, and to pray without ceasing, to walk in fellowship with the people of God, and heartily join in every pious and charitable exercise that may strengthen and perfect the Spirit of heaven in the soul.

Do you advise your Orator to translate the best orations, to commit much of them to memory, to be frequently exercising his talent in this manner, that habits of thinking and speaking justly may be formed in his mind? And is there not a similar benefit and advantage to be derived from books of spiritual piety, hymns and devotions? Should not a man use them in the same way, that the spirit of perfect charity may be well formed and well supported in his soul, and that he may be enabled powerfully to awaken, to edify, and inflame the hearts of others with the love of God, and all holiness and purity of life,—by the deep experience and piercing vigour of his discourses, and the seraphic ardours of his devotions.

Now the reason why Classicus does not think and judge thus reasonably of devotion, is owing to his never thinking of it in any other manner, than as repeating a form of words. It never in his life entered into his head, to think of devotion or religion as a state of the heart, as an improvable talent of the mind, as a seed of the Divine life, that is to grow and increase, (like our reason and judgment,) and to be formed and raised up to perfection, to the stature of a man in Christ Jesus, by such a regular, diligent use of proper means, as are necessary to form any wise habit or temper of mind.”

Thus much by way of suggestion to the Candidate and general reader.

APPENDIX.

“It is manifest to me that all our education must be Christian, and not be sectarian.”—DR. ARNOLD. See Life, Vol. ii. p. 23.

As the present treatise may perchance fall into the hands of some who have the direction of Education in this country, who would cheerfully assist in the establishment of a system of tuition wholly based upon the purest and most enlightened principles of Christianity,—somewhat analogous, indeed, in respect to the cultivation of pure wisdom and perfecting self-discipline, to that of the ancient Egyptian, Pythagorean and Platonic schools; or, of that magnificent institution which arose under the rule of the Romish episcopacy, in the sixteenth century of Christianity, and which, during the brilliant period of its early and healthy existence, may be said to have left no degrees of lofty sanctity unattained, or of practical piety unfamiliar to the world; “no treasures of knowledge unexplored, and no field of literature uncultivated,” and all from a pure seraphic regard to the greater glory of God; (or again, to that still later refined institute of Port Royal des Champs, near Paris,—) the following General Hints and Suggestions how to begin the experiment, without entrenching upon the existing educational studies, are here subjoined for consideration, as an Appendix to the present Section, and having reference to the leading subject of this work:—

But the thing I now mean, the education that I here intend, is such as were to be expected from virtuous and wise parents and learned and devout tutors and governors in a Christian country.

Had we continued perfect as God created the first man, perhaps the perfection of our nature had been sufficient self-instruction for every one. But as sickness and diseases have created the necessity of medicines and physicians, so the change and disorder of our rational nature have introduced the necessity of education and tutors.

And as the only end of the physician is to restore nature to its own state, so the only end of education is, to restore our rational nature to its proper state. Education therefore is to be considered as reason borrowed at second-hand, which is, as far as it can, to supply the loss of original perfection. And as physis may justly be called the art of restoring health, so education should be considered in no other light, than as the art of recovering to man the use of his reason.

Now as the instruction of every art or science is founded upon the discoveries, the wisdom, experience and maxims of the several great men who have laboured in it; so human wisdom or right use of our reason, which young people should be called to by their education, is nothing else but the best experience, and finest reasonings of men, that have devoted themselves to the study of wisdom, and the improvement of human nature.

All therefore that great saints, and dying men, when the fullest of light and conviction, and after the highest improvement of their reason, all that they have said of the necessity of piety, of the excellency of virtue, of their duty to God, of the emptiness of riches, of the vanity of the world; all the sentences, judgements, reasonings, and maxims of the wisest of philosophers, when in their highest state of wisdom, should constitute the common lessons of instruction for youthful minds.

This is the only way to make the young and ignorant part of the world the better for the wisdom and knowledge of the wise and ancient.

An education which is not wholly intent upon this, is as much beside the point, as an art of physic, that had little or no regard to the restoration of health.

The youths that attended upon Pythagoras, Socrates, Plato, and Epictetus, were thus educated. Their every day lessons and instructions were so many lectures upon the nature of man, his true end, and the right use of his faculties; upon the immortality of the soul, its relation to God, the beauty of virtue, and its agreeableness to the divine nature; upon the dignity of reason, the necessity of temperance, fortitude, and generosity, and the shame and folly of indulging our passions.

Now as Christianity has, as it were, new created the moral and religious world, and set every thing that is reasonable, wise, holy, and desirable, in its true point of light; so one would expect, that the education of youth should be as much bettered and amended by Christianity, as the faith and doctrines of religion are amended by it.

As it has introduced such a new state of things, and so fully informed us of the nature of man, the ends of his creation, the state of his condition; as it has fixed all our goods and evils, taught us the means of purifying our souls, pleasing God, and becoming eternally happy; one might naturally suppose, that the government of every Christian country would take care and see that it abounded with schools for the teaching, not only a few questions and answers of a catechism, but for the actual forming, training, and practising all our rising youth in such an outward course of life, as the highest precepts, the strictest rules, and the sublimest doctrines of Christianity require.

An education under Pythagoras, or Socrates, had no other end but to teach youth to think, judge, act, and follow such rules of life, as Pythagoras and Socrates used.

And is it not as reasonable to suppose, that a Christian education should have no other end, but to teach youth how to think, and judge, and act, and live according to the strictest laws of Christianity?

At least one would suppose, that in all Christian schools the teaching youth to begin their lives in the spirit of Christianity, in such severity of behaviour, such abstinence, sobriety, humility, and devotion, as Christianity requires, should not only be more, but an hundred times more regarded, than any or all things else.

For our education should imitate our guardian angels, suggest nothing to our minds but what is wise and holy; help us to discover and subdue every vain passion of our hearts, and every false judgment of our minds.

And it is as sober and reasonable to expect and require all this benefit of a Christian education, as to require that physic should strengthen all that is right in our nature, and remove that which is sickly and diseased.

But alas! our modern education is not of this kind.

The first temper that we try to awaken in children, is pride; as dangerous a passion as that of lust. We stir them up to vain thoughts of themselves, and do every thing we can, to puff up their minds with a sense of their own abilities.

(1.) To instance, in the first place, in our sons; whatever way of life we intend them for, we apply to the fire and vanity of their minds, and exhort them to everything from corrupt motives. We stir them up to action from principles of strife and ambition from glory, envy, and a desire of distinction, that they may excel others, and shine in the eyes of the world.

We repeat and inculcate these motives upon them, till they think it a part of their duty to be proud, envious, and vainglorious of their own accomplishments.

And when we have taught them to scorn to be outdone by any, to bear no rival, to thirst after every instance of applause; to be content with nothing but the highest distinctions; then we begin to take comfort in them, and promise the world some mighty things from youths of such a glorious spirit.

If children are intended for holy orders, we set before them some eminent orator, whose fine preaching has made him the admiration of the age, and carried him through all the dignities and preferments of the Church.

We encourage them to have these honours in their eye, and to expect the reward of their studies from them.

If the youth is intended for a trade, we bid him look at all the rich men of the same trade, and consider how many now are carried about in their stately carriages who began in the same low degree as he now does. We awaken his ambition and endeavour to give his mind a right turn, by often telling him how very rich such and such a tradesman died.

If he is to be a lawyer, then we set great counsellors, Lords, Judges, and Chancellors, before his eyes. We tell him what great fees, and great applause attend fine pleading. We exhort him to take fire at these things, to raise a spirit of emulation in himself, and to be content with nothing less than the highest honours of the long robe.

That this is the nature of our best education, is too plain to need any proof; and I believe there are few parents, but would be glad to see these instructions daily given to their children.

And after all this, we complain of the effects of pride; we wonder to see grown men actuated and governed by ambition, envy, scorn, and a desire of glory; not considering that they were all the time of their youth called upon, to all their action and industry upon the same principles.

You teach a child to scorn to be outdone, to thirst for distinction and applause; and is it any wonder that he continues to act all his life in the same manner?

Now if a youth is ever to be so far a Christian, as to govern his heart by the doctrines of humility, I would fain know at what time he is to begin it; or if he is ever to begin it at all, why we train him up in views and tempers quite contrary to it?

How dry and poor must the doctrine of humility sound to a youth, that has been spurred up to all his industry by ambition, envy, emulation, and a desire of glory and distinction? And if he is not to act by these principles when he is a man, why do we call him to act by them in his youth?—

Envy is acknowledged by all people, to be the most ungenerous, base and wicked passion, that can enter into the heart of man.

And is this a temper to be instilled, nourished and established in the minds of young people?

I know it is said, that it is not envy, but emulation, that is intended to be awakened in the minds of young men.

But this is vainly said. For when children are taught to bear no rival, and to scorn to be outdone by any of their age, they are plainly and directly taught to be envious. For it is impossible for any one to have this scorn of being outdone, and this contention with rivals, without burning with envy against all those that seem to excel him, or get any distinction from him. So that what children are taught, is rank envy, and only covered with a name of a less odious sound.

Secondly, If envy is thus confessedly bad, and it be only emulation that is endeavoured to be awakened in children, surely there ought to be great care taken, that children may know the one from the other. That they may abominate the one as a great crime, whilst they give the other admission into their minds.

But if this were to be attempted, the fineness of the distinction betwixt envy and emulation, would shew that it was easier to divide them into words, than to separate them in action.

For emulation, when it is defined in its best manner, is nothing else but a refinement upon envy, or rather the most plausible part of that black and venomous passion.

And though it is easy to separate them in the notion yet the most acute philosopher or schoolman that understands the art of distinguishing ever so well, if he gives himself up to emulation, will certainly find himself deep in envy.

For envy is not an original temper, but the natural, necessary, and unavoidable effect of emulation, or a desire of glory.

So that he who establishes the one in the minds of people, necessarily fixes the other there. And there is no other possible way of destroying envy, but by destroying emulation, or a desire of glory. For the one always rises and falls in proportion to the other.—

I know it is said in defence of this method of education, that ambition, and a desire of glory, are necessary to excite young people to industry; and that if we were to press upon them the doctrines of humility, we should deject their minds, and sink them into dulness and idleness.

But these people who say this, do not consider, that this reason, if it has any strength, is full as strong against pressing the doctrines of humility upon grown men, lest we should deject the minds, and sink them into dulness and idleness.

For who does not see that middle-aged men want as much the assistance of pride, ambition, and vain-glory, to spur them up to action and industry, as children do? And it is very certain, that the precepts of humility are more contrary to the designs of such men, and more grievous to their minds, when they are pressed upon them, than they are to the minds of young persons.

This reason therefore that is given, why children should not be trained up in the principles of true humility, is as good a reason why the same humility should never be required of grown men, and at once goes to uproot Christianity.

Thirdly, Let those people, who think that children would be spoiled, if they were not thus educated, consider this.

Could they think, that if any children had been educated by our blessed Lord, or his holy Apostles, that their minds would have been sunk into dulness and idleness?

Or could they think, that such children would not have been trained up in the profoundest principles of a strict and true humility? Can they say that our blessed Lord, who was the meekest and humblest man that ever was on earth, was hindered by his humility from being the greatest example of worthy and glorious actions, that ever were done by man?

Can they say that his Apostles, who lived in the humble spirit of their master, did therefore cease to be laborious and active instruments of doing good to all the world?

A few such reflections as these, are sufficient to expose all the poor pretences for an education, such as the Christian world at present bestows upon its sons.

(2.) And then with respect to the education of daughters. That turn of mind which is taught and encouraged in the education of daughters, makes it exceeding difficult for them to enter into such a sense and practice of humility, as the spirit of Christianity requireth.

The right education of the sex is of the utmost importance to human life. There is nothing that is more desirable for the common good of all the world. For though women do not carry on the trade and business of the world, yet as they are mothers, and mistresses of families, that have for some time the care of the education of their children of both sorts, they are entrusted with that which is of the greatest consequence to human life. For this reason, good or bad, women are likely to do as much good or harm in the world, as good or bad men in the greatest business of life.

For as the health and strength, or weakness, of our bodies, is very much owing to their methods of treating us when we were young; so the soundness or folly of our minds are not less owing to those first tempers and ways of thinking, which we eagerly received from the love, tenderness, authority, and constant conversation of our mothers.

As we call our first language our mother-tongue, so we may justly call our first tempers our mother-tempers; and perhaps it may be found more easy to forget the language, than to part entirely with those tempers which we learnt in the nursery.

It is therefore much to be lamented, that this sex, on whom so much depends, who have the first forming both of our bodies and our minds, are not only educated in pride, but in the silliest and most contemptible part of it.

They are not indeed suffered to dispute with us the proud prizes of arts and sciences, of learning and eloquence, in which I have much suspicion they would often prove our superiors; but we turn them over to the study of beauty and dress, and the whole world conspires to make them think of nothing else. Fathers and mothers, friends and relations, seem to have no other wish towards the little girl, but that she may have a fair skin, a fine shape, dress well, and dance to admiration.

Now if a fondness for our persons, a desire of beauty, a love of dress, be a part of pride, (as surely it is a most contemptible part of it,) the first step towards a woman's conversion to God, seems to require a repentance of her education.

For it must be owned, that, generally speaking, good parents are never more fond of their daughters, than when they see them too fond of themselves, and dressed in such a manner, as is a great reproach to the gravity and sobriety of the Christian life.

And what makes this matter still more to be lamented, is this, that women are not only spoiled by this education, but we spoil that part of the world, which would otherwise furnish most instances of an eminent and exalted piety.

For I believe it may be affirmed, that for the most part there is a finer sense, a clearer mind, a readier apprehension, and gentler dispositions in that sex, than in the other.

All which tempers, if they were truly improved by proper studies, and sober methods of education, would in all probability carry them to greater heights of piety than are to be found amongst the generality of men.

For this reason I speak to this matter with so much openness and plainness, because it is much to be lamented, that persons so naturally qualified to be great examples of piety, should, by an erroneous education, be made poor and gaudy spectacles of the greatest vanity.

The Church has formerly had eminent saints in that sex; and it may reasonably be thought, that it is purely owing to their poor and vain education, that this honour of their sex is for the most part confined to former ages.

The corruption of the world indulges them in great vanity, and mankind seem to consider them in no other view, than as so many painted idols, that are to allure and gratify their passions; so that if many women are vain, light, gewgaw creatures, they have this to excuse themselves, that they are not only such as their education has made them, but such as the generality of the world allows them to be.

But then they should consider, that the friends to their vanity are no friends of theirs: they should consider, that they are to live for themselves, that they have as great a share in the rational nature as men have; that they have as much reason to pretend, and as much necessity to aspire after the highest accomplishments of a Christian and solid virtue, as the gravest and wisest amongst Christian philosophers.

They should consider that they are abused and injured, and betrayed from their only perfection, whenever they are taught, that any thing is an ornament in them, that is not an ornament in the wisest amongst mankind.

It is generally said, that women are naturally of little and vain minds; but this I look upon to be as false and unreasonable, as to say, that butchers are naturally cruel; for as their cruelty is not owing to their nature, but to their way of life, which has changed their nature; so whatever littleness and vanity is to be observed in the minds of women, it is like the cruelty of butchers, a temper that is wrought into them by that life which they are taught and accustomed to lead.

At least thus much must be said, that we cannot charge anything upon their nature, till we take care that it is not perverted by their education.

And on the other hand, if it were true, that they were thus naturally vain and light, then how much more blameable is that education, which seems contrived to strengthen and increase this folly and weakness of their minds? For if it were a virtue in a woman to be proud and vain in herself, we could hardly take better means to raise this passion in her, than those that are now used in their education.

Some people that judge hastily, will perhaps here say, that I am exercising too great a severity against the sex.

But more reasonable persons will easily observe, that I entirely spare the sex, and only arraign their education; that I not only spare them, but plead their interest, assert their honour, set forth their perfections, commend their natural tempers, and only condemn that education, which is so injurious to their interests, so debases their honour, and deprives them of the benefit of their excellent natures and tempers.

Their education, I profess, I cannot spare; but the only reason is, because it is their greatest enemy, because it deprives the world of so many blessings, and the Church of so many saints, as might reasonably be expected from persons, so formed by their natural tempers to all goodness and tenderness, and so fitted by the clearness and brightness of their minds, to contemplate, love, and admire everything that is holy, virtuous and divine.

If it should here be said, that I even charge too high upon their education, and that they are not so much hurt by it, as I imagine.

It may be answered, that though I do not pretend to state the exact degree of mischief that is done by it, yet its plain and natural tendency to do harm, is sufficient to justify the most absolute condemnation of it—

And now taking for granted, the reader will be able to infer from the preceding remarks, what is implied by a wise and enlightened Christian education, and the necessity of attempting its establishment in this country,—it is asked, what simpler or more efficient mode can be suggested of introducing the principles (as well as the practice) of exalted wisdom and piety into the now established systems of education, (and at the same time the almost lost invaluable habit of strictly logical thinking, writing and speaking,) than by at once rendering the Tracts as arranged and composing the GRAMMAR OF WISDOM, (see p. 8, 9, supra.) a common every day school book, or grammar of experimental christianity, containing the principles of sound practical piety, and at the same time, the elements of the most sublime Theosophy,—which each pupil from a certain age, should learn by heart, as the classical student learns his Eton grammar, until he can repeat at least the First Part correctly and perfectly.

After the Pupil (or a class of pupils) can repeat by heart the three first chapters, and then nine, and then thirteen, with the conclusion, for so are the Sections of the First Part divided, let him begin to be examined by the Tutor, (for which however, supposing the book to become a regular Class Book, a series of Questions would require to be ingeniously prepared,) in every sentiment, reason, argument, inference, dependence, and connexion of the discourse. This accompanied by critical observations upon the logical construction, the ease, simplicity and rhetorical beauty of the composition; the pure and correct, though high standard of duty and sentiment; the radical exactness of the reasons, and mathematical strictness, so to speak, of the argumentation; the order and mode of the author's procedure, the justness of his conclusions, (and if so be the application of the truths demonstrated;—) the inference leading to the next gradation in the order of thought towards the intended final conclusion;—then the mode of proceeding again, the objections, comprehending all that can be offered, whether they be substantial, or untenable though plausible, or only those of hasty, irrational thinkers, with the answers thereto in logical order; and so on, not failing to strongly impress on the attention of the students, the duties and moral obligations, as they become manifest, in the course of the argumentation. Let the pupils we say, be thus exercised every day, till they really KNOW the several named Sections, and the entire discourse; till the principles, duties, and sentiments thereof, become the very approved natural feelings and reflections of their own minds*; and the logical construction, the objects, the foundation, reasons, arguments,

* In order to engraft their contents clearly and deeply in the mind, the pupils might, as a regular exercise, write them out in an analytical logical form, as in the following attempt:—(See the Serious Call to a Devout Life.)

PROPOSITION.—That it is the duty and happiness of all persons, of all ages and conditions of life, to intend and devote all to the glory of GOD. Required the Demonstration, and the Application of it to common life. (This will give pure religion without sectarianism.)

and conclusions of the whole, be as familiar to their understanding, as the grammar or construction of the Latin language is to a ready classical scholar, or the elements of Euclid or Algebra, to a sound and expert mathematician. (N.B. Our remarks throughout apply equally to both the sexes.)

Being grounded in the rules of composition, which (as the former Questions for examination) would also require to be deduced and illustrated from the entire book, which it is therefore proposed to render, by revision and alteration, a perfect model of elementary argumentative English composition, the Pupil, by way of exercise, might take a whole chapter to pieces, (e. g. as we have represented in the NOTE under-

SECTION FIRST.

Proving that Devotion consists not in prayers, or any particular instances of piety, but in giving and devoting the whole life to GOD.

CHAPTER FIRST.

Concerning the nature and extent of Christian devotion.

- I. 1. DEVOTION is neither private nor public prayer, [Q.E.R.]
 . but prayers whether private or public, are particular parts or instances of devotion,
2. DEVOTION signifies a life given or devoted to GOD.
3. ... HE therefore is the devout man, . who lives no longer to his own will, or the way and spirit of the world, but to the sole will of GOD.
 .. who considers GOD in everything,
 .. who serves GOD in everything,
 .. who makes all the parts of his common life, parts of piety, [1. 1. 32.]
 .. by doing everything in the name of GOD and under such rules as are conformable to him glory.
4. ... WE readily acknowledge . that GOD ALONE is to be the rule and measure of our prayers
 .. that in them we are to look wholly unto him and act wholly for him.
 .. that we are only to pray in such a manner, for such things, and such ends as are suitable to his glory.
5. ... NOW let any one but find out the reason why he is to be strictly pious in prayers, . and he will find the same as strong a reason to be as strictly pious in all the other parts of his life. [Q.E.D.]

Every Theological Student before taking his degree should do neath,) giving the rule for the analysis or the construction ; and then, commencing at the foundation, be directed to build up again the whole superstructure, until it be re-produced, as at first, a solid, well connected, elegant structure. For, as observed, one of the merits of the work (or of which it is capable,) will be found to be that of being composed according to true logical art, where the premises are first laid down undeniably stable, and the conclusions drawn therefrom, with rigid exactness and in regular sequence.

Another important exercise, to go hand in hand with the aforesaid studies, should be the practice of writing essays, embracing and exhibiting solid elementary meta-

6. ... FOR there is not the least shadow of a reason
 - . why we should make GOD the rule and measure of our prayers,
 - .. why we should then look wholly unto him, and pray according to his will,
 - . but what equally proves it necessary for us,
 - . to look wholly unto GOD
 - .. and make him the rule and measure of all the other actions of our life.
7. ... FOR any ways of life,
 - . any employment of our talents, whether of our parts, our time, or money,
 - . that is not strictly according to the will of GOD,
 - .. that is not for such ends as are suitable to his glory,
 - . are as great absurdities and failings as prayers that are not according to the will of GOD.
8. ... FOR there is no other reason
 - (a)
 - . why our prayers should be according to the will of GOD,
 - .. why they should have nothing in them but what is wise, and holy, and heavenly,
 - . there is no other reason for this,
 - . but that our lives may be of the same nature,
 - .. full of the same wisdom, holiness, and heavenly tempers,
 - . that we may live unto GOD in the same spirit that we pray unto him.
 - (b)
 - Were it not our strict duty
 - . to live by reason,
 - . to devote all the actions of our lives to GOD ;
 - . were it not absolutely necessary
 - . to walk before him in wisdom and holiness and all heavenly conversation,
 - . doing everything in his name and for his glory,
 - . there would be no excellency or wisdom in the most heavenly prayers.
 - (c)
 - Nay such prayers would be absurdities ;
 - . they would be like prayers for wings, when it was no part of our duty to fly.
9. ... AS sure therefore as there is any wisdom in praying for the Spirit of GOD, [I. i. 6.]
 - . so sure is it that we are to make that Spirit the rule of all our actions ;
 - . as sure as it is our duty to look wholly unto GOD in our prayers,
 - . so sure is it that it is our duty to live wholly unto God in our lives.
10. ... BUT we can no more be said to live unto GOD
 - . unless we live unto him in all the ordinary actions of our life,
 - .. unless he be the rule and measure of all our ways,
 - . that we can be said to pray unto GOD,
 - . unless our prayers look wholly to him.
11. ... SO that unreasonable and absurd ways of life
 - .. whether in labour or diversion,
 - .. whether they consume our time or our money,
 - .. are like unreasonable and absurd prayers,
 - . and as truly an offence unto GOD. [I. i. 5. Q. Erat D.]
12. ... IT is for want of knowing, or at least considering this, [I. i. 8 (b)]
 - . that we see such a mixture of ridicule in the lives of many people.
13. ... YOU see them strict as to some times and places of devotion,
 - . but when the service of the church is over, they are but like those who seldom or never come there.
 - . In their way of life,
 - .. their manner of spending their time and money,
 - .. in their cares and fears,
 - .. in their pleasures and indulgences,
 - .. in their labours and diversions,
 - . they are like the rest of the world.
14. ... THIS makes the loose part of the world generally make a jest of those that are devout,
 - .. because they see their devotion goes no farther than their prayers,
 - .. and that when they are over, they live no more unto GOD, till the time of prayer returns again ;
 - .. but live by the same humour and fancy, and in as full an enjoyment of all the follies of life, as other people.
15. ... THIS is the reason,
 - . why they are the jest and scorn of careless and worldly people ;
 - .. not because they are really devoted to GOD, physical knowledge, such as clear conceptions and exact definitions of virtues and vices, and their various modifications, possible approximations and other relations; and that from the deepest discovered ground of the nature of things, such as opened in Mr. Law's "Spirit of Love." For instance, upon the distinctions and essential qualifications of love and wrath in the Divine nature, and then in the human spirit, that is in eternal or intellectual nature; or of self-love and divine love, how distinguished and how generated in the mind; and upon such useful practical points, as pride, envy, covetousness, and anger, and their reverse spirits, or opposites, humility, meekness, patience, and resignation to God, &c.,—proceeding gradually from shorter to

16. ... JULIUS is very fearful of missing prayers:
 (a) . all the parish supposes Julius to be sick if he is not at church.
 (b) But if you were to ask him,
 why he spends, &c. &c. &c.

[and so forth, dissecting in the same manner, the remainder of the first Chapter, and then the second and the third chapters.]

SECTION SECOND.

Proving that it is in the several instances and particulars of our common life, that we are to exercise devotion.

CHAPTER FIRST.

We can please GOD in no state or employment of life, but by intending and devoting it all to his honour and glory.

- I. 1. HAVING in the first chapter stated the general nature of devotion, . and shown, that it implies not any form of prayer, [I. i. 9.]
 . but a certain form of life, that is offered to GOD, not at any particular times or places, but . every where and in every thing;
 . I shall now descend to some particulars, and show,
 . how we are to devote our labour and employment, our time and fortunes unto GOD.
2. AS a good Christian should consider every place as holy,
 . because GOD is there,
 . so he should look upon every part of his life, as a matter of holiness,
 . because it is to be offered unto GOD. [Q. E. D.]
3. ... THE profession of a clergyman is a holy profession
 . because it is a ministration in holy things,
 . . an attendance at the altar,
 . but worldly business is to be made holy unto the Lord,
 . by being done as a service to him,
 . and in conformity to his divine will. [Q. E. D.]
4. ... FOR as all men and all things in the world, as truly belong unto GOD,
 . as any places, things, or persons that are devoted to Divine service;
 . so all things are to be used
 . and all persons are to act in their several states and employments,
 . for the glory of GOD.
5. ... MEN of worldly business therefore must not look upon themselves as at liberty to live to themselves,
 . to sacrifice to their own humours and tempers,
 . because their employment is of a worldly nature:
 . but they must consider,
 . that as the world and all worldly professions as truly belong to GOD as persons and
 . things that are devoted to the altar,
 . so it is as much the duty of men in worldly business to live wholly unto GOD,
 . as it is the duty of those who are devoted to divine service.
6. ... AS the whole world is GOD's,
 (a) . so the whole world is to act for GOD.
 (b) As all men have the same relation to GOD,
 . as all men have all their powers and faculties from GOD,
 . so all men are obliged to act for GOD with all their powers and all their faculties.
 (c) As all things are GOD's,
 . so all things are to be used and regarded as the things of GOD.
 . For men to abuse things on earth, and live to themselves, is the same rebellion against GOD, as for angels to abuse things in heaven.
 . because GOD is just the same Lord of all on earth, as he is the Lord of all in heaven.
 (d) Things may and must differ in their use,
 . but yet they are all to be used according to the will of GOD.
 (e) Men may and must differ in their employments,
 . but yet they must all act for the same ends, as dutiful servants of GOD; in the right and pious performance of their several callings.

longer disquisitions, but in all cases by strict, and manifestly sound reasoning. This at first might be pure, nervous argument merely, expressed in as few, well-chosen, forcible words as possible; then occasionally a flower of rhetoric might be chastely introduced to relieve its strictness; then its mathematical severity might be concealed under a sober and easy classic dress; finally, it might be arrayed in the perfect charms and fascinations of the most refined and accomplished arts of rhetoric, displaying the clearness and strength of the argumentation, and the simplicity and elegance of its investiture, (in other words, the sound sense and good taste of the artist,) in equal force and brilliancy. And thus might the exercises proceed day by

7. ... CLERGYMEN must live wholly unto GOD, in one particular way,
 - .. that is, in the exercise of holy offices,
 - .. in the ministration of prayers and sacraments,
 - .. and a zealous distribution of spiritual goods.
 - But men of other employments are in their particular ways as much obliged to act as the servants of GOD,
 - and live wholly unto him in their several callings.
 - This is the only difference between clergymen and people of other callings. [II. i. 3 & 13.]
8. ... WHEN it can be shown, that men might be vain, covetous, sensual, worldly-minded, or proud in the exercise of their worldly business, then it will be allowable, for clergymen to indulge the same tempers in their sacred profession.
9. ... FOR though these tempers are most odious and most criminal in clergymen,
 - who, besides their baptismal vow, have a second time devoted themselves to GOD, to be his servants,
 - .. not in the common offices of human life,
 - .. but in the spiritual service of the most holy, sacred things,
 - .. and who are therefore to keep themselves as separate and different from the common life of other men,
 - .. as a church or an altar is to be kept separate from houses and tables of common use;
 - yet as all Christians are by their baptism devoted to GOD, and made professors of holiness,
 - so they are all in their several callings to live as holy and heavenly persons,
 - .. doing everything in their common life, only in such a manner as it may be received by GOD, as a service done to him. [I. i. 35.]
10. ... FOR things spiritual and temporal,
 - (a)
 - .. sacred and common,
 - .. must, like men and angels,
 - .. like heaven and earth,
 - .. all conspire to the glory of GOD.
 - (b)
 - As there is but one GOD and Father of us all,
 - .. whose glory gives light and life to everything that lives,
 - .. whose presence fills all places,
 - .. whose power supports all beings,
 - .. whose providence ruleth all events,
 - .. so everything that lives,
 - .. whether in heaven or earth,
 - .. whether they be thrones or principalities, men or angels,
 - .. they must all, with one spirit, live wholly to the praise and glory of this one GOD and Father of them all. [I. iv. 18.]
11. ... ANGELS as angels in their heavenly ministrations,
 - .. but men as men,
 - .. women as women,
 - .. bishops as bishops,
 - .. priests as priests,
 - .. and deacons as deacons,
 - .. some with things spiritual, and some with things temporal, offering to GOD the daily sacrifice of a reasonable life, wise actions, purity of heart, and heavenly affections.
12. ... THIS is the common business of all persons in the world, to trifle away their time in the follies and impertinences of a fashionable life,
 - .. nor to any men to resign themselves up to worldly cares and concerns:
 - .. it is not left to the rich to gratify their passions in the indulgences and pride of life,
 - .. nor to the poor to vex and torment their hearts with the poverty of their state.
 - But men and women, rich and poor, must with bishops and priests, walk before GOD in the same wise and holy spirit,
 - .. in the same denial of all vain tempers,
 - .. and in the same discipline and care of their souls;
 - .. not only because they have the same rational nature,
 - .. and are servants of the same GOD,
 - .. but because they all want the same holiness, to make them fit for the [II. i. 3, 7.]
 - .. same happiness to which they are called. [Q. Erat 1b.]
13. IT is therefore absolutely necessary, for all Christians, whether men or women, to consider themselves as persons that are devoted to holiness, day to the most elaborate, comprehensive and minute investigations. And when the pupil should be well practised in his art, thus regulated and established by fixed rules, he would be left to treat his subjects according to his particular genius and judgment, just as a complete master of Painting or Music when indulging his well tutored graceful imagination and perfected talents, in his own particular branch of art.

Again, the true scholastic style of reviewing a treatise will not fail to constitute

. and so order their common ways of life, by such rules of reason and piety, as may turn it into continual service unto Almighty GOD. [II. i. 2. Q. Erat D.]

- I. 1. NOW to make our labour or employment an acceptable service unto GOD,
 . we must carry it on with the same spirit and temper that is required in giving of alms, or any work of piety. [Q.E.D.]
2. ... FOR if whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, we must do all to the glory of GOD, 1 Cor. x. 31;
 . if we are to use this world, &c., &c.
 (and so forth to the end of the Section.)

SECTION THIRD.

Proving that devotion is the duty of all men, of every rank and condition, and the only source of peace and happiness.

CHAPTER FIRST.

Showing how all orders and ranks of men and women of all ages are obliged to devote themselves to GOD.

- I. 1. I HAVE in the foregoing chapters gone through the several great instances [II. passim.]
 of Christian devotion,
 . and shown that all the parts of our common life, our employments, our talents, and gifts of fortune, are all to be made holy and acceptable unto GOD, by a wise and religious use of everything, and by directing our actions and designs to such ends as are suitable to the honour and glory of GOD.
2. I SHALL now show that this regularity of devotion,
 . this holiness of common life,
 . this religious use of everything we have,
 . is a devotion that is the duty of all orders of Christian people. [Q.E.D.]
-
3. ... FULVIUS has had a learned education, and taken his degrees in the university;
 . he came from thence that he might be free from any rules of life.
4. ... HE takes no employment upon him, nor enters into any business, because he thinks that every employment, or business, calls people to the careful performance and just discharge of its several duties.
5. ... WHEN he is grave he will tell you
 (a) . that he did not enter into holy orders, because he looks upon it to be a state which requires great holiness of life,
 . and that it does not suit his temper to be so good.
- (b) . He will tell you,
 . that he never intends to marry, because he cannot oblige himself to that regularity of life, and good behaviour, which he takes to be the duty of those that are at the head of a family.
- (c) . He refused to be godfather to his nephew
 . because he will have no trust of any kind to answer for.
6. ... FULVIUS thinks he is conscientious in his conduct,
 . and is therefore content with the most idle, impertinent, and careless life.
 . He has no religion, no devotion, no pretences to piety.
 . He lives by no rules,
 . and thinks all is very well, because he is neither a priest, nor a father, nor a guardian, nor has any employment or family to look after.
7. ... BUT Fulvius, you are a rational creature, [II. iv. 13,
 . and as such are as much obliged to live according to reason and order, 27—32.]
 . as a priest is obliged to attend at the altar,
 . or a guardian to be faithful to his trust.
 . If you live contrary to reason,
 . you do not commit a small crime,
 . you do not break a small trust;
 . but you break the law of your nature,
 . you rebel against GOD who gave you that nature,
 . and put yourself amongst those whom the GOD of reason and order will punish as apostates and deserters. [II. iv. 33.]
8. (a)... THOUGH you have no employment, yet as you are baptized into the profession of Christ's religion, you are as much obliged to live &c. [II. i. 9.]
 (and so forth, to the end of the Section, and then again with the "CONCLUSION.")

another subject of common instruction in the course of the above studies. For instance, (a pure, devout regard to the glory of God, and to the public good, being of course premised; without which motive, indeed, every employment—but more especially that of a public writer—loses its innocence and piety, and sinks him only into a greater difficulty of salvation,) the pupil would first of all feel that he is perfectly master of the ground and philosophy of the subject upon which he has to express a discriminating judgment; he would then read over, and analyse the treatise to be reviewed, till he sufficiently apprehended its scope and particulars. Should those grounds or the superstructure in any of its parts, feel heterogeneous to the principles and developments of truth, sound reason and real knowledge, which will have been well formed in his mind, by the process of education we propose, he would after a little reflection and examination, easily discover where and why and how the discrepancy, whether in the premises, the reasonings, or the conclusion. And so, having clearly apprehended the source and nature of the errors, fundamental or partial, and the briefest mode of their effective confutation, he would proceed in the usual classical order,—first, to state the case of the question simply and clearly, for the understanding of the commonest, dullest reader; then give a just summary in so many propositions, of the several grounds on which the question rests, verifying his statements; then, by pure argumentation, from self-evident or tersely demonstrated principles, (in whatever purity, elegance, or ornaments of dress, his taste and judgment may deem suitable,) he would proceed in logical order, to lay open in variety of lights, the fallacy of the propositions, the misapprehension of the author, or the incorrectness of his reasoning, till the unsound edifice, however specious and imposing in its general aspect, or renowned its architect, appear in its true character, as an unsound and dangerous structure. Moreover by way of an accomplished and erudite finish to the review, and as before observed, always having regard to public good, (like a rigid, yet benevolent sage and guardian of truth,) he would at every suitable opening in the argumentation, make a digression, in order to throw off some masterly theosophical and edifying information, incidentally relating to the subject under discussion, summing up the whole with a well executed finishing stroke of some lucid and rousing truths, calculated to impress, to captivate, and to carry off with him the understanding, judgment and affections of the reader.

Again, for further exercises, the pupils might be directed to run through Law's "Christian Perfection," or some similar stringent casuistical dissertations upon the essential duties and obligations of wisdom and Christianity; or it may be of patriotism and moral virtue. (The work on British Education and eloquence, by Thomas Sheridan, M.A., 8vo., London, 1769, is here strongly recommended to perusal and consideration.)

And now may the inquiry be made, whether it might not be perfectly consistent with the true spirit and genius of Protestantism, as well as the nature and design of pure Christianity, to institute a kind of religious Colleges of Retreat*, where young persons after the attainment of a certain age, or when their education should be said to be finished, might, if so disposed, enter and remain for a period of five or seven years, for the simple and avowed purpose of being taught and exercised in the most enlarged practice of the divine virtues of Christianity; so that after being there daily trained by a holy and enlightened Superior, and his assistants, in everything that could strengthen and perfect them in evangelic virtue, they might be rightly prepared to enter upon public life, and exhibit living illustrations of the purity and glory of the Gospel. Would that such establishments had long been common in this our land, and that our senators, our priests, our public journalists, and leading public men, might have undergone such a wise and devout course of practical discipline, as an indispensable qualification for their respective offices in life,—the public manners and condition of this nation, and of the world itself, had been at the present time enjoying most blessed effects of it.

[* or elementary 'Theosophic Colleges.']

Now, though experienced, wise, and holy must needs be he, who should have the direction of an institution, wherein all that was perverse and rebellious in the blind reason and human will should be taught to die, to be suppressed, denied, crucified, and extirpated, as a foul disease, by its inexperienced subjects; where all that was evil, unamiable, partial in the human mind, should, by ingeniously devised trials and exercises, private and public, be made to show itself in its glaring opposition to the nature of the Divine will, and the happiness of the creation; where all that was wise, good, generous, noble, dignified, meek, humble, patient, silent, resigned, lovely, impartial, heavenly, would be made to vigorously shoot forth as so many natural births of the new life of Jesus, upon the gradual destruction and death of the respective contrary properties. Now, though thus conceivably high, we say, must be the qualifications of the heads of such an establishment, (who each from the Xavier-like superior downwards, would be elected solely for his surpassing excellency of understanding, profound wisdom, and great experience, for his high sanctity, and laborious, Bramwell-like devotional spirit); yet no fears need be entertained, we think, of a paucity of duly qualified individuals to fill such offices, were the system but once in operation, and a single College established upon such principles. Indeed, the world we believe, would be more astonished at the wonders of human nature flowing from such a fresh opened point of life, than it has ever yet been at the greatest marvels of natural or inspired effort; whilst ample precautions would be afforded, through the watchfulness of the public, the growing universal sentiment of piety, the reckless libertinage of the anonymous press, the stringent action of pure principles, and of a holy jealousy and mutual vigilance over each other, amongst the members themselves:—by these and other providential means, the Institute, we think, might be kept for fifty years, from being abused or degraded by a jesuitical spirit, and selfish interests; such Christianity, indeed, as is here contemplated, not admitting of secretiveness and scheming, but requiring the most open simplicity, the tenderest purity of mind, and the constant pursuance of perfect goodness. It may not be altogether superfluous once more to observe, that the simple sole intent of what we here advance, is the, so to call it, Spartan cultivation of a perfect and enlightened morality, or Christian perfection, wherewith to enter upon the common everyday duties of life. But to return.

For another exercise, the pupils might take the two volumes of Kempis, or the Spiritual Combat, or some similar works, selecting therefrom all the purest and most evangelical counsels and precepts, concerning self-government, holiness, and perfection, that might not have been specially comprehended in the former studies; preserving their original fire and unctuousity, yet turning them into logical, spirited tracts upon Christian virtues, or finely expressed holy devotions. (And the same remarks will also apply to the sentiments of moral prudence, which are to be found in several judicious treatises published in the early part of the eighteenth century.)

Again, another most profitable exercise for pupils who had become moderate proficient in the aforesaid studies, might be that of epistolary composition, directed to individuals supposed to be labouring under various kinds of spiritual distress, (whether “children,” “young men,” or “fathers” in Christ,) and also to others oppressed with the several troubles and trials, to which human life, in its various states, is every day subject,—to be critically examined and corrected by the superior; and thus they would be acquiring the qualifications for the ever-requisite office of a wise director and comforter of souls.

A further and very important exercise would be that of devotional biography, the channel through which so much valuable instruction may be effectively conveyed to the world. For instance, having been exercised in framing and painting characters, with classic talent, spirit, force, justness, charming delineation of perfect virtue, and ironical exposure of the deformity and folly of vice, as in the Serious Call, the pupil might select a few of the most edifying Biographies out of Butler's Lives of the Saints (or some other modern pious works), and, from their present tame, monotonous, inelegant style, might reproduce them in Law's simple, unctuous, masculine character of thought and expression; throwing in original sentiments of virtue, but keeping edification, truth, and pure history steadily in view, as the sole end and aim of all that be written, at the same time, omitting all Romish or Protestant peculiarities and eulogies; in short, merely extracting the pure Christian honey, and needful historical facts, and so (with the natural, ingenious, introductory remarks and concluding reflexions, into which the characters and incidents would be dovetailed,) forming, for the reader, a standard and a fascinating example, to win attention, and to provoke as well as guide emulation.

The same remarks may generally apply to the composition of fables, another invaluable source of instruction, and which when terse, elegant, weighty, and full of point, that is, when the previously mentioned rhetorical accomplishments are displayed in their construction, form another charming literary ornament and relief, as well as powerful means of instruction. For instance, instead of illustrating the subject under discussion by a character, a fable might be employed, as good taste and judgment would suggest, and so richness and variety be afforded to the subject, &c. For this purpose, besides English editions of ancient and modern authors, Fontaine should be studied in French, (also the preface to Perrin's school fables,) not for servile imitation, but with a view to engraft some of the classic elegances and perfections of his sylphine style, as likewise those of other talented classic writers, upon the pupil's own natural and standardly trained genius; so that whatever he shall put out of hand shall bear the marks of a powerful and finished talent, radiant with common sense, good taste, and sterling erudition.

Other suggestions might be offered of equally manifest utility, but without entering further into the subject, it may in conclusion be remarked, that by some such simple practical course as has been here sketched out and proposed, (in the spirit, indeed, of Sheridan, in his work on British Education, before recommended, or of the school in Germany, described in the "Theosophical Transactions"), might the minds of youth be easily imbued with the sublimest spirit of heavenly wisdom and piety. At all events, these exercises might serve for a beginning, leaving to the natural course of time and experience, to mature and perfect a simple, comprehensive system of instruction in the theory and practice of pure, natural religion and evangelical virtue—in other words, of a religion perfectly Christian, yet unsectarian; and that, we say, without injuriously trenching upon the existing modes and routine of education.

SECTION IV.

We have now completed what we purposed by this work, which was to fully elucidate the scope of the Advertisement, inserted at its commencement, in reference to the peculiar understanding and talent deemed needful for the adequate and just representation of the character of Mr. Law, and of the extraordinary individuals, agencies, and events, which, under God, were instrumental in the formation or development of it.

This undertaking is, in effect, comprehended in the first three, and the last fourteen pages, which, with an additional sheet or two, constituted the extent of the publication we had in our contemplation, on entering upon it; but which, as explained in the Note of p. 631, supra, is now found to be run out to its present large dimensions.

The entire work may then be considered of the nature of a general plan and specification, for the erection of a noble edifice, or temple, dedicated to the Deity of Christianity, that is, to the true, rational apprehension and worship of the universal Spirit of wisdom, goodness, and truth, according to his now consummate revelation of himself. And as moreover, furnishing the needful materials for its construction, or affording directions where to obtain them.

It only remains for us to add a few words by way of conclusion. The candidate is supposed to have qualified himself as indicated, for the great and noble work that is presented to his genius by this entire treatise;—a work that, if duly executed, cannot fail to have a most important and happy influence on the future destinies of the world. Should it now seem desirable to him to test his abilities, the subject we would suggest to him for that end, in the first place, in regard to theology and literary power, is contained in the following writings, being therein summarily, yet completely handled, viz., (1.) the tract of Regeneration, described p. 40, supra, (2.) the tract of Repentance, p. 41, (3.) the book of Prayers, p. 44, (4.) the tract of Temptation, p. 42, (5.) the tract of Resignation, p. 43, and (6.) the treatise of the Supersensual Life;—the sum and tenor of the whole, being, a comprehensive and practical elucidation of this grand verity and text of Scripture, “unless a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God :” which, for the purpose in question, might be rendered into the following proposition, viz., that it is the indispensable obligation of all men to be born again, and to grow up in such new spiritual humanity, to perfection; otherwise they cannot have any divine knowledge, nor become right magical artists in nature or the creation.

By this or some similar proposition, we conceive, may the candidate test his powers to do justice to the biography of so eminent a son of wisdom, and mystic evangelical prophet, as was Mr. Law. That is, in regard to theoretic theology, and mystical, spiritual, experimental divinity, he would elucidate the scope and implications of the text or proposition, according to the orthodox science and experience set forth in the above specified tracts, and the other works serially enumerated on pp. 634—41, supra; whilst as to the style of diction and argumentation, it would necessarily be according to the prescribed models and defined characteristics thereof. Wherein, by the way, amongst its general illustrations, might be introduced, as sacred ingenuity should dictate, sketches of modern character, in its common phases of injustice, baseness, depravity, and folly—these placed in strong antithesis or amenableness to the inflexible requirements, and sure reactionary, retaliatory laws of the Universal justice, righteousness, truth and wisdom; but especially scrutinising conventional pretensions to honour, justice, respectability and sanctity, probing them to the quick, and as groundless, exhibiting their moral degradation and loathsomeness in its true light; yet all touched off with the charming delicacy of a La Fontaine, the felicitous brevity and irony of a La Bruyère, and the devout wisdom, masculine sense, and pungent wit, displayed in the fine moral sketches of the* “Serious Call.” In short, the essay might present a spirited exhibition of the talent and genius of the writer in the above named instances. embracing all needful, general and particular instructions concerning the states and degrees, the experiences and the doctrines of christian regeneration; and being composed with all that classical simplicity, perspicuity and logical exactness, befitting an elementary treatise of essential practical truth, or a national grammar and exercise book of Christianity,—somewhat correspondent, for instance, with Potts’s Euclid, or a logical treatise on the elements of Arithmetic, in regard to mathematical science.

So far then as to the mode of ascertaining the theological and literary ability of the candidate. With reference now to pure theosophical science, (which, as will doubtless have been seen, is equally necessary in order to a just appreciation and portraiture of the mind and understanding of Mr. Law,) the subject we would offer for the exercise of the candidate’s attainments in that respect, is contained in the following references of Scripture, (though indeed, implied in every chapter of the Book,) namely, Luke xxiv. 26, 27, John i. 1—29, Romans xv. 22—27, Ephes. i. 3—22, iii. 9—19, Colos. i. 15—26, and ii. 2, 3, Heb. i. 1—3, and ii. 10, 1 John i. 1—8, Apoc. i. 8, and xii. 13. This subject, the “mystery of Christ”—the mystery of Deity revealed, or of God, nature and all things; or again, the mystery of the supernatural universal Will-spirit of Love, and wisdom, with all its creaturely outbirths and developments, may, for the purpose here in question, be ranged under ten chief heads or distributions, and further, into one hundred and seventy-seven propositions, put in the form of questions, thus:—

(1.) Concerning the Deity in his abyss and as eternal nature—in four chief questions. (2.) Concerning angels and their creation—in ten questions. (3.) Concerning the creation in general, according to the three principles, namely, of the first eternal principle, or dark centre—in three questions; of the second eternal principle, the angelical, holy, light-world—in two questions; of the third principle, the visible, material, temporal creation—in seventeen questions. (4.) Concerning the creation of man, and that whereunto Adam had relation whilst he stood in innocence, and then after his fall—in forty-one questions. (5.) Concerning Adam’s offspring, down to Moses—in sixteen questions. (6.) Concerning the figures and sacrifices in Moses and the prophets—in eight questions. (7.) Concerning CHRIST, his birth, life, sufferings, death, descent, resurrection, apparition to and conversation with his disciples, and ascension—in forty questions. (8.) Concerning Christ’s glorification, pentecost, the disciples speaking with all tongues, and what was that language; also of the two testaments, Baptism and the Supper, and the power of the keys—in eighteen questions. (9.) Concerning a true christian and antichrist, Babel, the beast and the whore—in four questions. (10.) Concerning the slaying of the beast, and the dying

Gen. i, ii,

* To the First Part of which work, as analytically set forth in the note of pp. 647—52, supra, it might form a suitable appendage, or Second Part; and both together constitute a GRAMMAR OF WISDOM according to the idea thereof, traced out in the Annotation of pp. 8, 9, supra.

of a true christian, viz. what in him dieth. Also, of the dying of the unregenerate and wicked, called an eternal dying. Also, of the soul's separation from the body, the different estates of souls, the resurrection, and final judgment, this world's dissolution, the eternal habitation of the saints, and the eternal prison and horrors of the unregenerate and lost, and whether they shall admit of any alteration,—these in thirteen questions: making in the whole, one hundred and seventy-seven questions.

The particular questions, (comprising an epitome of the whole gospel revelation, theosophically apprehended,) are these following:—

- VI.—What are the office and doings of the angels, and why did God's power introduce itself into imagings or figures?
- VII.—What moved Lucifer, that he lusted against God, and turned himself away from the good?
- VIII.—How was it possible, that an angel could become a devil? Or what is a devil? In what essence or being doth he now stand after the fall?
- IX.—Seeing God is omnipotent, why did he did not withstand Lucifer, but let it come to pass that he became a devil?

- XII.—How are men to consider or conceive of the eternal council of God, in the Divine contemplation: seeing the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deeps of the Deity, (as St. Paul saith, concerning it, 1 Cor. ii. 10), whereas it standeth not in the creature's ability, and yet is possible? How may a man really understand this ground of the deep UNITY?
- XIII.—How is the thrusting out of the Dragon, and of the legions of Lucifer, effected? Whether is he thrust, Rev. xii. 9, that he can be without God, whereas God filleth all things, Jer. xxiii. 24? Or what is the foundation of hell where he dwelleth?

- XIX.—What are the dominions, or thrones, and principalities of angels, evil and good, in the invisible world? Col. i. 16, Ephes. vi. 12. How may the spiritual nature of eternity be understood in the visible world? Whether also are they divided asunder by space and place; or what is the inward foundation?
- XX.—Out of what is the visible world created; seeing the Scripture saith, God hath made all things by his Word? John i. 3. How is that to be understood? (Three Principles, xxii. 11.)
- XXI.—Whereas God and his Word are only good, Gen. i. 25, out of what then is flowen forth the evil in the substance of this world, as venomous, poisonous worms, beasts, herbs, and trees; as also in the earth and other things? (Mysterium Magnum, lxi. 63, 68.)

Such then are the propositions or Questions into which the subject, contained in the passages of Scripture referred to, has been resolved, and which are offered to the candidate, as a further exercise of his abilities, that is, with respect to theosophical science.

By way of suggestion however, with regard to his mode of treating the same, as to brevity and elaborateness, we venture in conclusion, to submit to his consideration, the following Answers to a few of the earlier questions:—

Question I.—What is GOD, considered without nature and creature, in himself only?

Answer. (1.) God is the eternal Unity, (comparable rather to the cypher than to the first of natural numbers,) viz. the universal or unmeasureable Good; which hath nothing after it nor before it, that can give or afford anything to it. Without all inclinations and properties, and without original of time, it is in itself but only ONE, viz. a mere clearness, pureness, or stillness. It hath no where any space or place, nor needeth any for its habitation, but it is without and within the world, equally alike; and is deeper than a thought or an imagination can cast itself. Nay, if for a hundred thousand years together, one should speak forth myriads of numbers concerning its greatness and depth, yet he would not so much as have begun to have expressed its profundity, for it is the endlessness or infinity.

All whatsoever can be numbered or measured is natural and imaginable, but the Divine Unity cannot be expressed; for it is equally alike through and through all at once. And it is therefore called and apprehended to be the Good, because it is the eternal meekness, and the highest beneficence in the perceptibility or inventibility of Nature and creature, viz. the perceptible or inventible sweet Love.

(2.) For the Unity, viz. the Good floweth forth from itself, and with such outflowing, introduceth itself into willing and motion. There the Unity loveth or thoroughly inhabiteth the desiring or motion, and the desiring or motion apprehendeth the meekness of the Unity, viz. the ground of the love in the Unity: concerning which it is, that Moses saith, The Lord our God is one only God and no other. 1 Cor. viii. 6.

(3.) And the matter is not so as unenlightened reason supposeth, viz. that God dwelleth only above or without the place of this world. There is no place prepared for him, wherein he dwelleth apart; but only his revelation or manifestation is distinguishable.

He is through, with, and in all. And wheresoever he, in a life, becometh moveable with his Love, there is God in his working, manifested or revealed; that is, his Love, viz. the Unity, is there flowing forth, desirous, and perceptible or inventible. There God hath made himself a place, viz. in the ground of the soul, in the eternal IDEA or object or representation of the eternal desiring in the Love, wherein the Love willeth, and perceiveth or findeth itself; as it is to be understood in the angels, and in blessed souls.

Question II.—What is the Abyss of All things where there is no creature, viz. the abyssal No-thing?

Answer. (1.) It is a habitation of God's Unity, for the opening, or the something of the nothing, is God himself. The opening is the Unity, viz. an eternal life and desiring, a mere voleity or will, which yet hath nothing that it can desire, but itself. Therefore is the will a mere desirous love-longing delight, viz. an exit of itself to its perceptibility or inventibility.

(2.) This will is first, the eternal Father of the byss or ground; and secondly, the perceptibility of the love is the eternal Son, which the will in itself generateth to a perceptible love-power; and thirdly, the exit of the desirous perceptible Love is the Spirit of the Divine life.

(3.) And this is the eternal Unity, or threefold, unmeasureable, unbeginning Life, which standeth in mere desiring; in conceiving, comprehending and finding of itself, and in an eternal exit of itself.

(4.) And that which is gone forth from the Will, from the Love, and from the Life, the same is the Wisdom of God, viz. the Divine vision, contemplability, and joy of the Unity of God, where the Love eternally introduceth itself into powers, colours, wonders and virtues.

(5.) In this opening life of the Divine Unity, five clear and loud-sounding senses become understood, in the perceptibility of the Love of the life, viz. AEIOU, wherein the Divine desiring and working standeth. The same bringeth itself into an out-breathing or out-speaking, to the understanding of the one only Trinity, whereby the eternal life findeth and understandeth itself.

(6.) The Trinity manifesteth itself out of the Unity with a threefold breathing, so that this threefold breathing, after a threefold manner entereth into itself, to self-ownness. And this threefold sense is called with its sensual name IEHOVA.

(7.) For the Unity, viz. the I, goeth into itself into a threefold substance, which is called IE. And that IE is the Father, which bringeth itself with its breathing will into HO, that is into a formation of the Love; and in the HO the word of all powers is understood, for it maketh a circumference or surrounding of itself, viz. the eternal somewhat or something. Whence goeth forth the Love-longing or delight, whose exit is the Spirit, which comprehendeth and formeth itself into VA. For the V is the Spirit, viz. the out-going, and A is the Wisdom, wherein the Spirit formeth itself* into a working life.

(8.) And then is this threefold breathing or speaking life, in itself O, A. For the incomprehended longing delight is the O, viz. the eye of the one only seeing, a pure or clear vision; and the A is the threefold entrance of itself, that is, to the perceptibility of the desiring, which openeth itself through the eternal breathing or speaking.

(9.) The opening, viz. the property in the sense of the perceptible opening, is called ADONAI, and is six powers: out of which the Mysterium Magnum, viz. the high name TETRAGRAMMATON floweth, out of which all substances visible and invisible, are proceeded forth, and come into form and images.

(10.) In the word ADONAI, viz. in these six powers, do lie the six properties of the eternal nature, viz. of the natural life, out of which the angels and souls, according to the inwardness of their IDEA, are flowered forth; and also the six days of the creation of this world, which with the seeing life (that imageth itself in the midst of the substance, namely the O,) became shut into the rest; wherein the six powers stand and rest in the still love, viz. in the eternal Unity, and yet with their own self-working, do will and go forth without ceasing.

(11.) And that is the O, the seventh day, wherein God rested from all his works, and eternally doth rest; that is, the six powers (viz. first, the desirousness or astringency, secondly, mobility, thirdly, sense or perceptibility, fourthly, fire or life, fifthly, light or love, sixthly, sound, distinguishedness or understanding,) do rest in that out of which they are arisen, viz. in the O, in the place of God; wherein the eternal Love is signified, viz. the Unity, or the I-hood of the Unity, which is the eternal sabbath of all things, the good substance.

(12.) Thus we understand first, that the eternal Nothing without all beginning, is a clear pure shining, viz. the Eye of the eternal seeing, for therein, viz. in the nothing, all things see; and as the somewhat is arisen out of this seeing, so the nothing, viz. the eternal Unity seeth through all things unhindered.

(13.) And secondly, we understand further, that God himself is the seeing and finding of the nothing. Which is called a No-thing (though it is clearly God himself), because it is incomprehensible and inexpressible.

Question III.—What is God's love and wrath, how is he an angry jealous God, though he in himself is the unchangeable Love? How may love and wrath be one only thing; or what is the Divine nature as distinguished from the supernatural abyssal Unity? (Or, what is the qualification of that nature or element, in which we, spiritually, live and have our being?)

Answer. (1.) Although we may be difficult to be understood by the reader, yet he may understand all in the divine power, and calling upon God, if this be done in right earnest sincerity. For all lies in man: he is a living book of God and all things.

(2.) The reader must know that in Yea (the A above shown,) and* Nay, all things consist, be they divine, devilish, earthly, or whatsoever can be named. The One, viz. the Yea, is mere power and life, and is the truth of God, or God himself. This would be in itself unapprehensible, and therefore be neither joy nor exultation, without the Nay. The Nay is an object of the Yea or

* *Note the distinction between the Deity or triune life, and its seat or body of manifestation—its looking-glass of self-contemplation, or its magic Wonder-eye. One, it will be perceived, is all active, the other all passive; one is the abyssal, formless will, the other is the revelation of that will, the discovery of itself in an essential form, and that form is a virgin. This super-natural, eternal virgin is yet further a mother, yea the bride of God, and one of whose conceptions art thou, O reader, as to thy inmost signature. In this respect art thou God's own veritable child—his own little image; yea, and in thee, in this wisdom signature, God is ever waiting to reveal to thee thy portion of the glories of the Deity! Retire then into this thy inward, pure, peaceful, happy, intellectual ground, away from the exterior bestial, hellish, ratiocinative life: as thou art called anew to it, by this philosophy, which is all practical, all about thyself, thy inward being, and thy way back to God, (v. p. 43, supra), to teach thee only to know THYSELF, and be happy.*

† Symbolized by two equilateral triangles cross-ing each other, the lower, inverted one (the Nay) being black, and the upper one, with the circle in which they stand, being white.

of the truth, so that the Truth may be manifest, and there be somewhat wherein is a contrarium, and that may be loved, wherein the eternal Love is working, perceptible and desirous.

(3.) And yet we cannot say, that the Yea is separated from the Nay, and that they are two things, one besides the other; but they are one only thing, yet sever themselves into two beginnings (principia), and make two centra, wherein each worketh and willeth* in itself. Like as the day in the night, and the night in the day, are two centra, and yet unsevered, that is, only with their own will and desire are they severed. For they have a two-fold fire in them, viz. first, that or the heat unclosing, and secondly, the night, or the cold inclosing; and yet both together are but one fire, and neither of them without the other, were manifest or working. For the cold is the root of the heat, and the heat is the cause that the cold is perceptible: without these two, which yet stand in continual strife, all things would be a nothing, and stand still without moving.

(4.) Thus also is to be apprehended concerning the eternal Unity of the Divine power. If the eternal Will did not flow forth from itself, and introduce itself into a receptibility, then there would be no form nor distinguishableness, but all powers would be only One power; also there would be no understanding, for the understanding ariseth in the distinguishableness of the multiplicity, where one property seeth, proveth, and willeth the other properties. In like manner, also, there would be no joy.

(5.) Now if there must exist a receptibility, then there must be a desire to self-perception, that is an own will to the receptibility, which is not, neither willeth like unto the only Will. For the one only Will willeth only the one Good which itself is, it willeth no other than itself in the equilibrio or temperature; but the outflowed will willeth inequality, that it may be distinguished from the temperature, and be its own somewhat in order that there might be something which the eternal Seeing may see and feel. And out of the own or self will is proceeded the Nay, for it bringeth itself into a self-hood, that is, into a receptiveness of itself; it willeth to be somewhat, and likeneth not itself to the Unity, for the Unity is an outflowing Yea or A, which eternally standeth in a breathing-forth of itself, and is an imperceptibleness, for it hath nothing wherein it might find itself, save in the receptiveness of the outgone will, viz. in the Nay, which is an opposite of the Yea, wherein the Yea becometh manifest, and wherein it hath somewhat that it can desire.

(6.) For the One hath nothing in itself, that it can desire, unless it doubleth itself, so that it becometh two; also it cannot find itself in the Unity, but in the duality it findeth itself. Understand the ground aright, thus:

(7.) The self-separated will is gone forth out of the equilibrio of the eternal desiring, and also hath nothing that it can desire but itself. Now seeing it is a somewhat in respect of the Unity, (which is Nothing and yet All,) therefore it bringeth itself into a desire of itself, and desireth itself, and also the Unity, out of which it is flowen forth.

(8.) The Unity it desireth, as the perceptible love-longingness, that the Unity may be perceptible in it; and itself it desireth, as the moving, apprehending and understanding, that there may be a separableness in the Unity, that powers might exist. And though the power hath no ground nor beginning, yet so do distinctions arise in the receptiveness, out of which distinctions NATURE doth exist.

(9.) This outflowed will bringeth itself into a desire and the desire is magnetical, that is, in-drawing, and the Unity is outflowing. So that now it is a contrarium, like as Yea and Nay, for the Outflowing hath no ground, but the in-drawing maketh ground. The Nothing doth will out from itself, that it may be manifested, and the somewhat doth will into itself, that it may be perceptible in the Nothing, in order that the Unity may become perceptible in it. Thus is the Out and In an unequallness.

(10.) And the Nay is therefore called a Nay, because it is an in-turned desire, that is negatively in-closing; and the Yea is therefore called Yea, because it is an eternal out-going and the ground of all being, that is the clear-sounding Truth. For it hath no Nay before itself, but the Nay first existeth in the out-flowed will of the receptiveness.

(11.) This out-flowed desirous will is in-drawing or in-tracting, and conceiveth itself in itself, whence come forms and properties. The first property is acid sharpness, whence arise hardness, coldness, dryness and darkness, for the attractiveness overshadoweth itself; and this is the true ground of the eternal and also temporal darkness, and the hardness and sharpness in the ground of the perceptibility. The second property is the motion in the attracting, which is a cause of the separating. The third property is the true perception between the hardness and the moving, wherein the will perceiveth or is sensible of itself, for it findeth itself in a great sharpness, like a great anguish, in respect of the placid, soft Unity, so to speak. The fourth property is the fire, that is the flash of the glance, which existeth from the conjunction of the great anguishing sharpness, and the Unity. For the Unity is gentle and still, and the moveable hard sharpness is terrible, and is a ground of the painfulness.

(12.) Now in this conjunction there is a great terror, and in this terror the Unity is grasped or seized, and becometh a flash or glance, like an exulting joy. And thus ariseth the light in the midst of the darkness, for the Unity becometh a light, and the receptiveness of the desirous will in the properties, becometh a spirit-fire, which taketh its source and original out of the astringent cold sharpness, in the moving and perceptibility in the darkness; and it is even its very being, viz., a terrible consumptiveness.

(13.) And according to this, is God called an angry, jealous God, and a consuming fire; not according to what he is within himself, without or beyond all receptiveness, but according to this eternal fire-ground. And in the darkness is understood the foundation of hell, as a forgetfulness of the Good; which darkness is totally hidden in the light, as night in the day: as John i. 5 is to be understood. (See Note below.)

* There is no such a thing in nature as annihilation: for though darkness is nothing to the light, and light nothing to darkness, yet each is something to itself, and that unchangeably. Where the light is manifest, the darkness still exists in its own principle; and so likewise where the darkness reigns, there the light is only not manifest, yet dwelleth in itself, ever the same. The right apprehension of this point may greatly assist the understanding, in these and the like exercises.

(14.) Thus we see in the above-mentioned properties, God's wrath, viz., the first property of the in-tracting of the Nay: for that doth not assimilate itself with the Yea, namely, the Unity, for it maketh in itself a darkness, that is an extinguishing of the Good.

(15.) Secondly, it maketh in itself a sharpness, which is the ground of the eternal dying of the gentleness of the amiable Unity. Thirdly, it maketh in itself a hardness, which is the eternal death, like an impotency. Fourthly, it maketh in itself in such hardness of death, a perpetual painful perceptibleness. Fifthly, it maketh in itself an anguishing fire source. Now in these properties God's wrath, and the hellish fire, are to be understood; and it is called hell, or pit, because it is a hiding-place, or confinement. Also, it is called an enmity against God, because it is painful, and the Unity of God is pure gentleness. Wherefore one is against the other, like fire and water; whence also, fire and water in the substance of this world, have taken their original.

(16.) In this kindling of the out-flown will, is now born the fifth property, the perceptibility of the Unity of God, viz., the Love, which in the fire becometh moveable and desirous, and maketh in the fire (that is, in the painfulness,) another principium, viz., a great Love-fire. For it is the cause and the ground of the Light, so that in the fire's essence the light springeth up. It is the Love-power in the light, for thus the Unity bringeth itself into moving and perceptibility, that the eternal power may be perceptible, and that a desire and separableness may be therein; else would the Unity be an eternal stillness and without feeling.

(17.) This Love and Light dwelleth in the fire, and penetrateth the fire, so that the fire's essence becometh changed or transmuted into the highest joy, and no wrath can any more be perceived, but only a pure love-taste of the Divine perceptibility.

(18.) For thus the eternal Unity inflameth itself everywhere all over, so that it is a Love, and that there is somewhat that may be loved. For if the love of the Unity did not stand in the fire-burning kind, then it would not be essential, and there would be no joy or moving in the Unity.

(19.) Thus now may be understood in the fire's essence, God's wrath; and in the love-perceptibility, that is, the perceptible Unity, the divine Love-fire: these make two centra in one only ground, that is a two-fold fire.

(20.) Namely, first, the wrath-fire in the out-flown will of the receptiveness, is a ground of the eternal Nature, out of which the angels and the soul of man have received their ground, and this is called Mysterium Magnum: out of which eternal Nature, this visible world also is vegetated and created, as an objectum or mirror of the inwardness.

(21.) Secondly, the centrum of the love is the Yea, viz., the fire-flaming breathing, which is called the Word of God, viz., the breathing of God's Unity, the foundation of the power, wherein the true holy Spirit is understood, in the efflux of the Love-breathing, viz., the moving or life of Love. Thus also is the angelical, as also the soul's spirit understood therein, wherein God is manifest and dwelleth.

(22.) But the ground of the soul and the angels, according to their nature, is understood in the eternal Nature-fire. For the clear Deity becometh not creaturely, (for it is an eternal Unity,) but it dwelleth through Nature, as fire gloweth through iron.

(23.) And at this place, we understand the possibility of the perdition or damnation of angels and souls; if they lose the Love-fire, that is, turn away from the divine Unity, and enter into self-desire, then the wrath-fire burneth in them, and it becometh their proper life.

(24.) But if the divine Love-fire burneth in their central-fire, then is their fire-life a perfect joy, and amiable well-doing; and God's-fire and the fire of Nature stand in them in One only ground.

(25.) In this fifth property, the glory and majesty of God become manifest, as a light of Love. Whereof the Scripture saith, God dwelleth in a light that no man can approach unto, 1 Tim. vi. 16; thereby signifying, that no creature hath ever been born out of the central-fire of the Love, for that is the Most Holy fire, even God himself in his Ternary.

(26.) And out of this Holy fire is out-flowed the Yea, A, as a beam of the perceptible Unity: the same is the highly precious name JESUS, which has redeemed the poor soul from the wrath-fire again, having, in the assuming of the humanity, given itself into the divorced central-fire of God's wrath in the soul, and kindled it again with the love-fire, and united it with God. Oh, reader, observe this well!

(27.) Thus now understand the right foundation. In God there is no wrath, but only pure Love; but in the foundation, by or through which the Love becometh moveable, there is the wrath-fire, but in God it is only a cause of the joy and the powers, and in the centro of the wrath-fire, it is the greatest and most terrible darkness, pain and anguish.

(28.) And these two are in one another as day and night, where neither one may comprehend the other, but the one dwelleth in the other, and they make two principia, that is, two eternal beginnings.

(29.) The one beginning is the kingdom of God in the Love; and the other beginning is called the kingdom of God's wrath, viz. the foundation of hell, wherein the outcast spirits dwell.

(30.) The foundation of the kingdom of God, is mere Yea, viz. powers of the separable Word. And the foundation of the wrath of God is mere Nay, from whence the lie existeth; wherefore said Christ, that the devil was a father of lies, John viii. 44, for his foundation is mere Nay, and a contradiction of the Truth, viz. of the Yea.

(31.) The sixth property in the out-flown will, is the sound, voice, understanding, discourse, or distinctions, namely, the true understanding, and standeth in both central-fires alike at once. In the centro of the own receptibility of the Nature-fire, without the co-working of the Holy fire, (where these two fires are divorced, as in the devils and damned human souls,) it is not understanding, but only cunning and craft, that is, a proving of the foundation of Nature, a mere misusing of the powers of Nature, whence deceit, suspicion, folly, trickery, and wantonness originate.

(32.) In this sixth power stand the Holy Names, viz. the divine powers, in the opening of the Unity, in the working and desiring; and they stand in both the fires alike at once, namely, in the fire of the Natural mobility, and in the fire of the Love-flame.

(33.) And here standeth the wonder-doing Word in its workings; for the great name of God, TETRAGRAMMATON, (IeHovAh) is here the centrum of the wonders of God, which worketh in both the central fires: which the evil spirits, in their transmutation according to the centro of the fire's nature, do misuse.

(34.) And the ground of the whole CABALA and Magia is comprehended in this ground; for it is the working powers, where the imperceptible co-worketh in the perceptible. And at this place lieth the law of Moses before it, not to misuse it upon pain of eternal punishment, as is to be seen in the book of Exodus, xx. 7. (To those who are of the true theosophic school, enough is here said; to the rest there is a lock upon it.)

(35.) The seventh property of the out-flown desirous will is the substantiality, in which all powers do lie, and work in substance, viz. a subjectum of all powers. Whence the visible world is existed, and by the moving of the wonder-doing Name, is flown forth, or vegetated, and gone into divisibility and forms.

(36.) Therefore in all substances of this world, there are both the central fires, according to God's love and wrath; as is to be seen in the creatures.

(37.) But the Holy fire lieth inwardly concealed, which the curse, that is, the motion of God's wrath, holdeth shut up together with the sin, as is to be understood in the tinctora; and yet there is a possible entrance.

(38.) This out-flown Holy fire, when it yet co-worked through the earth, was the paradise, which indeed yet existeth, but man is thrust out of it. And a man may seek himself to death for this Fire, and find it not, unless he have first found it in himself. (Let this be an admonition to all pretended Alchemists, Hermetics, and Rosicrucians. Let them here consider the folly of attempting the philosophical work, or of even professing to understand it, where divine purity, love and light are not the actual spirit of the magus or artist. See v. 34.)

(39.) Thus then understand us in this Question—of the love and wrath of God, that there is a two-fold fire understood, viz., first, a love-fire, wherein is mere light, and that is called God's Love, viz., the perceptible Unity. And secondly, a wrath-fire from the receptiveness of the out-flown self-will, wherein the love-fire becometh manifest: which wrath-fire is a ground of the eternal NATURE, and in the centro of its inwardness, it is called an eternal darkness and pain. And yet, both these fires are but one only ground, and have been from eternity, and remain to eternity; but yet separate themselves into two eternal beginnings, as is to be considered of in fire and light.

Question IV.—What was there prior to the Angels and the Creation?

Answer. (1.) There was God, with the two central fires, with the great powers, viz., an eternal, infinite generating of wonders, colours, and virtues. Therein did lie the angels and the soul of man, together with all creatures of this world, and of the inward angelical, spiritual world—as an IDEA or spiritual modelling, wherein God from eternity, hath seen all his works. Not in a creaturely-formed kind and shape, that is in a separation; but in the form of the powers, according as the Spirit of God played with itself.

(2.) In these central fires, was the element, (the one element,) and both were but one only being, yet distinguished into two principia, as fire and light, as already shown.

(3.) But, when the central fire of the self-will moved and introduced itself into a greater desire to its visibility and formation, then was the creation effected. That is, when the eternal Will of God moved according to both fires, then the IDEA became image-like, to the praise of the wonders of God.

(4.) And in this motion did the hellish foundation, God's wrath, together break forth with it, which God rejected out of his working, and shut it up in the darkness. Where it standeth even to this day, as hungry jaws, full of desire after the creation, willing also to be manifest creaturely, and in an image-like manner.

(5.) And this is the ground and cause, that the throne-prince, Lucifer, turned himself away from God's love into the central-fire of the wrath, wherein he imagined to rule over God's meekness and love; and through this, was cast out of the central love-fire, and lost his throne in the light, and now possesseth the hell, as also with the damned souls. This hellish foundation in the curse of God's wrath, is a centrum of the visible world; and the same is called SATAN, of whom Christ saith, that he deceiveth the whole world, and is understood in the kingdom of darkness, where heat and cold are in strife. (Enough for our school-fellows.)

Question V.—What was the ground and substance out of which the Angels were created? What was that power in the Word of God which did flow out and become creaturely?

Answer. (1.) The Scripture saith of God, Thou makest the winds thy ministers, and flames of fire thy angels. Psalm civ. 4. In these words is conched the whole understanding; for with the word ministers, is understood the image like IDEA, viz. the spirit of the angels, out of the breathing of the Divine power and might, out of the Holy name of God.

(2.) And the word fire-flames, signifieth the central-fire of the eternal Nature, wherein the substance of the creature standeth, viz., the will of the own self-substance. This is now to be understood as followeth:

(3.) The IDEA or the image of God, hath been a form of the Divine name, in the opening name of God, wherein God from eternity hath known all things; that is, an imagination of the divine will, where the will of the Abyss hath figured itself into a form, and yet it hath been no creature, but only an IDEA, as an image is formed in a looking-glass. Thus hath the imagination of the Divine power, imaged itself in the out-flowing name of God.

(4.) But when God would have such an IDEAM in a living creature, that is, in self-desiring, then he moved and severed the central-fire of the eternal Nature, whereby the IDEA became manifest in the fire, which was done through the breathing, or the Yea.

(5.) At the same time, the Nay, viz., the out-flown will of the own-receptiveness, together imaged itself with the out-breathed Yea, that the creature might stand in an own or self-will: which own or self-will, is understood in the central-fire, that is in the properties to the fire, in which the creaturely life standeth.

(6.) For if this had not been, then had Lucifer not been able to separate himself in self will from the Good, and to fall. If he had had no own will, then must God's power be fallen; but thus the creature severed itself from the Good, and willed to domineer in the might and properties of the central-fire, viz., in the transmutation and phantasy, into which also he came.

(7.) And therefore Christ called him a murderer and a liar from the beginning, John viii. 44, and that therefore, because the Nay hath gotten the dominion in him, and so he is a mere liar.

(8.) The essence and substance of the good angels, is a power of the central-fire and of the central-light, wherein their image standeth. But the IDEA in them, is a figure of the Holy name of God, viz., of the wonder-doing Word.

(9.) And now as the Divine Names and Powers are many and without number, so also there is a distinction among the IDEIS in them, like as one power hath a different effect from the other; though in God they are all equal, yet they are distinct in the efflux, that is in the Wisdom, because of the manifestation and wonders. Thus there is a difference or distinction of the angelical IDEA in the power, and one hath always a greater power and might than the other, and likewise another virtue.

(10.) As the stars in the firmament are different, so are the angels also, that there may be a harmonia, viz. a joy and knowledge of the divine powers.

(11.) Their right foundation standeth in the thrones of the powers of God, and in such thrones of the powers they are everywhere ministers; for out of the thrones, that is, out of the Holy out-flowing names of God, out of the eternal Unity, is the IDEA sprouted, therefore there are distinctions and dominions among them.

(12.) Though they are all of them God's ministers, yet every throne hath its offices, and legions with particular names, according to those very thrones and powers; wherefore there are among them prince-angels, all according to the property of every throne: such a power as the throne hath, such also is the prince-angel. The others are ministers, not slaves, but free-will voices, in the harmonia of the throne, all to the praise of the great God.

(13.) The whole deep within and without the world, is full of such thrones and dominions, yet not in the four elements, but in the pure element of the inward fire and light. They possess another principium, viz. another world, which indeed is together in this world, but in another quality, in another chaos.

(14.) Understand the foundation of the angels thus: they are out of the essence of both the inward eternal central-fires. Their powers are the great out-flowing Names of God; all of them are originated out of the Yea, and were introduced into the Nay, that the powers might become manifest. Thus there must be an object, in which a distinction might be.

(15.) The name IACHIEL is the distinguishing of the IDEA of the virtue, out of which floweth ELIEL, and the Holy names according to the Divine property, which are many; but which all of them flow out of the divine sensibus, so to hint it to the reader.

(16.) But the names of the prince-angels, which in sensu bear the R. T. or S, the power of them standeth in the strength of the might of the fire, out of the high name TETRAGRAMMATON, (Iehovah;) and they are the princes over the astral elementum and over the four elementa, for they have their dwelling in the interior elementis, out of which the four elementa are flowen and do yet flow forth.

(17.) Though indeed there are yet exterior princes, which dwell in the four elements, and are called astral spirits, viz. ascendenti, which have also their properties in the world, but are not like the inward. For they have another chaos of an exterior kind, of which (N.B.) here nothing further is to be mentioned, in respect of the abuse and superstition.

(18.) If we would consider and very rightly understand the powers and virtues of the angels, and not adhere to dead pictures or images, as foolish reason always doth, then we have only to consider the spirits of the letters, in what sense and power each one standeth, and then the uniting of these letter-spirits, from whence the word or understanding originates, and so we have the whole ground, with Yea and Nay, that is the whole foundation.

(19.) For as now the words with the spirits of the letters, are distinct, so also is their distinction in the creatural image-like kind; as also the human kingdom is so, and all whatsoever is called creature. They are altogether nothing else but Divine sensus out of both the central-fires, like joined words of the divine Powers.

(20.) Like as the whole alphabet is the whole understanding of all things, so is God's Word the sole understanding of all things, and the angels are its letters.

(21.) The Prince-angels signify the letters, viz. the thrones, and the ministering angels signify the joining of the sensuum, who suffer themselves to be used to the harmoni of the divine understanding, to the praise of God.

(22.) Like as in the letters, do lie the force and power to the distinction of the sensuum, so also lieth the greatest power in the throne-angels. The others are like the joining of the letters to the distinction, and are joint powers: as the tree is in its branches, so also is their order and government to be understood. For all generations in the four elements, together with men, stand in such a form; every generation hath also its supremes, which altogether is a figure of the inward, spiritual world.

(23.) If man was not so very much shut up in the Nay, that he could understand what powers he carrieth in his mouth, what force standeth therein, he would highly exult therein. But he cannot understand that, on account of the curse, which lieth before it, for he would misuse it. Let the curse be removed out of him, and then he may see.

(24.) For he carrieth the might of all things poisoning in his mouth. If he had the * faith, that he could adjust or form these powers, then he would have the ground of all mysteries, and might do wonders like the angels. This the Scripture also testifieth, If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed, then ye might be able to say to the mountain, cast thyself into the sea. Also, the Word is nigh thee, even in thy mouth and in thy heart, Matt. xvi. 20, 21. Deut. xxx. 11. Rom. x. 8. Mark xvi. 17, 18.

(25.) And this, as above mentioned, for such as are of our school, and further not, in respect of

* See Mrs. Crowe's Nightside of Nature, (ch. xi. etc.) for some refined natural thoughts and judicious remarks, bearing upon this subject. This lady's mind would appear to be of the first order of qualification for deep, yet sober, philosophical research.

the abuse. (There lieth a fast seal upon it, that none unworthy should understand it, and it is also forbidden to write more explicitly hereof; yet the time is born when the same shall stand open, yet only to the theosophic magi. Enough here.)

Question VI.—What is the office and doings of the Angels; and why did God's power introduce itself into imagings or figures?

Answer. (1.) Like as we men upon earth, rule all things, viz. the whole apprehensibility, through the distinction of words; thus also doth God, viz. the eternal mind of the One only power, work and rule with such image-like words in the Wisdom.

(2.) The angels are mere imaged powers of the Word of God: for man's mind is a reflex-image, or ectype of the eternal power of God.

(3.) For all senses come out of the mind, and out of the senses come right thoughts, that is, a conclusion or imagination, from whence the lubet or good-pleasure existeth; which lubet goeth into a being, from whence the perceptible desire, and out of that, the operation proceedeth.

(4.) Thus in like manner, is God, the eternal mind, that is, the understanding; and yet there would be no distinction therein, if it did not flow forth from himself. His out-flowings are the powers, like as in man the senses, and the powers introduce themselves into an imagination, wherein standeth the angelical IDEA, and the imagination bringeth itself into longing to perceptibility, the same is Yea, A, and the longing bringeth itself into desire, which is the ground of the own-receptiveness, viz. the Nay, and the desire bringeth itself into properties, unto five, out of which the Light springeth. Thus, these properties of the desire are Divine thoughts, in two centris to be understood, viz. in Yea and the Nay.

(5.) The Yea is divine, and the Nay is own-selfness of Nature, viz. the perceptibility of the desire. This desire of the perceptibility is become a work (or figures,) viz. angels, which are no other thing than God's thoughts, according to love and wrath, viz. a manifestation of his mind and will.

(6.) Not that there are thoughts in God, but in his out-flown desirous will, which introduceth itself into fire and light to perceptibility.

(7.) And now as man with his senses and thoughts ruleth the world and all creatures, so God, viz. the eternal Unity, ruleth all things through the instrumentality of the angels; only the power and the working is of God. They are his work-instruments, with which he amuseth himself and moveth, whereby and wherewith he manifesteth the eternal powers and wonders, and introduceth them into a love-play.

(8.) They are altogether no other than strings in the great harmoni of the divine joyfulness in song and sound of the powers, and are all of them workers of the wonders of God, viz. formers of the powers and of the Holy names of God.

(9.) Like as we men in our mouth do make the powers of the sensuum formal, in articulate sounding words, so is their labour also a mere forming of divine powers and forms.

(10.) For that which they will and desire, that becometh by their imagination, brought into imaging and forms, which are mere ideæ after the manner as the divine powers, before the creation of the angels, have formed themselves in such IDEAS. Thus also is their modelling accordingly.

(11.) And herein standeth the Holy CABALA of the changings or variations, and the great joy, wherein the divine Wisdom and Science becometh imaged and formed through the central-fire-and-light-spirits; and there is such a joy of knowledge therein, that they eternally bow and humble themselves out of great joy and knowledge before such Highness, in order that the Nay may not get the dominion in them, and that they may not be bereaved of such honour and glory.

(12.) Their food is a creating, or in-drawing desire of the Unity of God, whence their central fire getteth the balsam, that the fierce wrath may not awaken; and therefore they also eternally live in resigned humility, that the Nay may not elevate itself, (as was done in the devils;) and the fall of Lucifer standeth for a looking-glass to them.

(13.) Understand us now rightly, thus. The whole creation of the inward and outer world, (viz. in the holy pure element and in the four elements,) is a mere imaging and formation of the divine Powers, but according to both central fires, viz. in Yea, and Nay. It is no other than one efflux gone out of another, even to the grossest materia or compaction of earth and stones.

(14.) For the visible world is no other than the out-flown Word with both the central fires, which have again made to themselves a subjectum, with the outward elementary fires, wherein the outward creatures live.

(15.) The more inwardly we penetrate into the power of a thing, the nearer we come to the Deity, as is to be understood in the metals and vegetables, as well as in all living creatures. For the most outward are the four elementa; the next following is the astral corpus; the third is the quinta essentia, or the ground of the out-flown holy element; the fourth is the tinctur, viz. the highest power of the out-flown Word, wherein both the inward central-fires lie in one only subjecto; and after this is the pure Deity understood.

[A holy art indeed, which can direct the human spirit and intellect, magically and consciously back through all these centres of life, and elicit from it at will, vocal revelations of its perceptions. Such an art belongs to our proposed Theosophic College, its magi and their initiates.]

(16.) If we would but once awake from the Adamical sleep, and look about us, then we might indeed see wonders. If the earth were not so dear to us, then we might well see the heaven, (as understood of ours.)

(17.) This then is the conclusion concerning the angel's doings, that they are co-playmates of the divine joy, and are members and branches of the great trees of the Divine names, upon which the heavenly fruits do grow. And they have their nutriment from the sap of their trees, viz. every angel from his throne; and as the throne, viz. the Name of God is, so is also the office of the angels thereof, yet the whole of the trees are but one tree, which is GOD.

(18.) The wise 'Heathens' have understood that subjectum, viz. the ectypes of such thrones, and have honoured them as gods, but they had not the true ground of the inwardness. But among the christians, it is altogether unknown, except to some theosophic few, to whom God hath opened it, who have kept it secret, in a parabolic diction.

Question VII.—What did induce Lucifer, that he lusted against God, and turned himself away from the Good?

Answer (1.) The own-receptiveness, that is, the Nay, induced him. The out-flown will in the central-fire of the eternal Nature, is the cause thereof; that did lift itself up in him, and desire to image the Divine power in the fire's might.

(2.) He desired to prove or experiment the properties of the eternal Nature, and would not stand in the resignation, but would domineer in and with the Holy name of the throne.

(3.) Yet the cause, which did move him to such a desire, is the throne of which he was, and indeed remaineth eternally a prince, according to his property of the fire's might; but according to the Holy name of the light's power, he is not remained therein, but according to the darkness.

(4.) When the moving to the creation of the angels was done, then the out-flown will of the own-receptiveness did elevate itself, and the properties stood in great working, and willed to be creatural.

(5.) In these properties, did the creaturely will of Lucifer create. When he did apprehend the omnipotence therein, and found the wonder-doing Power in himself, then did his creaturely will elevate itself according to the fire's might, and abused or misused the Holy name in himself, and would not abide in the resignation, but would domineer over the thrones, and so he severed himself from the Unity.

(6.) He did will to domineer with the Nay over the Yea, for the Nay elevated itself in him, and despised the Yea, because the potentiality to the separability and formability stood in the Nay; therefore would the creaturely will domineer in the Nay, that is, in the transmutation, and did sever itself from the Unity of God, and went into the receptiveness of the properties.

(7.) And instantly the properties in him became severally manifested, viz. the cold fire, also the sharpness, acidity, hardness, bitterness, thorniness, enmiciousness and anguish of the fire. Thus he became an enemy of all love, humility and gentleness, for the foundation of God's wrath grasped or possessed the false will.

Question VIII.—How could an Angel become a devil, or what is a Devil? In what essence and substance doth he stand after the fall?

Answer (1.) It is not so to be understood, as that the Holy name, wherein Lucifer was a throne-angel, is become in him a devil; much less the central love-fire, that is, the power of the Light. No, that cannot be.

(2.) For when Lucifer brought his desire into self-might, then he severed himself from the Will of God, whereupon the Holy name severed itself from him, and the Light in his fire-life extinguished. For he severed himself from the Unity, which is a balsam of the fire, wherein the fire conceiveth its glance of the Light.

(3.) Thus there now remained in him, no other than the Nay, an imaged creature, and the Yea departed from him. For the Nay divorced itself from the Yea, in own self-willing, and would not be under the Yea, that is, under the divine breathing of the Unity, but would be its own breathing.

(4.) Thus he remained a mere cold, hard, sharp, pointed, bitter, stinging, poisonous, anxious, painful fire-essence, wherein the central-fire standeth in mere strife, hunger and thirst, and can attain to no refreshing.

(5.) For if Lucifer would become an angel again, then he must imbibe again of the Unity and Love of God, and his fire-life become killed with the Love, and be transmuted into humility. But this the hellish foundation in the devils will not do, and indeed cannot do it, for there is in them all, no more any inclination or desire to humility or repentance.

(6.) Their whole life is no other than the hellish foundation, a fountain-spring or source of the wrath of God, a mere poison and stink, a dying torment! Whosoever they hear speak of love and humility, then they flee away, for the love is the death of their false life.

(7.) They have indeed an eternal sorrow for their lost inheritance, viz. for the Good, yet they can have no belief, that they might receive grace; for their belief is an eternal doubting.

(8.) They are severed off from God; therefore they curse or shun God's power and will, which is to them an intolerable thing. For if they were touched with the Holy power of God, then that would enervate or deflour them, because it mortifieth the self-will; and that the self-will willeth not, for it would lose its might and power.

(9.) Thus hath Lucifer, who was a throne-prince, forsaken the Holy name in him, and the self-will, viz. the creature, hath elevated itself aloft: understand the central fire-life, according to the properties of the eternal Nature.

(10.) Thus he hath trifled away the Divine image, or the IDEAM, so that it is become dumb and inoperative, and is like a withered tree, without divine power, a figure without motion, of which he is eternally ashamed, that within him standeth an angelical character, and yet this is no more in an angelical kind, and form. He hath lost the original image of God, and is become like to the venomous worms and beasts, whose life standeth in poison.

(11.) Such a deformity of shape have the devils gotten, all according to their several properties, for their properties are quite distinct and different, all according to the foundation of the hellish essence; and they have also among themselves, their princely dominions, all according to the properties, for there are pride-devils, avarice-devils, enchantment or witchcraft-devils, and very many others the like, as a contrarium against God's Wisdom and Truth.

(12.) Every divine Good power hath in the hellish foundation, that is in the Nay, a contrarium, that the Yea, viz. the Truth, might be recognised; and thus the darkness, viz. the foundation of God's wrath, is become image-like, or creatural, (N.B.) in the devils.

(13.) But yet it may be asked, How is it possible that out of a beauteous holy angel, an ugly wrathful devil is come to be?

(14.) This is done through the two eternal central-fires, wherein the will standeth in the properties; when the one divorceth itself from the other, then it is already done. Which is done also in man, which destroyeth a good man.

Question IX.—Seeing that God is omnipotent, why did he not resist Lucifer, but suffered it to come to pass?

Answer. (1.) When fire-and-light are once divorced, then there is a great enmity one against the other; like as water and fire are enemies, and neither of them desireth the other any more, for the one is the death of the other. But so long as they stand together in one only vegetating life, in one only ground, they love one another, and stand in great joy together. Thus also it is to be conceived of the devil and of God. God desireth the devil no more, and the devil also desireth God no more.

(2.) But if it be asked, Why did not God in the motion prevent him? It is answered, God did give him his Love, and so did prevent him, as he also prevented Adam. But the eternal central-fire, viz. God's wrath, would not have it; that in them would sever itself into its own kind.

(3.) Here we are to distinguish between God's LOVE and WRATH. They are indeed both called GOD; but God, inasmuch as he is the eternal Good, is not the wrath, the wrath hath another principium. In the Love-fire indeed they are one, but in the divorcement they are two. And seeing they are both eternal, without beginning, therefore they have also an eternal will, and the one cannot kill the other, but each continueth in itself eternally. They are no other but a two-fold power, and are two centra, yet come originally out of the Unity, out of one ground.

(4.) Therefore, when I say of God's love, it is omnipotent, over all and in all,—this is done according to the will of the Yea, viz. the Light; and if the Nay giveth its will thereto, then the Yea changeth the Nay into its power and love, and yet they remain two central-wills in one another, yet but in one ground, in one Love and desire; else were the wrathful God not omnipotent, if the Love had him solely in its omnipotency, and there is no other but one God, yet the Love would not be manifest, and there would be no Love known without the wrath.

(5.) Therefore the Love yieldeth itself up to the wrath-fire, that it may be a love-fire. But if the wrath severeth itself from the love into self-receptiveness, then doth not the Love hinder with force, else it would follow, that God were at odds with himself.

(6.) Thus is the Nay, viz. God's wrath, in the fallen angels, gone into a severation from the Love, viz. into a self-dominion, and this is also a wonder, and moreover Good: so that the other angels have a looking-glass or monition that the self-will elevate not itself. Also, that there be an eternal joy and praise of God, that they live not in such fire's essence, and thereupon the more turn their desire into the Unity of God, and remain standing in the resignation and humility, that is in the divine harmoni.

(7.) When now here it is said of the will of God's wrath, that it broke itself off from the Love, and would be image-like, that must not be understood as without the creature. It was no strange will in the apostate angels, which had not then been image-like, but the wrathful God in the formed creature, which creature before was image-like; else their whole locus had been an apostasy. Yet that it is not so, appeareth by this, that they were thrust out of their thrones.

(8.) We must not lay the fault of the fall upon God, but only upon the imaged power in the creature, according to the Nay. This has trifled it away, so that it is become a lie; not God, but the creature; not the unformed-power wherein the Love burneth, but the throne according to the receptibility and self-hood. And as their king and prince did, so likewise did all his legions.

(9.) For when God's wrath hardeneth a creature, there doth not then enter into it, a strange fierce wrath which hardeneth it, but its own fierce wrath doth that; wherefore it is, that a sentence or judgment passeth upon it. For if God did force it to evil, then no judgment could be passed upon it, for it would do only that which God would have; but thus it doth what God would not have it do, and therefore it cometh into judgment or condemnation.

(10.) Reason babbleth much indeed concerning God, and his omnipotency, but it understandeth little of God and his being, what and how he is. It separateth the soul totally from God, as if he were a sundry being, and it knoweth not what an angel, and a soul is. And this is the great misfortune of the blindness of reason, that men wrangle, dispute, and never at all come to the foundation.

Question X.—What did the Devil desire, whereupon he divorced himself from God's love?

Answer. (1.) He desired to be an artist. He saw the creation, and understood the ground; whereas he himself would be a self-God, and rule with the central-fire's might in all things, and image himself with all things, also image himself in all forms, that he might be what he would, and not what the Creator would. As indeed this is still to this day the greatest joy of the devils, that they can transmute themselves, and bring themselves into many images, and thus perform phantasmas.

(2.) He would be a fool, and that he is become; but he knew not how it would be, if the Light should extinguish in him. Like as Adam also knew not how it would be, when he should feel heat and cold; when also the central-fire together with the properties, should awake in him; and that he should fall out of the temperature, and lose the central Light-fire: this Adam knew not.

(3.) The devil would be a Lord in the Nay, and possess another principium, viz. the might of the separation in the ground of the figure-like imaging. The subjection pleased him not, but the highness; he despised the humility and sweetness or meekness, viz. the Love and the Truth, and would not be in the Unity, but in the multiplicity.

(4.) He would work with his own name, that is with the central-fire's power, and not with God's name of his own throne; he did set the Nay above the Yea. Thus he became an enemy of God, and a liar and murderer of the good imaging of the Good powers; he desired to destroy whatsoever the working of God imaged, that he might represent his own working and imaging.

(5.) The magic ground of the omnipotence pleased him; for which he revolted, and gainsayed the Yea, because this was not in his centro a fire's working, and that he saw, that the Yea, viz. the efflux of the Unity, introduced itself in the fire's centro, into a Light and working Love. Therefore he supposed that the fire's nature was stronger, and more than the gentleness of the Unity, viz. the imaged Names in the opening Unity, which he intended to bring into his fire's might, as he pleased; and to such a will, God had not created him.

(6.) Therefore seeing he forsook God's ordinance, the Holy opening Name of God severed itself from him, and continued in the Unity, and Lucifer remained in the properties of the central fire, dwelling in himself, and yet stood in his princely throne, wherein the Holy name of God had imaged itself into a throne, and was no more an angel, with his legions, but a horrible vizard-image and monstrum.

(7.) For when the Light went out in him, then the darkness and the cold sharpness of the fierceness, became manifest in him, and he became instantly an enemy of God, and of all angelical hosts.

Question XI.—What was the strife betwixt Michael and the Dragon? What is Michael, and the Dragon; and how is the vanquishing and thrusting-out effected?

Answer. (1.) Michael is the high name of the divine figure of this throne, in which Lucifer was a prince. It is that which severeth itself off from the Nay, that is from the lie, in which name and power Lucifer should co-work with God. It was the might and power of the strong Love of God in this throne, and remains so eternally. Also, he is himself the throne according to the Divine figure in the Unity, not as a creature, but as a figure of the power of God, in the opening or moving of the Unity.

(2.) Which Name afterwards, when the Unity did once more move, with the efflux, JE-SUS, did become ordained for man; for the sake of which, the devil became an enemy of men, because they shall possess his throne, and therefore he desireth to have men in his kingdom.

(3.) But the Dragon is the hellish foundation in its manifestation, in which Lucifer with his legions, had imaged himself, which foundation had with the throne prince Lucifer, elevated itself, viz. the central-fire kingdom according to the receptibility, which also is no creature, but the figure of God's wrath, according to the kind or manner of the severation from the Unity and Love.

(4.) It is the own or self-will of the might of the wrath, which cannot well be expressed with image-like words. Also it is the fierceness, a source and essence of heat, cold, hardness, acid sharpness, sting, bitter anguish, and woe, viz. the perceptibility, the first principium, a mere hunger and thirst, a desire of vanity and lies, a stink of poison and death-quality.

(5.) This fire is like a brimstone-fire, which burneth in stink and poison, for it is the dying death-anguish, viz. the death and hell, which became manifest in the apostasy of Lucifer.

(6.) But the SATAN which seducth the whole world, as Christ saith, this is now this false will of the self-hood, the first principium, viz. the will of hell, a ground of lies and contradictions, a leading-off from the good, an universal spirit of the hellish foundation, yet is no creature, but the false mind in the hellish foundation, viz., the hellish science.

(7.) And there are also devils of such properties and names, which are also princes in their legions, for they have imaged themselves in the hellish property.

(8.) This ground is their life, and holds them captive in itself; and as the properties of the hellish foundation are manifold, so also are there such princes among them, ruling in the same properties.

(9.) Thus also Belial is the source of lust, uncleanness and inordinateness.

(10.) Beelzebub, a source of idolatry and false imaging.

(11.) Asmodus, a spirit of fury or madness, and so forth. All these are qualities of the hellish foundation, yet also there are such creatural spirits therein.

(12.) But Lucifer is the fountain-source of pride, viz. of aspiringness.

(13.) All these properties were also awakened in man after the fall, when he turned himself away from God, and they have imaged themselves with man.

(14.) The same are now the Dragon, the old Serpent, with which MICHAEL, viz. the figure of the Divine power, fought and cast him out of the Holy names, together with his legions; and in man the name JE-SUS, striveth against this Dragon.

(15.) This strife is no imaged creatural being. Indeed it hath gone forth against the image-like domination of the false, lying spirits, that would rule and domineer in the Divine Names; it is a strife between Yea and Nay, between the image-like wrath and image-like Love, between the first and second principium.

(16.) In this strife, must the Divine character of the IDEAE overcome, if it will be an angel. In this strife is Adam fallen, and in this strife did the name JE-SUS, in the assumed humanity, obtain the victory over this Dragon, in the wilderness, when he was tempted forty days, and at last in death totally overcame him.

(17.) This strife was with Moses on Mount Sinai, in the Father's property, in the fire, when he remained there forty days, where Israel was tried whether he could and would abide in the property of the Father, but when that was not possible, then Israel fell away, and made himself an idol-God, viz. the golden calf. Upon which the tables of the Law were broken, to signify, that the human will of the self-hood could not prevail against the foundation of the wrath, but it must now be broken and put to death, and through death be introduced again into the Holy names.

(18.) Wherefore Christ must die, and lead the human will through death, through the hell, and through this foundation, for the own receptiveness of the self-will may not subsist in God. For if a will shall subsist in God, then it must be imperceptible and impassive, that it may be able to dwell in the fire, and yet not be consumed by the fire.

(19.) Like as the sun in the elements penetrateth through all, and kindleth itself in the elements, and yet its light continueth free in itself; or like as the fire gloweth through the iron, and yet it becometh not iron, but the iron is only an objectum, wherein the fire elevates and inflameth itself; so pure must also be the will, which God's Unity shall possess, that there be no receptiveness in it.

(20.) For as soon as it passeth into self-receptiveness, then such a dragon, viz. the hellish foundation is manifest in it; it must penetrate thoroughly the wrath-fire, and only inflame itself in the fire, without receptiveness. When, there would abide two clear essences in one only ground, viz. the fire and the light: in the fire the Nature, viz. the motion, and in the light the will-spirit or the true power of the Unity of God.

(22.) Thus may love and wrath stand undivorced in one only ground, and be wholly one original thing;—and thus are we to consider of God and of the holy angels.

(23.) Now understand this Question thus, That the power of the throne, viz. the Yea and Nay, God's love and the imaged wrath of the eternal Nature of the central fire-will, have striven one against the other; in which Lucifer sate with his angels, and would be a Lord, and was thus the cause that this central-fire-will figured itself into a den of the Dragon, that is, into a hellish foundation: which God permitted, that he might punish the apostate angel, and hold him captive therein, to hinder him from further disturbing the creation.

Question XII.—How are men to consider the eternal counsel of God, in the Divine Contemplation, as St. Paul speaketh concerning it, 1 Cor. ii. 7—10, Ephes. i. 11; which standeth not in man's ability as a creature, and yet is possible? How may a man in very reality, come to see and understand such ground of the deep Unity?

Answer. (1.) We have introduced this question, because the unenlightened mind holds it impossible to be able to know such secret mysteries, and being itself unable to apprehend the same, it blasphemeth, ascribing such knowledge to the devil. Wherefore in love to our fellow-creatures, we will a little expound the matter, to try if any may become seeing, and understand the deep sense.

(2.) Reason runneth on in mere imaginarieness after a creatural manner, and supposeth that God in his Trinity, had consulted with himself what he would create, and how it would and should go with it; and thereupon it determineth the fall of Lucifer and of Adam in a certain limit, that God foreknew it and therefore had ordained it, of his predestinate purpose: and so forth. But reason's mere thinking is not the ground. God needed not to consult with himself about anything, for he himself is the counsel; the high outflowing Names of the powers, viz. the wonder-doing-Word, is the counsel of God. There is also no predestinate purpose concerning anything, for the origin of all things lieth in the idea, in eternal imaging; not like an imaged substance, but in a perpetual ideal imaging, where God's Love and Wrath, viz. the two central-fires of the powers, stand in a continually enduring love-wrestling. Where, in such wrestling of the powers, the wonder-doing-Word imagineth itself in figures, which are mere reflex-images of the Holy names and powers, and are called IDEAS.

(3.) On the other side, the powers of the eternal Nature also image themselves according to the manner of the forms to the fire, viz. in a dark, sharp, hard, fierce, prickly-stinging, bitter, anxious, fiery, and cold manner, which are not creatures, but an imaging of the powers in the Nay, that is in God's wrath; and yet they are continually penetrated or possessed with the Yea and the central-light, and changed into a Love play, as it were an evil thing becoming a good thing, or a damned soul or angel becoming a good, holy angel.

(4.) Such imaging of the IDEAS hath indeed been from eternity, where the Spirit of God hath seen all things, what there should and could come to be, when such imagings should be brought forth creaturely; yet it cometh not from a divine Consultation of the Holy Name, but existeth in the Outflowen free will, according to both the central-fires of the powers, where the powers do create and image themselves. The own-will imagineth itself in the Nay, viz. in the fierce fire's kind, and the Yea or outbreathing of the Unity, formeth itself in the Light; and both these figures stand in one only ground in one another. In the Yea standeth the Holy Name of the love of God, and in the Nay standeth the name of the wrath of God; and there the Yea, in the Holy Name of the divine Love, wrestleth with the Nay (that is, with the outflowen will of the self-receptiveness,) for the victory, and yet it is no other than a Love play. For the Light penetrateth the imaging of the darkness, whereby this imaging is set into a joyful triumph, and thus there is an eternal overcoming of the Dragon in God's wrath, and yet it is no other than a sport of both the central-fire-wills.

(5.) And here is the purpose of God, of which the Scripture speaketh, and yet it standeth in the own or self-will. God, inasmuch as he is, and is called God, or rather Deity, hath need of no figure, but the powers are necessary for the overcoming.

(6.) And here is also the ground of the devils, where the self-will, that is the Nay, strove in an image like manner, against the Yea, and departed from the Yea, having divorced itself by its own self-motion, and become a devil, viz. an enemy against the Yea, and entered into own image-like dominion.

(7.) In this ground, we also see how Michael hath striven against this Dragon and the imaged False wills, in which false wills was yet in the beginning, the Yea, viz. the Holy name, when they were angels. But the self-will of the central-fire's own receptiveness, severed itself from the Yea in itself, and therefore it was thrust out by the Yea in the name Michael.

(8.) This also is set before us in Holy Scripture, both by the prophet Mich and by king Saul, when an evil spirit from the Lord entered into Saul, and also into the prophet Zedekiah and his companions. Also when the Lord said, Who shall persuade Ahab, that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-Gilead? And one said on this manner, and another said on that manner. And then came forth a spirit and stood before the Lord, and said, I will persuade him. And the Lord said unto him, Wherewith? And he said, I will go forth, and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets. And he said, Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also; go forth, and do so. 1 Kings xxii. 20. 22. This same Lord was now the Wrath of God, which burned over Israel, as is to be seen in many places of the Scripture, especially in Moses and in the prophets, that the Lord threatened them in his fire's might, that he would devour them. [Understand the Scriptures do not always mean the same thing by the word God, Lord, Lord God, e.g. this Lord is not that of St. James i. 13.]

(9.) Thus we now understand in this ground rightly, that such pouring forth of God's wrath cometh out of such a foundation, for in the Holy name of God, viz. in the centro of the Light, there is no wrath-will, but only love, which is God himself.

Q Q Q Q

(10.) But in the Nay, that is in the fire's might, exist such beams of wrath; and these are the evil spirits in Saul, and in the false prophets, and also in the babylonish strife of the Sects and parties, in respect of the opinions in Religion. Wherein they do not purely and sincerely love God, cleaving only to him, but will only run on in inventions and reasoning; and thereupon such sources of error, and such evil contentious spirits do rise up out of the fiery soul, which is sprung forth out of this ground of the eternal central-fire, and become a creature.

(11.) These sources are mere evil spirits from the Lord of God's Wrath, sprung forth out of the self-will of the own-receptiveness, and are right heretics, or cast-out spirits, as they, the sects, reproachingly call each other. Whereby we see, that they strive merely for the victory of their images, and in the latter would continually overcome the Holy name, viz. the outflowen Word of God; for they strive only about the letter, after that manner as the inward strife is, and cometh to pass, between the Yea and Nay, that is between the two eternal principles.

(12.) And in this strife, did the holy name JE-SUS sink itself down in the humanity, that it might overpower such source of the Dragon and the wrath of God, and release poor man from the will of the Nay; and so now in this strife he ruleth over all his enemies, viz. over sin, death, the devil and hell, as the Scripture saith, till these his enemies, (which all of them are enemies of the kingly and princely throne of Michael, because they are become thrust out of it,) be laid under his feet as a footstool, and this dominion and imaging in this throne ceaseth.

(13.) Hereby, to those that are of the true theosophic fraternity, whose understandings are enlightened by God, enough is shown; and we intend this in love to all. It is the highest arcanum which God openeth to us, and the very last, for those that can understand it. But for the scorers, so long as they shall persist in being such, we have written nothing, but we seal it with the eternal will, so that it shall be understood by no rash-judging, self-willed, blind scorner. Amen.

(14.) But now how we may really understand such depth of the Deity, and search all things, according to what St. Paul saith thereof, that the Spirit searcheth all things, even the deeps of God, 1 Cor. ii. 10, and that the natural, rational man in self-ability, viz. the own-will, apprehendeth nothing, and yet that this is apprehensible in man, understand it as follows:

(15.) Man is an image of the Being of all beings, a true image of God, according to Love and Wrath. For first, the soul is the eternal central-fire of the self-will, for out of that must all creatures come, and not out of the pure Deity.

(16.) And secondly, the soul-spirit is the central Light-fire, sprung forth out of the eternal IDEA of the power of God, and is supernatural; wherefore it is also a temple of the Holy Ghost, in which Christ dwelleth, and feedeth the soul with his flesh and blood, that is, with divine and human balsam, in which the death and wrath of God is become broken: whereupon there remaineth such divine balsam in the Spirit of the soul essentially, as Christ saith, Whosoever eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, abideth in me and I in him. John vi. 56.

(17.) But thirdly, the outward body is of the outer world, out of the four elements and the astral spirit, which outer dominion ruleth the outward life; after which outer dominion the Adamical soul longed or lusted, and for the sake thereof severed its will from the Unity of God, and introduced it into the dominion of this world. Where the will in itself became captive by the Dragon of God's wrath, and turned into a monstrum, when the true spirit died or faded away, so that the light of God extinguished to it, and the IDEA became dumb and inoperative.

(18.) Which spirit the Idea, JE-SUS, viz. an efflux from the divine Unity, came to assist, and introduced again the light of the Love into the poor soul.

(19.) When now this name JE-SUS, which was called CHRIST when he assumed the humanity, entered into the poor apostate soul, and penetrated it with this beam of God's Unity, then became the eternal idea, viz. the true Spirit, in such balsam of the Love, living and moveable again; then the light again shone in the eternal darkness of the soul, and the Nay was reunited with the Yea, where then Michael in the strife, stood against the Dragon, viz. the name of the throne in Christo Jesu.

(20.) In this light the soul seeth again into its native country, which it had at first, viz. into its original, out of which it sprang forth; for the Name of God is in it, and worketh in the spirit. Here it standeth in the contemplation of God, and may search out all things; yet not in self-motion and own will, but when the Name of God in the moving, entereth into it, then it looketh upon the forming of the wonder-doing NAME, it seeth and heareth what God speaketh in it; not in image-like speaking, but virtual or vital in the understanding, as the prophets have spoken. And yet this is incomprehensible to outward reason. Of which St. Paul saith, Our conversation is in heaven, Philip. iii. 20, and yet also that a thorn was given him in the flesh, = messenger of Satan, (viz. an opening or efflux from the spirit of lust,) to buffet him, 2 Cor. xii. 7.

(21.) Understand this matter rightly, thus; a man seeth such secret mysteries in the Spirit of Christ, wherein all treasures of wisdom do lie, as the Scripture testifieth throughout. Thus are we to understand what the eternal counsel of God is, and then also how man may come to such vision or contemplation. We have here only hinted at the possibility, but the way or process how to attain thereto, is largely enough described elsewhere.

Thus much, we say, by way of suggestion, or in elucidation of the manner—summary yet sufficiently explicit,* in which the Questions may be treated by the Candidate, as observed on p. 663, by way of testing his own theosophic apprehensibility, along with the other specified qualifications necessary to present a just and adequate portraiture of Mr. Law's mental constitution. Wherefore, he may now continue the solution of the remaining Questions, in such respect; or commence de novo, and answer them as his own speciality of genius may direct him therein.

We have now finally completed the task proposed to ourselves by this Work, and submit the whole to the consideration of the qualified reader. The design of it having been so repeatedly expressed on its pages, as well as its object, will render it unnecessary for us to add anything at length on those points, on the present occasion. What we wish to obtain, is the portraiture of a beau-ideal man of sterling sense and genius, of solid and sufficient erudition, a christian gentleman, a sage, and a divine philosopher—in the highest sense of the terms, from as it were a living model of the same; which, or the materials for which, we think we have furnished in the present volume, or if any deficiencies thereof, they may be supplied out of those at our command, conjointly with the ingenuity of the desired artist. Our object being in effect,—to form or establish, (by way of direction of the education of the rising future generations of men,) a practical STANDARD, of a perfectly square or right proportioned, uniform or nonidiotic, equally developed or exactly balanced mind, and consequently sound judgment, in regard to moral sentiment, erudition, literature, science, philosophy, and christianity, the latter* in its full theosophic scope, as well as simple evangelical knowledge and experience.

As concentrating these qualifications and perfections in a character, we think soberly, that we are justified in presenting the as yet unknown WILLIAM LAW to public notice in that respect; or at all events, as the nearest approximation to such an estimable and admirable combined excellence that we have ever met with, (or can conceive to have been,) either in the annals of history, (see Note, p. 334, 371, etc.,) or in the course of our own observations in life. And as his mind was, we say, so exactly composed and arranged, by nature and by art, by true erudition and piety, so he brought his knowledge and judgment to bear in the same just adequateness, and relations of moral value, in whatever became the subject of his mental contemplation, and issued from him, either by his pen or his word of speech; all being so to speak, poised and regented by perfect common sense acting under the light of high wisdom. Not that we mean to say, that Mr. Law was a totally regenerate, or a perfect man, but only that his mind was most admirably qualified for, and uniformly and highly advanced in growth toward that blissful consummation: for the piercing fiery sharpness, acidity and bitterness of his natural essences, (which qualities in the finest fruits of this world, as indeed of Paradise itself, form the ground of their rich taste and fine spirit when at perfect maturity,) were not yet so perfectly tinctured by the exterior action and inward developement of the divine light, as to be absolutely transmuted (though in his will so,) into paradisaical virtues and divine graces; which is perfect inward regeneration. Wherefore, when he deemed it needful, they could be, as they were, experienced or tasted according to their fundamental astringency and stinging pungency, by those who when affected by them, had not divine virtue sufficient to transmute their action into love, or in whom such qualities of the dark principle predominated, and who, by the evil motion of which, and the consequent pernicious action thereof on the public happiness, had given him cause as a guardian sage of truth, so to correct or reprove them.

Such, then, being our belief, (however rhapsodical our statements may appear to those who are ignorant of their well-groundedness. who have not tasted of the refined intellectual food and refreshments, or felt and enjoyed the supreme ravishing light, which enable us thus to speak; and whose opinions and judgment therefore upon the matter, until they are enabled to speak from experience, must necessarily themselves be phantastical and presumptuous, however they may usher them forth in an assumed garb of ability and knowledge, or in religious sentimentality of expression,)—such being, we say, our conviction, (and how far our judgment may be deserving of attention, in the absence of positive knowledge, must be either admitted, or left to those to declare who are capable of it,) we may not only be excused in our high admiration of such elevated and surpassing excellence, as we have described, but even be deemed worthy of honour, for having made it thus known to the world, and attempted thereby the object, which we state we had, and have in view to accomplish, by the present publication.

~~The following is a Gentleman, deceased, who in his deed of settlement a considerable sum to be applied by his Trustees, in the sum of 30 years from 1810, to the payment of Two Premiums for the best Paper, rise on the following subject: The evidence that there is a being all powerful, wise, and good, by whom every thing exists, and particularly to provide mankind, regarding the wisdom and goodness of the Deity. And this in the first place, from consideration of the nature of matter, extension, and in the second place, from the revelation of the true Deity, and from the whole, to bring out the references most necessary for, and useful to mankind.~~

~~This announcement appeared as a public Advertisement in THE TIMES journal of April 9, Sep. 24, 1840, and May 1, 1850; and in answer thereto, we also forward this work, which it may be needful to add, we perceive here and there to require a little alteration, but which, as to the main substance of it, taking the conclusion in connection with its previous portions, is correct. But we purpose going through every page of it, and noting the Corrections that duty and improved judgment require to be made, with respect to certain opinions, as well as statements inserted therein from time to time, under misapprehension of mind. Which ERRATA we intend to place at the beginning of the work, as a protection to the reader of it, from false or undue impressions.~~

And now to return to the Candidate, by what has been given he will be enabled to qualify himself duly for the proposed task, and in referring him at this close, to the Advertisement at the commencement, (upon which we need hardly repeat the whole work is merely of the nature of a large commentary,) we have only to add, that Communications in reply may be addressed (as stated at the foot of p. 51,) to PHILO-TEUTONICUS, and left at 24, LUDGATE STREET, LONDON, whereupon they will receive immediate attention.

Intimations having been given at intervals throughout this work, of a proposition to publish by Subscription, a beautiful Edition, new and carefully revised, of the theosophical Works of Law, Behmen and Freher, with their Symbols, Diagrams, and other Illustrative Drawings, which would occupy some Twenty handsome 8vo. Volumes, of about 500 pages each,—See end of Introduction to Theosophy Gentlemen and Ladies who may be desirous to share in so philanthropic an enterprise, by advancing £50 or £100 each toward the expense, or becoming Subscribers for five or ten copies of the same, the total cost averaging, it is supposed, about 10s. 6d. a volume, are respectfully requested to communicate such agreement to PHILO-TEUTONICUS, as before directed, at 24, LUDGATE STREET, LONDON. The scope and real nature of these serial writings, is, in a word, the revelation and demonstration of the mystery of GOD and Nature, of eternity and time, angels and Man, and all creatures, and reasons of things, or in a word, the entire philosophy of Truth.—We may just add, that the German edition of Böhme's Works, which would be strictly followed in the proposed translation, is that published A.D. 1730; which surpasses every other for precision of arrangement, as well as original correctness.

Further, we would recall to the reader's mind, what we have said respecting the necessity of a Theosophic College,—in regard to the true, enlightened fathoming of Christianity, and the establishment of a system of training of right subjects for its propagation, in the high arcana, science, arts, and prerogatives of the regeneration,—on p. 559, 638—40 supra, and elsewhere throughout this work. From the first of which references, we make the following extract:—

‘May the Lord infuse into the heart of some rich reader of this treatise, ‘so great a power of his love, and kindle therein so intense and affecting a ‘desire to proclaim the Divine glory, by the promotion of the reign of heavenly Wisdom on earth, as shall lead to the cheerful tendering of the needful pecuniary means for the establishment of such a Scheme. For surely ‘a more glorious, philanthropic and sublime christian work—one more conducive to the happiness of the world, and the elevation of the human intellect—might scarcely be accomplished.’ One of the very appropriate employments of the chief inmates thereof, might indeed be the preparation of the above proposed new series of theosophical and other corresponding literature; presenting in fact an entirely new original and complete, and as such standard philosophy to the world, for all future ages. In short, all the science and art, theoretic and practical, for the perfect evangelical regeneration.

POSTSCRIPT TO THE ADVERTISEMENT.

THE INTRODUCTION TO THEOSOPHY, mentioned p. 676, in 18mo., might itself serve for the presentation of an abridged edition of the Works of LAW, BÖHME, and FREHER to the English public. For instance, the Second Volume (the First Volume being almost completed,) might contain Mr. LAW's 'Appeal,' and 'Spirit of Prayer,' adding to the last Dialogue of this latter work, the first Dialogue of the 'Way to Divine Knowledge,' this as a complete finish to this volume. The Third Volume might consist of the Second and Third Dialogues of the 'Way to Divine Knowledge,' retrenching however a few leaves of obsolete matter at the commencement of the former of the Dialogues. And following this in the same Volume, might be given the 'Spirit of Love,' with a select few of his Letters. The Fourth Volume might commence with BÖHME's writings, placing the Mysterium Magnum as the introduction to their scope and contents. And so on to the end of them, which in the whole might occupy eight or nine Volumes, as in the German edition. About the Fourteenth Volume might then commence FREHER's writings.—Next after these might be presented three or four treatises of Animal Magnetism, setting forth in proper classification, its various recorded and known phenomena, both of body and mind, and also in respect to the instinctive and inanimate creation; and then indicating the ground and mystery of the same, with suggestions as to its further application, all according to the constituted principles, properties, and laws of nature, as described in the previously given theosophical treatises. And also showing how this wonderful, but as yet undeveloped, nay, unapprehended discovery of these last ages, (of vital magnetism,) has ever been the great experimental desideratum to theosophy, though alluded to and prophesied of, by its grand masters in their writings, (composing the former portion of this course of study,) as an event that should assuredly arrive, and to be continually expected. When indeed, the writings of BÖHME, or rather the realities of wisdom and truth so wonderfully configured in them, should be rendered apprehensible to any, and every right subject and artist; nay, when greater wonders of pure natural and evangelical truth, (not of Swedenborgian or other astral phantasma,) than those, should be opened to contemplation and research, at the will and direction of the controlling and rightly graduated magus. [See, for instance, BÖHME's allusions to the time of lilies and roses, (the paradisaical efflorescence and fruitage of the varieties of the human life and intellect,) the downfall of Babel, and his continual hints to his schoolfellows, concerning the secret science and art of magic, the point of motion in nature, the separator and tincture, the working creating word, &c.; also, FREHER's allusions and assurances of the same nature, as on p. 468 supra; also LAW's similar averments, as at the head of note, p. 560 supra, in his published 'Letters,' and at the end of his 'Animadversions on Traps."] By the supply, then, of this congenial experimental (à posteriori) central philosophy of God and Nature, or as it is more properly termed, theosophy; coupling therewith also, the high Bramwell-like or standard evangelical and other sublime experiences of the divine life possessed by the christian church, as implied in the contents of pp. 634 to 641,—by these we say, a key is presented to us, whereby to unlock the door and to enter into, and freely explore the most secret arcana of the practical mysteries of the divine and natural magic; and whereby indeed, all that is well grounded in the ancient Hermetic or Alchemic philosophy, may be proved,—if not found to be mere rudimentary conceptions and potencies, in respect of our new, consummated evangelical dispensation, or autumnal fruition in man of divine understanding and power.

The chief practical end then, of these last proposed volumes in this series, would be the judicious exposition of the art, whereby the humanity with respect to its moral or divine capacity, may be magically freed from its disorder, pollution and deadness, (as implied in the imperative requirements of our Lord in order to realise his life, salvation and redemption,) and then powerfully introduced into the birth, element and qualifications of the spirit of love, or its original and redeemed inward perfection. This, it is admitted, is the end of the common Christianity; but the latter no longer possessing the power of the keys, or high graduation in divine experience and recondite science, we maintain, is unable to effect the same, as contemplated in the Gospel,—which intimates that the true disciple or perfect believer in Christ, shall be inwardly as his glorified head and Lord, and shall manifest that sublimate exaltation of nature by corresponding works, wisdom and power. But on this topic we must not here enlarge. We might also refer to the glorious benefits of such a divine art in respect to education, in opening and strengthening the intellectual powers,—but shall conclude these remarks with the following extract in reference to this, and all other points, involved in the above observations:—

“Neither the medicus nor the alchemist hath the ground of the tincture, unless he be born again in the Spirit. Such an one seeth through all, whether he be learned or unlearned; with God the peasant is as acceptable as the doctor.—The tincture is a thing which separates, and brings the pure and clear from the impure, and which brings the life of all sorts of spirits, or all sorts of essences, into their highest degree of exaltation! Yea, it is the cause of the shine, or lustre; it is a cause that all creatures see and live. But its form is not one and the same—it is not in a beast as in man; so also is it different in stones and herbs. Although it is truly in all things, yet in some things it is strong, and in some, weak.

“But if we search what it is in essence and property, and how it is generated, then we find a very precious and noble substance in its birth, for it is come forth from the virtue and fountain of the Deity, which hath imprinted itself in all things. And therefore it is so secret and hidden, and is imparted to the knowledge of none of the unholy or sophisticate to find it, and therefore it remaineth inviolably hidden to him.”

With this quotation we close, merely repeating that the object of these last volumes in the course, would be to turn to the divine and proper account, in such position and relation, and after a further adequate development of it, the glorious discovery, phenomena and philosophy of the desideratum of vital magnetism.

We have then stated, above, the arrangements we propose, respecting the publication of LAW's works. We have also described the German edition of BÖHME, to be strictly followed in the proposed new translation of his writings, viz. that of A.D. 1730. It remains then, in this Postscript, to give the particulars respecting FREHER's writings; which are only known, and only can be known to ourselves. These intimations may therefore serve as a direction for their future publication, should it not please the Divine Providence to honor us as the immediate instruments of so great a benefaction to the world.

The following then, is a correct account of FREHER's WRITINGS, and in the order in which they were composed. After which statement, we shall present our annotations respecting the editions to be followed in case of their publication. The Titles and Contents are these following:—

(1.) SERIAL ELUCIDATIONS of the PRINCIPLES of PHILOSOPHY and THEOLOGY of BOHEMIUS, surnamed the TEUTONIC THEOSOPHER. In NINE VOLUMES.

VOL. A.—(1.) Of GOD considered WITHOUT all NATURE and CREATURE.

(2.) Of GOD, considered as MANIFESTING HIMSELF through Eternal NATURE. Of the Two co-ETERNAL PRINCIPLES—Of the SEVEN PROPERTIES—And, of the THREE CONSTITUENT PARTS of NATURE. With a SYMBOL in illustration of the subject.

VOL. B.—AN EXPLANATION of that SCHEME, or Table of BOHEMIUS, wherein GOD is CONSIDERED in the UNITY and TRINITY, WITHOUT all NATURE and CREATURE.—

(3.) An ANSWER to an OBJECTION, concerning the DESIRE'S ATTRACTING ITSELF.—(4.) Of the further MORE EXTERIOR MANIFESTATION of GOD, through the CREATION of ANGELS. Of MATERIAL CAUSES.—(5.) Of the FALL of LUCIFER and ALL his ANGELS.

VOL. C.—(6.) Of the CREATION of this our OUTWARD THIRD PRINCIPLE, wherein we Live, and Move, and have our Outward Being. With a Discourse on the SCOPE of St. JOHN's WORDS, 'IN THE BEGINNING.'

VOL. D.—(7.) Of the FALL of MAN from his primeval GLORY and PERFECTION, down INTO the SPIRIT of this WORLD.—(8.) Of the NATURAL PROPAGATION of MAN, in this now CURSED four-elementary WORLD.—(9.) Of MAN'S REGENERATION, through the BLOOD and DEATH of CHRIST.

VOL. E.—(10.) Of the ETHERIAL WORD'S BECOMING FLESH. Or of the PURE, IMMACULATE CONCEPTION and INCARNATION of our LORD JESUS CHRIST, in the WOMB of the blessed VIRGIN MARY.

NOTE.—The above systematic discourses are presumed to have been written between A.D. 1699 and 1703. The references therein made to J. B.'s Works, it may be proper to mention, are to the German edition of 1682, the numbers of the paragraphs or verses of which, do not always correspond with those of the English translation. The next treatise to which the author now applied himself, was that which we have hereafter denominated MICROCOSMOS: the idea of which was originally taken by him from a German publication A.D. 1696, by Johan Georg Graber and Johan Georg Gichtel, entitled, 'A brief Manifestation of the Three Worlds or Principles in Man.' The original title of this treatise, was THREE VERY DIFFERENT TABLES WITH THEIR EXPLANATIONS. In the year 1717, the author made considerable enlargements in the 'Explanation' of the First Table; and in the year 1727, an alteration was made in the Second and Third Tables, by the substitution of a Peacock for a Hunting Dog, according to J. B.'s metaphor in his 'Mysterium Magnum,' xxi. 12. We shall therefore present this work as if composed A.D. 1717.

[The preceding treatises in elucidation of the scope and principles of philosophy and theology of BOHEMIUS, were written at the request of esteemed friends of the author, and lent to them for perusal; amongst whom may be mentioned the learned Francis Lee, and the Rev. E. Waple, of St. Sepulchre's, Skinner Street. Indeed, it would appear from observations interspersed by the author throughout his writings, that what he undertook of this nature up to the year 1712, was altogether done at the entreaties of his friends, on emergent occasions. About the close of the Seventeenth and the early part of the Eighteenth Century, the writings of Bohemius (such of them as could be obtained, for they were then as now rare to be met with,) were earnestly looked into by many learned persons; some of whom (as might well be imagined,) formed misconceptions of their very profound yet exact and true sense, and so raised objections to such points and averments in them, as seemed to them in disaccordance with sound philosophy. Among the latter parties, it appears was one Mr. P., a friend of the Rev. Mr. Waple above mentioned, who therefore requested our author to clear up the true sense of J. B.'s ground which had seemed to his friend uncertain; whereupon he wrote the following Treatise, as on similar occasions, the remaining pieces of this series. These latter, we conjecture, were composed between the years 1705-12.]

VOL. F.—NOTHING and SOMETHING. Being a DISCOURSE concerning the TRUE SIGNIFICANT SENSE of BOHEMIUS'S DEEPEST, ETERNAL or ABYSSAL NOTHING. HOW this NOTHING (according to his Gift and Declaration) BRINGS FORTH ITSELF into SOMETHING, in and through the PROCESS of ETERNAL NATURE. HOW this SOMETHING is DISTINGUISHED FROM, (or WHETHER, and in WHAT SENSE it may be called OPPOSITE TO,) that former NOTHING. BUT more especially, HOW ALL his different DESCRIPTIONS of the DIVINE BEING, in UNITY and TRINITY, now as BEFORE or WITHOUT, and then as IN or AFTER ETERNAL NATURE, (only by means of UNDERSTANDING distinctly the PROPER MEANING of his ETERNAL NOTHING and SOMETHING,) may be found standing, without all Contradiction, in a MOST HARMONIOUS CONCORDANCE. Written in EXPLICATION of FOUR EMBLEMATICAL FIGURES, in which what is herein stated in Words, is for more distinct Apprehension, represented by several Signs and Characters.

NOTE.—The Four emblematic Figures mentioned in this title, (or as they might have been very properly termed—a Four-fold spiritual Figure,) constitute the first four of the 'Thirteen Theosophic Emblems,' which were afterwards engraved and inserted at the end of the Second Volume of J. B.'s Works, large 4to., published A.D. 1764. These four Figures, containing the basis of the divine revelation, the author enlarged into the Scheme in question, we judge about the year 1710. They were, probably, composed in elucidation of the single Symbol invented and inserted by the author at the end of VOL. A, supra, which figure might not have been clear to the readers of that discourse; whereupon on further reflection, the author was enabled to present his conception in this more lucid and felicitous manner. Query, Were the four circularly inclosed figures on p. 4 of our 4to. collection of fair copies of all the Author's symbolic illustrations to his writings, also originally intended for, or belonging to this figure at the end of VOL. A., or to the treatise here in question: which are thus respectively headed, Without all Nature—An Eternal Nothing—Why the Eternal Nothing introduces itself into Nature and Creature—And, How the Eternal Nothing introduces itself into Nature? We think whether so or not, in case of publication they should go with the latter.—[This treatise was not finished, because the objector owned himself mistaken, and satisfied by what the author had so far given. The first Nine pieces of the next following Volume (G.), however, supply what is wanting to it.]

VOL. G—(1.) NINETY SEVEN POSITIONS concerning GOD in UNITY and TRINITY, CONSIDERED both BEFORE and AFTER ETERNAL NATURE, according to BOHEMIUS'S CENTRAL PHILOSOPHY.—(2.) GENERAL POSITIONS concerning the DIVINE BEING in UNITY and TRINITY, and especially the GENERATION of ETERNAL NATURE, gathered from our FORMER WRITINGS, according to the mind of BOHEMIUS, and all taken either immediately FROM his own plain unquestionable WORDS, or by means of an EVIDENT CONSEQUENCE flowing forth freely out of them. An unfinished treatise. [At the end of some thirty pages of this Discourse, we find the following remark made by the author, Here the matter was interrupted, nay broken off with violence.]—(3.) HOW the PROPERTIES of ETERNAL NATURE are to be considered IN GOD.—(4.) HOW that the TWO SIMILIES made use of in a FORMER DISCOURSE, do NOT IMPLY that there are TWO TRINITIES.—(5.) FIVE QUESTIONS, raised OUT OF the FORMER DISCOURSES, ANSWERED.—(6.) CONCERNING the Expression, DARKNESS IN GOD.—(7.) ANSWERS to the following TWO QUESTIONS, first, Whether Bohemius asserts, that there was a motion of the central fire with its own self-desire, whereby the Will of God was stirred in both fires, and the wrath fire broke forth, before the Fall of Angels? Secondly, What is the true notion of own self-desire as it relates to fire and forms, and such like things of themselves inanimate; will and desire, in propriety of speech, belonging only to intellectual and rational beings?—(8.) A CONFERENCE (between A and B.) concerning ETERNAL NATURE, whether OUT OF GOD, or only EFFECTED BY his WILL.—(9.) REPRESENTATIONS of BOHEMIUS'S ETERNAL LIBERTY and ABYSSAL UNITY, pari passu ambulans.

NOTE.—Here at this place, of this collection or arrangement of the author's earlier writings, might not inappropriately have been inserted, the Fragment entitled, 'The SUBSTANCE of THREE CONFERENCES between a GERMAN THEOSOPHIST and an ENGLISH DIVINE,' written it is supposed about A.D. 1710.—We also take this opportunity of stating our conjecture, that the Fragment of this author, (of the exact character of writing of this last mentioned, and doubtless of the same date of composition,) headed IMMANUEL, and treating expressly of the 'SEVEN PROPERTIES of NATURE, with its TWO co-eternal PRINCIPLES, and THREE constituent PARTS,' was designed as a sequence to the Discourse of NOTHING and SOMETHING heretofore mentioned. Whether the author ever finished this piece, or whether he abandoned it, with a view to present its purposed contents in the projected Conferences on Predestination, cannot now be ascertained; but it is certain that the last mentioned 'CONFERENCE' Fragment, was left by the author in the state in which it is now found.—Further, there might have been also introduced in this place and relation, the remaining Fragment, in the author's handwriting, (as indeed are all these Fragments here mentioned,) which we have denominated 'A THEOSOPHIC CONFESSION of FAITH,' written in German and English, face to face, which commences at PROPOSITION XCV, and ends at PROPOSITION CXXIV. There is every reason to conclude, this last inestimable piece was really completed, and that it was written by the author, immediately after the treatise of the 'BECOMING MAN, etc.' described VOL. E, supra; but no traces now exist either of the antecedent or subsequent portions of it, to those above described. To resume.

(10.) THE PROCESS of the PHILOSOPHICAL WORK, considered as thoroughly ANALOGICAL with THAT in MAN'S REDEMPTION through JESUS CHRIST; and REPRESENTED by POSITIONS, as to its PRINCIPAL CIRCUMSTANCES. According to the DESCRIPTION given thereof, in J. B.'s SIGNATURA RERUM, Chaps. vii, x, xi, xii.—(11.) THE GROWING of VEGETABLES (with RESPECT to their YEARLY RENEWING in the SPRING-TIME) as DESCRIBED by BOHEMIUS.

VOL. H.—CRITICAL OBSERVATIONS upon the REV. EDWARD WAPLE'S EXERCITATIONS upon the PHILOSOPHY and THEOLOGY of BOHEMIUS, as elucidated in the PRECEDING DISCOURSES, and as set forth in J. B.'s WRITINGS, made at his own request.

VOL. I.—THE PARTICULAR CONTENTS of all the Former Treatises, (v. pp. 461—91 sup.) [The above series of Writings were composed, as we have stated, between A.D. 1699 and 1712, when Mr. Waple died; at which time, it would appear, our Author resided in his house.]

(2.) HIEROGLYPHICA SACRA, or DIVINE EMBLEMS, in THIRTEEN FIGURES, with their EXPLANATIONS. In elucidation of the BIRTH and BEGINNING of Nature, and of the MORAL PROGRESS and END of THINGS.

(3.) SIXTEEN CONFERENCES, CONCERNING the modern DOCTRINE of PREDESTINATION. Illustrated with SYMBOLS and DIAGRAMS. Wherein the Subject is fundamentally Resolved from the Ground of Nature, as well as from Scripture. In Eight Vols.

VOL. I.—THE FIRST CONFERENCE. A Dissuasive from searching into the doctrine of Predestination.—THE SECOND CONFERENCE. Proving that the Scriptures do not always understand the self same by the words, God, and Lord.—THE THIRD CONFERENCE. Of the Deity considered as in himself only, extra naturam. Point, Centre, Circumference.—THE FOURTH CONFERENCE. Of the Deity as manifested in and through the Properties of Eternal Nature, which are and must be Seven.—THE FIFTH CONFERENCE. Concerning the Three Radical, or Inferior Properties, and of each of them in particular.

VOL. II.—THE SIXTH CONFERENCE. Concerning the Fourth Property of Eternal Nature, standing between the Three Inferior, and the Three Superior properties. With Three large Digressions. The First, against Socinus; the Second, proving that this Nature is justly called Eternal; and the Third, against that New (Bourignon-Poiret) Doctrine, which denies an Absolute Necessity for the Death of Christ upon the Cross. [The subject of this latter digression was made the foundation of a large special discourse; which immediately succeeded the present work.] THE SEVENTH CONFERENCE. Concerning the Three Superior Properties of eternal Nature. The production of the Fourth Property, or united Power of Fire and Light. A parable of All-mine etc. God, and our God. J. B.'s Word, Scientz, not rightly expressed by the English word, Science. A true Fable of Will-mine. Riches and Poverty of Eternity.

VOL. III.—THE EIGHTH CONFERENCE. Concerning the Two co-eternal Principles of Nature. Of Annihilation and Transmutation.—THE NINTH CONFERENCE. Being a Particular Consideration of that Noble Simile, so much recommended to our Consideration by Bohemius.

NOTE.—Hitherto, the Author has only been preparing the way for a fundamental resolution of the doctrine, according to the central philosophy of Bohemius. In the remaining Conferences, it is settled first according to the Scripture, and then according to the previously opened ground of Nature, being represented according to J. B.'s deep and full sense thereof. The chief importance of this work consists in the comprehensive and perspicuous elucidation of the seven properties of Nature, with its two co-eternal principles, and three constituent parts, of darkness, fire and light; which is contained in the Third to the Ninth Conferences, above described. This most essential knowledge, of the Seven Properties of Nature, is in no other of this author's works, so clearly, copiously, and demonstratively exhibited as in the present treatises.—No one can have any solid pretensions to a knowledge of theosophical truth, until he shall have mastered in understanding and experience, this most fundamental subject, of the constituent ground of Nature.

VOL. IV.—THE TENTH CONFERENCE. [Wherein the Doctrine is settled, as yet, only according to the Scripture.] Predestination cleared up by Seven Particulars in the Simile of a Wise Man. Five Kinds of Predestination cut off from this Discourse. Proofs that God neglected no Soul, neither before, nor under, nor after the Law.

VOL. V.—THE ELEVENTH CONFERENCE. Three Preliminaries; first, What Truth is in the Scriptures; secondly, Of the Letter and the Spirit; and thirdly, Of rightly Dividing the Word of Truth. Voluntas Signi et Beneplaciti. Of the Turning of Man's Will. Of God showing Mercy to whom he will. Of Pharaoh hardened. Of Jacob and Esau. Of the Father's giving men to the Son. Objections raised from Romans ix, and other places in Scripture. Of St. Paul and St. James about Justification.

VOL. VI.—THE TWELFTH CONFERENCE. St. Paul and St. James reconciled about justification. The Strongest Predestinarian Argument, Answered. A Dream about the Doctor. Of Pharaoh again, as also of Jacob and Esau. Election and Reprobation not two collateral Branches of Predestination.

VOL. VII.—THE THIRTEENTH CONFERENCE. Concerning Pelagianism, or, the Grace of God and the Free Will of Man.—THE FOURTEENTH CONFERENCE. Concerning Semi-Pelagianism. Of Jeremiah, Ebedmelech, etc. An English Simile. A Wise and Foolish Son. The Preventing Grace and the Engrafted Word are one, and yet also distinct. Saul and St. Paul. With a Translation of Gottfried Arnold's Impartial Account of the Pelagians and Semi-Pelagians in his History of the Church and of Heretics, in the German Language.

[In the author's Original the following remarks are prefaced by him to this discourse :—"To this Fourteenth Conference belongeth my translation of a treatise of one who calls himself Hilar. Theophilus. But here is only the half part thereof, because the other half is not restored, but kept back from me wrongfully, by one, who certainly would have charged me with injustice, if I had served him so," etc.]

VOL. VIII.—THE FIFTEENTH CONFERENCE. Concerning a MS. of Bishop Sanderson, so far as his Ninth Position, upon the modern doctrine of Predestination, the Series of the Decrees of God, and the Causes and Means of Men's Salvation: as also many Questions which are now most in agitation, not only in the Church of England, but in many foreign Churches also, popish and reformed. Written by him, part in Latin and part in English, but now (upon a certain emergent occasion.) translated and transcribed all in English by one, who heartily wisheth that Babel might be pulled down, and that the Spirit of God might be built up in Jerusalem.—THE SIXTEENTH CONFERENCE. Concerning the same MS. from the Bishop's Ninth Position to the End. Also further considering several Distinctions between Grace and Grace, which are used by Predestinarians.

NOTE.—These sixteen conferences are considered to have been written by the author, chiefly in the year 1715; who, it is presumed, adopted the dialogue mode of representation, as being best calculated to elucidate his very profound subjects, without too much wearying the attention and patience of the reader. Still it were to be wished that the substance of the Third to the Ninth Conferences had been presented in a more condensed form, as indeed the worthy author would appear to have proposed to himself to do, in and by the 'Immanuel' Fragment, referred to in the notices of the contents of VOL. G, supra, but which whether completed or not, does not now appear. The theosophical student may very profitably go through these intermediate Six Conferences, and extract out of them that which is purely of solid instruction. This work is duly illustrated with symbols.

(4.) FIVE CONFERENCES, concerning the ABSOLUTE NECESSITY of all the HOLY SUFFERINGS and DEATH of JESUS CHRIST upon the CROSS. With a large HIEROGLYPHICAL FIGURE, representing the PROCESS of CHRIST, in effecting the REDEMPTION.—THE FIRST CONFERENCE. Being Preliminary to the Arguments against the position—'That the Mediation of Christ implies no Necessity of his Death;' and giving an Account of the Origin of the said Opinion.—THE SECOND, THIRD and FOURTH CONFERENCES. Proving the Necessity of the Death of Christ, from the Ground of Scripture. THE FIFTH CONFERENCE. Wherein is demonstrated the Necessity thereof, under some Emblematical Figures.

NOTE.—This work is supposed not to have been completed by the author, though the special mention of two more conferences, made at the end of the Fifth Conference, and also of the large hieroglyphic figure which was to be the subject of these remaining portions of it, would seem to imply the contrary. If the two deficient conferences were really written, they were not with the Author's other MSS., at the time of his decease, nor have they been in the possession of his intimate friends, and admirers of his writings since, up to the present moment. The original copy of this work, which is supposed to have been written A. D. 1716, is likewise no longer known to be in existence.—The portion of it which will be of most esteem with the theosophical Student, is the Fifth Conference. And we are not sure that, in case of a republication of the 'Third to the Ninth Conferences' of the 'Predestination' work, in a severed form, this last or fifth Conference of this Work might not very judiciously be placed before them, though an "unfinished" piece.

(5.) MICROCOSMOS, or the Formal IMAGE of DEITY and all NATURE, MAN. Considered in his PRIMEVAL STATE, his FALLEN STATE, and his STATE of REGENERATION. In THREE TABLES or SYMBOLS, with their EXPLANATIONS.

before/ NOTE.—As may have been perceived by the annotation made on VOL. E. of the Elucidations, etc., these Tables with their Explanations were originally composed immediately ~~after~~ that said treatise; but that the author's improved knowledge in subsequent years of his reflections, led him to make a great enlargement of the Explication of the First Table; though for want of convenience, leaving the other two in their original state. This First Table with its Explanation, would appear to have been regarded, either by the author himself, (on account of its universality of comprehension and completeness, and its practical christian scope,) or by his particular friend, copier and illustrator, Leuchter, as one of the best of his performances, for in the portraits afterwards made of him by the latter, this Table is generally represented as being held in his hand, and the subject of his immediate contemplation. As we have observed, the finishing stroke was put to this Explanation of the First Table, in year 1717; and some time afterwards, after the author had finished his two last pieces, which were written in his native German language, the translation of this Table and its Explanation, was also made into the same language, whether by the author himself or by Leuchter, does not now appear. The writer however is inclined to think only by the latter; whose German copy is that in the British Museum; and which was made to match his copies of the author's last two pieces, in the German language and character, which are in our possession. The author's first rough drafts in German of the 'Tables' themselves, with English Explanations, were then made, it is conjectured, about A. D. 1703; the final ones, from which the colored copy in the B. M. was afterwards made, about A. D. 1727.—We should observe, that the German translation of the Explanation of this First Table, is more illustrated with Diagrams and Emblems than the English original; wherefore in case of publication, our English copy should be compared with that, as to where the Emblems and Diagrams (of all of which we hold separate copies,) should be inserted. The Tables themselves were subsequently engraved for insertion in VOL. III. of J. B.'s Works, 4to., pub. A. D. 1772, with a purported Explanation of them annexed; but this we must state, is a sad mutilation of the original, and should no longer be tolerated. The drawings of the Tables are also not done justice to, by the engraver of those plates; these being much deficient in expression and spirit, to the said original fair copy drawn by Leuchter, now in our possession.—The real origin of these Tables and their Explanations, we must not fail to add, was to elucidate the plate (or truth couched in it) by J. B. himself, in Chapter ix of his THREEFOLD LIFE.

(6.) EPISTLES. WRITTEN in London, during the YEARS 1713—1717.

THE FIRST LETTER. To the Church or Religious Meeting, in Bow Lane. Wrote in the early part of the year 1713. (2.) THE SECOND LETTER. To the Same. With also, PART OF A LETTER read by the Author at the Conference held according to the Proposal in this Second Letter. (3.) THE THIRD LETTER. Read and delivered by the Author to the Church in Bow Lane, November 1st. 1713. (4.) THE FOURTH LETTER. Wrote probably 1714, or early in 1715. This Meeting was not, as has been stated incorrectly in a letter of Mr. Law of April 8th. 1747, the celebrated Philadelphia Society, (which arose about A. D. 1697 and continued until A. D. 1703 or 4, and the spirit of which, as appears from Roach's writings, was somewhat maintained up to the date of his two publications,) but was a Society formed about A. D. 1706 of a number of persons who were also well versed in the terms and phraseology of the writings of Bohemius, but some of whom it would appear, made a lamentable abuse or perversion of them. These Letters, as the observations at the end of the 'Explanation' of the First Table of 'Microcosmos,' show, how their Author was induced to visit and assemble with that Society, about 1712, and what he thought of its proceedings; and containing his views how to render the company a truly spiritual Church. (5.) THE FIFTH LETTER, addressed to one Mr. Inglis in Scotland, dated September 20th. 1715. This Mr. Inglis had addressed a Letter to this Society in November 1712, (which is attached to our collection of these Epistles,) in answer to one from it; also another in, it is presumed, the following year, both of a deeply pious practical character: and it appears that a correspondence was kept up between them, also that Mr. Inglis was privately made a referee, by one of the members, whose spiritual conduct had subjected him to the suspicion and censure of his brethren; whereupon ensued the Letter of this author last mentioned. (6.) THE SIXTH LETTER, which is found in the Copies of his Letters, next following the Letter to the Bishop of Bangor, but which we think might judiciously be inserted in this place, was probably addressed by the author to the members of this Society generally, or to his own particular friends amongst them, at what date does not now appear, but probably previous to the above mentioned Letter to Mr. Inglis. (7.) A Letter of 15 sheets, to a Mr. Gildersleve, wrote immediately after the Tenth of the Sixteen Conferences, A. D. 1715. (8.) A LETTER TO THE BISHOP OF BANGOR, dated August 8th. 1717, on the subject of the Bangorian controversy, in support of his Lordship. (9.) A LETTER, in the German language, to a Mr. Luchbecher (residing across the sea,) dated February 5th. 1723, wherein the author mentioneth his particular friends, viz. Berry, Leppington, Leuchter, Lorentz (Laurence) and Carlshoff.

NOTE.—These letters to the Church in Bow Lane, beam with the sublimest piety, and most enlightened and profound christian science. Also the 'Letter to Gildersleve,' which relates chiefly to predestination, the subject of the Conferences in which he recently had been and was then employed, contains here and there some beautiful elucidations of recondite truth. In this work is found the Symbol of the Eye of Eternity, seeing at one view, in itself, all that is past, present and future.

(7.) A TREATISE AGAINST the DOCTRINE of the RESTORATION of ALL the DEVILS and LOST SPIRITS. Herein is shown, FIRST, the GREAT DIFFERENCE between the FALL of LUCIFER and THAT of ADAM. NEXT, the NOTION of the 'EVERLASTING GOSPELLOWS,' together with their EIGHT CHIEF ARGUMENTS. FURTHER, the AUTHOR'S IDEA on the SUBJECT, accompanied with EXPLANATIONS and ILLUSTRATIVE SYMBOLS. And LASTLY, the METHODICAL ANSWER to the said EIGHT ARGUMENTS of the 'EVERLASTING GOSPELLOWS.' Written in the German Language, in London, A. D. 1718.

NOTE.—This treatise is one of the most elaborately illustrated of all the author's writings, and perhaps the deepest metaphysical or logical treatise that was ever presented to the world upon such subjects of recondite truth, as those upon which it treats.

(8.) A TREATISE OF GOOD and EVIL. Wherein Good and Evil are considered, FIRST, as in this OUTWARD THIRD PRINCIPLE. SECONDLY, as in the TWO INTERIOR WORLDS, yet as BEFORE the DAY of SEPARATION. And LASTLY, as AFTER the DAY of SEPARATION. In a Conference between A and B. Written in the German Language, in London, A. D. 1720.

NOTE.—In the author's Original of this work, now before us, the Fourth or last Conference is no longer to be found; nevertheless it is contained in the Copy of it, which we also hold, made by Leuchter. This treatise commences at "page 561," in face of which is an 'Antiscript,' by the author, calling attention to this circumstance; which is to intimate, that this treatise implies an antecedent one, and the due understanding of it, in order to apprehend the present work. From a Note at the head of it, it appears to have been drawn up to clear a Scruple. On looking over the author's own writings, we can find no work to which this remark may be supposed to refer, except it be the 'Sixteen Conferences on Predestination,' the pages of which are double pages. Page 560 therein, we find to be in the Eleventh Conference, the subject of it (see Title above given) being Voluntas signi et bene placiti. This page begins with the words, 'ever any other man'—and the bottom of the said double page, ends with these words, 'which the triune God.'—Were the original of the work 'against the restoration of devils' numbered with this extent of pages, then we should conclude this treatise to have been an appendix to that work.

(9.) PARADOXA, EMBLEMATA, ÆNIGMATA, HIEROGLYPHICA, de UNO, TOTO, PUNCTO, CENTRO. Being ONE HUNDRED and FIFTY THREE THEOSOPHIC DIAGRAMS and EMBLEMS, with LATIN CIRCUMSCRIPTIONS, and an ENGLISH TRANSLATION thereof affixed. Composed in London, A.D. 1717, 1718 and 1720.

(10.) A large, elaborate Symbolical Figure, Table, or Emblem, upon stout papier-maché or cardboard; whereon is represented at one view, the Mystery of All Things, in their mutual and reciprocal relations. The different Considerations of the Abyss of Deity (in which the great sphere of all Natural Being floats,) being distinguished according to their respective characteristics, by different depths or indentations, and the relations of Nature and its principles thereto, and these to each other, by more extended, or outward and raised superficies and colours. An Engraving of this large symbolic model was inserted in Vol. IV. of J. B.'s Works, published A.D. 1781, headed, THE TRUE PRINCIPLES of ALL THINGS; also, a plate made from the colored drawing, we hold, of the 'Tree of the Soul.' Whether invented by Freher, or only by Leuchter, does not now appear; but this Figure might very well preface J. B.'s great work, the MYSTERIUM MAGNUM.

ANNOTATIONS respecting the ORIGINALS and COPIES of this AUTHOR'S WRITINGS, where deposited, and which Copy ought to be FOLLOWED in CASE of PUBLICATION, with other incidental Notices.

(I.)—On the Serial Elucidations of J. B.'s Philosophy and Theology, Vols. A, B, C, D, E, F, G, H and I. A.D. 1699—1703—1710.

(1.) The Author's own original of this entire series, with the said I Index, is in our possession. No other copies have the Index to them; which refers to the pages of this original copy. These treatises, as we have intimated, were written at different times, as manifest by the paper and style of writing. They have evidently been much perused; marks and references here and there upon their pages, show them to have been looked over amongst others, by Fras. Lee, and also by Mr. Law, as well as by the aforesaid Rev. Mr. Waple, &c. They are all bound in calf and lettered. A and B Vols. are in 8vo., the remainder in 4to. Vol. I forming the Index to their Contents, is strong paper backed only. In case of publication, this original should be followed, as at first written and pointed, but expunging the continentalisms of for to see, for to understand, etc., and making such simple alterations merely. The references to J. B. in all the Author's own compositions, are to the German ed. of 1682; but in some of the copies thereof, the references are altered to the English translation.

(2.) There is good reason to suppose, Mr. Law made an entire copy of this Series, as we hold his copy of Vols. F and G, but not of the other Volumes. In copying out, he gave a better English turn to some of the sentences of the German Author's original, besides retrenching in places, where it might judiciously be done.

(3.) The next best written copy (of A to H only,) of this series, is that in the Brit. Mus., Add. MSS., No. 5767—5774, which is by Leuchter, in 4to. vel. The Author's writings therein deposited are entitled, FUNDAMENTA MYSTICA JACOBI BOHEMII TEUTONICI, EXPLICATA. PER ANDREAM DIONYSIUM FREHERUM. (Add. MSS. 5767—5792.) They were presented to the Museum by Mr. Edward Fisher of Bath and Bristol, through or from whom, the greater part of the same Author's MSS. we hold, are come into our hands. No. 5767 Vol. has a portrait of the Author, like the one prefacing our copy of the 'Letter to Gildersleve.'

(4.) We have also in our possession another uniform copy, (A to H) 4to. vel. made by Allan Leppington, except Vol. B, which is in another handwriting, at the end of which is written October 27. 1728; and further excepting Vol. G, which is bound in calf as the Author's original, and the writing of it in a very deformed hand.

(5.) We also hold a copy of A Vol. in the same above Vol. B handwriting; at the end of which is written July 22. 1727. Also a copy by Mr. Law (with his said alterations) of F and G Vol. Also, a copy in large 4to. calf, of vols. A to H in a more recent hand. This forms a part of the three last of the Six Volumes in 4to., containing Copies of the chief part of the Author's Writings, which were originally purchased at the Sale of the Books of Richard Cosway, Esq., R. A., and F.R.S., Portrait Painter to the Prince Regent (about 1818—20); who was also the intimate friend of the Lady de Clifford and Mrs. Udney: which two ladies jointly had the forming of the mind of the lamented Princess Charlotte. Several copies of one or two of the A and B Vols of this series, by Leppington, and others, originally belonging to a Mr. Holdercroft, which were rejected by the writer on purchasing his library, were afterwards disposed of in London, A.D. 1849.

(6.) Respecting the Fragments of Treatises specified in the description of G Volume, supra,—the original of the 'Substance of Three Conferences between an English Divine and a German Theosophist,' in the Author's handwriting, is in the Brit. Mus. Add. MSS., 5784, half bound. It expressly intimates the parties in question to be Mr. Waple and this Author. We hold a copy of this treatise in the handwriting of Edward Fisher.

Secondly,—the original of the Fragment headed 'Immanuel,' on the 'Seven Properties of Nature' we ourselves have in possession, in the Author's own handwriting; which exactly corresponds in the style of its writing, and other particulars, with the above-mentioned 'Conference' Fragment in the B. M. We have also a copy of it by Fisher.

Thirdly,—the Fragment of the 'Theosophic Confession of Faith' we hold the original of, itself, as referred to in the note on G Vol. supra. Also a copy by Leppington.—We repeat it, as much to be lamented, that the additional portions of this valuable piece, (as of the 'Immanuel' Fragment) is no longer, to our knowledge after many inquiries, in existence.

(II.)—On the Hieroglyphica Sacra, or Thirteen Theosophic Emblems. A.D. 1703, 10.

(1.) As we have before said, the author's own original is in our possession; the four first Tables having been composed as an elucidation of the Emblem at the end of A Vol., or rather of the truths therein symbolised. We have also intimated that the sequential Nine Tables were added sometime afterwards, and have fixed that period about A.D. 1710; but the designs of the treatise 'against the Restoration of Devils' have led us to suppose that these remaining Tables might have been added after the completion of that Work; and yet the writing and paper lead us back to the original conclusion, and further to infer, that the said designs of that German treatise, (against Universal Restoration) so far as they resemble those of this Work, might have been accommodated to that treatise from the present work.—It is to be observed, that these Symbols begin at the end; the reason being, that the first four are considered only as one, or a fourfold Figure, the fourth representing pure Eternal Nature, or God, or God in Trinity, or the outward immediate manifestation or birth of the abyss of Deity, "wherein all the powers, glories, and perfections of the hidden, unapproachable, supernatural Deity, have their wonderful manifestation," and thence in the creatures born out of it. The three first plates therefore, represent the motion or speaking of that eternal standing and eternally generated essence, ternarius sanctus, or kingdom of heaven of the fourth plate; in other words, the working ground, or root of all nature, or natural being.—Therein the theosophic student will observe the birth of the two co-eternal principles, and seven properties of nature, with its three constituent parts: which are the ground or working powers of all things, both of mind and matter, eternal and temporal, even of all qualities and sensibilities of all life.—They have been formerly published in vol. ii. of J. B.'s Works, 4to., 1764.

(2.) We also hold two copies of this series of Emblems, both of them by Leuchter: one following exactly the author's original, with the descriptions in face; the other a later copy with the tables proceeding in the regular order, and the descriptions of them placed altogether at the commencement. There is also a similar copy by the same Artist, in the Brit. Mus., Add. MSS. 5790.

(III.)—On the Sixteen Conferences concerning Predestination. A.D. 1715.

(1.) The author's originals of this work, with the exception of Conferences iv, v, vi, ix, xii, xv, and xvi, which are most probably lost, not having certainly been heard of by collectors of these writings for sixty years past, we have in our possession. They were originally contained in about thirteen vols., in brown paper backs and lettered. By this clue and other notices in this sketch, it is possible that at a future time, the author's missing MSS. and Fragments, may be traced and recovered.

(2.) There is however a very beautiful and entire copy of this Work in the British Museum, made by Leuchter, Add. MSS. 5775—83. They were thus arranged by Leuchter in Eight Volumes, as being the most equal and appropriate division of them. All Leuchter's copies of this author's writings, though he himself a German as the author, are written with great care, and in a very clear round hand; being probably what he made for his own use. They were however sold (as we shall state hereafter in our collected memoranda respecting this Author,) at a Sale by auction at Islington, in the year 1772, and were bought by old Mr. Denis, Bookseller, of New Bridge Street, Blackfriars. At the death of Mr. John Denis, his son, at the close of the last century, these were obtained by Mr. Edward Fisher, and the greater part of them presented to the Brit. Museum. In case of publication, the 'Conferences' which are above stated as being wanting in the author's original, should be supplied from this source; or rather the copies which we hold (besides the originals) of all these missing Conferences, with the exception of Conf. xii, xv and xvi, might be compared with this Brit. Mus. copy, in order to see whether they be correct, and the italicised words duly distinguished. There would then be only necessary, to copy out the above named xii, xv, and xvi Conferences.

(3.) In the Six Volumes, 4to., calf bd. Extracts from this Author's Works, formerly in the possession of the late R. Cosway, Esq., which we hold, as before mentioned, there is a copy of all the first Nine of these Conferences. Amongst our collection of MS. books, will also be found a recent copy of the first Three Conferences in 4to., bound calf, by a modern hand, and again, of the Fourth in 4to., bound calf, with a copy of Canfield's Third Part of 'Rule of Perfection,' &c., but these latter are not to be depended upon.

(4.) These Conferences we have no doubt were written in the year 1715, perhaps the concluding ones in the year 1716, and the earlier ones possibly in the year 1714. The Author at that time and for several years previous to 1715 or 16, residing in Eagle Court, St. John's Lane, near Smithfield.

(IV.) On the Five Conferences concerning the Necessity of the Holy Sufferings and Death of Christ upon the Cross. With a large Hieroglyphical Figure. A.D. 1716.

(1.) The original of this treatise, as we have observed, we have not been able to trace, but the original draught of the large Symbolical Figure is in our possession. In the large portrait drawing of the author, prefixed to the fair copy we hold, bound together in one large 4to. vol., green vel., of all the illustrative diagrams and tables of the author's writings, made by Leuchter, this large Symbol is represented as lying open on his table, his other writings (with the exception of the 'First Table') being exhibited as standing in order beside him, bound, with their titles labelled on each. We may just mention that this last work, (the Collection of the symbols and other illustrative designs of the author's writings,) came by a singular providence into our hands, as did indeed all his writings, originals and copies, as well as those of Mr. Law, Francis Lee, and others: and that by it, or rather by the above mentioned notification of his writings contained in it, we were enabled to ascertain whether all of them were preserved to us, which happily we find to be the case. Without this clue, we had been unable to trace out this fact, and also to present the series of particulars contained in these pages respecting them; and we do rejoice at being the instrument of preserving and making known such inestimable and unique, and—as will be found, we consider, in respect to the promulgation of theosophy or divine wisdom—essential writings and instructions, to the world.

(2.) We hold a good copy of these Five Conferences, made by Leppington, in two vols., 4to., vellum.—There is also a fine copy of the same, by Leuchter, in one vol. 4to., vel., deposited in the Brit. Museum. This copy has also, inserted in it at its commencement, a clever reduced copy of the large hieroglyphic Symbol, which was to have been particularly and entirely elucidated in the now wanting Sixth and Seventh conferences: at the end of this volume, (of the Fifth conference,) there is a remark in Leuchter's handwriting, that this work was not finished. Possibly, as we have stated our surmise to that effect, the author abandoned the completion of this undertaking, to enter upon the confutation of the doctrine of Universal Restoration, which he especially mentions in the First of these Conferences, as one of the grand babylonish errors of his age: which would necessarily involve the resolution of the chief points that would have come under especial review in these two concluding conferences of the present work. As he thus expresses himself on that occasion:—"Now this opinion of the restoration of devils is founded by these babylonians, upon almost the same bottom as the non-necessity of the death of Christ." See also some similar observations by him, relating to this matter, in the concluding part of the Sixth Conference on Predestination.

In this copy of the Brit. Museum, Add. MSS., 5785, is also found a very striking bust portrait of our author, which certainly ought not to be omitted to be also presented in case of publication of his writings. This portrait would require comparison with the others of him in his regular costume, for instance, with the large portrait we before mentioned prefacing the Collection of the illustrations of his works, also with that which prefaces our copy, (in a formal modern handwriting) of the 'Epistle to Gildersleve,' and with the two corresponding portraits of Nos. 5767 and 5789 Add. MSS. in the Brit. Museum. All these however must further be compared with the portrait in the 'Paradoxa, Emblemata' work of the author in our possession: which portrait is doubtless the most correct and genuine, being probably done at the very time of drawing up that copy of those emblems, which was, we judge, almost coeval with the author's own original thereof. Whereas the former, larger featured portraits, making the appearance of the author's countenance younger, were necessarily done at a later date. We are almost decided to regard this latter 'Paradoxa' portrait as affording a good idea of the general effect of the author's person; still we are much pleased to see this bust design, which has indeed a natural unsophisticated air and sentiment, that we well understand, and feel to be correspondent with the spirit which the worthy original avows in himself in his 'Epistle to Gildersleve,' and which is also manifest in his pious, deeply sensible 'Letters to the Church in Bow Lane,' in his confessions appended to the 'Explanation of the First Table,' and indeed throughout all his writings.

(3.) The large Hieroglyphical Figure of these Conferences, was formerly engraved, and inserted in the first of the incomplete ed. of J. B.'s works, published A.D. 1764—82, at the sole expense of Mrs. Hutcheson, (Miss Hester Gibbon not having, as formerly surmised, joined in that expense,) out of respect to the memory of her esteemed friend, companion, and spiritual adviser, Mr. Law, who died A.D. 1761, and who, we may here repeat, had nothing whatever to do with that publication, which was got through the press under the supervision and honest zeal, but great incapacity for such an important business, of a Mr. George Ward, an ancient friendly correspondent of Mr. Law, and great admirer of his talents; in which work assistance may have been also rendered, especially in the completion of the Fourth volume, after Mr. Ward's decease, by a Mr. Langeake, another friend of Mr. Law, but perhaps equally as incompetent an editor for such a task as was Mr. Ward.

(5.) We know of no other copies of this work than those above mentioned, except the further one, we hold, contained in the before mentioned Selections of the author's writings, in six vols. 4to., formerly in the possession of Mr. Cosway. We have stated it as our belief that this work was written in 1716, immediately after the Conferences on Predestination were completed; and that after having got through the Fifth conference, the author laid aside the undertaking for a time, if not altogether. He then (1717) put the finishing stroke, emendations and appendix to the 'Explanation of the First Table,' wherein, it will be found, how wearied he expresses himself to be with writing so continuously, (indeed he must have almost laboured night and day with his pen as well as his mind,) but adds, that nevertheless he will not abandon it all suddenly.

From observations interspersed in these writings, it appears the author was intimately acquainted with P. Poiret, between A.D. 1670 and 1680. See also the Philadelphian writings, Lee's Letter to Dodwell, pp. 194—221 supra, Roach's two publications, and other books in German and English, of about A.D. 1690—1725, not to mention others of previous or later times, upon the topic of the "everlasting gospel" and "universal restitution," which gave rise to the author's next original treatise as before mentioned. Freher like Law and their great master in divine science, Bohemius, by the constitution of their uniformly developed and well balanced intellect and judgment, had as great and instinctive an antipathy to all unsound, and babylonish confusion of christian theology, and empty profitless religious idiosyncrasies of doctrine, however plausibly dressed up, as St. Paul himself had to the Simon Magian conceits and alchemic pretences for the purification of the soul, in the first ages of Christianity.

(V.) On the Microcosmos, or Three symbolic Tables, with their respective Explanations. A.D. 1703—1717—1727.

(1.) The first original of the Explanation of the first table, we have not seen or heard of, though we hold a fragment copy of the commencement of it, which sufficiently shows what a great improvement the present work is upon the one first drawn up. Neither have we heard of the author's original of this present emended work; which yet we think must have been in Mr. Law's hands, when he made his copy thereof, for he would hardly have liked to copy from a copy of so important and valuable a treatise as the present. The Author's original of the 'Explanations of the Second and Third Tables,' are in the Brit. Museum, Add. MSS. 5787, the style of writing of which sufficiently testifies to us when it was composed by him. At the end of it is a Latin Note by some friendly hand, of the date of November, 1712.—These two Explanations as observed by the author at the end of the 'Explanation of the First Table' were left as originally written; for though he might have considerably enlarged and improved them, as he had indeed designed, yet (as he states) he was so weary with writing, and moreover what was needful to be further declared respecting them, would fully evidence itself to every reader and student of them, who had made himself experimentally acquainted with and master of the contents of that 'Explanation of the First Table,' which indeed was the sole object of it,—that, in point of fact, a further elucidation was not necessary, and therefore he would forego his original purpose, but leave the Explanations of those latter Tables as at first composed. This we cannot but regret, with respect to the future schools of theosophy, as we deem it desirable that the whole practical scope of man's nature and relations had been fully elucidated by this divinely illumined, and rationally erudite sage.—We would recommend the reader to look over if in his power, the German work before mentioned by Graber and Gichtel of 1696, headed 'Theosophia Practica, or a Brief Explanation of the Three Worlds and Principles in Man, illustrated with Plates;' in order to form a just conception of the origin of the present work, which was intended as a brief practical yet deep exposition and application of J. B.'s declaration of that subject in his THREEFOLD LIFE. Who Graber was, we do not know, but if he originated the drawings whilst Gichtel attended to the literature, he possessed great ingenuity of talent as well as high theosophical science,—more especially so, if he also originated the designs or symbols to the early German editions of J. B.'s Works.

(2.) The beautiful copy of this work, (of the literal portion of it) by Leuchter, in 4to., the first vol. in vel., the two latter Discourses in a paper back, are in our possession. Likewise, the copy made by Mr. Law for himself, of the 'Explanations of the First Table,' in 4to. green vel., and of the Second and Third Tables, bound up with, but preceding the discourse of Vol. F supra, of 'Nothing and Something'.

The copy of the First Table Explanation, Brit. Museum, Add. MSS. 5786, is in a very deformed hand, and we question whether a perfect copy. We hold a copy of the self-same treatise in the same kind of writing. We also hold a copy of the same treatise in fol. vel. written by Leppington.

We hold also a copy of the Second and Third Table Explanations, along with a fragment of the very original of the First Table Explanation (as before stated) in a fair hand. We should perhaps here observe that the title, 'Microcosmos,' is only given to this work by ourselves, or rather it was written in Mr. Law's copy of the 'Explanation of the First Table,' by Mr. Langcake, during the time he had the MS. in charge. And probably it was the finding of such treatises among Mr. Law's MSS. in Mr. Ward's papers, by Mr. Selfe, his friend and executor, that led to the knowledge of Freher's writings by Langcake, and then by Fisher, by whom they became subsequently hunted up.

(3.) Respecting the 'Tables' themselves, the finest and best copy, from which the plates were made that were inserted in Vol. III. of the 4to. Ed. of J. B. of 1772, are, as before stated, in our possession. These are for the original English 'Explanations.'—We also, as we observed, hold the original draught of these 'Tables,' though with the descriptive names on the figures and veils, in German; also the amended rough draught, with the substitution of the Peacock for the Hunting Dog, at a subsequent period.—The copy of the 'Tables' to accompany the German translation of their 'Explanation,' is also in the Brit. Museum, Add. MSS. 5788, which is colored. The above mentioned 'rough draughts' in our possession, were probably originals to this completed, but not highly finished (yet very striking, on account of its being colored) copy of all the 'Three Tables,' which may serve as a guide whereby to color future drawings of these Tables. Also the colored drawing of the 'Tree of the Soul,' with its relations to all the worlds in which man stands, with other unmentioned colored symbols, in our possession, may serve for a similar purpose.

(VI.) On the Author's Epistles. A.D. 1713—1717.

(1.) The copy of the Four Letters to the Church in Bow Lane, and of the Fifth addressed to Mr. Inglis, (which latter is signed "D. A. F. a zealot for the blessed memory, and the sacred writings of Jacob B.") made by Leuchter, in 4to. vel., is in our possession. Likewise the copy of the same made by Leppington, 4to., half-bound. Also the copy (if they are not the originals) of the two letters from James Inglis in Scotland, of the date of 1712, and we suppose 1713, together with a MS. in the same handwriting, (which also is the same writing as the fragment copy of the first original First Table 'Explanation,' as before named,) to the Bow Lane Society.—Of these letters there does not appear to be any copy in the Brit. Museum. The author's originals of them we have never seen or heard of.

(2.) The original of the long 'Epistle to Gildersleve' we are not aware of being in existence, neither of the remainder of the letters which are generally found together with this Epistle, for instance, the letter headed "To my friends," and the one "to the Bishop of Bangor, 1717."—The best written copy of these three letters, (in one vol. half bound, by Leuchter, to which is added a copy of the author's letter in German, addressed to Mr. Lütbecher,) is in the Brit. Museum, Add. MSS. 5791.—We ourselves hold a very clearly written copy in a modern hand, 4to. vel. bound, illustrated with a bold portrait of the Author, including also a copy of the letter to Lütbecher. Also, a copy in folio, vel., in the handwriting of Leppington; at the end of which are the initials 'J. D. Oct. 4th, 1782' (the year wherein old Mr. Denis bought Leuchter's and other copies of our author's writings at Islington, as before observed).

(VII.) On the Treatise against the Restoration of the Devil and all Lost Spirits. (Written in the German language and character.) A.D. 1718.

(1.) The Author's original of this work, if ever he made any but rough draughts of the very elaborate and perfected theosophic symbols contained in it, we have never heard of. There is no copy of this treatise in the Brit. Museum. We hold a perfect copy of it in folio, green vel., by Leuchter, the German words being in English letter. Also we hold a copy by Leuchter of the Drawings and Symbols only, the literary portion of it being lost. This was evidently once a perfect copy, and matches as to its size and paper, and German letter, the 'Explanation of the First Table,' in the Brit. Museum, Add. MSS. 5792, in the German character; but it has been taken to pieces to copy, the owner of it however not parting at the time with the Drawings which were therefore preserved, and are come into our hands. We have had them bound up again with blank leaves, whereon the literary portions of the work may be transcribed, and so the whole be again a perfect book. We do not know of any other copy in existence than the above named of this splendid treatise. Having already stated its especial nature in our incidental remarks in previous notices of these works, we need here say no more upon the subject. Very probably it was intended by the author to be a kind of finishing stroke to his profound theosophical labours for the benefit of mankind, not knowing however how this might take place, yet doing all with a single eye, and in the fulness of faith, to the divine glory. And yet notwithstanding his writings have been only in MS., and tossed about in the world, have been put up to public auction, and subject to all kinds of chances and dangers, arising from the death of friends and admirers, and falling into the hands of persons who might have no esteem for them, but have regarded them as enthusiastic mysticism and folly, and so have destroyed them; together with other thousand possible misadventures,—yet, we say, despite of all these perchances, the providence of God has still preserved them, safe up to the present moment; and it may be that they may yet perform their well adapted and, we think, predestined function, of being instrumentally, an universal blessing to all nations of the world! We consider the preservation of these writings to manifest a similar kind of special providential care and interposition to that which so signally was evidenced in the preservation of the scattered and multifarious MS. writings of this author's great master, Bohemius, as related in the A.D. 1730 of his writings. We cannot but greatly rejoice in being the depository of these inestimable, for ever useful productions, and the instrument of thus making them known to the world. Bohemius is the divinely appointed original Christian fountain of the true philosophy of the universe of intellectual and physical nature, of God, Nature and all Things. All that can be revealed touching the true ground and mystery of things, it has pleased God to open in his writings, with so amazing a power of light and conviction, as must almost strike the mind of the duly apprehensive reader, with awe and astonishment, yet gratitude and love. All that is mysterious and inapprehensible to superficial or even philosophical readers, unless of very piercing and devout, illuminated and composed intellect—and even these may sometimes have a difficulty of clear perception; all their possible and ordinarily occurring doubtfulnesses and misapprehensions of the deep truths couched in J. B.'s writings, are all met or anticipated, cleared and resolved in the lucid and scholastic writings of the extraordinary genius of our Author.—May we be enabled by the divine favour, to present to the world, a serial publication, in the right order of study, of the writings of Law, Bohemius, and this Author, with all necessary Notes and instructions, elucidated by all the discoveries of the established applied sciences; last not least of those of the sphere of intellectual and animal magnetism. Then the philosophy of nature and religion will be complete, and the world will have only to experiment upon it, and realise all that sublimation of the divine nature in man, of which it is capable; with the blessings and wonders and discoveries to which such moral or rather divine elevation of the spirit and mind of man, must necessarily lead, and which appertain to it.—We presume the symbols and drawings in this work may be supposed to be carried to their highest perfection of elucidation, and justness of representation, of deep theological truth.

(VIII.) On the Treatise of Good and Evil.—(In the German language.) A.D. 1720.

The nature and construction of this work, not being, so to speak, an original new development of theosophic truth, but to clear up as it were a scruple,—we have already explained. The Author's original, as we have stated, is in our possession, with the exception of the last Conference, which yet is contained in the copy we hold of this work made by Leuchter, both being in the German character and beautifully written. The dedication however (to young Jeremiah Leuchter,) with several large and elaborate drawings, inserted by the author in the midst of the First Conference, is not contained in the copy by Leuchter. The author's lettering upon the paper backs of these 'Conferences' (now however bound by us in one vol. 4to., vel., with blank leaves for the insertion of the last wanting Conference,) was as follows, in German: 'The First Conference and First Continuation of the Same, [after the said Dedication] of Good and Evil—The Second Continuation of the First Conference of Good and Evil—The Third Continuation of the First Conference of Good and Evil.' There is not any copy of this treatise in the British Museum, nor, do we believe any other in existence, besides those here mentioned as in our possession.

(IX.) On the Paradoxa, Emblemata, &c., Volume. A.D. 1717, 1718, 1720.

(1.) The author's original of this work we have never heard of. The copy we hold in small folio vel., clasps, is by Leuchter, and appears to have been made immediately after the original was completed. In this copy there are two emblems on each page, with their Latin circumscriptions; whilst the English translations are in a separate loose tract accompanying it. This as we stated contains a portrait of the author, with also his coat of arms, which however are affixed to all the regular portraits of him.

There is also a copy of this work in the Brit. Museum Add. MSS. 5789, by Leuchter, but manifestly of a later date than the one in our possession. It is likewise embellished with a bold portrait of the author. The emblems in this copy are each made to occupy single pages, whilst the English translations instead of being in a separate book, are inserted under each emblem, with its Latin circumscription: which arrangement enables the work to be presented in 8vo. This is altogether a very beautiful copy, and the arrangements of it should be strictly followed in case of publication. We know of no other copy than these here mentioned.

(X.) On the large mill-board Symbol or Hieroglyphic of Deity and Nature.

This original as we have observed, which was engraved and inserted in Vol. IV. of J. B.'s works, published 1782, and which is there headed the True Principles of All Things, is in our possession. In the engraving in question, the various depths or indentations of the figure, expressive of the various degrees and relations of the principles to each other, are not attempted to be indicated, in any wise whatsoever, which is a great failure in this plate. The original itself is rightly colored, though now much faded, and in case Theosophy—or the true science of the mutual relations and magical laws of Deity and Nature, and of the essential constitution of the latter, both exteriorly to, and interiorly in Man, and all beings—ever become, as it ought to become (being, the science of ourselves, of our Father, of our lost patrimony and promised re-inheritance, &c.,) a common elementary school-study,—then copies might be made of this large mill-board Symbol, (as indeed of all the other chief symbols,) to erect in such establishments, for the exercise and questioning of the classes of students, in the principles and truths of Theosophic Science.

POSTSCRIPT.—Our beautiful Copy of All the Symbols, Diagrams, and Illustrations of this Author's Writings, (in one vol. 4to., by Leuchter,) may serve, in case of their Publication, as a Guide to the Engraver and Draftsman, employed thereupon.

- 2,—of high rhetorical art, and pure Saxon simplicity of verbiage.
- 3,—of skeleton-leaf exactness of logical power and demonstration.
- 4,—of easy, natural aspiration of thought, as to length and cadency of periods, with great practice in argumentative composition.

N.B.—The more this read and considered, with its Scripture and other references, the yet higher and deeper found, and better and better liked.

—"It is with the pioneers of science, as with the pioneers of civilisation; they point out the way, and clear the paths along which others are to travel—leaving to posterity to appreciate their genius and labours, and to do honour to their magnanimity in braving the prejudice, superstition and malice, of the crude conceptions, ignorance and stationery interests, ruling their own age."

NOTICE.—The present pamphlet is a reprint of part of the preface of a Work of 688 pages, of the same size of page, but in nonpareil type,—which is thus entitled:—

"To the Christianity, the Philosophy, the Erudition, Science, and Noble Intelligence of the Age."——Notes and Materials for a Just and Adequate Biography of the Celebrated Divine and Theosopher, William Law. Comprising an Elucidation of the Scope and Contents of the Writings of Jacob Böhme, and of his Great Illustrator, Dionysius Andreas Freher; with a Notice of the Mystical Divinity, and most Curious and Solid Science of all Ages of the World. Also, an Indication of the True Means for the Induction of the Intellectual 'Heathen,' Jewish, and Mahomedan Nations into the Evangelical Faith. Printed for Private Circulation. London. A. D. 1848-56."

The object of this Work originally, was to find or create an Editor, to write the BIOGRAPHY OF MR. LAW, in a worthy manner: whose unpublished MSS. and papers, (with those of other EMINENT PHILOSOPHERS,) had come into the possession of the Advertiser. And that, by furnishing to the candidate, who might possess the needful groundwork of academic ability, the means of perfecting himself in the necessary and singular knowledge—and spirit, requisite for the task. At the same time, it was deemed appropriate, to set forth for his further enlightenment, the chief features of the information which was proposed to form the contents of the contemplated work, which was accordingly comprised in this treatise; whence it became extended to its present dimensions. With the former object still in view, as well as to confer what is considered to be, a well-timed benefit on the world, (awaiting the publication of Vols. II. and III. of the Introduction to Theosophy.) the Advertiser has reprinted the present Extract from the work, as above described, for general dissemination. The results of all which, he doubts not, will duly appear, to the great glory of God, and the fulfilment of his own earnest hopes and desires. Christmas, 1856.

THE "EXTRACT,"—BEING A RECAPITULATION, OR SUMMARY OF THE ENTIRE WORK.

The following Advertisement appeared some time ago in a public journal, but as the peculiar talent which is required, might not be exactly deducible from the terms of the announcement, it has been deemed fitting to present a more explicit and comprehensive statement in reference to the subject, and hence the present treatise.

WANTED a Gentleman of high Literary Talent, and deep Devotional Spirit, not under forty years of age, who during his scholastic studies, has been well versed in the casuistry and metaphysics of ancient divinity, and whose style of composition is that of strict logical argumentation, however its severity may be arrayed in the simplicity and graces of rhetoric, to assist in writing an elevated religious and philosophic biography.

The following series of works and tracts, are what have been selected as general models, from a due study of which, according to the observations annexed to each, may be gathered the exact nature of the required talent.

1.—Serious Call to a Holy Life, by W. Law, A.M.—Case of Reason or Natural Religion, fairly and fully stated. 2nd. ed. By W. Law, A.M.

These treatises (with the Author's "Christian Perfection" and his "Three Letters to a Lady inclined toward the Church of Rome") may be received as examples of the style of argumentative writing desirable, and showing the needful modicum of metaphysical knowledge. Also, as exhibiting masterly display of wit, brightness of imagination, penetrating observation of life, classic and felicitous delineation of character, and an easy, flowing, complete handling of the subjects of discussion.

II.—Earnest and Serious Answer to Trap.—Animadversions on Trap's Reply. Both contained in Vol. i. of "Introduction to Theosophy."

As models for an ingenious, dignified style of address, for elevated sentiments of christian purity and holiness, and for the earnest and serious spirit which must breathe through the work. The qualifications of the former named treatises to be incorporated with the characteristics of the present tracts.

III.—Short Confutation of Warburton's 'Defence of Christianity' in his 'Divine Legation.' This also in Vol. I. of "Introduction to Theosophy."—An Address to the Clergy. By W. Law, A. M.

The former of these treatises (in which may be said to be embodied the literary and other perfections of the previously named works,) may be taken as a model of the magisterial style and power of philosophic writing desirable. The latter, for the Elias-Baptist spirit of divinely animated zeal, resistless truth, and elevated wisdom, in which the biography from first to last should be composed—penned indeed in such a holy, reverential glow of spirit, as if indited by a seraph; so as to inflame the heart of all its readers with the love of God and all holiness and perfection of life.

The foregoing notices relate chiefly to the literary qualifications of the author: the following series of works express the ground of understanding, or sentiment of mind from which the work should be dictated.

IV.—Treatise of Christian Perfection. By W. Law, A. M.—Jeremy Taylor. Of Holy Living and Holy Dying.—Of the Following of Christ. Vols. i. and ii. Quesnel. Reflections on the New Testament, in 4 Vols., 8vo., 1725.—Letter on the Primitive Christians, appended to Horneck's Happy Ascetic.—Bp. Wilson's Letter to Lady Eliz. Hastings, p. 356, seq.—Fleury. Manners and Behaviour of First Christians. 8vo., London, 1698.—Calmet. Commentary, with the Dissertations and Prefaces, (in French.)

Augustine. Meditations, and Soliloquies, &c., 8vo., 1720. With other works of the ancients, Cyprian, Basil, Ambrose, Greg. Nyssen, Chrysostom, Greg. Naz., Jerome, Bernard, &c., wherein they especially discourse upon the blessedness, and means of attaining to perfect sanctity, purity and holiness, &c.—Tauler. Les Divines Institutions de, avec sa Vie. Also, his Exercices sur la Vie et la Passion de Jésus Christ, 18mo., 1718.—Also, his Evangelical Poverty, with Life prefixed, in English. London, 1708. And his Sermons in Latin.

Relation de la Mort de Quelques Religieux de la Trappe. 5 vols. 18mo. Paris, 1755.—Tour to Alet, (in Volume Second of Schimmelpennick's Port Royal Memoirs.)—Vie de l'Abbé de Rancé, par Dom Pierre le Nain.—De Rancé. The Sanctity of the Monastic State. 2 vols. 12mo. Dublin, 1830,—regarding therein what is of the essence of Christianity, or of expedient practice to the regeneration; and imbibing its earnest and serious spirit.

To form a right foundation for the high superstructure of a perfect Christian, regenerate, divine life. In the first place, inducing in the mind a profound and piercing conviction of the vanity and emptiness of all worldly things, and of the degraded sinful state of the humanity by nature; and therewith an earnest conversion of the soul to God. Secondly, to arm the mind with a steadfast, immoveable purpose, to follow Christ fully, in his process of the regeneration—in the way of his precepts, counsels and example,—the narrow way, the way of the cross, the way of faith; as being the one only true and direct way, from defilement to purity, from sin to holiness, from darkness to light, from death to life. And thirdly, to furnish the soul with principles to walk manfully and surely in that way; that is, in the perfect spirit and power of prayer, of self-denial, of contempt of the world, of divine love, and universal charity; of humility, patience, meekness, long-suffering, obedience, purity, silence and resignation; in heavenly foretastes of the world to come, in absolute trust and dependence upon God, with all that is earthly and temporal—all goods and evils of this present life, under the feet.

V.—W. Law, A. M. Serious Call to a Holy Life. With his Case of Reason; and his Three Letters to a Lady inclined to the Church of Rome, 8vo., London.—Life of Baroness de Chantal (translated by Mrs. Blachford), 12mo., 1787.

With a Preface, containing some Cautions and Directions with respect to Spiritual Books of the Church of Rome.—Also, to look over the Author's Christian Perfection, in 3 vols. 8vo., 1841; regarding therein, as in other similar writings, what is of the essence of Christian practice, or expedient to the attainment of an universal holiness and purification of soul.

To read the Life with the eyes of an earnest seeker, and as free from a critical, or judging spirit, as an infant-school pupil.—Be earnest, earnest—is the motto of the faithful, and truly enlightened child of God. Earnestness, labour, perseverance, with understanding, (or faith,) are the essentials for high attainments, both in grace and nature: without these, no right knowledge of regeneration.

* In elucidation of the manner, more or less perfect, according to the lights with which they were favoured, in which devoted souls have walked, in the process of the regeneration, or way of faith. And how, according to their peculiar complexions and dispositions, (having first sought and found "the kingdom of God" and his righteousness,) they have been led out to serve their neighbour and the world. But especially, are herein to be studied, the practical arts and instruments of entire sanctification,—even to the utter destruction of self-love and self-will in the spirit of the soul, and the attainment of that purity of heart which alone can see God. In fine, to lead the soul by a natural process, of a self-conscious, experimental growth of regeneration, up to the very vestibule of the temple of Wisdom—the supersensual, intellective, or divine life.

The order of the spiritual regeneration is divided by the mystic doctors, and that very justly, into the purgative, the illuminative, and the unitive states; but, as such must be the actual course of experience of all the truly and fully regenerate, we, in this serial order of study, have made provision for the soul to progress (surely) to that end according to its own natural complexion and constitution, rather than attempted to confine or cramp it to a certain form of growth or advancement. NOTE.—The antiquity of Mystical Theology (writes the Editor of the Theosophical Transactions, in commenting upon the treatise of Asceticks, etc.) is here derived down from Noah; and the instances of Melchisedec, Abimelech, the two Pharaohs, Jethro the Midianite, Rebekah, Balaam, and Job, with his friends, are adduced to prove, that it was anciently believed in all nations, that there were means whereby men and women might come to have some acquaintance and communication with God. The tradition and succession hereof through the Colleges of the Prophets, among the Jews; through the Priestly Colleges of the Eastern Magi, among the Egyptians, Chaldeans, and Arabians; and through the Pythagorean and Platonian schools, were it accurately and judiciously done, would be a considerable work; but this is not to be expected within a few sheets. And as for the media which the Gentiles did use, to attain the intimacies and communications of their peculiar Deities, or of the Soul of the world, or of the supreme Demi-urgus and Creator, a particular and distinct explication thereof, would necessarily lead us into a disquisition concerning the ancient Theurgic mysteries. [The next "Magical" Intersection will afford a clue to the understanding thereof.]

* See the arrangement of these and exposition of the contents and other particulars in "Notes and Queries" March 14 and 21. 1857, Boungois Royal 18 mo.

What was the spirit of Plotinus and Iamblicus, what also the spirit of Porphyry, cannot thoroughly be understood without a more than ordinary insight into these. The Porphyrian spirit is a very great mystery. But as it is in witchcraft, or in demoniacal obsessions, so also is it here. The evil demons are able to do nothing of themselves: it is Nature that works all, and produces those strange and wonderful operations. They also know how to supply actives to passives, and leave her to bring about what they design; to which the present corrupt state of nature is subservient, and wherewith they fail not to add somewhat of their own malice.

Here to read some judicious treatises on the necessity of pure diets, or a pure fuel for the fire of life, and indeed of an universal cleanness, in order (in common with the spiritual exercises of earnest religion,) to the regeneration, or purification and sublimation of the humanity, according to the true scope of the gospel. Also, to examine some works treating of high Boodhist, Sivic, and other Oriental, Druidic, etc. religious science, virtue and piety; and likewise, concerning the real purificative arts or rites, and inductive physical and mental training of the ancient vestal pythoneses, sibyls, priestesses, etc., etc.

are to be expected,—in, and from the DIVINELY REGENERATED, and DULY TRAINED MEDIA, and MAGI of a right THEOSOPHIC COLLEGE.—Exod. vii. 11, 12.

NOTE.—After having gone through the present division of study, (referring likewise again to the Notes of pp. 522—24, 549, 550, 553, 556, 559, and of 467—9, 464, 449, 495, and to the text of pp. 320, etc.), the student will perceive its scope and object; as opening out to him a glimpse of the whole field of the natural and divine magic, and of the accidental entrances therein made by the astral spirit and by faith, up to the present time; besides enabling him to advocate with superlative force of reason and earnestness of zeal, the necessity of the establishment of Theosophic Colleges, in regard to the perfect triumphs of the Gospel. Which should be, not mere elementary schools of the prophets, nor yet as the ancient philosophical academies: but brilliant evangelical seminaries, worthy of the age, for the rearing or training of children of God, up to the highest perfection of sanctity and wisdom, according to the lights of this work—even to the matured apprehension and exercise of those angelical arts and powers, which are the prerogatives of the regenerate humanity.

The considerations that will ensue upon a review of this particular of study, will also elucidate the original doctrines and mysteries of Christianity, of imposition of hands, (by a regenerate and official medium,) of baptism, of the supper of the Lord, etc.,—yea, even of the supplementary sacraments of the Romish church. Here, may be perused,—Law on Sacrament. Query.—Who or what the stranger that so impressively accosted BOHEMIUS when a youth, (as related in his Life,) and what ensued therefrom? Also, respecting the burnished platter, by the lustre of which reflected upon him, he became entranced with 'double consciousness,' into the central ground of all Nature; he however being manifestly qualified for such a baptism and revelation!—Is not this the secret clue to BOHEMIUS's character, (which we here offer to the judicious future editor of his life,) namely, that he was a pure, simple child of nature, of a highly delicate tincture and complexion of spirit, (manifest indeed by the existing 'Painting of him, in this country,) and accordingly susceptible to magic or 'magnetic' action? Hence his early vision on the Land's Crown mountain; and also, after being 'baptised' by the supposed Rosicrucian, his centre-life became still more opened, and he more lucide? And now, seeking God and salvation in the true, orthodox, gospel mode, (à la Bramwell), viz., by total penitence, and earnest, wrestling, unflinching, faith and prayer; and obtaining what he thus sought, even the full liberty and witness of the Spirit,—in this state of clear, and now greatly augmented salvation, being again 'magnetised' by the inward solar power and tincture, in the reflexion from the burnished platter, he became a perfect clairvoyant! That is, he realized the full prerogatives of his then state, as a highly regenerate man, in respect to both the temporal and eternal vision, and other senses; whence he wrote down his apprehensions of Nature, as he was able to conceive and express the same, by the astral reason, and our defective Babel language.—This original view or discovery of the character of BOHEMIUS, which has presented itself to us, is, we consider, the true key to his peculiar genius, as displayed in his writings; in which respect, it may also serve as a qualifying note to our other descriptions of him, in these pages. But the true subjects of a right Theosophic College and its training—Would that some noble minded Philanthropist might consecrate a hundred thousand pounds to the foundation of such a scheme in the name of the holy, holy, holy, eternal SOPH-IAH, and to his own high honour!—might, we consider, be made to far excel BÜHME, as enjoying equal clearness of spiritual sense, but, as being thoroughly grounded in modern science, so therefore enabled to elucidate technically the 'mystery' and virtues of things, and hence of greater practical utility to the Church and the world.

* At the close of this valuable analysis or Abstract, Freher observes, speaking of the latter portion of the work under his review:—

"That which now followeth of another Author, entitled, ELUCIDATION OF THE DOCTRINE OF THIS TREATISE, OF THE REVEREND P. J. EVANG., contains nothing else but a particularenumeration of the chiefest parts thereof, which are these four,—(1.) Of the Soul's gathering her into herself, (2.) Of the Soul's introversion, (3.) Of her penetrating herself, and (4.) Of her drawing near and exalting herself into God. Each of which, this author sheweth, is conformable to many others

Of the Essential Will of God, wherein is treated of the Supernatural Life.—Also, Eckart's Discourses, Tauler's Sermons, and Rusbrochius, Of the Perfection of the Children of God, all in German and Latin. And Jean de la Croix's sublime experimental writings, the Ascent of Mount Carmel, &c.—And again, Böhme's Supersensual Life, p. 43, seq.; Divine Contemplation; and Abstract of the Mysterium Magnum.

The object of this sixth division of study in the course, has already been sufficiently intimated, namely, to afford to the so advanced graduant, a knowledge of all the science and art, which has hitherto been revealed and discovered, in regard to the high sublimation of the human life; and of the true and lawful mode whereby to advance steadily to the very central throne of the divine revelation, even to become a holy artist—a lord, a prince over nature, to the praise and glory of God. For the humanity, as before observed, being now fully redeemed, man is therefore capable of a transcendently exalted spiritual renovation and illumination: (and if of a spiritual why not of an outward and physical—even of an Enochian life on earth?) And therefore it ought to be the aim of the enlightened Christian, to press on to this high regenerate perfection, or *glorified resurrection state of the inner man; to prove the arts of paradisical horticulture, first in himself, with his own life and intellect, and then to raise up others to the same faith, and inward glory. Which attainment according to its degree, it is, that restores to man his original prerogatives of dominion over all temporal creatures, and to open the latent powers of God, and scientz of the Divine Wisdom in everything. Our Lord spake to his wondering disciples to this purport,—Ye seem surprised at what I now effect, deeming it a miracle: Verily far greater works than these shall ye (my faithful, theosophic disciples,) do, after my ascension. St. Paul also, in the same scope of apprehension, observes, Henceforth know we no believer after the flesh . . . (but rather as members of a God of glory in heaven.) And again, But ye are come, &c. Hebrews xii. 22—24. And what St. John declares, respecting the paradisical glories of the New Jerusalem, i. e. of the perfection, or efflorescent stage of that Christianity, in which we are all growing up, if of the regeneration, needs not to be particularized in this place. [Philip*. iii. 11—16.]

As illustrative of the English Theology in its two chief forms of developement,— of the Mystical Writers, whose words he bringeth forth, viz. St. Bernh., August., Gregor., Rusbroch., Anon. de Spiritu et Anima, P. Florent. ab Hanswyck, Justus Orgelitanus, Harph., Gerson. Hugo a S. Victore, Thom. de Kempis, St. Bonaventura, Richard a St. Victore, Benjam. major, Lib. Fromundus, Eckartus, Joh. Taulerus, B. Teresa, Seraph. Firmanus, Anon. de inter. Domo. One or other place also of J. Evang. he illustrates, for fear his words might be mistaken. Concerning especially the breathing and the ceasing thereof, he observes, that the Apostle Paul says something to that purpose. Gal. ii. —'I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me;' that Job also says such a thing chap. xxiv. 14.—'If he set his heart upon man, if he gather unto himself his spirit and his breath,' (which words sound more favourably for him in the German translation.) And that the same may be found also in the words of B. Teresa, saying. 'This is such a death of the soul, that myself know not, whether or no she can breathe. I have to this hour much thought upon it, and it seems to me that she can not, or at least she herself knoweth not that she can.'

In illustration of the simple, experimental Bible christianity, and aggressive evangelical action of these latter days, though according to its best examples and discoveries. Which, as we have observed, requires to be impregnated with the recondite science, practice and experience of the antecedent divisions of this series, in order to be raised to its true perfection, and highest efficiency; that is, as the full manhood development of the Divine life, wisdom and power in the Church on earth: to which all astral and diabolical nature must be subjective.—Whilst, at the same time, we would not fail to recommend to the true graduating magus, who may desire to be an accomplished artist, after the mind and graceful model of the Lord Jesus, free from all harsh idiosyncrasies,—to pass through, both associatedly and officially, and spiritually, the experiences of this present methodist section.—End of INTERSCRIPT.]

VIII.—The Old and New Testaments of the Lord, JESUS CHRIST,—the pillar and standard of practical evangelical truth. This the popular, and devotional light in which the Holy Scriptures are to be regarded.—The other, or theosophic consideration of them, (and which affords a proof of their Divine Inspiration, though loose and partial in detail, and disseveredly composed,) is—as brief chronicles of the divine origin or creation, and of the degeneration or bestial-diabolic transmutation of the human nature in Adam, the natural head thereof; and then of the entire process of its redemption, retransmutation, and deification, by the “mystery of Christ” in the person of JESUS, as the second and divine head of the same.—Hence it is, the working of these two principles of life—of the rational-animal spirit of fallen man, and the holy, sophian Spirit of Christ,—forms the mystical ground of every narrative, however historically true, of the Scriptures; and the line and virtue of the Covenant, is the golden thread that runs through and illumines the whole. And hence they conclude with presenting to view the person of the Second Adam and Conquering Prince, all perfected, glorified, divine: and with thereupon inviting and admonishing all men to “follow him in the regeneration.”—That is, to cultivate the seed or spirit of grace, of moral holiness or love, of heaven or the heavenly humanity, or virgin wisdom of God, of the ‘divine nature,’ or—himself within them, into a powerful and all-predominant life; even to its full maturity or manhood-development, as thus visible in himself, the ‘perfect,’ ‘justified,’ ‘glorified’ Son of Man, and heavenly Virgin form of substantial light and Love, in whom the earthly nature or spirit, is swallowed up, ‘hid in God.’ And which transmutation is therefore possible to be effected in us—as he is the spiritual, heavenly parent and model and regenerator of the humanity, and (as the divine nature,) the element of our souls, possessed of omnipotent power over us,—if we will but conform to the laws of the divine nature, and co-operate with his horticultural, regenerative, unceasing action in us. Those laws and requirements, are revealed to us in the gospel, in the precepts and counsels of Christ, and in the subsequent elucidations and exhortations of his apostles, having been all fulfilled in his own example on earth; and which consist in the continual crucifixion of our fallen natural, or diabolical spirit, and renunciation of our animal, earthly will and wisdom: in other words, in a daily dying to all self, spiritual and natural, and in a turning of the faith and hope, and earnest prayer, or hungering desires of the soul, constantly and absolutely to God—into the love of God, the humility, meekness and patience of the divine light,—for deliverance from 'self,' and growth in grace, or salvation. And which spiritual diligence, labour and watchfulness, or passive subjectiveness on our part, must be persevered in, until the 'new birth' be fully brought forth in us, by our heavenly regenerator and magnetist; until the last remains of 'self' in the will, be finally absorbed in the power of God, and our life be thereupon transmuted into a spirit of love: which, and which only, is the gospel salvation!—The sum and end of the whole labour, being this: "that man, (the spirit of his soul being clothed with the regenerate, heavenly humanity, corporality, or 'flesh and blood of Christ,') may be able even in this world, to magically re-enter paradise, and 'eat of the tree of life' in the midst thereof, (as witnessed in the experience of Mrs. Pratt, related pp. 588—90 seq.) and so walk and act on the earth in divine power and understanding;* and that, on his mortal decease, he may be found a qualified subject and participant of those nameless, ravishing manifestations of wisdom, power and love, which shall spring up, and break-forth in fresh and fresh wonders, as displays of the unfathomable riches and glories of the God-head, in the kingdom of heaven, but especially in the souls of its redeemed inhabitants, even to all eternity:—in a word, that he may be a partaker of that same glory, wherewith JESUS, the King of Glory, and Lord of All—the Alpha and Omega—here exhibiteth himself crowned!—Thus are brought to a close, the words of the prophecy of this book; or the 'counsel of God' concerning man, in his creation, his fall, and his redemption in Christ! And, such the theosophic scope, spiritual unity, and divine certainty of the INSPIRED VOLUME; the contents of which, may well be termed the blessed gospel—or good tidings of great joy to all people! And how does the whole form a glorious demonstration of the love of God! or, that GOD, as our God—as in CHRIST JESUS—is mere LOVE, the POWER of LOVE!—Which power is in very deed, the universal basis of all things; and that quickening element, wherein, as before observed, our self-constringed, iron-hardened, insensible, ungrateful, unbelieving hearts and souls, have their momentary life and being! Ephes. iii. 8-19. 2 Cor. ii. 6, 7, etc.

* According to the prerogatives of man's first creation, and therefore of his full regeneration; when that which is outward is (virtually) as that which is inward, and there be no longer the division, and degradation of the created Virgin image of God into "male and female," like the beast creation, (Gen. i. 25—27;) but the garment of shame and ignominy—the ferine and sexual nature—having been virtually put off by regeneration, the man and the woman are again one in the Lord, who is both the father and spouse, or "bride," of the Virgin generation of the humanity. All which is the right Christian, Enochian faith and life on earth.

For Adam in the first creation, (when all was completed and perfect,) was in this world as a supreme being over it, having no share of its life and nature, that is, no sense or feeling of good and evil in distinction, from it; just as an individual in the magnetic sleep or trance, has no sensibility of pain or pleasure, by the animal body. He was in the world as a heavenly artist, medium and magist, that had power and skill to open the wonders of God in every power of outward nature.—An angel, we read, used at a certain time to come down into a pool at Jerusalem: the water, magnetised by the angel, gave forth its virtues; but the angel felt no impressions of weight or cold from the water. This is an image of Adam's first freedom from, and power over all outward nature. He could, wherever he went, do as this angel did—make every element and elementary thing, discover all the riches, virtues and powers of God, that were couched in it, without feeling any impressions of any kind from it. This was to have been the work both of Adam and his offspring, to make all the creation shew forth the glory of God; to spread paradise over all the earth, (which was then only existing in a certain place upon it, called the garden of Eden,) till the time came, that all the good in this world was to be called back to its first state, and all the evil in every part left to be possessed by the devil and his angels. But since man fell from this state into an animal life and nature, his work is changed, and he must now labour with sweat to till the cursed earth, both for himself and the beasts upon it. And must also toil in great anguish of mind, under the load of the cross, to regain his first heavenly birth of life, in the strait and narrow way thereto, strewed with briars and thorns, which has been opened for him by Jesus Christ; the end of which, when gained, will as intimated above, re-invest him with his first heaven in prerogatives.

CONCLUSION. Such, then, are the series of works which are deemed calculated to afford to the reader, a correct general apprehension of the profound and universal theological science of the chief subject of our proposed Biography. As likewise a conception of his far-seeing fideal realizations of the effects that should flow from his own Elias-restoring, Baptist-purifying ministration:—not only in the general diffusion of a simple, practical gospel christianity among the unsophisticate of the earth, as we behold in progress in our day; but also with regard to the induction of the intellectual unbelievers of all nations into the christian faith. Which is yet to be effected, as the final result of the revelation of the “mystery of Christ,”—of Deity, Nature, and all things—in BOHEMIUS, and of the refinement of all natural knowledge, philosophy and theology, the arts and sciences, mechanical and magical, which has ensued, and shall hereafter ensue, as a consequence or developement of it.

As a close, the following EXTRACT is offered to the reader's consideration:—

It is for want of considering the spirit of holiness, as a new nature, as a seed of God, a plant of paradise in the soul, and therefore as something that is to be nursed and cherished, to be cultivated and raised to perfection, by care and contrivance, by art and method, and a diligent use of the best means and most expedient instruments,—it is for want of considering it in this light, that so many people are so little benefited by it, and live and die strangers to that interior renovation, that holy, spiritual “oneness” with the glorified nature of the Lord Jesus, (John xvii. 21—24,) which they might have attained unto, had they but intended it.

For though the spirit of devotion is the gift of God, and not attainable by any mere power of our own,—yet it is mostly given, and never withheld from those who rightly seek, and prepare themselves for the reception of it.

And it is amazing to see how eagerly men of science and business employ their parts, their sagacity, time, study, application, and exercise—how all helps are called to their assistance, when anything is intended and desired in worldly matters; and how dull, infatuate, and unimproved they are—how little they use their parts, sagacity, and abilities, to quicken and cultivate the incorruptible seed of grace, or the Light and Spirit of God—which is the source of every divine blessing of holiness, power and wisdom, and therewith of every needful earthly good—implanted and latent in the ground of the soul.

Thus much by way of specification of the talent which is deemed indispensable for the proper representation of the genius and character of MR. LAW, (as contemplated by this Work;) or rather of the means and instruments whereby, the artist, who is qualified by nature and education for such a task, (being of pure methodist origin and understanding in religion,) may attain to the special ability, science and experience needful for its adequate performance. In a word, to present the portraiture of a man, which, whether as regards the subject of it, or the manner of its execution, may serve as a classic standard, or practical model of divine wisdom, solid learning and rhetorical art, for all future generations of the British people, and of mankind.—Communications on the subject, (or for liberty to make extracts from this Work,) to be addressed to the “Editor of Law's Memorial,” and left at 24, Ludgate-street, London. Christmas, 1856.

APPENDIX.—LAW'S PHILOSOPHICAL WRITINGS.

The following is an ABSTRACT of the treatises of MR. LAW, which are intended to constitute VOLS. II. and III., of the "INTRODUCTION TO THEOSOPHY." And which together with the previous volume, present a perfect, logical demonstration of Christianity, universal and evangelical, from the ground of Nature.

BOOK V.—THE APPEAL: OR, THE FUNDAMENTAL DOCTRINES OF CHRISTIANITY DEMONSTRATED. (Forming a Practical Guide to the Science of True Metaphysics.)

Chapter I.—Of creation in general. Of the origin of the soul. Whence will and thought are in the creature. Why the will is free. The origin of evil solely from the creature. This world not a first immediate creation of God. How the world comes to be in its present state. The first perfection of man. All things prove a trinity in God. Man hath the triune nature of God in him. Arianism and deism confuted by nature. That life is uniform through all creatures. That there is but one kind of death to be found in all nature. The fallen soul hath the nature of hell in it. Regeneration is a real birth of a divine life in the soul. That there is but one salvation possible in nature. This salvation only to be had from Jesus Christ. All the deist's faith and hope proved to be false.

Chapter II.—Of eternal and temporal nature. How nature is from God, and the scene of his action. How the creatures are out of it. Temporal nature created out of that which is eternal. The fallen angels brought the first disorders into nature. This world created to repair those disorders. Whence good and evil are in everything of this world. How heaven and hell are the foundation, or make up the whole of this world. How the fire of this world differs from eternal fire; and the matter of this world from the materiality of heaven. Eternal nature is the kingdom of heaven, the beatific manifestation of the triune Deity. The Deity is mere love and goodness. How wrath and anger came to be ascribed to God. Of fire in general. Of the unbeginning fire. Of the spirituality of fire. How fire comes to be in material things. Whence the possibility of kindling fire in the things of this world. Every man is, and must be, the kindler of his own eternal fire.

Chapter III.—The true ground of all the doctrines of the gospel discovered. Why Adam could make no atonement for his sins. Why and how Jesus Christ alone can make this atonement. Whence the shedding of blood for the remission of sins. What wrath or anger it is, that is quenched and atoned by the blood of Christ. Of the last sufferings of Christ. Why and how we must eat the flesh and drink the blood of Jesus Christ.

BOOK VI.—THE SPIRIT OF PRAYER, OR WAY TO THE REGENERATION. IN THREE PARTS.—(Being a Popular Treatise of the Art of Reconstituting the Dislocated Principles of Man's Threefold Life, or Nature, in their Original created Order, Relations and Subserviency. According to the Grounds established in the preceding Book V.)

PART FIRST. Chapter I.—The indifference and insensibility of men in general to their eternal interests. The original state of man as the son of God, or child of the total divine nature. His trial and fall. The commencement of his redemption. His real nature and state by reason of sin. How it differs from that of fallen angels. The means of his salvation, or recovery of the Light and holy Spirit of God. The new birth not a figurative expression, but a real, living process, or moral vegetation. The whole chapter being a familiar discourse of matters preparatory to the spirit of prayer.

Chapter II.—In what salvation, or the regenerate life consists, namely, in the manifestation of the nature, life and spirit of Jesus Christ in the new inward man. The means of attaining such a state, lie in faith, or the right direction and earnest working of the will. How the ground or principium of faith, which is a seed of "Christ," called in scripture, the "seed of the woman," or the "engrafted word," lies implanted in every soul. Its opening or development, the only way of salvation. The tokens by which the regenerate life discovers itself. All depends on adherence to it, and removing all impediments of earthly lusts from around it. The infallible truths by which we may be assured that our dependance is well grounded. The abandonment of self, and the true nature and worth of self-denials and mortification. No activity of our own, of any direct avail to salvation. The only way is the desire of the soul turned to God. [The further elucidation of these points, will be found in the last dialogue of the hereafter following treatise of the "Spirit of Love."]

PART SECOND, [the argument being set forth in the form of Dialogues, between (1.) Theophilus, a learned sage, and master of the science contained in the writings of ЯСОВ ВЪЯМЕ, surnamed centralis philosophus, (2.) an academic, or university-theologian and metaphysician, (3.) a plain, unlettered, honest, common-sense christian, and (4.) a rationalist, or natural moralist, whether Deist, Unitarian, or modern Swedenborgian.]

Dialogue I.—Introduction, on the vanity of spiritual knowledge where there is no religion, or true conversion of the heart to God. Spiritual books only useful as calls to the absolute renunciation of self, and the cultivation of the new life. The nature of self described, and the necessity of its complete obliteration or death demonstrated.——The actual grounds of this necessity here shown to be in the nature of things, and not in the arbitrary provisions of God's providence. How the will of the creature stands between God and nature, as the only opener of all good and evil. Its turning to God in true faith and earnestness of desire, the means of bringing heaven into the soul; that is, of attaining to the heavenly birth of the soul's life. The accordance of these doctrines with the Scripture. One only death and one only life throughout all nature. Vindication of the 'Appeal.' [This discourse, which involves an elucidation of the writings of ВЪЯМЕ, deferred to another occasion; when Theophilus proposes to describe the true nature and end of those writings, and the right use and manner of reading them. The concluding Fifth and Sixth Dialogues of this Book, will accordingly be found to be devoted to that object.]

Dialogue II.—The philosophy of the gospel doctrine of redemption and salvation continued.

How Adam stood in his state of perfection, or creation. The gradual fall or declension of his will, through earthly imagination. The division of Adam, (the corporified idea, or Virgin image of God, nature and all things,) into male and female, (like the earthly animals, Gen. i. 25-27.) The fall consummated, whereby the inward nature of man became diabolic, and the outward, ferine, gross and bestial. The means of human recovery, by the promised redeemer, or covenant of the 'seed of the woman.'—The argument for the renunciation of self and the world resumed, (from the first dialogue,) on the rational ground of this philosophy. In what consists the great apostasy—'the sin of all sins, and heresy of all heresies.' Hours and forms of prayer considered.

Dialogue III.—The difficulty attending the total conversion of the heart to God. The whole life of the fallen nature to be parted with, and yet no possibility in man of doing it. The omnipotence of the love of God, and how it overcomes all evil and opposition, when the heart turns to God, in a right understanding and faith. How this love has followed and inspired man from the beginning, as the 'Immanuel' or seed of Christ, treasured in the ground of every soul. The beginning of salvation, by the awakening or germination of this holy virgin seed. The new creature formed, or the spirit of divine love opened and working in man. How this spirit is procured and known, so as to avoid delusion. The prayer or respiration of this spirit, the only genuine devotion. No other spirit in man (and therefore no mere speculation or reasoning, however transcendental,) works to salvation. The consistency of this doctrine with free will. Prayer the continual and habitual state of the will, according as it works with the Spirit of God, or the spirit of its own selfish nature, fallen from God. All the soul's goodness, or growth in holiness, dependent on the continuity and earnestness of the will-state, or desire (as given up to God.) The outward expression of prayer justly discriminated. How far manuals of devotion, or set forms of prayer, are profitable. The degrees of prayer, or steps of the spiritual life to its perfection, (the state of Jesus glorified, Philip. iii. 12-15.) Why the motion, 'drawing' or magnetism of the Holy Spirit, (John xii. 32.) is the source of every aspiration to unite with the goodness and holiness of God. How this Spirit (or life of the element of Jesus-God,) is known by the pure, free, universal goodness, patience, meekness and love, which it inspires. These tempers in man, as the aim of his life, the certain effects of the Holy Spirit's presence and influence; and an evidence to him of his being in the process of the regeneration. 1 John iii. 24.

Dialogue IV.—The whole foundation of the gospel, in the certainty of man's original perfection, his bestial-diabolic fall, and his redemption. The primeval fire and light, still lodged in the human soul. Salvation consists in the consciousness or reopening (or vegetation and blossoming) of this latent, divine life. How it differs from any natural goodness, and yet must become a habit of the life, even the 'life of our life, and the spirit of our spirit.' The doctrine of the fall, the best and only safe means for converting unbelievers. Its proofs not historical, but are lodged in human nature itself, and self-evident to every sober, rational mind. (See also, 'Introduction to Theosophy,' Vol. I, Book I, pp. 39-62.) The possibility, occasion and manner of the fall, briefly sketched. The difference between the fall of mankind, and that of the Luciferian angelical hierarchy. The certain redemption of the former. Gospel christianity only its actual commencement, as involved in the glorification of Christ's humanity. How gospel christianity stands distinguished from the original, universal christianity, which began with Adam; was the religion of the patriarchs, and of their descendants in the direct trunk lines of the East; of the divergent branch of Abram, of Moses and the prophets; and in short of every penitent man, in every part of the earth, that had faith and hope towards God, to be delivered from the evil of this world. [END OF VOL. II.]

Dialogue V.—[Of the Way to Divine Knowledge. Being, (according to the intimation at the end of the Second Dialogue,) an Introduction to the Philosophy of the writings of BÖHME.] Learned expositions of scripture, like religious opinions, utterly useless. The only purpose to be regarded in scripture, is its use in advancing the new birth of the divine life, and directing it to perfection. [Hence it is, the sayings of our Lord, and the exhortations of the Apostle Paul, are ever found by truly awakened christians, to be of such incomparable spiritual efficacy.] ЯСОН BÖHME the only original guide to the philosophy of this new life. [Note.—He that will take BÖHME for his guide in regeneration, and for a time keep solely to the gospel and his devotional books, following implicitly his directions therein, will assuredly find by blessed experience, the truth of what is here asserted.] The nature of Böhme's disclosures, (as the crowning science of the gospel.) For whom his works are intended, and by-whom alone they can safely be consulted. The impossibility of searching into these things—appertaining to the supernatural sphere of the divine wisdom—by mere human reason. True apprehension derived from the Spirit of the supernatural Deity, working in man's natural immortal life, as he works in eternal nature. Hence the only way to divine knowledge, is the way of the gospel; which proposes the new birth, as the means of attaining to light and love. How the way to this birth lies wholly in the will. How the will of man rules his own nature, as the will of God rules the eternal nature. The nature of this will, as proceeding from the latent divine life, or power of redemption in the soul. Faith, in the true Scripture sense, as it relates to salvation, nothing else than the working of this new engrafted divine power, in the will of the soul.

Dialogue VI.—Nature and God both known by their manifestation in the mind. In what the whole ground of religion consists. Nature and God both defined. The birth and generation of the properties of nature as set forth by BÖHME. First form of Nature, and its three properties. Their beatification by the supernatural divine light and love. How they constitute the substantiality, or working powers of darkness, in which the supernatural deity moves and shines, or becomes perceptible. The degrees by which they become materialised: [or how the supernatural, intellectual, free, magic will of the Deity, the Nothing and All, inverts itself as self-desire, to seek and find itself,—thereby compressing or contracting, as it were, its infinity of power and virtue into a point, or centre of nature; and how it thence returns forward, pregnant with its essentiality into its own original expansive liberty, having completed the comprehension, sensation and manifestation of itself. VIRGIN SOPHIA.] In what state the original, eternal nature, or substantiality of heaven, was brought forth. Its fundamental constitution (as mere self-desire of omnipotence,) never intended to be known essentially or experientially, but only scientially or ideally. The reason of its discovery, and the creation of temporal nature as a consequence of the fall. Into what elements the upraised wrathful properties of the eternal nature finally passed, by the controlling will of God, in their three first circulations, or "days." The comprehension of temporal nature in Seven Properties, (the electric forces.) The place of the sun in their midst, or the Copernican philosophy opened from transcendental grounds. The end of temporal nature, and general review of the providential design connected with its origin, existence and termination. The philosophy of individual regeneration practically set forth. The birth of fire, or fourth form of nature in regeneration, (the actual transit into the divine life.) Admonition concerning the right use of the mystery revealed in BÖHMÉ. Practical religious value of this philosophy, as the last instructions that God can afford to the understanding of men, to prevail upon them, to qualify themselves to enjoy in a future state, the great glories procured for them by Jesus Christ; that is, to seek earnestly the regeneration.

BOOK VII.—THE SPIRIT OF LOVE, OR FULL BIRTH, END, TRUTH AND LIFE OF THE REGENERATION. IN THREE PARTS.—Being in Answer to Two Objections against the Doctrine of the former Discourses, which represents the Deity as mere Love.

The Objections are thus expressed. First, That the doctrine of pure and universal love may be too refined and imaginary; because, (says the objector) 'I find, that however I like it, I cannot attain to it, or overcome all that in my nature which is contrary to it, do what I can; and so I am only able to be an admirer of that love which I cannot lay hold of. Secondly, Because I find so much said in Scripture, of a righteousness and justice, a wrath and vengeance of God that must be atoned and satisfied &c., though I am in love with that description of the Deity which is given in these Discourses, as a being that is all love, yet I have some doubt whether the Scripture will allow of it. Thus stand the objections, the Answers to which respectively occupy the first and second parts of the present treatise.—The third part is a practical evangelical application of the subject; and conclusion to the whole of the antecedent discourses.

PART FIRST. Answer to the First Objection: which is contained in a Letter from Theophilus to Theogenes.—The nature and perfection of the spirit of love. No man can participate in this spirit, until he lives freely, willingly, and universally according to it. Its indispensable necessity as the means of union between God and man. The state of nature and of man as deprived of the spirit of love, by reason of the fall. The process of its recovery by purification. The fundamental reason of this process, opened out in a description of Nature, and its seven properties. The similitude of these properties in the nature and being of man. All evil the consequence of nature working in self, or in a state of separation from God. All good the power and presence of the super-natural Deity, dwelling and working in the properties of Nature. How his presence and the birth of the spirit of love, are the same thing. Being a spirit of life, it can rise in one only way, and from one only cause. Its birth, by the kindling of the eternal fire, or opening of the super-natural light in the centre of (nature in) the soul, and consequent transmutation of the soul's natural life. Hence the truth and necessity of the Christian redemption, and the doctrine of the cross.

PART SECOND. Answer to the Second Objection. This set forth in Two Dialogues, between Theophilus, and Theogenes accompanied by a Friend.

Dialogue I.—The Deity, an infinite source of pure overflowing love and joy. All nature and creature brought forth to manifest and rejoice in this divine love and happiness. Nothing can be in God which is not infinite and eternal. What wrath is in itself. It can be no where but in nature, and that in a state of disorder. The origin of wrath and evil, the same. In man at the disunion of his two-fold life, of Deity and nature. All man's salvation and good from the manifestation of the life of the Deity in the soul. Perpetual inspiration essential to a life of goodness. The ground of salvation, the inspoken word of the divine nature. This, the subject of all revealed dispensations. The earthly self to be resisted and renounced. Wrath ascribed to God, because the creature has changed its state in nature, therefore must experience God as manifested in the generation of nature. How wrath originates in nature, though this a manifestation of the Deity. God and nature distinguished. Wrath kindled by the will of the creature, when it breaks or loses the union of the seven heavenly properties. The Deity a supernatural governing love and wisdom, always seeking the restoration of lapsed nature and creature. The texts of Scripture confine the working of wrath to the powers of nature. Vengeance not allowed to man, because that a working with fallen nature. Only to God who is supernatural, that is to the light and love of God.

Dialogue II.—The atonement of the Divine wrath or justice, and the extinguishing of sin in the creature, only different expressions for one and the same thing. The analogy of scripture teaches this. The atonement, the one work of regeneration, rightly understood. The sufferings and death of Christ, the gracious effects of divine love and goodness. In what sense the justice or righteousness of God is satisfied thereby. Man's original righteousness from God his law. No peace till this be perfectly restored, or satisfied. God's being all love does not abate the force of the scripture-denunciations of eternal torments (or punishments) to those who live and die in sin. The popular doctrine of the vicarious suffering of Christ, erroneous; and opens a door either to superstition or to infidelity. "Christ's suffering and dying, nothing else but Christ conquering and overcoming all the false good and hellish evil of the fallen state of man. His resurrection and ascension into heaven, though great in themselves, and necessary parts of our deliverance, but the consequences and effects of his sufferings and death—his entering into possession of what he had obtained by them." The necessity and efficacy of the sufferings and death of Christ, as that which qualified him to become a common father of life to all that died in Adam. Only acceptable to the love of God on that account. How we, by virtue of Christ's accomplished process, have victory over all the evils of our fallen state, and shall rise to the glory of Christ—heirs of God. The Bible to be studied in this simple, adorable light.

PART THIRD. Of the Art of 'dying to SELF,' and of attaining to the 'full birth of LOVE.' Or, of the actual Conversion of the WILL with its Imagination and Desire, wholly, unceasingly to God. Being a Practical Conclusion to the preceding discourses.

Dialogue III.—The practical ground of the spirit of love. The moral and amiable of this natural life, easily mistaken (by mere reasoners and transcendentalists,) for the spirit of divine love in the soul. The danger of this delusion. The doctrine, and the spirit of love itself, two very different things. How we are to acquire the spirit of love.—The Scripture doctrine of election and reprobation, in its ground. The figures under which it is represented, Cain and Abel, Esau and Jacob, etc. Nothing elected but the 'seed' of the new man, or heavenly birth within us; all else reprobated to death.—Two ways of induction into virtue and holiness. One by rules and precepts, the other by the spirit itself, born in the soul; the former must precede the latter. What divine love is, and its effects within us. All that we are and have from Adam as fallen—all must be given up, if the birth of divine love is to be brought forth in us. All our natural contrariety to divine love, must be lost and swallowed up in it, as darkness is unperceived in the light. This, the state of the first man, previous to the fall.—Concerning darkness and light. The priority and glory of Light; which is ALL POWER. In itself invisible, and incomprehensible, and only known by possessing darkness, or substantiality. Light immaterial, though materiality always with visible light. All light whether in heaven or earth, only so much darkness illuminated. All nature and creature as such, darkness; and therefore can only work according to the powers of darkness. Nothing evil or tormenting but that which nature or self, does. Self or nature, the three properties of desire thrown into a fourth of wrath, through the loss or unattainableness of their only (supernatural) good. No possible deliverance from self, but by the new birth of the supernatural Deity in the soul. Desire, the ground of life, and all sensibility of life. How this manifest in outward nature, by attraction, with its essential properties. The relations of the visible world and all its productions to the invisible and hellish world. The way of escaping from, and abolishing all evil arising in the soul, or the art of dying to self. God must be and do all: the state of heart, the perfect conviction of this truth induces. The results of a true practical conformity to this conviction, or the spirit of prayer. The marriage-feast of the soul and Virgin SOPHIA, or full birth of the spirit of love. The one simple way to attain this, as here shown, the one infallible way, because the will is the leader of the creaturally life. Christ having obtained an infinite power over the human nature, must sooner or later see all enemies under his feet. Summary conclusion.

BOOK VIII.—A COLLECTION OF LETTERS.—Being Portions of the Correspondence of the Author of the Preceding Books, relating to Topics of Scientific and Practical Christian Doctrine, treated of, therein. [END of VOL. III., Introduction to Theosophy.]

BEHMEN'S WRITINGS. (Intro. to Theos. iv—xv., roy. 18mo., 4to.)

A SUMMARY Account of the Works of JACOB BÖHME, wherein is Revealed the Mystery of the Supernatural DEITY and VIRGIN WISDOM, and of the Birth and ground of NATURE; the Creation of Angels, and the Fall of One Hierarchy thereof; the Creation of this Gross, Mutable World, or Temporary Principle of Nature; and the Ground and Development, or the entire Mystery of MAN, (as ADAM and CHRIST, composing every individual,) in his Creation, in the process of his Fall, and in the process of his Restoration, or Cure. Also, with respect to his Individual process of Regeneration, and his ultimate Deification.

[The Emblem at the head of Böhme's Works, is an Angel passing through the air, blowing a Trumpet, signifying the Demonstration of the Gospel Religion, by a Revelation of universal and self-evident Truth; out of which is sounding forth these words,—To all Christians, Jews, Turks, and Heathens, to All the Nations of the earth, This Trumpet sounds for the Last Time.]

1. Aurora. The Dawning of the Eternal Day, or the Infancy of Creation.—An unfinished piece, of the childhood of his illumination. [Wherein he describes as best he could—as a stammering, timid, unlettered child, the opening panorama of the divine wisdom, set before his internal vision. He narrates the circumstances and ground of the angelical creation; the fall of the chief of the three hierarchies thereof, and the direful effects which ensued thereupon in eternal nature, (by their unbalancing of its seven equipoised powers or forces;) and the thereupon creation of this material, temporal system, (from the condensed, compacted, dark, fiery, fluidic, spoiled materiality and galvanic powers of the spiritual, angelical world, good as well as bad,) as the first act of the curative process of the thus originated evil in nature. The narrative was broken off, by violence, before the author came to the creation of Man.—This piece should not be perused till the reader is pretty conversant with J. B.'s other works; as herein his descriptions of the seven spirits, by reason of his at the time non-apprehension of the origin of the fourth property, the fire, differ from, and are relatively inferior to, those contained in the subsequent treatises, where that point had become recognised in his understanding. Which fourth property is the opening of the life of the supernatural liberty, abyssal nothing, or free, magic Eye,—in Nature; that is, of the pure Deity in nature.] A.D. 1612. VOL. IV. (bourgeois.)

2. De Tribus Principiis cum Appendice. Of the Three Principles or Worlds of Nature, with Appendix.—Describing the Eternal Birth of Nature, in its Seven Properties, and Two Co-eternal Principles, also this Third Principle, and the Creation of All Things. Lastly of MAN, as the Crown and Comprehension, or Developed Central Divine Idea of all, and therefore a true Lord and Prince over All. His Fall, with all the circumstances of it; and his Redemption, by virtue of the 'Mystery' and Process of Christ. With a concurrent evangelical application of the truths developed. A.D. 1618.—[Herein Man's creation is declared, from which it appears, that Man is the noblest being in the universe of God. That he is the primal centre, the immediate abode, habitation, organism, and personal medium of Deity, who, as the triune, incomprehensible, universal power, or Spirit of life—a mere goodness, light, and truth, has no form nor visibility but in Man—understand, the VIRGIN Man, as created, and as restored and glorified in Christ. (Oh, MAN! SEEK AND KNOW THYSELF.)—In this work Man, (who was created as the instrument by which God would heal the disordered, corrupted body of Nature, and restore all to its primitive perfection,) is circumstantially described, in his original creation, his fall, and his redemption, by the "mystery of Christ;" who, as a second Adam, or Man, came to heal and restore the first ruined Adam, and to effect all that, which the Deity would have had accomplished by him.—A knowledge of theosophic science, as of the experimental philosophy of animal magnetism, mediumship, spiritism, alchemy, etc., is, however, essential for a due apprehension of these deep mysteries of nature and magic.] V.

3. De Triplici Vita Hominis. Of the Threefold Life of Man, according to the Three Principles. That is, as the generated Idea, or Supernatural Image of the abyssal tri-une Will-spirit of the Deity—the VIRGIN SOPHIA, incarnated in, and clothed with the Eternal and Temporal Nature.—And from the relations of Man's present state of grace and nature, setting forth his practical duties and obligations, in order to the regeneration, and attainment of the prerogatives of his glorious redemption in Christ. A.D. 1619. VI.

4. Psychologia Vera cum Supplemento. Forty Questions concerning the Soul of Man, Answered, with Supplement.—In the Answer to the First Question, is presented a Symbolical Diagram of the Wonder-EYE of the Divine Wisdom, the supernatural Abyss or Habitation of the Tri-une Deity; with the Central Generation therein, (by the Father-Will of the Trinity of Deity,) of Eternal Nature, with its Two co-eternal Principles of black Darkness and lustrous Light, and this ex-generated third or mixed, temporal Principle understood therein. A.D. 1620. [Understand these two eternal principles of positive and negative, the nay and the yea of the speaking tri-une Word of Life, the SUPREME ONE—that they together constitute Nature, or eternal Nature: not the dark world alone, which is termed the ground or root of nature, but both principles together, in perfect, indissoluble union.—By the fall of angels, (through the perverse, obstinate, proud, self-willed, ignorant, rebellious misuse of their free, uncontrollable will; being unduly elevated by the sudden perception of their own wonderful beauty, power and glory,)—who had their life and being, or qualification in this eternal, or divine nature,—it came to be discovered or experienced, how the majestic visibility, body, or 'glory of God,' or, 'kingdom of heaven,' has this darkness as its basis or ground, and how the discovered life of this dark principle in itself, is a life of the most horrible wrathfulness, anguish, falsehood, and misery. And hence arose the Scripture and theological term, God's wrath, or the wrath of God—signifying, not that the will-spirit of the Deity is wrathful, or capable of wrath, for he is the one only good, pure, and lovely, the unchangeable love; but that in bringing forth his ineffable, intellectual, will-spirit into a perceptible essence or nature, a something sensible to creatures, by desire,—this desire, as such, must be the very opposite, or contrary spirit to his own Being of gentleness, peace, delight, holiness, happiness; and by overcoming or possessing which, his real goodness, holiness, light and truth become manifested in a triumphing, glorious life. This twofold life is then Nature, eternal Nature, the "divine nature," in which all immortal beings are created to live, and enjoy the divine happiness:—though alas! how many will frustrate the divine intention, and render ineffectual the divine benevolence toward them in the incarnation, sufferings and death of Christ; and so fall into the dark, fiery centre, self-contractive generation, or root of Nature—the eternal dying of the divine liberty, the life of desire, wrath, and all misery.] VII.

5. De Incarnatione Verbi, Partes tres.—Part First. Of the Incarnation of Jesus Christ the Son of God. That is, Concerning the Virgin Mary, what she was from the Original, and what kind of Mother she came to be in the *Blessing and Conception of her Son, Jesus Christ; and how the Eternal Word is become Man.—Part Second. Of the Suffering, Dying, Death, Resurrection, Ascension, and Glorification of Christ, as the first and second Adam. And why we must all follow him in the same Process, and Way thus opened for us, back to the Throne of God.—Part Third. Of the Tree of the Christian Faith; shewing the whole Christian Doctrine of Faith and Practice. Wholly brought forth out of the Supernatural Centre, through the Three Principles. A.D. 1620. VIII.

6. Sex Puncta Theosophica. Containing a Description of the Life of the Supernatural Wisdom and Abyss of Deity, and of that of the Three Principles of Nature, also of each Principle as in itself. Shewing how Men should seek, find, and know the Ground of Nature.—7. Sex Puncta Mystica. Clearing up certain deep Points involved and not resolved in the foregoing Dissertations.—8. Mysterium Pansophicum. A further diversified deep Consideration concerning the Heavenly and Earthly Mystery of Nature, and of the full working and fruition of the life of the Latter. A.D. 1620. VIII.

9. De Signatura Rerum. Shewing the Sense, Virtue, and Qualification of the Shapes and Forms of the Creation. And what the Beginning, Ruin, and Cure of Everything is, Spiritual and Physical. [The Ground of Physiognomy, Phrenology, Homœopathy, &c. &c.—The Language of Nature, or Speech of the Divine Wisdom, apprehensible of her regenerate, clairvoyant children. A book of the sublimest wisdom and angelical melody; and key to the regeneration of the medical art.] A.D. 1621. IX.

Christosophia. The Way to Christ, and Divine Wisdom. Pars prima.—10. De Regeneratione. Of the Grounds and Reasons of Regeneration, being an Introduction to the Gospel Religion.—11. De Pœnitentia vera. A Practical Entrance upon the Way of the Regeneration, or New Birth.—12. De Equanimitate. Of True Resignation, and Advancement in the Regenerate Life. Or, of continual Dying to Self, and demersing the Will and Desire wholly into the Meekness, Humility, and Love of the Supernatural, Divine Element.—13. De Tentatione, et 4 Com-

* I beg leave respectfully to observe, that it had been well if the recent Synod, held at Rome, had condescended to look into this author's demonstration, and revelation of the "mystery of Christ," previously to issuing forth to the world the false Dogma (!) it recently propounded, of the immaculate conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Her high Blessedness and inward reconstitution, whereby she became interiorly, as highly graduated as Adam when he was breathed forth out of the womb of Deity, and nothing could be higher, (so qualifying her to be the mother of the throne-prince of eternity, the "man Christ Jesus,"—God and man,) took place only on her acceptance of the divine salutation, through the angel Gabriel.—The loan of a copy of this Book of the Incarnation was offered to the Synod, at the time of its sittings, by the Writer, through the agency of the See of Rome in this county, but was not accepted, or the offer overlooked, though acknowledged. January, 1856.

plexionibus. Of the Ground and Nature of Temptation; whence it arises, and how to Overcome in the Conflict. [The first three Tracts composed the only book the author published in print: all the rest of his writings being left by him in the hands of his friends, in MS.] A.D. 1622. ix.

14. Libri Apologetici duo, contra Balth. Tilken. Two Apologies.—The first, in Defence and Elucidation of the Aurora. The second, concerning Predestination; and of the Person of Christ, and the Virgin Mary, as treated of in the before-named Book of the Incarnation. A.D. 1621, 23.—15. Anti Stiefelius, libri duo. (1.) Considerations of E.S.'s book, concerning the Threefold State of Man, and the New Birth; also of the Last Zion, or New Jerusalem, &c. (2.) Concerning the Errors of the Sects of E.S. and Ezech. Meths relating to Christian Perfection. A.D. 1621, 22.—16. Apologia contra G. Richter, cum libello Apologetico ad Senatum Gericensem. The Author's Defence of his printed Book of The Way to Christ, and his Aurora, against the Libellous Censures of the Primate, G. R. A.D. 1624. x.

17. De Electione Gratia, cum Appendice de Poenitentia. Being a Fundamental Demonstration of the Scripture Doctrine of Election, or Predestination. With Appendix, shewing the Way to attain to the clear Vision and Knowledge of Divine Mysteries. A.D. 1623. [Grounded in the deepest Supernatural, Abyssal Centre—the instinct, constitution, or scientia of the Fountain Word and Creator of all things; and thence traced into, and through Nature. And showing the inevitableness of that which is evil and that which is good.] xii.

18. Mysterium Magnum: an Exposition of the First Book of Moses, called Genesis. In Three Parts. Wherein is treated of the Revelation of the Divine Word, through the Three Principles of Nature; and of the Original of the World and the Creation. Also, wherein the Kingdom of Nature, and the Kingdom of Grace, are explained. A.D. 1623. [Demonstrating the literal truth of the descriptions of the book of Genesis. But to apprehend such truth a magic understanding is needful; one versed in theosophic science, and also in the modern experimentalism of animal magnetism, clairvoyance, spiritism, mediumship, &c. That is, the incidents narrated being penned from a central voyance—of the two eternal principles and of time, therefore only the like regenerated, divine understanding can duly apprehend the true and full sense thereof.] xii, xiii.

Christosophia. Pars secunda.—19. Theosopia. Of Divine Contemplation: how to attain unto Divine Clairvoyance and Understanding, or Wisdom. (Unfinished.)—20. De Vita Mentali. Of the Supersensual, Superrational or Divine Intellectual Life. [See F. Lee's enlargement of this piece in Vol. IV., large 4to., English ed. of J. B.'s Works; which is the most preferable.]—21. Colloquium Viatorum. A Dialogue between a Regenerate Soul, and one in the Way or Process, and Seeking the full birth of Divine Wisdom.—22. Epitome de Mysterio Magno. A Theosophic Summary of the Grounds and Process of the Regeneration.—23. Appendix. Suspiria Viatorum. The Holy Prayer Book (containing Prayers of the highest magnetical power, and virtue.) Left unfinished. A.D. 1624. xiv.

24. De Testamento Christi. Of Baptism and the Supper. How they are to be understood, both according to the Old and New Testaments. Set forth from the true Theosophical Ground, through the Three Principles of the Divine Manifestation. A.D. 1624. xiii.

25. Quæstiones Theosophicæ. Being a Consideration of the Divine Revelation. That is, of God, Nature, and Creation, Heaven, Hell, and this World, together with all Creatures. Whence all things in Nature have their original, for what, and why, they are created. Especially of MAN, or Adam and Christ. Set forth in 177 Questions, with Answers to Thirteen of them. (Unfinished.)—26. Tabula Principiorum. A Table or Consideration of the Deity, in Unity, Trinity, and Wisdom, and as manifested through the Three Principles of Nature; with the Explanation thereof. In order to enter upon a right study of these writings, the reader is advised to previously go through the treatises of Mr. Law, contained in the Vols. I., II. and III. of the "Introduction to Theosophy," named pp. xix., xxvi.-ix., and in the order there given.† Then, having obtained a conception of the entire scope and unity of Böhme's Philosophy, (commencing with the supernatural ground, out of which, or rather in the centre of which free, clear-seeing Eye, or vision—as a point—Nature eternally is generated, by the astrigent motion, attraction, or self-desire of the Divine Triune Will, or Word of life, therein, and universally possessing the same,)—he will be well prepared to pursue his object, according to the special directions for that end given by Mr. Law to an academic friend, at the end of the "Way to Divine Knowledge." Freher's Writings will be found to be a sequential study to the whole, and are as follows.

POSTSCRIPT—ON METHODIST EVANGELISM.

EDUCATION in the Science of Spiritual Nature, or Theosophy, and its Practical Elucidations, Ancient and Modern, of Natural and Divine Magic, etc., the Way to Perfect the Genius of Methodism as an Evangelical Agency. [Being a Quotation from the body of the Work from which the preceding extracts are taken; and having reference to the series of studies, pp. xvii—xxiii. sup.]

"The particular objects of these selections of books, will be found described annexed to each, and by the due perusal and study thereof, in the order in which they are set forth, the Candidate may get his mind thoroughly imbued with the perfect principles of evangelical sanctity,—free from partial, abusive, sectarian dogmas and opinions. For he is recommended to pass over all merely Romish, and indeed Protestant peculiarities of doctrine, crudities and idiosyncrasies, that he may meet with in his researches, and to simply extract from each work, the pure Christian honey and edifying instruction contained therein.—And such a ground of qualification we may remark, is needful, not only to do justice to the personal and other subjects of the memorial, but with regard to the world at large; inasmuch as the work is proposed to be rendered a kind of standard text book of divine science elemental and recondite, in all its solid theoretic and practical diversities, for future ages, with rules and directions for its complete attainment, all being set forth in the purest classic simplicity.

"One very important result we may mention, to be expected from the proposed work, if duly executed, will be the refinement and exaltation of the genius of Methodism, which is undeniably the most advanced system of popular evangelism that this country and the continent of America, with the world at large, have ever witnessed: by which however, we would also intimate the spirit of religious philanthropy now so universally operative, (originated instrumentally by it,) as well as the religious principles more immediately designated by that name. This system of simple practical Gospel doctrine, and of preaching and applying the same, being crossed, so to speak, with the large and diversified erudition and experiences of the great masters of spiritual science of former ages—of the ancient philosophic, as well as Christian mystic schools, and further sublimated with the maturing light of theosophy, and the revealments of modern experimental transcendentalism, (of the divine, as well as the natural magic,) may no longer remain a mere elementary and dogmatic theology, adapted to the masses of our own country or heathen lands, who can receive and believe without rational demonstration, and who, indeed, for the most part, are incapable of logical and metaphysical research—(that is, of tracing back all the issues of a conclusion into the premises, or the perfect development of the premises in the conclusion, so as to know assuredly the beginning and the end to be one; and again, of discerning whether the tendered and received doctrines of faith, in all their parts and involutions, be in harmony, or identical with natural and infallible abstract truth,—) but, we say, be exalted into a perfect philosophy, or complete logical science. And this commending and approving itself by the highest demonstration,—not only of ratiōive elucidation, from the ground of nature, and a clear interpretation of the signatures and forms of its scientz and qualities in its vegetations; but also by the display and evidence of a complete mastership over all the manifested powers of the dark principle,—transmuting by a touch, (or by a mere act of the will upon a right conditioned subject,) all their predominant evil qualification, only into more sublime vitality. All which divine magical potencies were continually referred to by our LORD, as being the natural prerogatives of his faithful, theosophic, perfect disciples, after the redemption and glorification of the humanity; and confirmed by him after his resurrection from the dead, as summarily related at the close of St. Mark's Gospel.—Then we say, may the Gospel be rightly and fully preached, and no rational understanding (whether of the East or the West,) on hearing it, (Rom. x. 8—17,) shall be able to gainsay or resist the belief of it. Then, as we have observed, may Missionaries go forth, who shall be capable of meeting the honest objections and just demands of the most refined rationalist or inveterate sceptic, by demonstrating (as well to his outward senses, as to his understanding, soul and spirit,) the verities of the Christian faith, and their identity with the universal voice of nature."—See BÖHME'S Mysterium Magnum, especially Chaps. xvi, lxvii, and xxx.

AN INTRODUCTION TO THEOSOPHY, OR THE SCIENCE OF THE "mystery of CHRIST," that is, of Deity, Nature, and Creature, (Col. i. 15—20.) Embracing the Philosophy of all the Working Powers of Life, Magical and Spiritual. And forming a Practical Guide to the Sublimest Purity, Sanctity, and Evangelical Perfection. Also, to the Attainment of Divine Vision, and all holy Angelical Arts, Potencies, and other Prerogatives of the Regeneration.—Vol. I. Complete in itself. London: John Kendrick, 27, Ludgate Street.

DEDICATION.—To the Students of the Universities, Colleges, and Schools of Christendom. To Professors of Metaphysical, Mechanical, and Natural Science in all its Forms. To Men and Women of Education generally, of fundamentally Orthodox Faith. To Deists, Arians, Unitarians, Swedenborgians, and other Defective and Ungrounded Creeds, Rationalists and Sceptics of Every Kind. To Just-Minded and Enlightened Mahomedans, Jews, and Oriental Patriarch-Religionists. But especially, To the Gospel Minister, and Missionary, (whether to the Barbaric, or the Intellectual Peoples,)—This Introduction to Theosophy, or the Science of the Ground and Mystery of all Things, is most Humbly, and Affectionately Dedicated.

Note.—A Copy of this Volume has been presented, and forwarded to every Missionary of the Four great London Societies (the Propagation of the Gospel, the Church Missionary, the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary, and the London Missionary,) labouring in India and Ceylon,—as affording to them, the clue to the true and only means of the induction of the intellectual Hindoo and Mahomedan nations, (out of their own patriarchal, or natural religious ground,) into the evangelical faith of Christianity. A Copy has also been presented to every chief College, Romish and Protestant, throughout Great Britain and Ireland, as well as to upwards of Forty principal Colleges and Libraries of the United States. This, with a view to direct the studies and researches of the present rising and future generations, to the true philosophy of Nature and Christianity, as opened in the writings of LAW, BÖHME and FRÉHER, as well as to the perfect practice and attainment of spiritual Regeneration. And further, as a guide to the only safe way, whereby enlightened christian minds may approach the modern revived sciences of Animal or Vital Magnetism and Magic, with their wondrous arcana henceforth to be revealed. When this philosophy shall be duly apprehended, then 'will the end come' of the Babel confusion of theological opinions, and 'there shall be one fold and one shepherd.' John x. 16.

In the Preface to this Volume, it is thus observed, alluding to the modern 'experimental transcendentalisms,' of Animal Magnetism, Clairvoyance, etc. :—"For the desideratum to progress in supersensual science, is thereby supplied, and the revelations of the magical or spiritual ground of nature, by true divine media, 'children of the mystery,' subjects of the high regeneration and theosophic magi, may henceforth far surpass in sublimity of character, and beneficial results to the world, the discoveries of the laws, powers and properties of material nature." In reference to this point also, the following further quotation is here inserted:—

"About the sixteenth volume of the Course, ('INTRODUCTION TO THEOSOPHY,') might commence FRÉHER'S WRITINGS, which would probably occupy about twenty-six volumes.—Next after these, might be presented some judicious treatises of ANIMAL MAGNETISM, setting forth in proper classification, its various recorded and known phenomena, both of body and mind, and also in respect to the instinctive and inanimate creation; and then indicating the ground and mystery of the same, with suggestions as to further research and experiment, all according to the constituted principles, properties, and laws of nature, as described in the previously given theosophical treatises. And also showing, how this wonderful, but as yet undeveloped, nay, unapprehended discovery of these last ages, (of Animal or Vital Magnetism,) has ever been the great experimental desideratum of Theosophy, though alluded to, and prophesied of, by its grand masters, in their writings, as an event that should assuredly arrive, and to be continually expected. When, indeed, the WRITINGS of BÖHME, or rather the mysteries of Wisdom and Truth so wonderfully couched in them, should be rendered apprehensible to every right conditioned subject and artist; nay, when greater works or wonders of pure natural and evangelical truth, than any he had recorded (not of Swedenborgian, Cahagnetic, Davianian, and such like mere astral phantasmata,) should be open to contemplation, at the will and direction of the controlling and rightly graduated magus. * * *

The chief practical end, then, of these last proposed volumes in the Course, would be the faithful exposition of the art, whereby the humanity with respect to its moral or divine nature, may be magically freed from its saturnine constringency, pollution and deadness, (as implied in the imperative requirements of the doctrine of our Lord, in order to realise his salvation,) and then powerfully introduced into the birth, element and qualifications of the spirit of love, or its original and redeemed inward perfection. This, it is admitted, is the end of the common Christianity, but the Church, as such, no longer possessing the power of the keys, or high graduation in divine science and art, is no longer able to effect the same, as contemplated in the Gospel: which intimates, that the true disciple or perfect believer in Christ, shall be interiorly as his glorified head and Lord, and shall manifest that sublimated exaltation of nature, by corresponding works, wisdom and power.

We might also refer to the glorious benefits of such a divine art in respect to Education, in opening and strengthening the intellectual powers, (that is, by the infusion of wisdom and knowledge into the liberate intellect, during the magical sleep, etc.,) but shall conclude these remarks with merely repeating, that the object of these last volumes, in the Course, would be to turn to the gospel and proper account, in such position and relation, and after a further adequate development of it, the glorious rediscovery, philosophy and phenomena of Animal, or Mental Magnetism, Spiritism, etc., in other words, of the NATURAL and DIVINE MAGIC. (Myster. Magn. lxviii. 7.)
